She compared her own experiences with the educational system to the nineteenth-century prohibitions against slaves learning how to read and write. In the words of Douglass, if he [the enslaved] knew how to read, "there [would] be no keeping him." In Williams' view not much had changed. Although she was living in a "different era and there were different people," things were still the same - "the same old discrimination still resides in the heart of the white man." She placed these teachers and her life at one end of the continuum and Douglass' on the other. A century after Douglass, instead of being barred from being taught literacy skills de jure, Williams experienced a de facto ban from learning how to read and write. She was in school, but the classrooms were filled with white teachers who were unwilling to teach, tedious worksheets, poor classroom management, and frustrated students suffering from either boredom or confusion. For white teachers to be able to be in a position of power to dictate what I can, cannot and will learn, only desiring that I may get bored because of the inconsistency and the mis-management of the classroom and remain illiterate and ignorant; or better yet distracted because some children decide to misbehave because they don't understand, and (sic.) ashamed to ask for help.^[1] In this essay, she executed an impassioned and brave indictment of her white teachers for denying her and her peers access to a decent education. After illustrating the similarities, Williams wrote a call to action as her conclusion, one that encouraged her peers to hold teachers accountable and to become active learners. Williams received two different responses to her essay. The Frederick Douglass Foundation, a conservative organization, awarded Williams their first Spirit of Freedom award. By contrast, her teachers and administrators disciplined her, instead of considering Williams' analysis or perhaps investigating the validity of her argument as she hoped. What ensued is emblematic of what many children of color experience today. Almost immediately, the staff labeled Williams a "problem" and "angry." She received D's, although prior to the essay she had consistently earned A's. She received disciplinary threats and actions for behaviors such as "laughing in class." This harassment finally forced her to transfer to another school. Eventually, Williams was pushed out of the district altogether. Although Williams' essay may have been exceptionally poignant and candid, her experience with school discipline is not anomalous. Disciplining Violence Throughout the United States, students of color, particularly Black and Latino youths, are more often suspended, expelled, policed, and arrested than their counterparts.^[2] Contemporary discipline policies, called zero-tolerance policies, were initially created to prevent students from bringing guns or weapons to school. Today, students are increasingly being suspended for behavioral "problems" such as truancy and disobedience. These experiences of being criminalized, disciplined, and punished by school authorities negatively impact the students' academic trajectories, life chances, and subjectivities. Unsurprisingly, Black and Latino youths are disproportionately represented in school discipline data. Their numbers mirror the disparities in incarceration rates. Scholars and activists have examined prisons as violent institutions. For instance and most recently, sociologist Beth Richie argued that prisons help to produce, and are sites of, violence against women of color.^[3] Motivated by what has been called the "school to prison pipeline" (the theory that schools funnel children into prison), more activists, scholars, and researchers are examining the problem of racial disparities in school discipline numbers. The federal government has begun to intervene in school districts alleged to racially discriminate in discipline policies. Alternative school discipline/violence prevention practices and programs have been developed in order to curtail overreliance on suspensions and expulsions. A number of these programs provide conflict resolution training, life skills development, and counseling services to marginalized youths. Other strategies include restorative justice programs that teach students about communication and accountability. Many of these alternative programs focus on teaching "at-risk" youths how to manage their feelings more effectively by employing "positive" mediums such as poetry or jobs skills development. The logic behind these violence prevention strategies, it seems, is that if children of color learn how to manage their behavior and feelings better, it is less likely that they will be disciplinary problems. While it is valuable that these programs may serve to alleviate tensions between youths, when done without a political purpose, these can have the effect of policing children's feelings and temper a kind of rage that is actually necessary to incite political resistance. Under a neoliberal context, which favors criminalization and incarceration over social welfare services and policies, support for discipline reforms can be considered a necessary shift in social and political priorities. Unfortunately, these violence prevention reforms are problematizing the children instead addressing a systemic problem. Under traditional school discipline policies, most students get into trouble for nonviolent behaviors and as a result of racial biases.^[4] Most of the efforts and even the popular ethos of society are more inclined to locate the problem with the children, their lack of guidance, their parents, their tempers, their culture, and their socio-economic status. Instead of implicating the social, political, and economic contexts that may propel children to act out or the racial/gendered phobic impulse to characterize the child as a problem and then legitimize punishing her, the child is the problem. Disappearing Violence Few if any current discipline reform strategies identify school discipline policies and violence prevention policies as instruments of structural and institutional forms of violence. Even fewer examine racial and gendered violence as dimensions of the policies. By focusing the gaze toward students, other forms of violence are obfuscated including the violence sanctioned by the schools and enacted by law enforcement. For instance, despite beatings and murders committed by police officers who have been deputized to assist with school discipline, school violence prevention and discipline policies, even when reformed, do not generally highlight police as instruments of violence.^[5] Discipline policies that target sexual harassment have not examined the explicit forms of sexual harassment performed by those that are authorized to regulate and discipline young people. According to the National Economic and Social Rights Initiative (2007), a 14 year-old female student reported that a 'security guard accused [her] of having a knife... They took [her] to a room and made [her] take off [her] shirt and pants to check [her] bra. They didn't call [her] parents or let [her] talk to a teacher [she] knew. [She] didn't have a knife just like [she] told them' (23). Neither does violence prevention include efforts to address other forms of harassment, including sexual harassment, that students receive almost every day from some of their teachers and other faculty. Put differently, as we focus on the problem of the student something disappears from our framework: In a society that is shaped by racial and gendered violence, schools, including their teachers, officers, and policies, have long been afforded the discretion to punish, police, and harass students of color. If there are students of color to police then the job implicitly includes this function. Whether the teachers and other staff consciously or unconsciously know or actually do it, they are authorized to perform this duty. In other words, alternative violence programs that do not center the problem of society replicate the violence of the zero tolerance. What gets missed in the student-focused disciplinary approach is a structural concern: Many groups of color exist within a context where their lives simply do not matter. Little credit is given to the child who is trying to understand and navigate through this reality. Instead, when a child finds the words to aptly describe what she experiences, as in the case of Williams, she faces hostility from her teachers and administrators. Racialized and Gendered Violence At the same time that these communities of color are criminalized, disciplined, and punished, their various experiences with violence often fail to qualify as "violence." Instead, sometimes the violence they experience simply does not matter. For example, although nearly 40 percent of all missing persons in the United States are people of color (33 percent of those missing are Black), [6] critics report "that most media attention is reserved for white women." [7] In particular, the layers of violence to which girls of color are subject, [8] especially those who are labeled defiant or problematic, are unintelligible and negligible. Many of the young girls of color, those who are formally and informally labeled as problems, are vulnerable to multiple layers of violence - institutional, state, and interpersonal forms of violence. These forms of violence are not limited to welfare policies, hyper-surveillance, and mass incarceration; they include sexual assaults and murders by community members, partners, and strangers. [9][10] There is also the violence of the social order that positions them to be the receptacles for racist and misogynistic projections. These fantasies are foregrounded in anxieties and insecurities that extend far beyond the girls and anything they could have possibly done wrong. Some young women of color, particularly Black girls, are rendered intolerable because they are imagined to embody the set of morals, ethics, and needs that threaten the sanctity of White civil society. Among a number of offensive characterizations, the girl of color can be perceived as too angry, defiant, despondent, and critical. She is also imagined as a subject that illegitimately takes from society, its institutions, and good people. At the same time as she extracts resources from society, she is ungrateful for its generosity. Other times, she is too private, foreign, alienating, and unapproachable. She is dispensable. She simply does not play well with White people. She is a problem. The impulse to characterize her in these scathing terms complements the drive to neglect her, rendering insignificant the complexities of her existence and needs. Little or no attention is paid to her life, what it means or entails. Generally speaking, discipline policies and violence prevention reform are not meant to recognize these girls' lives. They often invisibilize the girl of color whose life and subjectivity are affected by the interlock between layers of violence. Instead, discipline policies and their alternatives steer the gaze away from a society that sanctions and performs racial and gendered violence. Society and its schools compulsively organize around containing, disciplining, and reforming the girls of color it has problematized and criminalized. This is done in order to legitimize the hegemony of the social hierarchy and its institutions. Williams' story illustrates the need to examine racial disparities in school discipline policies. However, because her story is not anomalous and mirrors a historical and structural condition, the discipline policies and the efforts to reform them have to be contextualized beyond this moment. The problem is with an atemporal coercive society shaped by racial and gendered violence, which authorizes teachers, administrators, and other faculty, including law enforcement officials, to police, harass, and punish those it deems a problem. In order to address the problems with school discipline policies and their effects, perhaps we should start with examining the racial and gendered forms of violence that undergird them. I currently use "woman of color" even though I am working examining the politics of "women of color." I believe that a more nuanced analysis of this term is necessary, one that includes scales of differences within and between groups of Black and non-Black women of color, including the racialized ways in which gender is understood, performed but also denied and prohibited. Mental Health Bill Caters to Big Pharma and Would Expand Coercive Treatments Friday, 06 November 2015 00:00 By Oryx Cohen, Truthout | Op-Ed font size decrease font size increase font size Print 58 Email Rep. Tim Murphy (R-Pennsylvania), right, and former House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) during a news conference about the Affordable Care Act at the Republican National Committee headquarters in Washington, October 23, 2013. (Gabriella Demczuk / The New York Times) On its surface, the mental health reform bill introduced by Congressman Tim Murphy of Pennsylvania looks promising. Murphy is the only licensed psychologist in Congress, everybody agrees that our mental health system is not working, and we would all like to help families in crisis. On closer inspection, however, the Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act (HR 2646) - commonly known as the "Murphy Bill" - appears to cater more closely to the desires of pharmaceutical companies than to the actual needs of people in psychological distress, perhaps because of Murphy's connections to key lobbyists. Murphy's financial supporters include the American Psychiatric Association, psychiatric hospitals and the National Rifle Association, and his campaign contributors include no less than nine pharmaceutical companies and a law firm that represents Big Pharma. The bill was marked up Wednesday in the House Energy and Commerce health subcommittee and passed by that subcommittee, despite strong objections from almost all the Democrats on the full committee. The next step is for the full Energy and Commerce Committee to vote on moving the bill forward, followed by the House vote. A timetable has not yet been set. Although the bill is gaining momentum, there is substantial opposition, so passage is still uncertain. If the Murphy Bill is passed, psychiatric hospitals and pharmaceutical companies will reap huge financial benefits as a result of increased hospitalization and forced treatment. One way the bill will do this is by creating a financial incentive for states that implement "assisted outpatient treatment": court-ordered treatment (including medication) for people whom a judge deems as living with "severe mental illness" and unlikely to willingly take prescribed psychiatric medications. Psychiatric hospitals would also benefit from the bill's proposed elimination of the "Institutions for Mental Diseases exclusion," which currently makes mental health institutions ineligible for funding through Medicaid. By enabling psychiatric hospitals to access this funding, the Murphy Bill could usher in an unprecedented era of re-institutionalization, going against the recommendations of the Supreme Court's Olmstead decision, which asserted in 1999 that people with mental health issues have the right to be in the least restrictive setting possible. If passed, the Murphy Bill will lead to large-scale re-institutionalization in hospitals for longer periods of time for people who now generally have the right to live in supportive communities of their choosing. The Murphy Bill threatens the recovery and community integration practices that current consumers of mental health services and survivors of coercive psychiatric interventions have worked so hard for over the last 40-plus years to create for those most in need. In particular, the bill would dismantle the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration (SAMHSA), which actively funds and supports important efforts to rebuild the community and family life of people dealing with mental health issues through non-medicalized institutions such as peer-run respite (short-term crisis centers managed by people living with mental health concerns and available to "self-referred" individuals seeking to avoid hospitalization through support from peers). SAMHSA also supports suicide prevention initiatives, trauma-informed practices, Emotional CPR (an educational program aimed at teaching people how to assist others through an emotional crisis), Wellness Recovery Action Planning and much more, all of which would suffer if SAMHSA were dismantled. The bill would also threaten people's rights by weakening state "Protection and Advocacy for People with Mental Illness" organizations, which offer rights protections, and the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, making it easier to force people into treatment. Murphy and his supporters criticize opponents of the bill for being "against families." They fail to acknowledge that families are not united in support of this bill. While the national headquarters of the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) has come out in support of the bill, many local NAMI affiliates are against it. Activists who identify as current consumers of mental health services or survivors of psychiatric interventions are frequently approached by desperate family members who are looking for alternatives to coercive and institutional responses to mental health crises. We are finding ways to include families because rebuilding strong family connections can be essential to recovery. Community-Based Solutions to Mental Health Crises Rosey Padgett in Prescott, Arizona, recently contacted the National Coalition for Mental Health Recovery because her son Nick was trapped in the mental health system. Currently, he is in the Arizona State Hospital. "Nick has been placed in mental hospitals approximately 30 different times over the past seven years," Padgett says. "He has been court ordered and placed in many different group homes. All of the group homes have made his behavior worse due to being forced into these situations when these homes are not an environment for healing. No wonder so many people with emotional and mental distress commit suicide: They feel dead inside and hopeless from being forced to take medications that make them feel horrible." What has worked for Nick is connecting with other peers and having tremendous family support. A woman from the local Hearing Voices Network has begun visiting with him and providing peer support, as they are both voice hearers. He is doing so much better that the doctors at Arizona State Hospital are talking about releasing him in a few months. Nick's story is similar to the stories of others around the country who are languishing in and out of hospitals. Often it is not what is happening in those hospitals that helps people reestablish a life; it is the family and community support they have once they leave the hospital. Murphy Bill proponents point to a lack of institutionally or medically directed mental health treatment as being a primary cause of the alarming rise of violent acts such as school shootings and suicide. However, when we look at this argument closely, it falls apart. This argument overlooks the fact that the link between mental health conditions and violence is minuscule, as many studies have shown. Mentalhealth.gov, a website run by the federal government, says: The vast majority of people with mental health problems are no more likely to be violent than anyone else. Most people with mental illness are not violent and only 3 to 5 percent of violent acts can be attributed to individuals living with a serious mental illness. In fact, people with severe mental illnesses are over 10 times more likely to be victims of violent crime than the general population.... When economist Richard Florida took a look at gun deaths and other social indicators, he found that higher populations, more stress, more immigrants and more mental illness didn't correlate with more gun deaths. But he did find one telling correlation: States with tighter gun control laws have fewer gun-related deaths. We should probably be doing more questioning of the treatments themselves. For example, many antidepressant medications, such as Paxil, that are commonly prescribed to young people, have a black box warning that they can increase suicidality among teenagers. We all want to see violence and suicide go away, but passing legislation that imposes increased mental health screenings and forced treatments (including psychiatric medication) on unwilling individuals is neither an ethical nor an effective way to accomplish this, especially given the risk of medications backfiring. Standing Up for Peer-Run Recovery Perhaps Murphy and supporters of his bill should ask those of us who have lived through extreme emotional distress for ideas and possible solutions. Thus far, the many activists who share the concerns I have outlined here have been denied a seat at the table in congressional discussions of the Murphy bill, despite the recommendation made in 2003 by the President's New Freedom Commission on Mental Health, which said that transformations of the mental health system should be led and informed by consumers of mental health services. What would survivors of extreme emotional distress say if we were at the table with Congressman Murphy? Many of us would say that our mental health crises occur when we feel alone, abused and generally isolated from the rest of the world. We would thus raise our concern that, rather than reestablishing social connections, the current mental health system often disconnects us even more and leads us to a lifelong dependence on the system itself. Let's take Dan, who as an adolescent contemplated shooting up his middle school. It wasn't medication or therapy that prevented this terrible potential tragedy; Dan says it was talking to his friends at school and playing Dungeons and Dragons that grounded him and gave him hope. In other words, peer support. What would have happened if Dan had been flagged as a result of a mental health screening? He likely would have been removed from his social circles and placed in an institution, perhaps becoming permanently dependent on the system. Dan is now a part of a peer-run recovery community called the Western Massachusetts Recovery Learning Community. He has his own place to live, a job, friends and a life, and is starring in the documentary HEALING VOICES. The Recovery Learning Community helps people to establish much-needed social connections and gain a sense of belonging. This community is there when Dan needs it, and he doesn't need a diagnosis or a referral to attend the many support groups and wellness activities: the strength of places like the Recovery Learning Community is that they are integrated and open part of the broader community and not separate from it. But if the Murphy Bill passes, places like this might cease to exist. By requiring expensive clinical oversight and unprecedented congressional control over federal grants, the Murphy Bill targets consumer-run organizations and peer specialists, making it likely that national consumer-run organizations will be shut down, severely restricting what peer specialists can do and posing a threat to local peer-run organizations such as the Recovery Learning Community. Critics dismiss many opponents of the Murphy bill as being "anti-medication," but in fact many of us take medications and have found them useful. Our philosophy is that people should have accurate information to make informed choices, including the choice to use alternatives to medications. With the increase in violence and suicide and the alarming fact that people in the public mental health system die an average of 25 years younger than the rest of the population, shouldn't researching and supporting alternatives be a priority? Current consumers of mental health services and survivors of psychiatric interventions are willing to share our knowledge and expertise. Is anyone willing to listen? A.G. Schneiderman Announces Convictions Of Two Former Group Home Workers For Endangering The Welfare Of Developmentally Disabled Residents Of A State-Run Group Home Former Direct Service Assistant At Melville Estates Group Home Found Guilty After Trial; Other Pleads Guilty (Long Island, NY) Attorney General Eric T. Schneiderman announced today that James P. Brown, Jr., a former Direct Service Assistant at the state run group home Melville Estates in Melville, was found guilty of violently punching a 53 year-old, severely impaired, intellectually disabled resident of the home in the face in February 2014. Melville Estates is a group home for developmentally disabled adults in Melville, NY. In a separate prosecution arising out of Melville Estates, Alexy Chambers admitted that in February 2014 while he was employed as a Direct Service Assistant at Melville Estates, he punched a 56 year-old, profoundly intellectually disabled adult in the face while the resident did nothing other than sit in a chair. Both Defendants were removed from the state payroll and are awaiting sentence. "These acts of abuse by health care workers on the disabled and other vulnerable members of our society will not be tolerated," said Attorney General Schneiderman. "My office will continue to aggressively pursue and prosecute those individuals who prey upon our defenseless and infirm citizens." Attorney General Schneiderman thanked the Office for People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD) and the New York State Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs for their assistance in conducting the investigations. Brown, 33, of Farmingdale, was convicted of Endangering the Welfare of an Incompetent or Physically Disabled Person in the First Degree, a class E felony, after a bench trial before Supreme Court Justice William Condon in Suffolk County Court in Riverhead. Chambers, 21, of Brentwood, pled guilty to Endangering the Welfare of an Incompetent or Physically Disabled Person in the Second Degree, a class A misdemeanor. The case was investigated by Special Investigator Stephen Clarke and Special Investigator Greg S. Muroff with assistance from Deputy Chief Investigator Kenneth Morgan. The cases are being prosecuted by Special Assistant Attorney General Lara Merchan of the Medicaid Fraud Control Unit (MFCU) Hauppauge Regional Office. Jane Zwirn-Turkin is the Regional Director of the Hauppauge Regional Office. MFCU is led by Acting Director Amy Held and Assistant Deputy Attorney General Paul J. Mahoney. The Criminal Justice Division is led by Executive Deputy Attorney General Kelly Donovan. Family searches for cause of daughter's death in group home | www.wftv.com Family searches for cause of daughter's death in group home 1 5 2 19 ORANGE COUNTY, Fla. — Local family members said they just watched what would have been their daughter's 13th birthday pass and they are still trying to find out why she died in a group home. At the time Kencia Derat's death wasn't considered suspicious, so there was never an official autopsy. But her family called Channel 9's Jeff Deal when the family's own doctor found some things it said raised serious questions. The family said the girl was sexually abused before she died. Family members told Deal they believe it happened while she was living in the group home. "Words are not able to describe the pain and confusion that they're grappling with," family attorney Zachary West said. Kencia had cerebral palsy and in 2012 was moved into a group home in Sorrento operated by Betty's Home & Health Services. In late September she was found unresponsive in the home and later died at Florida Hospital Waterman. Hospital records show a call was made to the Medical Examiner's Office, which at the time denied taking the case. The death certificate indicates she died of natural causes: cardiac arrest related to her cerebral palsy. But the family, still looking for answers, hired a private forensic pathologist to do an autopsy. He found what the family believes was abuse. "Which, in his extensive experience, was strongly suggestive of sexual abuse," West said. The family blames the group home and is threatening a lawsuit. "This is an attempt by the family to try to harm this wonderful, wonderful company," group home attorney Lisa Augspurger said. Augspurger said she believes there's no merit to the claims and said the home has a flawless record in state inspections. Now the Medical Examiner's Office has reopened the case. They are waiting on forensic test results to come back to determine if there was any foul play in Kencia's death. The Lake County Sheriff's Department said there is not yet a criminal case; it is considered an open death investigation. Augspurger said the group home is ready to challenge any lawsuit related to her death. Source: <http://www.wftv.com/news/news/local/family-searches-cause-daughters-death-group-home/npHHc/>

Residents complain after police called to halfway house 28 times in 6 months Neighbors are complaining that lax supervision by the operators of a metro Atlanta halfway house are putting others in danger. The halfway house for troubled teens is located on Fellowship Road in Tucker, just northeast of Atlanta, and police have been called to the property 28 times in the last six months for various types of disorderly conduct. Dylan Goldman installed security cameras around his home after the nearby halfway house moved to his neighborhood a couple of years ago. "There's no accountability over there and the problem I have is my personal safety and the safety of my dogs," Goldman said. There have been numerous disorderly juvenile calls, person armed calls and even a call about an assault. Neighbors have become accustomed to seeing the police. "Oh, it's regularly, it's all the time," said Goldman. "I would say at least once a week. A construction worker said he was shot in the elbow with a BB gun while working on property behind the halfway house. A DeKalb County police report indicates that officers had been called to the home two days before that incident in reference to teens shooting at people with BB guns. CBS46 went to the halfway house in search of an explanation. There was only one supervisor on site and she didn't want to address the concerns. "There's nobody doing anything about this," Goldman said. We contacted Vision Youth Services, who manages the home, and we were told we would hear from someone in charge later. DeKalb County Housing Authority CEO Pete Walker said the housing authority owns the property on Fellowship Road, but Vision Youth Services manages the group home. The housing authority terminated the lease on Oct. 29 because management failed to maintain and pay for utilities and defaulted their payment agreement by not paying nearly $10,000 in rent. "We did choose to terminate the lease agreement with them and that's going to be effective Jan. 2 because we wanted to give them time to move the kids somewhere else," Walker said. Walker responded to a CBS46 investigation after learning about all the police calls to the group home from our report, which aired after the group home's lease was terminated. "I apologize to the neighborhood for this happening because I had no idea this was happening," said Walker, who expressed concern about the lack of adequate management at the group home. When asked if any information on the home was ever brought to his attention, Walker said, "Not at all. The first time I ever heard it was from you." "If you said three times this happened, I would say, Okay, that's a real problem," said Walker. "But 28 is completely unacceptable." We also learned that police had been called to the home after a man in the neighborhood said he was shot in the elbow by a BB gun. A police report indicates that officers had been called to the home two days earlier in reference to teens shooting at people with BB guns. "We have not heard anything about any source of disruption in the neighborhood, which would have been a violation of the lease had we known," said Walker. We spoke with the owner of Vision Youth Services and she said they have paid rent in full and this is all a misunderstanding. We checked back with the housing authority to clarify and we were assured rent has not been paid and the lease has been terminated. So many children in foster care seeking stability and permanence Placement with relatives not always an option Finding adoptive homes is a challenge Help by adopting, supporting adoptive and foster-care families, relatives or emergency-care facilities By Eva M. Guzman Special to the Star-Telegram LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story Every child deserves a loving and enriching home environment. Every child deserves joy and the opportunity to grow up happy and healthy. In some homes, however, childhood experiences are far from what they should be, and removal of children due to abuse has become a sad fact of life. Yet, no matter how abusive or chaotic the circumstances, separation from home and family can be extremely traumatic for a child. To help ease the distress of separation, the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services looks for relatives to care for children rather than placing the child in a foster home or an emergency shelter. Unfortunately, placement with relatives is not always an option. Based on my experience as a judge and chair of the Supreme Court Children's Commission, I can say without hesitation that for children in foster care, the term emergency aptly describes their reality. During a recent trip to Corpus Christi, I was blessed with the chance to visit The Ark, an emergency shelter that provides placement and critical care services for children removed from their homes due to abuse or neglect. When I arrived at the shelter, I met several toddlers who happily played in a clean and safe environment. A sweet 3-year-old girl immediately ran up to me and asked, "Can I have a hug?" It warmed my heart to wrap my arms around her and give her a loving embrace. Another child ran up to me for a hug, followed by another and then another. A few minutes and several hugs later, I was overwhelmed by the affection emanating from these dear children. Despite enduring pain and loss that many of us could never comprehend, they were open-hearted and eager to experience the kindness of a hug, even from a stranger. I remain inspired by their resilience and ability to connect with others during a time of crisis and vulnerability in their lives. Naturally, I left The Ark wondering about the fate of each child I met. Would they return home to their families or join the approximately 31,000 children currently living in our state foster care system? Far too many children grow up in foster care in Texas without ever obtaining stability and permanence in their home lives. What if you and your community could change that? In 2014, more than 6,500 Texas children were in foster care available for adoption. Finding adoptive homes is a challenge for our state's child welfare agency, especially for older foster youth. Even young adults who have aged out of foster care long to be adopted or to connect with relatives — to find a forever family. Every November, our nation celebrates Adoption Awareness Month to bring attention to the plight of children in foster care and to encourage families to open their hearts and homes to children who live with uncertainty about their futures. To adopt a child from foster care is to chart a new course for that child. This November, let us be mindful of the extraordinary opportunity we each have to change a child's life for the better. And let us greet that opportunity with open minds, loving hearts and a commitment to making a difference in the lives of others. Whether it be through adoption or support of adoptive families, foster parents, relatives or emergency-care facilities, we can work together to achieve a brighter future for children in need. My Turn: Arizona foster care is still broken Fred Klein, AZ I See It 3:06 p.m. MST November 6, 2015 My Turn: We've decided that foster care is a law-enforcement matter rather than the social-services problem it is. The new Department of Child Safety has been tasked to better protect Arizona kids. (Photo: Pat Shannahan/The Republic) For the last 10 years I've been a member of a Foster Care Review Board, one of more than 50 in Maricopa County. The boards' charge is to advise the juvenile courts that oversee the foster-care system, mainly to ensure that cases move toward resolution and not become stuck in the bureaucratic maze. Our monthly hearings, usually involving 20 or more children, are open to all participants, mainly biological parents, foster parents, Department of Child Services case managers and, sometimes, the kids themselves. They give us a look into Arizona's foster care system most citizens lack. My take-away from this exposure is anything but encouraging. Recent state-instituted changes, including the rebranding that took place under Governor Brewer and the top-level-executive overhaul initiated by Gov. Doug Ducey, have brought no recognizable improvements in a badly overburdened system. AZCENTRAL
My Turn: DCS is just rearranging deck chairs for kids The brunt of responsibility for DCS functioning still falls on the case managers, many of whom are just a year or two out of college. They typically have caseloads of upwards of 60 children whom they must visit monthly and whose health and educational progress they must monitor. They also have to keep in touch with the (sometimes many) adults involved in each case, sit through court appearances that sometimes drag on for hours because of delays and lawyer wrangling over scheduling, fill out the acres of paperwork their agency demands and, yes, show up at FCRB hearings. It's no wonder they're often at wits' end, wondering if there are better ways to make a living. The snafus don't end there. Parental drug addiction is the main cause of child removal in Arizona, and the families involved almost always are poor. Babies who are born drug addicted commonly have continuing medical, developmental and behavioral problems that must be dealt with by a state welfare system that is itself underfunded and overburdened. AZCENTRAL
Arizona foster care system critically short on families Children whose parents are suddenly removed by death or incarceration must stand in line to get the counseling they need to help cope with their losses. Extra educational services such as tutoring or custom instruction commonly are required for kids whose chaotic home lives didn't permit regular school attendance; those are the kinds of things usually sacrificed when school budgets are tight. Because of a lack of available foster homes we've increasingly seen children as young as 7 being placed in dormitory-style group homes with scant parental oversight. Problems are greatly exacerbated when the lone parent in a home has untreated mental-health issues. Publicly financed care in this area is especially hard to come by, leaving many children's cases in limbo until mom or dad can get the help they need, or not. Chances for family reunification or adoption often fall by the wayside while this process plays out. AZCENTRAL Suit details kids' troubled time in foster care Foster care typically gets public attention only when a so-called scandal is involved, such as in 2013 when it was reported that thousands of reported instances of child abuse or neglect had gone uninvestigated. That revelation came as no surprise to anyone in or near a system that was (and still is) swamped by a burgeoning case load triggered by the Great Recession. In early 2014 Gov. Jan

Brewer changed the agency's name from Child Protective Services to the current DCS and chose a new director to head it. He didn't last much past November's gubernatorial election. Greg McKay, the director picked by Gov. Ducey, stands out mainly for his 20-year record as a Phoenix police officer. Abruptly changing agency heads rarely is a good idea, and whatever his other qualifications, McKay's appointment signaled mainly that the new governor sees foster care as a law-enforcement matter rather than the social-services problem it is. Fred Klein (Photo: handout) That's not a positive message. Saying that a problem is complex and deep-seated usually is a way of saying it can't be solved anytime soon. That's especially true in a state that isn't known for generously financing social services. Gov. Brewer's reorganization reportedly involved the addition of some 200 new case-manager posts, but from most accounts that was like buying a size-six shoe for a child whose feet had grown from a five to an eight. Putting another couple hundred case workers on the job would help immediately, as would beefing up the other services foster care needs to succeed. DSS screens out child abuse reports that don't merit investigation Lauren Sausser Email @laurenmsausser Nov 7 2015 7:00 pm x The South Carolina social services agency received more than 1,300 allegations of "out-of-home" child abuse and neglect last year, but its team of investigators opened fewer than 400 investigations, new data shows. Online To read the original "Warehousing Our Children" series, go to postandcourier.com/group-homes. Some reports were sent to law enforcement agencies for investigation. Others were "screened out" because they failed to meet the criteria for abuse or neglect, as defined by state law. Taron Davis, deputy director in the child welfare services division for the Department of Social Services, said the agency was not equipped to drill down into the data to provide more specific information about 994 abuse and neglect reports that were not investigated. She did not know how many abuse allegations were handled by police or simply closed because they did not merit investigation. "Just because we're not taking action, doesn't mean another entity isn't taking action," Davis said. "It really varies case by case." Agency spokeswoman Karen Wingo said in a prepared statement that DSS receives allegations on a wide range of issues, "a number of which do not rise to the level of abuse or neglect, even if all of the allegations were true." For example, she wrote, the team that investigates out-of-home abuse at DSS may receive a tip that a child was bitten by a playmate at day care. The report could be accurate but it doesn't meet the criteria for abuse. The new 2015 fiscal year data, published on the agency's website, resembles data from previous years. During the 2014 fiscal year, the department received 1,055 out-of-home abuse or neglect referrals but investigated only 431. In 2013, it received 760 referrals but investigated only 399. Most of the investigations launched by DSS in 2015 involved out-of-home abuse or neglect allegations in foster homes, group homes or psychiatric institutions for children. Investigators rarely found enough evidence to support the claims, their numbers show. For example, the agency opened 104 investigations into abuse or neglect in group homes and institutions last year but determined only eight cases were "indicated or founded." Investigators also found evidence to prove 14 cases of abuse or neglect in child day care facilities and 25 cases of abuse or neglect in foster homes. The agency provided the names of group homes and institutions where it opened investigations last year. But DSS would not disclose where it determined abuse and neglect had been committed because the results of those investigations are protected by state law. The recent Post and Courier series "Warehousing our Children" determined it is nearly impossible for the public to know where children have been abused or neglected. Meanwhile, South Carolina sends its youngest foster children into group homes and institutions at a higher rate than any other state in the country, even though best practices indicate most children thrive with families, not in residential, congregate care settings. The state spends millions of dollars a year on these facilities, but taxpayers cannot evaluate where children are kept safe. The newspaper's series reported that child welfare experts have expressed long-running concerns that the embattled social services agency doesn't sufficiently investigate child abuse allegations inside these facilities. "I think transparency is a problem. They'll say they don't have the staff to do it," said state Sen. Katrina Shealy, R-Lexington, a member of the DSS Oversight Committee. "They don't have enough people to follow up on all those complaints. They've requested more staff. We've given them the money to hire more staff and they haven't filled the positions." Fourteen positions are funded for the team that investigates out-of-home abuse and neglect at DSS. There are currently two vacancies. Camden attorney Robert Butcher is particularly concerned that the agency discards reports alleging child-on-child sexual abuse inside group homes and foster homes. "It's not investigated ... because it's not an adult that's harmed a child," Butcher said. "And they don't have to track it." The state law defining child abuse and neglect includes offenses ranging from abandonment and malnourishment to sexual and mental abuse. It does not specifically mention child-on-child sexual abuse. "If we receive a report of sexual abuse that is child-on-child sexual abuse, we don't necessarily screen those out," said Davis, the deputy DSS director. For example, she said, if an adult is responsible for the welfare of a child and fails to protect the child from child-on-child sexual abuse, the case may warrant investigation. Butcher represents a Greenville man who filed suit last month against DSS in Richland County. The man, a former foster child named K.C. in court records, alleges the agency failed to protect him from sexual abuse in various group homes and foster homes. In an interview with The Post and Courier earlier this year, K.C. said he was sexually active with his sister and other foster children between 1999 and 2004. He contends the state agency continued to place him in homes with his sister and other children even though his caseworkers knew that they engaged in sexual activity with each other. They should have been separated and treated for their behavior, he said. K.C. served time in a Department of Juvenile Justice facility for raping his sister. He went back to prison as a young adult for fondling a child. "(K.C.), as someone who was sexually acting out (as a child), should have gotten the treatment and isolation that he needed, so he wouldn't have ended up in the DJJ system," Butcher said. "That's the problem. We're socializing people into the adult system by not treating them when they're children." State officials do not discuss pending litigation. Terrorizing Students: The Criminalization of Children in the US Police State Wednesday, 11 November 2015 00:00 By Henry A. Giroux. Truthout | Op-Ed font size decrease font size increase font size Print 179 Email (Image: Jared Rodriguez / Truthout) Violence has become the problem of the 21st century. This claim is indebted to W. E. B. Dubois' much quoted notion that "The problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of color line."^[1] For Du Bois, racism was one of the most pressing problems of the time and could not be understood outside of the gross inequities of wealth, power, opportunity and access. What he did not anticipate was the degree to which the violent character of racism would come to define the 21st century on a national and global level. What he described as a ruthless ideology and attitude of racist hostility would later mutate in the new millennium into a raw display of police brutality and state terrorism, camouflaged under the guise of an alleged post-racial society. To read more articles by Henry A. Giroux and other authors in the Public Intellectual Project, click here. As brutalism comes to shape every public encounter, democratic values and the ethical imagination wither under the weight of neoliberal capitalism and "post-racial" racism. Giving way to the poisonous logics of self-interest, privatization and the unfettered drive for wealth, US society reneges on the social contract and assumes the role of a punishing state. ^[2] Under the regime of a predatory neoliberalism, compassion and respect are viewed increasingly with contempt while the spectacle of violence titillates the multitudes and moves markets. A free-market mentality now drives and corrupts politics, destroys social protections, celebrates a hyper-competitiveness and deregulates economic activity. All human activities, practices and institutions are now subject to market principles. Public goods such as toll roads, libraries and schools are privatized as the very idea of the common good becomes an object of disdain. ^[3] Consequently, under such circumstances, governing principles such as equality, justice and fairness begin to disappear from the discourse of politics. As politics is emptied of any sense of social responsibility, the apostles of casino capitalism preach that allegedly amoral economic activity exacts no social costs, and in doing so, they accelerate the expanding wasteland of disposable goods and people. ^[4] One consequence is a vast and growing landscape of human suffering, amplified by a mass-mediated metaphysics of retribution and violence that more and more creeps into every commanding institution of US society, now serving myriad functions such as sport, spectacle, entertainment, and punishment. The neoliberal machinery of social death increasingly extends its reach across US society, dissolving the bonds of sociality and undermining social obligations. One outcome is the proliferation of neglect, exploitation and suffering among diverse populations, including poor and uneducated middle-aged whites, who are dying prematurely and unnecessarily in an epidemic of substance abuse, suicide and poor health. ^[5] Neoliberalism's unbridled social Darwinism, elimination of social provisions and culture of cruelty forces people out of Medicaid, pushes millions into poverty and eliminates social protections. ^[6] Alain Badiou rightly calls those who run our current political system a "regime of gangsters." ^[7] These so-called gangsters produce a unique form of social violence. According to Badiou, they: Privatize everything. Abolish help for the weak, the solitary, the sick and the unemployed. Abolish all aid for everyone except the banks. Don't look after the poor; let the elderly die. Reduce the wages of the poor, but reduce the taxes on the rich. Make everyone work until they are ninety. Only teach mathematics to traders, reading to big property-owners and history to on-duty ideologues. And the execution of these commands will in fact ruin the lives of millions of people. ^[8] Increasingly, institutions such as schools, prisons, detention centers, and our major economic, cultural and social institutions are being organized around the production of violence. Rather than promote democratic values and a respect for others or embrace civic values, they often function largely to humiliate, punish and demonize any vestige of social responsibility. Violence permeates and drives foreign policy, dominates popular culture and increasingly is used to criminalize a wide range of social behaviors, especially among Black people. [9] The punishment "creep" that has moved from prisons to other public spheres now has a firm grip on both schools and the daily rituals of everyday life. Violence functions as a brutalizing practice used by the state to squelch dissent, incarcerate poor people and people of color, terrorize immigrants, wage a war on minority youth and menace individuals and groups considered disposable or a threat. Not only does such violence destroy the conditions and institutions necessary to develop a democratic polity, it also accelerates abusive forms of punitiveness and control that extend from the prisons to other institutions, such as schools. In this instance, violence becomes the ultimate force propagating what might be called punishment creep. The punishment "creep" that has moved from prisons to other public spheres now has a firm grip on both schools and the daily rituals of everyday life. Margaret Kimberley captures one instance of the racist underside of punishment creep. She writes: "Black people are punished for driving, for walking down the street, for having children, for putting their children in school, for acting the way children act, and even for having children who are killed by other people. We are punished, in short, because we still exist." [10] Violence in the United States has always been defined partly by a poisonous mix of chauvinism, exceptionalism and terrorism that runs through a history marked by genocidal assaults against Native Americans, the brutality of slavery and a persistent racism that extends from the horror of lynchings and chain gangs to current patterns of mass incarceration, which subject many Black youth to the shameful dynamics of the school-to-prison-pipeline and unprecedented levels of police abuse. Violence is the premier signature of what Ta-Nehisi Coates calls "The Dreamers," those individuals and groups who have "signed on, either actively or passively, to complicity in everything from police shootings to real estate redline, which crowds blacks into substandard housing in dangerous neighborhoods ... The Dream is about the totality of white supremacy in American history and its cumulative weight on African-Americans, and how one attempts to live with that." [11] In part, violence - whether produced by the state, corporations or racist individuals - is difficult to abstract from an expression of white supremacy, which functions as an index for demanding "the full privileges of the state." [12] Police violence against Black people has become highly visible and thrust into the national spotlight as a result of individuals recording acts of police abuse with their cell phones and other new technologies. In the last few years, there has been what seems like a torrent of video footage showing unarmed Black people being assaulted by the police. For instance, there is the shocking video of Walter Scott being shot in the back after fleeing from his car; Eric Garner dying as a result of being put in a chokehold by a white policeman who accused him of illegally selling cigarettes; the tragic killing of Freddie Gray, who, after making eye contact with a police officer, was put in a police van and purposely given a jarring ride that resulted in his death; and the unbearable shooting of 12-year-old Tamir Rice for playing with a pellet gun in the snow in a park. All of these deaths are morally indefensible and are symptomatic of the deep-seated racism and propensity for violence in many police forces in the United States. Yet, as Jeah Lee observes, while such crimes have attracted national attention, the "use of force by cops in schools ... has drawn far less attention [in spite of the fact that] over the past five years at least 28 students have been seriously injured, and in one case shot to death, by so-called school resource officers - sworn, uniformed police assigned to provide security on K-12 campuses." [13] Increasingly, as public schools hand over even routine disciplinary problems to the police, there is a proliferation of cops in schools. There are over 17,000 school resource officers in more than half of the schools in the United States. [14] In spite of the fact that violence in schools has dropped precipitously, school resource officers are the fastest-growing segment of law enforcement. The Militarization of Schools In part, the militarizing of schools and the accompanying surge of police officers are driven by the fear of school shootings, particularly in the aftermath of the Columbine High School tragedy in 1999 and the massacre that took place at Sandy Hook Elementary School in 2013, both of which have been accentuated by the ever present wave of paranoia that followed the terrorist attacks of 9/11. [15] What advocates of putting police in the schools refuse to acknowledge is that the presence of the police in schools has done nothing to stop such mass shootings. While the fear of school shootings are overestimated, the fact remains that schools are still one of the safest places for children to be. Caught under the weight of a culture of fear and a rush to violence, many young people in schools are the most recent victims of a punishing state in a society that "remains in a state of permanent, endless war," a war that is waged through militarized policies at home and abroad. [16] Following Stanley Aronowitz, I think it is fair to argue that with "the breakdown of the mission of public schools ... today's authorities no longer offer hope" to this generation of young people. One consequence is that "under the doctrine of control they threaten punishment, which includes, although it is not necessarily associated with, incarceration." [17] Violence against young people in schools is a troubling index of the loss of faith in young people and the transformation of school from a source of social and economic mobility to despotic testing institutions for most youth, and repressive holding centers, primarily for youth of color. [18] The transformation of disciplinary problems into criminal violations has often resulted in absurd, if not tragic results. What has become clear is that cops in schools have not made schools safer. Erik Eckholm, reporting for The New York Times, stated that judges, youth advocates, parents and other concerned citizens "are raising alarm about what they have seen in the schools where officers are already stationed: a surge in criminal charges against children for misbehavior that many believe is better handled in the principal's office." [19] In Texas, police officers have written "more than 100,000 misdemeanor tickets each year" and many of these students "face hundreds of dollars in fines, community service, and in some cases, a lasting record that could affect applications for jobs or the military." [20] The transformation of disciplinary problems into criminal violations has often resulted in absurd if not tragic results. For instance, in 2009, in Richardson, Texas "A 14-year old boy with Asperger's syndrome was given a $364 police citation for using an expletive in his classroom." [21] It gets even more ludicrous. A 12-year-old student in Stuart, Florida, was arrested in November 2008, for "disrupting a school function." The 'disruption' was that the student had "passed gas." [22] Similarly, a number of civil rights groups have reported that the presence of police in schools often "means more suspensions, which disproportionately affect minority students," according to an article in USA Today. [23] Many of the young people who end up in court are poor Black and Brown students, along with students with disabilities. As reported in The New York Times, "police-driven policies have not made schools more secure. But they do make children more likely to drop out and become entangled with the justice system. And they disproportionately affect minority and disabled children, who are more likely to be singled out for the harshest forms of discipline." [24] In one instance, an 8-year-old and 9-year-old in a public school in Kenton County, Kentucky, both with severe disabilities that made it difficult for them to follow classroom instructions, were handcuffed by a deputy sheriff for misbehaving. One child was writhing and crying in pain because of the handcuffs placed around his biceps since his wrists were too small. [25] Such acts are more than shameful, they also are symptomatic of a society that is waging war on many of its children. What must be recognized is that schools in general have become combat zones where it is routine for many students to be subjected to metal detectors, surveillance cameras, uniformed security guards, weapons searches, and in some cases, SWAT team raids and police dogs sniffing for drugs. [26] Under such circumstances, the purpose of schooling appears to be to contain and punish young people - especially those marginalized by race, class and disabilities - rather than educate them. For the many disadvantaged students being funnelled into the "school-to-prison pipeline," schools ensure that their futures look grim indeed, as their educational experiences acclimatize them to forms of carceral treatment. [27] There is more at work here than a flight from responsibility on the part of educators, parents and politicians who support and maintain policies that fuel this expanding edifice of law enforcement against the young and disenfranchised. Underlying the repeated decisions to turn away from helping young people is the growing sentiment that youth, particularly youth of color, constitute a threat to adults, and the only effective way to deal with them is to subject them to mind-crushing punishment. Students being miseducated, criminalized and arrested through a form of penal pedagogy in prison-type schools provides a grave reminder of the degree to which the ethos of containment and punishment now creeps into spheres of everyday life that were largely immune in the past from this type of state and institutional violence. How else to explain, as Judith Browne Dianis observes that, Across the country, young people are being arrested for behavior that used to be solved through a trip to the principal's office or the intervention of a counselor. In Florida, a 14-year-old was arrested and charged for throwing a pencil at another student and spent 21 days in jail. In New York, a 12-year-old was arrested for doodling, 'I love Abby and Faith on her desk.' In Chicago, 25 children, some as young as 11, were arrested for engaging in a food fight. [28] How many more images of young schoolchildren in handcuffs do we have to witness before it becomes clear that the educational system is broken? Schools are no longer reliable spaces of joy, critical teaching and support. Too many are now institutions of containment and control that produce pedagogies of conformity and kill the imagination by teaching to the test. Within such schools, the lesson that young people are learning about themselves is that they can't engage in critical thinking, be trusted, rely on the informed judgments of teachers and administrators and that their behavior is constantly subject to procedures that amount to both an assault on their dignity and a violation of their civil liberties. Schools have become institutions in which creativity is viewed as a threat, harsh discipline a virtue and punishment the reward for not conforming to what amounts to the dictates of a police state. How many more images of young schoolchildren in handcuffs do we have to witness before it becomes clear that the educational system is broken, reduced largely to a punishing factory defined by a culture of fear and an utter distrust of young people? The School to Prison Pipeline According to the Advancement Project, schools have become increasingly intolerant of young people, imposing draconian zero tolerance policies on them by furthering a culture steeped in criminalizing often minor, if not trivial, student behaviors. [29] What is truly alarming is not only the ways in which young people are being ushered into the criminal legal system and treated less as students than as criminals, but the harsh violence to which they are often subjected by school resource officers. In a report published in Mother Jones, Jonathan Hardin, a Louisville Metro Police officer, in 2014 "was fired after his alleged use of force in two incidents at Olmsted Academy North middle school: He was accused of punching a 13-year-old student in the face for cutting the cafeteria line, and a week later of putting another 13-year-old student in a chokehold, allegedly knocking the student unconscious and causing a brain injury." [30] In a second incident that year, "Cesar Suquet, then a 16-year-old high school student in Houston, was being escorted by an officer out of the principal's office after a discussion about Suquet's confiscated cell phone. Following a verbal exchange, police officer Michael Y'Barbo struck Suquet at least 18 times with a police baton, injuring him on his head, neck and elsewhere." [31] Y'Barbo claimed that beating a student with a police baton was "reasonable and necessary" and "remains on regular assignment including patrol." [32] There have also been incidents where students have been shot, suffered brain injuries or have been psychologically traumatized. Jaeah Lee cites a young Black high school student in Detroit who, after a troubling interaction with a school police officer, speaks for many young people about the dread and anxiety that many students experience when police occupy their schools. He states that "Many young people today have fear of the police in their communities and schools." [33] If one important measure of a democracy is how a society treats its children, especially young children who are Black, Brown or suffer from disabilities, there can be little doubt that US society is failing. As the United States increasingly models its schools after prisons, students are no longer viewed as a social investment in the future. A deadly mixture of racism and violence in the 21st century has become increasingly evident in the attacks being waged against young people in American schools. If students in general are now viewed as a potential threat, Black students are regarded increasingly as criminals. One result is that schools increasingly have come to resemble war zones; spaces marked by distrust, fear and demonization. With more police in the schools than ever before, security has become more important than providing children with a critical education and supportive learning environment. As authority in many of the schools is often handed over to the police and security forces who are now asked to deal with all alleged disciplinary problems, however broadly defined, the power and autonomy of teachers and school administrators are weakened at the expense of the safety of the students. This loss of authority is clear in New York City where school administrators have no control over security forces who report directly to local police departments. In most cases, the disciplinary problems that take place in schools involve trivial infractions, such as violating a dress code, scribbling on a desk or holding a 2-inch toy gun. The assault on children in public schools suggests that children of color cannot view schools as supportive spaces where they can be given a quality education. Instead, schools have become sites of control, testing and punishment all too eager to produce pedagogies of repression, and more than willing to erect, once again, what has been called the school-to-prison pipeline, especially for youth of color. Roxane Gay is right in observing that, Black children are not allowed to be children. They are not allowed to be safe, not at home, not at pool parties, not driving or sitting in cars listening to music, not walking down the street, not in school. For black children, for black people, to exist is to be endangered. Our bodies receive no sanctity or safe harbor. [34] Police Brutality in the Classroom It is inconceivable that in an alleged democracy poor youth of color at all grade levels in the public schools are subjected to shameful criminal practices, such as being handcuffed and carted off to jail for minor incidents - and that such draconian practices could take place in a society that views itself as a democracy. Stripped of their public mission as institutions that nurture young people to become informed, critically engaged citizens, schools have become punishing factories all too willing to turn disciplinary authority over to the police and to usher students into the harsh bureaucracy of the criminal legal system. [35] Rather than assume responsibility for students, too many schools have abdicated on their authority and are more than willing to turn discipline problems, however trivial, over to the police. The results have been devastating for youth of color. As the Advancement Project points out: Across the United States many public schools have turned into feeder schools for the juvenile and criminal justice systems. Youths are finding themselves increasingly at risk of falling into the school-to-prison pipeline through push-outs (systematic exclusion through suspensions, expulsions, discouragement, and high-stakes testing). Yet, an even more direct schoolhouse-to-jailhouse track is transferring a growing number of youths to the penal system. In the name of school safety, schools have implemented unforgiving, overly harsh zero tolerance discipline practices that turn kids into criminals for acts that rarely constitute a crime when committed by an adult. No one is safe from zero tolerance - age, grade, past behavior, and disabilities are often irrelevant. And, although students of all races and genders are victims of this track, it is especially reserved for children of color - and males in particular. Schools have teamed up with law enforcement to make this happen by imposing a "double dose" of punishment: suspension or expulsion and a trip to the juvenile justice system. [36] One recent example of a particularly disturbing incident of police brutality was captured in a series of videos recorded at Spring Valley High School in South Carolina. Prior to the incident being filmed, a young Black student named Shakara took out her cell phone in class. The teacher asked her for it, and when she refused to hand it over, she was asked to leave the class. The teacher called the vice principal. Rather than attempt to defuse the situation, the vice principal called for a school resource officer. At this point, Officer Ben Fields enters the classroom. One of Shakara's classmates, Niya Kenney, immediately asked her classmates to begin filming because, as she put it, "I told them to get the cameras out, because we know his reputation - well, I know his reputation." [37] In what follows, one of the videos records the following: Officer Ben Fields approaches the young woman, appears to give her no time to stand up and proceeds to grab her left arm while placing his right arm around her neck; he then lifts her desk, pulls her out of her seat, slams her to the ground and drags her across the floor before handcuffing her. The video is difficult to watch, given the extreme and disproportionate violence used against this young Black woman. She was arrested, as was Kenny, who both filmed the incident and loudly protested the treatment of Shakara. Fields was fired soon afterwards, but incredulously, both students are being charged with "disturbing schools, a crime punishable by up to ninety days in jail or a thousand dollar fine." [38] After the incident went viral, information emerged indicating that Fields had a previous reputation for being aggressive with students, and he was viewed as a threat by many students who nicknamed him "Officer Slam." Moreover, he had a previous record of violently assaulting people. [39] The question that should be asked as a result of this shocking act of police violence against a young Black student is not how Fields got a job in a school working with children, but what kind of society believes that police should be in schools in the first place. Whatever happened to teacher and administrator responsibility? Sadly, it was a school administrator who called in the police at Spring Valley High School because the student would not turn over her phone. Even worse, when Sheriff Leon Lott announced his decision to fire Fields, he pointed out that the classroom teacher and administrator supported the actions of the police officer and made it clear that "they also had no problems with the physical part." [40] Both the teacher and administrator should be fired. This incident was in all probability a simple disciplinary problem that should have been handled by responsible educators. Students should not be treated like criminals. It is one thing not to assume responsibility for students, but another to subject them to brutal assaults by the police. Lawlessness runs deep in US society and has been normalized. Brutal attacks on defenseless children rarely get the attention they deserve, and when they do, the corporate media refuse to acknowledge that the United States has become a suicidal society willing even to sacrifice its own children to an expanding punishing state that protects the interests of the corporate and financial elite. [41] How else to explain the shameless defense of such a brutal assault against a young Black girl by pundits such as CNN's Harry Houck and Don Lemon, who implied that such violence was warranted because Shakara did not respect the officer, as if the beating of a Black child by a police officer, who happens also to be a body-builder who can lift 300 pounds, justifies such actions? This is a familiar script in which Black people are often told that whatever violence they were subject to was legitimate because they acted out of place, did not follow rules that in reality oppress them or simply refused to fall in line. Grassroots Resistance The other side of this racist script finds expression in those who argue that any critique of the police endangers public safety. In this dangerous discourse, the police are the victims, a line of argument recently voiced in different ways by both President Obama and by James Comey, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The most vociferous and strident voices opposing any critique of police violence come from police unions. As William Boardman observes, "Two of the biggest police unions in the country are now on record in opposition to free speech. They are on record against constitutionally protected free speech that opposes the epidemic of police violence across America (more than 900 killed by police so far in 2015)." [42] This was particularly visible when film director Quentin Tarantino gave a talk criticizing police violence in New York as part of Rise Up October, three days of protest against police terror. While addressing a number of families whose members were victims of police brutality, Tarantino stated that, "I'm here to say I'm on the side of the murdered." [43] The backlash from major police unions was quick and severe, as the unions began calling for a nationwide boycott of his films. This repressive discourse not only refuses to recognize the growing visibility of police violence; it also shores up one of the foundations of the authoritarian state, suggesting that the violence propagated by the police should not be subject to public scrutiny. As an editorial in The New York Times pointed out, this "formulation implies that for the police to do their jobs, they need to have free rein to be abusive. It also implies that the public would be safer if Americans with cellphones never started circulating videos of officers battering suspects in the first place ... This trend is straight out of

Orwell." [44] Instead of putting police in schools, money should be spent on more guidance teachers, social workers, teachers, community intervention workers and other professionals. Educators, young people, parents and others concerned about violence in schools need to organize and demand that the police be removed from school. Not only is their presence a waste of taxpayers' money and an interference with children's education, they also pose a threat to student safety. [45] Instead of putting police in schools, money should be spent on more guidance teachers, social workers, teachers, community intervention workers and other professionals who are trained to provide a secure and supportive environment for young people. It is particularly crucial to support those social services, classroom practices and policies that work to keep students in schools. Everything possible should be done to dismantle the school-to-prison pipeline and the underlying forces that produce it. At the same time, more profound change must take place on a national level, since the violence waged by the police is symptomatic of a society now ruled by a financial elite who trade in cruelty, punishment and despair. US society is broken, and the violence to which it appears addicted will continue until the current configurations of power, politics, inequality and injustice are eliminated. The increasing visibility of police brutality in schools and in the streets speaks to a larger issue regarding the withering of democracy in the United States and the growing lawlessness that prevails in a society in which violence is one of the few resources left to use to address social problems. The US is paying a horrible price for turning governance at all levels over to people for whom violence serves as the default register for addressing important social issues. As the movement for Black Lives has made clear, the Spring Valley High School case and others are part of a larger trend that has turned schools across the country into detention centers and educators into hapless bystanders as classroom management is ceded to the police. What we see in this incident (and in many others that have escaped national attention because they are not caught on cell phones) are the rudiments of a growing police state. Violence is now a normalized and celebrated ideal for how the United States defines itself - an ideal that views democracy as an excess or, even worse, a pathology. This is something Americans must acknowledge, interrogate and resist if they don't want to live under a system of total terror and escalating violence. Search Life and Death in a Troubled Teen Boot Camp A tragic accident exposes the dangers of an out-of-control billion-dollar industry By Jesse Hyde

November 12, 2015 In the darkness of early morning, 16-year-old Bruce Staeger lay splayed across his mattress, sleeping soundly for once. Most nights, he would smoke a blunt and crash, but not this one. Lately, his mother had been watching him closely. She and Bruce's stepdad had even installed a motion detector on the porch of their doublewide trailer to keep him from sneaking out at night. Around 4:30 a.m., his bedroom light suddenly flipped on. Bruce rolled over, blocking his eyes from the glare to find his mom sitting on the edge of the bed. "Bruce, do you remember what I told you a few days ago?" She said softly. "I would never make a decision that would hurt you." Sidebar Trying to Fix America's Broken Juvenile Justice System » Over her shoulder, two men in cowboy hats and Wranglers hovered near his bedroom doorway. Other kids, he would later learn, freaked out in this moment. They yelled, they swore, they swung wildly at the two strangers. But Bruce did none of this. He quietly got dressed as instructed. "You're going away with these men," his mom told him. "This is for your own good." The cowboys nudged him out into the cold morning air and loaded his things into the bed of a pickup. They headed west, towards the Black Range, a rugged and remote stretch of mountains in southern New Mexico. After a few hours of driving, one of the men put a black pillowcase over Bruce's head so he wouldn't know where they were going. The truck lurched and heaved as the paved road turned dirt. Eventually, Bruce would come this way again and see it all—the dry creek beds and narrow slot canyons, the craggy ridgelines and low-lying mesas that glowed red in the sun—but for now, his head hooded in darkness, he could see nothing. Bruce had been getting into trouble ever since his dad left six years earlier. A skinny kid with sloping shoulders, braces and a mild case of acne, he rarely went to school, spending his days smoking pot and skateboarding instead. A few months earlier, he had run away and holed up with some meth junkies. When he finally returned home, his mom said she didn't know what else to do for him. Apparently, this was her answer. Finally, they arrived at their destination: a camp known as Lockwood, a satellite location of Tierra Blanca Ranch, which for almost 20 years had reformed troubled youth. The camp's owner and director, a man named Scott Chandler, emerged from the truck, bowlegged with a slight hitch in his step. He lifted the hood from Bruce's head. "Hey guys," Chandler called out. "Come meet the new kid!" It took Bruce a minute to gain his bearings. He was in the mountains, above 5,000 feet, standing in a clearing surrounded by towering strands of pine. A thin plume of smoke rose from a cooking fire and two industrial grade Army tents loomed in the distance. Down by the creek, he could hear voices, high and reedy. Slowly, a dozen boys emerged, hard and lean, with haunted eyes. Their clothing was soiled and stained, their fingernails rimmed with dirt. The ones wearing orange, Bruce would soon learn, were trouble. The worst cases didn't approach at all; they were firewalled, which usually meant they couldn't speak to anyone except staff. Each looked Bruce dead in the eye and shook his hand firmly — something in their manner, though, both cocksure and skittish, unsettled him. Bruce had no idea the terrors and torment that awaited him at Tierra Blanca, some of the worst of it at the hands of the boys who now surrounded him. And he could never have imagined the decision to send him here would result in his death. A working cattle ranch spanning 30,000 acres in one of the most isolated regions of the country, Tierra Blanca promised to take unruly teenagers—drug users, drop outs, kids in and out of the court system—and reform them through "sound Biblical principles," exercise, hard work and discipline. The program operates on the fringes of what's known as the troubled teen industry, a booming business that generates as much as $1.2 billion a year and takes in 10,000 to 14,000 kids and teenagers at any given time. For around $100 a day, or the rough equivalent of prep school tuition, you could send your teen to Tierra Blanca to become the sort of raw-boned young man who answered "yes, sir" and didn't complain when asked to do the dishes. Bruce Staeger was on the path to "real change" before his death in 2013. Courtesy of Carla Campbell-Moffat When Bruce arrived in October of 2011, he had little idea how the camp functioned, what it would take to leave, or how long he'd be there. "There was no program, there was no handbook, there wasn't anything," says Nathan Bailey, who was at the ranch with Bruce. "As you became more trusted, more things were explained to you by the other guys. The only way you learned about the place was just a trickle of information." The aim of the program, several boys told me, was to break you down so what Chandler called "real change" could begin. Each day began early, typically at 7 a.m., with breakfast and Bible study or reading about historical leaders like Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr. Tuesdays and Fridays a retired elementary school teacher known as Miss Allie came to the ranch and handed out assignments from teachers in the nearby town of Deming. Every other day, the 15 or so kids at the camp were put to work on the ranch, clearing land, chopping the firewood that Chandler sold in town, or building miles of fence to keep cattle from wandering off. To soften up the rocky ground for fence posts, the biggest kids ran the digger, an unwieldy contraption with sharp metal spikes, or they just used "ghetto dynamite," bullet cartridges stuffed with gunpowder, to blow the rock apart. "That's what we did every day, shit like that," says Gunnar Hatton, who was at Tierra Blanca with Bruce. "And then they'd say, 'Everyone put your tools down, it's time to run up and down the mountain, 10 fucking times with a 20 pound rock in your hands.' And then it was back to work. That's all we did, run and work." Exercises varied from grueling long distance runs to charging up a hill with a truck tire hoisted above their heads, a drill Chandler called "Halos." In between, boys were made to do up-downs, scissor kicks, push-ups and wall sits until their legs burned and their lungs were on fire. "The bigger you were and the stronger you were and the more you liked fucking up the little guys, the more powerful you were," says Hatton. Bruce tried to keep up, but he was out of shape. When he couldn't do exercises, staff encouraged the other boys to "help" him, which was code for either dragging him or "just a punch to the gut," another camper later told police. "The bigger you were and the stronger you were and the more you liked fucking up the little guys, the more powerful you were." If Bruce did what staff asked, and didn't give them any trouble, he could earn three points a day. Once he earned 60 points he could call home. Staff favorites who had accumulated enough points for good behavior were given "privileged status," which meant they could also go home for a visit, rent a movie (as long as it wasn't R-rated) or play on the Deming football team. Those who broke the rules or tried to run away were taken to a special closet full of orange clothing, assigned an outfit, and in some cases made to sleep, work and eat shackled and cuffed. (Chandler says this has only happened a "handful" of times when a boy was a danger to himself or others.) I talked to several boys who said they spent weeks in shackles, and one showed me scars on his ankles and wrists from times the cuffs and shackles cut into his skin until he bled. "Sometimes kids would step on your shackles just to fuck with you," he tells me. "I learned how to sleep with them on, do the dishes with them on, everything." To cope, some boys made a crude form of hooch out of canned fruit, bread and sugar, and tattooed themselves using ballpoint-pen ink and cactus needles. Others tried to run away. A boy named Jordan Almanza tried twice, once stealing a hacksaw to cut off his handcuffs and shackles, but every time Chandler and his staff hunted him down. "There was no way out," Hatton says. "You could either run and fucking die of dehydration, or just end it yourself." At first, Bruce was so timid the other boys had to look at his homework packet from Miss Allie to figure out his name. "He was hard to read," recalls Bruce's fellow camper, Nathan Bailey. "At times he would just stare off. He could go from being completely stoic, like nothing was getting to him, and then he'd just break down." As the months passed, though, Bruce began to open up. Laying in his tent at night, careful to make sure staff weren't listening, he talked about his ex girlfriends, the metal band he fronted back home and how much he missed his mom. "This shit really sucks," Bruce often said. "But I deserve it." In the spring of 2012, Chandler took Bruce and a group of other boys three hours east into the Sacramento Mountains to build fence line and turn rugged terrain into a hunting camp for wealthy clients. Most of the boys, including Bruce, were in orange for breaking camp rules. Because they were in such a remote location, roughly 100 miles from ranch headquarters, there was limited electricity; much of the food was canned — "way past the expiration date," Hatton says — and stored in a horse trailer with a leaky roof. Another camper later told police that "rain would get in the pancake mix and it would mold, but it was the only food that was there so you just cooked it and fried the crap out of it and just ate it." (Chandler denies this. "I ate everything the boys ate and 90 percent of the time there were leftovers, which we fed to the dogs," he says. "They got plenty to eat.") Bruce was beaten and tortured by fellow campers for over a month in New Mexico's Sacramento Mountains. Don Smith/Getty One night, after a week of work, the boys were loading up to return to Tierra Blanca headquarters when Chandler realized his wallet was missing. After hours of searching, he became convinced one of the kids stole it. One by one, he and another staffer took them under a tarp beside the horse trailer, and strip-searched them. When the wallet still didn't turn up, he gathered them around his truck. "One of you stole my wallet," he said. "And this is your one chance to come forward and admit you did it." No one said anything. The next morning, Chandler told the boys they'd stay at the camp until the wallet turned up. Suspicions quickly fell upon Bruce; he'd been one of the last ones in the truck with Chandler before the wallet went missing. But Bruce insisted he didn't have it. Chandler slowly upped daily exercise to extreme levels and cut rations down to just rice, canned beans and tortillas. To turn the boys against Bruce, the staff sat him in a lawn chair, gave him water and forced him to watch the other boys do "Halos" up and down a steep rocky slope. When that didn't elicit a confession, Chandler and his staff started waking the boys up in the middle of the night to run. (Chandler says this only happened twice.) "We were already starving, and really the only thing we had left was sleep," Hatton says. "When he took that from us, it felt like we were losing our minds." The other boys tried to figure out why Bruce wouldn't reveal the location of the wallet. Some of them guessed it was a final stand against Chandler, to show he wouldn't break. But others began to wonder if he'd stolen it at all. At some point, Bruce reportedly told Chandler that he had taken the wallet and burned it. Either way, after a few weeks, several boys say that Chandler subtly suggested how to end the ordeal. As Hatton later told police, "He wanted Bruce beaten." Hatton says the beatings started off once or twice a week, but eventually escalated to every day. A group of four or five boys, usually the biggest, would take Bruce away from the camp and start interrogating him. "We'd tell him, 'You know what's about to happen,'" Hatton recalls. "And then we'd beat the shit out of him." Several boys say they'd beat Bruce in plain sight of ranch staff, something Chandler denies. The camp consisted of a cluster of tents near the mobile campers where Chandler and the staff slept. "They'd either just go in their trailers while it was happening or sit there right outside their trailers eating," says one of the boys who participated in the beatings. "They never once intervened." When beatings alone didn't work, the boys grew more inventive. They hung Bruce from the horse trailer from his handcuffs; lassoed him and dragged him across the dirt; and put him in a sleeping bag stuffed with cow shit and knelt on his chest. The worst of it, one boy told me, was the day they hogtied him to a pole by his cuffs and shackles and paraded him around camp like a pig on a stick, while other boys beat him. Eventually the boys decided the only way to end the ordeal was for one of them to die so authorities would shut down the camp. They drew lots to decide who would drink nightshade tea, derived from a poisonous plant, but staff discovered the plot before anyone could go through with it. Two weeks later, they met again. This time they decided they'd have to kill Bruce, but ultimately abandoned the plan. And then one day a staffer found the wallet in a five-gallon bucket of electrical wires. While Bruce never confessed to putting the wallet there, Chandler says he has never doubted that Bruce did it. Not that it mattered to any of the boys. After six weeks, their trip to the Sacramento Mountains was finally over. All the boys I talked to who participated in the beatings had trouble admitting what they had done to Bruce. "It's something I have a really hard time forgiving myself over," one former camper says. "I feel so guilty, not just for taking part in the beatings, but for wanting him to die. I still have nightmares from what we did to him." It's hard to know how many programs like Tierra Blanca operate across the country, but conservative estimates put the number in the hundreds. Some are tough-love boot camps; others are wilderness-based programs whose philosophies can vary from meditation and yoga to the most extreme versions of fundamentalist Christianity. Many of the programs share an outright disdain for traditional therapy and try to fly under the radar of state regulators. Despite an alarming report by the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO) in 2007 that found "thousands of allegations of abuse, some of which involved death" at residential treatment programs nationwide, the troubled teen industry has flourished in recent years, especially in states with religious exemption laws. In Florida, which bans the inspection of private, faith-based facilities, there have been at least 165 allegations of abuse and neglect over the past decade. Children have complained of being pinned to the ground for hours, held in seclusion for days and made to stand until they wet themselves. Some have even been choked to unconsciousness. Girls have been forced to wave around their menstrual-stained underwear as chastisement for being "unclean." Conversion therapy for gay teens is a common practice at many of the faith-based facilities as well. Most troubling about the growth of the industry, advocates say, is that there's no proof any of it works. In fact, research highlighted by the GAO report suggests that tough love programs are actually counterproductive. "If you want to teach a kid how to get along better in the outside world, it doesn't make sense to completely isolate them and submerge them in this world with arbitrary rules and unpredictable and severe punishments and make them live in a constant state of fear," says Julia Graff, of the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law in Washington, D.C. "Most kids are worse when they get out." "If you want to teach a kid how to get along better in the outside world, it doesn't make sense to isolate them in this world with arbitrary rules — most kids are worse when they get out." In the past 15 years, as many as 86 kids have died in troubled teen programs. At least 10 kids have died at wilderness programs like Tierra Blanca, most of them because of starvation, exposure to the elements or pressing medical needs that went ignored. In one of the most highly publicized cases, a 16-year-old named Aaron Bacon was forced to hike without food for as many as 14 days and sleep for several nights in freezing temperatures in the canyons of southern Utah without a sleeping bag or blanket. When his body began to shut down, and he lost control of his bowels, the staff made him walk without pants. He died after just 20 days at the camp. "These programs are based on the premise that today's teens are so out of control and morally compromised that only the most extreme and harsh tactics can keep them in line," says Maia Szalavitz, who interviewed hundreds of kids who had attended tough love programs for her 2006 book, Help At Any Cost: How the Troubled Teen Industry Cons Parents and Hurts Kids. "And they think the answer is to isolate them, deprive them and eventually break them." The largest industry trade group—the National Association of Therapeutic Schools and Programs (NATSAP)—says that tough love programs like Tierra Blanca are outliers and not representative of the industry as a whole. The group requires its 166 member programs — which serve an estimated 6,000 kids, or about half of those in the industry — to be licensed or accredited, something programs like Tierra Blanca are notorious for resisting. "There's a lot of frustration about these sorts of programs because it's a black eye for the field as a whole," says the NATSP's spokesperson, Megan Stokes. "Programs using outdated tough love methods with no science, that's absolutely not what we're about." By the time Bruce arrived at Tierra Blanca, New Mexico's Children, Youth and Families Department (CYFD) had compiled a growing list of concerns about the ranch. In 2006, a father contacted CYFD to complain that his son had been kicked in the head by a staff member for "faking" a seizure. Two years later, a 16-year-old escaped with a satellite phone, until state police found him miles away trying to remove the shackles from his ankles. During visits, CYFD found that one staff member had no first aid training, another hadn't undergone a criminal background check and there were no written policies or procedures to explain the ranch's rules. There was also no working landline, meaning the only way anyone could communicate with the outside world was through Chandler's cell phone. "This is not an acceptable safety situation," a CYFD staffer wrote in an internal memo, "especially since [Tierra Blanca Ranch] is located in a very remote, rural area." To make matters worse, calls were monitored and letters were screened. "If I wrote, 'This shit is happening, they ran me until I was coughing up blood,' they wouldn't have sent it out," says Ryan Houghton, who was a camper at Tierra Blanca the same time as Bruce. "There was really no way to tell anyone what was going on." Before their next visit, CYFD informed Chandler that, among other things, he'd need to ensure that any vehicle used to transport kids had a fire extinguisher, a first aid kit and enough seat belts. Otherwise, CYFD warned, Chandler would be shut down. Bruce poses with his mom, Carla Moffat, at Tierra Blanca on his 18th birthday. Courtesy of Carla Campbell-Moffat Chandler said he was working to come into compliance with these requests when the state decided, in 2006, to re-classify Tierra Blanca as a wilderness camp. That meant the program would no longer fall under the state's purview. "I don't think anyone can explain why the state agreed to that," says Liz McGrath, Executive Director of Pegasus Legal Services for Children, in Albuquerque. "At that point, the state abdicated its responsibilities to oversee the ranch. There really was no one there to ensure the safety of these kids." (CYFD didn't respond to repeated requests for comment.) By the time Bruce was in elementary school, his family was coming apart: his dad left them when Bruce was 10 and his mom worked long hours at a hospital in El Paso. Bruce spent afternoons alone, playing video games, or riding his bike aimlessly around the neighborhood. "The kid never met a stranger," says his brother Eric, a 27-year-old at New Mexico State University. "He was a really fun, energetic kid, but he didn't really have anybody. He was pretty lonely." Bruce started skipping school when he was 12, and then fell in with a group of friends who seemed dangerous to his mom. At one point, they robbed her house, and from there Bruce's life unspooled in a classic archetype of teenage angst: black clothes, thrash metal, the musty odor of marijuana trailing him from his room. When the family moved to the trailer park outside Truth or Consequences, New Mexico, a flyspeck of a town known for farming and meth, in 2010, things got worse. One night the following summer, Bruce came home rolling on ecstasy and shoved his mom. A few days later, he ran away from home; his mom and stepdad didn't hear from him again for two weeks. "I was worried he was going to end up in jail, or even end up dead," Carla Moffat says. "If he ran away one more time I didn't think I'd ever see him again. People don't understand how few options parents have in these situations." When Moffat heard about Tierra Blanca from a friend, she researched it online and found glowing testimonials from graduates. Even though she was already working 12-hour shifts, and paying for the program would require additional overtime, she felt like it was worth it. On the phone, Chandler explained how the program worked: she wouldn't hear from Bruce for several months and she couldn't visit without permission. "He told me, 'You're the parents, but we're his family now.' I asked him how we would reintegrate Bruce back into our family and he said, 'You don't. Because the problems that exist in the family will always exist in the family.' That should have been a red flag right there." Despite the violent episode in the Sacramento Mountains, Bruce began to adjust to the strict regimen at Tierra Blanca. By the fall of 2012, just months after the wallet incident, he earned certain privileges for good behavior. In the bunkhouse at Tierra Blanca headquarters, he now ate cornbread, beef stew and the occasional steak that Chandler's daughters cooked. His grades began to improve under Miss Allie too. All signs to Chandler that Bruce was on the path to "real change." "He was on my A team," Chandler says. "If there was a job to do that had to be done right, he was one of the first kids I'd pick. And that was a real cool thing to see, just knowing some of the things he was dealing with when he came in, some of the things going on in his life." When Bruce's mom and stepdad visited him, in the winter of 2013, he seemed like a different person. He had gone in with big gauges in his ears, but now he wore a black cowboy hat everywhere. Bruce also started attending a Baptist church in nearby Hatch with some of the other boys, often lingering in the chapel to talk with the youth leaders who played guitar. Eventually he asked one to baptize him. "The program seemed to be working," Carla Moffat says. "He looked happy. He was polite. He was calm. He had direction." In the meantime, pressure to regulate the ranch was mounting at the governor's office. In December of 2012, CYFD got a 27-page memo from the father of a boy who had gone to the ranch, alleging potential abuse and neglect. He included statements from boys who had contemplated suicide and at times felt like they were starving, along with details of an incident in which a staffer had allegedly beaten a 15 year old with a night stick for not completing exercises. Six months later, Pegasus Legal Services for Children sent a letter to the governor and the then-director of CYFD, alerting them that former participants had told police that "children are routinely hit, shackled, and handcuffed, deprived of food... and threatened by staff at Tierra Blanca Ranch if they make disclosures about abuse." Pegasus urged an investigation. And then tragedy struck. On the night of Sept. 22, 2013, Bruce and a group of boys were coming back from Chandler's parents' house after watching a football game when the boy driving, a recent Tierra Blanca graduate, took a curve on a dirt road too fast and rolled the truck. Because there weren't enough seats in the cab, Bruce had volunteered to sit in the bed of the pickup, and the crash ejected him. The remote location of the ranch and the spotty cell coverage delayed Bruce's arrival at the hospital, in part because calls kept dropping. Not long after being airlifted to a Level 1 trauma center in El Paso, Bruce died of massive internal bleeding. The crash was the last straw for CYFD and the governor's office. Less than three weeks later, state police raided the ranch, search warrant in hand, only to find no one there. State officials, believing Chandler had been tipped off and fled with the boys, issued an AMBER Alert. Chandler maintained that they were on a camping trip, and arranged to deliver 11 of the 13 teens to their parents (the other two were 18 and decided to return to the ranch with Chandler). A week later, Chandler and his wife, Colette, appeared on the Today show with Matt Lauer. "People don't understand...the type of kids we end up dealing with," Chandler told Lauer. "We care about kids. We want the kids to be safe. We want them to be successful." Colette and Scott Chandler appeared on the "Today" show after New Mexico officials raided the ranch. Pete Kramer/Getty When I visited Chandler this spring, he carried himself like a man under siege. He called the raid and what followed "the burn down," and seemed convinced the governor of New Mexico, Susana Martinez, had a personal vendetta against him. (The governor's office declined to comment.) He said his critics fail to recognize that he deals with kids who have criminal records and were violent with him and his staff. "You're only getting a part of the story," Chandler told me. "Some of the things these kids are saying, they're just flat out not true. You have to remember some of these kids are master manipulators, and a lot of them have some big credibility issues." Chandler speaks with a slight drawl, which depending on his mood can come across as friendly or slightly intimidating. When we stopped at a local Mexican restaurant for lunch, nearly everyone there seemed to consider him a close friend. Many Tierra Blanca graduates speak of him fondly; some consider him a mentor or surrogate father and still keep in touch, sending wedding invitations and birth announcements. Growing up in Central Texas, Chandler's parents had taken in teens from "broken homes" and he'd seen the difference it made in the kids' lives. After his dad allowed a wilderness program to operate on portions of his ranch in the late 90s, Chandler decided he could do it better, and cobbled together a "common sense" approach to reforming troubled teens. When I asked if a particular methodology governed the ranch, Chandler seemed amused. "People keep looking for a formula for our success, but it doesn't work like that," he said. "It's not something that's easy to replicate." Chandler says he doesn't practice what he calls the "medical model" of treatment. And while he's contracted with therapists in the past, he's never hired one on staff. "Our philosophy is you can replace the things drugs are trying to do with just work, exercise, get the endorphins going, you know, try and teach," he says. "We've become such a pill society, we mask our emotions. We don't just learn how to resolve a conflict, they have to have something else to control their emotions up and down." Fiercely individualistic, Chandler subscribes to a sort of libertarian idealism common in the West. Spend a few minutes with him and he's sure to bring up parental rights, which is his way of saying that the government has little to no business telling parents how to raise their kids. "People don't understand what we do," Chandler says. "We were trying to make productive citizens out of a group nobody cared about, and now we're getting burned at the stake. My family has been through so many lies, distortions and mischaracterizations." During my visit, we drove out to Camp Lockwood with his wife and two of his daughters (all of them help on the ranch), and Chandler introduced me to several program graduates still there. All of them disputed the allegations made in the lawsuits: namely, that staff had encouraged boys to beat Bruce. "This is all based on hysteria," a staffer and former camper named Tim Roberson told me. "If they had any evidence, why hasn't a single charge been filed against anybody? I've known the Chandler family for about six years and they are the most amazing family I've ever met. They've tried to help every person that's come through here, even those who are now trying to hurt them." Bruce died after being thrown from the bed of a pickup truck owned by Scott Chandler. Courtesy of Carla Campbell-Moffat That evening as we drove back towards town, I asked Chandler about some of the most troubling allegations against him. He didn't deny subjecting kids to intense exercise or cuffing them. And when I asked if a former staffer had used a night stick to punish a boy, Chandler said, "It didn't happen like that." But he strongly rejects allegations that he encouraged his kids to beat each other. Those who did, he said, were immediately disciplined. We drove in silence for a few moments, and then his wife spoke up from the back seat of the truck. "Let's just say this," she said of the incident. "Do you remember when you were a kid in the school yard and there was some kid out there who just drove everybody crazy and a few of the boys got together and just gave him a little dose of medicine?" "Yeah," I said. "Things like that happen sometimes," she said. As for Bruce, most of what happened was "out of earshot" and the exercises he imposed as discipline during that period were roughly similar to "what guys do in the military," he said. But he did acknowledge that sometimes "kids took matters into their own hands." (In a subsequent interview he denied ever being aware of other kids beating Bruce.) "If we had really done something wrong," Chandler said. "Would we really be sitting here two years later without a single charge filed against me or any of my staff?" Chandler's supporters, and there are many, are intensely loyal (after the raid, he says, a petition he prepared got over a 1,000 signatures). A half dozen graduates Chandler put me in touch with said the program literally saved their lives. One of them, Pecos Cook, today a 28-year-old oil field worker in North Dakota with a wife and two kids, described similar experiences to those now suing Chandler: grueling physical exercise, being so hungry he ate grub worms and staffers who enforced strict rules. And yet, Cook says, those very tactics made the program work. "At times that place was hell," Cook says. "But looking back on it, I needed it. There are certain types of kids where that's the only thing that's going to work." Other program graduates, now in adulthood, told me the same thing: that they went in adrift, with no work ethic or sense of purpose, and left with a sense they could do just about anything. "If somebody you love has a terminal illness, you're going to do whatever it takes to get them treated, and that's how I see the ranch," says Matt Griffoull, who sent two of his kids to Tierra Blanca. "These parents who are complaining now, they knew exactly what they were getting into. So I think some of the blame has got to fall on them." Last year, Chandler reached a civil settlement with the state, allowing limited oversight for one year. But he still faces a lawsuit from parents who say their children were abused at the camp. A criminal investigation sparked by the raid is still under review by the state attorney general's office. Their findings could determine the fate of the program. For now, however, Tierra Blanca is open for business. A week after Bruce died, his family and friends gathered for a memorial service at the church where he had been baptized. Many of those in attendance came from Tierra Blanca, including Scott Chandler. Afterwards, the boys from the ranch approached Carla and Jim Moffat and presented them a baseball they had all signed, a small way to memorialize the good times they'd had playing games on the ranch. When Carla realized the boy who was driving the truck during the accident hadn't signed the ball, she found him in the crowd and asked him to sign it. "I hold no malice for these kids," Carla says. "I see it as Animal Farm, or Lord of the Flies. It was that kind of environment where you had kids turned against kid. It wasn't their fault." The long-term answer, Szalavitz and other advocates say, is federal legislation that would put the industry under a uniform standard. Former California congressman George Miller twice sponsored bills that would do just that, banning programs from withholding food, water and medical care "under the guise of discipline or therapy," and reserving the use of handcuffs, shackles and other physical restraints for emergencies. The bill also would have created a national hotline for kids to report abuse, but it was never signed into law. A similar piece of bipartisan legislation, introduced in July, is currently in committee. Earlier this year, I drove out to Truth or Consequences to meet with Bruce's mom, Carla. We sat on the porch of their doublewide, and she showed me the last of Bruce's possessions: the black cowboy hat he wore everywhere, the blue T-shirt he'd earned once he attained privileged status and the Bible he had marked up after his baptism. Bruce with his brothers from left to right, Brian, Kevin and Eric. Courtesy of Carla Campbell-Moffat Carla says the abuses Bruce suffered at the camp came out slowly, in emails and phone calls from different boys. Her husband Jim has asked her not to read some of the details. And while the incident that claimed her son's life was an accident, Carla says it's a direct reflection on the way Chandler runs the ranch, and his refusal to comply with safety guidelines suggested by the state years earlier. "It's a wonder no one has died out there before," Bruce's stepdad, Jim Moffat said. "There are kids who attempted suicide, kids who ran away in the desert, and it's in the middle of nowhere, kids who felt like they were starving to death. That place was an accident waiting to happen." Carla showed me the truck Bruce used to drive, and the horse Chandler had promised to give Bruce upon graduation. Instead, he gave her to the Moffat family, and Jim now makes a point of riding her as often as he can. "There's nothing I can do to bring him back, and honestly, there are days I don't know if I can go on," Carla said. "But if it can result in some kind of lasting change, if it saves another kid's life, maybe some good can come from all of this." Alone and at risk Set up to be safe havens, some group homes for the disabled have become remote "prisons," where residents are vulnerable to violence and neglect. Story by Chris Serres and Glenn Howatt • Photos by David Joles • Star Tribune NOVEMBER 9, 2015 — 12:00AM Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC 'I BECAME LOST' Ashley Daly, who has bipolar disorder and is cognitively impaired, has attempted suicide seven times since she moved hours away from her grandparents. Late one night this summer, George Daly woke abruptly to the sound of the fax machine humming from the den of his tidy home near Minneapolis. It brought tragic news: Just hours earlier, on a desolate stretch of highway in northern Minnesota, Daly's granddaughter, Ashley, had slashed her wrist with a piece of glass and thrown herself in front of a speeding car. It was the seventh suicide attempt since Ashley, who has bipolar disorder and a cognitive impairment, was sent to live in a group home three hours away, on the wooded outskirts of Hermantown, Minn. "Ashley feels lost and abandoned," said Daly, who settled on the facility only after several others closer to the Twin Cities turned them down. "She has no place to call home in this world and this is her way of crying out for help." Each year, hundreds of Minnesotans with developmental disabilities and mental illnesses are uprooted from their families and sent to live in secluded group homes in remote parts of the state. Cut off from the communities they know, housed with strangers, they often fall deeper into anger and despair. Many, like Ashley, see violence and self-injury as their only means of escape. Minnesota's far-flung network of group homes is another sign of how it has fallen behind other states in the movement to integrate people with disabilities into mainstream life. Though designed as safe havens for people too vulnerable to care for themselves, group homes now leave thousands of adults isolated and vulnerable to neglect and abuse. A Star Tribune review of hundreds of public documents has found: • Minnesota relies more than any other state on group homes to house adults with disabilities, spending $1 billion annually for about 19,000 people in more than 4,500 facilities. • While many group homes are safe and orderly, others are understaffed and chaotic. Each year, state regulators receive more than 700 reports of abuse, neglect, exploitation and serious injury at Minnesota group homes. In 2013, a federal judge became so alarmed at conditions facing group home residents that he appointed a special monitor to review their care. • Scores of Minnesota's group homes lie in remote rural settings, placing residents hours away from relatives who might assist with their care and check on their well-being. The Star Tribune analyzed records for more than 5,000 individuals and found that one-third were placed in group homes outside their home counties. Of these, hundreds live more than 100 miles from their home counties, often in small towns such as Hermantown in rural St. Louis County. • In dozens of interviews, people with intellectual and developmental disabilities said they were sent to group homes against their will, even when they were capable of taking care of themselves. "This feels like a prison," said Joshua Burt, 28, standing outside the Rochester group home where he was placed, against his wishes, six years ago. "This is not the place for me, but it feels like my life is outside of my hands." Erin Metzger, director of outpatient mental health at St. Luke's Hospital in Duluth, said she has seen dozens of patients cycle through local psychiatric wards and clinics after they ran away from group homes. "My heart breaks for these people," she said. "They're hundreds of miles away from their families and support systems, and that makes them sicker." In September, under pressure from U.S. District Judge Donovan Frank, Minnesota completed a plan that would give people with disabilities more say in where they live and raise the number living independently. But the increases are modest, and the plan does not call for closing group homes or reducing their state payments. FAR FROM HOME: Ashley Daly woke up to another day at her group home in Hermantown, Minn., three hours from her childhood home. 'Woods and swamps' Remote settings such as Hermantown not only place group home residents far from family and friends, they can contribute to neglect and violence. In 2010, a 44-year-old man with schizophrenia went missing after wandering away from his group home north of Duluth. A group of deer hunters discovered his bones two years later, decomposing inside his clothing in the woods. "People like to say these homes are in the 'community,'" said St. Louis County undersheriff David Phillips, as he drove by the woods where the man's remains were found. "But about the only community out here is woods and swamps." In Lewiston, a man with schizophrenia and a degenerative brain disease died after falling seven times in the kitchen of his group home. Despite sustained bruising and four cuts on his head, staff members said the 58-year-old man fell "for attention" and did not call for medical help, state investigators found. In a case last year, a 26-year-old man living at a group home in Princeton, Minn., was found dead on his bedroom floor after staff had lost contact with him for more than 44 hours. In some cases, residents simply run away, hoping that someone will move them if police take notice. VaLinda Henry suspects that's what drove her son, Troy Henry, 41, who was cognitively disabled and had schizophrenia, to wander off into the forest near Stillwater with a plastic bucket full of his personal belongings. Later that night, his body was found floating down the St. Croix River, with the bucket attached to his waist. Sheriff's deputies found what appeared to be the words "MY WILL" scrawled in the sand nearby. Just days earlier, Henry had called his mother, saying the group home wouldn't let him leave for a weekend with his two children, ages 13 and 15. "They treated my son like a prisoner," his mother said, sobbing. In far northern Minnesota, the consequences of isolation have reached crisis levels. Stuck for months or years, often among housemates with severe mental illnesses, many residents lash out at each other, turning these homes into small battlegrounds, according to county health officials and group home workers. "It's not right for human beings to live this way," said Cody Jakowski, a crisis responder at Stepping Stones for Living, a company that operates group homes near Duluth. "People aren't meant to be isolated like this." In St. Louis County, more than one out of every three 911 calls involve incidents at group homes, the sheriff's office estimates. "What is happening up here is brutal beyond belief," Phillips said. "It's like hundreds of little train wrecks dotting our landscape." Remote clusters Minnesota's reliance on group homes dates to the late 1970s, when it led the nation in shutting down large state hospitals that housed people with mental illnesses and developmental disabilities. The state encouraged small, private group homes as a more humane and cost-effective alternative, and subsidized them through Medicaid and other programs. Many of these early group homes sprouted up near the shuttered state hospitals, in outstate cities such as Faribault and Rochester. Soon, large for-profit operators began clustering group homes nearby, in rural areas where land was cheap and local resistance was minimal. Today, 62 percent of Minnesota's group homes are outside the Twin Cities metro area, state data show. The biggest cluster is in St. Louis County, where half the group home residents come from other parts of the state. Some local officials now refer to their county as the "State Hospital of Duluth." The result, some advocates say, is a system with the same misguided paternalism that "separate but equal" embodied during the civil rights movement a half century ago. "It's a segregated system," said Mark Nelson, division director of adult services in St. Louis County. "If you concentrated this many people of color in one area, there would be accusations of discrimination." Once this far-flung network emerged, it became self-perpetuating. County social workers typically recommended group homes as the only option, even for people with moderate cognitive problems, even in communities with services to support independent living. And though group homes were meant for people needing 24-hour care, such as patients with severe mental illnesses, many accept just about anyone with an intellectual or developmental disability. Records show that even clients who need just basic assistance with daily activities — like cooking meals or catching the bus — can wind up in group homes that cost up to $80,000 per person per year. "We are spending hundreds of millions of dollars a year for 24/7 care for people who don't want it and don't need it," said Nancy Fitzsimons, a professor of social work at Minnesota State University in Mankato. "Minnesota fell in love with the four-bedroom group home model, and we got stuck." Closer look SET UP TO FAIL: Tony peered nervously from behind the plastic blinds of his one-room apartment. He could hear a police siren in the distance, then some loud shouting, then a heavy silence. Top state administrators and group home industry leaders acknowledged that many people who could be living independently are instead steered toward group homes. Clients are now being asked where they want to live, a process the state plans to complete by the end of 2016. "There are people living in group homes who probably could live in other settings, but either don't know the options or don't trust the options," said Alex Bartolic, disability services director at the state Department of Human Services. "Everything has to change — our context and our way of coming at this." Closer look 'SET UP TO FAIL' Tony peered nervously from behind the plastic blinds of his one-room apartment. He could hear a police siren in the distance, then some loud shouting, then a heavy silence. "I wish I lived far, far away from this ..." he paused, searching for the right word, "sewer." Read full story Tony has a psychiatric disorder and has spent his adult life in group homes, trying steadily to get a place of his own. His attempt at independent living was cut short by the lack of therapy and job counseling, but he eventually found work on his own. 'Most people get to choose' Every so often, Joshua Burt stares out the basement window of his Rochester group home and imagines an elaborate escape. Burt sees himself packing a suitcase and then waiting for a rare moment, usually a Sunday afternoon, when shift changes sometimes leave him unsupervised. He imagines running to a nearby bus stop, using the neighborhood trees and bushes as cover. ESCAPE PLAN: Joshua Burt, who has a mild developmental disability, lives in a group home outside Rochester and often imagines running away. "I think about escaping two or three times a day," said Burt. "But where would I go?" Burt, who has a mild developmental disability, was never asked whether he wanted to live in a group home. The decision came, he said, on the day he and his siblings learned that their mother had lung cancer. "My brother came up to me and said, 'Mom wanted you in a group home,' and that was it," he recalled. Weeks later, Burt was told to pack his belongings from his mother's trailer in a mobile home park outside Rochester, then was taken to a group home he had never seen, to live with three strangers. "It seemed unfair," said Burt. "Most people at least get to visit the places where they live and choose who they get to live with." Burt works two part-time jobs — at a Wal-Mart and a Culver's restaurant — and aspires to get his own apartment. Then he wouldn't have to ask permission to have visitors or go on fishing trips with co-workers. But Burt gets just one chance a year to make his case, at a meeting that includes his county case worker, group home provider, and his older sister, who is also his guardian. At this year's meeting, Burt said, he was told he still lacked adequate "financial management skills." "I keep saying, 'I want out,' but no one listens," Burt said, after wrapping up a shift at Culver's. "How is it possible that I can work two jobs and take the bus here every day, but can't live on my own?" Video (05:29): Ashley Daly's grandparents grew too frail to handle her bipolar disorder and violent mood swings, so they moved her to a group home hundreds of miles away, a wrenching decision that still brings them to tears. A pattern of scars No one ever asked Ashley Daly either. When her grandparents, who adopted her as an infant, decided they had grown too frail to handle Ashley's violent mood swings, they asked for help from the county. A social worker gave them a long printout of group homes, most located far away, that might accept Ashley. With little more than Google to guide them, George and Ruth Daly worked their way through the list. George asked each provider a series of 10 questions — "Do you have locked doors?" and "Do you involve them in the community?" — and jotted down plus or minus signs next to each one. The group homes with the most plus signs were typically in remote places, like Saginaw and Thief River Falls. Many had wait times of a year or more for a bed. When a provider from northern Minnesota finally called them with an opening, the Dalys were elated. Though it was a long way away, the couple hoped the remote location would keep their granddaughter safe. "You wouldn't run away, because you wouldn't know what direction to run," George said. A year later, the Dalys admit they underestimated Ashley's attachment to her family and childhood home. It was only after arriving in Hermantown that she began her suicide attempts, each one prompting a faxed report to her grandparents. More than a dozen deep, zigzagging scars line her forearms, marking the many times she has cut herself since arriving up north. On a recent morning, she staggered from her bedroom at the group home, spread out on a couch, and described how much she misses her grandparents' house and her pet terrier, Holly, who stayed behind. "I had a dream last night that I finally got to see Holly," she said. "Why has everyone abandoned me?" On long distance calls home, Ashley would ask her grandparents, "Why did you adopt me if you couldn't even finish the job?" The question hangs heavy over the Dalys, who now wonder whether they made a mistake by sending her so far away. They even considered shipping all her bedroom furniture up north to make her feel more at home. But, like thousands of other Minnesota families, they were beginners in a baffling system that seemed to offer no middle ground between keeping Ashley at home and sending her far away. "We did our very best with the options we had," Ruth Daly said, "and no one to help us." BEST FRIENDS: Ashley Daly and Holly the terrier were happy to see each other on a holiday weekend. HEADING 'HOME': Ashley Daly was excited about a weekend with her grandparents and her terrier, Holly. When she learned that she was moving to a distant group, where she was cared for by Amber Johnson, above right, she felt abandoned. 'I became lost' On the long drive back from the North Woods, Ashley Daly hummed the words to her favorite song, "Put Your Records On," from the back seat of her grandparents' sport-utility vehicle. Ashley's voice got louder and more animated as the family neared the suburban landscape of her youth — the day care center and the playground where she once walked her dog now spread out asleep on her lap. After a long, cold winter in Hermantown, in a group home that allowed her only 20 minutes of "alone time" each day, Ashley was brimming with excitement at spending Easter weekend with her grandparents in Minnetrista. George and Ruth have kept Ashley's bedroom exactly as she left it — walls painted with pink butterflies and windowsills lined with teddy bears. On the living room couch is the extra-thick security blanket that George and Ruth would gently wrap around Ashley when she would fly into one of her "rages" and needed to calm down. "Grandpa!" Ashley called out from the back seat. "Tonight, after we get home, can we watch the stars? Like we did when I was little?" "Honey, we told you this before," George Daly said, as he pulled into his neighborhood. "This is NOT your home. Your home is in Duluth." But attempts to make Ashley feel at home up north have not worked. In late July, she moved to a new group home in Duluth after the one in Hermantown determined it lacked adequate staffing to keep her safe. The new home is in a residential neighborhood, but Ashley said she's still lonely — she still misses Holly and staying up late watching episodes of "CSI" with her grandpa. Beneath Ashley's bed is a box full of the poems and essays she has written since middle school. Many reflect her sense of abandonment, including self-portraits showing her lying in a pool of blood or hanging from a noose. Among the assorted letters is one she wrote to herself on the October night her grandparents first dropped her off up north. "I became lost once I learned I was moving to Duluth," Ashley said, reading the letter. "I lost everything. Trust. Hope. Relationships. Friends. Family. ... I felt this was the end." Ashley leaned her forehead on the dining room table, exasperated, and added, "I just want to go home." chris.serres@startribune.com 612-673-4308 glenn.howatt@startribune.com 612-673-7192 Source: <http://www.startribune.com/Alone-and-at-risk-in-Minnesota's-group-homes/330695801/>

On Friday, November 6, 2015, detectives from the Rancho Cucamonga Police Department in cooperation with other local and State authorities, served a Search Warrant at the Anyelir Home located on Lemon Avenue in Rancho Cucamonga. Joseph Serna Contact Reporter Police are asking people to come forward who may know more alleged victims of two caregivers accused of abusing clients with disabilities at a group home in Rancho Cucamonga. The two caregivers, Marselyn Sihotang, 36, and Roselina Sihotang, 38, were arrested Friday after a former employee contacted state regulators and reported that clients there were being abused and neglected. The women worked at Anyelir Home, which provides rooms and care for people with varying levels of disabilities. Investigators visited the facility and said they found two victims of abuse, though neither person could communicate with authorities, police said. Detectives reviewed security camera footage that allegedly showed abuse. Authorities posted a 4-minute clip of the video on YouTube in hopes it would help bring to light additional abuse allegations. In the video, a facility client wearing slippers is seen walking laps around a couch while other people sit in chairs lining the walls. A person who appears to be a caretaker stands off to the side for a few laps then pushes the client in the back as the person passes by. The caretaker does this several more times. See the most-read stories this hour >>Read the story In footage from the same room during an evening shift, another person who appears to be a client is seen slowly getting up and walking toward the exit. A person who appears to be a caretaker, but not the same person from the earlier footage, is seen cutting off the client's path and shoving the client forcefully back toward a chair in the corner. The client eventually gets up and heads toward the exit again and for a second time, the caretaker cuts off the client's path. But this time, as the client turns and heads back toward the chair in the corner, the caretaker shoves the client in the back, sending the client tumbling to the ground and into the chair, which bounces to the side. Both women were arrested Friday on suspicion of dependent-adult abuse by a caregiver and have since been released on bail. A court appearance has not been scheduled. Protecting the vulnerable vs. civil rights Advocates say guardianship too often trumps the rights of disabled adults. Story by Chris Serres • Star Tribune NOVEMBER 12, 2015 — 12:00AM Minnesota law explicitly gives these individuals the right to associate with people of their choosing and to have privacy for visits. Yet advocates seeking to help the disabled live more independently say they are routinely barred at the door by group home supervisors or court-appointed guardians, who often exercise broad powers over their wards. As a result, group home residents can become virtual prisoners, said Maggie Treichel, an organizer for Self Advocates of Minnesota, a disability rights group. "There are people across this state who desperately want the chance to tell their stories, and they are being silenced," she said. Guardians and group home operators say they must protect vulnerable adults whose cognitive disabilities or mental illnesses can lead them to make poor decisions. But they acknowledge that balancing safety against individual liberties can be tricky. "Guardianship is the most intrusive tool we have available," said Anita Raymond, a social worker and board member of the Minnesota Association for Guardianship and Conservatorship. "And it's a tool that we as a society tend to overuse." During its six-month investigation, the Star Tribune was prevented by guardians from interviewing six people with disabilities, even though all had consented to interviews. One guardian said she feared her ward might say something critical about his group home and jeopardize his placement there. Another guardian prevented an interview with a woman with a mild cognitive disability, saying the conversation could cause her anxiety. Lawyers with advocacy groups say Minnesota should work harder to enforce the law that protects the disabled's rights. "You don't leave your First Amendment rights at the door when you become someone under guardianship," said Patricia Siebert, an attorney with the Minnesota Disability Law Center. "But unfortunately, those lines keep getting blurred." chris.serres@startribune.com 612-673-4308 2 View Comments Read our comment standards StarTribune.com welcomes and encourages readers to comment and engage in substantive, mutually respectful exchanges over news topics. Coroner's jury: 'Punishment' shower death of Murray Center resident was homicide Patient choked while being given 'punishment' shower Case referred to prosecutor One employee fired; one remains on paid leave Opponents of the proposed closure of Murray Center waved signs during a public hearing. A Marion County coroner's jury ruled Thursday night that the death of 46-year-old Todd Clementz was a homicide. Clementz, a resident of the state-operated developmental center, was being given a punishment shower when he choked and died on March 30. According to testimony at a coroner's inquest Thursday night, a Murray Center employee was giving Clementz a punishment shower when Clementz began to choke. Clementz, who was deaf and blind, coughed up food particles and died. Witnesses at the inquest included Illinois State Police Special Agent Tom Hatley, who described the shower given to Clementz as a "punishment" shower. Marion County Coroner Troy Cannon said evidence suggests the employee had given punishment showers to residents on multiple occasions. "Basically, there are indications that the employee had done this kind of thing in the past with this resident — and other ones, as well, even before this took place," Cannon said. Vera said one of the two employees has been fired, while the other remains on paid leave. The coroner's jury was convened in Marion County, because Clementz was pronounced dead at St. Mary's Hospital, which is in the Marion County portion of Centralia. A coroner's jury has five possible rulings on manner of death: homicide, suicide, accident, natural or undetermined. Murray Center was the subject of months-long battle over a state plan to close some state-operated developmental centers and shift residents to private group homes. After employees, relatives of residents and community members mounted stiff opposition to the cost-cutting move, the state relented and decided to keep the center open. State Rep. Charlie Meier, R-Okawville, was a lead supporter of keeping the Murray Center open. He said the case is not a bad reflection on state-operated developmental centers. "It was Murray workers who questioned what happened and got this investigation going," Meier said. "If this would have happened in a group home, it never would have been known about — it would have been considered an accidental death." Oregon Lawmakers To Get An Update On State Foster Care Oversight By Chris Lehman • 23 hours ago Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email Chris Phan Flickr Originally published on November 13, 2015 5:39 pm Listen Listening... 0:00 / Oregon lawmakers return to Salem Monday for a three-day series of meetings. One of the first items on the agenda is an update on the state's oversight of the foster care system. This after Oregon Governor Kate Brown removed the head of the state agency in charge of child welfare programs. That was less than two weeks ago. This transition in leadership comes after an investigation by Portland's Willamette Week newspaper that showed that top officials at Oregon's Department of Human Services turned a blind eye to financial problems and other neglect issues at a prominent foster care provider in Portland. Lawmakers will also take a first look at possible bills for the 2016 legislative session. Those include a possible hike in the legal age to buy tobacco products, and a possible increase in the state's minimum wage. The Gates teacher evaluation system in action—a costly and ineffective adventure in Hillsborough, Florida November 13, 2015 Gates Foundation by Carol Burris Executive Director, Network for Public Education and former New York principal (Part of this report first appeared in Valerie Strauss' The Answersheet as a guest blog by Burris) In 2008, Florida's Hillsborough School District received a \$10,000,000 grant from the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. The initiatives in the grant included: the establishment of an evaluation system based 40% on student test scores; the inclusion of test scores in decisions to grant tenure and determine teacher career paths; merit pay, which is referred to in the grant as "pay for performance"; bonuses for principals and teachers who raise low performing students' scores; the use of data for hiring; and the use of "data dashboards" to make instructional decisions. By 2012, the Hillsborough district had spent a whopping \$28.4 million on the grant's initiatives, using Race to the Top, additional grants, and district funds. District funds were 19% of all expenditures. $3,224,000 was spent developing a value added model (VAM) to measure teacher performance by test scores. The $24.8 million was considered a "lower bound" estimate by AIR, which studied the spending. Winning the grant was heralded as a reform in which a teachers union had cooperatively worked with a Superintendent, Mary Ellen Elia, to enact evaluation reform. In his book, Class Warfare: Inside the Fight to Fix America's Schools, Stephen Brill describes Hillsborough union president, Jean Clements, as a union president who was "willing to embrace the Jeb Bush reforms rather than take a headline against them." Brill reported that Clements collaborated on the grant after being prodded to do so by the AFT [\[1\]](#). Elia wanted 50% of the evaluation to be based on test scores; Clements insisted that it not be more than 40%. The Gates grant, however was not popular with the rank and file teachers of Hillsborough. In 2012, thirty Hillsborough teachers went to Jacksonville, Florida to participate in a televised discussion on merit pay and the evaluation of teachers by test scores. The teachers complained about the effects that merit pay and evaluation by test scores had on their teaching. In December of 2014, the Hillsborough school board asked for a review of the evaluation program based on complaints. During that review, the once enthusiastic Clements voiced concerns. She told the School Board that the system she helped put into place is considered by teachers to be "demeaning and unfair" and that teacher voice and input has decreased. After Superintendent Mary Ellen Elia, who was the driving force in the partnership with the Gates Foundation, was dismissed by the district, it was reported in The Tampa Bay Times [that during the last four years of her tenure the district went on a "spending jag" using more than half of all of its over \$300 million in reserves in order to pay costs such as \$11.3 million for teacher peer evaluators, \$6.1 million to teacher mentors and other cost overruns expected to reach a total of \$50 million. The Gates Foundation, for its part, only paid 80 million of the 100 million that it promised the district through 2016, and will not pay the balance. The experiment is over. \[The district is dismantling the Gates teacher evaluation program\]\(#\) which was not only too costly but never achieved its goals—test scores for minority students are dismal, graduation rates are down, and the best teachers are not assigned to the neediest students. The Gates teacher evaluation grant was a costly, failed experiment. \[\\[1\\]\]\(#\) According to Brill, AFT President Randi Weingarten said that she was involved in the negotiations of the Gates teacher evaluation grants. Boy who died at Lord of the Flies bootcamp November 17, 2015 11:32am Bruce Staeger - teen ranch death. Picture: Carla Campbell-Moffat. Emma Reynolds news.com.au Share Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on Google+ Share on Reddit Email a friend TIERRA Blanca Ranch is advertised as the bootcamp where troubled youth can make "a new beginning". For Bruce Staeger, it was the place he would suffer and die. His mother and stepfather were like any desperate parents trying to help an out-of-control teenager. They had run out of ideas for how to save their 16-year-old from a vicious cycle of drug use, skipping school and running away, and the strict program on a remote New Mexico outpost was the last resort. Today, they have heard endless shocking stories about the camp, where teenagers reported being beaten, chained, handcuffed and starved by abusive leaders. Most disturbing is the punishment peers say they doled out to Bruce — a story straight out of Lord of the Flies. MOB MENTALITY After months of being broken down at the camp, the traumatised boys started bullying Bruce, they told Rolling Stone magazine. They say camp staff tacitly encouraged them to beat and abuse Bruce in gangs, or turned a blind eye. He was the perfect scapegoat. Several say they still have nightmares about their own vile actions. Bruce's death came in September 2013, two years after his arrival at the ranch, when he fell from the back of the camp owner's pick-up truck, which another boy was driving in the dark on a dirt road. The ranch was 64 kilometres from the nearest town with little mobile phone coverage, so it took some time to get help. Bruce died of internal bleeding in El Paso. The tragic accident marked the beginning of a major investigation into the ranch, which had been the subject of disturbing reports since 2006. In October 2013, local authorities began looking into allegations teens were beaten by an ex-employee and forced to wear leg shackles and cuffs for minor infractions of ranch rules, the Albuquerque Journal reported. Witnesses told police the staff member hit one boy with a "Kubaton" baton and another youngster was made to run all day and then shackled. Officers called to the ranch by a boy on phone he took from the site found a boy wearing restraints. Police reports also showed camp staff allegedly had groups of teenage residents beat another for being uncooperative. New Mexico Governor Susana Martinez said authorities were particularly concerned when they arrived to search the site and found nine boys and owner Scott Chandler missing. She said evidence found at the ranch appeared to corroborate some of the boys' claims, the NY Daily News reported. 'BIBLICAL PRINCIPLES' Chandler has repeatedly denied the accusations and said he was proud of his site's reputation for helping at-risk teens. "Most youth get on track to successful and rewarding lives outside the ranch," he said in a statement. He claimed he had simply been on a wilderness walk when the authorities turned up. Shortly after Bruce's death, he and wife Colette appeared on the Today show, where he admitted restraints might sometimes be used on boys "when we go into a detention centre to pick up a child that has been court-ordered before a judge or something to have him placed in our program." But he added, "that is actually very minimal of what we do." The Chandlers call themselves "cattle ranchers with a heart for God, and turning kids [sic] lives around", and claim their $80-a-day youth program is run on "sound Biblical principles". They have been running the "tough-love" treatment for 20 years. In 2000, the ranch's website says, 104 pre and early teens visited for summer sessions funded by the National Institutes of Health, in partnership with a major university and New Mexico's second largest county. The Children, Youth and Families Department has also come under fire because it never followed up allegations that started in 2006, claiming the ranch was a "wilderness program" rather than a "residential program" and therefore not under its jurisdiction. HOGTIED AND DRAGGED IN DIRT A year after Bruce's death, his family filed a lawsuit against the program and the ranch's auto policy at Santa Fe County District Court, local news station KOB4 reported. They alleged Bruce had been subjected to cruel punishments, including being forced to eat horse dung and having jalapeño juice poured in his eyes. They alleged the teenager was carried from a pole by his bound hands and feet, like a pig. "His death was the end result of a pattern of abuse and negligence," said the lawsuit. Several boys gradually approached Bruce's mother Carla Moffat to talk about their experiences, and what they did to Bruce. They described having to run up and down hills carrying truck tyres and rocks, and made to work and sleep in restraints that left scars. They said staff encouraged them to "help" out-of-shape Bruce, by dragging him or punching him in the gut, Rolling Stone reported. That's when the beatings started. Several boys admitted to hanging Bruce from the horse trailer, lassoing him and dragging him over the ground and putting him in a sleeping bag filled with dung and kneeling on his chest. Another family have now also sued, with James and Cheryl Morgan claiming their grandson suffered physical and emotional abuse and naming the CYFD as another defendant for not doing enough to protect kids on the ranch. Liz McGrath, executive director at Pegasus Legal Services for Children, told news.com.au: "We are very concerned that Tierra Blanca may be accepting minors to their program. It is critical that the State of New Mexico exercise its authority to license and oversee these types of programs to ensure that the kinds of abuses reported in the Rolling Stone article never happen again." CYFD said it wanted jurisdiction over such programs, with secretary Yolanda Deines telling KOB4: "I just need to know we don't create a Lord of the Flies situation anywhere in New Mexico and as long as we don't have supervision for this kind of program, there's potential for that." TROUBLED TEENS INDUSTRY There are hundreds of extreme teen rehab programs like the one at Tierra Blanca across America. Many are unregulated and employ questionable techniques, often based on fundamentalist Christian ideas. Rolling Stone estimates the industry generates $1.7 billion a year and has around 10,000 teenagers from around the world in its care at any one time. In 2007, the US Government Accountability Office found "thousands of allegations of abuse, some of which involved death" at residential programs. A shady transport industry has grown up around it, with parents often hiring "escorts" to forcibly take their offspring to US camps. Eddie Curry, from First Step Adolescent Services in Las Vegas, told the BBC British families would pay up to \$8000 to have him get their kids. "It's a wonder no one has died out there before," said Bruce's stepdad, Jim Moffat. "There are kids who attempted suicide, kids who ran away in the desert, and it's in the middle of nowhere, kids who felt like they were starving to death." While some speak of trauma, many of Chandler's graduates say the tough program turned their lives around. Bruce's mother hoped it would save him from an early grave — instead it sealed his fate. For nearly 50 years the campus, replete with handcrafted dormitories, classroom buildings, shops and a handsome chapel, served as the setting in which thousands of wayward young people could study forest management, learn a trade, undergo counseling, and gain perspective and guidance on what it would take to become productive members of society. “This was always the hidden jewel of juvenile corrections,” said Doug Herrmann, director of Juvenile Services for the South Dakota Department of Corrections. Herrmann was instrumental in the decision to close the camp and hand over the property to the state Department of Game, Fish & Parks, but he said he did so reluctantly. “It’s a great facility, and I started my career there in ‘85,” Herrmann said last week. “In closing it, I felt like I was losing a little something.” Authorized by the South Dakota Legislature in 1966 and constructed in 1967, the Youth Forestry Camp, known as Camp 1, taught forest-management techniques to troubled male teens. In 1975, Camp 2 was built, introducing more vocational-technical education, building trades, small engine repair and programs that assisted young men in transitioning back into the community, Herrmann explained. In 1996, juvenile girls were transferred from correctional facilities at Redfield to the East Campus in Custer State Park, while the Youth Forestry Camp and all the males were shifted to the STAR Academy’s West Campus south of the city of Custer. In early 2000, the two campuses were treating 218 14- to 18-year-olds, most sent there by the court system, Herrmann said. Today, due to a variety of factors, that number stands at 45, he said. “I’ve always said I don’t think juvenile corrections should be a growth industry,” Herrmann said. “Back then, when you looked around the country, there were an increasing number of kids entering the system. But, we got smarter at how we did intervention.” Herrmann credited the development of partnerships and programs for reducing the number of troubled teens sentenced to treatment facilities by the courts. “We’re just being more effective and having more success with the kids we do release back to the community,” he said. “We’ve put things in place — foster homes, individual living choices, transitional beds — and worked with places like the McCrossen’s Boys Ranch near Sioux Falls. Herrmann said the move, under study for three years, would save the state about $550,000 annually through economies of scale, reduced number of employees and combined food services and maintenance. About two weeks after the consolidation, STAR Academy Superintendent Jeff Haiar, who has been on the job 19 years, said his staff had encountered no problems in combining boys and girls programming at the West Campus. “It’s gone very well,” Haiar said. Custer State Park Superintendent Matt Snyder welcomed the exchange and said managers of the 110-square-mile park were studying potential uses for the facilities. “We’re still in the process of determining what we have and how we will use that in the future,” Snyder said. “The buildings are in decent shape. They’ve done a nice job of keeping up that whole campus. By the first of the year, we’ll have a direction on where we are going to go with this.” South Dakota’s most popular state park, which is on track to welcome 1.7 million visitors in 2015, is always in need of facilities, Snyder said. The park’s concessionaire, Custer State Park Resort Co., had already shown an interest in using a shop at the East Campus for a maintenance facility, while the dormitories may be converted to staff housing for the 60 to 70 seasonal workers hired annually by the park, or the same number of volunteers who assist each year, he said. What Education Policy Makers Can Learn From A ‘Failing School’ “How can someone make a decision about a school they’ve never even walked into?” That question is at the heart of Kristina Rizga’s terrific new book Mission High: One school, how experts tried to fail it, and the students and teachers who made it triumph. Rizga uses her considerable journalistic skills—honed as the education writer for Mother Jones—to involve readers in the lives of students and educators at Mission High, a San Francisco public school with a proud history but a “failing school” label. The school, where Rizga spent four years as an embedded reporter, serves a student body of mostly low-income kids, many from households where the first language isn’t English, and which ranks among the lowest-performing 5 percent of schools in the country. Only 30 percent of the school’s students score at proficient or above on the state standardized tests in English, and only 40 percent score proficient in math. But in looking more closely at the school, Rizga discovered that other data—college acceptance and teacher retention—didn’t align with the school’s “failing” label. When Mission High principal Eric Guthertz welcomed Rizga into his school, she observed something that frustrates students, parents, and educators across the country: As these schools do everything in their power to serve their students, they continue to be judged as failures by a process that seems completely remote and disconnected from the school. As she walked the halls of Mission High, observed classes, and spoke with the students and their teachers, Rizga came to see a very different story about the school—one of committed educators and persevering learners doing all they can to succeed despite the judgments and prescriptions of policy makers. Recently, I spoke with Rizga about her experience at Mission High. Your point of view in this book is not at the 30,000-foot level like many other education books. You spent four years embedded in this school. Was that a deliberate decision you made, to be really at the ground level? Or did that just evolve? In my research as an education reporter, I always started in libraries and with books but felt what was missing were the voices of students and teachers. It’s impossible to get to the truth without those voices. When you remove those voices and talk about schools as abstractions and policy ideas, you create a recipe for ideological wars with no on-the-ground evidence supporting the positions. I felt that if I could follow the stories of students and teachers and learn what were their needs and what works for them, then I could get beyond the abstractions and the ideological war. Doesn’t that make your work just anecdotal? I get pushback on that. But I spent about half my time reporting from the schools, and in the other half, I read some 200 studies written by academics. I consulted with researchers, such as Linda Darling-Hammond, Larry Cuban, and others. There are three chapters in the book where I review nearly a hundred years of education history to give readers an understanding of why we have such a top down, one-size-fits-all policy for education, and why it’s been difficult to include the voices of people who are most impacted by the system. I looked at some of your earlier writings for Mother Jones from 2010 and saw you’re from Latvia. You described the schools you attended in that country as “Soviet-style schools.” Why didn’t you bring that up in the book? American education is so complicated I wanted to have a focus and not bring my personal background into it so much. That said, I remember upon landing in this country that one of the most shocking things to me was how unequal the funding is for schools. In Latvia, and just about every other Western and Asian country, public schools get equal funding, and schools that teach high numbers of low-income students get more funding. Whereas in the United States you have a school like Mission High, where the students are mostly low-income, that receives $9,700 per student while in Palo Alto, one of the most affluent suburbs in the United States, schools receive $14,000 per student. I found an elementary school in Sausalito, another affluent community, that receives $33,000 per student. That’s a shocking fact for anyone who comes to this most powerful and wealthy country in the world, to see so much inequality. How did the inequality of funding affect the students and teachers you met at Mission High? It’s obvious to the teachers and students in that school. San Francisco is one of the wealthiest cities in the country and in the world. And when you first see Mission High, you see a beautiful building that is quite old and has seen decades of neglect. The beauty of the original structure reflects the past commitment California made to education, but now, some of the furniture hasn’t been replaced since the 1950s, it looks like. The school looks more dilapidated than my high school in Latvia looked, which is one of the poorest countries in the European Union. I still get pictures from my relatives in Latvia, and the children’s schools look 30 years ahead of what Mission looks like in terms of furniture and computers. Also, classes are larger, and teachers in Mission High work much longer hours than teachers in places like Palo Alto. Because the students at Mission High come from all over the world—from El Salvador, Guatemala, China—the teachers have to provide a lot more personal support before and after school, during lunch, over the weekend. And the classroom preparation takes so much longer too than it does when teaching in a school where the student population is relatively homogenous. Also, many of the students at Mission High come from some of the poorest neighborhoods in San Francisco. Their families are often under-resourced, and there tends to be instability. So students are dealing with home issues, and teachers have to address those personal issues before they can get to academics. That takes more time too. Despite all these extra hours, teachers at Mission High actually get paid $10,000 less than a typical teacher in Palo Alto. So lack of resources and demands on teachers’ time are big problems at a school like Mission High. Why don’t policy makers get this? Educational policy is mostly driven by outsiders—philanthropists, politicians, business folks, and tech moguls. They tend to focus on things they know, such as organizational restructuring, management practices, data collection systems. They tend to ignore the most important things about teaching and learning. Like what? So many things that happen at the classroom level are completely invisible to most people who aren't teachers. As the science teacher Rebecca Fulop, who I profile in my book, pointed out, most people feel they've spent enough time in classrooms to know what education is all about. But much of what goes into teaching and learning is invisible unless you're the actual teacher, such as the pace of the class, the variation in instruction, the grading and analysis of student work, the relationships with students. This is why it's so important to have teacher and student voices in the policy conversation, to make sure policies address these invisible issues. For someone who wanted to write a book that's above the "ideological wars," that sounds pretty ideological. After four years at Mission, I've spent enough time to know the importance of including the voices of teachers and students in policy conversation because they know more than any other academics, politicians, or philanthropists what works in the classroom. Nearly all the educators you portray approach their practice from a social justice frame. Isn't that pretty controversial? I can't speak about the history of a social justice teaching approach. I can speak about what I learned from the teachers at Mission High School. They all had awareness that schools can be set up as institutions that can replicate racist patterns in society, or they can be institutions that help reduce these racist patterns. At Mission they call it an anti-racist teaching lens. So where does academics fit in with correcting social problems? When the teachers at Mission School look at their work through an anti-racist lens, they look at the content and notice whether or not it recognizes that 95 percent of the students in their school are students of color. After students learn the standards in the canon, do they have opportunities to do their own research, and are they allowed to learn about things going on in society that they care about? When it comes to the craft of teaching, are teachers recognizing the needs of African American and Latino students? Are there patterns in grading that unconsciously reflect the race of the students? What support services are there in the school – student clubs, tutoring, help with college application, English classes for immigrant parents, and access to computers? Another thing you're adamant about in the book is that a copy-and-paste way of replicating education policies doesn't work—that you can't just take what has been effective at one school and assume it will work at another. Because the cultures of the schools may be very different. Nothing I learned at Mission High can be used as a top-down blueprint. But aren't there some main things that just about any school can learn from your experience at Mission High School? Yes, there are many important principles and ingredients at Mission High that others can learn from. First, the teaching in this school is student centered. Sure there are standardized tests, but the instruction is centered on the interests, experiences, and needs of individual students. That is the driving force, not the standardized tests. Second, there is an enormous focus on the craft of teaching. Both the administrators and the teachers make sure there is always time set aside to give teachers opportunities to plan lessons together and share knowledge with each other, which is so rare in other schools based on my conversations with other teachers around the country. Third, there is an intense focus on issues of race and equity. Teacher leaders at Mission High are always disaggregating school-based data—not just the standardized test scores, but data on absences, grades, referrals, and other school-based statistics—to identify gaps. They'll also look at qualitative information, interview teachers and students, look at lesson and unit plans, and student work to ascertain where students are struggling and what kinds of supports teachers need. This is the type of support teachers are generally thrilled to receive because it's respectful. It is based on relationships, not to fire them or give them a bonus. The teachers I met at Mission High in my four years there want to be successful. They are in this profession for very little money because they want to work with kids and help their students succeed. Involuntary Hospitalization of Drug Users Is Bad Policy Thursday, 19 November 2015 00:00 By Susan Sered, Truthout | Op-Ed font size decrease font size increase font size Print 44 Email (Photo: Hospital Bed via Shutterstock; Edited: LW / TO) This story could not have been published without the support of readers like you. Click here to make a tax-deductible donation to Truthout and fund more stories like it! Massachusetts appears to be on the cusp of adopting legislation proposed by Republican Gov. Charlie Baker that would allow doctors to hospitalize drug users, involuntarily and without a court order, for 72 hours. Previously, the power to order involuntary commitment of drug or alcohol users lay exclusively in the hands of judges under a Massachusetts law known as Section 35. At this time, few states give judges similar power to take away the freedom of individuals not accused of a crime. (1) Does allowing people to be forcibly confined really serve the interests of the addicted person? The plan to allow the involuntary commitment of drug users has received virtual across-the-board support. According to press reports, the majority of Massachusetts' sheriffs and the association representing Massachusetts' district attorneys have come out in favor of the bill (H.3817). Hampshire County Sheriff Robert Garvey's comments represent the growing opinion that, "The governor's bill changes the attitude that addiction is not a criminal offense as much as it is a medical problem." Garvey's remarks are echoed around the country. For a variety of reasons - including a shift in media portrayals of the race of drug users - we are currently experiencing a cultural and judicial movement away from criminalization and toward medicalization of substance abuse. Massachusetts might well be the vanguard of this movement. Not only is Massachusetts a relatively "white" state at a time in which the new face of drug use is white, but also it is the first state to have passed the health-care coverage reform ("Romneycare") that later became the law of the land nationally ("Obamacare"). However, does allowing people to be forcibly confined in any space - whether it is a jail or a hospital - really serve the interests of the addicted person? And should the onus to fix social problems really be placed on physicians? Addiction Treatment and the Role of Physicians Having worked for the past decade with criminalized women, most of whom struggle or have struggled with addiction issues, I am far from convinced that the governor, sheriffs and district attorneys have got it right. While recategorizing addiction as a medical rather than a judicial issue certainly sounds like a step in the right direction, giving doctors unchecked power to hospitalize people against their will opens the door for serious human rights violations. Our legal system, like that of other modern democracies, insists that an individual should not lose his or her freedom without the due process of law. A doctor, committing people without an opportunity for those people to be represented by counsel, will be asked to serve as both prosecutor and judge - a position that directly contradicts principles of US jurisprudence and places doctors in an uncomfortable and untenable position vis-à-vis their patients. Knowing that doctors have this power will, I fear, serve to discourage people who could benefit from immediate medical attention from seeking assistance. More broadly, the proposed bill puts the onus on physicians to fix social problems. There is no evidence whatsoever to indicate that three days of treatment will have lasting positive effects upon drug users. I understand that the motives behind the proposed bill are benign. However, I assume that the image of the doctor-patient relationship in the minds of the governor, sheriffs and district attorneys is most likely the kind of relationship they have with their own family doctors: a relationship in which the doctor knows each patient's history and family and has a good grasp of each patient's medical and social background. However, it is likely that the doctors who will be committing patients under Governor Baker's plan are emergency room doctors or hospitalists; that is, doctors who meet the patient for the first time at the encounter that leads to the commitment. Asking doctors to singlehandedly take away the freedom of patients they barely know is not a reasonable burden to place on doctors. I have great respect for doctors and I understand their frustration at treating patients for overdoses, only to watch these same patients walk out the hospital door immediately following stabilization. However, the bottom line is that there is no evidence whatsoever to indicate that three days of treatment will have lasting positive effects upon drug users. The three-day proposal, I assume, is based on the three-day commitment for psychiatric patients under Massachusetts General Law, Section 12, though, since no reason is articulated for the three-day idea it might just as easily (although perhaps subconsciously) follow the three days between the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ. In any case, there is little to no evidence showing that coerced drug treatment is effective. (2) When patients are released after their three-day involuntary commitment, there is no reason to think that they will not return to their former drug use. In fact, having abstained from opiates for several days may set them up to overdose when they return to their former level of drug use, with a reduced tolerance for the drugs. (3) If a plan were in place to provide long-term, multifaceted support after the three days, I might have a different take on the proposal. But I do not see that Governor Baker's bill includes such a plan, or a way to fund it. As I've seen repeatedly among the women with whom I work, even the "good" rehab placements - that is, ones that last three or six months - usually end with people going back out into poverty, unemployment, scarce community support and often homelessness. These are sure recipes for sending them back into the drug use/detox cycle. A Gap in Standard US Medical Training We in the United States have great respect for physicians and we trust that their medical training is among the best in the world. However, addiction treatment is not a substantial part of most medical school curricula, and even in instances where doctors took a course (typically an elective) in the subject, given the rapidity with which the field of addiction treatment is progressing, their knowledge in the field may well be outdated. (4) I personally have spoken with physicians who know nearly nothing about Suboxone (a drug used to assist people recovering from heroin addiction) and have never administered a dose of Narcan (a drug used to treat heroin overdoses). Few hospitals in Massachusetts, and even fewer in other parts of the country, have more than one or two addiction medicine specialists on staff, which means that non-specialists will be tasked with the responsibility of deciding whether or not to commit patients who, in many cases, are seen as a nuisance or part of a "revolving-door" patient group. I know from having spoken with doctors around the country that they, like many politicians, tend to believe that 12-step programs like Narcotics Anonymous (NA) are effective in treating addiction when, in fact, there is no evidence showing that NA participation (and especially coerced participation) leads to long-term abstinence from drug use. (5) Indeed, I suspect that lying behind the proposed legislation is the notion, propagated by 12-step organizations, that alcoholism and substance abuse are "diseases" that take over one's life, independent of social and structural conditions - and that people living with alcohol- or substance-abuse disorders lack the capacity to make sound decisions. (This is why they must turn themselves over to a "higher power.") How Race and Class Shape the Treatment of Drug Users I do not doubt that many doctors are thoughtful, fair and knowledgeable. But I do know that there is a sufficient history of medical abuses - including medical experiments on prisoners and on Black men (e.g. the infamous Tuskegee syphilis experiment) - which warrants that all medical research undergoes thorough vetting and oversight by ethics reviews boards such as the institutional review boards. Crafted in the frenzied panic over opiate deaths in Massachusetts, Governor Baker's bill lacks a requirement for any sort of oversight. Decades of research show that doctors tend to treat patients differently depending on the gender or race or both of the patient and of the doctor. (6) Particularly when doctors are being granted full discretion in whether or not to subject individuals to confinement, this lack of oversight is troublesome. Crafted in the frenzied panic over opiate deaths in Massachusetts, Governor Baker's bill lacks a requirement for any sort of oversight. It certainly should raise eyebrows that the popular push to relabel addiction and send addicts to "treatment" rather than prison is taking place at a time when public attention has shifted from Black crack users to white opiate users. Still, redefining people as "sick addicts" rather than "criminal addicts" is not as significant a social shift as one may think. In both cases, they are labeled as flawed individuals who have failed to take responsibility for their own lives. In both cases, the onus for "deviance" lies on the individual rather than on the society that creates and sustains social and economic conditions that lead far too many people to feel that mind-altering and mood-altering substances are the best - or the only - means of making it through the day, the week or their lives. Of course, those people labeled as "addicts" or "drug abusers" are not all that deviant. Throughout the United States, the normative way for dealing with misery is through doctors' prescriptions for attention challenges, for anxiety, for depression and even for low libido. (7) The "epidemic" of opiate-related deaths is not spread evenly across white communities in the United States. In fact, the new attention to white opiate users exposes an important and seldom discussed reality of US society: class matters. The white opiate users in Massachusetts overwhelmingly come from poor and working-class communities - mostly non-urban - where good jobs are scarce and where young people see little hope of ever attaining the American dream. The criminalized women I have come to know over the past decade are, for the most part, poor and white, and they represent a tragic social trend. According to research published in 2014 by sociologist William Cockerham, "For the first time in modern history, the life expectancy of a particular segment of the American population - non-Hispanic white women with low levels of education and income living in certain rural counties - is declining." And the same decline is happening among white men. (8) Opiate use is one of the factors explaining declining life expectancies in impoverished white communities, but it is crucial that we understand that opiate use is a symptom of hopelessness, disaffection, powerlessness and marginalization. Unless we treat those social forces, we are deceiving ourselves if we think that allowing physicians to commit drug users for three days is going to do anything other than intensify those forces. NZ adoption laws 'breach human rights' Updated at 11:17 am on 16 November 2015 Share on Twitter Share on Facebook Share on Google Plus Share on Reddit Share on LinkedIn Share via email Max Towle, Employment Reporter - @maxbentleytowle Fewer children are being adopted in New Zealand, and an adoption action group says the country's 60-year-old law breaches human rights and needs overhauling. Advocates say the present law breaches human rights, children's rights, and the Bill of Rights drastically needs an overhaul. Sitting in a small room filled with musical instruments, Wellington shop worker Peter Jamieson told of his adoption as a baby. "In 1967, when I was born, a family could walk into a ward with about 20 or 30 children and pick the one they wanted. "My parents, they chose me and I was brought up in a very nice, normal family... all through that I was told I was adopted." Peter Jamieson, who was adopted as a baby, said knowing about his history meant a lot to him. Photo: RNZ / Max Towle He's since reconnected with his biological mother and father, and said he was incredibly glad he did. "The time when I found my biological family, I was at a maturity level where it wasn't going to faze me," he said. "My whakapapa was really important to me - just knowing about my history meant a lot to me - I had felt detached and didn't know anything about where I came from." Parents who've adopted 'must be open with children' But Unicef advocacy manager Deborah Morris-Travers said many were not as lucky. Under the current law, when a child is adopted, a new birth certificate is drafted without any mention of the biological parents. "It's important for them to maintain contact with their birth family, but also, as they get older, to have more information about their cultural identity," Ms Morris-Travers said. "It's about the child's right to know who they are - New Zealand continues to have adoption law which breaches human rights." Ms Morris-Travers said Child, Youth and Family was generally good at telling parents that adopt to be open with children, but said there still needed to be a law change to enforce that. Dr Anne Else of the group Adoption Action, who has written about the history of adoption, said the law breached the Human Rights Act and the Bill of Rights Act. "The act is based on the premise that neither the adopted person, nor the birth family, would ever see each other again," Dr Else said. "It is entirely orientated around adult interests. The birth mother can sign a consent when the child is 10 days old, which is one of the shortest periods in the world." She said another problem was there was no requirement for a child to give consent to be adopted, even at the age of 17. Adoption laws criticised but no change yet There were 152 domestic adoptions last year, down 25 percent from five years ago, and many of those were people adopting family members. The number of applications for adoption also fell from 253 to 207 in that period. In 2000, the Law Commission published a report suggesting about 100 changes to the law, but to date, none have been imposed. In 2007, a Ministry of Justice paper to Cabinet stated there were legal and social reasons why adoption laws needed to be changed because it perpetuated discriminatory practice and created a system open to abuse. Three years later, a Human Rights Commission report highlighted the need to review adoption legislation as too many children were experiencing poverty and poor health, which resulted in poor outcomes in early childhood, which reached into later childhood and adulthood. Law Society family law chair Allan Cooke said the law lacked regard for children's cultural background and their heritage, which he said was important for Maori and Pasifika groups. "The other issue for us is there's no way for the voice of the children to be heard in the adoption when it goes through the Family Court," he said. Green Party MP Kevin Hague said the law was becoming increasingly irrelevant. "This is a law that dates from 1955 and effectively fossilises the attitudes and values of that time. It's legislation that desperately needs overhaul." Mr Hague has tried to push a bill updating the law for seven years, and had met with Justice Minister Amy Adams who he said was responsive to change. But the minister's office provided a statement which said "adoption law reform isn't currently on the Minister's work programme due to competing priorities for law reform in the justice sector". When asked to explain, a spokesperson said "there are other things on the minister's agenda that are more important right now". A Channel 2 Action News investigation found evidence that the group home closed in 2010 but continued to solicit donations from the public, accepting at least \$658,000 in contributions from donors in the years that followed. "There's no Children's Care Home, like no foster kids ... period," said Christy Cunningham, who worked as the Noah's Ark marketing director. The Noah's Ark name is best known around metro Atlanta for its animal sanctuary, which rescues and rehabilitates exotic animals. But tucked away on the same Henry County property is a 6,000-square-foot house that was once the Children's Care Home. The two charities share one address, one website and money, according to the whistleblowers. "You get into a really sticky situation when you start taking money meant for one non-profit and putting it into another," said Jo Crane, who worked as the charity's assistant controller. Crane, Cunningham, and former accountant, Jill Phillips-Lingen, approached WSB-TV to share what they observed while working at Noah's Ark. "It's not anything like they pretend they are," said Phillips-Lingen. All three women had access to the Noah's Ark records and say they were fired when they began to question discrepancies in the finances and personal spending by the Noah's Ark founding family. "There's no way that they can account for everything they spent," said Crane. "Because it's not spent where it should be." In 2011, Georgia's Department of Human Services sent a letter to Noah's Ark confirming that the Children's Care Home had closed "in response to financial failure." The charity's founder, Jama Hedgecoth, did help foster children for years, but admitted in a letter that the last foster child left her home in March 2010. "I freaked out. I'm like, 'Holy crap. I'm involved in a major, major scam,'" Cunningham recounted when she began working on the Noah's Ark website. As recently as last February, that website was still soliciting and accepting donations as the Children's Care Home. The same month, it changed its business name with the state of Georgia, but continues to use its original 501(c)(3) IRS exemption ID assigned to the children's home. State records show that nonprofit, now called Noah's Ark Children's

Sanctuary, has not been registered as a charity since 2012. "Absolutely, I think the state of Georgia should be investigating this organization," said Sandra Minuitti, who runs the watchdog website Charity Navigator. "That's a huge ethical breach. It could be a legal issue as well." Minuitti said she sees a number of red flags in the Noah's Ark financial records, particularly so many Hedgecoth family members on both of the charity's boards. She also found it unusual that the children's home could have brought in so many contributions without any fundraising expenses. The charity's own audits show tens of thousands of dollars spent on things like groceries, utilities and even landscaping, since the last foster child left in 2010. Hedgecoth also paid herself roughly $100,000 in Children's Care Home salary during that time; she also makes roughly $65,000 each year from the animal sanctuary. Channel 2 investigative reporter Jodie Fleischer initially scheduled an interview with Hedgecoth, but her general manager Raymond Jordan, who had arranged the interview, tried to cancel it because of weather. When told the questions were regarding financial irregularities at the children's home, and that access to the animal sanctuary grounds was not necessary, he left a voicemail message claiming that Hedgecoth was suddenly getting on a plane to Haiti and would be unavailable for two weeks. Two days later, Fleischer spotted Hedgecoth and Jordan, at a gas station near Noah's Ark. "You can't tell me what happened to more than half a million dollars in the last five years?" Fleischer asked. "Nothing has happened to over half a million dollars, except it was spent on children," Hedgecoth replied, dismissing the allegations as trumped-up claims by disgruntled former employees. Hedgecoth admitted that five of the six kids featured on her website as "children of the Ark," are her own adopted children. Fleischer asked, "Besides your adopted children, who are the children living in that home?" "There's children we have rescued from another country that are medically fragile," replied Hedgecoth. UPDATE: Charity watchdog website issues advisory for Noah's Ark "Online, you say the money you're raising is going to abused and neglected children," Fleischer asked. "Absolutely," replied Hedgecoth. "Have you ever been to Haiti?" The sixth child featured on the website is Haitian. As of last summer, he was being adopted by Hedgecoth's daughter. "Putting them out there as foster kids, and people are giving them money, I mean, once you adopt them, they're your kids. It's not up to everybody else to raise your kids," said Phillips-Linger. Hedgecoth claims that she pays for 100 percent of her adopted children's expenses and lifestyle, but admitted that they all live on the tax-free property. She says it is no longer a children's home, it is her home. The latest IRS tax return for the children's home charity lists a $950,000 building as an asset, along with $150,000 worth of equipment. "I have never misspent one penny, not one penny," said Hedgecoth. "And I can prove it." She may have to. Georgia's secretary of state's charities division opened an investigation after Fleischer inquired about the Noah's Ark records. The state plans to investigate both charities, based on the whistleblowers' claims. After Hedgecoth's interview, Noah's Ark changed its website to specifically say that it does not take in foster children through the state of Georgia. Oregon Governor Orders Independent Review Of State's Foster Care Oversight By Chris Lehman - N3 • Nov 16, 2015

Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email Matt Howry Flickr Listen Listening... 0:00 / Oregon Governor Kate Brown wants an independent review of the state's foster care system. It comes after the Willamette Week newspaper reported that the Oregon Department of Human Services ignored warning signs at a prominent foster care provider in Portland. The problems ranged from squalid conditions to poor financial management. Brown removed the leader of the agency this month and appointed Clyde Saiki in his place. Saiki told a panel of Oregon lawmakers Monday that the agency will double down on its efforts. "This commitment is the only way we can hope to provide the best service possible and ensure the safety of our foster children," he said. "We must do better. The children of Oregon deserve no less." Saiki said he supports the governor's call for an independent review. Some lawmakers say they'll introduce legislation next year aimed at increasing transparency at the Department. Kansas Legislators Call For Scrutiny Of Foster Care Contractors By Andy Marso • Nov 18, 2015 Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email Wichita police officer Brian White, left, talks with Ed Klumpp, a lobbyist for several law enforcement organizations, after the two testified at a hearing on the Kansas foster care system. Credit Andy Marso / Heartland Health Monitor The Kansas Department for Children and Families announced major changes to its standards for substantiating child abuse Tuesday. But lawmakers want more reform of a privatized foster care system they say is failing to protect children. DCF Secretary Phyllis Gilmore announced that the agency will begin using a "preponderance of the evidence" as the standard for substantiating a child abuse claim rather than the more stringent "clear and convincing evidence." The change comes after the Wichita Eagle and Topeka Capital-Journal reported on children who were injured or died after multiple reports of abuse. Gilmore noted that Kansas is the only state using the "clear and convincing evidence" standard. The change will make it easier for state investigators to place people suspected of child abuse on a registry that prohibits their employment at child care facilities. The agency also added a category between unsubstantiated and substantiated — "affirmed" — that will describe cases in which abuse or neglect are believed to have happened but not to a level severe enough to bring a substantiated finding. Prosecutors seeking to bring criminal abuse charges still will have to prove guilt beyond a "reasonable doubt," and only judges can remove the custody rights of children's legal guardians. The changes were announced during a hearing of a special legislative committee formed to vet the state's foster care system. The Capital-Journal's reporting focused on Mekhi Boone, a 4-year-old Hiawatha boy who was beaten to death after DCF and one of the state's foster care contractors placed him with his father. Kaddillak Poe-Jones, a Wichita infant who died in a hot car after the foster parents she was placed with forgot her, also was mentioned in Tuesday's hearing. Privatized system questioned After Gilmore's announcement, legislators suggested the foster care system still needs a deeper look. Democrats pushed for an audit of the system in July, but it narrowly failed when five Republicans voted it down. At Tuesday's hearing, though, the majority party members expressed serious concerns as well. "The kind of system we've created isn't working," said Sen. Julia Lynn, a Republican from Olathe. The foster care system has been privatized since 1997, and DCF now works with two contractors, KVC Behavioral Healthcare of Olathe and St. Francis Community Services of Salina. A subcontractor, Topeka-based TFI, handled Kaddillak's case, and DCF briefly halted new foster care placements with that agency after her death last year. In recent years the state has consistently set records for the number of Kansas children in foster care, topping 6,000 last year. Rep. Willie Dove, a Republican from Bonner Springs, expressed concerns that the numbers continue to burgeon under the privatized system. Lynn said she requested information from staff about the cost to dismantle the system and have the state take over again but was told it was difficult to calculate because the Legislature never fully funded it prior to privatization. The state currently pays the contractors about $280 million annually. Lynn said the current contracts should be heavily scrutinized before they expire in 2017. Whether DCF stays with the current companies or enlists others, she said the next contracts should require more accountability. "We need to have in place measurables for our contractors," Lynn said. State agency also scrutinized DCF also faced scrutiny from legislators and law enforcement officials as the state agency that oversees the contractors. Rep. Erin Davis, a Republican from Olathe, expressed concerns that the state was not doing enough to track the school attendance of foster children. Ed Klumpp, a lobbyist who represents several law enforcement groups, said local police and county sheriffs get little help from DCF on calls involving foster children — especially after hours. A phone line that is supposed to be staffed 24 hours a day is frequently not answered late at night, he said, and even when it is, the help that can be provided outside the Topeka area is minimal. "When you go into a law enforcement conference and mention the DCF hotline, eyes roll," Klumpp said. "We've got to fix it." He said more foster parents need to be trained in de-escalation and conflict resolution techniques, so police are called in less frequently. Gilmore said her agency is short on trained social workers. "We continue to have issues of both recruitment and retention," Gilmore said. Lynn said blame should extend to the legislative branch as well, telling the committee that the Legislature had "lost a collective will" to protect the "weakest of the weak" in the state. Her comments were echoed by Rep. Mike Kiegerl, another Olathe Republican, who submitted written remarks. Kiegerl criticized legislative leaders for granting the special foster care committee only one day of hearings, after its members requested five days. "Children are not a legislative priority," Kiegerl said, "and this committee faces an impossible task to find solutions to intractable, long-term problems which finally culminated in the horrendous death of two children." State agency shuts down another Hutto group home By David Barger Published: November 17, 2015, 5:44 pm Updated: November 17, 2015, 5:57 pm Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) 86Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) 86Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) Related Coverage State shuts down Hutto group home State investigation: Hutto group home had numerous violations HUTTO, Texas (KXAN) — A state agency has moved to decertify and terminate its contract with the operator of a Hutto group home, after it found multiple "serious" concerns, a spokesperson said. According to Texas Department of Aging and Disability Services records, the agency received multiple complaints about Assurance Care Inc.'s home at 202 Peaceful Haven Way. The series of complaints received by DADS since July alleged problems with nursing practices, quality of care, the living environment and patients' rights. The review of Assurance Care's contract is ongoing, said agency spokesperson Cecilia Cavuto.

Larry Eweka, CEO of Assurance Care, said he disputes the concerns noted by DADS. He has appealed the agency's decision to terminate the company's Home and Community-Based Services (HCS) contract. "The allegations, that is not true," Eweka said. HCS locations are typically homes in residential neighborhoods in which services for people with intellectual or developmental disabilities are provided. The homes can house one or more people, or they can be an individual's own home. The companies operating the homes receive payment through the state, which can range from an average of about $2,500 to more than $5,000, depending on the type of home and services provided, according to DADS. DADS listed the following issues as "concerns" at the Peaceful Haven home. Unauthorized use of physical restraint Unsafe living environment due to not resolving home maintenance issues (no hot water, missing lights) Falsely documenting medication administration records No RN monitoring use of medications Unlicensed, untrained staff use of psychotropic drugs without calling RN for approval Eweka disputed the concerns noted by DADS and said he did not receive reports of those problems. Assurance Care took over the Peaceful Haven Way location from a different provider a few months ago, Eweka said. According to records provided by DADS, the previous operator of the home was Michael Smith, former CEO of A Step Beyond. DADS shut down his company in June. Smith is also a Hutto City Council member and the city's mayor pro tem. As Eweka's appeal is pending, DADS has stopped payment for all clients at all locations under the HCS contract. Assurance Care's HCS contract includes 18 other Central Texas locations, according to DADS records. Cavuto said, if necessary, local authorities would continue to offer choices of service for clients under Assurance Care's HCS contract, so they would not be without services. KXAN first learned about issues at the location from a concerned neighbor of the Peaceful Haven home. Johnny Rushing told KXAN he has seen clients living at the Peaceful Haven location digging in the garbage outside, and he saw one patient bang his head against a window until it broke. Rushing said his children "used to play outside all the time ... now they are scared." He said he had called adult protective services and DADS about problems at the home. Cavuto said that anyone with knowledge of problems at a group home should contact both DADS and Department of Family and Protective Services. DADS, she said, has the capacity to investigate contractual obligations of service providers. DFPS, which is under Texas Adult Protective Services, has the authority to investigate abuse, neglect and exploitation allegations. --> Easter Seals cited for not reporting sex assault at Wilson group home Posted 6:53 p.m. Tuesday Updated 7:10 p.m. Tuesday image: http://wwwcache.wral.com/asset/news/local/wral_investigates/2015/11/17/15116398/215407-sloane530-640x360.jpg <http://wwwcache.wral.com/presentation/v3/styles/vendor/leaflet/images/marker-icon.png> Find News Near Me Wilson, N.C. — Easter Seals UCP has been cited by state regulators after managers of a group home it operates in Wilson didn't promptly report that a resident of the home sexually assaulted another resident. The group home on Tilghman Road houses up to six men with intellectual or developmental disabilities. On July 30, a staff member suspected a 49-year-old resident of assaulting a 66-year-old man. According to a report by the state Division of Health Service Regulation, the crime was never reported to police even though the suspected assailant confessed to raping the resident repeatedly. The man told staffers when questioned that the other man "did not want to have sex" and that he "tried to fight him off and make noises." The staffer who first discovered the abuse tried repeatedly to get help, but a supervisor told her she couldn't do anything until she spoke with a regional manager and that the man didn't have any money to pay for a doctor's visit. Two days later, when the staffer said scratches were still visible on the man's back from an assault, the supervisor allowed her to take the man to an urgent care clinic, where he was turned away because it wasn't equipped to handle a rape case and because the man couldn't pay, according to the report. The staffer then took him to a hospital emergency room, where police were called. Wilson police turned their findings over to local prosecutors who, according to police, decided not to file charges because of the suspect's "mental impairment." "(District attorneys) sometimes look at the criminal justice system and realize that the criminal justice system is ill-equipped to deal with anyone with significant disabilities or limitations," said Vicki Smith, director of Disability Rights North Carolina. Smith added that locking up an intellectually disabled person isn't necessarily the answer, especially if the person doesn't realize he or she committed a crime. "Did he have the capacity to understand consent and exploitation and power?" she asked. Smith cast a harsher eye at Easter Seals. "What did the staff do? How long did this go on, and what were there response?" she asked. Easter Seals Regional Director Jean Kenefick acknowledged that "an incident" occurred at the Wilson group home that was investigated but resulted in no criminal charges, but she added state and federal confidentiality laws prohibit her from elaborating. "Easter Seals UCP's first priority is the safety and care of the people we support, and we report and respond to all allegations as required by law," Kenefick said in an email to WRAL News. "Whenever an incident like this occurs, our staff carefully follow our policies and procedures designed to protect the well-being and privacy of those individuals. Our policies and procedures align with State and Federal guidelines." The suspected assailant has been moved out of the group home, and the staffer who first reported the abuse has been fired, according to the state report. Department of Labor orders foster care firm to pay $218,000 in back wages and fines Paul Giblin, The Republic | azcentral.com 7:47 p.m. MST November 18, 2015 Breaking news.(Photo: The Republic | azcentral.com) Story Highlights Family Support Resources to pay $218,000 in back pay and fines for overtime violations Phoenix-based firm shorted 98 employees at 24 facilities, the Department of Labor says The U.S. Department of Labor ordered a Phoenix foster-care housing provider on Wednesday to pay more than $218,000 in back wages, interest and fines for unpaid overtime owed to workers. Federal investigators found that Family Support Resources Inc. shorted pay to 98 workers at 24 foster-care housing facilities across metropolitan Phoenix. Family Support, based at 8037 N. 43rd Ave., provides short-term and long-term residential housing for at-risk youth. The company receives funding from the state's Department of Child Safety. Officials determined company executives wrongly classified house managers and assistant house managers, who worked primarily as caregivers, as exempt from overtime pay. As a result, Family Support did not pay the workers overtime for working more than 40 hours a week. The practice violated the Fair Labor Standards Act, according to the Labor Department. Under the terms of a consent judgment filed with the U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona, Family Support and owners Larry and Alta Douglas of Glendale, agreed to pay workers $186,222 in unpaid minimum wage and overtime back wages, and $1,946 in interest. The employer also will pay $30,184 in civil penalties, bringing the total in wages, interest and fines to $218,352. Some employees will receive more than $5,000 in back pay, said Jesus Olivares, spokesman for the Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division in Phoenix, which investigated the case. The investigation covered the period from January 2012 to January 2014, he said. Larry Douglas died Nov. 10. He was 72. His wife, Alta, was not available for comment Wednesday. Family Support provides services to address a range of needs, including substance abuse, interpersonal skills, human sexuality matters, vocational skills, behavior management and more. "It is critically important for employers to properly classify their workers," said Eric Murray, director of the Wage and Hour Division's district office in Phoenix. "Shorting workers their hard-earned wages not only harms the workers and their families, but also harms other employers who are playing by the rules," he said in a statement. "We will remain vigilant in our enforcement of a fair day's pay for a fair day's work." The investigation showed that Family Support employees often worked 45 to 50 hours a week, but only were paid for 40 hours, Olivares said. "That, unfortunately, was not the proper way to pay these employees," he said. In general, most wage investigations are prompted by complaints from employees or competitive business executives, but Olivares declined to specify what led officials to investigate Family Support. The residential-care industry has been a priority for wage enforcement the past two or three years, and officials hope the case will serve as an example for others in the sector, he said. "Many of these employees work long hours taking care of children, the elderly, the ill, disabled loved ones, but unfortunately, many times they are not getting paid the full wage that is required by federal law for the hours that they work," Olivares said. Simply paying an employee a salary does not necessarily mean the employee is ineligible for overtime, according to the agency. To qualify for an exemption, employees generally must meet certain tests regarding their job duties and be paid on a salary basis at not less than $455 per week. Job titles do not determine exempt status, according to the agency. Federal law requires nonexempt employees be paid at least the federal minimum wage of $7.25 per hour, as well as time and one-half their regular rates for every hour they work beyond 40 per week. The law also requires employers to maintain accurate records of employees' wages, hours and other conditions of employment, and prohibits employers from retaliating against employees for reporting violations, according to the agency. At Family Support, both house managers and assistant house managers supervise, evaluate and monitor the work of other staff members and clients, according to the company's website. FOR MORE INFORMATION The U.S. Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division offers assistance to employers to understand and comply with federal labor laws and to ensure that workers receive all wages they have earned. "The information they give us, it will be kept confidential, so there is no reason for employers or employees to ever doubt calling us," agency spokesman Jesus Olivares said. State lawmakers told of problems in foster care By John Lyon Arkansas News Bureau john@arkansasnews.com LITTLE ROCK — Caseworkers in Arkansas' foster care system are overworked to the point that they quickly burn out, an area director for the Department of Human Services' Division of Children and Family Services told a legislative panel Wednesday. "We're putting them in an impossible situation," Lisa Jensen of Fort Smith said during a joint meeting of the Senate Children and Youth Committee and the House Aging, Children and Youth and Legislative and Military Affairs Committee. Jensen is DCFS director for an area that includes Sebastian, Crawford, Franklin, Logan, Johnson, Scott and Yell Counties. She said more 900 children are in the foster care system in those counties, nearly 600 of them in Sebastian County alone. "Any day we have 20 to 40 kids that we're looking for placement for. We have to overload foster homes in order to have beds for our children so they don't sleep in the offices at night," she said. About one-third of the children can be placed within the seven-county area, but about two-thirds typically have to be placed in other areas across the state, Jensen said. The amount of travel involved in placing children in homes means that Jensen's caseworkers are working 60-hour weeks and sometimes not getting home until midnight or the early morning hours, she said. "They're burned out because of the hours that they work," Jensen said. She told the panel the burnouts lead to high turnover, which creates more problems. "We have such a high turnover rate that the families get reassigned," Jensen said. "They get reassigned to another worker who already has 30 cases on their workload. So then they get five or 10 more because somebody left, and now they have to try to learn the whole history of that case. Every time you change a caseworker, you start over." She said it would "help tremendously" if foster homes were more plentiful, but finding homes to take children is a challenge. One difficulty is a shortage of daycare, which she said has resulted in losing some foster homes in her area. "Sometimes it's just that we're over so over-burdened we can't meet their needs," she said. "We're not able to really support them as well as we could if we had more reasonable workloads." Cassandra Scott, DCFS director for an area that includes Arkansas, Ashley, Desha, Chicot, St. Francis, Lee, Phillips, Monroe and Drew counties, told the panel of similar problems in the Delta. She said there are more than 300 children in the foster care system in her area and about 47 foster homes, so workers travel across the state placing children in homes in other areas. Cecile Blucker, state DCFS director, said there are 4,599 children in the foster care system statewide, which is up from 3,200 in July, "so we're watching that number grow." DCFS conducts between 3,000 and 3,200 child welfare investigations monthly, she said. Turnover at the division is so high that 50 percent of caseworkers were hired within the past year, Blucker said. "When you look at the complexities of the child welfare cases coupled with the inexperience of new workers, that creates some challenges," she said. A report on Arkansas' child welfare system released in July found that between January and April, 22 children spent the night in a DCFS office because of limited placement options. The report contained a number of recommendations, including adding caseworkers and supervisors. Gov. Asa Hutchinson has said he will seek legislative approval to add about 200 positions over a three-year period. Phoenix House Academy is now closed for good Adult substance abuse residential treatment program to continue in-state, while teens served outside of New Hampshire By Benji Rosen Monadnock Ledger-Transcript Wednesday, November 18, 2015 (Published in print: Thursday, November 19, 2015) Share on email Email Print 0 Comments Share on twitter Share on facebook Share on gmail More Sharing Services 2 The last teen to complete Phoenix House Academy has been released and the residential treatment facility is preparing to accept 18- to 25-year-olds currently on a waiting list, according to Jayson Pratt, clinical director for the New England region. Phoenix House Academy, a three-to six-month residential treatment program for teens aged 13 to 18, officially closed on Monday. It was the last substance abuse residential treatment center for adolescents in New Hampshire. The Academy was located on the same campus as Phoenix House's adult program. The Phoenix House New England relocated the 12 beds in the program to its facility in Rhode Island, said Pratt. Starting next week, the beds on the campus in Dublin will become available for 18- to 25-year-olds, expanding the capacity of the residential program for this demographic from 32 to 44, he said. The waitlist for 18- to 25-year-olds was at nine Monday and has been as high as 20 in late October. The teenage program, in comparison, had nine beds unfilled in October when the Ledger-Transcript first reported the Academy would close. John "Jack" Wozmak, the state's drug czar, and other substance abuse prevention professionals have said close the Academy is the "right move," and that it's better to provide treatment to 18- to 25-year-olds than it is to leave beds empty. Wozmak is the senior director for substance misuse and behavioral health for the governor's office, and is overseeing the governor's efforts to fight substance abuse. To compensate for the closing of the Academy, the Phoenix House and Pratt are working hand-in-hand with Wozmak to open four intensive, outpatient treatment programs for adolescents in regions most affected by substance abuse. Pratt said Tuesday he envisions these outpatient programs opening in Keene, Manchester and two other locations in the southern and northern parts of New Hampshire. Wozmak said the most current research suggests structured, intensive outpatient programs are more beneficial than 30-day residential programs, and emphasized the importance of enrolling an adolescent in a treatment program period. If an adolescent requires residential treatment, they can receive it in a nearby state. The decision to relocate the program to a Phoenix House facility on Wallum Lake in Rhode Island was based, in part, on a dwindling number of referrals from the state. While Division of Children, Youth and Families was able to provide referrals for up to 6 of the 12 beds at the Phoenix House for adolescents, DCYF chose instead to refer teenagers to residential treatment centers for behavior health that treat comorbid, or co-occurring, disorders, said Eileen Mullen, the administrator at DCYF. Another reason for the relocation is financial — the Phoenix House was losing money on Medicaid patients. Although the Academy was the last center in the state designated solely for substance abuse, there are 24 state-certified residential treatment centers for behavioral health for youth that offer substance abuse programs, said Mullen. The facility on Wallum Lake had 11 teenage boys enrolled in the program Wednesday, none of whom are from New Hampshire, said Pratt. The program has 20 beds exclusively for boys, with plans to expand to 40 and potentially become co-ed, said Pratt. The Phoenix House New England operates treatment facilities in New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Massachusetts. In New Hampshire, the organization oversees the Phoenix House in Dublin, an outpatient treatment center in Keene and a sober living home in Northfield. Tuckahoe group home worker lied about woman's injury Michael D'Onofrio, medonofrio@lohud.com 5:57 p.m. EST November 19, 2015 Kimm Thompson (Photo: Submitted) 1 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A state worker has been convicted of a fraud charge in connection with the abuse of a disabled woman at a Tuckahoe group home, officials said. Kimm Thompson, 50, was accused — with two other employees — of injuring the developmentally disabled woman at a group home at 1A Ridge St. on Oct. 9, 2014. The three women were accused of slamming the disabled woman's foot in a van door, then lying to cover it up. The group home is operated by the state Office for People with Developmental Disabilities. Thompson, of Albany, was found guilty by a Westchester County Court jury Thursday of offering a false instrument for filing, a misdemeanor, for lying in her reports about the woman's injuries, according to the Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs, another state agency. Monsurat Dindi (Photo: Submitted) She was acquitted of a felony count of endangering the welfare of a vulnerable person. The jury failed to reach a verdict and a mistrial was declared on a second endangering count. No new trial date on that charge has not been set. Thompson was fired after the incident. She is scheduled to be sentenced on the false-instrument charge Feb. 16 and faces up to a year in jail. The two other women charged in the incident were Monsurat Dindi and Maxine Smith, both of the Bronx. How Prison Reform Could Turn the Prison-Industrial Complex Into the Treatment-Industrial Complex The private prison industry is exploiting prison reform efforts by shifting from brick-and-mortar carceral facilities to outsourced social services. By Michelle Chen Twitter Today 11:42 am Facebook Twitter Email Print A California parolee wears a GPS tracking device on his ankle as he speaks to his parole officer. (AP Photo / Rich Pedroncelli) With one in 45 adults on probation or parole and one in 100 behind bars, America looks like a nation of captives. From a business perspective, though, it's a captive market. Ad Policy Yet prison reform is gaining political currency. Both Republican and Democratic federal and state lawmakers have sought to soften sentencing policies and reduce the overall use of incarceration in criminal policy, and to facilitate “second chances” for the formerly incarcerated as they transition into work and family life. Yet, while politicians ostensibly seek more humane alternatives to incarceration, those being released will never quite leave prison behind. Not just because individuals will bear criminal records, but because the entire prison industry has already captured their communities on the outside. Reform initiatives like rehabilitation and employment programs focus on making “corrections” less punitive. But they maintain the political framework of “redeeming” bad people, rather than dismantling antisocial systems. According to investigative research by American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), the private prison industry is exploiting prison reform efforts by shifting from brick-and-mortar carceral facilities to outsourced social services. In other words, many of the dollars expected to be “saved” from shuttering prisons may simply be funneled into privatized “alternatives to incarceration” like parole programs and halfway houses. These operations are often run by the household names of the prison business—they’re simply moving from behind bars to the so-called “treatment-industrial complex.” According to AFSC’s research, the corporatization of prison reform is an outgrowth of a long-standing trend of prison privatization—corrections authorities contracting to outsource services such as food or long-distance calls home. Efforts to “decarcerate” may reduce some business for private prison companies. But carceral institutions and technology are being rebranded for the outside world and profits from these sectors appear to be on the upswing: There is growth potential in halfway houses and treatment centers—perhaps minimally regulated and financed on a per diem basis. In the pre-trial stage, there’s demand for private probation (used in poor communities to coerce people owing fees and fines for petty infractions) and ankle-bracelet monitors (shackled to thousands of detained migrants who’ve been released on bond). Most Popular 1 What I Discovered From Interviewing Imprisoned ISIS Fighters 2 The Big Idea That Could Bring Disaffected Voters Back to the Polls 3 ISIS Wants You to Hate Muslims 4 There Is Only One Way to Destroy ISIS 5 The Crazier the Republican Candidates Sound, the More Popular They Become But contrary to the rhetoric of privateers, private prison is a dirty business. Prison giants like Corrections Corporation of America are notorious for cost overruns, inadequate staff training, and abusive conditions. Meanwhile, the underlying structural injustice lies in the basic business model of profiting from oppression. The AFSC argues, “The profit motive is inherently at odds with the stated purpose of ‘corrections’” because contractors “are financially dependent on the growth of supervised populations, providing a perverse incentive not to rehabilitate.” While prison alternatives are billed as “cost-efficient” compared to conventional incarceration, particularly by conservatives, Dalit Baum, director of AFSC’s Economic Activism Program, warns that “the talk about reducing costs is what got us into problem to begin with, which is privatization.” But, she adds, the unforeseen collateral damage—recidivism, abuse, and economic losses for communities—should serve as an object lesson that a system can’t be relied on to remedy the social ills that prison produces. GET THE LATEST NEWS AND ANALYSIS DELIVERED TO YOUR INBOX EACH MORNING SIGN UP! Ethical questions may also surround prison-related rehabilitation services. For example, many convicted on drug charges undergo mandatory regimented therapy. While treatment is favorable to strict incarceration, radical anti-prison activists say such programs, sometimes steeped in rhetoric of “personal responsibility” and self-discipline, tend to promote conformity and undermine the potential for solidaristic activism. Could imposing corporate-controlled rehab ultimately discourage the treatment population from developing an organic political consciousness? Should rehabilitation be rooted in communities, or managed by a company that prioritizes obedience over social action? Democratic governance is also eroded by the prison service industry’s invasion of the public sector, AFSC argues. If the justice system is to operate in the public interest, Baum says, “we do believe that it is the state’s authority and very, very grave responsibility to deal with the justice system, that it should not be given to the hands of profiteers.” Another area where the prison-linked industries will continue to profit is more indirect—the unique role of large corporations as a liaison between the mainstream economy and the political economy of prisons; they monopolize business within and outside the prison gates. Consider the multinational 3M, maker of Post-Its and surveillance technology. An incarcerated person may be surveilled at his facility constantly by taxpayer-funded 3M tracking devices. He might manufacture license plates in prison factories, which are supplied by 3M’s reflective coatings. Post-release, if he manages to pass the background check, he might land a job at a 3M warehouse, joining a workforce infamous for its links to the prison-industrial complex as well as labor and environmental violations in the mainstream economy. And both in and out of prison, the company extracts profits from commercialized social control. On principle, reducing incarceration is necessary and just. But some activists fear private-sector solutions might pervert prison reform into a neoliberal variation of convict leasing, in which industry and state collude to “redeem” society’s undesirables. If the price of “reentry” is a softer state of unfreedom, the formerly imprisoned remain bonded to a hegemony of state and corporate control. And as consumers and workers, they’re still locked into “free-market” economy that perpetuates capitalizing on repression. “Living in capitalism as we do, we often do feel like there’s very little for us to do against big corporations and big systems of control like this,” Baum says. But now that there is political momentum for a policy overhaul, “our responsibility as activists is to use this moment of opportunity in order to propose some real alternatives.” Rejecting corporate solutions, grassroots groups can work toward long-term community-led decarceration by fostering social inclusion. Community groups can champion post-release voting and employment rights or develop restorative justice programs that elevate reconciliation over harsh punishment to reduce recidivism. Although Big Business wants to capture public reinvestments in prison “alternatives,” communities recover the real social cost of mass incarceration by reclaiming the whole criminal-justice system so its policies serve the public good, not private gain. Now the defendant, Med-Van Transport driver Scott Weimer, 26, of Altoona, will stand trial in the case. And it is not just the world of a troubled teen against the driver. WPXI reports that a police officer in Allegheny County saw the vehicle pulled over on a road around 4:30 a.m. and witnessed Weimer and the victim putting on clothing. All this, as the medical driver was taking the girl from Johnstown Hospital to Southwood Psychiatric Hospital in Upper St. Clair on a voluntary mental health commitment earlier this month, WPXI writes, adding: According to investigators, Weimer asked police if “he would be in trouble if he had sex with her in the van.” Meanwhile, the girl was described by police as being “lethargic” and “unable to care for herself” at the time. After waiving his preliminary hearing Thursday, Weimer will face charges including statutory sexual assault at trial, WPXI reports. Sent to US for Drug Rehab, Puerto Ricans Endure Humiliation at Unregulated Centers Wednesday, 25 November 2015 00:00 By Adriana Cardona-Maguigad, Truthout | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 41 Email Melissa Hernandez says she has been able to find at least 100 men and women who were sent from Puerto Rico to unregulated rehab homes. She has been able to connect some of them with certified drug addiction services in Chicago. (Photo: Bill Healy) Do you want media that's accountable to YOU, not to corporate sponsors? He grabs a stock of paper towels that hang from a dispenser below the windshield wipers near the gas pumps. He walks unsteadily: Every time he takes a step, he winces while placing his hands on his stomach. I ask him if he is OK, but he shakes his head “no.” As he tells me his health condition is deteriorating, he lifts his shirt to show me the scars associated with what he thinks is a bacterial infection. Erick knows who I am. I often see him panhandling at another nearby corner. [I interviewed him soon after I released an investigation last April that aired on WBEZ Chicago Public Radio and NPR's "This American Life," exposing a practice in which drug users from Puerto Rico were sent by Puerto Rican authorities to unregulated rehab centers in Chicago and other cities across the United States. Under a program called De Vuelta a la Vida run by the Puerto Rican state police and other programs run by municipal agencies in Puerto Rico, hundreds of Puerto Ricans have come to Chicago expecting to enter comprehensive, high-quality rehab centers with excellent doctors, nurses and even swimming pools. Instead they end up in unregulated, crowded homes. The places are known as “24-hour groups” - rehab homes where people struggling with addiction find themselves sharing overcrowded rooms, sleeping on dirty mattresses or on the floor, and facing routine humiliation as part of a protocol supposedly intended to keep them on the path to sobriety. People taken to these homes are required to stay there for up to 90 days and are subjected to a “tough love” approach that includes intense group therapy sessions, verbal abuse and insults from peers and “padrinos” (godparents) - the leaders of the groups. Feeling deceived by the false promises, many like Erick have left these “rehab” to venture out on the streets of an unfamiliar city. The night I saw Erick, the temperatures were dropping and a windy rainstorm was on its way. I asked whether he would rather be back in one of those rehab centers instead of being in the cold. But he quickly said no. “The way they treat you there might help others, but it doesn't help me,” he said slowly heading back to the corner where he had been panhandling all day. Many former drug users defend the 24-hour rehab groups, arguing that the hardcore therapy, name-calling and long group sessions serve as eye-openers that in turn help them realize the damage they have caused themselves and their loved ones. But for others like Erick, the tough treatment is too much to bear, especially since many of them already have been victims of abuse, have mental health issues and have experienced trauma caused by their own addictions. And there is no denying the broken promises: People are being led to the United States for sorely needed comprehensive treatment - and presented with neglect and abuse. Connecting Drug Users to Adequate Services Melissa Hernandez volunteers her time during the week to deliver infection control supplies, food and clothes to drug users who came all the way from Puerto Rico looking for drug rehab treatment and are now living on the streets of Chicago. (Photo: Bill Healy) The stories of the Puerto Rican drug users who are still wandering the streets of predominantly Latino neighborhoods across Chicago have angered elected officials, service providers and even residents who want to establish a network of services to help this new population. One of them is Melissa Hernandez, a mother of two, dental assistant and former IV drug user who said she has been outraged ever since she first heard the story. Since May, Hernandez has been walking through Chicago neighborhoods such as Back of the Yards, Little Village and Humboldt Park, looking for drug users that were sent from Puerto Rico to the 24-hour rehab homes, aiming to assist them in finding real support. Drug users from Puerto Rico come to Chicago thinking they will get quality care, but instead end up in rehab homes with no medical professionals in sight. I met her at a Dunkin' Donuts a few months later near Humboldt Park, a largely Puerto Rican neighborhood on the city's west side. She was on the phone talking about a person who needed drug addiction services. She had a heavy pile of papers tucked inside a folder crammed with notes, telephone numbers written all over the cover. She was speaking firmly, making sure the person on the other line would respond to her request to find immediate drug rehab services for the drug user she was trying to help. Hernandez's family is from Puerto Rico, too. Although she grew up in Chicago, her Spanish has a slight Puerto Rican accent. Her warm personality makes her well-suited for the job she has set out to do: She is working to kick-start a program called the Puerto Rico Project, geared toward supporting drug users who've been sent from Puerto Rico to unregulated drug rehab homes - many of whom are now homeless. On Monday and Friday nights, she visits the places where she knows she will find her clients and delivers food, infection control materials and clothes. During the day, while her kids are in school and before her work shift begins, her outreach continues. Once she finds the men and women she is looking for, she completes an intake form, gets their full stories and connects them to services. She begins by asking how they came to hear about the program, while in Puerto Rico. "I ask them, who they talked to ... who picked them up, how long did they wait, what group they went to, what was their experience in the group, what happened to them," she said. So far she has identified about 100 men and women from Puerto Rico who are wandering the streets of Chicago while battling an addiction. But even as she tries to build a network of services for drug users, securing full access to those services has been challenging, Hernandez said. Some of the men and women she serves, she said, are stuck in the cycle of their addiction - and even when she shows up willing to take action and connect them to services, it's not always that easy. "Some guys have even said to me, 'Melissa, I am gonna be really honest with you, I am really, really sick. I am gonna try to get some money, I am gonna panhandle and once I am feeling better, I'll call you,'" she said. Being a former drug user herself, Hernandez understands how hard it is to break the cycle of addiction and endure the physical and emotional symptoms associated with quitting. She understands that people often waver over whether they want to commit to recovery. "I guess a major challenge is just going back and forth and staying on top of it, telling them that there is help and professional services," Hernandez said. Some people Hernandez meets have clearly been traumatized by their experiences at the 24-hour rehab groups. She showed me pictures of two men, one who had his eyebrows shaved and another one who had his head shaved. Both incidents happened as a form of punishment for relapsing in two different 24-hour rehab groups, Hernandez said. And there are other sad stories. "We actually had one young kid who ended up in the UIC [University of Illinois at Chicago] psych ward," she said. "He was here since August and he was led to one of these groups. He ended up leaving - they took his government documents and I guess when he ended up leaving, he couldn't find a job, he couldn't get an ID, he had nothing. He tried to kill himself, didn't know what to do. It's sad but it's a story I hear all the time." The many stories that Hernandez and I have heard are all too similar. Drug users from Puerto Rico come to Chicago thinking they will get quality care but instead end up in rehab homes with no medical professionals in sight. Many times their IDs and important documents are stolen or lost there, and once they walk out of the groups they find themselves in the streets, alone, many times in the middle of winter, without identification or prospects for work or housing, and with a strong addiction to feed. Take Manuel, a man I got to know during my initial investigation. When I met him he was panhandling in the corner of a predominantly immigrant neighborhood just two weeks after he arrived. The 24-hour rehab home he was sent to is called Segunda Vida (Second Life), and it's a dilapidated gray brick building on the South Side of Chicago. Manuel, like the other residents, had to sit through long hours of group therapy, endure insults and stomach the so-called "tough love" approach. However, after three days, he'd had enough: He walked out, alone and without his documents. Manuel was finally able to get his birth certificate, Puerto Rican ID and medical records back after I accompanied him to Segunda Vida with an audio recorder in hand and refused to leave without the papers. Manuel was sent to Chicago by the Puerto Rican police. He was suffering from a severe health condition, and he needed medicine and constant medical attention. Manuel also has serious mental health problems that have been getting worse since he arrived in Chicago. He has been arrested multiple times and complains that he is often harassed by local police who know about his addiction and don't want to see him panhandling in high-trafficked streets. Other Puerto Rican drug users in the area have similar complaints about the police. "I have been hospitalized six times due to my health issues, I have been in the psychiatric hospital three times, I have been dealing with depression," Manuel said. When he is not in jail, he lives in an empty house with six other Puerto Ricans who came to similar rehab groups and are now on the streets. "And believe me, I am afraid of the winter," he said. "There comes that white monster again." Last time I saw Manuel, he had been rushed from a halfway house where he was under house arrest with an electronic ankle monitor to an emergency room due to complications with his liver. He also spent several days under psychiatric care because he threatened to kill himself multiple times. "When I am done here, I don't want to go back to the streets, I don't want to experience what I went through last year," he told me. Looking to Puerto Rico for Answers Melissa Hernandez is kick-starting a campaign (or organization) to help Puerto Ricans who came to Chicago looking for drug rehabilitation treatment, but instead found themselves in unregulated 24-hour groups run by former addicts. (Photo: Bill Healy) Hernandez has been working closely with Illinois State Sen. William Delgado (D-2), one of the elected officials who has vowed to investigate the unregulated rehab homes and work with authorities in Puerto Rico to establish an adequate referral system for those seeking rehab services in the future. With Delgado's support, Hernandez has connected with other service providers and participated in meetings and strategy sessions to figure out how to serve the people who have been funneled into these group homes by government officials, service agencies or family members. Hernandez said she is collaborating with at least six licensed rehab agencies in Chicago, including Rincon Family Services, Haymarket, Lake Shore Hospital, New Vision and Health Care Alternative Systems. Those agencies are working with her to identify and assist drug users from Puerto Rico in need of help. "We have been fortunate to save many of these folks with our own services, despite our own deficit," Delgado said. Aside from connecting drug users to services, Delgado said he's been trying to communicate with Puerto Rican government officials, but so far it has not been an easy task. One of his main goals has been reaching out to the municipalities that he knows were involved in sending people struggling with addiction off the island. One city that has particularly caught his attention is Bayamon and its program called Nuevo Amanecer. Delgado said the mayor of Bayamon, Ramón Luis Rivera Cruz, and the director of Nuevo Amanecer, Gladys Cintron, have ignored his many requests to discuss the impact of sending drug users to unregulated rehab homes in Chicago. Many of the people who were sent to Chicago say Cintron connected them to the rehab homes; sometimes, the municipality of Bayamon pays for a one-way plane ticket to Chicago. I have made several attempts to speak with Cintron and the municipality of Bayamon about the referral strategies that are being implemented by Nuevo Amanecer. On April 24, after repeated requests, I received an email from the municipality of Bayamon stating, "The program Nuevo Amanecer only uses homes that have been certified and legally established in Puerto Rico and in the United States." The statement said that once the patients are placed in a program, they are monitored either through social networks, via telephone and or visits to the center. But some of the drug users that Hernandez or I have interviewed say Gladys Cintron sent them to the unregulated 24-hour rehab homes. Erick is one of them. Hernandez said she met with Cintron during her short visit to Chicago last October. Cintron wanted to find the drug users whom she had referred under Nuevo Amanecer and are now on the streets. She wanted to offer them a ticket back to Puerto Rico, Hernandez said. According to Cintron's Facebook page, she visited several 24-hour groups. She posted a note on Facebook saying that she toured several streets in Chicago looking for her "children," as she calls the drug users in the program. In her post, Cintron wrote that she was happy to learn that none of her "children" were living on the streets, and posted pictures of her with other men outside of some 24-hour group homes. I called her to ask about the visit, but she declined to comment, adding that she had already met with Hernandez to discuss her motives. According to the April statement from Bayamon, the municipality has sent 40 people to Chicago. In the last decade, the Puerto Rican police De Vuelta a la Vida program said it has transported 758 people to the mainland of the US for treatment. Of those, 120 were sent to Chicago. From 2007 to 2013 the municipality of Juncos said it sent 259 drug users to other cities in the US, and 56 of them were referred to Chicago.

The municipality of Caguas said it has only referred 25 people in the last three years. But service providers are skeptical about those numbers. In some parts of Puerto Rico, the practice of sending drug users off the island for treatment has been in place for years, and so far there has been no comprehensive review of those practices by any state agency or municipal organization. Senator Delgado said he has been in communication with the agency that oversees drug addiction programs in Puerto Rico, which is known as ASSMCA (Administración de Servicios de Salud Mental y Contra la Adicción), but no concrete action has yet been taken. He also said he has been in contact with Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart to further investigate what is happening on the Chicago side of the equation. "I am working with County Sheriff Tom Dart to review and to recommend any legal course of action that needs to be taken here in Chicago to assure people are not trapped in uncertified, unsafe conditions and that they have a chance to get real services to live a successful and decent life," Delgado said, adding that he is concerned about possible elements of human trafficking, welfare fraud and ID theft happening as part of the 24-hour group system. Abdon Pallasch, the director of public affairs for the Cook County Jail, didn't provide any specific details about the investigation, but said his agency is trying to identify drug users from Puerto Rico who wound up in jail for retail theft and other related small violations in hopes to fast-track them out of jail and into rehab under a new "rocket docket" law. But there are some challenges when trying to identify and connect these drug users to rehabilitation services, Pallasch said. "Most of the guys aren't there long enough for us to get up and run a tally of the people who have come through the jail and have been part of the deceptive unlicensed clinic scheme, but the infrastructure is there for these guys to get the help they need if they are willing to stick with the program." Pallasch said the jail has identified eight individuals sent from Puerto Rico to Chicago group homes who have been in and out of the Cook County Jail system, costing the jail and taxpayers about $88,000 in a period of two years. Last May, Dart asked the federal government to investigate the issue of the group homes, and filed a fraud report with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) warning that the agency could have possibly been funding De Vuelta a la Vida and Nuevo Amanecer. The 24-Hour Group Homes Persist Unregulated 24-hour group homes have existed in Chicago for decades, subjecting drug users to long hours of required group therapy and, in many cases, to insults, humiliation and mockery. Some of those groups are newer than others and some are part of larger networks - like the International Movement of 24-hours, with locations in Chicago and other cities in the US and also in other countries including Mexico, Colombia, and even Spain. Other groups spring up now and then. In many cases former drug users come together to start their own rehab homes and provide a space where people struggling with addiction can eat, sleep and receive long hours of group therapy for several months. They make their own rules, borrow concepts from Alcoholics Anonymous and many times bring the tactics they've learned in other 24-hour rehab homes. The members in many of these groups take pride in their sobriety and the fact that they have helped other addicts with their addictions without the assistance and guidelines of any government agency. They survive on donations and contributions made by current and former members. Individuals who have lived and received group therapy in these group homes also said that in some cases eligible participants are taken to the Illinois Department of Human Services (IDHS) offices to apply for a LINK (food stamps) card. The card is then used to buy food for the entire group. The persistence of these groups demonstrates the existence of a huge, largely unmet need in Chicago: accessible around-the-clock services where drug users can find shelter, food and a community of peers. Segunda Vida, the group where Manuel and many other drug users have been referred to by the Puerto Rican authorities, was founded by former members of a group called Vida, a 24-hour rehab home located across the street from an elementary school on the South Side of Chicago. In 2006, a man fatally stabbed another man with a kitchen knife at Vida during a group-counseling meeting that was going late into the night, according to a Chicago Tribune article and police records. The same news article said the perpetrator later admitted in a videotaped confession that the man he stabbed was "being overly hard on him" during the group therapy session. Shortly after that, Vida closed its doors. In addition to the stabbing incident, nearby neighbors and school officials complained to local authorities that students were being harassed by the men who lived in the building and often hung out on the corner smoking cigarettes. After Vida closed, some members continued on with Segunda Vida and others moved on to start their own groups or simply joined existing ones. Some of the Puerto Rican drug users whom I have talked to know each other well in and outside of the 24-hour groups. Many have attended the same groups in the South Side and have sat through long hours of testimony and group counseling together. They know each other's lives, their struggles, their addictions and how far they are willing to go to get drugs. The padrinos (godparents) know the lives of many drug users as well. They have been sober longer than the people they work with. They don't have formal training, and their knowledge of how to deal with addiction comes from the streets. While some group participants develop strong and long-lasting relationships with the padrinos, others complain about the padrinos berating, insulting and yelling at them. The persistence of these groups demonstrates the existence of a huge, largely unmet need in Chicago: accessible around-the-clock services where drug users can find shelter, food and a community of peers. The number of people seeking treatment - or simply seeking a place to live, as a drug user far outweighs the available resources, and people are desperate. The "tough love" approach and the long hours of group sessions used at the 24-hour groups have helped some drug users stay sober. They even hold annual events where they celebrate each other's sobriety. But others do a few months of group therapy, leave and relapse again. Recently, at a group called Blanco y Negro (Black and White) on the South Side, a man stood in front of a small crowd to share his testimony. He was wearing jeans and a bright green shirt. He was tall and handsome and had a strong Puerto Rican accent. He talked about how he lost the past 10 years of his life struggling with his heroin addiction. His testimony was full of guilt and disappointment. "I got curious and I finally tried heroin, and I ended up marrying her," he said, also discussing his experiences with homelessness and the pain he caused to his family. He said he regretted the times when he walked away from the 24-hour group, adding that regardless of the rough treatment he experiences there, Blanco y Negro is still the one place he can call home until he finally gets back on his feet. "I was doing good for a while, when I was in the group, but when I left the group whatever I acquired I tossed it in the garbage," he said, adding that God keeps telling him to stay in the group, because that's where he can truly get the spiritual strength that he needs to keep fighting his addiction. My recent investigation focused on two 24-hour rehab groups where many Puerto Ricans were being sent - Segunda Vida and El Grito Desesperado (The Desperate Scream). After being in the spotlight for a few months, Segunda Vida took its small logo down from the grimy second-floor window where it had been displayed. But the group is still up and running. Leaders have denied any mistreatment, ID theft or use of members' LINK cards. Its members said they are just a support group, providing a place where addicts can live and receive group counseling. They also said hundreds of drug users have found sobriety thanks to the group. El Grito Desesperado closed down one of its sites and is now operating in one location along Cermak Road in Chicago. That rehab group also took down its signs. The Illinois Department of Human Services' Division of Alcohol and Substance Abuse said it has inspected several sites. The agency has categorized these 24-hour groups as AA support groups, saying they "are not subject to the oversight and regulations that rehabilitation and treatment facilities are. If there is a criminal allegation, that is subject to the jurisdiction of law enforcement authorities, or in the case of building code or zoning violations, subject to the jurisdiction of the City of Chicago." The statement went on to say that, "a license is required through [the division] in order to operate an addiction treatment facility." In the past, several city departments have said they don't have any jurisdiction over this matter either. In the meantime, some 24-hour rehab groups like Blanco y Negro still advertise themselves as rehabilitation centers that offer psychotherapy and treatment to Spanish-speaking people for neurosis, traumas, bipolar disorders and depression, along with addiction. And although these centers continue to use rough tactics and remain largely unregulated, they are fulfilling a shortage of treatment options available for people struggling with drug addictions. Even though drug users know they may be subject to verbal abuse and humiliation at these centers, some continue to seek them out because the doors of these rehab homes remain open at a time when many more formalized centers are inaccessible. Foster care, abuse -- Laquan McDonald's tragic life Protesters march after shooting video released NEXT STORY Arrest in killing of Tyshawn Lee Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text CNN Photos CNN (CNN) — In death, Laquan McDonald has countless defenders, people who want justice for him. They know him as the teenager in a police dashboard camera video who is seen walking away from a police officer who, in the span of 15 seconds, shoots him 16 times. What to know: Laquan McDonald case Protesters took to the streets of Chicago after police released a graphic dashcam video showing an officer shooting 17-year-old Laquan McDonald. Here is what you need to know about the case. More In death, many see Laquan as another black person killed by a cop. While an attorney for Officer Jason Van Dyke argues that his client was justified, crowds of outraged protesters chant and march. They are demanding that the right thing be done for Laquan, 17. But in life, very few people apparently protected him. Laquan was hurt over and over again by those who were closest to him, according to a timeline of his life that CNN obtained from Veronica Resa, a spokeswoman with the Illinois Department of Children & Family Services. When Laquan was 3, child welfare officials took him from his mother, Tina Hunter. DCFS found evidence to support allegations he had been neglected. Less than two weeks before Christmas in 2000, the state of Illinois was granted temporary custody of Laquan and welfare workers placed him in a foster home. Sometime in 2000, the state's child welfare department conducted an investigation into alleged abuse of Laquan happening in that foster home. The department did not provide CNN with information on the outcome of that probe, but he was removed from that foster placement. On February 19, 2001, Laquan was placed in a relative's home. The department did not say who that person was or how he or she was related to Laquan. The boy remained in that home for barely seven months before the state moved him again on September 17, 2001, to the home of his great-grandmother. On May 8, 2002, Laquan was returned to his mother. Though spokeswoman Resa did not provide a specific reason why the mother regained custody, Resa told CNN, "DCFS's number one goal is to always try to reunite a child with a parent if at all possible." But, giving the child back to his mother resulted in more pain for Laquan. In June 2003, when he was 5 years old, the state determined that his mother's boyfriend was abusing him. Laquan had cuts, welts and bruises. Once again, Laquan was placed in a foster home. On Wednesday, CNN sought a response from Tina Hunter regarding the information that the Department of Children & Family Services provided. Attorney Michael Robbins declined to comment and said that she would not be available for any interviews. A home with his grandmother In July 2003, Laquan was sent once more to his great-grandmother's house. After five years there, she became his legal guardian in January 2008. Maybe 10-year-old Laquan had a good life then. Maybe he was still young enough that he could have started to heal. He stayed with his great-grandmother for five more years. She died in the waning days of summer in 2013. Laquan was 15. In the middle of January of the following year, he was arrested on suspicion of possessing marijuana and detained at a juvenile justice center. Ten days later, Laquan was handed back to state care, and for nearly five months he languished in that center until May 2014, when he was released and moved back in with his uncle. Two months before Officer Van Dyke shot Laquan to death on Chicago's Southwest Side in October 2014, the teen, still a ward of the state, had started attending Sullivan House, an alternative school for students aged 16 to 21, said principal Thomas Gattuso. He described Laquan as outgoing, jovial, talkative and funny. The teenager was considering playing basketball and wanted to get his life on track, Gattuso said. Laquan showed up to school everyday and demonstrated commitment to his classwork. The principal said he wasn't sure whether Laquan ever talked about his home life or his family. 'We have a tragic ending' Between Laquan's death and when the footage of his shooting was released this week, the city of Chicago agreed in April 2015 to pay $5 million to McDonald's mother. Over the summer, freelance journalist Brandon Smith filed a lawsuit pressing the Chicago Police Department to release the dashboard camera video. A judge found in Smith's favor and ordered that the video be released by November 25. Even Chicago Police Superintendent Garry McCarthy acknowledged this week that Laquan had a very difficult life. "We have a tragic ending to -- unfortunately -- a tragic life of a young man, who was betrayed on a number of different levels," said McCarthy. On Tuesday, attorneys representing Laquan's mother and his uncle released a statement. "We [the family of Laquan McDonald] deeply appreciate the outpouring of love and support for Laquan. This is a difficult time for us. As we have said in the past, while we would prefer that the video not be released we understand that a court has ordered otherwise. "We ask for calm in Chicago," the statement continues. "No one understands the anger more than us. But if you choose to speak out, we urge you to be peaceful. Don't resort to violence in Laquan's name. Let his legacy be better than that." Source: <http://www.wdsu.com/national/foster-care-abuse-laquan-mcdonalds-tragic-life/36661426>

Town hall focuses on link between foster care, sex trafficking - Wave Newspapers Town hall focuses on link between foster care, sex trafficking November 25, 2015 Written by: Amanda Anderson, Contributing Writer U.S. Rep. Karen Bass](#) Don Wanlass LOS ANGELES — The sexual exploitation and abuse of children in the child welfare system and what can be done to prevent it was discussed by elected officials and representatives of the National Foster Youth Institute Nov. 21 at a town hall meeting. U.S. Reps. Karen Bass and Janice Hahn, county Supervisor Mark Ridley-Thomas and state Sen. Isadore Hall III took part in leading the conversation. "This is really about all underage girls and boys who are involved in sex trafficking and the majority of them happen to be in foster care," Bass said. "I think this was a critically important event to hear about what's happening in our community to girls as young as 9 years old who are involved and caught up into sex trafficking," she added. "Our basic responsibility is to make sure that every child is safe. However, nearly 60 percent of the children who were arrested on prostitution charges in Los Angeles County spent time in the foster care system. Preventing this link between foster care and sex trafficking is a key part of the conversation." The Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department recently announced that it would no longer use the term "child prostitute," because young girls forced into prostitution are actually the victims of rape. County Supervisor Mark Ridley-Thomas also spoke at the town hall meeting on the exploitation of children in the foster care and child welfare systems. (Photo by Daniel Castillo) "Our children are not for sale," Ridley-Thomas said. "Children are lured and trapped. Once they are in and are committed to the subculture of exploitation, there are deeper levels. It is a moral crisis with true consequences in the lives of these children. "I intend to do everything in my power to address this problem and help these young people leave conditions that absolutely no one should endure," Ridley-Thomas added. It is estimated that in Los Angeles County, 3,000 children are victims of trafficking. The average age for a person to enter that life is between 12 and 13 years old. Sex trafficking also has become a highly lucrative business run by many street gangs. The National Foster Youth Institute, which convened the town hall meeting at the Founder's Church of Religious Science in Koreatown, aims to reform and strengthen the child welfare system and improve outcomes for foster youth. "Real change will happen when we involve the community," said Michelle Guymon, director of child trafficking in the Los Angeles County Probation Department. The Nov. 21 meeting came the day after law enforcement officials and prosecutors met downtown to coordinate efforts aimed at reducing child sex trafficking. "With this summit and the work of our local prosecutors' offices, we want to send a clear message to human traffickers and buyers of child sex that we know they exist and we are after them," Los Angeles County District Attorney Jackie Lacey said. "I hope we also send a clear message to the victims of human trafficking, who are still in bondage, that we care about them and are looking for ways to help free them." Also last week Los Angeles County Sheriff Jim McDonnell announced the formation of a human trafficking task force aimed at providing relief to the hundreds of men and women ensnared by sex traffickers each year. The unit will include personnel from the Sheriff's Department, the FBI, the District Attorney's Office and other agencies and focus on bringing stiffer prosecutions against traffickers and johns who interact with minors, McDonnell said. California is a hot spot for human trafficking. The National Human Trafficking Resource Center's hotline has received more than 2,000 reports of human trafficking cases in California since 2012, the most of any state. The hotline has received 477 reports of trafficking cases in California so far in 2015, more than twice the number reported in Texas, the state from which the hotline received its second highest number of calls. McDonnell said he hopes the task force will allow law enforcement to provide better access to relief resources for trafficking victims. Roughly 85 people from various law enforcement and social service agencies will be assigned to the task force, officials said. Bass was happy with the Nov. 21 town hall. "There are new ways for people to report abuse; there are trainings for people so that they know how to recognize [sex trafficking]," she said. "But the really good news is that we met some leaders in the community and county here who have been making some very significant gains. So now there are programs and places for people to go and there are ways for us to address this." City News Service contributed to this story. Authorities: Health aide had sex with boy, 17, in group home | Lights and Sirens Authorities: Health aide had sex with boy, 17, in group home November 28, 2015 | Filed in: crime, PAHOKEE— A 26-year-old health care aide was arrested last weekend after she allegedly engaged in sexual activity with a 17-year-old in a group home where she was working. Authorities arrested Tykea Lasjara Alexander, of Pahokee, Saturday in connection with a sexual battery investigation that began in March. She was released the same day on $10,000 bail. According to the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office, Alexander had sexual relations with a 17-year-old boy in a group home where she was assigned to provide care. Deputies say the boy told them he and Alexander flirted with each other for several weeks and traded text messages. But an unidentified witness told deputies he walked into the room and saw Alexander and boy having sex, a sheriff's arrest report said. When deputies spoke to Alexander, they report she denied having a sexual relationship or communicating with the teen more than once. Deputies monitored a call between Alexander and the teen, the report said. During the call, they report she admitted to deleting text messages, photos and a call log between her and the teen. State foster care reform ends group homes By Karen de Sá, Bay Area News Group Posted: 11/29/15, 4:58 PM PST | Updated: 4 days ago 0 Comments Vowing to raise its most traumatized children in committed family homes instead of residential facilities, California will soon stop warehousing kids in group homes where they often languish for years because the foster care system has found no other place for them to live. Under a new law taking effect in January, the state's Department of Social Services will begin a multiyear plan to replace privately run group homes with "short-term residential treatment centers" where youth will mostly stay no more than six months. "In theory, and in all our hopes, this will be a revolutionary change in the way foster care operates in our state," said Kyle Sporleder, policy director for the leading foster youth advocacy group California Youth Connection. "But like with many, many large reform efforts, we all kind of have to wait with bated breath." Success of the plan — already three years in the works and now involving 25 full-time state employees — relies heavily on finding enough family homes equipped with the skills to care for the state's most troubled youth. Will Lightbourne, director of the California Department of Social Services, is leading the reform effort backed by his department. He anticipates that the more than 5,800 foster youth now living in group homes — an alarming 1,000 for more than five years — could drop below 2,000 once the new law takes full effect. "What we have to have is children and youth nested in a family," Lightbourne said. "That has to be a core goal." Youth in group homes tend to have greater emotional and psychological needs than most foster kids. They are among the most likely children in foster care to have been moved multiple times, often with few lasting connections to family or trusted supports outside of the parade of professionals who govern their lives. The new legislation aims to treat children's specific challenges, such as trauma in youth who have been sexually exploited or the effects of clearly diagnosed mental illnesses. With indefinite stays no longer an option, social service workers will begin planning to place a child back in a family home as soon as he or she enters residential treatment. Almost $18 million is already budgeted to expand, recruit and retain the ranks of foster parents and relatives who will receive special training and additional 24-7 support to care for youth now in group homes. An additional $30 million ensures that relative caregivers receive the full state foster care rate. But the plan could take years to make a difference in the lives of the roughly 62,400 children now in California's foster care system. Despite long-standing difficulty recruiting enough foster homes, the plan relies upon vast new reserves and better trained foster parents and relative caregivers who will be patient and loving enough to care for youth even through rough times when they may act aggressively or try to harm themselves. What's more, many details of the new law have yet to be finalized — such as precisely how individualized mental health care will be delivered to children in family homes. Currently, there are 333 private agencies running a total of 1,022 licensed facilities in the state for foster youth in the child welfare and juvenile justice systems, as well as for developmentally disabled children, whose group home care will not change under the new statute. The San Jose Mercury News investigation "Drugging Our Kids" found that foster youth in group homes are the most likely to be prescribed excessive amounts of psychotropic medications, with more than half receiving court-approved prescriptions. Many of these drugs are commonly used to sedate troubled kids, often for the convenience of group homes, rather than any proven therapeutic benefit. Meanwhile, youth in group homes continue to suffer far worse outcomes than foster children raised with relatives or foster parents. Studies cited in a recent state report show they have higher rates of school dropout and arrest. Roughly two out of every three failed to attain basic proficiency in either English or math. Then, there are the emotional consequences. "If you're living in a group home, that's not a normal family, and it will give you the message, 'Maybe I don't belong in a normal family' — they're not normal situations," said Sporleder, who raised his two siblings in the foster care system. "It makes them feel like they don't belong in a family setting — that they will never fit in anywhere but an institution." Many group homes are not expected to meet the new, higher-level standards of care under Assembly Bill 403 and could go out of business. Others are expected to adapt to the new treatment requirements, or to expand their programs to offer home-based services — wrapping care and treatment around kids in family homes, rather than moving them around in search of a residential facility. Stone's legislation joins three other foster care bills taking effect in January to curb excessive use of psychotropics. The bills step up oversight, monitoring and training about drugs that are too often used for behavior management, rather than the mental illnesses for which they are designed, leaving kids to suffer debilitating side effects. "One of the biggest impacts that we're going to have on reducing the use of psychotropic drugs is getting kids out of group homes," said Stone. "Put a kid in a family, and that family is much, much less likely to resort to chemical restraints. It gets kids into situations where there is a commitment to their future." Morgan Hill mentor to troubled youth accused of sexual battery on teen A mentor to troubled youth has been arrested for sexual battery on a teenage boy and now police want to know if there are more victims. By Lilian Kim Monday, November 30, 2015 11:18PM MORGAN HILL, Calif. (KGO) -- A mentor to troubled youth has been arrested for sexual battery on a teenage boy and now police want to know if there are more victims. Police say the suspect worked with as many as 10 kids at a time, which is why they believe more victims may be out there. Morgan Hill police say 45-year-old Patrick Dauphin has been working with kids for more than a decade. Most recently, he served as a mentor to kids on probation, which is why they say his sexual battery arrest involving a 17-year-old boy is especially disturbing. "We often times tell youth to reach out to counselors and facilitators, to be open and honest, to work through their problems and it's very disturbing that this one male juvenile did and then in the end he was a victim," said Morgan Hill police Sgt. Carson Thomas. Morgan Hill police were first contacted by the boy's parents, whose son alerted them that Dauphin inappropriately touched him. In a statement, Dauphin's employer, Unity Care, says he has since been "terminated" and that "this is the first time in the organization's 22-year history that a Unity Care employee or volunteer has been arrested for an allegation of misconduct involving youth." Marie Christy Chade, Dauphin's housemate, has known the suspect for more than six years and doesn't believe the charges. "I think somebody's out to try to hurt him. I think it's deliberately mean," Chade said. Dauphin used to care for her husband and now rents a room from her. "Very caring. You know, gives his whole heart to any of the projects, or things that he's working on," Chade said. Investigators are trying to determine if there are other victims. Ex-youth counselor sentenced to prison on teen sex charges Monday, November 30, 2015 - 1:59 PM Image by: Davis County Sheriff's Office FARMINGTON --- Keldon Severn Cook, 29, was booked in the Davis County Jail on three counts of forcible sodomy on Thursday, April 16, 2015. Loretta Park Reporter FARMINGTON — A former Brigham Young University-affiliated youth counselor received four prison sentences for having sex with a teenage boy in Bountiful. "What you did was not only illegal, but morally wrong," said Judge Michael Allphin at the sentencing hearing Monday, Nov. 30 for Keldon Severn Cook, 29. Cook pleaded guilty in October to one count of attempted sexual exploitation of a minor and three counts of unlawful sexual conduct with a 16- or 17-year-old, all third-degree felonies. RELATED: Ex-youth counselor pleads guilty to Bountiful teen sex charges Allphin sentenced Cook to serve four terms of up to five years at the Utah State Prison. He said the sentences could run concurrently. He gave Cook credit for time served in the Davis County Jail. A 17-year-old boy told police he had a sexual relationship with Cook, whom he met when he was 14 while attending Especially for Youth, according to court documents. EFY is a week-long religious seminar sponsored by the BYU Division of Continuing Education, according to the BYU website. Cook had been employed with Granite School District as an assistant cheerleading coach at Alta High School last school year, but is no longer employed with the district, officials said. Before he was sentenced Monday, Cook read a statement from a yellow-lined piece of paper. His hands shook as he unfolded the statement and he broke into tears more than once while reading it. "I'm embarrassed and ashamed," Cook read. "I'm full of regret. I'm so sorry for all the pain I've caused ... I'm humbly asking for forgiveness from all those I've hurt." Cook also said his church and BYU should not be blamed for his actions. He is a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and attended BYU, where he was a cheerleader. Cook's attorney, Melanie Cook, said her client, who has no previous criminal record, "made a mistake." The attorney said Keldon Cook had plans to become a teacher "and because of this, he will not be able to go forward with those plans." She said Keldon Cook thought the age of consent was 16. Keldon Cook chose not to have a preliminary hearing or a trial because he knew "this process can be painful for the victim and the family." He also "wanted to keep it quiet and outside of the media," Melanie Cook said. Deputy Davis County Attorney Cristina Ortega said Keldon Cook met the victim at EFY in 2011. He kept in contact with the teen through Facebook and when the boy turned 16 he turned to Cook for help. "This was a young man who had some issues and the defendant took advantage of him," Ortega said. The Standard-Examiner does not publish the names of victims of sex crimes. Ortega said the victim told investigators Cook said what happened between them "was acceptable, but in the next breath the defendant told the victim he could get into trouble.” Ortega said Cook admitted in his presentence report that he has had 30 to 40 other sexual partners and she believes Cook poses a risk to reoffend. “Your sexual activity from the time you encountered this victim until you were arrested was pretty reckless,” Allphin said, referring to the presentence report, which is a private document. Allphin also said that as he read statements written by Cook in the presentence report, “it seems you fault the young man who is the victim. I need to remind you, you are 12 years older than this young man.” You can reach reporter Loretta Park at lpark@standard.net or at 801-625-4252. Worthington residential center for children with behavioral problems will close | The Columbus Dispatch Worthington residential center for children with behavioral problems will close. Fred Squillante | Dispatch Resident Audrey Kaune, 17, plays Scrabble with stabilization technician LaTasha Kinlocke at the Elijah Glen Center in Worthington on Thursday. As her teenage daughter grew older and stronger, Kelly Meara was effectively housebound. Audrey's rages spared no one. “She would not leave and she attacked everyone who came in the house,” Meara said. “I had to wear a helmet.” Obtaining short-term, residential treatment for older children with severe autism and behavioral problems is often impossible for Ohio families, and Meara struggled for years before she finally found a place for 17-year-old Audrey in August. Relief was short-lived. The new, 14-bed Elijah Glen Center — the only program of its kind in central Ohio — is closing at the end of the month after being open for less than a year. Not enough families could get the insurance coverage they needed, whether through Medicaid or private plans, to pay for the care, founder Marla Root said on Thursday. The only option left for some was to relinquish custody in hopes that their county Children Services agency would pay for the residential treatment, Root said. The Elijah Glen Center, on the Worthington campus of the autism agency Step by Step Academy, charges an average of $850 a day. Private insurers generally limit the length of stay at such centers. Medicaid pays for the medical and behavioral components of care, but not the residential part. Surrendering children to secure treatment is a terrible choice for parents, Root said. “It's scary. They didn't understand why that had to happen.” State and federal legislators know that the need for intensive behavioral-health treatment is devastating many families and triggering unnecessary child-welfare cases. According to the Public Children Services Association of Ohio, six in 10 children in the custody of county agencies in 2013 were there for reasons other than abuse or neglect. “I'm pretty down,” Root said. “We have families waiting to get in. How can it be that we're closing?” In Ohio, a joint legislative committee on multi-system youth — those who need services through more than one system, such as developmental disabilities and mental health — is to study the systemic problems and make recommendations for improving care. And at the federal level, advocates say, legislation could soon be introduced in Congress that would allow federal foster-care money to be used to help families who are at risk of relinquishing custody to get treatment for their children. “Residential treatment for children with behavioral health conditions is important but expensive,” said Mark Mecum, executive director of the Ohio Association of Child Caring Agencies. “The family is often on the hook.” Root went through the nightmare with her son Elijah, now 19 and the center's namesake. He is 6-foot-8, has severe autism and went through a period of aggressive behavior. Because there was no crisis-residential program available, Elijah had to be treated at a state developmental center geared toward adults with developmental disabilities. He now lives in a group home. Even when insurance coverage does work out, options are scant. “The need is so great, but there are no places,” Meara said. “There are even fewer who take adolescents who are in this type of crisis.” Her family's insurance company stopped paying for Audrey's residential treatment at the beginning of November. Because the teen, who initially was hospitalized at Nationwide Children's Hospital, still needed more help, Meara recently made the difficult choice to surrender custody to Franklin County Children Services. The decision feels more bitter now. The agency has been helpful, Meara said, but has the authority to determine Audrey's placement — possibly in another county or state — after the Elijah Glen Center closes. “We had found this help, and it's being taken away, and it's just stunning,” said Meara, who lives on the Far North Side, just 4 miles from the center. “I just don't know what to say.” Audrey doesn't mean to cause anguish for her family and two younger brothers, her mother knows. The girl can't easily convey her feelings. “It's like a very primitive way to express her unhappiness,” Meara said of the outbursts. “I know she's not doing it on purpose. I know that.” But that doesn't make it any easier for the Mearas, and many other families, to manage sometimes-violent teens at home. “Our boys know, when Audrey gets upset, that they run to their rooms and lock the door,” she said. “So much of the focus goes to her.” prince@dispatch.com Source: <http://www.dispatch.com/content/stories/local/2015/12/03/elijah-glen-autism-center.html>

Program at Long Beach Unified aims to keep children out of juvenile hall, probation camps By Sarah Favot, Los Angeles Daily News Posted: 12/06/15, 5:02 PM PST | Updated: 9 hrs ago #Comments The Los Angeles County Department of Probation has launched an educational program for Long Beach Unified School District students who are on probation or at risk of entering the system at Beach High School. A Juvenile Day Reporting Center operated by the probation department opened in September. The partnership is set to be formalized Tuesday by the Board of Supervisors via a memorandum of understanding between Long Beach Unified and the probation department. The program is an alternative for children who might be placed in juvenile hall, a group home or camp. Probation Department Deputy Chief Reaver Bingham said the students receive programming that is tailored to them and includes academic study, cognitive behavioral therapy, pro-social behavior training and mental health services. After school they receive drug counseling and life skills training from the Probation Department and attend field trips on Fridays. The program is designed for 25 to 30 students. About 12 students are now enrolled. Rather than moving from classroom to classroom, as is the case in a traditional high school setting, the students are taught in the same room by the same teacher for the entire day. Bingham said this allows students to be more focused. A probation officer also supervises the classroom. Each student is provided transportation to and from school, as students can encounter problems with law enforcement when they skip out on school. “These are kids that never went to school or hardly ever went to school who now come to school on a daily basis because they have no choice,” said Hania Bocklen, who runs the program for the Probation Department. The students also have exhibited behavioral problems, she said. “They're considered medium- to high-risk, but in reality they're just kids,” Bocklen said. “I call them my kids. They're super awesome kids.” Bingham said the program is geared toward prevention because many of these students are at-risk for re-offending. “Our desire is to curb or stem that trajectory,” he said. Ultimately, the goal is to move these students back into a traditional high school setting, Bingham said. Many of the students need to make up for credits they've lost. The program can also be for youths who are not on formal probation but who can enter the program through an agreement with the child's parents and the school district. Advertisement Probation Chief Jerry Powers said in a memo to the supervisors that the program is in compliance with a federal Justice Department settlement that requires the department to provide community-based treatment services rather than rely on juvenile halls, group homes and camps. Bingham said similar programs operate in East Los Angeles, at Lynwood High School and through an after-school program at the Zev Yaroslavsky San Fernando Valley Family Support Center in Van Nuys. Bocklen praised the district for providing the classroom space, a teacher and lunches for the students. The agreement between the county and the school district is nonfinancial. A spokesman for Long Beach Unified did not respond to several requests for comment. Richland County Sheriff's Department Should End Programs That Humiliate Children Plus: Muschamp ... Really? By Free Times Readers Wednesday, December 9, 2015 14 Share 0 Tweet 0 Share 0 Pin 0 Share 0 Mail 0 Share The video of a Spring Valley school resource officer grabbing a student, flipping her desk over and dragging her across the room led to nationwide outrage and to the termination of the officer. But this video is troubling not only because of the way that the officer brutally assaulted a helpless student but also because it is the tip of the iceberg in terms of the ways that the Richland County Sheriff's department treats children. While Richland County's school resource officer program has rightfully come under fire and is currently under federal investigation, there has been less attention placed on the other questionable programs within the department's Youth Services Division. Richland County has pioneered several “diversion programs” that claim to help troubled pre-teens and teens but in effect punish, humiliate and harm children. One of these programs is Camp

L.O.T.T., which stands for “Leading Our Troubled Teens” but also happens to be the last of name of Richland County Sheriff Leon Lott. Local news footage of the boot camp shows several Richland County deputies verbally assaulting and humiliating a group of boys — almost all African-American — until some of the boys are clearly shaken and distraught. Another youth program within the department is known as R.E.A.D.Y. (Richland County Educating And Detering Youth) highlighted in the A&E television program Beyond Scared Straight. In this program, parents pay a $10 fee to have their children — some as young as 11 — transported in shackles, suited in a prison jumpsuit, and locked in an adult holding cell for the night. Like Camp L.O.T.T., the purported goal of the R.E.A.D.Y. program is to scare children into curbing behaviors that may land them in jail in the future. By stationing its officers in Richland County schools, the sheriff’s department helps create a perverse demand for its programs. Often after a school resource officer arrests a student for a low-level offense in the school, the departments offers the student an opportunity to participate in its scared straight program in lieu of pressing charges. While the sheriff’s department may intend to help troubled youth, humiliating and terrifying them is not the way to help them. Extensive research has shown that boot camps and scared-straight programs are the least effective programs in preventing crime. In fact, several studies have found that sending children to boot camps and scared straight programs actually increases the likelihood that they will have future involvement with justice system. Instead of operating these harmful and ineffective programs, the Richland County Sheriff’s Department should partner with proven programs in schools and communities that successfully divert young people from the court system and help them grow into successful and law-abiding adults. Effective community-based programs hold students accountable for their actions while also teaching them to resolve conflicts and contribute to their communities. Restorative justice, teen courts and mentoring programs are much better alternatives to police in schools, boot camps and scared-straight programs. In order to prevent more incidents like the one at Spring Valley High School, Richland County should remove police officers from its schools and prioritize investing in community programs that work to keep kids, schools and communities safe. Mishi Faruquee National Field Director, Youth First Initiative New York Muschamp ... Really? Please say it ain’t so, Gamecock Nation. Our esteemed athletics director had 60 days and a near-unlimited budget to find a new Head Ball Coach, and the best he could do is find another Florida hand-me-down? Really? Muschamp is young, energetic and full of defensive acumen — but he also could not win consistently in a state with some of the best football talent in the country and was summarily fired by Florida barely two years ago for not being able to win the big game. Is this what Carolina needs to rebuild its dilapidated program? I fear time will prove Ray Tanner should have stuck to coaching baseball where he knew how to produce winners, and that University of Houston Coach Tom Herman was indeed worth whatever it would have taken to secure him — and will always be the big fish that got away. New Report Shines A Light Into The Charter School Black Box Charter schools are now the most rapidly growing form of schools in the nation’s education system, but surveys show Americans generally don’t understand what charters are even if they tend to favor them. Are these schools public? Are they private? Who really runs these schools, and how do they take in and spend money? According to charter industry reports, more than 500 new public charter schools opened during the 2014-15 school year enrolling an estimated 348,000 additional students, representing a four percent growth in the number of operating public charter schools and 14 percent growth in public charter school students. There are now more than 6,700 public charter schools enrolling about 2.9 million students nationwide. But in-depth investigations conducted in communities where these schools proliferate find that government officials who have to deal with the impact of charters generally are perplexed about the “business model” driving these schools. And public school parents who send their children to these schools generally know very little about the financial machinations that support the schools’ operations and staffing. So little is known about how charter schools are organized and operated that they’re often referred to as a “black box.” A new policy brief from the National Education Policy Center pries at the lid of the charter school black box to shine a light into these institutions and reveal how charter schools blur the line from what it means to be a “public school” and, by their very design, expand opportunities to profiteer from public tax dollars and privatize public assets. The brief “The Business of Charter Schooling: Understanding the Policies that Charter Operators Use for Financial Benefit” delves into the many ways the design of charter schools complicates any analysis of the flow of money into and out of these schools. The authors Bruce Baker and Gary Miron — university professors from Rutgers and Eastern Michigan, respectively — detail how the very structure of the charter school business introduces new actors into public education who skim money from the system without returning any benefit to students and taxpayers. In one of the more bizarre schemes the authors examine, charter operators will use third-party corporations to purchase buildings and land from the public school district itself, so taxpayer dollars are used to purchase property from the public. Thus, the public ends up paying twice for the school, and the property becomes an asset of a private corporation. In other examples, charter operators will set up leasing agreements and lucrative management fees between multiple entities that end up extracting resources, which might otherwise be dedicated to direct services for children. These arrangements, and many others documented in the brief, constitute a rapidly expanding parallel school system in America, populated with enterprises and individuals who work in secret to suck money out of public education. Charter Schools Aren’t Really ‘Public Schools’ The first secret of charter schools that keeps their financial workings hidden and their funding prone to exploitation is that they aren’t really public schools, despite what charter advocates say. As Baker and Miron explain, charters generally aren’t subject to the same disclosure laws that apply to state operated entities and public officials, especially when the governance bodies for these schools outsource management services to for-profit management firms, as is increasingly the case. As the brief explains, outsourcing school operations to private entities has the potential to make transparency laws — for open meetings, public access to records, and financial disclosures by public officials and state operated institutions — subject to court interpretation. Courts across states have offered mixed opinions as to whether and to what extent to apply transparency laws to charter schools, their authorizers, operators, and governing boards. Further, the public-private arrangement of charter schools often place new limits on the constitutional (and some statutory) protections that are customarily guaranteed to school employees and students in state operated institutions. These important differences between charter schools and traditional public schools are not generally understood or appreciated by even the most knowledgeable people, which is why charter advocates put so much energy and resources in marketing their operations as “public” schools. How The Charter School Gravy Train Works Just as the complexity of public-private governance emerging in the charter sector complicates analysis of these organizations’ legal rights and responsibilities, it also complicates analysis of how money flows into and out of these schools. Because education management organizations do not report relevant, detailed, and comprehensive expenditures in the same format or with comparable documentation as public districts, charter operations can spend money in ways that would generally be impermissible in public institutions. The types of controversial expenditures in charter schools — what the NEPC brief calls “excess costs” — include bloated executive salaries, wildly inflated administrative fees, acquisitions and transfers of buildings and property, and “asset hoarding” where school supplies and materials purchased with public tax dollars are retained in private holdings. Most troubling of the charter school excess costs documented in the brief are the various forms of financial arrangements that steer vast sums of public money designated for education to private investors and their firms. In one such financial arrangement, charter operators will use independent, though often closely affiliated, private nonprofit or for-profit entities to acquire long-term debt that ultimately must be paid for by the public. In these arrangements, the third party entity repays investors by charging the charter operator exorbitant lease payments — a cost that is ultimately charged back to the public taxpayer. Yet, this lease payment, the brief notes, “doesn’t need to be approved by local taxpayers.” This arrangement also leads to excess debt service expenses where financial transaction and loan interest costs divert money that had been used for education into the financial industry. Remarkably, the brief notes, these debts generally will not mature until after the year 2040, way beyond when the authorization of most charters will have to be renewed. In another questionable financial scheme, taxpayer funds are used, without voter approval, to purchase a property from the taxpayers themselves, for someone else — the charter school operator or the education management company. In other words, “the taxpayers are buying the facility a second time, albeit from themselves, but the result is that these taxpayers will no longer own it. Worse, in the process of transferring the property, taxpayer dollars have subsidized substantial fees and interest to various parties. The icing on the cake is that the federal government has spent federal taxpayer dollars to stimulate these transactions.” As Charters Gain Financially, Students And Schools Lose Educationally In addition to their financial wheeling and dealing, charter schools also “enhance revenues,” as the authors phrase it, by engaging in practices public schools would never get away with. “Some charter schools have been found to condition continued student enrollment on parent volunteer activities,” the brief documents. “Others have been found to charge exorbitant fines for student disciplinary infractions.” Charters also frequently engage in a “head count” game in which they inflate enrollments before a cut-off date in the fall and then retain money given to them by the district as students dis-enroll from the charter throughout the rest of the school year. Another revenue enhancement strategy frequently employed by charters is to avoid serving children with more severe, more costly disabilities. After charters have tapped all revenue enhancements related to students and parents, they go after teacher salaries and benefits. The brief documents how charter chains, such as KIPP, slash teacher personnel costs at the same time they spend more than what comparable public schools in their communities spend. Another charter chain, Harmony, cuts teacher expenses to spend considerably more on the operating costs of the schools than what comparable public schools spend. Often, these lower personnel costs are accomplished by keeping a relatively inexperienced staff of teachers who frequently leave the school and are replaced by other low-cost, inexperienced teachers. Why Are We Doing This? What emerges from these revelations should be deeply concerning to government officials, public policy makers, charter school lobbyists, and others who advocate for more expansion of the charter sector. As the authors state, a "substantial share of public expenditure intended for the delivery of direct educational services to children is being extracted inadvertently or intentionally for personal or business financial gain, creating substantial inefficiencies." The outright unlawful costs of charter schools to the public are not a trivial matter. A recent report from the Center for Popular Democracy and the Alliance to Reclaim Our Schools uncovered over $200 million in "alleged and confirmed financial fraud, waste, abuse, and mismanagement" committed by charter schools around the country. Authors of the report called their findings the "tip of the iceberg," because much of the fraud goes undetected. Reports of charter schools financial misconduct are now so numerous that it seems every day brings a new revelation of how these schools misappropriate and misspend public money. However, many of the financial arrangements and business opportunities discussed in the NEPC brief are legally permissible and entirely understandable from the point-of-view of charter schools and their operators. States and authorizers have given these institutions permission to do this. But authors of the brief ask us to consider whether "that which is legal is not necessarily ethical, or in support of the public interest." While charter schools can claim to be doing "a reasonably good job of satisfying parents and students," the authors contend, the academic results of these schools are mixed at best, and there is considerable evidence charter schools have acted to further racial segregation and privatization of our education system. Given their findings, Baker and Miron argue that as these public-private relationships have become increasingly complex and opaque, state charter laws have failed to keep pace. They propose reasonable recommendations for revisions of laws and financial reporting requirements and a tightening of the regulatory provisions for these schools. These revelations and the recommendations they lead the authors to constitute an invaluable service to all who care about our children's education. Source:

Foster parents 'were let down by back-up services' 0 Comments CHILDREN'S Services did not offer enough support to foster parents and did not investigate concerns raised about children in care, a former foster carer has said. The woman, who was referred to as Miss B, told the Independent Jersey Care Inquiry that she fostered children for several years in the 1990s and early 2000s, but often felt unsupported by Children's Services. She said she raised concerns about some of the children's behaviour, but that nothing ever seemed to be done. Miss B was jailed in 2010 after being convicted of perjury and perverting the course of justice for tipping off a man accused of abusing one of the children – known as child A – in her care that the police were investigating him. However, during the hearing yesterday she continued to deny that she had tipped off the man, who was jailed for two years for sexual abuse of child A. Source:

Nurse describes harsh conditions inside group home before fire 1 day ago December 09, 2015 Dec 9, 2015 Wednesday, December 09 2015 Wednesday, December 09, 2015 10:31:08 PM CST in News Source: WBRZ By: Trev Schmalz Share: BATON ROUGE - A nurse described disturbing living conditions of people who were burned out of their group home earlier this week. The woman, who asked not to be identified, said people were barely being treated as human beings in apartment units in the 600 block of Donmoor. The apartment was rented out from its owner by an independent living agency. The agency's owner is identified as Cynthia Jackson on state business filings. "People's lives are in her hands, and obviously one has definitely slipped through the cracks," the woman, a nurse, said in an interview with WBRZ reporter Brett Buffington Wednesday night. On TV, the woman's face was hidden and her voice disguised since she worked as a home health nurse at the apartment complex. Lenard Grimes, a resident, died in a fire at the apartment complex Tuesday morning. Another person was severely injured. A previous WBRZ Investigative Unit report about the blaze uncovered fire officials also had concerns with the property. Inspectors found fire code violations and even questioned the conditions of the people who resided at the facility. "Codes for independent assisted living must be further researched," an inspector wrote in a violation report. The whistle blower interviewed on TV said there was a careless mentality about patient care. "I brought up my concerns several times... it was just discounted," she said. The woman claims people were living in cramped, one bedroom apartments and said sometimes, air conditioning was not working. The woman stopped seeing patients at the property before the fire but said she wanted to talk about what she felt were harsh conditions in the hopes of prompting some sort of high-level investigation. The fire department has not released a cause of the fire. Source:

Grand Jury Indicts Unlicensed Care-Home Group In all, nine people face 53 charges in the running of about a dozen Snellville-area homes. Snellville, GA By Doug Gross \(Patch Staff\) December 11, 2015 ShareTweetGoogle PlusRedditEmailComments A Gwinnett County grand jury has handed down a 21-page indictment against nine people accused of running a ring of unlicensed personal-care homes. The homes were exposed in a December 2 raid by Gwinnett County Police and other law-enforcement agencies. Authorities say they discovered 12 homes in the Snellville area where people with a range of physical and mental illnesses were being housed. The residents often were receiving poor care, according to police, and in many cases were being forced to sign over their Social Security and other government benefits directly to the people running the homes. In all, nine people face 53 exploitation charges in the case. An attorney for the defendants told the Gwinnett Daily Post that the case is a "witch hunt." "I've already been receiving calls from people who have multiple family members in one of these facilities or have had them in the past, saying 'What can we do to help them out because they were great with my family?'" lawyer Jack Harrell said to the paper, after filing bond requests at the Gwinnett County Courthouse. Harrell said the homes were primarily run by Donovan Ricardo Coward and his mother, Dawn Cicelia Walker. He said they never intended to meet the strict standards of a personal-care facility, but instead were trying to run boarding houses for people who couldn't afford more upscale options. The December 2 operation stemmed from a May domestic-dispute call at one home, at 4126 Wrexham Dr. in Snellville. There had been an "extensive call history" at the home for medical and domestic issues and code violations and authorities began suspecting it was being run as an unlicensed care facility. Two suspects at that home were charged with neglect of an elderly person and the investigation that followed revealed other homes and suspects. Numerous people suffering from a range of mental and physical illnesses were being housed in the homes, according to the indictment. Police said the victims "are living in unsafe and unsupervised conditions and some have a diminished mental capacity." In addition to Coward and Walker, the people charged in the case are William J. Walker, Neonard Precious Kumassah, Sasha Chantel Alphonso, Stefani Amoi Walker, Yulanda Natasha Walsh and Reggie Benard McKenzie and Jacqueline Pamela Mitchell, who has not been arrested. Source:

(AP) — A mentally disabled teenager who died while under state care in 2013 writhed in excruciating pain for months when a doctor ignored his rejection of a stomach feeding tube, according to a watchdog group that faulted the state's oversight agency for not substantiating neglect in the case. Disability Rights New York, which has the federal authority to oversee such care in the state, issued a highly critical report that was provided to The Associated Press before its release Monday. The report calls for a new investigation by the state's Justice Center, established two years ago to protect the 1 million disabled, addicted, mentally ill and young people in state care. The report underscores what other advocates for the disabled said of the Justice Center when the AP reported in October that its investigations have rarely resulted in criminal charges. The agency has received more than 25,000 allegations of abuse and neglect by caretakers since 2014, substantiated about 7,000 of them, with just 169 cases — or less than 2.5 percent — resulting in criminal charges. According to the Disability Rights report released Monday, the autistic, severely mentally disabled 18-year-old, identified as "M.H.," was being cared for at Dominican Hall in the Hudson Valley town of Goshen. It said the teen had been fed through a stomach tube that he became unable to tolerate in late 2012, leading to "consistent and excruciating pain" almost daily for about eight months. The facility's doctor, identified in the report only as "Dr. P," continued the same "ineffective" treatment and didn't assess him for three months before his death from peritonitis and sepsis at a hospital after a new tube attached to his intestine was inadvertently removed. The report said the Justice Center, which investigated the case, failed to substantiate neglect, didn't prevent the doctor from putting other vulnerable patients at risk and justified its inaction with a legalistic "smoke screen" by claiming it lacked jurisdiction for most of that time period despite having inherited the authority of its predecessor agency. The Justice Center said the teen's case largely predated its purview, which began when it became operational on June 30, 2013. M.H. was hospitalized shortly before that, and he died four days later. "We have no idea why the concepts of time and space did not figure into this organization's report," Justice Center spokeswoman Diane Ward said. The state agency said in a statement that it did a thorough investigation and concluded M.H.'s medical care "appeared to be inadequate and inappropriate"

by the group home's and two hospitals' doctors but that it didn't empower the Justice Center to substantiate abuse or neglect. The operator of the group home, Catholic social services agency Saint Dominic's Hall, said in a formal response that it disagreed with the report's findings and called M.H.'s death "tragic" but referred back to the Justice Center investigation. Saint Dominic's Home President Judith Kydon did not return calls to The Associated Press seeking further comment. Disability Rights' investigation, which included interviews with current and former Dominican Hall staff, found administrators failed to sufficiently supervise medical services, nurses and that other staff repeatedly reported frustration with the doctor's lack of accountability. It also said the staff reported being verbally reprimanded by the director for reporting concerns and felt their jobs were in jeopardy. Disability Rights said all failed to report neglect allegations to the state as required, which could have saved M.H.'s life, and they weren't pursued until after he died. Organizations like Disability Rights operate under federal authority in all 50 states and U.S. territories. The legal services group has federal funding and offices in Brooklyn, Albany and Rochester, with lawyers and advocates who provide free services to protect the interests of people with disabilities and ensure they aren't abused, neglected or subjected to unlawful discrimination. Drugging Our Kids: California courts step up scrutiny of foster care use of psychiatric drugs By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 12/15/2015 11:19:07 AM PST 2 Comments Updated: 12/16/2015 04:43:56 PM PST Driven by new legislation and a motivation to create more meaningful oversight, California's courts are calling for far more justification before judges authorize the use of powerful psychiatric drugs that are now too freely prescribed to foster children. The state's juvenile court judges have long had the responsibility for signing off on those prescriptions, but too often they fail to question requests for multiple medications at once, unapproved drugs and unproven regimens for very young children. The proposed new rules aim to turn these often blanket approvals into serious probing of prescribers and others who care for foster children, from social workers to foster parents and legal advocates. Sacramento Superior Court Judge Jerilyn Borack, who presides in juvenile court and helped craft the new rules, said the goal is to have judges approve medications for a foster child "as if this was their own child." The new procedures represent the first and most significant statewide response yet to a package of bills signed into law late last year by Gov. Jerry Brown to curb rampant use of psychiatric drugs in foster care. The problem received far-reaching response after "Drugging Our Kids," this newspaper's 2014 investigative series. Advertisement The newspaper found the foster care system often depends on antipsychotics and other mind-altering medications to manage children's behavior, not to address rare mental illnesses they are designed to treat. Under the new proposals, judges will probe deeper into a child's overall mental health care: If nondrug therapies have not been tried, why not? How are the medications expected to improve the child's condition? How is their sleep, and ability to engage in school? And, in a nod to children's rights to refuse the drugs: Did the child take the medication willingly, or was it a struggle? Indeed for the first time, children's input -- no matter their age -- would become more central to the courts' decisions. Children would not have to fill out forms. They could draw a picture, talk to an advocate, even speak to the judge directly about how they felt on psychotropics, and whether side effects could be overshadowing potential therapeutic gain. The current forms have "a lot of check boxes, and a lot of teeny-tiny lines that doctors may or may not write on, and we didn't feel that met the requirements of the new law," Borack said. "If we just give them a check box we are telling them we don't need much more than a yes or no." In contrast, she added, the expanded forms "will be a way to evidence how little information some of us got in the past, and how that is no longer adequate. The doctors say, 'Well, I'm the doctor. Just trust me and sign off on it.' " The public has until Jan. 22 to comment on the new proposed rules and forms now posted on the website of the Judicial Council of California, the policymaking body of the state's courts. A final decision will be made April 15, after a series of public meetings, with the new rules taking effect in July. California is unique in the nation for requiring juvenile court approval of all psychotropics prescribed to foster children. But in many counties, the approvals rarely provide a meaningful review of whether medications are appropriate or even safe. Doctors fail to fill out medication requests completely, and judges often approve medications they know very little about in terms of why they are needed and how they may be helping -- or harming -- the children. This newspaper found that over the past decade, almost 1 in every 4 teens in foster care receives psych meds, the majority prescribed the most powerful and untested variety, antipsychotics. Many of these drugs leave youths suffering from obesity, diabetes, uncontrollable tremors and severe lethargy while failing to treat the true causes of their emotional difficulties. The new court rules follow some of the provisions of Senate Bill 238, one of three new laws taking effect in January to better protect foster youths from unsafe medications. A fourth bill, requiring even more of the courts and physicians, did not pass this year but is set to be reintroduced next month. Under the new rules, doctors could no longer prescribe one drug after another with no explanation of whether they worked. They would be required to discuss specifically whether prescriptions alleviated symptoms. Social workers and probation officers would have to state specifically, in the next six months, what types of therapies "other than medication" the child is enrolled in. Critique of the proposals is expected to grow, as word gets out to physicians, caseworkers and others that they will be asked to do more to justify medications, as well as fill out more paperwork. Mark Edelstein, medical director of EMQ FamiliesFirst, a Campbell-based nonprofit providing mental health services to foster children, said that although he agrees with most of the Judicial Council's recommendations, he is concerned that forms for doctors will double in length from three to six pages. "Child psychiatrists are already in short supply, and requiring even more paperwork would give them less time to provide direct clinical care to foster youth, an already underserved population," Edelstein said. "This kind of administrative burden drives good doctors out of the public sector." But retired longtime Los Angeles juvenile court Judge Terry Friedman -- the architect of the 1999 California system that requires court approval for all psychotropic prescriptions to foster youths -- called the changes "realistic, balanced and smart." Together, Friedman added, "they will save countless kids from unnecessary and excessive medication while assuring that foster youth receive the drugs they truly need." State Sen. Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles, who authored the bill requiring the court changes, said in an emailed statement that necessary care should not be impeded through "red tape." But she remains hopeful that more accountability "will halt the practice of medicating for convenience the foster children we are supposed to protect and nourish." UPDATE: Richland juvenile home official charged with sex with teen Juvenile home administrator charged with custodial sexual misconduct Mindi M. Stoker of Pasco allegedly had sexual relationship with 18-year-old felon Stoker pleaded innocent, released on $20,000 bail The Twin Rivers Community Facility on McMurray Street in Richland, shown here in 1998, is for juvenile felony offenders who are transitioning back into the community. File Tri-City Herald i By Ty Beaver beaver@tricityherald.com LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story The acting administrator at a home for juvenile felony offenders in Richland is charged with having sex at least once with an 18-year-old felon housed there. Mindi M. Stoker, 38, of Pasco, pleaded innocent Monday to one count each of first- and second-degree custodial sexual misconduct with the young offender. Investigators said she allegedly kept a "To do" list on her cellphone of the sexual experiences she wanted to have with the teen. The list also included helping the 18-year-old get back his gun rights and having his criminal record sealed. Stoker was released Monday from the Benton County jail after posting a bond on $20,000 bail. She works at the Twin Rivers Community Facility, which helps offenders sentenced as juveniles to transition back into society toward the end of their sentences. A release from the state Department of Social and Health Services, which operates Twin Rivers through its Rehabilitation Administration, said Stoker has been placed on alternative assignment until an internal investigation is finished. "This is inexcusable for any of our staff, and especially intolerable for someone in a position of authority," said Assistant Secretary John Clayton. This is inexcusable for any of our staff, and especially intolerable for someone in a position of authority. John Clayton, state Department of Social and Health Services Twin Rivers is one of several facilities maintained around the state. The group home at 605 McMurray St. in north Richland has 15 beds for offenders. The Richland School District provides educational programs at the home but is otherwise not involved in its day-to-day operations and management. Information on how long Stoker has worked at the facility was not immediately available. Authorities learned of the alleged relationship between Stoker and the 18-year-old after the teen's roommate told staffers the two were having sex. That triggered an investigation by DSHS, Child Protective Services, the Washington State Patrol and Richland police. "We take these extremely seriously, especially in a custodial circumstance," Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb told the Herald. We take these extremely seriously, especially in a custodial circumstance. Capt. Mike Cobb, Richland police Stoker's victim initially denied having any inappropriate relationship with her, court documents said. But after being told he was not in trouble, the teen told a Richland detective the relationship with Stoker began about Oct. 20 when she took him on a trip to another juvenile facility, and they had sexual contact on the drive back. Stoker and the resident had numerous other instances of sexually touching each other since that time and had sex in a bathroom at Twin Rivers. Richland police said there are witnesses to some of the instances when the pair engaged in sexual contact. Investigators found 36 notes on Stoker's phone, including a "To do" list that listed numerous sexual acts and locations for sexual contact with a person with the initials that match the victim's initials. Richland police are still investigating and DSHS officials said they are cooperating with those efforts. A decision on Stoker's continued employment with the state agency also is expected in a few days, DSHS officials said. Ty Beaver: 509-582-1402, @ tybeaver Source: <http://www.tri-cityherald.com/news/local/crime/article49747905.html>

Kids Get Hurt at Residential Schools While States Look On Some residential programs for kids have settled on better ways to handle children. But the best practices are almost entirely self-imposed, by Annie Waldman ProPublica, Dec. 15, 2015, 4:07 p.m. 0 Comments Print Print Spur Reform in 2015 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. David Sleight/ProPublica After slamming his fists into the wall until his knuckles dripped with blood, the raging teenage boy turned to a staff member and shoved him. The teen had recently been admitted to Youth Development Institute, a residential program for children with emotional and behavioral disorders in Phoenix, Arizona. Even the smallest incidents triggered his anger. Years ago, the response would have been swift and physical: The boy would have been forced to the ground and restrained until he grew calm, which sometimes could take up to 45 minutes. But this time, Sean Hennessey, a direct care staff coordinator, stepped in front of another staff member, sending him out of the room before the conflict could escalate. Hennessey stood at the door with his head down, avoiding eye contact, and calmly spoke to the boy. When tears rolled down the boy's face minutes later, Hennessey moved in and offered a reassuring side hug. "It's exhilarating when you've avoided a restraint," Hennessey told ProPublica, recalling the incident. "Pinning a kid to the ground until they stop fighting and start crying, it's barbaric if you think about it." Eight years ago, restraints occurred multiple times a day at Youth Development Institute. When children violently acted out, staff would hold them or even strap them down, and sometimes inject them with sedatives. Trish and David Cocoros, the directors of the program, said they hated relying on restraints, but assumed that if they stopped using them, more staff members and kids would get hurt. Then, in 2012, the program changed course after an industry expert visited and discussed alternatives to restraints such as the approach Hennessey used. Now, the program averages less than one restraint a month. Youth Development Institute is part of a growing group of residential programs nationwide attempting to improve their work with children in key ways. Eliminating restraints is just one example. Many programs are shortening children's stays, involving families more, and offering more rigorous classes. But best practices like these are almost entirely self-imposed. There are few federal requirements for residential programs involving children, and a patchwork of state regulation has left significant gaps: There is little to no monitoring of how well schools are teaching kids overall, no required national tracking of abuse and neglect allegations, and not even a comprehensive database of all programs. Efforts to bolster federal standards have drawn fire from some providers and industry groups, which have lobbied lawmakers. Legislation to modestly increase federal oversight has languished for years. As a result, for years, some programs have continued to thrive despite having long records of mistreating residents that has even, at times, led to injuries and deaths. (Read ProPublica's recent story about one for-profit company, AdvoServ, that has used its deep pockets and influence to bully weak regulators and evade accountability.) Because of the wide latitude they're given, some programs still use extreme methods on children – including forced labor or exercise, electric shock and restraint devices that include shackles and a wrap that resembles a full-body straight jacket. Our recent story also detailed how AdvoServ workers at one campus used mechanical restraints 28,000 times in less than five years. (AdvoServ told us workers only use restraints as a last resort, "when there is imminent danger.") At programs across the country, at least 145 children have died from avoidable causes at residential facilities over the past 35 years, a ProPublica analysis of news reports found. At least 62 children died after being restrained, most often because of asphyxiation. The job of monitoring the wellbeing of children at the programs is spread across so many state and local agencies that kids can fall through the cracks. State education agencies, for instance, rarely take strong action. A ProPublica survey found that about half of the education departments didn't have the power to sanction such schools even if they discovered public school students were being mistreated. School officials in just seven of the 44 states that responded to the survey said they had levied penalties on or closed such a program in the last decade. "State agencies can certainly step up measures to hold all residential treatment programs accountable to high health and safety standards, but the reality is that most have not despite a rash of abuse allegations occurring in programs on their turf," Rep. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., told ProPublica in an email. Schiff reintroduced a bill earlier this year that would require the tracking of abuse allegations lodged against such programs. Trish and David Cocoros, directors of Youth Development Institute in Phoenix, Arizona, are part of a growing group of kids' residential treatment facilities working to strengthen best practices in the face of lax national oversight. (Annie Waldman/ProPublica) Youth residential centers originated in the 1940s to fill a gap in the therapeutic spectrum: They are less restrictive than psychiatric hospitals and are often a last resort for overwhelmed families. They provide housing, treatment and, often, schooling to kids with a range of issues, from emotional disorders to substance abuse problems to profound disabilities like severe autism. They use a diverse array of approaches and include so-called "wilderness" programs, boot camps and other behavior modification centers. Public schools funnel roughly 18,000 kids per year into residential programs. Federal law entitles all children with disabilities to free public schooling but school districts sometimes pay private providers to educate students with severe impairments that local classrooms can't handle. Some of the programs provide 24-hour care and take children from across the country. Many of the programs are pricey, with total costs for some children soaring past \$350,000 per year. A host of other agencies, from child welfare to Medicaid, typically pay the rest of the bill for children's stays, each with their own standards for the programs. Despite the public funding, there is little data on residential schools. One federal database collects state data on abuse incidents, but submission is voluntary. There is no required federal tracking of abuse allegations—and there is not even a nationwide list of all residential programs. One often-cited government survey, which is more than a decade old, estimates that there are at least 3,600 facilities across the country, housing more than 50,000 children annually. Ira Burnim, legal director for the Bazelon Center for Mental Health, believes that the current data gives an incomplete picture. "Our lack of information and data is very troubling," said Burnim. "To a certain extent, the residential treatment centers are out of sight, out of mind." Lawmakers have repeatedly called for changes amid reports of chronic abuse and neglect. A government report in 2008 found gaps in state regulation increased the risk of abuse and neglect at some youth residential programs. Some state agencies didn't visit programs often enough to make sure kids were safe and well-cared for, the report found. In other states, some programs, such as private boarding schools and religious treatment centers, are exempt from licensing and do not have direct regulation. The report also found state agencies did not routinely share negative findings on programs, or even inform other agencies when a program had its license revoked. A few industry groups support greater oversight and transparency. "Even if it means more regulation and paperwork, we have an obligation to support what would be best for the children," said Kari Sisson, executive director of the American Association of Children's Residential Centers. To help reinforce standards, some states and federal agencies require programs to obtain accreditation from professional standards groups, which generally have more requirements than state agencies. But the accrediting agencies have few tools to enforce compliance. "They do a lot of things well and they have a lot of good measures," said Robert Friedman, a clinical psychologist at the University of South Florida. "But they are not there that often." Unrestrained While evidence of abuse of the disabled has piled up for decades, one for-profit company has used its deep pockets and influence to bully weak regulators and evade accountability. Read the story. What Happened to Adam It took one mother seven years to learn that the for-profit school she trusted with her son had strapped him down again and again, one time after not picking up his Legos. Read the story. With few enforcement powers, some federal officials have focused on encouraging best practices. Dr. Gary Blau, the chief of the child, adolescent and family branch of the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, has led a campaign to promote changes at children's residential centers, such as eliminating the use of restraints. In 2006, Blau organized the first "Building Bridges" summit to bring residential program directors and community care providers together to discuss how to improve the standards of therapeutic care for youth. Although many facilities, like Youth Development Institute, were ready and willing to incorporate best practices, others were resistant to any kind of culture change. "There were residential facilities that had built fortresses around themselves," Blau said. "They kept kids in and kept families out." Since that first meeting, nearly 130 organizations have committed to the standards set by the Building Bridges initiative. Blau recognizes that there's only so much that persuasion can accomplish. "There's still a lot more work to be done," Blau said. For facilities that are resistant to change, "that's where I would look to state licensing and say that we need to include these principles in our licensing requirements." Aside from facilities, several states have also begun to formally adopt the standards as their own. Massachusetts, for example, has embedded the Building Bridges' guidelines into their licensing regulations, including limiting restraints. "The data made it impossible to walk away from," said Janice LeBel, the director of system transformation at Massachusetts' Department of Mental Health. When LeBel compared the psychiatric care of children and adults, the rate at which restraints were used was at least 4 times higher in youth facilities. "There was a moral imperative to do something about it." Under LeBel's watch, the state has reduced the use of restraints in children's psychiatric facilities by 89 percent. They are now implementing the reduction strategies across children's residential facilities and schools. But for reductions to happen across the country, LeBel said, national standards should be stronger. "There is great value to having local oversight, but it's important for there to be federal standards that drive service advancement," she told ProPublica. Industry groups and providers have at times aggressively sought to fend off federal regulation of their programs and worked to undermine stricter rules. "Lobbying against regulations is traditionally the posture of the providers," said Burnim of Bazelon Law Center. "They are not fans of regulation, and where they are supportive of regulation, it's in the service of getting resources.” The National Association of Therapeutic Schools and Programs, also known as NATSAP, represents over 150 residential treatment programs and was one of the more prominent groups lobbying Congress on earlier versions of Schiff’s bill. Between 2008 and 2009, NATSAP spent $220,000 lobbying Congress, according to disclosure reports. “We are all for regulation, it just has to be the right kind,” said Clifford Brownstein, the executive director of NATSAP, which requires that its members be licensed and accredited. “We have found that, for a variety of reasons, issues can be dealt with best more locally.” While NATSAP has not actively lobbied since 2010, another member-based organization, the National Association for Children’s Behavioral Health, or NACBH, has spent at least \$100,000 since 2013 lobbying Congress on mental health bills, including legislation on residential program oversight, according to congressional disclosure reports. Joy Midman, executive director of NACBH, believes that “the field has been swiped with one broad brush.” Midman, who emphasized that the disclosed dollars spent by NACBH only show what bills her organization has paid firms to monitor and does not necessarily indicate lobbying, described the recent legislation as a “work-in-progress.” Additional reporting by Heather Vogell and Meral Agish. DFCS’ mission is to protect children, but in this case, the agency placed Laila in the hands of a caretaker who police say eventually beat, starved and killed the child. The case summary details a broken leg that Laila suffered while in Rosenbaum’s care. Rosenbaum told DFCS caseworker Samantha White that the injury occurred while the child was at a gymnastics class. Had White checked out that story, she would have learned that the child was not even enrolled in a gymnastics class, the summary said. “It was definitely a screw-up. That’s where the ball was dropped,” said Gina Banks, the girl’s maternal grandmother. Patricia Lambert was caring for Laila before the girl was formally transferred to Rosenbaum’s care. The girl made several visits to Rosenbaum’s during that time, but Lambert told the agency that Laila came back with injuries. “She was concerned about their care and the supervision being provided by the Rosenbaums,” the summary said. The caseworker did not file a report on these injuries or investigate them, the summary said. Her husband, Joseph, charged with child cruelty, had earlier received a $10,000 bond. Laila died Nov. 17, about five months after she was placed in the care of the Rosenbaums. The arrest warrant for Jennifer Rosenbaum said she killed the child by striking her in the abdomen “with such force the child’s pancreas was transected. The child was believed to enter shock due to the blood loss resulting from the injury.” The warrant noted that Laila was “injured about her body in its entirety,” suffering severe bruising on her back, legs, head and abdomen, and breaks of her legs and arms. The Rosenbaums also abused Laila’s sister, authorities said. Corinne Mull, the Rosenbaums’ attorney, said Laila died after Jennifer Rosenbaum performed the Heimlich maneuver and CPR when the child was choking on some chicken. Mull said the force of the compressions may have caused the injury to the pancreas. Mull attributed Laila’s and her sister’s other injuries to either abuse prior to their stay with the Rosenbaums or the general bumps and bruises of childhood play. White and Warner were also fired because of problems with a background check on Rosenbaum. When DFCS places a foster child with a person, the agency is supposed to check whether the person has a criminal history or any accusations against them of child abuse or neglect. The agency also inspects the home to make sure it’s a safe environment. “We followed the standard background check, but it was not conducted as thoroughly as it was defined in policy,” said DFCS spokeswoman Ashley Fielding. She said the caseworker failed to screen Rosenbaum’s maiden name when determining whether she had a history of accusations of child abuse or neglect. Rosenbaum had no such history, Fielding said, so the check “would not have had an impact on the placement decision.” Source: <http://www.myaic.com/news/news/dfcs-worker-failed-to-investigate-signs-of-child-a/npmDr/>

Judge: Foster care system violates children’s rights Emily Ramshaw and Edgar Walters, The Texas Tribune 2:11 p.m. CST December 17, 2015 Judge: Foster Care System Violates Children’s Rights(Photo: Texas Tribune / Photo illustration by Todd Wiseman / Karolina Michalak / Felipe Hadler) CONNECTTWEET 2 LINKEDINCOMMENTEMAILMORE AUSTIN — A federal judge ruled Thursday that Texas has violated foster children’s constitutional rights to be free from an unreasonable risk of harm, saying that children “often age out of care more damaged than when they entered.” “Years of abuse, neglect and shutting between inappropriate placements across the state has created a population that cannot contribute to society, and proves a continued strain on the government through welfare, incarceration or otherwise,” the ruling states. “... Although some foster children are able to overcome these obstacles, they should not have to.” The class-action lawsuit, brought by the New York-based advocacy group Children’s Rights, Inc. in 2011 on behalf of children in long-term foster care, argued that Texas caseworkers are assigned too many children for them to effectively monitor and that kids are placed too far away from home into settings where they do not get appropriate care. In it, Children’s Rights asked U.S. District Judge Janis Jack, of Corpus Christi, to order the state to take steps such as hiring more qualified caseworkers and setting lower caseload limits. The lawsuit also called for the state to quit placing children with no special needs in more restrictive residential treatment centers and for better staffing ratios in group foster homes. In the ruling, which the state is expected to appeal within 30 days, Jack orders child welfare officials to “establish and implement policies and procedures” to ensure that foster children are protected, and appoints a “special master” to ensure compliance. That overseer will be chosen by the court but funded by the state. She also directs the state to stop placing certain foster children in unsafe placements like “foster group homes that lack 24-hour awake-night supervision.” Texas’ roughly $1.2 billion-per-year Child Protective Services division, with about 8,000 employees, is one of the nation’s largest child abuse investigation and foster care teams. Independent child welfare advocates have said a ruling in favor of Children’s Rights could require significant changes at the agency, raising questions about whether state lawmakers would need to reconvene during a special legislative session to implement — and allocate money for — reforms. Anchorage juvenile justice officer charged with sexual abuse of teen inmate, helping plan her escape Jerzy Shedlock December 22, 2015 Email Print Text Size-A +A A former juvenile justice officer at McLaughlin Youth Center has been charged with five counts of sex abuse of a minor and conspiring to help an inmate escape after an investigation into the officer’s relationship with a 16-year-old girl at the facility. The charges say Phillip Bigham, 47, resigned Nov. 24, the same day his superiors called a meeting where they questioned Bigham about outings he took with the teenage girl, an inmate at McLaughlin, to secluded areas like a tool shed and the school section of the building. “Bigham became visibly angry with the staff, left the room and returned a short time later with his letter of resignation,” the charges say. But Bigham kept his job for another week; he requested the time to gather his belongings and say goodbye. Related: Former McLaughlin justice officer accused of sex abuse Bigham worked at the facility for underage offenders for about four years and three months, according to the charges. Unit Supervisor Nicole Cuaresma told an Anchorage police investigator there were no issues with Bigham until he took a position with the Girls Treatment Center. After Bigham left the facility, the girl got letters from the Anchorage area despite having no relatives in the city, the charges say. A phone number had also been added to her call list as an alternative number for her father. The facility’s officials checked and determined the number wasn’t her father’s. The investigation heightened when McLaughlin officials searched the girl’s cell, discovering a letter with handwriting similar to Bigham’s, according to the charges. “Cuaresma stated that the letter talked about an escape plan and how (the girl) could get out of the building by obtaining the code from one of the other juvenile justice officers,” and further advice for how to find the code, the charges say. Bigham’s letter also informed the girl he had set up a room for her in his garage, which included hair dye and new clothes, according to the charges. The girl was at first reluctant to come forward with more information but started helping with the investigation. Bigham worked as a kind of counselor for several in the Girls Treatment Unit, which serves inmates struggling with drug use, trauma and self-esteem, among other issues. The girl said Bigham began treating her differently in July by giving her candy and letting her use his phone and computer. Their relationship became more sexual in October, she said; she described three sexual encounters they had at the facility. The charges do not indicate how plans for the girl to escape were formulated, but she said she was supposed to try and get out on Dec. 13. She told staff she got scared and the plan fell through. On Dec. 18, Bigham was secretly recorded speaking with the girl on the phone, the charges say. The two discussed the best time for her to escape and where to meet up, as well as their sexual encounters. Anchorage police spokesperson Jennifer Castro said Bigham was arrested and jailed on Dec. 18. Supporters Of New Law: Let's Find Homes, Not Group Homes, For Foster Kids Bob Moffitt Tuesday, December 22, 2015 | Sacramento, CA | Permalink

In this Tuesday, April 14, 2015 photo, Madison Rodriguez looks at her phone while standing by a window at Beachwood House, a group home for foster kids in Los Angeles. Jae C. Hong / AP This story is part of Capital Public Radio's series on new California laws that take effect on Jan. 1, 2016. A new law signed by California Governor Jerry Brown this year will require group homes meet treatment standards for foster children with histories of mental illness, sexual abuse or significant trauma. Homes that can not meet those standards will not be allowed to operate and children who do not need those services will not be allowed to stay in those homes. Democratic Assemblyman Mark Stone wrote the law and says it's part of an effort to get kids out of group homes and into family settings. "It is a major push away from the utilization of group homes and into more individualized care. That's the significant shift," he says. "There still will be some group homes. But, what we've done in this is limited the duration, turned them into more short-term, intensive care treatment facilities for those kids who need that." Studies cited in a Department of Social Services report from this year say increased time in group homes corresponds to higher rates of incarceration, lower levels of education, and lower employment. Stone says the department is already preparing for the new standards. "What the department is right now doing is going out to each county and finding out from them what resources they have available, what group homes they have, how they're going to be able to do this transition, what their inventory, if you will, is of resource families," he says. About 3,000 California children have been in group homes for more than a year. One thousand kids have been in group homes for more than five years. Henn. Co. Sheriff Investigates Sex Assault At Juvenile Treatment Center December 23, 2015 4:36 PM Filed Under: County Road 62, Hennepin County, Hennepin County Home School, Hennepin County Human Services, Hennepin County Sheriff's Office, Juveniles, Minnetonka, Nexus, Sexual Assault (credit: CBS) MINNEAPOLIS (WCCO) — The Hennepin County Sheriff's Office is investigating a report of a sexual assault at a county treatment facility for troubled teens. The assault allegedly occurred at the Hennepin County Home School on the 14000 block of County Road 62 in Minnetonka. The school is a state-licensed, residential treatment facility for juveniles who have been committed by the state. The sheriff's office says the incident happened within a program run by a private company called Nexus, who works with the county's human services office. The date of the incident and information about those involved have not been released. Nexus released the following statement on the investigation: "We are aware of the allegation and we are cooperating with all applicable authorities in their ongoing investigation within the scope of the medical privacy laws that govern these types of cases. Additionally, we are conducting our own internal investigation to get to the facts of this allegation. The safety of the youth in our care is always our highest priority, and our standard practice in these situations is to remove the staff in question from working with our clients until the investigation is completed. This protects both the youth and the staff in question." Source: <http://minnesota.cbslocal.com/2015/12/23/henn-co-sheriff-investigates-sex-assault-at-juvenile-treatment-center/>

--> Kansas lawmaker seeks end of privatized foster care system Posted 4:57 p.m. today Updated 4:58 p.m. today 0 reactions More on this The Topeka \(Kan.\) Capital-Journal TOPEKA, Kan. — A Republican Kansas lawmaker is calling for an end to the state's first-in-the-nation privatized foster care system, as it nears its 20th anniversary with increasing scrutiny and a record number of children in foster homes. What do you think? Rep. Mike Kiegerl, an Olathe Republican, wrote a report titled "When Children Die We Must Act" in which he concluded that the mid-1990s privatization wasn't successful, the Topeka Capital-Journal (<http://bit.ly/1RxWskK>) reported. What do you think? "It grieves the author of this report who as an economist fervently believes in private-sector efficiency to categorically state that this program as currently in place ought to be eliminated. Perhaps another method of privatizing services could be studied," Kiegerl wrote. What do you think? His report was among more than 100 pages of documents provided to the Legislature's Special Committee on Foster Care Adequacy, which met for one day last month and hopes to get permission to meet again. What do you think? The Department for Children and Families, which oversees the state's foster care contractors, has been facing questions and criticism in recent months over the deaths of multiple children in the foster care system. What do you think? ADVERTISING The scrutiny intensified after a Topeka city councilman and his wife were charged in November with child abuse. The couple have 17 children, including multiple foster and adoptive children. What do you think? Kiegerl prepared his report before the couple, Jonathan and Allison Schumm, were arrested. The report notes that the state spends about $283 million every two years on foster care, not counting payments to foster parents. What do you think? The report called caseworker turnover a serious problem that creates extra work for DCF employees, disrupts procedures and increases expenses. It concludes that contractors must have healthy profit margins in order to pay a CEO of one of the contractors $650,000 a year. What do you think? In 1997, Kansas became the first state to privatize its foster care system, partly in response to a 1989 class-action lawsuit that accused DCF — then known as Social and Rehabilitation Services — of failing to adequately care for abused and neglected children. What do you think? DCF Secretary Phyllis Gilmore told lawmakers last month there are about 6,600 children in foster care in Kansas — a record high — and 2,826 licensed foster homes. What do you think? Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, a Topeka Democrat, said he opposed privatization when the change was made and continues to do so. What do you think? "I believe it's been an abject failure, particularly in taking the best interest of children in mind. I believe too many decisions are made that are based on money," Hensley said. Youth Villages Oregon plans to end residential services in Lake Oswego Created on Wednesday, 30 December 2015 16:43 | Written by The Review | inShare Share 0 Comments Agency that cares for troubled youth says it will begin laying off 74 workers on March 1 Youth Villages Oregon alerted county officials Wednesday that it will stop offering residential services at its Christie Campus in Lake Oswego and begin laying off or transferring workers on March 1. LaTonya Pendleton, the managing director of human resources for Youth Villages, told the Clackamas County Workforce Investment Council that 74 employees would be affected at the facility, which is located near Mary's Woods and the Marylhurst University campus. Affected employees range from program managers and a charge nurse to teacher/counselors, night monitors and therapists. Some of the workers will be offered positions in other Youth Villages programs in Oregon and outside the state, Pendleton said. Youth Villages Oregon is one of two programs currently facing the loss of their state licenses to care for foster children and troubled teens. In early December, the Oregon Department of Human Services said it was working with the Oregon Department of Justice to draft "intent to revoke" letters to Youth Villages, which also operates a facility in Oregon City and a family intervention program in Redmond, and to Scotts Valley School, a therapeutic boarding program in Yoncalla, south of Eugene. As a result of a recent review, DHS spokesman Gene Evans said the state would stop placing foster children at Youth Villages programs in December and would move the children who were already there to other placements. But Connie Mills, manager of public relations for Youth Villages, told The Review on Thursday that 15 children were still receiving services at the

Christie Campus this week. "We are in the midst of finalizing an agreement with the state," Mills said, "but will be able to share information once it's finalized." Mills said that agreement could be finalized as soon as Thursday, but that negotiations could stretch into next week. Youth Villages established itself locally in 2011 when it merged with ChristieCare, an organization that served thousands of Oregon families since its founding in 1859, the same year Oregon earned statehood. The nonprofit provides residential treatment for youths with severe emotional and behavioral problems. It also provides intensive in-home support for children who might otherwise be placed in foster care, residential treatment, detention centers, hospitals or juvenile facilities. When the state announced the results of its review earlier this month, Mills said in a statement that Youth Villages took officials' concerns seriously and was making improvements to the program. "We have a long history of providing care for Oregon's youth who face some of the biggest challenges, and our commitment to caring for them is steadfast," Mills wrote. Former county home worker indicted Filed on December 30, 2015 by Brad Dicken 2 Comments ELYRIA — A former child care worker at the Lorain County Juvenile Court's Stepping Stone residential center has been indicted on charges he was involved in drug activity with residents at the group home for boys. Sean Justice Sean Justice, who now works for the U.S. Postal Service, was booked into the Lorain County Jail on Monday on two counts of conspiracy and a single charge of corrupting another with drugs. The 29-year-old was released Tuesday on bond. The charges come nearly two years after Justice resigned from his county job after being confronted by a court official about allegations he had been trading drugs with juveniles he was assigned to guard. Justice's lawyer, Paul St. Marie, said his client plans to fight the charges. "He may have used poor judgment on occasion, but nothing that rises to a criminal offense," St. Marie said. "He fully expects the judicial process will demonstrate the state's charges have no merit." The allegations against Justice that led to his resignation in January 2014 weren't the first time that he had been under scrutiny for allegedly engaging in drug activity at Stepping Stone, where he was hired as a relief worker in September 2012 and became a full-time employee in January 2013. In March 2013, a juvenile probation officer reported that a Stepping Stone resident had told his counselor that Justice asked him if he knew anyone willing to buy the painkiller Lortab, a Lorain County Drug Task Force report detailing the long-running investigation into Justice said. Out of Options, California Ships Hundreds of Troubled Children Out of State One 14-year-old boy's search for care takes him to Utah as his home state struggles to safeguard its most challenging children. by Joaquin Sapien ProPublica, Dec. 31, 2015, 12:24 p.m. 4 Comments Print Print Spur Reform in 2016 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. Deshaun and Veronice Becton walk away from the Mount Pleasant Academy in Mount Pleasant, Utah. Short of options in his home state of California, Deshaun is now living in a Utah psychiatric facility. (Kim Raff, special to ProPublica) At 14, Deshaun Becton's life is a roadmap to California's faltering efforts to care for its most troubled children. Over more than a dozen turbulent years, he lived with a half-dozen foster families and in five different group homes. Now he is among the more than 900 children that California sends to out-of-state residential facilities, most of them in Utah, a ProPublica analysis shows. Each of these children represents a surrender of sorts: a tacit acknowledgement that California — the nation's biggest and, by some measures, richest state — somehow has no good answer for them. In the late 1990s, after a 16-year-old boy died from abuse at an Arizona boot camp, California pledged not to export its troubled youth to out-of-state group homes and juvenile detention facilities that didn't meet certain standards. The number of kids sent away plummeted. Today, however, the state is grasping for options anew. California has shuttered most of its secure facilities for youth and done away with almost all beds for children in psychiatric hospitals. It has moved to curtail the use of group homes, partly because, as ProPublica has reported, several have melted down into chaos in recent years. Most recently, the state has adopted reforms meant to keep children in need of acute care as close to home as possible, pumping money into county programs to create new centers and recruit foster families. At the same time, California is sending more and more children to facilities out of state — some as far away as Florida. Indeed, the number of children sent from probation and child welfare agencies across the state has more than tripled since 2008. "What's happening in California is dishonest," said Ken Berrick, the founder of Seneca Family of Agencies, a major child services agency based in Oakland. "We're saying we don't want locked facilities here and we don't want group homes, so instead we're sending kids to Utah where we can't monitor them. What's that about? It's just wrong." There are signs that California has a limited ability to guarantee the health and welfare of the children it sends beyond its borders. For one thing, state officials struggle even to keep track of how many children they've sent away. They couldn't provide a total. Using several different sources of state data, ProPublica calculated that county probation departments in 2015 had some 235 children living out of state; child welfare agencies in 2015 had another 52 placed outside California; and local school districts had more than 600, including Deshaun Becton. California's Department of Social Services conducts occasional inspections of out-of-state facilities where California agencies have placed children. Earlier this year, records show, at a facility just over the Nevada border, California inspectors responded to a complaint that children were not being adequately fed. Days later there was a riot at the facility, with two of its buildings set on fire. Only afterward did the inspectors corroborate the complaint and begin removing children. In Colorado, inspectors worried in October 2014 that a facility housing California children was vulnerable to targeting by sex traffickers. It took a year before children were removed and California decertified the home. ProPublica sent DSS a list of questions concerning the hundreds of California children being cared for out of state, including why such placements were needed and how the state was ensuring the children remained safe. Michael Weston, a spokesman for DSS, sent a general response acknowledging that California had run out of options for many of the children but maintaining that DSS was meeting all of its obligations for monitoring and safeguarding the welfare of those sent away. Deshaun's long journey to find a safe and effective level of care has exhausted his parents and drained their finances. Lamont Becton, Deshaun's father, is a firefighter; Deshaun's mother, Veronice, is a registered nurse. They have met with dozens of experts, driven thousands of miles to rescue Deshaun from one facility after another, kept in touch with their son via Skype when he was assigned to a horse ranch in a remote corner of Utah. Through it all, they have repeatedly asked themselves a basic question: How can California not be capable of better for Deshaun? His problems — post-traumatic stress, mood disorders, violent outbursts — are significant. Yet can it really be best for troubled, vulnerable children like Deshaun to be sent to other parts of the country in pursuit of adequate supervision and treatment? "What I don't understand is why aren't there any options here?" said Veronice. "Is it really about the children? It's not. If it was, you'd want these kids to be near their families." The Bectons recognize the challenge Deshaun presents. He consumes a daily diet of anti-psychotic medications to control his behavior. He has tested his committed family's best efforts, and he has exasperated the staffs of group homes across the state. His care has cost, by a rough accounting, more than $1 million to his home county and the state of California. The family has also experienced the risk of out-of-state placements firsthand. In May of 2012, Deshaun was sent to a home in Kansas where he was once restrained by staff, face-down, for nearly 90 minutes. Officials in Kansas soon recommended Deshaun be sent to Mount Pleasant Academy, a horse ranch in Utah, which advertises itself as specializing in children addicted to pornography. Officials at the ranch quickly realized it was an inappropriate placement for Deshaun, but before his parents could remove him, he wound up with scrapes and bruises from encounters with staff members. Just before Christmas, Deshaun entered a secure psychiatric facility in Utah, his third out-of-state placement. The Bectons have learned to limit their expectations. They wish mostly that he will be safe, and that he might make some small progress toward stability with the right combination of medication and therapy. "We can paint a picture to somebody that makes him look like a monster," said Lamont Becton. "Unfortunately, he came into this world with some issues that weren't necessarily his fault. But he is a great kid with a good heart. He's really just searching for love." Veronice and Lamont Becton have grown accustomed to living without Deshaun in their home in Antioch, California. (Jessica Dimmock, special to ProPublica) Deshaun's mother was 14 when she gave birth to him on Jan. 30, 2001. They spent their first night together in a hotel, and over the next several years mother and child bounced from emergency shelters to foster homes to the care of relatives. Court records show they ricocheted up and down the state, sometimes together, often apart. When Deshaun was three, a young couple considered adopting him. But medical records show he suffered "meltdowns that lasted hours," and frequently bit, kicked and screamed at those who came near him. The couple became overwhelmed. They eventually drove Deshaun to the Solano County Child Welfare office and left him. Enter, almost by accident, Veronice and Lamont Becton, a working class, African-American couple from Oakland and its suburbs. The Bectons had casually discussed adoption for years. They both came from supportive, two-parent, middle class families, and they were proud of the life they had started together, one of stability and faith. They had one son, but also a spare bedroom room in their newly purchased, three-bedroom home in Antioch. The couple first agreed to take Deshaun in as a foster child. When he arrived, all his possessions had been packed into a single trash bag. It wasn't much — some baby clothes and a stuffed animal. "I maybe lived in two places my entire life," said Veronice, who has been unable to shake the image of the trash bag. "And you know, when I would go visit my grandparents, I had my little luggage." Deshaun wasn't easy. He stayed up far later than had their older son, Jonah. He would scream and cry. But two months in, it did not feel like anything the Bectons could not manage. "At that point, there was no giving him back," Veronice said. "In my mind, we'd already adopted him." The ensuing weeks were something of a honeymoon. They had a party. There was cake and balloons and relatives.

Deshaun was giddy from all the attention. But as home life took on its long-term routines— shifts at the hospital for Veronica; commutes to the firehouse for Lamont; Jonah to school and sports practice— Deshaun quickly unraveled. The night terrors intensified. Jonah had asked to share a room with Deshaun, to embrace the role of older brother. But that arrangement disintegrated as Deshaun kept Jonah up all night, throwing toys, smearing feces on the bedroom walls, carving deep scratch marks into the sheetrock with his tiny nails. During the day, the Bectons did their best to treat him as a normal child. They got him in an art program, then pre-school, but soon the calls rang off the hook from teachers. He was disruptive. He would bite and kick his classmates. He's "not the right fit for this setting," the teachers would say, trying to be polite. A social worker told them Deshaun likely had something called "reactive attachment disorder," a condition that develops in children who've been abused or neglected in their early years of life. It often manifests in extreme, sometimes violent episodes. She gave the Bectons a photocopy of a book on the subject. "We were so naïve," Lamont said. By the time Deshaun was in kindergarten, his parents began the process of enrolling him in an "Individualized Education Program," a plan laid out by the school district for children who have special needs. By first grade, Deshaun had to travel to a school in Concord, a 30-minute drive. To get there, Deshaun boarded a bus each morning. He started fights, he spit on other children. He kicked the back of the bus driver's seat. Eventually the school district opted to take him to school privately, in his own van. "It was such a horrible feeling," Lamont said, bowing his head. "To rely on people to help you with your own child; to be dependent; I never thought I'd have to make sure someone else could get my kid to school." Jonah Becton has done his best to be an attentive older brother to Deshaun. (Jessica Dimmock, special to ProPublica) He and Veronica rattled off all the activities they experimented with to relieve their son of his boundless, often destructive energy: physical outlets like karate, soccer and football. "He liked to kick things," Lamont joked. They tried creative outlets like music, art and therapy of all kinds. They tried discipline, making him do community service when he misbehaved: cleaning up litter, scrubbing graffiti off walls at a nearby public school. The janitors grew to love the Bectons. Lamont kept a list of all the professionals they'd met over the years: teachers, psychologists, coaches, social workers, counselors, lawyers. A year ago, the list was close to 100. In 2011, the Bectons got a taste of what California then considered the latest, best answer for children such as Deshaun: wraparound care. A team of social service workers would come to the Becton home and tend to Deshaun directly. Soon there were five people, working in shifts, in and out of the home. The counselors were earnest and dedicated, but they struck the Bectons as young and inexperienced. "The only way I could explain it is, when you have an open, gaping wound, it's not time to put a Band-Aid on," Veronica said. "You're going to have to suture that wound and put pressure dressing on it." Wraparound care, she said, was like a Band-Aid and "we were like... hemorrhaging blood." California offered another option – a group home with trained staff and expert support. Soon enough, Deshaun was sent to a home in Davis. It was designated a Level 14, for the most challenging children. It had a campus and classrooms and dormitories. Psychiatrists and therapists would be on hand. The $10,000 a month in costs would be borne by the family's home county. Deshaun arrived at the home, known as FamiliesFirst, in March 2012. The first weeks weren't easy. He missed home and told his parents so in regular phone calls. But over the next several months, he progressed. He forged bonds with a counselor and a social worker, he spent hours in the arts center and the Bectons noticed that his emotions had steadied. He could cool his temper using techniques his therapist had taught him. But FamiliesFirst came undone – quickly and disastrously. The staff was slashed. Children, including Deshaun, went missing for days or longer. The police were called hundreds of times – to save children or to arrest them. The home's demise was the focus of an April 2015 ProPublica examination – one that revealed a wholesale failure of care and protection involving the home administrators, government overseers and the local police. The Bectons felt the extent of that failure acutely on the evening of May 31, 2013. Veronica was preparing to go to dinner with a friend when she got a call from Audrie Meyer, the home's executive director. Meyer said Deshaun had fled the facility the night before and something terrible happened. He'd been "assaulted in the community," she said. The Bectons raced to reclaim their boy. They took his picture when they picked him up that night. He appeared traumatized, sullen and scratched up, his eyes badly bloodshot. The home eventually was closed, and Deshaun wound up back in Antioch. The search for California's next best solution got underway. "So how do you find a place?" Lamont asked. "You go to your laptop and you type in 'boys group home' and you go, 'Wow, those are lovely pictures.'" The Bectons say the approach of government agencies in finding the right fit for Deshaun has often felt as random and scattershot as theirs. Some of this, they accept, is a consequence of his distinctive profile: he exhibits some symptoms of autism, yet not in a manner severe enough to qualify him for some of the most advanced care. But some of it feels like a lack of consistency and coordination on the part of the authorities to properly diagnose and treat Deshaun. His mood swings do not result from a diagnosed psychosis, and yet for years he has been prescribed anti-psychotic medications. His evaluations by government screening panels can feel perfunctory, and his resulting placements determined more by the availability of a bed somewhere – anywhere – than by a considered strategy for success. A drawing done by Deshaun. With help, Deshaun's mother thinks his art skills could develop into a real talent. (Jessica Dimmock, special to ProPublica) And so Deshaun eventually landed at a facility called the Milhous Treatment Center in the foothills of Northern California's Sierra Nevada Mountains. The home serves 38 boys in six houses on a bucolic 1,000-acre ranch. The Bectons viewed the expanse of the campus as a selling point. They figured it might make it harder for Deshaun to run off. The home's administrators evinced confidence that they could help Deshaun with the right mix of therapy, schooling and recreation. But the administrators did not mention that Milhous had recently been in trouble with the California Department of Social Services for a string of violations. Records show that in 2010, the department found that a staff worker had allegedly molested a child resident on two separate occasions. In 2011, the facility was cited for filing late incident reports. In 2012, according to another report, the staff had strip-searched children. For each violation, the department demanded the home provide a "plan of correction" – a legally binding document that is meant to show how exactly a group home's staff will address specific violations. By January 2013, the home was late on one of those, too, forcing the state to take the rare step of financially penalizing the home. The problems did not end with Deshaun's arrival. Staff turnover contributed to Deshaun changing therapists four times. Veronica said that at the end of Deshaun's time there, the home had also lost its staff psychiatrist. As a result, Deshaun's monthly psychiatric consultations were provided over Skype with a doctor who lived in another state. In December 2014, Deshaun ended up fleeing. He disappeared with another boy for some four hours before he was found on the side of a highway wearing a T-shirt, shorts, and cowboy boots. In an interview, Milhous Children's Services Chief Executive Officer Dan Petrie defended the agency's overall record and its treatment of Deshaun. He said that Milhous had filed the overwhelming majority of its incident reports on time. Of the strip-searching incident, Petrie said the children had kept their shorts on during hunts for marijuana. It happened on a single occasion, he said, and the staff member been properly disciplined. Petrie said Deshaun had been "easily in the top 10 of the most challenging cases I have seen in my career." "Unfortunately," he said, "California is seriously lacking options for kids that need such intensive services." By the end of 2014, the Bectons were done with Milhous. And Milhous was done with Deshaun. The family hired yet one more consultant to plot out yet one more alternative. Under California law, public school districts must provide an education to all students who live in them. If a student has a mental health need that his home district can't meet, then the district must pay for that student's education elsewhere. That is how Deshaun was sent to Utah. Mount Pleasant Academy in Utah treats children with sexually aggressive behavioral disorders. (Kim Raff, special to ProPublica) Deshaun and nearly 600 other California children did not end up in Utah by accident. Today, there are an estimated 100 or more homes in Utah meant to care for and safeguard some of the country's most troubled children – more than any other state, experts say. California has contracts with 20 of them, and it sends them a range of children who have been through California's juvenile justice, foster care or special education systems. The niche industry traces its roots to homes founded and run by Mormons in the early 1970's. Many in the faith saw caring for disturbed children and their often desperate families as consistent with their mandate to do good works. "You find more of those people who are idealistic and willing to do this work within the Mormon population than you would have out in the world," said Dr. Robert Crist, a psychiatrist and a co-founder of the Provo Canyon School, one of the earliest Utah homes for troubled children. "The obligation to young men is to treat them fairly and teach them good principles." Roughly 40 of the facilities in Utah are members of the National Association for Therapeutic Schools and Programs, a national trade organization that represents such facilities in Washington, D.C. Trade group officials say all members must prove they employ well-qualified workers and are either licensed by their home state or meet voluntary accreditation standards. But trouble has erupted over the years at homes throughout Utah. Perhaps the most damning example involved a network of homes operated by a former worker at Provo Canyon. A lawsuit on behalf of 350 children against the network's founder, Robert Lichfield, had for years tarnished the entire industry. The 3,000 page complaint— built on testimony from nearly all 350 children and multiple depositions of current and former employees — accused Lichfield of hiring woefully underqualified workers who used cruel, sometimes violent methods of discipline, including long periods of solitary confinement or even beatings. For more than a decade, the suit wound its way through state and federal courts. More than one judge recused themselves. Ultimately, many of the claims in the suit were dismissed, and a settlement was reached on the remaining issues. "Frankly, I never thought we found a judge in Utah who was willing to deal with these hard and large issues," said Windle Turley, the attorney who filed the suit. In an emailed statement, Lichfield sought to distance himself from the troubled homes and discredit the complaints against him. "I did not operate the facilities as they were independently owned and operated," he said, adding that he believed the students "were just looking for some free money” and “were very upset with being sent to the schools where they couldn’t do drugs or other inappropriate behaviors.” Many of the homes tied to Lichfield in Utah and across the country have been closed in the wake of scandal. Thomas Burton, a Salt Lake City attorney who has sued multiple Utah group homes on behalf of children who allege abuse in them. (Kim Raff, special to ProPublica) Spurred in part by these incidents, Utah’s legislature passed a bill in 2005 expanding the number and type of homes it would formally license and oversee. But efforts at adopting national standards that would be enforced by federal regulators have been defeated, in part by the work of the national trade association. Clifford Brownstein, executive director of the association, said the federal standards appeared aimed at punishing the worst actors in the business even when some programs are outstanding. “They haven’t been well thought out,” Brownstein said of the federal proposals. He said his members prefer working with state rather than federal regulators, he said. Diane Moore, director of licensing at Utah’s Department of Human Services, said the agency’s “primary focus” was verifying that “critical health and safety standards are met in order to protect the well-being of all residents” at the homes and facilities. “Regardless of who the players are, we license each facility to a set standard of criteria provided by state statute and rule,” she said. “We thoroughly investigate complaints and incidents using a unique set of criteria, and we utilize an appropriate level of corrective action for any rule violations that are found.” Thomas Burton, a Salt Lake City attorney who has filed 25 lawsuits against facilities in the state, said whatever regulations Utah has are clearly ineffective. Otherwise, he said, he wouldn’t have so much work. “There is no oversight,” Burton said. “When you look at the complaints from kids, you often see that the children are dismissed as inveterate liars.” At Red Rock Canyon, a facility in St. George, a worker pleaded guilty in 2014 to multiple counts of sexually abusing three teenagers in his care, one of whom was just 13. The facility did not properly report the abuse to Utah regulators or the police. But Utah has allowed the home to remain open, accepting Red Rock’s assurances that it would retrain its staff. It turns out the owners of Red Rock Canyon also run the horse ranch Deshaun arrived at last August. Both the home, Mount Pleasant Academy, and the Bectons realized almost immediately it was not a good fit. A month after Deshaun arrived, Veronice received a copy of notes recorded by his therapist. Except they were for another child. Meanwhile, administrators at the home concluded that Deshaun did not need treatment for issues of sexually aggressive behavior, something the home advertised itself as specializing in. What he needed, they wrote to the Bectons, was intensive, individualized care – something the home said it did not have the staff to provide. They suggested he be sent to Red Rock Canyon. It would be his sixth placement in three years. The Bectons asked for time. In October, the home’s staff informed the Bectons that Deshaun’s face had been scraped while he was being restrained – pinned down atop some gravel in the parking lot of the home. When Lamont visited that month, he was surprised by the severity of Deshaun’s injury. The scrape stretched from above his son’s eyebrow down beneath his cheekbone. In November, Veronice began arranging for Deshaun to come home for Thanksgiving. The trip never happened, and Veronice had to settle for a Skype session with her son on Nov. 23. When Deshaun’s face showed up on her computer screen, she saw the faint outline of a black eye. Deshaun, in his halting way, said it happened during a restraint triggered by a dispute he had with another student over a roll of duct tape. Veronice had to request a formal report, and when it came it said that Deshaun was out of control and had to be restrained. According to the report, Deshaun gave the black eye to himself. Veronice made plans to remove Deshaun immediately. And there was no way she was going to send him to Red Rock Canyon. Jerry Spanos says his Heritage School outside Provo is a model for how to care for troubled children. (Kim Raff, special to ProPublica) Utah is not bereft of what appear to be quality options. Jerry Spanos, a former Mormon missionary, is the chief executive officer of the Heritage School, a 19-acre residential treatment center set in a narrow valley that divides the outskirts of Provo from the snow-capped Wasatch Mountains. The campus is comprised of 11 gleaming 12-bed dormitories. There is a 627-seat performing arts center where students have performed The Wiz and West Side Story. There’s a rock-climbing wall, a soccer field, a basketball gym, a horse stable and a heated, indoor pool. Spanos’ staff includes 17 therapists and two psychiatrists. They are meant to get to know the kids as individuals: their triggers, their trauma, their history, their skills and their weaknesses. “I didn’t go into this because I wanted to make a ton of money,” Spanos said. “I did it because I wanted to help children.” There might have been better placements in Utah, but the Bectons’ first priority was just retrieving their son. Thus on Dec. 3, Veronice pulled up to the log cabin walls of the Mount Pleasant Academy horse ranch. The building is tucked at the end of a curling gravel driveway off a road that winds around a trailer park and an outcropping of trees. There was little evidence the staff was prepared to return Deshaun to his mother. Deshaun eventually ambled into a basement where his mother waited. He was disheveled and bleary-eyed. There was dirt in his hair, dust on his blue jeans and mud on his black parka. Veronice held Deshaun tight, and the two of them soon marched up the long, sloping driveway. They stopped at a nearby gas station so Deshaun could clean himself up. He used a restroom to change clothes while Veronice opened the trunk to organize a pile of jackets, sweatpants and gloves that lay loosely atop two half-full garbage bags: one carried a tangled of shirts, pants, drawings, and Star Wars books. Another mostly held dirty socks and video game cords. “I can’t believe this,” Veronice said, visibly distraught and hoisting the bag before her. “This is the way he came to me. And now here he is like this all over again.” A senior official with Mount Pleasant said he was eager to talk to ProPublica about the ranch and Deshaun’s stay, but over several weeks he did not make himself available. On the road, Deshaun opened up. “Mom, can I tell you something really amazing?” he asked, backing into a story about being allowed on a recreational trip as a reward for his recent good behavior. “That was the first time I ever had tears of joy in my whole life. I never had that feeling and it’s a great feeling.” Deshaun rambled on, his long tangents of thought sometimes leading to keen, surprising insights about himself and the world around him. He was remarkably self-aware and honest about his condition. Veronice has grown accustomed to these versions of Deshaun. He can be charming and funny and exceedingly polite. His imagination can be vivid, and Veronice over the years has marveled at his natural gift for art – he can make something remarkable out of almost anything, be it bottle caps or duct tape. “Mom didn’t really look that excited to pick me up,” he said to his father on a cellphone, cracking his family up. “The first thing I’m going to do when I get back home is take a warm bath.” Such moments make Veronice want to keep Deshaun home. “And that’s the thing,” Veronice said. “That’s been the most challenging piece. Because when he gets in a program, they go ‘This kid’s going to be a dream. And his family is involved?’ And then, you know...” “Every program he’s been in, he’s never graduated.” Veronice Becton hugs her son Deshaun outside a gas station. She had just retrieved him from his second out-of-state group home placement. (Kim Raff, special to ProPublica) More than 15 years ago, California was shaken by a tragedy that grew out of sending children out of state with little oversight to ensure their safety. On March 2, 1998, a 16-year-old from Sacramento named Nicholas Contreras died at the Arizona Boys Ranch, a “tough-love” boot camp in the desert. In the days prior, the camp’s staff had forced him to endure physical exercises so intense, in heat so extreme, that his body began to rebel against itself. He ultimately collapsed and succumbed to a respiratory infection. His chest cavity had swelled with two-and-a-half quarts of pus. California officials immediately demanded to know why a boy born in the state capital had been sent to Arizona as punishment for a juvenile offense. It turned out Contreras was one of roughly 1,000 California children in who had been sent to boot camps, juvenile detention centers and other programs in other states. California lawmakers quickly discovered the wave of children sent across state lines had been set in motion by two key factors: Juvenile justice judges and probation officials in the state’s 58 counties were appalled by conditions in California’s notoriously violent youth prisons. Sending California’s children out of state seemed safer. Also, it was often cheaper. After Contreras’ death, then-Gov. Pete Wilson signed a bill prohibiting California children from being sent to out-of-state facilities that permitted corporal punishment or barred parental visits. Wilson put the California Department of Social Services in charge of enforcing that mandate, and quickly California children were returned home. But now, the tide has been reversed and the reasons are familiar enough. California’s detention facilities grew so bad they have been all but eradicated. And its group homes proved such failures that the latest reform plan calls for drastically limiting them, as well. The plan pushes responsibility for troubled children back to individual counties, giving them some money to help fund alternatives, though it is unclear if that will be enough. Some counties, challenged to deliver individualized services to children at home, have come to see the financial appeal of sending away children caught up in the juvenile justice system or grappling with profound mental health issues. “We have had an influx of kids that have mental health issues like schizophrenia, or bipolar disorder, or are just highly aggressive. And unfortunately, we just don’t have a lot of facilities here that can handle what we have been seeing,” said Amy Jacobs, deputy probation officer for Stanislaus County in California’s central valley, which sent 16 children to out-of-state group homes this past year. “Lately, when we look to out of state programs, it’s usually because they offer more extensive mental health services,” she said. Representatives of California public school districts, which are responsible for the overwhelming majority of the out-of-state placements, also say it’s an option of last resort. But a last resort that’s being used plenty. No Place for a Kid to Go In Long Beach, California, a group home for troubled children sinks into crisis. Read the story. “We don’t want to send kids out of state,” said Beth Kauffman, director of psychological services at the Los Angeles Unified School District, the largest district in the state. “We try to find the least restrictive settings in our community first.” Kauffman said she’s managed to place fewer children out-of-state in recent years, but there are still some for whom she sees little choice. This past year, she sent away 56, mostly to Utah. The Department of Social Services currently bears some responsibility for monitoring the welfare of the state’s children once they have been sent elsewhere. But ProPublica’s reporting has showed the department often has trouble effectively monitoring the care of children in its own networks of homes and residential facilities. Even when homes are besieged by violence and sexual assaults, regulators have appeared to move slowly and act indecisively. Parents and advocates worry that DSS will struggle to monitor conditions of homes in other states and a review of some recent incidents suggests such worries are warranted. The Rite of Passage Silver State Academy on tribal land in Yerington, Nevada, for instance, has been the site of four riots or major disturbances among residents in the last year. Six months before the first riot, California inspectors visited the facility and gave it high marks. They noted it had "a less tense and volatile environment" than in previous years. An inspector did not visit the home again until Feb. 19, 2015—a full six weeks after there had been violent clashes involving multiple students on back-to-back days in December 2014. The inspector showed up not to investigate the fights, but to find a resident who had complained he was not being adequately fed. By the time the official from California arrived, the resident had already been moved. Nine days later there was another riot. Described in one report as a "student rebellion incident," on the night of February 28, two buildings were set on fire and four workers at the home were injured. The California inspector did not return to the facility for another two weeks. In the meantime, he talked to three former students about the inadequate food claim. "All students stated with confidence that the amount of food is inadequate," said the final report, dated March 16—17 days after the buildings had been burned. Over the next several days, the inspector confirmed a number of other allegations: that the facility lacked enough well-trained staff and that those it employed had too often and too aggressively used restraints to subdue children. Rite of Passage officials did not respond to requests for comment. Michael Weston, a spokesman for the Department of Social Services, said the department acted responsibly in its oversight of the children at the Nevada home. He said that, because of an "enforcement action," the home's administration increased its ratio of staff to children. He said that by June 2015, the facility had reduced the number of children in its care from 120 to 50. Then, in August, it changed leadership. Today, DSS allows teen girls from California to be housed at the facility. Benchmark Behavioral Health systems operates this locked psychiatric facility in Bountiful, Utah. It is Deshaun's latest placement. (Kim Raff, special to ProPublica) Deshaun's latest out-of-state residence is a locked facility in Bountiful, Utah. The facility can house 84 children and is run by a company called Benchmark Behavioral Health Systems. The company's website advertises the facility as a place "high in the Rocky Mountains" that offers "progressive treatment in a beautiful, majestic setting." In reality, the facility is a pink stucco building sandwiched by Interstate 15 and a strip of auto repair shops and pawnshops. Earlier this year, a 25-year-old female mental health worker at the facility was charged with sexual assault for allegedly raping a 16-year-old resident. Benchmark officials did not respond to a request for comment. Kelly Criddle of the Utah Department of Health, which oversees the facility, said state law requires such psychiatric homes to be inspected at least once every five years, and that the Bountiful site had not been inspected by the state since March 2013. He said inspectors did not visit the facility to inquire specifically about the sex abuse charge, opting instead to accept documentation from the facility showing how it planned to address the issue. He said the health department decided the hospital administration did not violate any state laws because it properly responded to the incident. Back in Antioch, the Bectons stand at one more place of uncertainty and apprehension in a 12-year hunt for help. Their home is filled with evidence of the family's enduring devotion to Deshaun. Its walls are adorned with photographs of his smiling face. In one, he horses around with Jonah and Lamont. In another he wears his father's fire helmet. One photograph holds particular meaning. In it, Deshaun is wearing a Batman costume and is staring resolutely through a mask. There is a quote from Martin Luther King inscribed across his chest. It's drawn from a book of sermons published by King in 1963 called "Strength to Love." "The ultimate measure of a man is not where he stands in moments of comfort and convenience, but where he stands at times of challenge and controversy." The Bectons say they will not give up, but their optimism has been badly damaged. The best they can imagine for Deshaun is a life of modest independence and contribution. A simple job. A safe place to sleep. As for the next facility that might assist him in that pursuit, their hopes are even more modest. "I'm not looking for a perfect system for Deshaun," Veronica said. "If I did, I would lose my mind. There is none." Mother Seeks To Press Charges For Alleged Caretaker Abuse At Stillwater Facility Posted: Dec 31, 2015 12:54 PM PST Updated: Dec 31, 2015 4:12 PM PST By Aaron Brilbeck, News 9 Email_Connect_jen.billings@news9.net Share this story on Facebook Tweet this story Plus one this story on Google Plus Email this story Previous ImageEnlargeNext Image 1 / 1 STILLWATER, Oklahoma - A young man with Autism was taken to the hospital Thursday, after his mother says he was brutally beaten by his caretaker. Christopher Leverett, 26, was all smiles as he left the hospital after hours of tests. That's just his nature. But you could see the worry on his mother's face. She said Christopher was attacked by a caretaker in the Stillwater group home where he lived. "Now he flinches if I just raise my finger up just one time" Robin Drinnon said of her son, "And Lord knows what it's done to him inside and he can't tell me." The group home manager noticed the bruising Wednesday and, according to Drinnon, asked the staff "What happened to Christopher? And at that point Nick Butler said to her, I need to speak to you in the other room." According to Human Services documents, the caretaker, Nick Butler said Christopher "Hit me four or five times in the face, and I hit him back. I didn't mean to, and I didn't want to, it was just an instant reflex". There are bruises on both sides of Christopher's face though. Christopher doesn't like to talk about what happened. He just said he's sorry. But Christopher's mother said the guy who hit him is going to be sorry. She has called police and they are investigating. She also said the company that runs the group home also apologized, but, "I'm sorry doesn't fix it. It don't change the fact that someone hurt him. Chris can't take care of himself," said Drinnon. "I mean Chris trusted me to put him somewhere safe. And I honestly thought I had." Ron Hammock with Supported Community Lifestyles, the company that runs the group home, said Christopher has a long history of assaulting staff members, and that his caretaker simply snapped. Hammock said while he empathizes with the caretaker, the caretaker has been fired. Drinnon has taken Christopher to live with her. She wants to hire a lawyer but says she can't afford one now. A GoFundMe account has been set up to help her with legal costs. The system is broken and the problems need to be addressed now, not years down the road after all the appeals have been exhausted and another generation of foster children has aged out of the defective system. Texas must act without delay. Corpus Christi-based U.S. District Judge Janis Graham Jack ruled earlier this month that the state's current system for children in long-term care is unconstitutional. She cited the constant moving of children and their placement in unsafe places. The judge also took the state to task for its failure to hire enough people to handle the workload, improperly tracking abuse, child-on-child abuse and inadequately monitoring foster care facilities. It is not as if any of this should have come as a surprise to Texas and its Department of Family and Protective Services. Recent Headlines Your Turn: January 3 The Trump way — what Constitution? How a suicide bomber is made — a Pakistan story Foster system abuses needs attention now A third condition between urban and non-urban — aBroadway linear park Jack does not mince words in her 255-page ruling about the horrid living conditions some of the state's most vulnerable residents have to endure. She describes a reality most of us cannot image in which "children have been shuttled throughout a system where rape, abuse, psychotropic medication, and instability are the norm." The judge has ordered the state to put an immediate stop to the placement of foster care children in unsafe places such as group homes that do not have someone awake and on duty 24-hours a day. There is much more that needs to be addressed. These problems are not new. Jack points out that the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services has for decades largely ignored reports that detailed the problems and possible solutions to those problems. It looks as if Texas taxpayers may be in for more of the same. A spokeswoman for the Department of Family and Protective Services told the Express-News the agency was disappointed in Jack's ruling and is reviewing its option. An appeal appears inevitable. This has all the appearance of the state simply not caring. And this is unacceptable. Prolonging the court battle serves no real purpose. Instead of spending money to continue to fight the lawsuit brought by Children's Rights, a New York-based advocacy group, the state should invest the funds to fix the problems plaguing the 12,000 children in permanent foster care. Time does not stand still for children in foster care. The system needs immediate fixing. Any judge who has handled child abuse and neglect cases will acknowledge the fact that children who remain in the system for long periods of time

often leave the system in worse condition than when they entered it. There are individualized efforts across the state to address the problem, but it is time for a uniform plan that looks at the bigger picture. In Bexar County, court officials recently announced the creation of a court program aimed at addressing the needs of children who find themselves in the justice system due to abuse and neglect. The goal is to reduce the number of children who end up in foster care by helping their parents tackle problems with mental health, drug and alcohol abuse and domestic violence — along with housing and employment issues — so families can remain intact. The local program is being made possible through the generosity of the Baptist Health Foundation and the Katherine C. Carmody Charitable Trust of San Antonio, which have provided grant funding. Many communities are not as fortunate, and that is why it is important that the state step up and take responsibility for dealing with the broken system. Texas is notorious for exhausting all appeals before begrudgingly doing what the courts have ordered when it finds itself on the losing end of a class action lawsuit. The playbook merits changing. Failure to do so will only continue to have an adverse effect on the state's economic future. That's what is at stake here. Jack lays it out pretty clearly in her ruling. "Years of abuse, neglect, and shuttling between inappropriate placements across the state has created a population that cannot contribute to society, and provides a continued strain on the government through welfare, incarceration, or otherwise. Although some foster children are able to overcome these obstacles, they should not have to," Jack wrote. She is precisely right. The state needs a plan of action to address the problems within the foster care system sooner rather than later. The lives of too many children are at risk. Waiting around and doing nothing until another round of litigation comes to an end should not be an option. Methodist Children's Home to close Jayton facility Ministry cites declining number of children serviced at Sammy Baugh Foster Group Home
Posted: January 1, 2016 - 5:43pm | Updated: January 2, 2016 - 12:07am By JOSIE MUSICO A-J MEDIA JAYTON — Methodist Children's Home is closing its Kent County facility after nine years of operations. The Sammy Baugh Foster Group Home, located in a county-owned building that once served as a senior citizens center, served about 100 children since 2006. The ministry's decision to close that Jayton branch was in response to declining numbers of children served, spokesman Russell Rankin said. Its final weeks of operation saw only about three children. Methodist Children's Home is a Waco-headquartered, faith-based non-profit group. Rankin described the Sammy Baugh home as a partnership between his agency and Kent County; the county provided the building and Methodist its occupants. Young clients attended nearby Jayton schools. "From the beginning, both sides went into this knowing we would operate this as long as there was a need and as long as there was a beneficial endeavor," Rankin said. The agency worked with Child Protective Services, birth families and foster families. An optimal conclusion is for parents to work through the troubles that led to the separation with their children, then get them back. The Sammy Baugh home provided services in the meantime. "That's the ideal situation — for children to be reunited with their families in a healthy manner," Rankin said. Finding qualified new parents to formally adopt children from the program is considered another happy outcome. Others have left the program by graduating Jayton High and becoming legal adults, Rankin said. Kent County commissioners reviewed Methodist Children's Home's resignation letter and inventoried property left at the facility. "We were blessed with nine years of it," County Judge Jim White said. "We wished it could continue longer, but we realized that based on bureaucracy rules and regulations, it made it difficult to continue." Jayton is a tiny town about an hour and a half east of Lubbock. Certain health care and other services are limited, and no other major metropolitan area is much closer. While he misses the children and staff, White admits taking them to frequent out-of-town visits to doctors and counselors could be inconvenient. "We had over 100 children that came through it and blessed our community, and we hope that these children and these families realize the world is not entirely dysfunctional — that there's love out there for them," he said. josephine.musico@lubbockonline.com • 766-8796 Source: <http://lubbockonline.com/local-news/2016-01-01/methodist-childrens-home-close-jayton-facility>

A Primer on the Damaging Movement to Privatize Public Schools Friday, 08 January 2016 00:00 By Marion Brady, The Washington Post | Op-Ed font size decrease font size increase font size Print 36 Email (Photo: Abandoned School via Shutterstock) When, about 30 years ago, corporate interests began their highly organized, well-funded effort to privatize public education, you wouldn't have read or heard about it. They didn't want to trigger the debate that such a radical change in an important institution warranted. If, like most pundits and politicians, you've supported that campaign, it's likely you've been snookered. Here's a quick overview of the snookering process. The Pitch Talking Points: (a) Standardized testing proves America's schools are poor. (b) Other countries are eating our lunch. (c) Teachers deserve most of the blame. (d) The lazy ones need to be forced out by performance evaluations. (e) The dumb ones need scripts to read or "canned standards" telling them exactly what to teach. (f) The experienced ones are too set in their ways to change and should be replaced by fresh Five-Week-Wonders from Teach for America. (Bonus: Replacing experienced teachers saves a ton of money.) (g) Public ("government") schools are a step down the slippery slope to socialism. Tactics Education establishment resistance to privatization is inevitable, so (a) avoid it as long as possible by blurring the lines between "public" and "private." (b) Push school choice, vouchers, tax write-offs, tax credits, school-business partnerships, profit-driven charter chains. (c) When resistance comes, crank up fear with the, "They're eating our lunch!" message. (d) Contribute generously to all potential resisters - academic publications, professional organizations, unions, and school support groups such as PTA. (e) Create fake "think tanks," give them impressive names, and have them do "research" supporting privatization. (f) Encourage investment in teacher-replacer technology - internet access, iPads, virtual schooling, MOOCs, etc. (e) Pressure state legislators to make life easier for profit-seeking charter chains by taking approval decisions away from local boards and giving them to easier-to-lobby state-level bureaucrats. (g) Elect the "right" people at all levels of government. (When they're campaigning, have them keep their privatizing agenda quiet.) Weapon If you'll read the fine-print disclaimers on high-stakes standardized tests, you'll see how grossly they're being misused, but they're the key to privatization. The general public, easily impressed by numbers and mathematical razzle-dazzle, believes competition is the key to quality, so want quality quantified even though it can't be done. Machine-scored tests don't measure quality. They rank. It's hard to rank unlike things so it's necessary to standardize. That's what the Common Core State Standards do. To get the job done quickly, Bill Gates picked up the tab, important politicians signed off on them, and teachers were handed them as a done deal. The standards make testing and ranking a cinch. They also make making billions a cinch. Manufacturers can use the same questions for every state that has adopted the standards or facsimiles thereof. If challenged, test fans often quote the late Dr. W. Edward Deming, the world-famous quality guru who showed Japanese companies how to build better stuff than anybody else. In his book, "The New Economics," Deming wrote, "If you can't measure it, you can't manage it." Here's the whole sentence as he wrote it: "It is wrong to suppose that if you can't measure it, you can't manage it - a costly myth." Operating the Weapon What's turned standardized testing into a privatizing juggernaut are pass-fail "cut scores" set by politicians. Saying kids need to be challenged, they set the cut score high enough to fail many (sometimes most) kids. When the scores are published, they point to the high failure rate to "prove" public schools can't do the job and should be closed or privatized. Clever, huh? The privatizing machinery is in place. Left alone, it'll gradually privatize most, but not all, public schools. Those that serve the poorest, the sickest, the disabled, the most troubled, the most expensive to educate - those will stay in what's left of the public schools. Weapon Malfunction Look at standardized tests from the kids' perspective. Test items (a) measure recall of secondhand, standardized, delivered information, or (b) require a skill to be demonstrated, or (c) reward an ability to second-guess whoever wrote the test item. Because kids didn't ask for the information, because the skill they're being asked to demonstrate rarely has immediate practical use, and because they don't give a tinker's dam what the test-item writer thinks, they have zero emotional investment in what's being tested. As every real teacher knows, no emotional involvement means no real learning. Period. What makes standardized tests look like they work is learner emotion, but it's emotion that doesn't have anything to do with learning. The ovals get penciled in to avoid trouble, to please somebody, to get a grade, or to jump through a bureaucratic hoop to be eligible to jump through another bureaucratic hoop. When the pencil is laid down, what's tested, having no perceived value, automatically erases from memory. Before You Write... If you want to avoid cranking out the usual amateurish drivel about standardized testing that appears in the op-eds, editorials, and syndicated columns of the mainstream media, ask yourself a few questions about the testing craze: (a) Should life-altering decisions hinge on the scores of commercially produced tests not open to public inspection? (b) How wise is it to only teach what machines can measure? (c) How fair is it to base any part of teacher pay on scores from tests that can't evaluate complex thought? (d) Are tests that have no "success in life" predictive power worth the damage they're doing? Here's a longer list of problems you should think about before you write. Perspective America's schools have always struggled - an inevitable consequence, first, of a decision in 1893 to narrow and standardize the high school curriculum and emphasize college prep; second, from a powerful strain of individualism in our national character that eats away support for public institutions; third, from a really sorry system of institutional organization. Politicians, not educators, make education policy, basing it on the simplistic conventional wisdom that educating means "delivering information." In fact, educating is the most complex and difficult of all professions. Done right, teaching is an attempt to help the young align their beliefs, values, and assumptions more closely with what's true and real, escape the bonds of ethnocentrism, explore the wonders and potential of humanness, and become skilled at using thought processes that make it possible to realize those aims. Historically, out of the institution's dysfunctional organizational design came schools with lots of problems, but with one redeeming virtue. They were "loose." Teachers had enough autonomy to do their thing. So they did, and the kids that some of them coached brought America far more than its share of patents, scholarly papers, scientific advances, international awards, and honors. Notwithstanding their serious problems, America's public schools were once the envy of the world. Now, educators around that world shake their heads in disbelief (or maybe cheer?) as we spend billions of dollars to standardize what once made America great - un-standardized thought. A salvage operation is still (barely) possible, but not if politicians, prodded by pundits, continue to do what they've thus far steadfastly refused to do - listen to people who've actually worked with real students in real classrooms, and did so long enough and thoughtfully enough to know something about teaching. Report finds Mississippi foster care system still worsening Posted on January 7, 2016 by Daily Journal in News By Jeff Amy Associated Press JACKSON – A new report finds that Mississippi's child welfare system continues to deteriorate, raising the stakes for state government's effort to stave off a federal judge from taking over the system. The report, covering the year that ended June 30, is the second in a row to find the state is backsliding in efforts to meet settlement obligations in a long-running Olivia Y federal lawsuit. The case is named after a then-young girl who was one of eight children who lawyers said had been abused because of the state's failures. Performance declined in all but one of 13 regions, and none met even half the 19 standards. "It's as if these children are out there in a forest or a desert with no kind of structure around them," said Marcia Lowry, one of the lead lawyers for plaintiffs in the case. Gov. Phil Bryant in December named former Supreme Court Justice David Chandler to lead the Division of Family and Children's Services, ordering the unit of the Department of Human Services to report directly to him. He also pledged to increase funding. "The governor understands that the system is broken and that drastic improvement must be made to avoid federal takeover," spokesman Knox Chandler wrote in an email. "Justice Chandler and Gov. Bryant will work tirelessly to ensure Mississippi's foster children receive the best care and comfort. They deserve nothing less." The report, by court-appointed monitor Grace Lopes, delves deeply into an infant who died five days after entering state custody in early 2015. The infant died while sleeping in bed with the foster parents, a prohibited practice. The foster parents' own child had died the same way earlier, and complaints about their care for two sets of foster children were received in 2014. The department placed the infant without inspecting the foster parents' new home, and didn't know the foster mother had lost her job and had been convicted of a crime. The report also faulted the state for how it handled the investigation afterward, saying files in the case were difficult to follow and a death review panel made recommendations without documenting how they would prevent a recurrence. "There does not appear to be any systematic way in which the DFCS responds to and reviews cases in which there is a fatality of a child in custody," wrote a consultant hired by Lopes. In the wake of the child's death, the department also disclosed that local officials weren't following rules on training foster families, and had pushed 132 foster families through one-day training sessions, instead of training them over weeks as required by state policy. The report said the system was pressured by a 26 percent increase in children in state custody from mid-2013 to mid-2015, placing "significant strain on the agency's understaffed workforce, contributing to a decline in defendants' performance." In Hinds, Harrison, Jackson and Hancock counties, 64 percent of caseworkers and supervisors carried a caseload that exceeded settlement mandates. In Mississippi's other 78 counties, 48 percent of caseworkers and supervisors carried a caseload exceeding requirements. Lopes said increasing populations don't bear all the blame. The monitor said the state has struggled with "demonstrable shortcomings" in management and accountability. Foster care scandal deepens: 'Every single staff person has a criminal record' 1 / 3 DHS hearing Donna Keddy, the Oregon Department of Human Services' licensing and regulatory oversight director, testifies before a Senate panel looking at foster-care legislation on Nov. 16, 2015, at the Capitol in Salem. "At a site visit last week, numerous concerns arose (on top of the fact that they aren't licensed) — the most serious of which is that every single staff person has a criminal record," Erin Kelley-Siel wrote to the Department of Human Services' director, Bruce Goldberg. "I know you've had extensive involvement in the past with issues concerning [Give Us This Day] — are you currently in discussions with them?" continued Kelley-Siel, who later led the department from 2011 to 2015. "I want to make sure our activities support yours. Thoughts or suggestions on how to proceed?" The department eventually stopped placing children at Give Us This Day — but not until almost seven years later, after allegations emerged that the provider had misspent nearly \$2 million in state funding. Sen. Sara Gelser, who's pushing for tougher oversight of Oregon's child welfare system, released Kelley-Siel's email amid hundreds of pages of records in advance of a key legislative hearing next week on her proposals. The details revealed in those records show senior officials knew of significant troubles at Give Us This Day years earlier than previously reported. And they knew of problems in time to have avoided the money issues and allegations of abuse that arose later. The records also add to disturbing questions about state officials' willingness and ability to crack down on troubled providers. Just months after the 2009 discussions about Give Us This Day, department leaders announced a review of their handling of abuse cases — following high-profile allegations that caseworkers in Washington County had ignored reports of abuse allegations for more than a decade. Oregon has paid millions of dollars in settlements involving abuse, in some cases fatal, over the past several years. Costly allegations: Click here to see a list of the state's 12 most expensive abuse settlements. "We need a very significant culture change," said Gelser, D-Corvallis, who's working up bills that would give officials more power to investigate abuse claims and close providers accused of neglect. "All of the right things were being said in public. But behind the curtain, decisions were being made to sacrifice the safety of kids," Gelser said. "That's not a red flag. That's a giant neon sign." Give Us This Day's financial troubles were first reported by Willamette Week in September. Later that month, a former Give Us This Day employee sat before the Senate's human services committee and said the provider failed to provide food and clean bedding, rewrote reports, tolerated mold and rodents, and let workers use improper force. Gov. Kate Brown ousted the Department of Human Services' interim director in November and announced a review of Oregon's foster care system. Brown later told lawmakers her review would focus on abuse investigations, licensing practices and how the department shares warning signs. An advisory group, including lawmakers and advocates, is set to meet for the second time this month, a spokeswoman for Brown's office said. Last month, after changes by Brown's handpicked human services director, officials pulled kids from a Clackamas County provider. Youth Villages, amid complaints of supervision so poor that teenagers were allowed to engage in sexual contact. Youth Villages announced last month it was closing the residential program in question. Another provider, the Scotts Valley School south of Eugene, received a letter from the state that mentioned children enduring hunger, bedbug bites, vulgar nicknames such as "orphan whore" and punishment that involved silently facing a wall for 12 hours a day. Gelser said the latest documents on Give Us This Day, which she obtained in a public records request, put an exclamation point on her argument that state law must change to help stop further abuse. One of Gelser's bills would tighten licensing requirements and financial rules, and give regulators the power to suspend a provider's license over abuse claims and other safety violations. Now, providers can keep their license if they're "substantially" in compliance, even if regulators have repeatedly confirmed abuse and neglect. For example, messages sent between 2009 and 2014 show back-and-forth discussions over licensing, abuse complaints, worries about poor care and supervision, problems with cleanliness and hunger, and "concerns about financial management and cash flow." Despite those concerns, officials in June 2013 recommended keeping the state's contract with Give Us This Day — swayed by the provider's "willingness to take almost any child any time" and its "experience with children and families of color." Officials have repeatedly said they turned to Give Us This Day because it accepted troubled children other providers turned away. "That is not an acceptable reason," Gelser said Thursday. "Those decisions impacted the safety of every other licensed provider. It gutted the power and the authority of the licensing agency to actually hold providers accountable." Gelser warned of another possible hit from Give Us This Day: penalties over Medicaid fraud. On Nov. 13, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services issued a subpoena for all state records dealing with Give Us This Day since 2007. Gelser said officials may have broken the law by paying Give Us This Day despite knowing "on multiple occasions" that it lacked a license. She said the inquiry could come with "a big bill" and, potentially, federal criminal charges. "I hope people are held accountable," she said. "Kids were hurt." — Denis C. The doors to Attollo Boys Group Home at 3900 Chandler Road closed its doors Dec. 18, MCCOYS Interim Director Cindy Perkins said. "We evaluated what programs we have, and we decided to reduce our child welfare residential programs that provide long-term care," Perkins said. "And we thought we'd focus our efforts on short-term residential services." Preceding the closure was an inordinate number of calls for police to the group home, mostly for missing persons, according to police reports. "Anytime someone would go AWOL, we had to call," Perkins said. For a three-month period starting in August, there were three runaway juvenile reports and two assaults. From about Nov. 6 to Dec. 7, there were 30 reports for missing or runaway juveniles, at least three assaults, one burglary and one report of vandalism, according to police reports. "It would take me awhile to calculate how many calls we have at Attollo boys home, but in general it's been two to three times a week for a while, sometimes less," Muskogee Police Department Public Information Officer Lincoln Anderson said. "The biggest issue with responding to a place repeatedly, especially in a situation such as that one, is that it isn't fixing the problem." The children and teenagers who were housed at the group home were either placed into other facilities or returned home, Perkins said. Back in October 2014, MCCOYS purchased the facility, a former church, under the impression it was zoned for commercial use. Former director of MCCOYS Mark Winters spearheaded the effort to rezone the property, which was voted down by the city council on Oct. 8, 2014. Miami foster group home under scrutiny for video of kids fighting Judge rips into child welfare providers for provoking "cockfight" Lawyers for other parents will attend Wednesday hearing called by judge Home operator, DCF say they are reviewing incident, safety protocols Judge Michael A. Hanzman has called a hearing on a group home where two foster children were encouraged to fight. Roberto Koltun El Nuevo Herald i By David O'valle dovalle@miamiherald.com LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story A Miami group home for foster children is under fire after a video circulated on social media showing two 11-year-old boys in a violent brawl — egged on by the facility's adult supervisor as other kids cheered. "I saw a cockfight ... between foster kids," Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Michael Hanzman said in court last week, describing the video as showing the employee "provoking and encouraging violence" while "these two boys battled it out and beat each other up." In extraordinarily blunt language, the judge blasted Children's Home Society of Florida, a statewide company that runs 11 foster homes in Miami-Dade. Children's Home Society has a contract to operate the group homes through Our Kids of Miami-Dade, a nonprofit child welfare agency itself under contract to the Florida Department of Children and Families. "What is really sad is these kids are abused, abandoned and neglected. And then they get taken from their parents. They come in expecting refuge," the judge said. "And what they are subjected to is more abuse and neglect at the hands of ineptitude, and agencies who throw them in these group homes with incompetent people who stand around watching them have cockfights." The brawl led to one of the kids being beaten and then hospitalized against his will for psychiatric treatment. The Children's Home Society employee has now been fired while DCF investigates whether the episode amounts to child abuse. Another court hearing is to be held on Wednesday as lawyers for some of the parents of foster children seek to be included in the legal proceedings involving Children's Home Society group homes. There is reason "to believe that the incident in the case is not isolated, and that all of the children in the care of CHS are potentially in danger of similar abuse," Eugene Zenobi, head of the publicly funded Regional Counsel office, wrote in a motion filed to the court Friday. The two children — known only by their initials J.W. and N.L. — have since been moved out of the group home. The court motion filed by the Regional Counsel office said one of the kids was "severely beaten" during the brawl. "We are working in partnership with Our Kids to review the matter and provide solutions/improvements," Maggie Dante, the Southeast executive director of Children's Home Society, said in a statement to the Miami Herald. "The employee was terminated and did acknowledge that she did not follow our de-escalation protocols." A DCF spokeswoman said the agency is "working closely with Our Kids to make certain all necessary steps are taken to ensure the safety and well-being of the children." Jackie Gonzalez, the CEO of Our Kids, acknowledged the "troubling matters raised in court" and said all three agencies are "conducting a thorough review" of the incident. The judge's venting is nothing new. Over the past several years, Hanzman has repeatedly chided DCF and its contracted agencies for failing to provide proper services to children under state care. Much of his anger last week was directed toward Children's Home Society, the longtime private Florida child welfare agency that oversees 100,000 children in 67 counties. The agency made news in July when Microsoft awarded it $7.2 million in grants to help train employees and disadvantaged youth with the latest technology. The judge made no decisions last week — although he hinted at one course of action. "Are you going to shut down this group home or do you want me to do it for you?" he angrily asked. Many of the details of the case, such as the location of the foster-care group home or the identity of the suspended staffer, have yet to be made public. Exactly how the video made its way to authorities remains unclear but Hanzman learned about the case Dec. 21 when J.W., who was supposed to receive Christmas gifts at a court hearing, missed the appointment because he was in the hospital. According to the testimony in court, J.W. at some point had apparently been "hit with a heavy object" thrown by the other child. Instead of stopping the fight, the staffer "told them, quote, 'Go ahead and fight it out,'" Hanzman recalled, according to a transcript of the hearing. The fight continued unabated as a ring of other boys cheered and hollered, even as the staffer summoned police. "I think that that person lost her composure," Dante said. "Oh she was very composed," the judge retorted. "She encouraged the kids to fight. She said, go ahead and fight, just don't use weapons. Let's have a fight. She circled everybody around. Got the kids all riled up." Said Dante later: "This one particular staffer is not a reflection of the work we do everyday with these children." After the staffer summoned police, officers committed J.W. against his will to a hospital for days for psychiatric evaluation under the state's Baker Act. Hanzman said the staffer clearly "lied to" officers about what happened. "This kid is going to be labeled as having a mental illness his whole life. Probably won't be able to get a job," he said. "All because you have a stupid, inept case worker at your facility that encourages 11-year-olds to engage in brutal violence and stands around watching and cheering." Hanzman also raised concerns about the group homes having enough staffers at each group home and that Children's Home Society reported the suspected child abuse first and only to DCF, not police. Foster Care Company's "Abnormal Level Of Lobbying" Aram Roston BuzzFeed News Reporter Tweet Tumblr Stumble Bookmark it View this image The for-profit company, Mentor, placed 2-year old Alexandria Hill with a troubled foster mother the firm had recruited and trained, who murdered her. Milam County District Attorney ID: 7742460 A company under investigation by the powerful Senate Finance Committee for its practices in privatized for-profit child foster care has hired a phalanx of expensive and high-powered lobbyists and lawyers, including former staffers for the senators leading the probe. One of the lobbyists, Josh Kardon, used to serve as chief of staff for Democratic Senator Ron Wyden (Oregon), the ranking member of the finance committee. Another lobbyist, Makan Delrahim, used to advise Republican Senator Orrin Hatch (Utah), the committee chairman. The for-profit firm markets itself as "The Mentor Network," though it trades on the New York stock exchange under the name Civitas Solutions. Senate staffers said the investigation is moving ahead and that the company's lobbying blitz won't affect it. Still, one staffer acknowledged that lobbying on this scale, though routine in fields such as defense contracting or banking, is rare in foster care, which few people realize is a profitable business to companies such as Mentor. "For this industry, this is an abnormal level of lobbying," he said. Hatch and Wyden first signed a letter demanding information from Mentor in June 2015. That came after a BuzzFeed News series on a string of child deaths and abuses at the foster homes run by Mentor. The series disclosed how the firm has turned the business of foster care into a cash cow, with double digit profits in some states. It's paid by states to place children, recruit and train foster parents, and even hire the social workers who are supposed to work with children and monitor foster parents. In one grisly case in Texas, Mentor had received multiple warnings that Sherrill Small should not be a foster mother. Yet Mentor placed two-year-old Alexandria Hill in her care. Small swung her by her feet into the floor, killing the little girl. In Maryland, at a grim Mentor foster home compound called "Last Chance Farm," foster children were serially abused by their Mentor foster father for over a decade, while the company allegedly ignored repeated red flags. Sarah Magazine, the company spokesperson, emailed BuzzFeed News a statement that read in part, "We appreciate the interest of the Senate Finance Committee in the important work done every day by our nation's foster care systems." However, the company's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission show worries about the Senate investigation. "It is both costly and time consuming for us to comply with these inquiries," according to the most recent Civitas Solutions annual report. "It is possible that the inquiries could result in negative publicity or other negative action that could harm our reputation.” A firm named Capitol Counsel registered in November to lobby for Mentor, and listed Kardon, who worked with Wyden for 17 years, as one of the two lobbyists who would work on “Issues related to Title IV-E foster care contracts.” (Title IV-E foster care is federally subsidized.) Kardon is considered so close to Wyden that when he left Wyden’s office in 2011 to move to K street, the Oregonian said he had been the senator’s “alter-ego.” Kardon wrote in an email to BuzzFeed News that “when Mentor called I jumped at the opportunity to work with an organization dedicated to the cause of providing the best possible care for all foster kids.” Josh Kardon is seen in an undated Facebook photo. Facebook / Via facebook.com ID: 7749901 Samantha Offerdahl, a spokesperson for Wyden, said Kardon would not be able to influence the probe. “It doesn’t change anything from the committee’s standpoint. Senator Wyden worked with Senator Hatch to initiate the investigation and he’s continuing to doggedly pursue the facts until the investigation is complete.” The company also brought in a lobbyist with a past connection to Senator Hatch. It retained the lobbying firm Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck in July, shortly after the senators began their investigation. As a registered lobbyist for Mentor, the firm listed Delrahim, a former Justice Department official who also once worked as staff director of the Senate Judiciary Committee under then-chairman Hatch. Delrahim’s bio says he was a “principal legal and policy advisor” on judiciary matters to Hatch. View this image ; Makan Delrahim is seen in this file photo from 2000. Former advisor to Sen. Bush. He is now a partner at WilmerHale, where he oversees the firm’s “congressional investigations practice”. Brown declined to comment. Although Mentor got its start as a for-profit foster care company in the 1980s, it has expanded into other lines of business, such as group homes and caring for the developmentally disabled, and it uses the umbrella term “human services” to describe its business. And while the former Hatch and Wyden staffers were brought on board after Hatch and Wyden announced their investigation, federal lobbying is nothing new for the company. It has spent $1.6 million on lobbyists since 2006. The firm’s filings with the SEC emphasize that almost all of its revenue for “human services” comes from state, local, and federal agencies. “To facilitate our ability to procure or retain government-sponsored contracts,” the firm wrote, “we rely in part on establishing and maintaining relationships with officials of various government agencies, primarily at the state and local level but also including federal agencies.” In 2014, the firm announced it was giving an award called the “Ripple of Hope” to Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, the independent who then chaired the U.S. Senate Committee on Veterans’ Affairs, and is now running for president. A spokesman says Sanders does not know Mentor and doesn’t remember receiving the award. Mentor has been doing some work with the VA, in a business where it tends to veterans with Traumatic Brain Injury. State Releases Investigation Log for Troubled Foster Care Provider Give Us This Day Documents show numerous and longstanding allegations of abuse and neglect. By Nigel Jaquiss Updated January 12 at 3:56 PM Published January 12 at 11:19 AM The Oregon Department of Human Services has finally released documents detailing more than a decade of complaints and allegations involving the now-defunct Portland foster care provider Give Us This Day. DHS, which was responsible for funding and regulating Give Us This Day, previously refused to provide such information to WW, claiming allegations of abuse and the investigations into such allegations were not a public record. The agency’s position shifted after a series of stories by WW and other media about Give Us This Day and after Sen. Sara Gelser (D-Corvallis), the chair of the Senate Human Services Committee, filed a series of public records requests of her own. The 40 pages of documents released today today show years of allegations and complaints, involving claims of physical abuse; sexual assault; various kinds of violence; lack of food; filthy living conditions; staff lacking training but possessing criminal records and a litany of other problems. Some of the allegations were sustained by investigators. Many were not, although the notable characteristic is how numerous and consistent the complaints have been since 2001. As long ago as May 2005, for instance, state officials, the Portland Police Bureau and Give Us This Day met because police service at Give Us This Day facilities and foster homes were so prevalent that DHS said calls to the police were reaching a “public nuisance” level. (That continued. Between 2005 and 2015, records show, police responded to Give Us This Day facilities more than 1,000 times). Give Us This Day promised to do better but in August 2005, the state responded to a complaint that a Give Us This Day staff member “with a serious criminal history, including sex offending, compelling prostitution of a minor, rape and possession of a weapon.” Give Us This Day fired that employee but overall problems continued. In an October 2005 letter, DHS issued Give Us This Day a stern warning “due to the high number of complaints and concerns received (over 30 in less than 12 months) regarding treatment of children in Give Us Day.” The Oregon Department of Justice finally forced Give Us This Day to cease operations last October, after finding the organization wasted or diverted more than $2 million. The Senate Human Services Committee will hold its third hearing on DHS’ handling of Give Us This Day Thursday morning at 8 am. The rancher estimated that more than 50 boys, often coming from group homes, drug rehabs, and psychiatric institutions, have lived with them in the past decade. “My ranch has been a great tool for these boys,” Fincum said. “It has done a lot of good.” (Last week, Fincum traveled between the Malheur Wildlife Refuge, in southeastern Oregon, and Utah, as part of a press tour. “We went fast, and came back fast,” he told OPB. “I doubt [law enforcement] even knew we were gone. He said a social worker removed the first of them on January 4th, just a few days after the occupation began, and the last was removed on January 9th. He blamed “pressure from the feds,” who “must have gotten to the governor, who told the state to get them out of there.” From OPB: Sponsored That represents an enormous loss of income for the Fincums. According to a 2010 tax filing, Catholic Charities paid the family $115,343 to foster children in 2009. That year, foster parents were compensated between \$22.31 and \$37.49 per child, per day, meaning if the Fincums were paid at the maximum rate, they cared for, on average, eight children per day in 2009. “That was my main source of income,” Fincum said. “My ranch, well, the cows just cover the costs of the ranch. If this means rice and beans for the next few years, so be it. We’re going to stay the course.” Since then, Catholic Charities has increased payments for foster care significantly, but it does not itemize the dollar amount the Fincums were paid in subsequent years. Elite Rhode Island boarding school stayed silent on sex abuse cases for decades Some alumni have charged that St. George’s School hushed up the abuse to protect its lofty reputation. By and DENISE LAVOIE/The Associated Press Share 3 Comments Read Article MIDDLETOWN, R.I. — For more than a century, St. George’s School has been part of the pedigree of some of America’s richest and most influential families. Astors, Vanderbilts and Bushes have attended the exclusive boarding school, where students can go sailing, play on world-class squash courts or simply enjoy a sweeping view of the sea from the hilltop campus. But since at least the 1970s, leaders at St. George’s kept a secret. Dozens of former students say they were raped or molested by employees or schoolmates at the exclusive St. George’s School in Middletown, R.I., over the past 40 years. The charges began to come to light when a Boston Globe article reported on one of the alleged victims. The Associated Press Anne Scott, of Charlottesville, Va., left, and Katie Wales Lovkay, of Granby, Conn., right, who stated they were sexually assaulted at St. George’s School as students, face reporters at a news conference in Boston earlier this month. The Associated Press Search photos available for purchase: Photo Store → Dozens of former students have come forward to say they were raped or molested by employees and schoolmates over the past four decades. St. George’s acknowledged in a report it issued shortly before Christmas that it repeatedly failed to notify police and child welfare authorities as required by law. The school's current leadership has characterized the abuse as a problem of the past and said it discovered the extent of the misconduct only recently. But many accusers have disputed that, and much of their anger has fallen on Eric Peterson, headmaster since 2004. Peterson was told in 2004, 2006, 2011, 2012 and 2015 about numerous allegations of abuse, according to interviews with alumni and documents obtained by The Associated Press. Many alumni are calling on Peterson to step down. Some want the entire board swept clean. "It's like a charade of arrogant exceptionalism that is endemic in the school, in the leadership of the school," said Hawk Cramer, an alumnus who says he was molested by the choir director in the 1980s and told Peterson about it in 2004. SILENCE PROTECTED REPUTATION? Some alumni have charged that the school's leaders hushed up the abuse to protect the reputation of St. George's, which was founded in 1896 and counts among its graduates the poet Ogden Nash, the late Sen. Claiborne Pell and Fox News commentator Tucker Carlson. The $56,000-a-year Episcopal institution just outside Newport has about 400 high school-age students and a rich endowment of more than $140 million. A spokeswoman for both the school and Peterson declined to comment on specific allegations, citing an independent investigation underway. St. George's previously issued a statement apologizing "for the harm done to alumni by former employees and former students." The statement added, "We also apologize that the way in which the school addressed these incidents has served to compound this harm." Separately, Rhode Island state police are looking into possible sex-crime charges and other offenses, including failure to report abuse. There is no statute of limitations on rape in Rhode Island. The problems at St. George's burst into view in mid-December, about a week before the in-house report was issued, when The Boston Globe reported the story of Anne Scott, who said she was repeatedly raped by athletic trainer Al Gibbs as a 15-year-old in the 1970s. She sued the school as "Jane Doe" in 1988. St. George's tried and failed to reveal her identity publicly and aggressively fought the case, even though her lawyer, Eric MacLeish, says evidence emerged during the lawsuit that Gibbs had assaulted four other girls. Scott dropped the case the following year, receiving nothing, and agreed to a gag order preventing her from speaking about it. More such allegations quietly piled up in following years. It was not until last spring that St. George's sent a letter informing the entire school community about possible sexual misconduct "many years ago" and asking graduates to report anything they knew. In November, the school reported allegations of abuse to the Rhode Island state police for the first time. MacLeish, a St. George's alumnus and a lead lawyer in the Boston Catholic Church sex abuse lawsuits, said he is aware of at least 40 people who say they were abused at the school and 12 alleged abusers, either employees or students. The most recent misconduct alleged dates to 2004. FIRINGS AND FORCE-OUTS The school did take some action over the years, firing or forcing out three teachers in the 1970s and '80s, according to its December report. They were: - Gibbs, who was fired in 1980 and died in 1996. The school acknowledged he raped or otherwise abused at least 17 students. It did not report any misconduct to child welfare authorities until 1989, in the course of Scott's lawsuit. The agency said it had no authority to act because the alleged victims were over 18. - The Rev. Howard "Howdy" White, who abruptly left in 1974 after a parent accused him of inappropriate sexual conduct with a student. The school said White abused at least three students. White refused to comment when reached by the AP. CHARGES NOT FILED - Franklin Coleman, the choir director, who was fired in 1988 after student complaints of molestation and other inappropriate behavior. The school said it did not notify child welfare authorities on the advice of its legal counsel. MacLeish said he has now spoken to six of Coleman's alleged victims. Coleman did not return messages seeking comment. Neither White nor Coleman has ever been charged. Both went on to other schools around the U.S. before retiring several years ago. One graduate said he was molested by Coleman in 1987 during an overnight trip to Boston. The man told the AP that he reported it to the school the following year, after he learned Coleman had asked another boy to sleep in his bed during a choir tour. The man said he spoke with Peterson's predecessor as headmaster, Charles Hamblet, and met with Peterson in 2006 to discuss the abuse. Both Hamblet and Peterson offered to pay for therapy, which he accepted. "This offer is an attempt to right a wrong," Peterson wrote to the man in a 2006 letter obtained by the AP. He added that the school's willingness to pay for therapy was "in no way an admission of responsibility." Dan Brewster, a 1974 graduate, went on to serve on the board of trustees in the early 1990s. He said that then-headmaster Hamblet and Howard Dean, a former board chairman and father of the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, told him that in some past cases of teachers accused of abuse, the school would quietly let the educator go with a lump-sum payment, a nondisclosure clause and an agreement barring the faculty member from taking a job at another boarding school. Brewster said that when he asked why the school didn't notify parents and the authorities, the two men replied that teenagers might be dragged in to testify and that their parents might also bring an "avalanche of lawsuits" against the school. Hamblet and Dean are now dead. "I do believe they were honestly wrestling and did care about an obviously difficult issue. I also felt they came to the wrong conclusion," Brewster said. "It was because the prestige and the fundraising capacity of the school was more important than any one kid." ONCE AGAIN, POLICE NEVER NOTIFIED In the 2004 case, three students reported to then-Dean of Students Tim Richards that a teacher "was touching them in ways that made them uncomfortable," according to Richards' spokeswoman, Karen Schwartzman. Richards investigated and the teacher was placed on leave, but the authorities weren't notified. Peterson told Richards that he talked to outside legal counsel and was advised that the school was not required to contact authorities, the spokeswoman said. Another alumnus, Harry Groome, said he was raped by an upperclassman with a broomstick in 1978 in front of at least five students. In 2002, Groome said, he sent a letter to Hamblet describing what happened. Hamblet thanked him, but nothing else happened, Groome said. "I want this school to thrive in the future, but it cannot thrive until we flush out the bad, and Eric Peterson has got to go," Groome said. "This stuff can't go on anymore. It's ruined lives." The hidden harms of the US foster-care system The hidden harms of the US foster-care system January 22, 2016 6.02am EST Lenette Azzi-Lessing Author Lenette Azzi-Lessing Associate Professor of Social Work, Wheelock College Disclosure statement Lenette Azzi-Lessing does not work for, consult, own shares in or receive funding from any company or organization that would benefit from this article, and has disclosed no relevant affiliations beyond the academic appointment above. Children in the U.S. foster care system can languish for years. Firestorms regarding child-protective systems have become sadly commonplace, occurring recently in Massachusetts, Colorado and Florida. Elected officials and the general public often don't pay much attention to child protection systems until a child dies in a family known to the state agency charged with protecting children at risk. Having worked - in both the programmatic and policy arenas - to improve the US child protective system for more than 25 years, I am sadly familiar with the pattern. When such tragedies occur, political leaders express outrage. The media shines a glaring light on the various systemic holes through which yet another vulnerable child has fallen. Some may express outrage that the child wasn't removed from the dangerous home sooner and placed in foster care - the intended social safety net for children who are unable to live with their birth parents. However, such a sentiment ignores the fact that foster care harbors its own threats to the safety and well-being of vulnerable children. Children languish for years in foster care In 2014, 415,000 children in the United States spent time in the foster care system. This system works best when used to provide nurturing, short-term care to vulnerable children until a family crisis can be resolved and they can return safely home, or until a child can be placed with a permanent adoptive family. For many children, however, foster care is anything but short term. The average length of time children spend in foster care is just over a year and a half. About 30 percent remain in temporary care for more than two years. In 2014, 64,300 children had been stuck in the foster care system for more than 3 years, 28,000 of them for 5 years or more. Languishing in foster care harms children's wellbeing in a number of ways. The longer a child remains in temporary care, the more likely he or she will experience multiple placement changes and the disrupted relationships caused by such changes. Unfortunately, more than 40 percent of children placed in foster care are moved to a different foster home or care facility - such as shelter or group home - at least once during their first six months in state custody. More than one third of children who remain in foster care for one to two years experience three or more changes of placement, as do two thirds of those remaining in the system for two years or longer. Studies suggest that as many as 70 percent of placement changes have nothing to do with improving the wellbeing of the children moved. An investigation by Sigrid James in the Social Service Review found that the majority of changes are made to implement policy and system mandates, such as when child welfare workers fail to place siblings in the same foster home from the start, and are later forced to move the children into a single foster home to comply with federal mandates. Placement moves also commonly occur when children are initially placed in a short-term foster home or shelter, and must be moved to a long-term foster home. In addition to such policy compliance moves, children are also commonly removed from foster homes because the foster parents were found to be unprepared to meet their needs. A system with more appropriate foster homes and care facilities to meet the diverse and complex needs of the children in their custody could minimize these placement changes. The consequences of multiple moves Disruptions make it difficult for children to form the kind of stable attachments that undergird healthy social and emotional development. This is an especially grave concern for children ages five and under - by far the largest group of children in foster care - given the critical role that strong and stable early life attachments play in healthy human development. For children of all ages, multiple changes in placements often lead to severe, long-term behavior and emotional problems. Frequent moves also contribute to other mental health problems and poor educational achievement, as children are shuttled from school to school. Moreover, each change in foster placement decreases the likelihood that a child will return home or be adopted. Children are often bounced from one foster-care home to the next. Pixabay Bleak futures for those aging out This means that too many children get stuck in the system, having neither their biological family nor a permanent adoptive family. In 2014 alone, more than 22,000 young people, ages 18-20 were discharged from foster care and sent to live on their own. Nearly as many were released with only a legal guardian to provide them with supervision. What happens to youths raised in our chaotic and dysfunctional foster care system? The outlook for most is grim, given their histories of broken relationships and unstable educational experiences. They are far more likely to become teen parents, be chronically unemployed, and spend their lives in poverty than other young people. Moreover, recent studies have shown that young adults exiting the foster care system are prime targets for predators running sex-trafficking rings. In a study of youths held for prostitution in California, for example, most had come from foster care. A lack of political will The problem is complex but not without ready solutions. Providing child protective agencies with sufficient funding to recruit, train, and support more high quality foster families would be a good place to start. Children are far less likely to be moved around when placed with foster families who are well prepared to meet their often challenging needs. More aggressive recruitment of adoptive families would help as well. So would hiring more social workers to ensure that children are placed in the most appropriate settings and to expeditiously move children out of foster care and safely return them to their parents or place them with adoptive families. Like other urgently needed repairs to the child welfare system, these measures require more funding to a system that typically takes a hit whenever state and federal budgets are squeezed. Changing this requires political will; the kind we only see, unfortunately, during a firestorm. Source: <http://theconversation.com/the-hidden-harms-of-the-us-foster-care-system-49700>

Family of teen victim files $1.5 million lawsuit against Laurel Ridge Sharon Ko, KENS 5 11:19 p.m. CST January 28, 2016 Laurel Ridge Treatment Center (Photo: KENS 5) CONNECTTWEETLINKEDINCOMMENTEMAILMORE SAN ANTONIO -- A local family has filed a $1.5 million lawsuit against Laurel Ridge Treatment Center because it says the center failed to protect their daughter, who was sexually assaulted. 24 year-old Alexander Williams was arrested on multiple charges of sexual assault of a child. Investigators said he sexually assaulted the victim who was 14 years old at the time. The attorneys representing the victim's family said Williams's actions have had irreparable consequences. "Every time I talk to them it's too emotional. This has done mental damage. They have been devastated all throughout this," attorney Alberto Velazquez said. The attorneys said Williams was a former counselor at Laurel Ridge, where he accessed the victim's medical records. She has a history of disruptive behavior, self-esteem issues and deemed high-risk for sexual activity. "Knowing the child was vulnerable. There was no question about that. It was in the records, knew that he had the opportunity. He had the motive to do it," attorney Edgardo Baez said. "Not only did he gain access to medical records, he gained access personally to the child," Velazquez added. "Things that are overstepping his authority. You know, phone numbers, social media, things like that." Williams was suspended after the teen's father found out and contacted the treatment center. Williams was hired by the Bexar County Juvenile Probation Department as a residential treatment officer, despite being investigated by police. The probation department says Williams did not list the treatment center as a prior workplace. It says it would not have hired him if it knew about the investigation. Although the lawsuit can never change what happened to the teen, the attorneys representing the family said it will make sure Laurel Ridge is held accountable. Alexander Williams, Laurel Ridge (Photo: KENS 5) "Hurt them where it hurts them the most. It's a business and you hurt them in their pockets. But that doesn't do justice for the client. That's going to come with time. With counseling. With prayer," Baez said. Laurel Ridge sent a statement in response to the lawsuit: "Laurel Ridge Treatment Center, including its High Point campus, treats the safety of its patients as its number one priority. Upon learning of the recent allegation, Laurel Ridge contacted the appropriate authorities and state agency, and promptly removed its former employee from any further contact with the facility's patients. As the facility understands, the alleged incident occurred off campus and while the former technician was off duty. Due to the pending police investigation and associated patient privacy laws under HIPAA, however, the facility is unable to comment further at this time." Grace House to close its doors after 20 years Maddy Hayden, Carlsbad Current-Argus 4:59 p.m. MST February 1, 2016 The Carlsbad Current-Argus(Photo: File Photo) CONNECTTWEETLINKEDIN 4 COMMENTEMAILMORE CARLSBAD — After 20 years of opening its doors to troubled, adolescent boys,

Grace House is preparing to permanently close them. The group home was established in 1996 to treat boys ages 13 to 18 with educational, emotional, behavioral and social issues, according to their website. Melissa Roberts has been Grace House's executive director since it opened. She said the government's 10 percent cut to their daily costs that came eight years ago with the creation of the New Mexico Behavioral Health Collaborative began a pattern of losing money that they have been unable to stem. "There's a lot of demand for services and not a lot of money," Roberts said, adding that group homes have gone out of favor as a preferred method of treatment in recent years. Roberts also said "the mindset has been that they prefer to keep kids at home." For some of the children that live at Grace House, though, home may not be the best place for them. They may have friends or family that are detrimental to their treatment progress or abusive. "I think they're (group homes) important because not every home is safe," Roberts said. Some of the children have substance abuse issues or are involved with gangs, something the home serves to remove them from physically. Roberts said generally children are sent to residential treatment centers outside of their hometowns. Currently, Roberts said they are working on placing clients in group homes in Artesia and Hobbs, or possibly living back at home and receiving outpatient services. Once they are all placed, the Grace House will close. "I'm heartbroken," Roberts said. "I had really hoped that a group of people would grant us an endowment. We were never able to put that together." Roberts said there is a gap in funding. While there are plenty of grants out there for "brick and mortar" (new buildings or additions) and for the children, the money to actually sustain an operation are hard to come by. "Cars, insurance, food, clothes, washers, dryers, beds, computers, furniture, therapists, maintenance," she said. "It was costing us more than we had money for." Roberts said she felt honored to work at the Grace House and said it has been a pleasure to work with the community and Grace House staff. "I wish everybody who we've touched and have touched us all the best," she said. Maddy Hayden can be reached at 575-628-5512. Source:

Boys home employee charged with sexual misconduct with teen at facility Matt Eloffson Crime and courts reporter | Posted: Monday, February 1, 2016 4:01 pm Shon Christopher Holton Shon Christopher Holton Dothan police recently arrested an employee at a local boys home facility and charged him with multiple counts of inappropriate sexual contact with a teenage boy at the home. Dothan Police Lt. Will Glover said police investigators arrested Shon Christopher Holton, 43, of Gordon, and charged him with 10 felony counts of custodial sexual misconduct. Glover said Holton worked for the Alabama Department of Youth Services as an employee for a local boys group home. "While he was working there he conducted inappropriate acts with a juvenile," Glover said. Glover said the victim was a teenage boy, who was inappropriately contacted on multiple occasions between February and June of 2015. Glover said some of the offenses occurred at the facility where the suspect worked, which was not identified, and some of the other offenses occurred at a local residence while some others occurred at other local Department of Youth Services facilities. Glover said the criminal charge of prohibited act (custodial sexual misconduct) is not commonly used. "This is the first time I've actually seen this type of charge," Glover said. Holton was taken into custody after his arrest and later booked into the Houston County Jail. Foster care scandal: Bill requiring public reports on abuse clears Senate panel Print Email Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive By Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive The Oregonian Email the author | Follow on Twitter on February 03, 2016 at 5:08 PM, updated February 03, 2016 at 5:53 PM comments SALEM — Oregon's foster care officials would have to produce public reports listing confirmed findings of abuse and neglect every three months under proposed legislation that emerged from a Senate panel Wednesday. Senate Bill 1515, shepherded by Sen. Sara Gelser, D-Corvallis, cleared the Senate's human services committee in a unanimous vote that came with praise and promises of urgency — offering a flash of bipartisanship in a legislative session that's otherwise been off to a tense start. Gelser spent months drafting the bill amid outcry over the Department of Human Services' handling of a provider named Give Us This Day. The provider closed last year amid accusations that it misspent more than $2 million in state money and tolerated more than a decade of child abuse. Beyond compelling officials to produce quarterly reports on abuse findings, the bill would add licensing inspectors for child-care facilities, give officials more power to shut down or take over troubled agencies, and treat the failure to pull children from unlicensed facilities as a crime. Oregon has nearly 8,000 children in foster care on any given day, many of them already victims of abuse or facing behavioral and emotional issues before coming into state care. "Could we hold off? We could," said Rep. Duane Stark, R-Grants Pass, one of three House members who testified in support of the bill. He noted the difficulty in vetting such complicated legislation in a 35-day session, a major concern for Republicans this month in light of other that would increase the minimum wage and make changes to housing policy. "But the problem is children need that attention right now," he said. "I really hope we move that bill right now, so we get the positions in place right now, to get the licensing we need right now, to protect children right now. So they're not waiting." Gelser's bill joins an outside investigation of the Department of Human Services' child welfare system, ordered by Gov. Kate Brown. The review could take up to six months. Brown's policy adviser for human services, Dani Ledezma, joined Brown's interim human services director, Clyde Saiki, to show support for the bill. "Our caseworkers have some of the toughest jobs in the state," Saiki said. "We also have many caring and competent providers. But that being said, we still have the responsibility to provide the safest environment we can for our foster children, and we have to do better." After Saiki took over in November, department officials released thousands of pages of internal documents detailing abuse concerns at other providers and showing that top officials had known about Give Us This Day's problems since 2009. A 2014 log that tracked abuse reports at Give Us This Day since 2001, also released under Saiki's watch, revealed that several serious accusations, including sexual abuse, were repeatedly closed without full investigations. Gelser's bill, because it seeks money for two licensing inspectors, heads next to the Legislature's budget-writing committee. Oregon currently has just three inspectors who track some 200 licensed child-care facilities. The first quarterly compilation of abuse reports could come out as soon as this fall, Gelser said. The rest of the bill's provisions would take effect July 1. "This is meaningful, real and concrete change," Gelser said in an interview. "I'm so grateful for how hard people worked." — Denis C. Clark continued, "The things that went on at that school still really haunt me, and I think they should haunt him." SPECIAL INVESTIGATION: ABUSING THE TRUTH Before moving to Arizona and being elected sheriff, Babeu worked at the DeSisto School from April 1999 to August 2001, records show. During that time, child care investigators opened a case to stop abusive and inhumane practices and force the school to obtain a license. ABC15 first exposed Babeu's ties to DeSisto and the horrific abuse at the school in 2012. At the time, he threatened to file a lawsuit. His attorneys claimed he had no 'knowledge' and wasn't 'aware' of any mistreatment of students. But Clark said she needed to speak out after ABC15 obtained a damning home video recorded in 1999 that shows Babeu discussing abusive punishments in detail. "As the video shows, the Sheriff knew exactly what was going on and decided to condone it instead of speaking up for very vulnerable children," said Clark, who also said she was disturbed by Babeu's repeated denials. "There was absolutely no way you could be involved with that school and not have known what was going on." DeSisto was a therapeutic boarding school for teens. Many of the students had a wide range of special needs, including eating disorders, depression, paranoid schizophrenia, bi-polar disorder, self-harm and suicide attempts, learning disabilities, and substance abuse issues. In the home video, Babeu praises the school's extreme disciplinary methods used on the children. He called one of the most punitive practices "amazing." He tells family members that the students "need to feel hopeless and feel depression." The goal is to make them "bottom out." Despite the video evidence, Babeu continues to minimize his role at the school. In response to this story, he issued a written statement. It begins, "I do not recall ever meeting with this attorney nor was I a principal in any state investigation that occurred during or after my two-year employment at the school. As headmaster, I oversaw administrative issues with the school and had no involvement in discipline or student affairs.” (READ MORE OF BABEU’S STATEMENT BELOW) Rep. Clark said she remembers meeting Babeu. However, she said he quit working at the school before state investigators could depose him. State child care officials launched a civil licensure case to curb DeSisto’s dangerous practices in May 2000 – directly in the middle of Babeu’s tenure. But Babeu left the school August 2001, one month before the state ruled it needed to obtain a license and stop its dangerous practices or be shut down, records show. During that time, Clark said Babeu was “definitely part” of trying to keep state investigators away. “He had a high role there,” Clark said. “When he was there, he really stonewalled our investigations at every turn, as did the school.” During Babeu’s time as DeSisto’s administrative head, the school violated court discovery orders, repeatedly withheld records, obstructed, and was sanctioned, according to an order written by a superior court justice. In his statement, Sheriff Babeu did not respond to Clark’s statements about him stonewalling the state’s case or what state documents show on the matter. The rest of his written statement said, “But what this does show is the Democrat Congressional Campaign Committee has a target on me and they will sink to baseless personal attacks and spare no expense to keep this seat from falling into Republican hands. I reject this politics of personal destruction.” Rep. Clark is a Democrat representing a district surrounding Boston. She pushed back the claim that her comments are political. “This case wasn’t about who’s a Democrat or Republican. It’s about the welfare of children,” she said. “It was ritualistic child abuse - a sort of lord of the flies situation, where some of the children were groomed into positions of disciplining other children, including some really egregious things like students strip searching other student when they arrived at the school,” Clark said. “That was the type of allegation we were trying to investigate when the Sheriff was in charge of the school, and we were met with a complete stonewall.” Contact ABC15 Investigator Dave Biscobing at dbiscobing@abc15.com. Retired St. Paul cop repeatedly punched juvenile in group home, charges say The suspect, Clemmie H. Tucker, Sr., previously pleaded guilty in federal court on drug charges. Clemmie H. Tucker Sr., 64, was charged in Ramsey County District Court with one count of malicious punishment of a child for the Jan. 30 incident that left the 14-year-old boy’s face bruised and swollen. Tucker, who retired from the department as a sergeant in the 1990s after 23 years, has a troubled past. In 2006, he pleaded guilty in federal court to possessing about 22 pounds of cocaine and 8 pounds of methamphetamine estimated to be worth $4 million. “People who know me best know I am not a criminal,” Tucker told the judge when he was sentenced to five years in prison. “I made a mistake.” In his most recent run-in with the law, he allegedly assaulted a teenager, talked over the boy while police were questioning the boy and then left the scene despite orders from police to stay put. According to the complaint: Police responded to a group home about 7:40 p.m. for an assault. Tucker told police the boy assaulted another juvenile. The boy, who was in tears, told police that Tucker assaulted him “for no reason.” The boy said that he had argued with another teenager over video games and that he had punched the other teenager. Tucker called police and confronted the boy. The boy said he stood up in front of Tucker because the other kids picked on him and he didn’t want to look weak. Tucker pushed the boy to the ground. “[The boy] said he tried to get up and Tucker punched him in the face and head, ‘too many times to count,’ ” the complaint said. The account was corroborated by a witness and surveillance video, which showed the boy did not swing at Tucker. Another juvenile in the home told police that he witnessed the first altercation between the two boys, and then Tucker’s reaction. He told police that Tucker told the boy, “ ‘I wish you would hit me like that, I’d [expletive] you up.’ ” The juvenile said that was when the boy stood up in front of Tucker and was assaulted. “The juvenile male stated that once [the boy] was on the ground, Tucker continued to punch him multiple times,” the complaint said. “Tucker was hitting [the boy] with both hands and [the boy] was trying to hide under the table.” Tucker was breathless after the assault, the witness said. Tucker drove away from the scene and was later fired from the group home. He was a Golden Gloves boxing champion in his teens, according to the complaint. Martial arts hold used on teen before detention center death by Curtis Figueroa on 06/02/2016 "The staff performed an Aikido restraint hold to safely conduct a pat-down search and remove the youth's hoodie", wrote a spokesperson from Lincoln Village Juvenile Detention Center in an email. After the physical encounter, it is reported that the guards didn't check on McMillen overnight, and once they found her unresponsive, they waited 11 minutes to administer CPR. According to a spokesperson for the Kentucky Department of Juvenile Justice, McMillen refused to remove her sweatshirt for a booking photo and patdown, leading one staffer to use the hold on her. The detention officers used what is referred to as an Aikido restraint, which could be a number of restraints considering Aikido, like most martial arts, includes various techniques. McMillen was placed in the cell on January 10 and detention center workers allegedly didn't check on her again until she failed to respond to a breakfast call the next morning. Eventually, shortly following the Aikido restraint, McMillen was brought to her cell, and spent the night there, failing to react in any way when personnel tried to bring her food at 6:30 a.m. and then at 8:17 a.m. and 8:53 a.m. The troubled teenager also remained silent and passive when her mother tried to contact her later that morning. Recordings released Saturday also reveal responders started CPR on Gynnya 11 minutes after she was found dead. At about 9:55 a.m., a deputy arrived at about to take Gynnya to her court appearance. It took nine minutes for the staff to call 911 at 10:04 a.m. When the 911 operator asked the nurse at the detention center (about 90 seconds into the call) if CPR was in progress, the nurse said, "No it's not". Indeed, given the fact that McMillen was kept in isolation throughout the night, her condition should've been monitored every 15 minutes, if internal regulations at Lincoln Village had been followed. A day before authorities confirmed the martial arts maneuver was used on the teen, Lincoln Village Juvenile Detention Center employee Reginald Windham was placed on administrative leave. Juveniles alone in cells are under constant surveillance at the Kentucky facility. "As far as I'm concerned that is a completely inappropriate use of a restraint", Deitch added. "This goes back to not being so punitive with kids". "We're not exactly sure what happened but I can tell you this". Officials have said it appears that McMillen died in her sleep. That footage has been turned over to investigators. Source: <http://cinemablaze.com/2016/02/06/martial-arts-hold-used-on-teen-before-detention-center-death.html>

Man arrested in rape was foster parent, youth leader Rebecca Butts and Cameron Knight, cknight@enquirer.com 4:29 p.m. EST February 5, 2016 Joseph Niemeyer (Photo: Provided/Kenton County Detention Center) A church youth leader arrested Tuesday in connection with the rape of a minor girl was also a licensed foster parent, officials confirmed Friday. Joseph Niemeyer, 54, worked with youth at the New Banklick Baptist Church in Walton. He was also a resource for Benchmark Family Services, a foster care service, according to the Cabinet for Health and Family Services. A statement from the agency said it was fully cooperating with the investigation. "We did all required criminal background checks as well as the required child abuse and neglect checks for the foster home," the statement said. "Our agency has completed all requirements associated with the foster home's initial certification and annual re-certification. We are deeply saddened by this tragic news." Benchmark Family Service and the Cabinet for Health and Family Services have not disclosed whether Niemeyer was taking care of any foster children at the time of his arrest. Niemeyer turned himself in to the Independence Police Department, where he was arrested Monday. He is facing first-degree sexual abuse, rape and sodomy charges, all against a girl younger than 12, police said. Capt. Mike Thatcher could not confirm whether there are multiple victims, and said the investigation into the abuse is ongoing. He said several other possible witnesses and possible victims need to be interviewed. Niemeyer and his wife, Becky, are listed as youth ministers on the church's website, but pastor Tim Cochran said Becky Niemeyer actually leads the youth program. Joseph Niemeyer will not be allowed to continue leading youth services at the church if he is released from jail, Cochran said. Cochran has known Joseph Niemeyer for five years and considered him a friend. The two traveled to church retreats and conferences together. He was sickened at the news of Niemeyer's arrest. "Our church, we are all just sick about what has happened," Cochran said. "He was a good friend of mine. Never in a million years would I have thought he would do anything like this." Kenton County Prosecutor Rob Sanders said investigators would be checking on any children Niemeyer had contact with. Sanders went on to explain "education and reporting methods have improved." Programs, including those in schools, are teaching kids about what is proper contact and what isn't. This has resulted in more cases involving sexual abuse, he said. "I see cases like this every week in my office," Sanders said. Niemeyer is being held at the Kenton County Detention Center on a $50,000 bond. A preliminary hearing is scheduled for Tuesday. Juvenile centers make hundreds of 911 calls Kendra Conlon, WTSP 11:18 p.m. EST February 10, 2016 There are 10 state-funded facilities in the Bay area, and there have been fights, riots and escapes from the facilities. Bay area juvenile detention facilities are supposed to be putting troubled teens on the right path. 10News has uncovered problems on the inside prompting hundreds of 911 calls. There are 10 of these state-funded facilities in the Bay area, all privately run by the company G4S, and taxpayers are on the hook to help fix problems. In the past, we've seen the aftermath from riots, fights and escapes caught on camera, staff arrested and accused of sex acts with the teens inside the detention centers. Leaders have been calling for change. "The way juvenile justice is done in the state of Florida needs to undergo radical change," says Polk County State Attorney Jerry Hill. Recently, two teens escaped from the Tampa Residential Facility through a hole in the fence, only to be captured days later. Two workers got fired, two others are being punished and retrained. It's the latest in the long list of problems for company G4S. 10News wanted to know just how many times Tampa police and Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office deputies have been called out to the facilities. Here's what we found at the Columbus Drive complex: From 2012 through Jan. 21, 2016, there have been 291 calls. Seventy percent of the cries for help turned out to be founded. There have been founded reports of child abuse, assault, and sexual battery. Columbus Drive Juvenile Justice Complex: 2012 22 calls 16 founded 2013 96 calls 63 founded 2014 52 calls 42 founded 2015 99 calls 67 founded 2016 (through Jan 21) 22 calls 16 founded At Les Peters Academy on West Martin Luther King Boulevard, from 2013 to 2015, Tampa police handled another 71 calls. 2013: 20 calls 2014: 21 calls 2015: 30 calls "I'm sure they're going to take a look at what you're questioning, to make sure we're not missing something, because that the dedication the secretary has," says Rep. Kathleen Peters, R-District 69. Peters and the Department of Juvenile Justice tell 10News with offenders having unlimited access to the Department of Children and Families Abuse Hotline, they expect every time there's an accusation of child abuse, it will be investigated, and say staff should err on the side of caution when deciding to call law enforcement. "We want to ensure that every child has an opportunity to make sure they're protected. Is it perfect? No, but it's significantly better than it was," says Peters. G4S tells 10News that it has a plan to make sure an escape doesn't happen again. We requested a copy of the corrective action plan from the Department of Juvenile Justice and were told it's still being finalized. Gov. Rick Scott has requested an additional $12.8 million in this year's state budget for DJJ to repair buildings, increase staffing and improve prevention and intervention programs. Prior problems have prompted changes at some of the G4S facilities. Source: <http://www.wtsp.com/story/news/2016/02/10/juvenile-centers-make-hundreds-911-calls/80213702/>

Youth treatment center counselor arrested Comment 0 1 By Joe Goldeen Record Staff Writer recordnet.com By Joe Goldeen Record Staff Writer Posted Feb. 9, 2016 at 4:52 PM By Joe Goldeen Record Staff Writer Posted Feb. 9, 2016 at 4:52 PM » Social News By Joe Goldeen Record Staff Writer Posted Feb. 9, 2016 at 4:52 PM TRACY — A 25-year-old Stockton woman who worked as a counselor at a youth treatment center has been arrested and charged with suspicion of having sex with a minor and committing lewd acts with a child younger than 14. Tracy police arrested Ariana Gonzalez Salas on Thursday. Salas faces two felony counts: unlawful sexual intercourse with a minor more than 3-years younger; and lewd or lascivious acts with a child younger than 14. She is being held at San Joaquin County Jail in French Camp in lieu of $1.55 million bail. At the time of the reported incident on Jan. 15, Salas had worked for Manteca-based Valley Oak Residential for almost four years. Its website describes the 27-year-old residential treatment facility as a 24-hour, 36-bed program that provides specialized treatment for emotionally disturbed and behavior disordered children between 10 and 17 years old. It operates a six-bed home in Tracy as well as homes in Stockton, Manteca, Ripon and Modesto. "We just became aware that there were some boundary issues and we just turned it over to the (Tracy) Police Department," said Greg Potts, Valley Oak's founder and executive director. "We're sick to our stomachs." Potts said Tuesday he had no further information about the criminal case against Salas, who had been a long-term employee before being terminated. He said she typically worked an eight-hour swing shift alongside other counselors in the Tracy home. Valley Oak operates with a staff of 75. Potts said he had considered Salas a good employee. "There were no red flags; this caught us off guard. She had been working with the children for four years," he said. Sgt. Steve Beukelman, a spokesman for the Tracy Police Department, said the department declined comment because of the sensitive nature of the case. Court documents referred to the victim as John N.M. Doe and indicate he would have been at least 16 years old in January. The prosecutor assigned to the case could not be reached for comment Tuesday afternoon to explain the discrepancy between the second charge and the age of the victim. A protection order has been issued restricting Salas to no direct or third-party contact with the victim, including by electronic means. She also must stay more than 100 yards away. In addition to unspecified jail time, court documents indicated that if Salas is convicted, she will have to register as a sex offender. Salas' first hearing was held Monday in the Manteca branch of San Joaquin County Superior Court. It was continued to 8:30 a.m. Feb. 19. — Contact reporter Joe Goldeen at (209) 546-8278 or jgoldeen@recordnet.com. A Louisiana foster care worker faces criminal charges that she faked documents to cover up her failure to visit foster children THE ASSOCIATED PRESS Published: 2/15/16 3:18 pm EST - Updated: 2/15/16 3:18 pm EST AAA BATON ROUGE, Louisiana — A Louisiana foster care worker faces criminal charges that she faked documents to cover up her failure to visit foster children. The Advocate (<http://bit.ly/1QhPTgP>) reports that Kimberly Deann Lee, a 49-year-old Calhoun resident, faces 20 counts of filing false public records and one count of malfeasance in office, according to an arrest warrant filed by the Office of Inspector General in the 19th Judicial District Court on Feb. 10. Inspector General Stephen Street said Lee is expected to surrender this week at the East Baton Rouge Parish Prison. He said the misconduct isn't linked to child abuse, but says the case is significant because there is a potential for abuse or other problems when children are not properly supervised. The warrant says Lee was hired in December 2012 and required to make monthly in-home visits in the Ruston area. At least 20 times between July 31, 2013 and August 15, 2014, Lee used the state computer system to log fake reports, the warrant says. Foster parents in four foster homes confirmed that Lee did not conduct the visits, according to the document. The investigation started with a complaint from DCFS on Dec. 5, 2014, the warrant says. Attempts to reach Lee were unsuccessful Monday. Spokespeople for the Department of Family and Children's Services did not immediately respond to requests for comment on Monday. In an interview with OIG investigators held in Monroe in June, Lee explained her actions by saying she was committed "to getting things done no matter what." She said her supervisors gave her a heavy workload and pressured her to use "buzz words" in her reports, according to the warrant. "This is the sort of behavior that cannot be tolerated. Matters of child welfare are of the utmost importance and we will seek to hold people criminally accountable whenever we uncover this kind of misconduct," Street said Monday. Street said he does not expect more arrests in the immediate future linked to this case. Source: <http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/5153c479041c411e82e09b9c552e3994/LA--Foster-Care-Charges>

Teen Treatment Center Won't Allow Disability Rights Iowa To Investigate By Sarah Boden • Feb 15, 2016 Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email A residential treatment center for teen boys is being sued for refusing to allow a federally-mandated agency to inspect the facility and its records. Disability Rights Iowa says a minor with the initials P.F., who stayed at the Rabiner Treatment Center in Ft. Dodge last year alleges a staff member slammed him against a wall. P.F. also claims a center employee provided boys at the treatment center with alcohol, tobacco, and other controlled substances. Rabiner's services include substance abuse treatment. DRI wants access to the facility to investigate and review the original documents. Rabiner has denied the request, though correspondence shows it did turn over copies of the P.F.'s records. DRI says it also wants access to the facility, staff, residents, photographs, video/audio records, and other documentation on Rabiner's buildings, professional performance, procedure and safety standards. The treatment center says while a social worker did determine P.F. has a mental illness, this was not a formal diagnosis. Rabiner also says it doesn't have to comply because it does not provide mental illness treatment. Rabiner's attorney, Eric Eide, says he does not yet know how the treatment center will respond since he has yet to meet with the board. State investigation leads to changes at girls' inmate facility By Cory Pippin (WPEC) Wednesday, February 17th 2016 Share Video Share MARTIN COUNTY — A brawl at the Martin Girl's Academy prompts the state to make some changes. The fight broke out almost a year ago but investigators with the Department of Juvenile Justice just finished their investigation of the youth inmate facility. The 21 page report goes into specific detail about violations committed by the administrator of the facility as well as a security officer. It began after a juvenile inmate was jumped and attacked by five other inmates on May 3rd of 2015. Investigators say an anonymous tip alleged the facility administrator Anne Posey canceled a 9-11 call made by the victim and security officer Alonzo Watkins physically harmed an inmate involved. According to documents released by the Department of Juvenile Justice, the Martin County sheriff's office responded and "Posey acknowledged she informed law enforcement that the matter would be handled internally and their services were not needed." The paperwork continued: "There is sufficient evidence to support the allegation that Facility Administrator Posey failed to allow youths timely access to the abuse hotline." Investigators say that action was a failure of policy. Also according to the state, "surveillance video shows Watkins tackled (an inmate) to the floor."

Accordingly, the allegation of Excessive Use of Force against Watkins is sustained." The Department of Juvenile Justice acted immediately upon concluding the investigation. Watkins was fired and authorities arrested the five suspects involved. They also forced the Girls Academy to install a direct access abuse hotline which allows youth to make abuse calls without restrictions or limitations. Still, records show the incident isn't rare. According to the Martin County Sheriff's Office, deputies have been called to the Martin Girls' Academy 53 times since the attack for incidents that include youth assault, a sexual assault, fights and regular police service calls. State investigators say the Department of Children and Families is also involved and they're currently reviewing policies to see if other improvements can be made. More boarding schools unregulated by DHS Lee Rood, lrood@dmreg.com 9:42 a.m. CST February 24, 2016 In this photo taken on Thursday, Feb. 11, 2016, a Uhaul is parked outside Midwest Academy in Keokuk, Iowa. Federal, state and county law enforcement officials have returned to the southeast Iowa boarding school for troubled teens following abuse allegations. The Keokuk Daily Gate reports officials with the FBI and the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation returned to Midwest Academy on Thursday to execute a search warrant for records following an initial search of the academy on Jan. 28 and 29. (Photo: Cindy Iutzi/Daily Gate City via AP) At least three other boarding schools in Iowa have no oversight by Iowa's Department of Human Services in addition to the shuttered southeast Iowa facility where accusations of sex abuse and other crimes are being investigated. Cono Christian School, a tiny boarding school north of Walker for struggling seventh- to 12th-graders, has never been licensed as a foster care facility in Iowa, state officials say. Like Midwest Academy in Keokuk, the 65-year-old school costing more than $36,000 a year also has no accreditation and is not considered a school by the state. Likewise, the Maharishi School's boarding program, for almost 60 international high school students in Fairfield, and Scattergood Friends, a college prep program for 35 students in West Branch, have no oversight by DHS. However, both of those private-pay schools, which cost roughly $28,000 a year, are independently accredited with oversight by the Department of Education. MORE: Legislators to investigate Midwest Academy after abuse reports Any private boarding school in Iowa — including Midwest Academy should it reopen after this year's criminal probe concludes — could be greatly affected by Senate Study Bill 3154, introduced this month by Sen. Herman Quirmbach, D-Ames. The bill would require any facility of its kind housing seven or more youth to be licensed by DHS, and overseen by the departments of education and inspections and appeals. Such legislation would not only necessitate licensing visits and far more reporting, but also require that such facilities abide by state and federal laws affecting safety, staffing, where youth sleep, what they eat and when or if they can be restrained. Amy Lorentzen McCoy, a spokeswoman for DHS, said a mix of state agency officials are reviewing the legislation. The state is also mulling other action, such as a possible certification process, that might be considered less onerous for owners of private boarding schools. "I think there is a desire by some groups that, if they are not receiving any government funding, to not have the same requirements," she said. DES MOINES REGISTER Editorial: Youth homes need state oversight The new bill came after a 17-year-old one-time student at Midwest Academy claimed she was sexually abused by owner-director Ben Trane. Court records also show criminal investigators are looking into allegations of fraudulent practices and a pattern of child endangerment in the school's use of isolation rooms. Celeste Siemsen, administrative director at the Maharishi School, said officials there were unaware of the proposed legislation. However, she said, "Certainly, we fall in the category of very much being for school choice." The Maharishi boarding school differs from public schools because of its interdisciplinary curriculum and incorporation of transcendental meditation twice a day into classes. Students stay with host families, who are vetted by the school, she said. "We ask for regular progress reports (of students) and check in with families on a regular basis," she said. Iowa's DHS has always had the authority to conduct child abuse probes at any school or facility. But the bill would send state workers to the schools more often during licensing visits and other times. PREVIOUSLY: 80 sheriff calls in 3 years to school Sheriff says academy needs oversight DHS: Midwest Academy used outdated methods Quirmbach, chairman of the Senate's Education Committee, said he believes whether a boarding school receives public funding or not, it needs to be regulated if it bills itself as therapeutic. "Look, I think we have a responsibility for these kids," he said. Quirmbach said a draft version of the bill passed out of the Education Committee last week. "But I committed to having broad input before any floor action would take place," he said. "It's still a work in progress." Midwest Academy was in the process of applying for foster care facility licenses for its Keokuk and Montrose locations when the criminal probe was launched. But not all the necessary documentation was submitted, and no site visits had been made, Lorentzen McCoy said. The DIA was overseeing the application process and eventually was expected to give DHS a recommendation on whether to approve the application and license. Norfolk foster parent accused of soliciting sex from boy he adopted BY World-Herald News Service/Paul Hammel | February 25, 2016 Home > News > LINCOLN — A longtime foster parent in Norfolk, Nebraska, has been ordered to stand trial for soliciting sex from a foster child he adopted. The 59-year-old man is accused of offering $100 and other favors in exchange for being allowed to sexually fondle a boy, then 17, he had adopted after serving as the boy's foster parent. The man — whose name is not being published to protect the identity of the teen — has pleaded not guilty to soliciting prostitution from a person under age 18. If convicted on the felony charge, he could face up to two years in prison and 12 months post-release supervision, or a $10,000 fine, or all. A trial has been scheduled for March 8 in Madison County District Court. According to court records, the Norfolk man has been a foster parent to at least 13 boys since the 1990s. A court document from 2008 indicated that he was employed by Boys and Girls Home of Nebraska. Madison County Attorney Joe Smith said the case points to a need for more vigorous review of people who are allowed to foster children. The teen was placed under temporary custody of the Nebraska Department of Health and Human Services after telling police that he had been assaulted in April 2015. Now 18, he lives independently, Smith said. Ron Temple, a Norfolk attorney defending the accused man, did not respond to calls seeking comment. Russ Reno, a spokesman for Health and Human Services, confirmed that the man's home was licensed by the state for foster care. He said that when the department hears of a serious criminal charge, it will put a hold on placements at such locations pending the resolution of the allegations. Reno said prospective foster parents are put through a "battery" of background checks, including checks of criminal history and sex-offender registries. Fmr. Mountain View employee says she's witnessed inmate abuse By Heather Burian | Posted: Thu 11:53 PM, Feb 25, 2016 | Updated: Fri 12:18 AM, Feb 26, 2016 KNOXVILLE, Tenn. (WVLT) -- Sex between inmates and staff, physical abuse, even inmates escaping are all headlines involving Mountain View Youth Development Center in Dandridge. It's run by the Department of Children's Services and houses the most serious youth offenders. A former employee said she's aware of staff physically abusing inmates and despite her attempts to bring attention to it, nothing is being done. In fact, Dmayla Holliday, a youth service worker, was let go Thursday. DCS said it was poor performance. Holliday tells us it's because she took a stand. Holliday said she's had a number of inmates come up to her accusing staff of physically assaulting them while they're in handcuffs, in confinement, and when they're being transported. According to Holliday, she couldn't let the accusations go by without investigating. Then she started seeing it first-hand. Holliday said she's tried to report the it, but the people the kids accuse of physical abuse are her superiors. One example Holliday gave was when she was helping to restrain an aggressive inmate. "He does end up assaulting guards. That does happen. But once we got the situation under control -- we were able to get the handcuffs, we were able to place him into confinement -- there was a guard who had his hand around (the inmate's) throat. I actually grabbed the guard's arm and I moved it and I told him get your hand off of his throat, he's already contained," Holliday said, adding she found another inmate last week covered in blood, his face swollen, his lip busted. Holliday said she doesn't care that she lost her job, what's most important is making sure these inmates are protected. While these children are violent offenders, Holliday said she sees signs that make her believe they are telling the truth. For example, when inmates are scared to go up to the floor where they eat, because that's where the main office is. "If your son or your daughter was to accuse somebody of abuse, would you instinctively think of all the bad things they've done in their past? Or would you say, 'Hey, where is this coming from?' Would you dig deeper to try to figure out what's going on." As for whether there are cameras in the facility, Holliday says there are, but access is limited. They're not in certain meeting areas, bedrooms nor in confinement, which is where a lot of the abuse happens, according to Holliday. DCS has investigated some recent sexual abuse cases at Mountain View. Source:

Criminologists: Boot out boot camps By COREY CONNELLY Sunday, February 28 2016 Criminologist and founder of the Caribbean Ant-Violence Institute Renee Cummings has debunked the myth that boot camps are a sure way to rehabilitate delinquent youths. "Boot camps are popular not because they work but because they make good reality television. Through popular American television talk shows, boot camps garnered attractive public appeal. Politicians and citizens like the military style which is naturally seen as being tough on crime," she said in a Sunday Newsday interview. Cummings said, however, that in contrast to public perception, research has shown that boot camps are not very effective in rehabilitating juveniles. "There's little evidence that the attitude-change lasts beyond the length of the programme which is usually three to six months," she said. Cummings was responding to Government's plan to consider establishing boot camps as a way to curb delinquency among the nation's youth. The issue came to the fore, following recent reports of violence and serious indiscipline at Chaguanas North Secondary School. According to Cummings: "Current studies in adolescent brain research, juvenile delinquency best practices and youth development suggest that teenagers do not respond to a short term physical programme that includes punishment, threats and humiliation." She added that the hostile environment of the boot camp worked against rehabilitation. "Over three decades of research in the United States, showed that the boot camp is a flawed model. Once perceived as a promising solution, it is now viewed as a failed experiment," Cummings said. Given the nature of the initiative, Cummings argued, participants in boot camps were constantly at risk of injury and death "which goes beyond the concept of pair punishment." She said the intense nature of the staff-participant relationship also created a high risk for abuse of participants. "The lack of a proper screening mechanism for physical and mental health has made the boot camp a deadly experience for some young people," Cummings added. Cummings, who is also a criminal psychologist and profiler, further argued that on the issue of reducing recidivism, boot camps do not seem to have any lingering effect on participants once their resident stay ended. "Actually, re-offending is usually higher for boot camp participants," she said. Cummings said young people need an opportunity to change their lives and re-invent themselves in a caring and supportive environment. "Weighing in on the possible move to implement boot camps to curb juvenile delinquency, criminologist Ian Ramdhanie noted that while the idea was being touted, no clear plan has been put forward. "To date there have not been any clear proposal of what this boot camp aims to accomplish, how it should operate, who will be executing it, how it will be monitored to see if it worked. It has always been talk, talk and more talk," he told Sunday Newsday. "We are yet to see any policy paper on this proposition. We had some versions of this in the recent past. For some people, the MILAT and MYPART may be seen as some type of boot camp." Ramdhanie said there also has not been talk about where the boot camps will be located, its costs and whether there will be qualified persons to deliver the Government's mandate. Noting there were many types of boot camps around the world, the criminologist said some were academic-based while others were treatment-oriented and punishment-driven. "What model will Trinidad and Tobago follow is unknown," he said. "There had not been any national discussion with the critical stakeholders on how it should be patterned. These stakeholders include the parents/ guardians, teachers, police, corrections, judiciary." Ramdhanie said to criminologists and other professionals, the perennial talk about sending delinquent youths to boot camps comes across as a diversion tactic from the real issues rather than trying to reduce the delinquency problem itself. "Two weeks from now, no one will be talking about boot camps since no technical discussion has been held on what types of delinquent problems will qualify for a term at a boot camp. For example, is it that for fighting in school, drugs in school, cursing, disrespect to teachers. We don't have a clue," he said. Source: <http://www.newsday.co.tt/news/0,224630.html>

Our opinion: Iowa must regulate youth facilities Story Comments Share Share Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size where we stand Iowa lawmakers must take steps to ensure that facilities like Midwest Academy aren't allowed to operate without some government oversight. Posted: Sunday, February 28, 2016 12:00 am | Updated: 6:10 am, Sun Feb 28, 2016. Our opinion: Iowa must regulate youth facilities BY THE TH MEDIA EDITORIAL BOARD Telegraph Herald One month ago, news broke about a raid at an Iowa facility for troubled youth. Allegations of sexual abuse by staff members prompted law enforcement to swoop in and shut down Midwest Academy in Keokuk. For many Iowans, that was likely the first time they heard mention of the place. It's the kind of place you don't hear about or find -- unless you really need it. Desperate parents seeking help for troubled teens sought refuge there. Midwest Academy is the kind of place parents find online when they are at the end of their rope. Its website offered counseling, academic support and therapy in a safe and secure environment. Programs like this can cost thousands of dollars, but that probably seemed like a small price to pay if it could get these struggling youth back on track. So parents bought in to the school, and sent their children off into the care of the facility's employees. Maybe parents didn't want to ask too many questions. Finding support for a teenager on the edge can be daunting. But this home for troubled youths wasn't a school. And it wasn't a mental health facility. Therefore, it was not beholden to any state rules that regulate those kinds of institutions. Midwest Academy quite literally made its own rules. In the month since the raid, the FBI continues to investigate, children have returned home, the doors have shuttered and the website has closed. Officials are looking into possible charges of sexual abuse, child pornography and child endangerment, among other claims. But so far, no charges have been filed. Because it was not governed by state regulations, filing charges might be complicated. Whether there was criminal behavior on the part of Midwest Academy employees is a matter best left to law enforcement to sort out. The Iowa Legislature, however, can and should take action. This past week, lawmakers announced that a bipartisan committee would be assembled to launch an investigation on behalf of the state. Because the facility had no burden of regulation, there's no obvious state department to turn to for oversight. The Legislature is right to step in. Further, lawmakers have an opportunity to remedy the circumstance that led to this rogue facility lurking in vulnerable minors. The Legislature can and should put a stop to facilities operating in this capacity without transparency or oversight. Senate Study Bill 3154 would require places offering services like this to more than six youth be licensed by the state. With that oversight would come audits, inspections and transparency in programming. Lawmakers must get behind this measure. For parents seeking help for an out-of-control teen, the promise of a "wilderness camp" or "boarding school" that can "straighten out" at-risk kids is likely incredibly tempting. They exist all over the country. But many of these programs fly under the radar of state and federal regulation. Parents have no guarantee that these programs are even safe for their children, much less that they can truly help children. Parents must look at programming like this with great scrutiny and a degree of skepticism. It's troubling to hear allegations of abuse about a place billed as a refuge for struggling teens. We must be more vigilant about ensuring that these facilities aren't allowed to operate within our state's borders without government oversight. Editorials reflect the consensus of the TH Media Editorial Board. Source: http://www.thonline.com/news/opinion/article_24cef152-ec88-5f91-922c-61a06276c339.html

Denver County Human Services to close center for foster teens More than 60 Family Crisis Center employees learned Monday they would lose their jobs By Jennifer Brown The Denver Post Posted: 03/01/2016 12:01:00 AM MST 9 Comments Updated: 03/01/2016 08:08:12 AM MST The Denver Family Crisis Center (Andy Cross, The Denver Post file) A Denver County home for troubled teenagers in foster care will close in July, and 64 workers with the Human Services Department will lose their jobs. Family Crisis Center is home to 29 teens, most placed by court order, who will move to foster homes or privately run residential treatment centers by July 1. Employees of the county-run center, who are caseworkers, therapists, kitchen staff members and others, were notified Monday that their jobs end in three months, said department communications director Julie Smith. Closure of the center, which costs nearly $6 million annually, comes as residential treatment centers across Colorado downsize while the state works to meet federal goals in housing more foster kids with families and fewer kids in so-called "congregate" care. Family Crisis Center has the capacity to house 60 teenagers ages 12-17, but Denver County Human Services cut that number to 30 in recent years as caseworkers aimed to send more kids to families and group homes. Denver County is the only county in the state that runs its own residential treatment center. In recent years, the county was increasingly competing with the private sector as fewer children needed care at the Family Crisis Center, Smith said. Also, running the center conflicted with the county's goals of reducing the number of children in residential treatment centers. Advertisement By July, human services will pay private centers to house the teens and will use the cost savings on prevention of child abuse and neglect as well as mental health services, Smith said. Since 2008, the state has focused on reducing "out-of-home" care and increased spending on prevention and mental health. The county has scheduled two job fairs and two workshops to help the 64 employees find new positions in the Denver area. "We recognize this is not an easy thing," Smith said. Treynor man arrested for alleged group home sexual abuse - The Daily Nonpareil - Council Bluffs, Iowa: Local News Treynor man arrested for alleged group home sexual abuse Treynor man arrested for alleged group home sexual abuse Michael Krauth Posted: Tuesday, March 1, 2016 12:00 am | Updated: 9:25 am, Tue Mar 1, 2016. Treynor man arrested for alleged group home sexual abuse By Tim Johnson tjohnson@nonpareilonline.com nonpareilonline.com | 0 comments A Treynor man employed by REM Iowa Community Services is facing charges for sexual exploitation by a counselor or therapist. Michael E. Krauth, 54, was arrested on warrant at 11 a.m. Friday at REM Iowa's Council Bluffs office at 25 Main Place. Krauth is accused of victimizing a 30-year-old male resident of a group home in August 2015 and September 2015, according to Sgt. Chad Meyers of the Council Bluffs Police Department's Criminal Investigation Division. Krauth is being charged at the level of an aggravated misdemeanor. Kelly Flanagan, area director for REM Iowa Community Services, said Monday morning, "I can't make any comment at this time." Sarah Magazine, a spokeswoman for REM, said that Krauth was not an employee at the time the allegations occurred. She said he was hired last fall after passing a background check. REM Iowa's Council Bluffs operation offers services to children and adults with disabilities, including residential services and dual diagnosis services, and also offers supported living services to adults with neurological disorders and brain or spinal cord injuries. Krauth was being held in the Pottawattamie County Jail on Monday on $10,000 bond. He has requested a public defender, and his preliminary hearing is scheduled for Thursday, March 10. Correction: The original version of this post incorrectly identified the group home where the alleged incident took place as being operated by REM Iowa. Sex Abuse, Drugs, Lack of Food Pose 'Immediate Risk' to Kids at State-Funded Group Homes | NBC Bay Area Sex Abuse, Drugs, Lack of Food Pose 'Immediate Risk' to Kids at State-Funded Group Homes A three-month NBC Bay Area investigation reveals serious health and safety violations at facilities that house over 3,700 abused and neglected children in California. By Bigad Shaban, Michael Bott and Jeremy Carroll View Comments \(3\) | Email | Print UP NEXT X Sex Abuse, Drugs, Lack of Food Pose... Link Embed Email Copy Close Link to this video Copy Close Embed this video Replay More videos (1 of 9) «» An NBC Bay Area investigation reveals dreadful violations at some of California's group homes, which are 24-hour child care facilities that house abused and neglected children throughout the state. California is in the midst of overhauling its child welfare system, but the reform could take years. In the meantime, the Investigative Unit found evidence of 815 violations at Bay Area group homes that posed an "immediate risk" to children and teens over the past five years. Those violations included physical and sexual abuse of children, drug use among group home staff, and other serious violations such as a lack of food. Lawmakers in California have acknowledged that outcomes for children in group homes are substantially worse compared to outcomes for children placed with relatives or foster families. As a result, the state is now undertaking one of the largest overhauls of the child welfare system in recent history. The effort, which has been dubbed the "continuum of care reform," aims to eliminate group homes by 2021, which currently house roughly 3,725 children and teens across California. The reform would require counties to do a significantly better job in recruiting foster families and relative caregivers for foster youth. "When you look at the suicide rates, drug abuse rates, when you look at all the negative outcomes for the foster care population – the lack of the number of kids going into higher education, just the absolute lack of success – that's the danger that the system puts these kids into," said Assemblymember Mark Stone, who authored AB 403, the legislation behind the continuum of care reform effort. Stone says group homes were originally intended to be short term placements for foster youth, while social workers connected children with foster families or relatives. Counties, however, simply have not been able to recruit enough foster families or relative caregivers, which has transformed group homes into long term placements for many children. Stone says his legislation would address these shortfalls by increasing resources for the recruitment and retention of foster families and relative caregivers. The group homes that continue to exist after the transition will become short-term facilities, which would aim to place children in longer-term homes within 6 months. "We want to reduce the amount of suicides, we want to reduce the amount of drug abuse, we want to reduce the amount of failure that kids suffer coming out of the foster care system," Stone said. "And it's not because they're bad kids. It's not because they're not capable. It's because they haven't had a chance." There are currently 166 group homes across the Bay Area that can house anywhere from four to more than 100 children. To find out what foster kids were enduring at Bay Area group homes, NBC Bay Area obtained hundreds of pages of inspection reports from the Department of Social Services. The reports contained troubling allegations that government inspectors determined to be true. They include: A group home employee "sexually abused a child" Staff did drugs with a child An employee brought a 'loaded gun' into a group home Several violations over a lack of food for children Failing to provide medical attention to a child "after a seizure" Not reporting an injury to a child that resulted in two broken bones An employee caught on tape "physically abusing" a child by cracking an object like a 'whip' Using behavior modifying drugs as punishment." After acting out, one child was given "Benadryl on at least 30 documented occasions," which can cause drowsiness Despite the seriousness of these violations, the group homes where these violations occurred all remain open, although some are on probation, meaning their license can be revoked if they don't show improvement in the quality of care provided to children. NBC Bay Area requested an interview with Department of Social Services director Will Lightborne to discuss whether the state was doing enough to ensure the safety of children housed in group homes, however, the agency said their spokesperson Michael Weston was the only person available. Weston agreed that group homes are not appropriate long-term placement options, which is why he said the Department of Social Services is supporting and implementing the continuum of care reform. "These group homes were designed to deal with children who needed therapeutic services," Weston said. "What they've become for some kids, particularly at the lower level, is a permanent placement option and that is what a lot of the reform is trying to undo." While Bay Area group homes have been cited 815 times over the past 5 years for putting the health, safety, and personal rights of children at "immediate risk," Weston said the department is doing enough to keep children in group homes safe. "We have a system for dealing with facilities that are out of compliance and part of that is a progressive discipline process," Weston said. "And where we have facilities where children's needs aren't being met, we're being very active. There's a process that we go through." Weston said that process includes meeting with group homes to discuss improvements, putting them on probation, or even shutting them down. Inspectors with the department's Community Care Licensing division are required by law to conduct unannounced inspections at every group home at least once every five years. Weston says the department aims to investigate complaints against group homes within 90 days. Weston, however, said shutting down a problematic group home can be a long process. "The administrative process does not give the authority to the department to close a facility without doing a lot of legwork," Weston said. "[There's] a lot of legal work in order to do that. It's a very long process in order to investigate and close a facility from start to finish." Records provided by the Department of Social Services show 19 group homes in California have had their licenses revoked between 2011 and 2015. Mariah Corder, 16, spent much of her childhood in group homes after her biological father went to prison for murder. She was removed from her parents' home as a toddler. Corder has cycled between multiple group homes and foster homes since then, and says the state should be doing more to protect children and teens. "The purpose of a high level group home is to help a youth deal with any trauma they've had before," Corder said. "But I really believe that pretty much all of the group homes I was in gave me more trauma that I had to deal with." Corder said she experienced physical abuse by staff members, and at one group home, was even given daily doses of psychotropic drugs to unnecessarily subdue her. NBC Bay Area confirmed that once she was transferred to a different group home, the staff there took her completely off the medication, saying she didn't need it. "I never should have been abused," Corder said. "I never should have had to fight or defend myself in a government home and never should have had to be so behind in school. I never should have had to be in a group home at all really. If there were more foster homes, I wouldn't have." Corder did spend some time in foster homes as a child, which she says made her realize how poor the conditions were at group home facilities. "It took a few foster homes in between group homes to realize how different things were and a couple of really good foster homes to explain to me that the stuff that was happening to me wasn't right," she said. Corder says she supports the continuum of care reform, but does have some reservations about whether counties will be able to recruit enough foster parents and relative caregivers to phase out group homes as long-term placement options for foster youth. In the meantime, Corder is fighting to change the system alongside other teens at California Youth Connection, a non-profit group that's been advocating for child welfare reform for the past two decades. "I think just knowing the horrible things that I went through and never wanting any other youth to have to go through that, that's what gets me going every day," Corder said. "[It's what] keeps me motivated to advocate for youth." Source: <http://www.nbcbayarea.com/investigations/Bay-Area-Group-Homes-for-Children-and-Teens-369305871.html>

Top Texas CPS Official Stepping Down AP FILE PHOTO: J. Michael Short by Lana Shadwick 6 Mar 2016 6 Mar, 2016 7 Mar, 2016 The top official for the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services (DFPS) has announced that he is stepping-down effective May 31, 2016. Judge John Specia Jr. announced on Friday that he intends to retire after 30 years of public service. Specia became DFPS Commissioner on December 1, 2012. Commissioner Specia is a former family law judge with a distinguished legal history, especially in Child Protective Services (CPS) cases. He has extensive expertise in the foster care system, and has broad civil law experience. “It has been an honor every day working with the dedicated public servants at DFPS,” Commissioner Specia said in a prepared statement. “I never cease to be amazed at the way our team fights for our kids and vulnerable adults, no matter the circumstances. I know they will continue to put at-risk Texans first as the HHS system transforms itself in the coming months and years.” “Judge Specia is a dynamic leader and has proven himself a true public servant for three decades,” Health and Human Services Executive Commissioner Chris Traylor said in a statement obtained by Breitbart Texas. “His career will always be defined by his commitment to children, preventing child abuse and making Texas a safer place.” The former judge was a founding member and jurist in residence for the Texas Supreme Court Children’s Commission. He also established the Bexar County Children’s Court which provides specialized services for children. He created the Family Drug Treatment Court in that county and it became a model for the Lone Star State. He was vice-chair of the Supreme Court’s Permanent Judicial Commission for Children, Youth, and Families, and chair of the Supreme Court Task Force on Foster Care. Commissioner Specia served as District Judge of the 225th District Court in San Antonio for 18 years (1988-2006) and was the administrative judge for Bexar County district courts for four of those years. He also served as Master of the 289th Family and Juvenile District Court (1985-1988). Commissioner Specia was one of the state’s first child welfare attorneys, serving as a regional attorney for the former Texas Department of Human Services (1980-1985), and he was a family law attorney in private practice before becoming a district judge. After retiring from the bench in 2006, Specia served as partner in a law firm where he practiced mediation and arbitration. He also served as a visiting judge. Judge Specia has been an adjunct professor at St. Mary’s School of Law since 1995, teaching trial advocacy, advanced trial advocacy, and international arbitration. Specia was honored with the 2012 Infant Mental Health Advocacy Award and received the 2011 Lone Star Award for his work in substance abuse prevention and treatment. He was a recipient of the Dale Wood Award for outstanding protection of children by the judiciary and was named “Judge of the Year” by Texas CASA (Court Appointed Special Advocates). Specia has a bachelor of arts in political science from the University of Texas and a doctor of jurisprudence from St. Mary’s University of Law. The Department of Family and Protective Services is the agency in Texas that works to protect both children and the elderly from abuse, neglect and exploitation. Its most commonly known subdivision is CPS. It also has an Adult Protection Services Division (APS). The agency also licenses facilities and works to protect the health and safety of children in day care and foster care. The agency is not, and has not been, without its critics. Breitbart Texas has reported about the abuses, problems, and overreach in the agency, particularly among CPS caseworkers and in foster care. In 2014, the department approved new agency rules aimed at preventing deaths of children in CPS foster care, as reported by Breitbart Texas. The Council’s action came after the deaths of two year old Alexandria Hill and eleven month old Orion Hamilton. Both died of blunt-force head injuries suffered in foster and kinship homes. The homes were approved by child-placing agencies (CPAs) which were licensed by TDFPS. The Department licenses the 220 foster child-placing agencies that recruit, investigate, and train potential foster and kinship parents and monitor the placements once they become caregivers. In March 2015, Breitbart Texas reported that Texas Governor Greg Abbott directed the DFPS to implement comprehensive reforms after three children died under the supervision of the department. The reforms were aimed at protecting future and current children under the agency’s care. Nine children died under DFPS’ watch during 2014. In September, a CPS worker was found guilty of official oppression, as reported by Breitbart Texas. The CPS worker, Rebekah Ross Thonginh, is one of three individuals who were charged in connection with a CPS investigation of a case involving a special needs teenager who was murdered in 2012. Thonginh, Natalie Ausbie Reynolds, and Laura Ard were arrested in September of 2013 and were charged with official oppression and tampering with evidence. Critics say that more caseworkers should be investigated for their constitutional overreaches with parents, custodians, and guardians. In 2014, a Texas judge ordered the removal of a YouTube video, which after highlighted in an article by Breitbart Texas, went viral with hundreds of thousands of views and shares. As reported by Breitbart Texas, Judge Keith Dean ordered the removal of a YouTube video produced by a 13-year-old boy that exposed the sexual and physical abuse that he and his brother and family say they endured while in CPS foster care. The video, obtained from someone outside of the family, also discusses the 377-day nightmare suffered by him and his six siblings after they were ripped from their family and placed in four different foster care facilities out of their home county. The mother told Breitbart Texas at the time “they are trying to rake this abuse under the rug.” A Children’s Advocacy group brought a class action lawsuit against CPS in December of 2014, as reported by Breitbart Texas. The class-action lawsuit was filed by a New York advocacy group called Children’s Rights. About 12,000 children were included in the class-action suit. These children were in long-term care in Texas. The group successfully sought and received an order from U.S. District Judge Janis Graham Jack to have the State of Texas enact reforms for its children’s services. The judge ruled that the long-term foster care system is improperly run and is a place “where rape, abuse, psychotropic medication and instability are the norm,” as reported by the Dallas Morning News in December 2015. The judge noted that the DFPS and Judge Specia have “the best intentions” but the system is underfunded. She called the long-term foster care system in the state “broken.” Lana Shadwick is a writer and legal analyst for Breitbart Texas. She has served as a prosecutor and associate judge. Oklahoma Man Gets 40 Years in Prison in Kenya Orphans' Abuse By tim talley, associated press OKLAHOMA CITY — Mar 7, 2016, 3:37 PM ET 147 Shares Email Star 147 Shares Email A former missionary from Oklahoma convicted of sexually abusing children at an orphanage in Kenya was sentenced Monday to 40 years in a federal prison. U.S. District Judge David L. Russell handed down the sentence to Matthew Lane Durham, 21, who had faced up to 30 years on each of four counts of engaging in illicit sexual conduct in foreign places. He also ordered Durham, of Edmond, to pay restitution of $15,863. “These were heinous crimes committed on the most vulnerable victims. He was their worst nightmare come true,” Russell said. Durham, wearing an orange prison-issued jumpsuit, read a statement before sentencing in which he asked the court for mercy but did not express remorse for the offenses he was convicted of. Durham showed no emotion when the sentence was issued. Prosecutors alleged Durham targeted orphans while volunteering at the Upendo Children’s Home in Nairobi between April and June 2014. Durham had served as a volunteer since 2012 at the orphanage, which specializes in caring for neglected children. “All I wanted was to follow God’s plan for me,” Durham told the judge. He said he will try to commit himself to serving others while he serves his prison sentence. Although Durham claims he is innocent of the charges, he said he was sorry that the accusations against him had damaged the orphanage and those it cares for. “The Upendo kids do not deserve this,” Durham said. In a sentencing memorandum, prosecutors said Durham’s actions have had a chilling effect on the lives of dozens of foreign volunteers in Kenya and elsewhere “who must now live under the cloud of suspicion, distrust and apprehension when they volunteer their time, talent and resources for the betterment of children in East Africa and beyond.” “There is a real perception among Upendo’s local Kenyan community that more pedophiles lurk among the volunteers, especially the young male volunteers,” prosecutors said. A jury convicted Durham in June on seven counts of engaging in illicit sexual conduct in foreign places, but Russell acquitted Durham on three of the charges in January. The same jury cleared Durham of accusations he planned to abuse the children before leaving the United States. Defense attorney Stephen Jones has said Durham plans to appeal his convictions. The orphanage’s founder, Eunice Menja, read a statement in court Monday in which she said the sexual abuse was “not only a betrayal of the Upendo mission but of the trust Upendo placed in him.” “Matthew Durham defiled the children,” Menja said as she fought back tears. “Matthew has no remorse. After he got caught, he still denied.” Menja told reporters after the hearing that she hopes Durham’s 40-year sentence is long enough to prevent him from being a threat to anyone else. "We're hoping that when he comes out he will be a changed man," she said. Federal prosecutors had asked in their sentencing memo that Russell to sentence Durham to 120 years in prison — the maximum punishment he faced. Jones had sought a sentence of just eight years, followed by probation. Evidence produced by prosecutors included handwritten, signed confessions that Durham gave orphanage officials after he was accused of inappropriate behavior. Jones has argued that the statements were coerced by orphanage officials who isolated Durham, took his passport and created the allegations to obtain $17,000 from the U.S. government for security cameras. Jones has described Durham, who was 19 when he was charged in 2014, as "an emotionally vulnerable teenager" who was struggling with "sexual identity and development" while also being a devout Christian. Photo: Rachel La Corte, ASSOCIATED PRESS Lawsuit: State could've saved children raped by foster dad 1 / 3 Back to Gallery Two children sexually assaulted by a state-paid foster parent now say child services workers ignored an earlier report of abuse in the Snohomish County home. Attorneys for the girls claim Department of Social and Health Services workers failed to act on a 2012 report of sexual behavior in foster father John Phillips' home. Months later, Phillips began raping two foster daughters and a third child. Phillips, now 45, was found out in 2014 and is currently serving a 25-year prison term. "Sadly, once again we see two innocent young children horrifically abused in our state's foster care system," attorney Michael Pfau said Friday. "This lawsuit is hopefully the beginning of a long journey toward healing for them. "Our state meanwhile must address the problems in its foster care system now so tragic cases like this are a rare occurrence not something we continually read about in the news media." Pfau, a Seattle attorney with the firm Pfau Cochran Vertetis Amala, filed a lawsuit on the girls' behalf earlier in March. They are seeking compensation for harm they claim was caused by state negligence. A Department of Social and Health Services spokesperson declined to comment on the claims, citing a DSHS policy against speaking about pending lawsuits. The Washington girls, then 9 and 14, were placed in Phillips' Granite Falls home after being physically and sexually abused elsewhere. Phillips, aware of what the girls had already endured, won their trust and then sexually exploited them. Two years before that, though, child services workers received a report that a 4-year-old who had been placed at Phillips home reported sexual activity there, attorneys for the girls said in the lawsuit. The child told her foster mother an individual in the home had exposed himself to "exercise ... on someone's butt." The girls' attorneys claim the state didn't properly investigate the strange report and instead allowed three children to be raped by Phillips. Investigators would ultimately learn that Phillips had been raping the girls regularly at the home he shared with his wife and biological children. The abuse continued throughout the girls' time at Phillips' home. The abuse came to light in August 2014, when the younger foster daughter when to Phillips' wife and said she had "done something bad." The girl went on to say Phillips had touched her sexually. Phillips' wife called the other foster daughter and a third girl into the room and asked them if Phillips had abused them. They said he had. Phillips walked in a moment later. Confronted, he admitted to abusing the girls, though he would later make nonsensical claims that the children enticed him into raping them. "Although he readily admits to his actions he refuses to take actual responsibility for choosing to do what he did," a Snohomish County community corrections officer who interviewed Phillips said in court papers. Phillip turned himself in after his wife said she was going to report the abuse. He later said he didn't know what he would've done had his wife not threatened to turn him in. Authorities arrested Phillips and removed the foster children from his former home. He ultimately pleaded guilty to four child rape and child molestation counts, and is currently imprisoned at Washington State Penitentiary in Walla Walla. In court papers filed in Phillips criminal case, a social worker assisting the girls after their ordeal with Phillips said both have struggled because of the betrayal. "They both trusted John and (his wife) to be their adoptive parents," the social worker said in the June memo. "It's been hard trying to build that trust again." Attorneys for the state have not yet responded to the girls' lawsuit, which is filed in King County Superior Court. Youth home closed after sex acts, meth Records show porn exposure, broken bones at brawl By Greg Moran | 7 a.m. March 8, 2016 The former home of the Phoenix House Academy in Decanso. [Union-Tribune file] Nancee E. Lewis The former home of the Phoenix House Academy in Decanso. [Union-Tribune file] A group home in Descanso that treated youths with drug and alcohol problems under a contract with San Diego County abruptly closed last fall, following a series of incidents involving staff and residents that led child welfare officials to stop sending children there for treatment. Records show that Phoenix House Academy, a group home located on about 90 acres of what was once a ranch in bucolic East County backcountry, was told a year ago that county officials had become concerned for "the safety and welfare of dependent and probation youth" placed in the home. In a February 2015 memo, the county demanded a plan to correct 11 areas, including supervision and training, "appropriate staff-to-youth ratio" and improving the "timeliness and accuracy" of reports that are required to be submitted to the county when someone is hurt, property damaged or some other incident occurs. W Phoenix House submitted a 60-page plan to correct the flaws in March. But by September, the group informed the county it was closing down, citing a change in funding and regulations, as well as an increase in the severity of the case referrals of adolescents. That decision came after a series of incidents dating from October 2013 detailed in the records, which included incident reports and complaint investigations. They included: In April 2014 a female staff counselor was found to have engaged in sex acts with a male resident on at least two occasions, and providing the youth with methamphetamines. A male staff member in October 2013 gave pornography to residents, purchasing a magazine on the way to work and leaving it in a place male residents would find it, according to a redacted report of the incident. The report indicated the staff member had been disciplined once before and "had issues with inappropriate boundaries with residents at Phoenix House." On Jan. 31, 2015, five male residents got into a brawl in one of the residential cabins on the site, leaving one with a broken hand. One of the fighters threatened to stab another, and was found with utensils that had been fashioned into weapons. On Aug. 30 last year, about a week before the announcement to close, two female youths walked away from an outing at the Mission Valley mall and were missing for hours. They were found that night in Poway and later tested positive for drugs. The program's closure was not announced at the time. The San Diego Union-Tribune came across the situation as part of an unrelated request for public records. Ann Bray, executive director of the organization that operates 120 programs in California and nine other states, declined to comment on the specific incidents detailed in the reports. She said in an interview that the string of incidents did not factor into the decision to close the Descanso facility, which the organization had operated for more than 25 years. The rural location and expense of maintaining the home led to the decision to no longer accept youth under the contract, which was set to expire in 2017, Bray said. Phoenix House still provides rehabilitation services for county youth — but they are sent on a case-by-case basis to a facility in Lake View Terrace in Los Angeles County. "We made the decision it was better to deliver care in a more contemporary health care setting rather in a facility in a remote location, that was built in the 1940s," she said of the Descanso campus. The referrals to Los Angeles are done under an amended annual contract that could pay Phoenix House up to $600,000 per year for treating youths, said Dale Fleming of the county's Health and Humans Services Agency. She said the county continues to contract with the organization because it is one of the few that offers the kind of specialized care that some youth need. Until it closed, Phoenix House in Descanso was the only place such youth could go to within the county, Fleming said. She said the county stepped in when it became aware of the problems there last year. "We worked closely with Phoenix House Academy to take appropriate steps to prevent these types of situations from recurring," Fleming said in a written response to questions about the facility. She said the county stopped referrals there from Feb. 18 to March 13 last year. In all, the county has paid $2.8 million to Phoenix House since 2014 under two separate contracts. Candi Mayes, the executive director of the Dependency Legal Group which represents children in child welfare cases, said she was unaware of the problems detailed in the county reports. The relatively small number of clients placed out there had concerns other than reports of misconduct by staff there. "They didn't feel like it was helping them, or the group counseling was consistent," she said. "They were raising concerns with their attorneys that they were in the inpatient programs, and they didn't feel they were getting the intensive services that they needed. For us, the issue was it was more about it wasn't a good fit." Bray said that the organization now plans to convert the Descanso site from a licensed treatment program for youths, to a post-treatment recovery retreat type facility for families. The new program would require county development approvals, but there is no plan to take county referrals. That may not sit well with residents of the area, some of whom have long complained about problems with the facility, which is not a locked or secured camp. There have been problems with youth trespassing on private property, thefts and traffic hazards from vehicles traveling down the winding road to the camp, said Maggie Leavitt, a resident and former chairwoman of an association of property owners in the area. One resident committed suicide there in 2010, according to the medical examiner, which said the youth had a history of depression and making suicidal threats. "Ever since they opened the doors it's had problems," Leavitt said, "Kid-created problems, staff-created problems." She said placing any kind of rehab facility in the area is "highly inappropriate in our rural, residential community." The county said that since 2014 it had placed some 107 youths at the Phoenix House campus, 84 in 2014-15, and 23 from July 2015 until it closed down. Since the closure, the county has placed 10 children in the Los Angeles Phoenix House facility. Also see County-contracted charity accused of improper billing Fleming said county officials visited the facility in January and were "comfortable with what we observed." Paddles, Stun Guns and Chemical Sprays: How US Schools Discipline Students Friday, 11 March 2016 00:00 By Eleanor J. Bader, Truthout | News Analysis font size decrease font size increase font size Print (Image: Lauren Walker / Truthout) "Brian was a regular kid," longtime communications professional Kathy Parrent says, "a boy who liked to make everyone in our third grade classroom laugh. One day he said something smart-alecky, and our teacher grabbed him by the collar, lifted him up, opened up the coat closet, threw him in and locked the door. The rest of us sat in stunned horror, terrified. Brian immediately began banging and screaming, 'please, please, let me out,' but the teacher kept him in there for what felt like an eternity." As Parrent speaks, her voice breaks and it is clear that Brian is still vivid in her mind's eye. "I remember that he was wearing a white shirt and when the teacher finally opened the door, he was covered in blood. My first thought was that he must have cut himself, but no. He'd had a nosebleed, something that happened to him all the time. It was awful. He might have deserved to be reprimanded; I don't know. What I do know is that more than 50 years later, I can still see the blood." Despite the lasting impact of this incident on Parrent -- we can only guess how it affected Brian as he continued his schooling and came of age -- it's tempting to assume that this type of discipline is a thing of the past. After all, the encounter took place in 1963. Security officers routinely use mace, pepper spray, stun guns and Tasers to break up fights and suppress "unruly" behavior. But not only are students still being locked in "isolation rooms" and physically restrained, but 19 states also continue to employ corporal punishment against "disobedient" pupils. What's more, in the wake of Columbine, Sandy Hook and other school shootings, security officers -- often employees of the local sheriff's department or area police force -- routinely use mace, pepper spray, stun guns and Tasers to break up fights and suppress "unruly" behavior. First, let's look at corporal punishment. Since there are no federal policies regarding the paddling or physical punishment of students, a patchwork of state regulations govern how students can be disciplined. This means that although 31 states prohibit public school teachers, paraprofessionals and principals from striking students -- only two states, Iowa and New Jersey, ban private schools from doing the same. The practice remains pervasive, particularly in the South. To wit: Available statistics show Texas leading the nation, with 49,197 students being paddled at least once during the 2008-09 academic year; Mississippi came in second, with 38,131 cases; then there's Alabama, with 33,716; Arkansas, with 22,314; Georgia, with 18,249; Tennessee with 14,868; and Oklahoma with 14,828. Children with disabilities are between two and five times more likely to be hit than other students. For those unfamiliar with this type of chastisement, it is worth noting that the paddle is typically made of wood and is used on the thighs and buttocks for infractions such as bullying, "defiance," fighting, using profanity, refusing to put a cell phone away, smoking on school grounds, tardiness or violating a school dress code. Equally noteworthy, boys of color receive the stick far more frequently than white males or females, regardless of race. Indeed, more than a third of those paddled during that school year -- 35.6 percent -- were Black boys. The 12 to 15 percent of public school students living with disabilities also experience disproportionate corporal punishment, regardless of race and regardless of whether they have learning disorders, are autistic or have illnesses ranging from cerebral palsy to asthma. According to the Gundersen National Child Protection Training Center, children with disabilities are between two and five times more likely to be hit than other students. And paddling, of course, is only one of the tools used to control them. Isolation or Seclusion for Students With Disabilities Historically, time-outs, also known as seclusion or isolation, have been used to give students a means of stepping away from stimuli. "People typically couch removal from class in therapeutic language, but there is no research to back up the use of isolation as helpful," said Gail Stewart, an attorney in Albuquerque, New Mexico, who has represented numerous children with disabilities in lawsuits against punishment-happy school systems. "What isolation teaches is trauma." New Mexico, she adds, like most other states, does not require parents to be notified when their children are put in seclusion or are restrained, and since many of those placed in involuntary isolation are nonverbal, family members are often unaware of what's happening in the classroom. "Many kids become highly distressed when sequestered," Stewart told Truthout. "You can see blood and snot, and smell urine, in these holding rooms." "No one has solid numbers on the number of officers with Tasers or sprays, how much is spent by school districts, or exactly where they are used." She described a typical scenario, illustrating the type of provocation that can send a student into seclusion. "A kid who does not want to transition from one activity to another may throw a book or push a desk," she said. "The teacher then calls security. In some cases, the room will be cleared of other students, leaving three or four adults to surround the kid who is considered 'noncompliant.' If the kid ends up on the floor, it can escalate into head-banging or thrashing, and may result in injuries." In addition, says Matthew Bernstein, staff attorney at Albuquerque's Pegasus Legal Services for Children, "zero-tolerance" policies in some schools complicate things further by prohibiting teachers from using discretion when handling disruptive behaviors. "I was a high school teacher before I went to law school," he said. "I know it's hard to be a teacher and individualize what each student needs, but it's time to dial back the punishments and find alternatives." This is especially true when punishment includes being tased, zapped with a stun gun or sprayed with chemicals. That said, no one knows how often, or even where, these methods are used. "There is not a federal mandatory school crime [sic] incident reporting system for Pre-K through 12 grade school crime," Ken S. Trump, president of National School Safety and Security Services, wrote in response to an email from Truthout requesting hard data. "No one has solid numbers on the number of officers with Tasers or sprays, how much is spent by school districts, or exactly where they are used," he wrote. Instead, we have anecdotes. Although Trump calls Tasers "an additional intervention tool that falls between the ultimate use of deadly force and other less-than-lethal interventions," he is emphatic that they should be used exclusively by "sworn, certified and trained police officers," not educators. Many Ask Why Police Are in Schools at All. Many, however, believe law enforcement is missing the mark and argue that neither police nor weaponry belong in schools; others, however, take a middle position, advocating that law enforcement should be a last resort, utilized only when other types of mediation have failed since chemicals and stun guns have the potential to cause permanent physical and psychological problems. Ebony Howard, an attorney at the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), represented eight students in a lawsuit against a Birmingham school district over its use of mace. "One of them was KB, a pregnant African-American 16-year-old," Howard told Truthout. "She was going from one class to another when a boy walked up to her and started calling her foul names like bitch and whore. She tried to get away from him but he and a group of his friends followed her." Things got loud and a security officer showed up. According to Howard, "he told KB that if she did not calm down, he'd arrest her. He then sprayed her with mace." "In schools where the students are poor and mostly of color, police departments are criminalizing adolescent conflict." Fortunately, KB recovered and her fetus was unharmed, but a SPLC lawsuit challenged the officer's handling of the altercation. A judge ultimately found that the officer's use of mace constituted excessive force and while the ruling did not impose an outright ban on the use of chemical compounds in academic settings, Howard believes that the decision "sends a signal to other school districts" about calling police at the first sign of discord. "Here in Alabama and across the country, in schools where the students are poor and mostly of color, police departments are criminalizing adolescent conflict," Howard told Truthout. "Bias against children of color is woven into the fabric of the US. They are devalued." This has become known as the school-to-prison pipeline and Howard is clear that it represents a gross violation of students' rights to test boundaries and resolve conflicts on their own. Still, Howard notes that if law enforcement personnel are going to be stationed in schools, they should be trained to work with young people. "They do not need to use a hammer to settle a conflict. They need to learn to negotiate and work things out without arresting anyone." Rukiya Dillahunt, a former teacher and school administrator from Raleigh, North Carolina who now works with the Education Justice Alliance, favors peace circles facilitated by mediators. "I remember doing this with two girls who'd gotten into a brawl over a boy. A social worker and peer mediator met with them to talk it out. There were rules. For example, they couldn't call each other names and had to either talk directly to one another or to one of the other people in the room. From what I saw, the method worked. It gave the parties involved a way to process the issue. By the time they walked out, things between them were fine. Furthermore, they learned a strategy to settle disputes, and I hope, developed into adults capable of handling conflict and tension." This would not have happened had one or both been arrested, Dillahunt said. Suspension would have been similarly disruptive. "When kids are kept out of school they become demoralized and angry," she told Truthout. "We have a block schedule, with 90-minute classes. If you miss one day, it's like you've missed two. Not everyone can catch up, especially if they've been kept out for five or 10 days. Some kids feel like they'll never pass, so rather than fail, they drop out." While some may re-enroll later, excessive discipline is associated with other negative consequences including increased aggression, anxiety, depression and suicidal ideation. These conditions, in turn, can lead to physical ailments, including liver and heart disease. All of this, said Victor Vieth, director and founder of the Center for Effective Discipline at the National Child Protection Training Center, is completely avoidable if school personnel look at the underlying issues -- including poverty, hunger, domestic abuse and homelessness -- that typically cause students to act out. "If we simply respond with corporal or violent punishment we're treating the smoke while ignoring the fire that underlies it," he said. This, of course, hurts students and their allies and can turn school from a place of excitement and wonder into a site of angst and upheaval. Eleanor J. Dangerous use of restraints plummets at Minnesota homes for people with disabilities By [Chris Serres Star Tribune March 9, 2016 — 9:08pm Text size comment2 share113 tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase:Order Reprint

Minnesota has turned the corner in a prolonged battle against the use of dangerous restraints and isolation rooms at facilities for people with developmental disabilities. Eight years after reports first surfaced of metal handcuffs and leg shackles being used as punishment in state facilities, officials are reporting a 40 percent drop in the use of restrictive procedures at group homes and programs for people with disabilities. Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC Incidents of restraint, seclusion and other restrictive measures dropped from 8,602 two years ago to 5,124 in the most recent fiscal year, according to a report state officials filed last week in federal court. The sharp drop results from changes in state law and a massive effort by state and county officials to stamp out the use of punitive techniques that are widely seen as inhumane and unnecessary. The issue was also the subject of a Star Tribune series last year that found Minnesota had fallen behind other states in integrating people with disabilities in mainstream life, and often isolated them in group homes far from families and friends. Though the use of restraints persists, the recent reduction marks a major shift for a state that has long relied on punitive techniques as a way to control behavior at small group homes and other state-licensed facilities. As far back as 1949, Gov. Luther Youngdahl lit a giant bonfire of straitjackets, cuffs and leather straps on the grounds of the state mental hospital in Anoka, while condemning the "barbarous devices and the approach which those devices symbolized." "This is a paradigm shift, and something that we have wanted to see for a very, very long time," said Roberta Opheim, of the state Ombudsman Office for Mental Health and Developmental Disabilities. In 2008, Opheim's office reported that scores of residents at a state-operated facility in Cambridge, Minn., were being routinely handcuffed, placed in leg irons or isolated in seclusion rooms as punishment. One resident of the facility, known as the Minnesota Extended Treatment Options (METO), was restrained 299 times in a single year. In some cases, residents were restrained for behavior as minor as touching a pizza box, bumping into someone or threatening to run away. The findings led to a federal class-action lawsuit by METO residents and their families, and a major legal settlement that forced the state to modernize its rules. At the time, Minnesota had fallen behind other states and generally accepted standards in social services, which held that restraints have little or no therapeutic value and can be extremely dangerous. After Minnesota changed state law in 2014 to prohibit a long list of restrictive procedures, from leg shackles and handcuffs to prone restraints, the state Department of Human Services launched an unprecedented outreach and training effort across the state. The agency created a special team to train staff at facilities for people with disabilities on identifying the individual needs of their clients, and to de-escalate situations without resorting to restraints. And, for the first time, the state required providers to report all incidents of restraint and seclusion and began issuing licensing violations against providers that didn't comply with the law. Tighter enforcement, combined with increased awareness from the METO lawsuit, led to a "change in thinking," said Alex Bartolic, disability services director at DHS. "We drew a very hard line in the sand," she said. "We decided that we no longer wanted to do things that caused people pain and humiliation." The impact was immediate. Within months after the new state law took effect, the use of restrictive procedures plunged by more than a third, from 746 incidents a month to fewer than 500. The most dramatic drop, say state officials, has been in the use of forced isolation. Until recently, many providers still thought it was acceptable to use "time out," or seclusion rooms, to correct unwanted behaviors. But regulators have also moved to stamp out more subtle forms of punitive restraints, including a category the state refers to as "penalty consequences." In these cases, residents are punished with the loss of certain rights or privileges, such as visits from family and participation in group activities, if they fail to correct certain behaviors. "We said, 'You should never take away something that is a basic right,'" Bartolic said. "Karen H" Despite the improvements, disability advocates remain concerned that state enforcement hasn't kept pace with the changes in state law. In late 2014, a federal court monitor raised alarm that documented incidents of restraint were not properly investigated, after highlighting the case of a 33-year-old woman strapped to a metal-framed chair in a group home in Crystal for up to nine hours a day. The woman, identified as "Karen H." in state documents, was deprived of food and bathroom breaks while in the chair and urinated on herself, investigators found. In a case last year, federal inspectors found that a patient at Anoka-Metro Regional Treatment Center was placed intermittently in a wheelchair restraint, without being evaluated for the restraint and without proper documentation. The initial gains will be difficult to sustain if Minnesota does not address other issues, such as the statewide shortage of people trained to care for people with developmental disabilities, Bartolic warned. Some providers may resort to punitive methods because they lack staff trained in more positive approaches. "We saw a big drop," Bartolic said, "but it's going to take a lot of diligence to keep seeing gains." Opheim, the state ombudsman, said she worries that the new rules have not been in place long enough to determine whether all providers are actually reporting all incidents as required under state law. "I am cautiously optimistic that we're on the right track," she said, "but we still have a long ways to go." Girl in city-contracted foster care molested, suit alleges - NY Daily News EXCLUSIVE: Girl in city-contracted foster home was repeatedly molested, then blamed for 'acting out,' new lawsuit alleges BY Victoria Bekiempis NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, March 9, 2016, 6:56 PM A A A facebook 124 Tweet email Share this URL Frances Twitty/Getty Images A woman who claims she was repeatedly molested while under the care of city-contracted foster home is seeking $18 million in damages. A girl under the care of a city-contracted foster home provider was repeatedly molested in her household — and then blamed for "acting out" when she complained about sexual abuse, a new Manhattan federal lawsuit alleges. The victim, who is now 20 and whose name is not listed in the civil complaint, was removed from her birth home when she was 2-years-old. Abbott House, a foster care organization that receives some $50 million in public funds, was charged with taking care of her, the lawsuit claims. When she was 8 years old, the woman complained to her school about her foster mom's alleged physical abuse. An Administration for Children's Services staffer investigated but didn't permanently remove the girl from the home, the lawsuit charges. She was sent to therapy at Arista Center for Psychotherapy, Inc., and the foster mom whom she alleged assaulted her attended the sessions. Her foster mom's teenage son started molesting her around age 9, and the abuse came to include years of "oral sex and penetration," the suit states. Several years after the abuse began, she was sent back to the same therapist, who blamed her for the molestation, claiming she was "acting out." Arista staffers wrongly described her behavior as "giving oral sex to an older boy" and "treated her for shame instead of seeking to treat her and protect her from the sexual abuse traumatization," the suit says. Arista had a legal obligation to tell an independent entity about the girl's allegations, but only "cooperated with Abbott House and treated the minor 10-year-old child for years for her guilt instead of investigating the causes and making sure there was a safe foster home setting." The lawsuit also alleges that Abbott House has a history of providing abusive foster homes — but that the organization and city turn a blind eye to them. Bruce Young, the woman's lawyer, said the case reveals the need for more oversight in foster homes. "We trust and presume they're helping troubled children," Young said. "But that presumption — that they're safe — needs greater scrutiny." The woman is seeking $18 million in damages. A Law Department spokesman said "We will review the complaint." Neither Abbott House nor Arista returned calls for comment. Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/girl-city-contracted-foster-care-molested-suit-alleges-article-1.2559041>

City shuts down illegal group home By Vanessa Murphy | vmurphy@8newsnow.com, Neb Solomon Published 03/10/2016 10:57PM Updated 03/10/2016 11:22PM LAS VEGAS An alleged scam is disturbing part of a valley neighborhood. Some say it highlights the problems of homelessness and a lack of resources. A house near Maryland Parkway and Charleston Boulevard appears to be set up for business, but that's not what was happening. Police say it was being used as an illegal group home. "It's just been people coming and going," said nearby resident Eileen Lanahan. She says she saw someone with a clipboard leading a group of people from the nearby Huntridge Circle Park to the house. "We've got a problem," Lanahan said. She says she has lived in the neighborhood all her life. The park where these individuals came from is known to be frequented by the homeless. Metro Police say the tenant renting the house was renting it to others. It was operating as an unlicensed group home, and police were called there 14 times over two and a half months, mainly for disturbances. A spokesman for the City of Las Vegas says code enforcement took action in mid-February. The place was cleaned out, and people living there had to leave. Now, they're back on the streets. "We've got to do something about the homeless," Lanahan said. Merideth Spriggs connects the homeless with resources through her organization Caridad. She agrees this may be a sign of a bigger problem. "We have a need, and we're not really addressing it," she said. According to a survey from 2015, there are more than 7,500 homeless people in southern Nevada. 28 percent of them reported suffering from mental illness. Spriggs says there are not enough places they can go in southern Nevada for long-term treatment they may need. "We desperately need mental health beds in Clark County. There's a shortage," she said. "It seems like they're always full and in dealing with the homeless, it can sometimes be hours waiting to get someone into mental health services, even if they do have insurance." Spriggs says she's waited up to twelve hours with some clients to get them a bed in a mental health facility. She says police and jails have become the mental health services in Clark County. The owner of the house is a Texas-based corporation. 8 News NOW reached out to the attorney, but received no response. According to the city, the owner had to evict the person who was renting the place out to others. Source: <http://www.lasvegassnow.com/news/city-shuts-down-illegal-group-home>

Legality of group home being investigated following Taylor fire that injured three men Published: Thursday, March 10, 2016 0 Comments More Photos Click thumbnails to enlarge A fire from a discarded cigarette destroyed this house in Taylor Wednesday afternoon, believed by authorities to be a group home, despite not being licensed with the state. Photo by Jessica Strachan A fire destroyed what is believed to have been an unlicensed group home in Taylor on Wednesday afternoon, sending a resident and two firefighters to the hospital for treatment. All three men have reportedly been released and are recovering, but the blaze has sparked an investigation into the legitimacy of the facility. The fire started just before 3 p.m. in the 6100 block of John Daly Road, near Van Born and Beech Daly roads. Taylor firefighters arrived to find several residents and a reported caretaker outside, Fire Chief Steve Portis said. One man, described as being in his mid-to late- 60s, was still inside and had to be rescued. As a result of battling the fire, one firefighter was treated for smoke inhalation and another received medical attention after a portion of the roof collapsed on top of him, according to Taylor Fire Marshal John Hager, who said Allen Park and Dearborn Heights fire departments assisted on scene. The fire started after a man who lives in the home attempted to toss a cigarette butt on the ground, but instead set fire to two mattresses that were stacked outside on the deck, Hager said. City tax records show the house is owned by Habib Capital, LLC, a Farmington Hills-based company, registered since 2012. It is listed as a 1,600-square foot, three bedroom house with two bathrooms. Hager said he spoke with a man employed by Habib Capital, LLC on scene and that the home had six adult residents, five of whom were there when the fire broke out. Smoking is not allowed inside the home, per management rules, Hager said. The fire completely destroyed the house and residents were reportedly transferred to other group homes outside the city, but owned by Habib Capital, Hager said. Group homes are licensed by the state, based on criteria like services provided and mental status, but are not always registered with the cities they are a part of. Those with fewer than seven residents are not required to seek rezoning permits from the city, according to state officials. "We do have several group homes in the city, but I was not aware that this one," Hager said. "Maybe it's something we're going to have to look at as a city and figure out if we need an ordinance (to keep track of group homes)." Continued... 1 2 See Full Story "Especially with the (residents') mental status, it was challenging trying to talk to them and determined what happened," he added. State law says an operation must be licensed if it is providing personal care, supervision and protection, in addition to room and board for unrelated people "who are aged, mentally ill, developmentally disabled or physically disabled" for five or more days a week, two or more consecutive weeks — for compensation. Nineteen adult foster care facilities in Taylor are registered with the Michigan Department of Licensing and Regulatory Affairs. The John Daly property is not licensed, according to state records. A State of Michigan representative investigating the damaged house Thursday afternoon confirmed that a complaint had been received and that they will be making contact with the owner to determine if the operation was legal. Read more The husband and wife convicted of keeping their three daughters imprisoned in their house were sentenced to 58 years and 20 years, respectively, in prison on Thursday. Fernando and Sophia Richter were found guilty in December of three counts each of kidnapping and child abuse. Fernando Richter, stepfather to the three girls, was also convicted of two counts of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon. The girls testified to having been physically abused, taken out of school and held captive for several months before the two younger girls escaped through a window in November 2013. Police rescued the oldest girl, who was held in a different room. They were 12, 13 and 17 at the time. The Richters were sentenced by Pima County Superior Court Judge Paul Tang after a morning of hearing statements from the couple's daughters and relatives. "This was a tragedy to us all," Tang said as he announced the sentences. The daughters survived physical and mental abuse, yet "found grace and forgiveness," which Tang called "a testament to the human spirit." Sophia Richter held tissues to her face as her daughters spoke, while Fernando Richter faced away from the gallery. "I rescued myself from a condition that no child should go through," said the 16-year-old daughter, who was 13 when she escaped. "I know she could have left if she really, really wanted to. She let this man torture us," she said of her mother. But she said she does not hate her mother, who was abused in a prior relationship. She said she forgave Fernando because she "can't live with the hatred." Her younger sister also spoke to the judge, saying she was consumed by fear of people around her after she was rescued and for a time wanted to go back to be with her mother and stepfather. "I guess because I was so used to it," she said, adding Fernando "took everything away from me." "Even after everything she has done, I find it in me to love her," she said of her mother. The oldest daughter, 19, said the rules of the trial unfairly restricted her mother from testifying that she also was a victim. Fernando is a "really evil person" who manipulated her mother, she said. Tang said the court was bound by law from allowing such testimony. A 20-year sentence for Sophia Richter would be "too long," she said. "The court is ignoring our need for our mother." "I want her to get help and be our mother again," she said. As for Fernando, he "truly deserves to rot in prison." Robert Richter, stepfather of Fernando Richter, read a statement saying Fernando cannot read or write properly and has suffered from mental illness since he was a boy. Fernando Richter previously raised the issue of mental illness, but after an evaluation Tang ruled he was competent to be sentenced. Defense attorney Paul Skitzki said Fernando was "not a monster." Records of Fernando's mental illness go back to early childhood and were "not something put together for the defense." The daughters testified that Fernando put cameras in their rooms and locked the windows, he said. Fernando did that to protect them out of fear of outside influences. "In Fernando's mind, that's true," he said. Paula Kammon, mother of Sophia Richter, said her daughter became "withdrawn" after meeting Fernando Richter and "kind of slipped away." Fernando Richter was given 58 years in prison and credited with 835 days of time served in jail awaiting trial; Sophia Richter, who was also sentenced to three years' probation in addition to her 20-year sentence, was credited with 835 days of time served. Sophia Richter's defense attorney Leo Plowman said he would appeal. "We were not allowed to present a defense," he said, citing the fact that Sophia Richter could not testify that she was under duress. Man Gets 20-Year Term for Starving, Beating Foster Children By The Associated Press SAN ANTONIO — Mar 11, 2016, 8:10 PM ET 33 Shares Email Star 33 Shares Email A third former operator of a San Antonio day care center was sentenced Friday to 20 years in prison for forcing his three adopted children to sleep in a shower, bite each other and pour bleach on wounds. Tim Archuleta agreed to the 20-year sentence in a deal with prosecutors in which he pleaded guilty to injury to a child with serious bodily injury by omission. His sentencing comes a week after his wife, Iliana Archuleta, was sentenced to 30 years in prison and his brother, Rogelio Archuleta, received a 35-year sentence. Both pleaded no contest to injury to a child and other charges. Prosecutor Stephanie Boyd told state District Judge Ron Rangel that the three adopted children, who had been born drug-addicted, to collect the state support of more than $90,000. "They got $90,000 tax-free and blew it all on themselves," Boyd said. Nevertheless, defense attorney James Tocci appealed for probation for his client. "Should he have done more? Yeah, OK, I'll give you that. But did he intend to starve those kids out? No," Tocci said. Rangel told Archuleta that he "buried his head in the sand" while the children were abused and starved. The children, 8 to 10 years old at the time, had been taken from an abusive home before being placed with the couple, who operated a day care. They slept in a shower, forced to sit with their knees pulled tight against their chests, Bexar

County sheriff's investigator Tony Kobryn said. The shower drain and a bucket served as toilets, and boxes were stacked against the glass door to prevent the children from opening it. They ate mostly bread and butter, with some broth and the occasional half sandwich, he said, and weren't allowed to eat with the Archuletas or their two biological children. The mistreatment was discovered when one child was taken to a hospital for seizures and staff found him malnourished and bruised. The case had highlighted long-standing questions about the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, which a federal judge last year ruled was unconstitutionally broken. The judge said many kids often leave state custody in worse shape than before. The system has nearly 30,000 children and is one of the largest child protection agencies in the U.S. Caseworkers face massive workloads and struggle to provide necessary oversight, with only about 100 residential Child Care Licensing investigators to ensure that the state's roughly 10,000 foster homes are providing adequate care, according to Dimple Patel, senior policy analyst with The Texas Association for the Protection of Children. "My son was murdered and I want to know the reason behind it," the boy's birth mother, Nina Stead, said in a Facebook message to Argus Leader Media. "I cannot begin to tell you what I feel inside. My family and I are suffering a great loss." The Sioux Falls boy was taken off life support Jan. 6 after suffering from a traumatic head injury. His foster mother, Mary Beth Jennewein, has been charged with second-degree murder in connection with his death. "I grew up in the system and I know that there are people who foster children and mistreat them," Stead said. "I began to cry just at the thought of how he was treated behind closed doors." Public records do not indicate why the boy was in foster care. A background check for his birth mother, Stead, revealed arrests for disorderly conduct and several traffic violations, as well as an arrest for child abuse in Brule County in 2009. That charge was dismissed by the prosecutor. ARGUS LEADER Foster mother charged in child's death The South Dakota Department of Social Services, which licenses foster parents, would not make anyone available for a phone interview. Spokeswoman Tia Kafka said in an email that abuse by foster parents is rare and that the department deals with fewer than three cases per year. "South Dakota has a rigorous process for licensing of foster parents that is set out in administrative rule," Kafka wrote. Potential foster parents are required to pass a criminal background check conducted by the FBI and the Department of Criminal Investigation, Kafka said. They must also not be on the state's sex offender registry or the South Dakota Central Registry for Child Abuse and Neglect. Foster homes are inspected weekly for the first month after a child comes to live there and monthly after that, Kafka said. Jennewein was licensed to become a foster parent on Jan. 23, 2015, and has fostered five children. The department followed the correct process when licensing Jennewein, Kafka said, and no complaints had been made against her. A statewide criminal background check on Jennewein showed only three minor charges, all traffic-related, between 2004 and 2014. Kafka described the licensing process as "rigorous," but said the department was reviewing its procedures following Jennewein's arrest. "DSS reviews processes in an effort to identify opportunities to make improvements, and will do so in this situation as well," Kafka wrote. Stead said she is thankful her son is no longer being mistreated and that she prays the truth will be made known. "An innocent child was taken and he lived a short life," she said. Midwest Academy highlights child welfare worries Lee Rood, lrood@dmreg.com 8:27 a.m. CDT March 13, 2016 In this photo taken on Thursday, Feb. 11, 2016, a Uhaul is parked outside Midwest Academy in Keokuk, Iowa. Federal, state and county law enforcement officials have returned to the southeast Iowa boarding school for troubled teens following abuse allegations. The Keokuk Daily Gate reports officials with the FBI and the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation returned to Midwest Academy on Thursday to execute a search warrant for records following an initial search of the academy on Jan. 28 and 29. (Photo: Cindy Iutzi/Daily Gate City via AP) Story Highlights Coming Monday: Could Omaha's Boys Town be a model for Iowa group home reforms? First of two parts Last April, 11 students at a southeast Iowa boarding school near Keokuk stampeded through the facility's kitchen and across an open field on the 70-acre property. All but one of the runaways was rounded up within a few hours. The other was found the next evening. Afterward, Midwest Academy owner Ben Trane emailed parents scattered around the country, recounting the incident and urging them not to be frightened into picking up their children. "Please reinforce with all your children that emotional terrorism is not tolerated anymore," he wrote in the email, obtained by The Des Moines Register. What happened next, according to one of five former students whose families have hired a nationally known children's rights lawyer for possible litigation against the company, underscores why child welfare advocates have been warning for years about the risks associated with residential foster care facilities for troubled youths. MORE: Midwest Academy-inspired bill held up in House | Prosecutor: Sex abuse allegation may not stick against academy owner The boys were put into concrete isolation rooms, sometimes two at a time. That isolation lasted at least three weeks for each one, said David Ferleger, the Pennsylvania children's rights lawyer representing a student who recounted the incident. "No matter what one thinks of therapeutic boarding schools, putting a child in a segregation room for three weeks is unacceptable," Ferleger told the Register. Trane has not responded to several requests for interviews regarding allegations at the facility. As state and federal authorities continue to investigate allegations of child sex abuse and other mistreatment of children at Midwest Academy, some Iowa lawmakers have been moving swiftly to require oversight of private-pay facilities that foster struggling youths. State officials concede that they don't know how many youths are being housed in Iowa's private-pay foster care facilities, because no state agency licenses or regulates them. But in May, Hillcrest Family Services in Dubuque, which has been providing government funded residential care for years, is expected to open one more. Awakenings Academy will be a private-pay, six-bedroom program with a more holistic approach for behaviorally challenged boys ages 12 to 17. "Parents whose kids do not qualify for state or federal subsidies still have needs," said John Bellini, a vice president for Hillcrest. A bill passed by the Iowa Senate would at least mandate certification of those homes — requiring that they meet basic health and safety needs, protect children from abuse and neglect, conduct background checks, and limit the use of seclusion and restraint. House members have said it's too late to pass their own bill, but they are weighing whether to add the language into a human service appropriations bill. Nationally, though, residential group homes for troubled youths that receive taxpayer money are coming under increased scrutiny. In states such as California and Illinois, scandals have erupted over widespread reports of sexual abuse, excessive use of restraints and lack of supervision at group homes. RELATED: Despite complaints, agency couldn't regulate boarding school | Search warrant info remains confidential in Midwest Academy case The number of children in any kind of foster care, including residential and group homes, has dropped by almost one-third since the late 1990s. Still, about 57,000 — or 14 percent — of the nation's foster youths live in group care, according to the Annie E. Casey Foundation, which has been pushing Congress for legislative changes. A bipartisan group of U.S. senators, including Iowa's Chuck Grassley, co-chair of the Senate's caucus on foster youths, has been looking to shift funding away from group care that isn't deemed clinically necessary in favor of options that keep more children home or with relatives. Major national providers of residential and community-based programs generally agree with that goal. At a congressional hearing that Grassley chaired in 2014, Jeremy Kohomban, CEO of Children's Village in New York City, said group care is "simply the wrong intervention for most youth, including teens." Kohomban said reforms are needed to address "pervasive incentives" that steer most federal child-welfare dollars into foster care, including group settings. But if you talk to parents who took their children to Midwest Academy, they will tell you almost uniformly that they could no longer handle their sons or daughters at home. And few places would take them. "I didn't sleep at night until I put him in there," said Jeff Rolczynski, who brought his 16-year-old to Midwest Academy from Illinois. "He was either going to be dead or in jail." Rolczynski said he traveled the country in 2011 looking for a place to put his son, who had problems with drugs and alcohol, as well as acting out. "My son's psychologist said I basically had two choices: either I need to come home every day and handcuff him to a bedpost, or find a boarding school of some sort," Rolczynski said. EDITORIAL: Youth homes need state oversight In return for tuition ranging from $30,000 to $50,000 a year, Midwest Academy marketed a "merit model" of behavioral modification that some former students and parents likened to brainwashing. Boys and girls reported being stripped of their possessions and shoes, cut off from communication with family, and prohibited from speaking to their peers until they earned privileges through "good behavior, academics, and leadership." Rolczynski said his son, now 20, changed his behavior in just five months. "It didn't fix him. But it did give him a base as to how he could get back on track," he said. While some parents loved the rigid atmosphere at the boarding school, others complained that it was a traumatizing, one-size-fits-all program that had no basis in child psychology. Laura Gillings, who lives in Minnesota, said her son spent a majority of his three months at the school in 2006 in isolation. Afterward, she said, she learned that he was on the autism spectrum, "which explains why he couldn't understand how to get out of isolation." Gillings said her son, now 23, was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder after attending the academy and Tranquility Bay, a similar school in Jamaica recommended by the staff. That school was shuttered in 2009 after reports of alleged child abuse, unsanitary living conditions, unqualified staff and denial of medical care. "I am still in debt ... paying for the schools that ruined our family," Gillings said. The residential programs, their directors say, fill a dire need, serving patients from areas where no adequate treatment is available. "Only 15 to 30 percent of people have access to specialized care for eating disorders, which means there are a lot of people out there who have zippo," said Doug Bunnell, the chief clinical officer for Monte Nido, a program that began in Malibu, Calif., and now operates centers in five states. But the advertising and the profusion of centers, which typically cost $1,000 a day but can run much higher, is raising concerns among some eating disorders experts, who worry that some programs may be taking advantage of vulnerable patients and their families. In the companies' rush to expand, they argue, quality of treatment may be sacrificed for profit. And they question whether the sparkle atmosphere of some programs is so comfortable that it fosters dependency. "For the most part, the people who are running and working in these programs believe they're doing the right thing," said Dr. Angela Guarda, the director of the eating disorders program at the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore. "But it's a slippery slope," she said. "Money can cloud your view." Many eating disorders specialists agree that some patients require the supervision of residential programs and benefit from the treatment. But studies showing the programs' effectiveness are scant, Dr. Guarda and other experts said. The methods of the handful of studies that exist have been criticized. The quality and form of treatment varies widely across centers, and in some cases includes approaches — equine therapy, for example, or "faith-based" treatment — with little or no scientific evidence behind them. Some programs have full-time psychiatrists and medical doctors on staff, but others lack the expertise to handle emergencies or treat patients with coexisting medical or psychiatric problems. The perks offered to outside clinicians who might refer patients, the experts say, include free trips, restaurant meals, educational seminars and small gifts like pens and key chains dispensed at professional meetings. Critics liken them to pharmaceutical industry tactics that led to laws and policies requiring financial disclosure, though on a smaller scale. Studies had shown that even small gifts from drug companies, like free medication samples, affected doctors' prescription practices. Continue reading the main story What to Look For in an Eating Disorder Treatment Center Choosing a residential treatment program for eating disorders can be challenging. Advertisement Continue reading the main story In an article to be published Monday in the journal Psychiatric Services, Dr. Evelyn Attia, a professor of psychiatry and director of the eating disorders program at Columbia University Medical Center, and four colleagues called for more transparency about the financial relationships between residential centers and the professionals who send them patients, and urged clinicians to be mindful of efforts to influence their recommended treatment. "The effect of these clinician inducements, which are aimed at building a program's patient referral base, may not be fully recognized by the professionals they target," wrote Dr. Attia and her colleagues, who included Dr. Guarda. Several industry representatives said that while they had not seen the journal article, they agreed that more data on patient outcomes and stricter standards were needed. But, they said, the trips and seminars offered to clinicians were primarily educational. "I don't think anyone in the eating disorders world is giving out swimming pools and trips to Europe and things like that," Dr. Bunnell said. Jillian Lampert, president of the Residential Eating Disorders Consortium, a group that represents about 85 percent of the centers, said, "Health care's always been a business," adding that quality and profit were not mutually exclusive. If there are concerns, she said, "we are incredibly open to having those conversations." A Deadly Mental Illness Eating disorders are among the most difficult mental illnesses to treat. Anorexia, in particular, has stymied many of psychiatry's best treatment efforts. The illness has the highest mortality rate of any mental disorder, with patients dying from the medical complications of starvation or from suicide. And patients often resist treatments that make them feel uncomfortable. The most severely ill patients — the prognosis is grimmer the longer someone has anorexia, studies suggest — require hospital treatment just to stay alive. But even after being stabilized, many patients need continual supervision for a time to regain weight and learn new behavior. The length of stay in residential centers ranges from two weeks to a year. A 2006 study found that the average stay was 83 days. In the past, health insurance companies placed strict limits on coverage for eating disorders, treating them differently from other medical illnesses. Few insurers were willing to pay for 24-hour care after a patient was out of immediate danger. But the passage of the Mental Health Parity and Addiction Equity Act in 2008 and the Affordable Care Act two years later mandated equal treatment. Lawsuits brought by the families of patients who were denied coverage added to the pressure on insurers. In 2012, a federal appeals court ruled that health plans must cover residential treatment for anorexia under California's parity law. The higher reimbursement rates offered some relief to families, who had often mortgaged their houses or drained their savings to pay for critically needed care. Advertisement Continue reading the main story They also attracted the attention of Wall Street investors, who saw profits in providing treatment for so-called behavioral health problems like eating disorders, alcoholism and drug abuse. "The number of covered lives is growing faster than the availability of services to treat them, creating compelling investment opportunities," the accounting and consulting firm BDO noted last year in an article on its website, referring to the effects of the legal changes. Advertisement Continue reading the main story As the industry has expanded, larger centers have acquired smaller ones and some programs, flush with private equity investments, have expanded across the country. For example, Monte Nido, a treatment program founded by Carolyn Costin, a former teacher who recovered from an eating disorder, began with a center in Malibu. But in 2012, with financing from Centre Partners, a middle-market equity firm, Monte Nido began opening new residential centers and day-treatment programs. The company now has centers in Oregon, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and New York, including one in a renovated mansion in Westchester County. Last year, noting that the investment had "tripled the company's facility footprint during our ownership period," Centre Partners sold Monte Nido to another investment firm, Levine Leichtman Capital Partners, for an undisclosed sum. "I believe that the Monte Nido's [sic] approach to eating disorder treatment is what you and others like you have been waiting for," Ms. Costin wrote in a letter to potential patients on the company's website, which includes images of beaches, mountains and the Boston skyline on its home page. With a need to fill more beds, marketers for some centers make cold calls to psychiatrists, psychotherapists, medical doctors and others who treat eating disorders, offering to inform them about a program's advantages and inviting them to visit. The Denver-based Eating Recovery Center has a call center and employs 20 "professional relations liaisons" who contact clinicians across the country. The author and motivational speaker Jenni Schaefer, who recovered from an eating disorder, recently joined the program's outreach team. On its website, the company, which began with a single center, bills itself as "the only national health care system devoted to serious eating disorders at all levels of care." Craig Johnson, a well-known eating disorders specialist, joined the company in 2010 and has seen it through its expansion to 24 treatment programs in seven states, including three residential centers. He said when therapists visit, the focus is education, not entertainment. "We're delivering lectures," Dr. Johnson said. Some therapists see the offer of free trips as a chance to view the facilities that they might recommend to patients. Ann Jacob Smith, a family therapist in Chevy Chase, Md., said that last year, she accepted an invitation to visit the Oliver-Pyatt eating disorders center in Miami. (The center is now part of Monte Nido). "It was absolutely promotional," she said, "But it was actually really educational. They took us in depth into what they did." Advertisement Continue reading the main story Her later referrals were not influenced by the visit, she added. "I'm not impressed by being romanced." But Adrian Brown, a psychiatrist in Virginia, said that therapists who had not gone through the "battle phase" with drug companies might not even realize they were being swayed by financial interests. Dr. Brown recalled being offered a "V.I.P." trip to a treatment center, with the representative telling her, "We will pay your way, put you up in a really nice hotel, all expenses paid, yoga and whatever." Dr. Brown responded, "No, that's not ethical.” The representative replied, “What do you mean?” Another invitation arrived the next year. Credit Jenn Ackerman for The New York Times Mixed Results Prospective patients or family members searching for a treatment program sometimes turn to ed.treatmentreview.com, where former patients describe their experiences at different centers, evaluating the staff, critiquing the food and noting whether cellphones are allowed. Many reviewers have spent time in more than one residential center and the opinions on any particular program vary widely, a range reflected in interviews with former patients over the last several months. Tina Klaus, a 51-year-old artist who has struggled with bulimia since she was 10, said residential care was initially useful. “Residential treatment is vital when you are at your ultimate rock bottom” she said. But once home, her illness worsened because “you’re going back into your life, you’re going back into all the emotions you used your eating disorder to hide from.” Melissa R., 28, who asked that her last name not be used for reasons of privacy, said after several hospitalizations for anorexia, beginning when she was 21, she found a residential center in the Southwest on the Internet and spent six weeks there. The center, which she described as “more like a resort,” was “somewhat helpful,” she said, but not worth the time and money. “People were nice, and the food was really good,” she said. “I had fun, I enjoyed rock climbing and stuff, but that’s not why I was there. I’m paying a lot of money to get well, not to rock climb.” Last year, she spent two months at Eating Recovery Center in Denver, moving from residential care to day treatment, and began to gain control of her illness. “E.R.C. was the best place I’ve been,” she said about the center. “They were very individualized.” Ashley Bilkie, 29, had a different experience with E.R.C. When she returned home in February 2015 after about six months in the Denver program — her fourth stay in an inpatient program for treatment of anorexia and her second at E.R.C. — “I was getting sicker and sicker,” she said. She lost the weight she had gained back at the center. “I had to buy children’s clothing,” she said. She was evasive with her parents. At the recovery center, she said, “It was kind of like they set up a battle between myself and my parents.” For their part, Ms. Bilkie’s parents, who for years had watched their daughter’s health decline, grew frantic. Ms. Bilkie would disappear, her father, Robert Bilkie, said, and he would find her wandering the aisles at Kroger or Target. Driving through the neighborhood, he half-expected to see her hanging from a tree. Advertisement Continue reading the main story Advertisement Continue reading the main story “It’s a parent’s worst nightmare,” he said. It was also expensive. Mr. Bilkie, a financial adviser in Michigan, calculated that over three years, he paid at least $350,000 for unreimbursed inpatient care for his daughter. The Eating Recovery Center, he said, sent him bills for $30,000 each month. Mr. Bilkie paid willingly — he was desperate to see Ashley get well, he said — but no program seemed to produce lasting results. “We spent an outrageous amount of money for what really amounted to ineffectual treatment,” Mr. Bilkie said. Last fall, Ms. Bilkie entered the eating disorder center at the Johns Hopkins Medical Center, a university affiliated program. Photo Ms. Bilkie is studying to be a nurse. Credit Laura McDermott for The New York Times The staff there gradually weaned her off some drugs she had been taking taking at the center in Denver, including high doses of Xanax, a tranquilizer, and Adderall, an attention deficit drug and a stimulant. In group therapy, other patients put pressure on her to change her behavior. It was a switch, she said, from previous groups, where patients talked about their problems. With the program’s stress on weight restoration — studies show that it is the best predictor of how anorexic patients will do once they leave, rather than, say, elevated mood — her weight returned to normal. She was discharged in November and continues to do well. “I hated every single solitary second of it,” she said of the experience. “But that’s a good thing, because I was not comfortable, and it meant that something was working.” Dr. Ovidio Bermudez, the chief clinical officer of Eating Recovery Center, said that other patients have fared poorly at academic centers and then done well at E.R.C. Despite Ms. Bilkie’s perception, he said, therapists at the program did not try to divide patients from their families. (Ms. Bilkie gave Eating Recovery Center permission to discuss her case.) “We would have to filter this through 20/20 hindsight,” Dr. Bermudez said. “It’s really hard to know what somebody’s frame of mind is and the degree of fragility they bring to any treatment experience.” Dr. Anne Marie O’Melia, a psychiatrist at the recovery center, said Ms. Bilkie was on Xanax when she arrived and was fearful of reducing the drug’s dosage, though the center tried. She was switched to Adderall from another stimulant at E.R.C., Dr. O’Melia said, to treat “significant impulsivity.” Seeking Standards Ms. Bilkie’s history of ups and downs is not unusual for patients with eating disorders. “In many cases, you see one step forward, two steps back,” said Dr. Mark Friedlander, the chief medical officer for Aetna Behavioral Health. His company, Dr. Friedlander said, considers residential care essential for treatment of some patients. But, he said, a lack of outcome studies, an absence of industry standards and a patchwork licensing system across states make it difficult for Aetna or other insurers to evaluate care. “We would love to see greater consistency and higher standards,” he said. To that end, a group of eating disorder specialists from treatment centers, including Eating Recovery Center and Monte Nido, have developed a list of minimum requirements for accreditation of residential programs. The Joint Commission, an independent company that accredits health care facilities, has adopted the requirements, which go into effect July 1. Dr. Lampert, president of the consortium, said the centers in the organization were also collecting data on patient outcomes, lengths of stay and other variables, with each center collecting data on 15 consecutive admissions of adults and adolescents. In the meantime, many patients and families will continue to rely on word of mouth and any information they can find online. “These are black boxes,” Dr. Scott Hadland, an adolescent medicine specialist at Harvard Medical School, said of the residential centers. “People get the idea that these are places that can heal just based on what they see on a website or in the photos.” Source: http://www.nytimes.com/2016/03/15/health/eating-disorders-anorexia-bulimia-treatment-centers.html?_r=0

MT. PLEASANT, Sanpete County — The Sanpete County Sheriff’s Office is investigating allegations of sexual abuse and obstruction of justice at a southern Utah residential treatment center, a newly unsealed search warrant reveals. Sheriff’s deputies went to the Mount Pleasant Academy, 70 W. 1100 South in Mt. Pleasant, and seized multiple computer hard drives and at least one computer tower, according to a search warrant affidavit that was executed on Feb. 23. The warrant was unsealed in 6th District Court Tuesday. Investigators were looking for documents, data, emails, photographs, filings and other evidence of multiple sex crimes as well as evidence of attempts to conceal the crimes, the affidavit states. The investigation began in January when the Division of Child and Family Services received information “that juveniles at a youth group home (Mt. Pleasant Academy) were engaged in unlawful sexual activity and that the staff members of the home were aware of the activity and not reporting to the proper authorities,” according to the warrant. A staff member from the academy who wished to remain anonymous filed the complaint, the warrant states. “The intake report also stated that staff members do not supervise the children appropriately to prevent sexual incidences between the children. In the intake report, the complainant also makes allegations that the director of the youth home is sharing video surveillance with other staff members,” the affidavit states. Six days after the division contacted the sheriff’s office, interviews were conducted with three boys at the ranch. “Interviews indicated that there had been sexual activity between some of the boys in the home and that the staff was aware of the sexual activity,” according to the warrant. Sanpete County Sheriff Brian Nielson confirmed Tuesday there is an active investigation, but he said it will likely take some time to complete. Until then, he said he was unable to comment. On its website, the Mount Pleasant Academy advertises itself as “a small, 16-bed, residential treatment center for boys ages 12-18 struggling with compulsive sexual behaviors, sensitive sexual issues, pornography addiction, and/or digital addictions.” The director of the academy on Wednesday referred all calls to the executive director. A call left at the executive director’s St. George office was not returned Wednesday. Investigation underway in Winter Park foster care agency Updated: Mar 16, 2016 - 5:20 PM 1 Tweet this to your followers! From To Compose your message 114 Thanks for sharing with your followers! Investigation underway in Winter Park foster care agency - <http://www.wftv.com/news/9-investigates-investigation-underway-in-winter-park-foster-care-agency/165156176> <http://www.wftv.com/news/9-investigates-investigation-underway-in-winter-park-foster-care-agency/165156176> WINTER PARK, Fla. — Eyewitness News uncovered one of the largest foster care agencies in Florida is denying allegations of Medicaid fraud. Officials said the Children’s Home Society of Florida admitted to 9 Investigates they made billing errors totaling $82,000. Eyewitness News was first tipped off early Wednesday that a whistleblower complaint sparked the investigation at the state’s oldest and largest statewide organization. The facility based in Winter Park has a stellar reputation, providing care for 50,000 families throughout Florida. According to the most recent tax returns available, the agency received $7 million in Medicaid and/or Medicare payments from the state and federal government to provide care for those families. Now, an investigation is underway to find out if the agency over-billed the government for those claims. A spokesperson later sent Eyewitness News a statement, admitting the agency uncovered billing claim errors, totaling $82,000. In a statement, the agency said: "In July 2014, Children's Home Society of Florida implemented a new electronic health records and billing system. During this transition, we experienced some implementation challenges related to billing errors which resulted in allegations of fraud. Once management was made aware of the allegations we took several actions: We immediately reported the allegations to the Inspector General's Office for the Agency for Healthcare Administration. We engaged outside counsel and an auditing firm to independently investigate the allegations. The investigation concluded there was no fraud committed. CHS assigned a team comprised of senior management to perform a claim-by-claim review of every transaction dating back to July 2014 when the new billing system was first implemented. As of today, this review has identified claim errors totaling $82,876. We have repaid $66,821 to date and the remaining $16,055 is in the repayment process. All claims submitted were for services that were actually provided. Because there were no findings of fraud, no CHS employees have been disciplined in connection with any part of this investigation. Specifically, Bob Wydra, our former Chief Financial Officer, did not leave CHS as a result of this investigation. We continue to encourage our employees to raise any concerns through an independent whistleblower hotline, which reinforces our commitment to transparency. Going forward, CHS has engaged outside consultants to resolve any outstanding issues with our billing implementation system. We are also providing increased and enhanced training for staff on how to use the new billing system. CHS has a strong history of caring for children and families across Florida. Our services depend on our strong and committed workforce. We will continue to review our billing implementation systems while maintaining the same high level of quality services to children and families that we've provided for more than 100 years." Eyewitness News was told the agency implemented a new electronic health records and billing system in 2014. During that process, a spokesperson said there were challenges related to billing errors, but allegations of fraud were unfounded. Eyewitness News asked if their internal investigation was related to the recent departure of CFO Bob Wydra. A spokesperson said no employees with the Children's Home Society have been disciplined because there were no findings of fraud. A spokesperson told Eyewitness News Wydra did not leave as a result of the investigation. The state attorney general would not confirm or deny an ongoing investigation on that level. They did confirm they have received five complaints against the agency since January of 2015, but wouldn't say what they are related to. Controversial youth program director seeks House seat By Dan Boyd / Capitol Bureau Chief Friday, March 18th, 2016 at 12:01am SANTA FE – The owner of a southwestern New Mexico ranch whose youth program has come under fire and been the subject of several lawsuits – at least one of which is still pending – is running for an open seat in the state House. CHANDLER: Says he's conservative, independent Scott Chandler, the owner of Tierra Blanca Ranch, said this week that he doesn't think the high-profile abuse allegations will be a distraction during his campaign this year. "I don't think so. I don't want it to be (a distraction)," Chandler said in an interview, pointing out that no one affiliated with the ranch's youth program has faced criminal charges. "If anything, I think it shows I've been vetted." Chandler, a Deming Republican, is one of four candidates – two Republicans and two Democrats – vying for the House District 32 seat currently held by Rep. Dona Irwin, D-Deming. Irwin, who was first elected to the seat in 1998, is not seeking re-election this year. The race could play a role in determining which political party ends up controlling the House. Republicans currently hold a 37-33 edge and are seeking to retain control after a historic takeover of the chamber in 2014. Chandler likely has the most statewide name recognition of any of the four candidates, though much of the attention the former college football player has received has come because of his ranch. Tierra Blanca is a 30,000-acre working cattle operation in New Mexico's Black Range. The ranch's High Country Youth Program is intended to "teach responsibility, self-discipline and the existence of consequences" to troubled teens, according to its website. While some former ranch residents have praised Chandler and the youth program's positive impact, other participants have claimed they were beaten, shackled and fed starvation rations. New Mexico State Police agents and social workers, responding to abuse allegations, showed up at the ranch in October 2013 to try to take custody of the children staying there. That led the Chandlers to file a lawsuit against the Children, Youth and Families Department in 2013, claiming the agency had overstepped its authority. The lawsuit was settled in 2014. Meanwhile, three lawsuits have been filed by families alleging their children were abused at the ranch. Two of those lawsuits have been dismissed, state court records show, and one is still pending. In addition, Chandler and his wife have a separate lawsuit pending against the State Police and the state Department of Public Safety, among other parties. The lawsuit alleges that Chandler was defamed by Gov. Susana Martinez's security detail when he was asked to leave a GOP event in Luna County that the governor was attending. Chandler said this week that his family is "very proud of how we've helped people." He described himself as "very conservative" on most issues, but said that, if elected, he'd be politically independent and willing to work with Democratic lawmakers on regional job creation efforts. The other candidates running for the open seat are Democrats Candie Sweetser and Frederick Sherman, and Republican Vicki Chavez. All four are Deming residents, according to campaign filings. Foster care scandal: Human services director fires top child welfare officials 1 / 6 foster care feb. 3, 2016 Oregon's then-interim human services director Clyde Saiki, left, and Dani Ledezma, a policy adviser for Gov. Kate Brown, prepare to testify to lawmakers in support of foster care reform legislation. Saiki is among those sued Thursday over treatment of two vulnerable preschoolers. Denis C. Theriault/staff Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive Print Email By Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive The Oregonian Email the author | Follow on Twitter On March 18, 2016 at 11:04 AM, updated March 18, 2016 at 2:32 PM Kate Brown Answering a foster care abuse scandal that's rocked the Department of Human Services for months, Gov. Kate Brown's newly appointed human services director, Clyde Saiki, has fired two of the agency's most senior child welfare officials. Ousted are Jerry Waybrant, the agency's chief operating officer over child welfare programs, and Lois Day, the agency's current child welfare director. Saiki announced the dismissals Friday, days after Brown made his position atop the agency permanent. "When the governor asked me to serve as the director of DHS," Saiki said in a statement, "she made it very clear that one of my top priorities was the safety of children entrusted to our care. She had serious concerns about some of the incidents that came to light over the past year, and I share those concerns, too. "I need to have leaders who can help DHS move in the direction we need to go. I am making changes today, and in the coming months I will make additional personnel changes, as needed," he continued. The decision also came as the agency learned of a \$60 million lawsuit that accuses officials of allowing two small children under its watch to endure severe starvation. In a note to lawmakers Thursday morning, obtained by The Oregonian/OregonLive, Saiki said he acted "after reviewing the case and based on my assessment of our child welfare program." Jerry Waybrant Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive Waybrant briefly served as the agency's acting director last year, until he was replaced by Saiki. Brown demoted him amid reports he was among a group of senior officials, including former director Erinn Kelley-Siel, who'd continued placing children with a Northeast Portland provider despite repeated red flags over abuse complaints and financial problems. Day was also among that group. She had retained her job atop the child welfare program, even as lawmakers led by Sen. Sara Gelser, D-Corvallis, held a series of hearings on foster care lapses and released hundreds of pages of documents showing concerns and indifference had stretched back years. Those hearings led to legislation, Senate Bill 1515, that requires quarterly reports on abuse, tightens licensing rules for providers and makes it a crime for officials to knowingly ignore neglect. Day, repeatedly called to testify in front of lawmakers, had called Gelser's proposals "very good." Earlier, in September, she had promised an internal review of the agency. Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive "I feel responsible for helping see this through," she said in November, "to ensure this doesn't occur again." The records released by Gelser show officials had known about problems at provider Give Us This Day for more than a decade, adding to revelations that included allegations of \$2 million in misspent money and children forced to deal with mold, hunger, inappropriate force and a lack of bedding. And a complaint log released among the documents raised serious questions about the way human services officials handle complaints of abuse and neglect. Many serious complaints against Give Us This Day and its employees never went beyond an initial screening. The words "no investigation" appeared next to reports on allegations including anal rape, sexual fondling, children accused of having sex after being found in the same bed, a lack of supervision from foster parents, bruises and death threats. Oregon's foster care system, in charge of thousands of kids on any given day, has long faced troubles — paying millions of dollars to settle abuse claims and struggling under budget cuts that sapped caseworker staffing and sent caseloads skyrocketing. In June, The Oregonian/OregonLive found the Human Services Department had struggled to report a basic means of keeping children safe: monthly visits from caseworkers. Federal audits have repeatedly dinged the department for falling behind benchmarks. Saiki has presided over a steady shakeup since being given interim control of the department in November. Under Saiki, department administrators now meet regularly to discuss abuse claims and licensing infractions. And Saiki has talked about opening his door directly to employees and others who worry mid-level managers aren't heeding their concerns. Earlier, some foster care programs, despite racking up complaint after complaint, had continued receiving children despite lingering on a department watch list for years. Twice since November, the department has moved against the licenses of programs who'd been on that list. One of those providers, Youth Villages in Lake Oswego, closed one of its programs as part of a settlement with the state. Saiki has also been asked to shepherd an outside review of the department's child welfare system, another effort launched by Brown. "Our mission is to assist Oregonians in achieving safety, health and independence — and in some areas we have lost that focus," Saiki said in a statement Friday. "It is my job to make the decisions and changes, sometimes difficult ones, to restore that focus on safety. The governor expects it, and Oregonians deserve it." — Denis C. Long Island Foster Parent Accused Of Sexually Abusing Kids In His Care « CBS New York. Suffolk DA: Long Island Foster Parent Accused Of Sexually Abusing Boys, Dog March 18, 2016 5:20 PM Filed Under: Cesar Gonzalez-Mugaburu, Sex Abuse 2 RIVERHEAD, N.Y. (CBSNewYork/AP) — A Long Island man is accused of sexually abusing at least seven foster children in his care at a home prosecutors described as a "house of horrors." Cesar Gonzalez-Mugaburu, 60, of Ridge, pleaded not guilty to child endangerment and sexual misconduct charges at his arraignment Friday in state Supreme Court in Riverhead. Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota said the victims, who were as young as 8, were forced to live under punishing conditions. "Physical contact, physical abuse, hitting them, denying them meals, making them stand out in the cold," Spota said. Neighbors claimed they saw some of the children rummaging through garbage cans in search of food, Spota said. Mugaburu fostered 140 children over 19 years, earning as much as $18,000 a month, authorities said. The children were all boys with special needs. The floodgates opened when seven boys recently came forward, afraid until now to admit the heinous abuse, CBS2's Jennifer McLogan reported. The district attorney said Mugaburu also abused the family dog. The victims said he threatened and controlled them with physical beatings, cutting off cell phone contact, not allowing girlfriends, and giving them two meals a day. CBS2 asked neighbors if they had suspicions. "We've seen him always putting out there with his cars and the kids doing yard work, tidying up the place," neighbor Christine Stein told CBS2. "I've talked to them, played baseball with them, never complained. It's insane. I never would have thought this," neighbor Patrick Cawley said. Authorities said the children were placed in his care by New York City child welfare officials and SCO Family of Services, a non-profit group on Long Island. "SCO Family of Services is aware that the Suffolk County District Attorney has filed charges against a former SCO foster parent in connection with allegations of abuse and maltreatment," the group said in a statement. "SCO considers the safety and wellbeing of children in our programs to be our absolute highest priority. We are cooperating with authorities as they continue their investigation." A spokeswoman for New York City's Administration for Children's Services didn't immediately comment on the allegations. The defense attorney denies Mugaburu was ever abusive, calling him a doting and caring father who was never in trouble with the law. The district attorney wants to know if the nonprofit organization ever made house calls or checked up on Mugaburu in any way. Detectives said they expect there are dozens more victims. He is being held on $500,000 bail. He faces up to 50 years in prison if convicted. Source: <http://newyork.cbslocal.com/2016/03/18/long-island-foster-parent-sex-abuse/>

Youth Services International history of problems dates to 1989 | www.mypalmbeachpost.com Detainees forced to pay for forks; shackled teen coughing up blood News By Pat Beall - Palm Beach Post Staff Writer 0 Posted: 7:32 p.m. Friday, March 18, 2016 Youth Services International is not the only for-profit juvenile detention company targeted for criticism. But, say critics, the company, its founder James Slattery and YSI's predecessor companies have been under fire for far longer than other firms, in more states and for many of the same issues. 1989: Hoteliers James Slattery and Morris Horn's stab at government-subsidized housing ends amid allegations of squalor — and roughly 600 code violations — at New York City's infamous Brooklyn Arms welfare hotel. The hotel is closed. Undaunted, the two men found Esmor Correctional Services and strike a deal with the federal government to house immigrant detainees. 1995: One year after Esmor begins operating a New Jersey immigrant detention center for the federal government, immigrants riot. A federal investigation finds detainees were forced to pay for forks and spoons. Women were denied sanitary napkins. Clothing was dirty, and soap was withheld. Severe understaffing forced 16-hour shifts. And the facility administrator said corporate policy was to keep the government "in the dark." The contract was canceled. Detainees sued. 1997: Esmor reorganizes as Correctional Services Corp. and moves to Florida, where it contracts with the state to run the 350-bed Pahokee Youth Development Center for teenage offenders. Eight months later, a Dade County Circuit judge reports "physical and psychological conditions bordered upon child abuse." The state defends its contractor and Slattery denies reports of problems. The state contract is ended early, by "mutual agreement." 2001: A teenager serving six months at a Texas boot camp run by CSC dies of pneumonia. According to a suit filed by his family, Bryan Alexander had been coughing up blood for days before he was shackled in leg irons and taken to a hospital. A suit was settled for more than $38 million. 2004: The U.S. Justice Department concluded teenagers at the YSI-run Charles H. Hickey Jr. School in Maryland were in danger. Citing "a deeply disturbing" degree of violence by staff, federal investigators found excessive solitary confinement, female staffers romantically involved with teenagers as young as 14 and psychiatric drugs used to sedate teens. 2010: The Southern Poverty Law Center sued YSI over management of Broward County's Thompson Academy. There wasn't enough to eat, said teenagers, and weight loss of 10 pounds or more was common. Excessive force was being used, and some teenagers were promised rewards if they did not speak to their lawyers, according to the suit, which was settled and sealed. 2012: The Pembroke Pines Police Department filed misdemeanor battery charges against two Thompson staffers. According to police records, one abruptly put a teen in a choke hold. Witnesses said the teen stopped breathing, but the guard refused to release him. In a separate incident, a staffer grabbed a teenager by the neck and began choking him. 2013: The U.S. Justice Department found that of 41 teenagers at the YSI-run Palm Beach County Juvenile Correctional Facility who filled out a confidential survey, 16.2 percent reported sex abuse, more than triple the statewide average of 5.2 percent. All of the self-reported sex offenses involved staff, and about two-thirds of them involved force, the teens said. A Florida Department of Juvenile Justice review found no substantiated cases. Santa Teresa youth facility faces state sanctions Diana Alba Soular, Las Cruces Sun-News 5:47 p.m. MDT March 19, 2016 Company says it's making improvements Pictured is the Peak Behavioral Health Services facility located at 5055 McNutt Road in Santa Teresa, New Mexico. (Photo: Robin Zielinski / Sun-News) 350 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE LAS CRUCES - A Santa Teresa mental-health and substance-abuse treatment facility for teens is under a six-month-long period of intense state scrutiny after findings that it routinely neglected residents' safety last year. A statewide advocacy group in late 2015 issued a highly critical report on the 119-bed facility, known as Peak Behavioral Health Services, or "The Peak" for short, and urged potential clients to consider other options for psychiatric treatment. Meanwhile, Peak Behavioral Health and its parent company, Strategic Behavioral Health, issued a statement, saying they're collaborating with the state to make improvements and have implemented "many" changes contained in a corrective plan. Report issued The 28-page report, issued by the nonprofit advocacy group Disability Rights New Mexico, concluded that Peak Behavioral Health failed to protect its teen residents from attacks by other residents and used questionable physical restraints and chemical restraints — the use of medicine to subdue someone — during a 13-month period of monitoring by the group that ended in the fall of last year. Also, residents were found to have escaped from the center in 23 instances. In all, Disability Rights New Mexico — a state-designated disability rights watchdog group — found there were 80 incidents of "resident-on-resident violence or aggression" that resulted in "numerous injuries," including a broken nose, loss of teeth, bleeding and swollen lips, a cut that required stitches. Also, there were "eye, hand and ankle injuries requiring X-rays," the report states. Police were called to the facility's adolescent Residential Treatment Center on 21 occasions, according to the report. More than 50 suicide attempts and self-harming incidents were reported. Disability Rights New Mexico reviewed 316 incident reports submitted by Peak Behavioral Health — run by Strategic Behavioral Health — from the 13-month time frame and carried out interviews with residents at the center. The group concluded the company "provided an unsafe environment" that was the "result of a pattern and practice of neglect" in violation of state regulations, according to its report. "The frequency of resident-on-resident violence reported above, in conjunction with perpetual incidents of self-harm, elopement, and sexual allegations, clearly pinpoint the Peak's failure to provide a safe and humane psychological and physical environment," the report states. "To that end, DRNM is deeply concerned about the safety of residents on the RTC (Residential Treatment Center) units at the Peak under the care of Strategic Behavioral Health." Among incidents cited by Disability Rights New Mexico were a resident who was hit by another resident and was taken to a hospital ER for stitches; a resident who was "punched in the face" by another resident and suffered a broken nose; and a resident who was "straddled by a peer and kicked and punched in the face 4-5 times," while another resident was a "lookout" on the watch for staff. Some residents reported being in fear of other residents. In concluding the report, Disability Rights New Mexico stated it "encourages adolescent consumers and their guardians who are seeking residential treatment options to consider alternatives to the Peak," the report states. It also recommended that judges and court officials "seek alternatives to the Peak" when ordering teens to attend residential treatment facilities. Restraint use questioned In addition, the organization found that Peak Behavioral Health staff failed to fully fill out incident reports about the use of physical restraints, which is required by state regulation, and implemented "questionable use of restraint for incidents that did not meet the criteria of an emergency situation," according to the document. And there was "frequent" use of medication restraints after physical restraints, the document states. Nancy Koenigsberg, senior attorney with Disability Rights New Mexico, said restraints are a way to address a patient who's endangering himself, herself or other people. But restraints should be a last resort. They're not a form of treatment and shouldn't be used lightly, especially because teens can have backgrounds of physical or sexual abuse and find the restraints traumatic, she said. "Restraints are not therapy," she said. For instance, Koenigsberg said, a child failing to obey a directive is not appropriate justification to use restraints. But the frequent use of restraints, including medication-type restraints after instances of physical restraints, at Peak Behavioral Health during DRNM's monitoring period was a sign of a break-down in its treatment program, Koenigsberg said. That's because clients, including those with self-harming tendencies initially, should be making strides toward well-being during their stays at the facility. A high rate of restraint incidents isn't a positive sign, she said. Questionable uses of restraints identified in Disability Rights New Mexico's report include a resident who was "restrained for 37 minutes after throwing a tennis ball at a staff member," a resident who was restrained for "screaming at staff" and a resident who was restrained after "throwing yogurt at a wall," according to the document. Separate from DRNM's investigation, the New Mexico Children, Youth & Families Department was carrying out an investigation of its own last year that resulted in sanctions because of similar findings, said Henry Varela, spokesman for the agency. Jose R. Santos, chief executive officer for Peak Behavioral Health Services, said in a prepared statement that the company is "dedicated to providing excellent care to adolescents in our residential treatment program, which is focused on the underserved population of children with significant mental health issues." "We have been working collaboratively with the state's Children, Youth and Families Department to make improvements in our program that address concerns the agency raised in its report, and have taken those concerns very seriously," he wrote. The facility serves clients who are referred by a variety of agencies and organizations. That's after a treatment authorization by one of the insurance plans — also called Managed Care Organizations — in New Mexico, officials said. Clients can fall under either Medicaid or private insurance. State sanctions According to public records obtained by the Sun-News, the state department issued a "notice of contemplated action" against Peak Behavioral Health on Nov. 9 of last year, based on its findings. A Nov. 23 letter from the state to the center indicating the state planned to issue "formal sanctions," including directing corrective actions and implementing a compliance monitor team, according to the document. It also specified that facility, based on earlier negotiations, had voluntarily agreed to a freeze on new admissions, which would "remain in place for a minimum of 30 days after the Compliance Monitor begins." And after the freeze, Peak Behavioral Health would voluntarily cap the client population in the center. Varela said the existing clients at the facility at the time of the admissions freeze were transitioned out in several ways. Some were transferred to other centers. Others were at the normal end of their treatment stay or because their treatment needs required less-intensive care. A Nov. 24 memo from CYFD to the state to the company specified that an independent professional, Katie Cosper, had been appointed to serve as a compliance monitor for the residential center for six months, along with state staff that would work with her. Cosper was tasked with reviewing center records and policies to make sure proper policies were in place, making recommendations on how to correct violations and "improve overall programming," according to the document. Santos said Peak Behavioral Health Services has submitted an action plan to the state and has "already implemented many of the improvements it contains." "In fact, some of the changes were already underway before the state issued its report," he wrote. "Nationally recognized experts have been brought in to conduct training at our facility, and we have brought on new medical and administrative leadership. We have also revamped our assessment methods, and improved management of medication and medical issues." Continued Santos: "Perhaps, most importantly, we have put in place a new treatment model, which focuses on helping residents heal from the traumatic abuse that most of them have suffered." Santos noted the facility is "fully accredited" by The Joint Commission, the "leading agency in healthcare." He said it's been "recognized by The Joint Commission for the past three years as a top performer on key quality programs." There's been a change in CEOs at the facility since last year. Admissions re-launched In late February, CYFD sent a letter to Strategic Behavioral Health — Peak Behavioral Health's parent company — notifying it that the state had received the facility's revised policies and procedures regarding the use of restraints and seclusion practices. Daphne Rood-Hopkins, children's behavioral health director for CYFD, also said that the state was "ready to proceed with allowing admissions to the Peak" according to a verbal agreement made earlier. "We agreed that the Peak will admit 2 boys and 2 girls per week for the next 4 weeks for a total of 16 admissions," the letter states. Varela said the gradual addition of clients is a way to resume the needed service, while ensuring that children are receiving proper treatment. There are weekly visits by the monitoring team, he said. "It's a way to slowly bring them in," he said of the clients. Varela said the state's efforts are not only scrutinizing the center, but also meant to help it develop sound practices because there is a big need for mental health services. "We assist in any way we can to make sure they have the resources they need," he said. The six-month monitoring period by the state began in November, according to Varela. That means it will run through May. Diana Alba Soular may be reached at 575-541-5443, dalba@lcsun-news.com or @AlbaSoular on Twitter. City sent me to therapy with my abuser when I asked for help: suit By Kathianne Boniello March 20, 2016 | 1:02am Modal Trigger Photo: Shutterstock More On: lawsuits Instead of rescuing her from a hellish foster home, a Bronx woman says social workers and therapists hired by the city ignored her complaints and sent her to therapy with her abuser. Now 20 years old, the woman has filed a $3 million lawsuit against the Administration for Children's Services workers, foster-care program and therapists who oversaw her case, claiming they never investigated her reports of abuse or reported it to authorities. Therapists at Arista Center for Psychotherapy forced her into counseling with the foster mom who assaulted her, the woman claims. — ADVERTISEMENT — The woman, whom the city took from her parents before she was 2, "learned that her cries for help . . . would be ignored or reported directly back to the perpetrator of harm, until she learned to no longer ask for help," the lawsuit says. ACS and a Bronx foster-care program called Abbott House placed the woman, identified only as "E.L.A.," in the foster home of Linda Smalls as a young child without properly investigating the home, who was living there or checking the sleeping arrangements, she claims in Manhattan federal court papers. In 2003, the girl told a teacher that Smalls abused her, but social workers and the therapists at Arista in Queens never talked to the educator, the girl alleges. Abbott House declined to comment. Arista did not return a message. Smalls could not be reached. Source: <http://nypost.com/2016/03/20/city-sent-me-to-therapy-with-my-abuser-when-i-asked-for-help-suit/>

EXCLUSIVE: Accused Long Island pedophile foster parent kept terrified children locked in rooms BY Ross Keith, Joseph Stepansky, Larry McShane NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Sunday, March 20, 2016, 4:00 AM A A A facebook Tweet email Share this URL David Wexler/For New York Daily News Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu's foster home was a house of horrors for four children who spent two unsettling months with him in 2009. An accused pedophile foster parent who preyed upon boys tried to keep a 1-year-old in his Long Island house of horrors, while striving to evict his three older sisters, their mother told the Daily News. Creepy Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu, 59, left the girls in tears with his bizarre behavior during their time together and tried to arrange their transfer to another home, according to mom Sue O'Keefe. "He just wanted my son," O'Keefe told The News in a Saturday interview at her Staten Island home. "He didn't want my daughters. . . . It didn't make sense to me. Why would you keep my son?" Gonzales-Mugaburu, of Ridge, L.I., was charged with sexually abusing seven children — and a pet dog — inside his home on a Suffolk County cul-de-sac. He was jailed on $1 million bond. Prosecutors say there were likely more victims among the 140 kids he took in over the past 20 years. L.I. FOSTER PARENT ABUSED CHILDREN FOR 20 YEARS: PROSECUTORS "You never got a good vibe from this guy," said O'Keefe, who recognized a photo of Gonzales-Mugaburu from The News' front page. Suffolk County District Attorney's Office/Reuters Gonzales-Mugaburu kept foster children locked in their rooms, barred them from playing with other kids and once sliced all the cables to the television as punishment. Her children began recounting memories of abuse and bizarre antics after seeing the picture of their alleged tormentor, she said. O'Keefe said caseworkers told her at one point that her daughters were in good hands with the alleged predator. Their explanation, she said — he was gay. The four children spent two unsettling months with the suspect in 2009, their mother said. The kids shared the place with one of his adopted sons, who was a former foster child. According to the kids, their freaked-out foster dad kept them locked in their rooms, barred them from playing with other kids and once sliced all the cables to the television as punishment. The 1-year-old brother was permitted out of his room with Gonzales-Mugaburu while his sisters were often kept behind closed doors, the oldest of the three told The News. New York Daily News Gonzales-Mugaburu faces up to 50 years in prison if convicted on charges of sexual misconduct and child endangerment. The eldest girl, now 16, told The News that Gonzales-Mugaburu once called the police — and when they responded to the house, insisted that she had threatened to kill him. Another time, two of the girls had to free their terrified little brother when Gonzales-Mugaburu locked him alone inside a room and left the house for more than an hour. "When he got home, he was yelling, 'Who did it? Who let him out?'" the

oldest daughter recounted. "So then he grabbed a knife from downstairs and cut all the cables to the TV. I started crying. We all started crying." Gonzales-Mugaburu punished the same girl by taking her phone and throwing it into the woods. He would push dressers in front of kids' doors to block them from leaving their rooms. "He was very abusive toward us," said the daughter. "When I got in trouble, he used to come into my room and scream in my face." Susan Watts/New York Daily News "You never got a good vibe from" Gonzales-Mugaburu, said Sue O'Keefe, whose children were in his custody. Over the years, needy kids were sent to the serial foster parent by both the New York City Administration for Children's Services and the nonprofit St. Christopher Otilie, known as SCO. In an email to The News, SCO said the situation was "extremely troubling" and the organization was cooperating with authorities. Additional charges against Gonzales-Mugaburu were blocked in some cases by statutes of limitation, officials said. He was due back in court Monday, and faces up to 50 years in prison if convicted on charges of sexual misconduct and child endangerment. Authorities charged that Gonzales-Mugaburu had sexual relations with a female dog while a girl assigned to his care watched. LONDON COP SUING AFTER NYC ARREST, BABY PUT IN FOSTER CARE There were two cars parked Saturday in the driveway of Gonzales-Mugaburu's home, but nobody answered the door. David Wexler/For New York Daily News At least two organizations sent needy kids to the serial foster parent who faces up to 50 years in prison if convicted. One of the suspect's adopted sons drove up to the house behind the wheel of a white Lincoln Continental. "No comment," he said, before zipping away. Prosecutors said another of Gonzales-Mugaburu's adopted sons cooperated with the probe after two boys made allegations to a caseworker about mistreatment. Neighbors said Gonzales-Mugaburu, who pleaded not guilty Friday, was single with no family other than his adopted children. O'Keefe, 37, now has custody of all seven of her kids, although all were at one point in foster care. Over the last two decades, the suspect kept as many as eight children at a time in his two-story ranch home. The Administration for Children's Services issued a Friday statement saying it removed all foster kids from the house upon learning of the allegations — although the agency didn't specify when that was. Yet Another Scandal Rocks Utah Home for Vulnerable Children Police raided the home after an employee reported sex among residents and misconduct by staff. by Joaquin Sapien ProPublica, March 21, 2016, 10:27 a.m. 0 Comments Print Print Spur Reform in 2016 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. Mount Pleasant Academy in Utah. (Kim Raff for ProPublica) In 2014, an employee at a group home for troubled children in Utah said they informed superiors that a staff member was having sex with one of the boys the home was charged with safeguarding. When nothing happened, the employee helped alert local child welfare officials, and the staff member was eventually charged and convicted of sexual battery. But Utah officials took no action against the home, Mount Pleasant Academy. It was allowed to continue housing as many as 16 boys, almost all of them sent to the home to be treated for a variety of sexual addictions or disorders. "We found no evidence of violation of our rules," said Diane Moore, the licensing director for the Utah Department of Human Services, which oversees the operation of group homes in the state. Barely 18 months later, the same employee said they made another grim discovery: several boys, at least one as young as 13, were having sex with each other with the full knowledge of members of the home's staff. Worse, the employee alleged, the home's director shared video of the sexual activity with other employees. The employee made direct reports to state authorities, and last week the Sanpete County Sheriff's office raided the home, taking computers, surveillance tapes and other possible evidence. A search warrant based on the employee's claims lays out the suspected crimes: forced sexual abuse of a minor; unlawful sexual activity with a minor; abuse and neglect of a child with a disability. Still, Mount Pleasant Academy is open, with boys remaining in its care. "Yes, children are still placed there pending further fact finding," said Moore, the state licensing director. "Even if violations are found, facilities may remain open while addressing corrective action plans and timelines as long as there is no perceived further risk to critical health and safety rules. These are the very things we will be assessing moving forward." Mount Pleasant Academy's program director, Matt Kiefer, told ProPublica he was "not going to be talking" about the latest developments. Kiefer is the man accused by the employee of sharing sex videos with his staff. Brian Pace, executive director of Red Rock Canyon, the parent organization of Mount Pleasant, said information ProPublica had obtained was "incorrect" but declined to elaborate. "We always work with our licensing agency and local law enforcement to get these matters resolved," he said. "We also do our internal investigations and if disciplinary measures are necessary we take them." In 2015, ProPublica examined the raft of problems plaguing group homes for vulnerable children in California. We discovered that California was so bereft of safe options for its troubled children that it had sent hundreds of them out of state, some 600 to Utah alone. And California was doing so knowing the risks: Utah had suffered a variety of scandals involving its own group homes, including one that led to a lawsuit on behalf of hundreds of children who said they had been abused at facilities in the state. Indeed, Red Rock Canyon, the parent facility located in St. George, Utah, had a sex scandal in 2014. A worker pleaded guilty to multiple counts of sexually abusing three residents, one of whom was just 13. A state investigation found that the facility did not properly report the abuse to the Department of Human Services, which oversees group homes throughout the state. Again, no action was taken against Red Rock Canyon, and it now turns out that an almost identical crime took place in 2014 at Mount Pleasant. The employee who made the reports about Mount Pleasant in 2014 and again this year spoke to ProPublica and laid out what the employee said was a deeply disturbing series of events and failures to act. The employee has since quit and would not be identified for fear of reprisal. The employee said that in 2014 officials at the home became aware that a 20-year-old employee named Robert Quirt Ashworth had sex with a minor at the home over the course of several months. The sex would occur in locations at the facility that were not monitored by surveillance cameras. The employee said they were told their only responsibility had been met — to report it to their superiors. But when Ashworth went unpunished, the employee went to the authorities. The former employee said that Ashworth was spared discipline by the home's management because he was related to senior officials there. Ashworth was charged with a misdemeanor count of sexual battery of a minor at the home in 2015. He pleaded guilty in Sanpete County District Court. Efforts to contact him were not successful. Moore, the director of licensing for Utah, tried to explain why the state authorities were limited in what they could do against the home. "As serious and abhorrent as this crime was, our statutory oversight is in regards to the licensee and their program. We assess to ensure that no rule violations contributed to the incident. Our inquiries include but are not limited to verification of incident notification, staffing ratios, training, current staff background screenings, and overall administrative response by the program." "Of course the action of the employee was a violation and a crime," Moore added. "But we have to be able to tie that unfortunate event to specific rule violations by the licensee in order to take action against the licensee." The latest set of incidents, the former employee said, had taken place over several weeks. That boys were having sex with each other was widely known, and even treated as an amusement. "So many staffers knew what was going on — too many to name — but no one reported it," the former employee said. "We were told to go through our chain of command." The employee said that at least one child connected to the activity had been arrested. Last December, Mount Pleasant was featured in a ProPublica article that examined the number of troubled California children sent out of state. That story focused on the journey of 15-year-old Deshaun Becton, a boy who lived in several California group homes before landing in Mount Pleasant in the summer of 2015. Out of Options, California Ships Hundreds of Troubled Children Out of State One 14-year-old boy's search for care takes him to Utah as his home state struggles to safeguard its most challenging children. Read the story. The boy's adoptive mother, Veronice Becton, was hesitant to have Deshaun live at the home. She only agreed to place him there because she was completely out of options. Deshaun's often violent outbursts had exhausted the resources of several other group homes meant to provide intensive care to emotionally disturbed children. Deshaun's parents eventually removed him from Mount Pleasant after he had been hurt in several encounters with the staff. When Veronice Becton arrived to pick him up, she found him filthy and disheveled. As a result, when she learned last week that officers with the Sanpete County Sheriff's department had begun investigating allegations of sexual abuse, Veronice Becton was distressed, but not shocked. She said she intends to contact police in Utah to make Deshaun is available to be interviewed. "They were never very transparent," she said of the leaders of Mount Pleasant. "I don't know if it was just me, but I felt like they did not appreciate any kind of questions or inquiries at all. They were very hostile towards us." The former employee remembered Deshaun fondly. The employee said the home had recognized it was not appropriate for Deshaun, but had taken him in because it wanted to keep its beds filled. "Please tell her, I can't take ownership for what happened to him, but I am very, very sorry," the employee said of Veronice. "I care deeply for their son." Michael Weston, a spokesman for the California Department of Social Services said no children from the state's foster care or juvenile justice systems were currently placed at Mount Pleasant. Danger in the psych ward Safety issues plague a chain of mental-health hospitals in Texas and across the United States By Miles Moffett | Staff Writer March 18, 2016 Universal Health Services, Inc., headquarters in King of Prussia, Pennsylvania. (Kris Tripplaar/Sipa USA) In Sherman, workers at a psychiatric ward dropped a suicidal patient off at a bus stop; a day later he was found dead after jumping from a Dallas bridge. In San Angelo, hospital employees created infection risks by leaving an observation room covered in vomit and a kitchen black with grease and dead bugs. And in Austin, male nurses stripped a teenage sex-abuse victim and shut her in solitary confinement, naked. Inspection data uncovered by The Dallas Morning News shows that serious safety problems have plagued dozens of mental-health hospitals owned by one giant chain: Universal Health Services Inc. Across Texas and around the country, government inspectors investigating patient complaints cited 44 of the company's hospitals for dangerously poor care or unsafe conditions between 2012 and mid-2015, according to data from the federal Department of Health and Human Services. That's more than a quarter of the 154 company hospitals that The News identified as receiving taxpayer money to treat the poor and elderly. Inspectors found safety breaches at 13 of the company's 26 such facilities in Texas, the hospital company's largest market. Universal Health is the nation's biggest for-profit provider of mental-health services, including treatment for depression and addiction, and also owns some full-service hospitals. "The large number of investigations aimed at misconduct within this hospital system is appalling," said Dr. Peter Breggin, a New York-based psychiatrist who has consulted for the National Institute of Mental Health and the commission that accredits hospitals. "It is especially frightening that these deviations are occurring in the largest network of psychiatric hospitals in the country." Universal Health, which is valued by Wall Street at over $11 billion, says its overall safety record is excellent. It cites rising patient-satisfaction scores and above-average results on hospital-accreditation evaluations. The number of government safety citations simply reflects the chain's size, according to the company, which is based in a suburb of Philadelphia. When problems have been brought to its attention, the company says, it has come up with plans to fix them. "We are mindful that over the course of treating approximately 2.5 million patients per year, irregular and unpredictable events occasionally occur," the company said in a statement in response to questions from The News. However federal data suggests that Universal Health has a higher-than-average rate of problems, according to a News analysis of government reports on hospitals that receive funding from Medicaid and Medicare. For example, government inspectors investigating complaints found serious problems at 8.4 percent of Universal's hospitals in 2014, the most recent full year for which data is available. Nationwide, that figure was 3 percent. Federal regulators usually focus only on incidents at individual hospitals, not across chains, so government data is fragmented and you can't easily compare Universal Health to its peers. And the company operates hospitals under a variety of names that can make it difficult for patients and watchdogs to evaluate its overall care. But the government compiled an unusual systemwide report on the company last summer at the request of congressmen from Illinois and Massachusetts, where a report by the Boston Globe and another by the Chicago Tribune revealed problems at Universal Health hospitals. Student's death investigated decades later Phil Williams Jr. was a student at school for troubled teens in Poland when he died in 1982 NEXT STORY Maine police department's post about 'misplaced' marijuana goes viral Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text POLAND, Maine —State police are investigating the death of a student more than three decades ago at a now-closed school for troubled teens. The cause of death for Phil Williams Jr. was listed as "probably a ruptured aneurysm" on his death certificate in 1982. He was 15 years old and living at Poland's Elan School for troubled teens. Pam Newall, his sister, said for 33 years she never thought to question his death. "I didn't know that these stories were out there, but they've been out there for years," Newall said. Newall was contacted by a former student working on a documentary who had names and phone numbers of witnesses. They told her Williams was accused by staff of faking headaches. They said in the hours before her brother's death, he had been punished in what they described as a boxing ring. "Not a boxing ring, like a boxing ring. A ring of children where he proceeded to get beat," Newall said. "Twenty minutes or so they called the ambulance. They took Phil and they never saw him again." The Elan School closed in 2011 after being criticized for its controversial therapies — one of which was forced fighting. "I want people to take responsibility for what they did. I don't care that they didn't throw the punches. They were adults. Adults are supposed to take care of children," Newall said. She said she hopes state police can uncover what really went on that day. "I thought it was a wonderful place. I thought they were helping my brother. I thought he was coming home. He came home all right ... in a box," Newall said. Source: <http://www.wmtv.com/news/students-death-investigated-decades-later/38641272>

St. Paul Facility for Troubled Teens Forced to Suspend Referrals after 'Serious Concerns' Brett Hoffland Updated: 03/23/2016 8:58 AM Created: 03/22/2016 5:34 PM The future is uncertain for a St. Paul facility that houses troubled teens. Ramsey County judges have stopped sending children to the Boys Totem Town program because of what they're calling "serious events." Verena Nelson, a St. Paul resident who lives right across from the facility, says usually the neighborhood is pretty quiet, but she did have a run-in with some teens who decided to escape. "One day I was sitting out on the porch and a couple of kids come running by and they said, 'We're running away from Totem Town,' and they climbed over my fence and away they went," Nelson said. Nelson isn't alone. "I've seen it on several occasions," Geff Crowell, a St. Paul resident, said. Last month, 29-year-old Karen Anne Meyer, a contract therapist, was charged, accused of helping two teens escape from custody. "That really surprised me," Nelson said. Judge Teresa Warner sent a letter to Ramsey County Community Corrections because "the lack of communication from probation to the judges regarding that incident is concerning." In a separate event, according to Warner, a young man "ran from Boys Totem Town, stole a neighbor's vehicle, and then tried to run over the neighbor." Since Feb. 19, there haven't been any new referrals to this facility and Judge Warner says there won't be any in the future until they see some changes. "We were very surprised, obviously, and very concerned about the situation," said John Klavins, the Ramsey County Community Corrections director. Klavins says these are medium- to high-risk teens who he says committed mainly property crimes or low-level personal offenses. He says they're reviewing their communication protocols and updating security procedures to protect the boys and the community. "I certainly hope we can get the program back on track," Klavins said. Seventeen teenagers are still at the facility. The county says the independent investigation should be finished in a couple weeks to determine whether Boys Totem Town can start accepting children again. Juvenile offenders can currently be placed in juvenile detention centers or group homes for any level offense. Kansas has the sixth-highest rate of juvenile offenders placed in detention centers or group homes nationwide. The measure passed 117-6 in a final-approval House vote Monday, after it passed 38-2 in the Senate last month. Senators will review the changes before it is sent to the governor. The House version of the bill includes a provision to reserve up to 50 beds in group homes for juvenile offenders. The previous measure approved by the Senate says all group homes will close by July 2018. Source: <http://www2.ljworld.com/news/2016/mar/21/kansas-lawmakers-vote-overhaul-juvenile-justice-sy/>

Recommended for you Valley City State prof faces ID theft charges after police seize 200 credit cards Bruce Lee Biddlecome, who was the director at Douglas Place, a drug and alcohol rehabilitation center, was charged last May with one count of third-degree criminal sexual conduct in Polk County District Court, but a judge dismissed that felony charge in December. The 41-year-old appeared in court and pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a new charge: one count of criminal abuse, a gross misdemeanor, that applies when a caregiver or staff person in a facility engages in sexual contact with a patient or client. While both charges are linked to the same alleged incidents from 2014, the difference stemmed from a disagreement over Biddlecome's role at the center involving the patient. A now-29-year-old female told investigators Biddlecome sexually assaulted her twice when he took her in his truck on two different trips to Wal-Mart and Gordmans in November and December while she was a patient at the center, according to a court document. Both times, Biddlecome demanded she have sex with him and threatened she would go back to where she came from—she understood him to mean jail—if she did not comply, a court document states. The woman told investigators Biddlecome assaulted her a third time on Christmas Eve when he went into her room at Douglas Place and said he had come "for an early Christmas present and that it was her," according to a court document. The woman turned over a napkin to a counselor at the center, which she said had Biddlecome's semen on it, and the napkin later tested positive for Biddlecome's DNA, according to court records. Last November, Biddlecome argued his felony charge should be dropped because the charge didn't apply to him. His initial charge accuses him of having sex with a patient to whom he was a counselor, but Biddlecome's attorney, Eric Gudmundson, argued Biddlecome wasn't a counselor to the woman at all. A Douglas Place employee told police Biddlecome was assigned as a counselor only to male residents. Biddlecome would have one-on-one sessions with female patients in his office, but he "never documented these incidents," a court document states. The prosecution argued that Biddlecome was a licensed drug and alcohol addiction counselor and the woman was a patient seeking treatment, resulting in his original charge, but the defense responded Biddlecome managed the center and oversaw other counselors, and there was no evidence Biddlecome was ever the woman's counselor. Biddlecome was charged with the wrong crime, Gudmundson argued, and said a gross misdemeanor in which it is illegal for any staffer at a residential addiction treatment center to have sex with a resident was more appropriate. That is what Biddlecome is charged with now. Biddlecome faces a far lesser sentence for his new charge. For the gross misdemeanor, he faces a maximum of one year in jail and $3,000 fine. For his original felony charge, he faced a maximum of 15 years in prison. The Polk County assistant attorney prosecuting Biddlecome's new case did not return a call by press time to discuss the difference between the charges. Typically, district court prosecutors are unable to comment on active cases. Biddlecome next appears in Polk County District Court on his new charge at 1 p.m. May 17. Abuse in Foster Care: The Denial Runs Deep by Richard Wexler March 24, 2016 Here's the latest foster care horror from Oregon, according to the Oregonian: Under the watch of the Oregon Department of Human Services, a lawsuit alleges, a young sister and brother were starved so severely by their foster parents and guardians that they weighed the same at ages 4 and 5 as they did at ages 1 and 2. Those facts, largely supported by the state's own examination of the case, are laid out in a complaint filed against the state Thursday. It says the children ended up resembling victims of a famine: their ribs visible, their bellies protruding and their brain development severely affected. The suit says caseworkers and their supervisors and managers overlooked repeated specific complaints and glaring red flags... A caseworker saw the children less than a month before doctors at Randall Children's Hospital determined they were suffering from chronic starvation, but the caseworker did nothing. That story comes on top of this one, and this one. That's just Oregon. A federal judge in Texas found rampant abuse in foster care. And in just the past week, there was this from New York and this from Utah. Of course, there are plenty of horror stories about how children are treated by their own parents. In fact, the current child welfare system was largely built on such stories. When anecdotes collide, it's time to look at the data. But not in the highly-selective way Marie Cohen chose to do so in a recent column published by The Chronicle of Social Change. She wrote that "State data compiled by the federal government show that the proportion of children in foster care who were the subject of substantiated maltreatment in foster care ranged from 0 to 1.34 percent." But the figures she cites come from child welfare agencies' own investigations of abuse in foster care. For reasons that should be obvious, in such cases agencies have a strong incentive to see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil and write no evil in the case file. If the figures Cohen cites are to be believed, there are three states – Delaware, Vermont and New Hampshire – where absolutely no children at all were abused or neglected in foster care in 2014. New Hampshire has made that claim for five years in a row. Seriously? Texas claims that fewer than one-third of 1 percent of foster children were abused in foster care in 2014. In other words, if 300 former foster children were gathered in a room and asked, "How many of you were abused over the course of a year?" only one would raise his or her hand. That's not what the judge found. And in Oregon, which claims that fewer than three-quarters of 1 percent of foster children were abused, state law apparently sets a higher standard for substantiating abuse if a foster parent or institution staff are accused than if the accused is a birth parent. In contrast, research has revealed alarming rates of abuse in foster care. One independent study after another has found abuse in one-quarter to one-third of foster homes, and the rate in group homes and institutions is even higher. And for reasons related to study methodology explained here, even those figures almost certainly are underestimates. In response, Cohen abandons the fiction of the official figures and simply tells us the homes from which the children were removed must be even worse because the children were removed from those homes. But just because a caseworker says a home was abusive or neglectful doesn't make it so – particularly since poverty itself often is confused with "neglect." Her argument also presupposes that no intervention other than foster care could prevent recurrence of abuse in the cases in which children were removed. But the real question is: How does the rate of abuse in foster care compare to what would happen if families simply got the help they needed? It's not hard to answer, considering that even when families don't necessarily get the help, foster care often is a worse option. There are two massive studies involving 15,000 typical cases in which the researcher made exactly the sort of comparison Cohen demands: What happens to children placed in foster care and left in their own homes, in the same types of cases? The children left in their own homes typically do better – and that's even when the families did not necessarily get any help. None of this means no child ever should be taken from her or his parents. But foster care is an extremely toxic intervention that should be used sparingly and in small doses. Cohen wants to further increase the dose. I prefer less toxic options. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/blogger-co-op/abuse-foster-care-denial-runs-deep/16834>

LDS Church named in lawsuit alleging sexual abuse of Navajo children in foster program | fox13now.com LDS Church named in lawsuit alleging sexual abuse of Navajo children in foster program Posted 6:14 pm, March 24, 2016, by Mark Green and Lauren Steinbrecher. Updated at 11:09pm, March 24, 2016 Facebook Twitter Reddit Pinterest LinkedIn Email WINDOW ROCK, Ariz. -- Two members of the Navajo Nation have sued The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, alleging the church placed Native American children in Mormon foster homes where they were sexually abused and that LDS leaders did not take adequate steps to protect those children. The lawsuit, filed in Navajo Nation District Court on March 22, names The Corporation of the President of the LDS Church, The Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the LDS Church, LDS Family Services and the LDS Church itself. The allegations stem from a foster care program formerly carried out by the LDS Church and its subsidiaries called the "Indian Placement Program" or the "Lamanite Placement Program" (LPP). The two plaintiffs, a brother and sister, state they and another sibling experienced abuse while in the program in Utah from 1976-1983. "It was kind of a series of ongoing sexual abuse situations of varying degrees while in this program," said Craig Vernon, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs. The brother, fictitiously named in the lawsuit as "RJ" to protect his privacy, reportedly suffered abuse that included fondling, sexual molestation and rape during his years in the program. According to the suit, RJ was placed in an LDS home in Oak City, Utah in 1978 at the age of 10, where he was allegedly sexually molested on several occasions by an older stepbrother. The boy was removed from the home after he disclosed the abuse, and the next year he was placed with another family in Utah--where the lawsuit states he was again molested by an older foster-brother. After the boy said he again reported the abuse to Church leaders, he was placed with another family in the LPP, where he was again allegedly abused and also witnessed the alleged abuse of a younger sister. He said he reported the abuse to the Church, but this time, the Church sent him back to live in that same home where the reported abuse occurred. The sister, fictitiously named "MM" in lawsuit documents, was placed in an LDS home in Utah in 1976. The girl was allegedly raped by a friend of her stepbrother, who was 40 years old at the time. A few years later in 1983, after being placed in a different foster home in Centerfield, Utah, MM said she was again allegedly abused sexually, this time by her foster-father. The lawsuit alleges the LDS Church did not take reasonable steps to protect the children--even after abuse was reported. "The problem is, when they reported this to LDS social services, we don't believe that the police was ever contacted," Vernon said. "First and foremost, that's what needs to happen." Other steps would have included removing children from the home where the abuse occurred, and setting up better policies to monitor children, according to the lawsuit. The lawsuit further alleges that LDS Church policies are designed to protect the church and its leaders from culpability rather than ensure that abuse is reported to authorities and justice pursued. The lawsuit cites a policy that states, "'To avoid implicating the Church in legal matters to which it is not a party, Church leaders should avoid testifying in civil or criminal cases or other proceedings involving abuse.'" (Handbook 1, Stake Presidents and Bishops 2010, section 17.3.2)." And another policy that encourages church leaders to contact an LDS Bishop about abuse first rather than the police. "We want clear policy changes... that the Church is not going to investigate its own sexual abuse, it's going to report it immediately and direct its members and leaders to report it immediately to police," Vernon said. The lawsuit also asks the Church to create a policy to remove any leader named in abuse allegations from contact with children. Plus, the attorneys request that the LDS Church change their policy about directing leaders not to testify in civil or criminal cases involving abuse. The lawsuit seeks damages for the injury caused to the plaintiffs, though no amount is specified. And, Vernon said, the plaintiffs want to see the LDS Church write a formal apology for harms caused and to restore Navajo culture, which they allege was damaged by years of efforts to assimilate native children into white, Mormon culture. The LDS Church released a statement Thursday in response to the lawsuit through spokeswoman Kristen Howey: "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has zero tolerance for abuse of any kind and works actively to prevent abuse. This lawsuit was filed earlier today [sic]. The Church will examine the allegations and respond appropriately." Another attorney on the case, William Keeler, said the Church has 30 days to respond to the lawsuit. The LDS Lamanite Placement Program ran from about 1947 to the 1990s. Lamanite is a term used by the LDS Church to refer to Native Americans, who the LDS Church believes are descended from a group that fled Israel in 600 B.C. The lawsuit states Mormons believe Native Americans were "cursed" with dark skin for wickedness, and the lawsuit alleges Mormons felt a cultural and religious duty to convert Native American children and immerse them in white, Mormon culture as a way to redeem their prophetic destiny. As such, thousands of Navajo children like the plaintiffs were baptized into the LDS Church and relocated to live with white, Mormon families through the LPP. Most drug, alcohol group homes in City of Prescott not state-licensed Photo by Les Stukenberg. Dayton Turberville sits on a bench outside Prescott House, one of the oldest recovery homes in the Prescott area. By Cindy Barks Originally Published: March 27, 2016 6:03 a.m. Cindy Barks Editor's note: This is the next in an ongoing series of articles concerning the sober-living group home issue in Prescott. PRESCOTT – Of the 160 or so drug-and-alcohol-treatment group homes identified in the City of Prescott, only about 40 are listed as having a license through the State of Arizona. The discrepancy occurs, in part, because state licensing requirements take in some of the group-home categories, but not others. For instance, the state requires licensing for: inpatient facilities with a specific number of beds (behavioral health facility-adult); outpatient treatment centers; and detox centers (behavioral health inpatient facilities-subacute). The Arizona Department of Health Services Division of Licensing Services' website lists 26 licensed outpatient facilities in Prescott, along with six in Prescott Valley. In addition, the list includes two detox (behavioral health-subacute) centers in Prescott, and two in Prescott Valley. The number of inpatient (behavioral health-adult) facilities totals 10 for Prescott, and four in Prescott Valley, along with three counseling facilities in Prescott. (Some of the facilities double up on categories. For instance, the Chapter 5 Treatment Program in Prescott is licensed for two behavioral health-adult inpatient facilities, as well as a counseling facility, and an outpatient treatment center. Likewise, West Yavapai Guidance Clinic is listed as having licenses for five outpatient facilities – two in Prescott, three in Prescott Valley – and one behavioral health facility adult facility). Even as the state is licensing those categories, however, it does not require licensing or registration for sober-living or halfway homes. And, according to local experts, that is the category that has grown exponentially in Prescott in recent years. 'IT HAS EXPLODED' Officials at Prescott House (one of the licensed inpatient residential facilities), say the Prescott landscape has changed dramatically over the past decade or so. Dayton Turberville, executive director of Prescott House, says the community had just a handful of treatment centers and halfway houses when he came on board at Prescott House 12 years ago. He and Jeff Martin, program manager for Prescott House, say things started changing about nine years ago, and then, "In the last five years, it has exploded," Martin said. They say a main difference between the licensed and unlicensed facilities lies with the amount of supervision. Martin pointed out that Prescott House has supervisory staff members awake 24 hours, which allows for crisis management around-the-clock. "If we have a crisis here, there is someone to deal with it," he said. Unlicensed facilities have no such requirement. "I think that's a world of difference," Martin added. Martin, Turberville and other local industry representatives say a number of the centers in Prescott use an arrangement known in the industry as the "Florida model" – a system in which residents of nearby sober-living homes travel to licensed outpatient centers for their treatment. Under that model, the state requirement for licensing of outpatient treatment facilities is covered, but the people who use the facilities for treatment live elsewhere – often in unlicensed homes. A description of the "Florida model" on the DrugTreatmentFinder.com website explains that the model flourished in south Florida over the past several decades because of the mild weather and beaches, which provided "an enticing recovery environment." The website maintains that the Florida model has been effective – not only because of the favorable locale, but because "having so many rehabs in an area gave individuals a selection from which they could choose, finding the treatments that best addressed their needs." In Prescott, the model reportedly has contributed to the community's proliferation of "structured sober-living homes." In several instances, the same operators that are licensed through the state for outpatient-treatment facilities also have a number of unlicensed sober-living homes. State records show, for instance, that A Sober Way Home has two state-licensed outpatient treatment centers on Plaza Drive and West Gurley Street. And City of Prescott registration records show that A Sober Way Home also has a half-dozen or so other homes in residential areas, which are not listed on the state's licensure list. Sandra Tillman, owner of A Sober Way Home, said this past week that the organization would soon be closing all of those homes, however, and moving to a new location. The new building is currently under construction on the site that previously housed an East Gurley Street motel, she said. The move is being made, Tillman said, in order to get all of the treatment centralized in one licensed facility. "It will be a one-stop facility," she said, adding that the center would likely house 60 to 70 clients. And Tillman expressed some dismay at the way the recovery industry is being portrayed in the community and the media. "So many people have come through the program and are successful," she said. "It's a sad thing to see how it's being portrayed." She added: "The problem is not the halfway houses; the problem is heroin." LEGISLATION Many in the community have pointed to the dozens of sober-living homes in residential neighborhoods as a source of continuing problems, such as loud parties, drug use, smoking, unkempt yards, and declining neighborhood property values. That situation led Arizona Rep. Noel Campbell to introduce a bill in the State Legislature this year that aims to give cities and counties more authority in regulating the sober-living homes. Campbell's original bill referred to mandatory registration, as well as training and education standards for house managers. A later amendment made the bill's language less specific, but still would give cities, towns, and counties the right to craft more regulation for structured sober living homes (although it would not require the municipalities and counties to take on the new responsibilities). The amended bill, House Bill 2107, passed out of the Senate Rules Committee this past week, Campbell said on Friday, March 25, and could go to a vote of the full Senate sometime this week. If successful in the Senate, the bill would then have to go back to the House of Representatives for another vote on the amended version. Campbell has maintained that the structured sober-living homes have caused problems in residential neighborhoods, because they have little regulation, other than the zoning-oriented rules for which the city currently has the authority. But Tillman says the legislation would not solve Prescott's issue, and would open the community up to a discrimination lawsuit. She also questions the city's list, which identifies about 160 group homes within city limits. Although some in the community have speculated that the number is likely closer to 200, Tillman said, "There are not 200 here; you might find 60. They just come and go so fast." SERVING LESS FORTUNATE Despite the lack of regulation, all of the local experts emphasize that some effectively run sober-living homes already exist in Prescott. Bill Orick of Triple Point Recovery Homes considers his homes among those well-run houses. He pointed out that Triple Point is contracted through Yavapai County Probation to take in clients who are one step away from incarceration. While most people on standard probation are allowed to live out in the community, Orick said, "If they screw up," they could be eligible for Triple Point, as an alternative to jail. Clients are required to participate in a 12-step program, Orick said, and they are required to get up at 7 a.m., do chores, and then either go to work or go to a meeting. They also are mentored in living a normal lifestyle. "Some of them are 50-year-old men who have never lived a structured life," Orick said. He sees programs such as Triple Point as necessary because it serves "the less fortunate" – those men who have no insurance, cannot afford other treatment, and have little or no family support. Nearly all – 99 percent, said Orick – are battling heroin addiction. Noting that the well-run homes are often categorized by the community with less effective sober-living homes, Orick sees the need for more regulation. "I'm so frustrated with all of these programs that are opening up," he said. City actions such as the recent approval of stricter code enforcement and the possible implementation of a business license would help to make the industry more accountable, he said. City of Prescott's group homes list reveals web of owners, operators By Les Bowen Originally Published: March 27, 2016 6:02 a.m. NewsyLesBowen PRESCOTT – A list maintained by the City of Prescott shows there are some 164 homes city officials have determined or believe are group homes. The Daily Courier obtained the list through a public records request to the city. City officials redacted information about four entries on the list, explaining those are emergency shelters and, in the interest of protecting the privacy of people who own, operate or patronize the shelters, they are not subject to the newspaper's records request. Of the remaining list, two homes are listed as adult care centers, three for people with developmental disabilities and one for gambling recovery. For six entries on the list, Prescott city officials did not indicate what type of support services the home provided. The city categorized the remaining 148 as either focused on drugs and alcohol addiction recovery, or having multiple focuses. An analysis of the complete list shows the variety of owners and operators running these homes. The Daily Courier compared the city's records against Yavapai County's property ownership records and the state's database of corporations, compiling a database of every identifiable company or individual connected to the group homes industry. First, it should be noted the city's list contains some outdated information. City officials have been developing the list for at least two years, and it contains at least 33 entries for homes that appear to have been sold since the city collected its information. In some cases, home ownership was transferred to a corporation with connections to the drug and alcohol rehabilitation industry. However, in other cases, it appears homes were sold and no longer owned or operated by the companies and people on the city's list. City Planning Manager George Worley said the list is constantly changing and the city updates it as new information becomes available. He further explained that the list contains a fair amount of historical artifacts that may not reflect the ownership and operation of group homes currently in the city. One notable example is the home of Prescott City Attorney Jon Paladini, which he purchased in early 2014, about a year after taking his job with the city. Prior to his purchase of the home, city records indicate Decision Point operated a group home there. "The house sat vacant for about a year and a half ... the group home closed, before I bought it,” Paladini said, confirming that he lives in the house. The city has marked the entry for Paladini’s home as “discontinued” – the only such entry on the city’s list – but other entries on the list reflect a reality that the city has been unable to verify operators of some homes. In another example, homeowners sold two houses previously listed as operated by Embark Sober Living. The city indicates one home is now operated by Carleton Recovery Center, but there’s no new information for the other. What is clear from the information in the city’s records is that there are a handful of major players operating many group homes. Some takeaways from the list of prominent operator include: • The Solution House operates 24 group homes, according to the city’s list, some of which are owned by subsidiary companies including The Bridges Network and LNK Holdings. An address cross-check showed corporate agents for The Solution House share an address with a corporate agent listed for Paramount Recovery Services, which the city reports as operating two homes. • A Sober Way reportedly operates 20 homes. Two organizations with connections to A Sober Way – Clean Adventures of Sober Living and Oasis Addiction Counseling – apparently operate another six. • Carleton Recovery Center appears to have ties to Decision Point. The two companies operate 17 group homes, according to the city’s list, three of which are owned by yet another affiliate company, NTD Properties. All three companies share some or all of their corporate officers and have ties to company called DPC Behavioral Health. • The Next Step Transitional Living runs 10 homes, according to the city records. Most of the company’s homes appear to be leased from private owners with no obvious connections. • West Yavapai Guidance Clinic reportedly owns and operates seven group homes, and is operating an eighth under a lease from a private owner. Further analysis of the list also reveals connections between seemingly separate organizations. For example, two companies, Footprints Recovery Home and New Freedom Recovery House, share several corporate agents, as well as a common attorney who filed paperwork with the state. The companies operate five different group homes, according to the city’s list. A third company, Recovery in the Pines, operates a home whose owner’s address is the same as one of the corporate agents listed for Footprints Recovery Home and New Freedom Recovery House. There are a few other similar connections between owners and operators, but from outward appearances, most of the remaining group homes in Prescott are independently owned, and many operators run fewer than three homes. In the end, the city’s list shows the sheer size of the group homes industry: More than 300 individuals or companies are connected to the ownership and operation of group homes in Prescott. A Look Inside The Home Of A Pedophile Foster Parent Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu Inside the Long Island home where an accused pedophile foster parent preyed upon already-suffering boys is a shrine of sorts to films of every genre. NY Daily News So many boys. So much hurt. And five alarms are sounded that the city’s child welfare agency appears to have put dozens of foster children into the hands of a sexual predator. Prosecutors have charged serial foster father Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu with subjecting kids as young as 8 to sexual abuse in a Long Island house of horrors. For two decades, New York City sent children who had lost their parents or been taken from them to live with Gonzales-Mugaburu, via the Administration for Children’s Services The commissioner of that agency, Gladys Carrion, has retreated into silence, deflecting explanation, let alone accountability, behind the confidentiality that protects children’s privacy. And that enables officials to hide the failures of their agencies. A LOOK INSIDE THE LONG ISLAND HOUSE OF ALLEGED PERVERT CHARGED WITH MOLESTING FOSTER BOYS Mayor de Blasio must take notice because the emerging facts strongly suggest that ACS allowed Gonzales-Mugaburu to operate a money-making orphanage that concealed entrenched abuse. Based on the horrific circumstances, the mayor would be well advised to order a Department of Investigation review of ACS foster care placements. All told, Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota says, 140 boys, many with disabilities, came into the dad-for-pay’s clutches, half by way of SCO, a private agency hired by ACS and county agencies to find and oversee foster homes. Through ACS, New York City paid Gonzales-Mugaburu as much as $2,400 per month per boy, six to eight at a time. Prosecutors say that he has no employment record. If true, it’s likely Gonzales-Mugaburu has supported himself entirely through stipends meant to help foster parents meet the expenses of their charges. New York Daily News ACS regulations are designed to prevent adults from making a cottage industry out of taking in foster kids as a way to improve their own lifestyles. The more children, the more money. The more children, perhaps, the less care. ACCUSED L.I. PEDOPHILE FOSTER PARENT KEPT TERRIFIED KIDS LOCKED IN ROOMS Former wards, now aged 11 to 30, speak of beatings, weeks-long confinement, forced lock-outs in the cold and even witnessing Gonzales-Mugaburu having sex with the family dog. He has pled not guilty, and the district attorney bears the onus of carefully verifying each and every account of criminality. But that is hardly the end of the matter. Allegations of sexual and other abuses in city foster care permeate a lawsuit brought last year by Public Advocate Letitia James. De Blasio resisted the suit. As the government ultimately responsible for foster care, the state was also a defendant. Gov. Cuomo agreed hire a monitor to scrutinize ACS under a settlement that’s pending before a federal judge. ACS is responsible for 10,000 children living in foster care, the majority placed by private agencies into the homes of strangers. Those agencies struggle to find capable adults willing to invest time and energy to caring for needy and often troubled youngsters, perhaps for years on end. Against that backdrop, private and public agencies appear to have accepted at face value Gonzales-Mugaburu’s long readiness to take in children while lacking other evident means of support. De Blasio needs to know how and why that happened, most especially because of how horribly children were allegedly victimized for so long. Lawyers for foster kids fighting to obtain ACS case files - NY Daily News Attorneys for foster kids claiming abuse fighting to obtain ACS case files needed for lawsuit BY Victoria Bekiempis NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Thursday, March 31, 2016, 9:46 PM A A A facebook Tweet email Share this URL Bonifacio, Mark Seen here is the Administration for Children’s Service’s office in New York City. The agency is battling lawyers trying to obtain case files for foster kids who are suing the city and state. Lawyers for 10 children alleging abuse while in foster care are fighting for access to the kids’ ACS case files, part of an ongoing federal lawsuit seeking reforms to the child welfare system. The children claimed in the lawsuit filed against the city and state in July that they’d been abused — some of them sexually. Their attorneys blame systemic failings by the city Administration for Children’s Services and the state Office of Children and Family Services. The lawyers are not seeking monetary damages, but are trying to prevent children from being placed with agencies that have excessive caseloads. They also argue that children have better outcomes when placed in foster situations permanently, rather than being shuffled from place to place. N.Y. SENATE GOP TOO BUSY TO FIX KID-RAPE LAW The plaintiffs have hit a wall, they argue, because the city is blocking access to the children’s case files that might shed light on their care. The city says the release of the case files would threaten the privacy of others, possibly the foster children’s siblings, foster parents or biological parents. While the state agreed in October to certain reforms, the city continues to fight the lawsuit. A Manhattan federal judge agreed in November that city and children’s lawyers could share certain confidential information with each other, such as case files. In a letter earlier this month, however, city lawyers asked the court to further consider the matter. Marcia Lowry, one of the lawyers representing these children, disagrees and said the city’s move just drags out the legal process. “The longer they’re withheld, the longer the case is going to be delayed,” she said. The city Law Department defended its position, saying, “There are confidentiality issues that have to be worked out regarding the people mentioned in the files who are not plaintiffs.” Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/lawyers-foster-kids-fighting-obtain-acscase-files-article-1.2584724>

Steve Lundy | Staff Photographer Shaquan Allen, 16, died Wednesday at the Allendale Association campus in Lake Villa. Christopher Placek Family members of a 16-year-old Chicago boy found dead at the Allendale Association campus in Lake Villa said Friday they have more questions than answers about their loved one’s death. Their attorney, Cannon Lambert Sr., said at a Chicago news conference that Shaquan Allen was found dead in “very mysterious circumstances” and that the family has been given three versions of what happened Wednesday night at the private residential treatment center serving children and adolescents with moderate to profound emotional and behavioral disabilities. Lambert said he believes Allendale “is responsible for the occurrence.” The attorney said authorities have told him there are two suspects in custody. Lambert declined to reveal additional details of the investigation at the request of the Lake County Major Crimes Task Force. Det. Christopher Covelli, a spokesman for the task force, confirmed two adults are in custody and are considered persons of interest. No charges have been filed yet. Shaquan Allen's mother, Willie Mae Allen, said an employee at Allendale who befriended her son advised her to seek an attorney. "I wanna know how could this happen to my baby, and nobody is telling me anything to let me know what's really going on," she said. "He was only 16 years old. I didn't send him there for that. I sent him to get help, because I didn't want to lose him to the streets." Allendale officials did not return messages seeking comment Friday. An Allendale official said Thursday the entire staff was "saddened beyond words" and was cooperating with the investigation. The Illinois Department of Children and Family Services is also investigating. "Any time we lose a child, under any circumstance, we are devastated. Right now DCF is in its initial stages of an investigation," DCF Director George H. Sheldon said. "We are gathering all the facts and are working with authorities and Allendale officials to get to the bottom of this incident." The state agency has staff on site to help the other children there deal with the trauma of Allen's death, spokeswoman Veronica Resa said. It has put a hold on Allendale accepting any new children for the time being, she added. Resa said "Allendale is not a problematic facility" and doesn't have a history of serious issues. Lake Villa police and rescue were called to the Allendale campus at 9:58 p.m. Wednesday for the report of an injury. The 16-year-old resident was taken to Advocate Condell Medical Center in Libertyville, where he was pronounced dead at 11:10 p.m. An autopsy was scheduled for Friday by the Lake County coroner's office, but no findings have been released. The family plans to have an autopsy of its own done as well. Willie Mae Allen said her son had been receiving treatment at Allendale for three years. She believes his behavioral problems were due, in part, to the loss of his father, who died in 2007. Though he was a ward of the state, he came home from time to time, and his mother said she often went to Allendale to take part in family counseling sessions with her son. She said she last spoke with Shaquan two days before his death, and he talked about coming home for spring break. Allendale was founded in 1897. The youth and their families receive care and treatment through the residential treatment programs, day treatment special education schools or from community-based clinical programs and services, according to its website. The organization says more than 1,200 clients between the ages of 7 and 18 are served annually. The Lake Villa campus has residential services for 150 clients and a school with an enrollment of 200 students. It also has homes or community-based centers in Wisconsin, Highland Park and Waukegan. • Daily Herald staff writers Lee Filas and Mike Riopell contributed to this report. Mentor-on-the-Lake man gets 9 1/2 years in prison for sex acts against four girls Duncan Scott – The News-Herald Daniel Taeusch listens as one of his victims makes a statement March 31 in Lake County Common Pleas Court before being sentenced to 9 1/2 years in prison by Judge Eugene A. Lucci. Taeusch previously pleaded guilty to one count of sexual battery and three counts of gross sexual imposition. At right is defense attorney Mary Catherine O'Neill. By Andrew Cass, The News-Herald Posted: 03/31/16, 5:33 PM EDT | Updated: 8 hrs ago Q A Mentor-on-the-Lake man was sentenced March 31 to 9 1/2 years in prison on sexual battery and gross sexual imposition charges. Daniel Taeusch, 43, was indicted in October on two counts of rape and five counts of gross sexual imposition. On Feb. 25, Taeusch agreed to plead guilty in Lake County Common Pleas Court to a reduced charge of sexual battery and three of the gross sexual imposition counts. Taeusch, a driver for a courier service, was arrested at his Mentor workplace by police and the U.S. Marshals Fugitive Task Force several months after the incidents were reported. Assistant County Prosecutor Jenny Azouri previously said none of the girls were strangers to Taeusch and all were under the age of 16. Advertisement The 9 1/2 years was the maximum Taeusch could serve on those four counts. "The victims of the case, all four of them, are going to feel lasting effects beyond the maximum potential sentence in this case," Azouri said. "It wasn't their choice these offenses occurred. It was the defendant's choice four separate times." The first victim was molested at a Mentor-on-the-Lake home between Sept. 14, 2010, and Sept. 14, 2011, with the threat of psychological force, Azouri said. Between March 1 and May 31 of 2015, Taeusch then had sexual contact with two other victims while their abilities to resist were impaired. He was charged with a prior sex offense in the late 1990s, which led to him being dishonorably discharged from the U.S. Navy after a court-martial. Although Taeusch ended up pleading to a misdemeanor in that case, he spent 16 months in a military prison. One of Taeusch's victims read a statement at the sentencing. "The situation has affected my life in many different aspects," she said. "Some are more serious than others, but it changed my life and I'll never be the same person again." She said she has been emotionally affected and traumatized. She's had signs of paranoia, depression, anxiety and constantly feels unsafe and has trouble trusting people. "I cry about what's happened to me at random times," she said. "Even when I'm having fun and happy one moment, the situation will cross my mind and I will cry." She said her social life has been a "whole new world" and she's been bullied and harassed. "People will say things like, 'Stop lying, you're ridiculous,' and 'I can't believe you made that up,'" she said in the statement. Taeusch's attorney, Mary Catherine O'Neill, said that Taeusch takes full responsibility for what he did and has dealt with mental health issues and alcoholism. O'Neill said that his family would struggle if he was sentenced to prison and argued for him to avoid prison time. Judge Eugene A. Lucci, however, ultimately felt prison time was necessary. "The effects are irreversible, most of them can't be helped and I have to live with them for the rest of my life," the victim said in her statement. Two Employees Charged After Boy Dies At Lake Villa Troubled Youth Facility April 2, 2016 9:58 AM By Mike Krauser Filed Under: Lake Villa, Mike Krauser UPDATED: 11:29 a.m. (CBS) –Two employees of a residential treatment center for troubled teens in Lake Villa are charged in the death of a 16-year-old resident following a struggle on Wednesday night. Detective Chris Covelli with the Lake County Major Crimes task Force says Shaquan Allen was having behavioral issues at the Allendale Association residential treatment center. Lake Villa Police Chief Craig Somerville says employees James Davis and Justin Serak were attempting to get him to his room. "Officers were told by Allendale staff that the juvenile became unconscious during an effort to restrain him following a brief struggle," Somerville said. Covelli said Davis had the teen by the throat and Serak was holding his legs and Covelli said both lied to investigators, saying all three slipped on water. "It was later determined the water was caused by the defendants pouring water on the victim to attempt to wake him," Covelli said. He said there were 15 witnesses. The teen died of asphyxiation due to restraint. Covelli said, "It's a tragic time for the family and we can't imagine the pain they're going through right now. State's Attorney Mike Nerheim asked for a million dollars bond for Davis, who's charged with involuntary manslaughter and obstruction. "We have a dead 16 year old child, so I think a million dollars is appropriate." Serak is charged with obstruction and had his bond set at $50,000. Nerheim said its troubling nobody called 911 for 15 minutes. "Anytime you have a case like this it's a tragedy and that's always compounded when you have a child," he said. The victim's family said they were told three different stories by Allendale staff. "I wanna know how could this happen to my baby and nobody is telling me anything to let me know what's really going on," said the victim's mother, Willie Mae Allen. The boy was a ward of the state and his mother said she pressed for him to be admitted to the facility because she didn't want to lose him to the streets. Private Prison Companies See Dollar Signs in 'Treatment and Care' Facilities April 3rd 2016 By: Alex Mierjeski@amierjeski Share Tweet Mail SMS In recent years, private prison companies have quietly been handling deals to handle correctional care beyond prisons and detention centers, adapting to changing opinions about mass incarceration. For decades, private prison companies have made billions in revenue, operating correctional and detention facilities on the behalf of overburdened states; last year, the combined revenue for CCA and GEO exceeded $3.5 billion. But nationwide efforts to scale back mass incarceration and cut down on harsh sentencing have posed problems to private corporations' revenue models. Corporations like Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) and GEO Group, whose businesses had been largely dependent on putting and keeping people behind bars, have diversified and now include the treatment and care of those within the criminal justice system — but not necessarily locked up in its cells. That means private contracts for out-of-jail services like "probation and parole services, halfway houses, day reporting centers, drug and alcohol treatment programs, home confinement, electronic monitoring, and various supportive services such as educational classes and job training," Arjun Sethi, who teaches law at Georgetown University, and Cate Graziani, a mental health campaign coordinator at a national non-profit that studies private prisons, wrote in Politico. Researchers who have studied the transition call it the "treatment industrial complex." Activists worry about the incentives of corrections companies "whose bottom line depends on the growth of supervised populations, rather than their rehabilitation and treatment," Sethi and Graziani wrote. Flickr/Christian Senger "As state governments work to reduce prison populations by creating alternatives to incarceration, the private prison industry is rebranding itself and taking over treatment alternatives," Bob Libal, executive director of Grassroots Leadership, said in a statement. Grassroots Leadership released a report on private operation of mental health facilities back in March. As private prison companies move to adapt, researchers point to private corporations' sketchy record of handling the care and safety of inmates housed in their prisons to discredit claims that they are well-positioned to transition into treatment and care providers. There have already been lawsuits brought by prisoners against private care providers in New York, and calls for federal intervention after a gruesome Florida case involving a mentally ill man who died after allegedly being left in a scalding bathtub for hours. As Sethi and Graziani note in Politico, these are just some of the complaints "now proliferating regarding [private prison companies'] treatment and rehabilitation programs." Why Are K-12 School Leaders Being Trained in Coercive Interrogation Techniques? Wednesday, 06 April 2016 00:00 By Kali Holloway, AlterNet (Op-Ed font size decrease font size increase font size Print) One of America's great paradoxes (or perhaps hypocrisies) is its claim to be a global beacon of freedom, even as it jails more of its citizens -- by population percentage and in raw numbers -- than any other country in the world. This tendency toward suspicion, hyper-enforcement and punishment is so pervasive it even trickles down to our kids. CNN cites a National Center for Education Statistics report that finds 43 percent of US public schools have some form of security personnel patrolling their halls and grounds, a figure that rises to 63 and 64 percent, respectively, in public middle and high schools. In addition to the school resource officer, the over-policing of American society has now given rise to a new figure: the educator-interrogator. As the Guardian noted last year and the New Yorker discussed recently, school administrators are increasingly being trained as interrogators to extract confessions from students for so-called "crimes" -- most often, minor offenses from schoolyard scuffles to insubordination. Instruction in the interrogation arts is provided by John E. Reid and Associates, a global interrogation training firm that contracts with police departments, armed services divisions and security companies around the country. According to the New Yorker, the company has taught its patented "Reid Technique" to hundreds of school administrators in eight states. That training may be leading to an increasing number of students 'fessing up, even when they have nothing to confess to. As the New Yorker notes, "like the adult version of the Reid Technique, the school version involves three basic parts: an investigative component, in which you gather evidence; a behavioral analysis, in which you interview a suspect to determine whether he or she is lying; and a nine-step interrogation, a nonviolent but psychologically rigorous process that is designed, according to Reid's workbook, 'to obtain an admission of guilt.'" Reid's methods are built on what Bloomberg writer Drake Bennett calls "the twin poles of interrogation styles: 'minimization' and 'maximization.'" Forms of coercion that correspond, roughly, to "good cop, bad cop." Minimization plays down the significance of the crime and offers potential excuses for it -- "you just meant to scare her" or "anyone in your situation would have done the same thing." Maximization plays it up, confrontationally presenting incriminating evidence and refusing to allow any response except a confession. The two are the most widely used tools in the American police interrogator toolkit. The New Yorker spoke with Jessica Schneider, an attorney at the Chicago Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, who attended one of Reid's educator-focused training sessions early last year. The instruction included a run-down of telltale body language signs indicating a student -- or as they were referred to in the session, suspect or subject -- is lying. Many of these purported indicators can be found in Reid's Criminal Interrogation and Confessions. The list includes "closed, retreated posture" ("crossed arms...reflect decreased confidence or lack of emotional involvement"), "constant forward lean" ("a controlling and defensive posture") and "frozen and static" ("the subject who is so intent on not incriminating themselves...may, essentially 'shut down' nonverbally"). Interrogators are cautioned to look for poker-like deception "tells" -- hand wringing, scratching, wiping sweat, knuckle popping. An anxious liar, according to the Reid Technique, is a squirmy liar. One of the many problems with this approach is that it's notoriously fallible. Typically nervous behaviors are not surefire indicators of guilt, mostly because there's no universal litmus test for lying. Bennett points to a 2003 study from the Universities of Virginia and Missouri-Columbia which found that many of the behaviors associated with lying don't necessarily tell us anything at all. "Behavioral cues that are discernible by human perceivers are associated with deceit only probabilistically," researchers wrote. "To establish definitively that someone is lying, further evidence is needed." In other words, there is no definitive liar's pose. TV police procedurals and cop movies get it wrong all the time, and when they expect similar results, so do real-life interrogators. Minimization and maximization interrogation methods, like those used by Reid and others, are good at yielding confessions. But an increasing number of experts suggest that in far too many cases, those confessions are false, resulting from a blend of fear and coercion. Psychologist Melissa Russano devised a study that found the Reid Technique often produces false admissions of wrongdoing in innocent subjects. "Guilty people are more likely to confess," Russano told Bennett. "The problem is, so are innocent people." That was certainly true in the case of Juan A. Rivera, who in 1993 was convicted to life in jail for the rape and murder of an 11-year-old girl. After serving 20 years for a crime he didn't commit, Rivera sued a number of law enforcement agencies and other organizations for $20 million, a figure he was granted in an out-of-court settlement. John E. Reid and Associates paid $2 million of that sum. The false confessions of the Central Park Five, who were all teenagers at the time of their arrests, were also likely obtained using Reid-derived methods. It's no wonder the US Supreme Court has written that "mounting empirical evidence" proves that certain forms of interrogation "can induce a frighteningly high percentage of people to confess to crimes they never committed." Another glaring issue is that children and adolescents are often easily influenced and compliant toward authority figures. They're easy to intimidate and coerce, and often prioritize immediate rewards (having the interrogation end; getting to go home) over future penalties (suspension/expulsion/etc.) The Innocence Project, highlighting figures provided by the National Registry of Exonerations, notes that "in the last 25 years, 38 percent of exonerations for crimes allegedly committed by youth under 18 years of age involved false confessions, compared with 11 percent for adults." A University of Virginia review of research on the subject found a study of exonerations between 1989 and 2004 discovered "42 percent of the cases of juvenile exonerees involved false confessions, compared with 13 percent of the cases of adult exonerees. Among the youngest of these juvenile exonerees (12- to 15-year-olds), 69 percent confessed to homicides and rapes that they did not commit." A 2013 American Prospect piece titled "Teacher, May I Plead the Fifth?" cites yet another example: In a 2012 study of interrogations of around 300 juveniles charged with felonies in Minnesota -- the largest such empirical study available -- University of Minnesota law professor Barry Feld found that, after suspects waived their Miranda rights, officers used maximization techniques in 69 percent of cases and minimization techniques in 15 percent. Seven percent of all the interrogations studied were performed in schools...In the Minnesota study, 93 percent of juveniles gave [their Miranda rights] up. Juveniles waive at such high rates either because they do not understand the warning, do not grasp the gravity of their situation, want to tell their side of the story, or are terrified, says Feld. After they start to talk, confessions almost always follow (88 percent of the time in the Minnesota study), making the state's case easy to put together and often leading to a quick plea bargain. These issues are particularly relevant in schools, where protocols such as reading kids their Miranda rights and securing authority for searches don't apply. There's also the highly important question of how transforming school administrators into interrogators informs their view of students. A 2009 study cited by the New Yorker suggests that among police, training in the Reid Technique skewed perceptions of juveniles, making them appear more adult and less trustworthy. University of Virginia psychologists reported that "Reid-trained police were less aware of the developmental differences between adolescents and adults than police who did not receive the training." The researchers also found that officers trained in the Reid Technique "tended to believe that adolescents were just as capable as adults of withstanding psychologically coercive questioning, including deceit." That's not a particularly surprising outcome to casting every student as a potential criminal. If even well-trained law enforcement personnel have their ideas about minors shifted in this way, imagine the likely impact interrogation training has on school administrators. If all this isn't enough to show how problematic interrogations in schools are, consider how the practice contributes to the school-to-prison pipeline, a cluster of education policies that combine to deliver students -- overwhelmingly poor, African American, Latino, or coping with physical and mental disabilities -- directly from schools to jails. Zero-tolerance policies, which criminalize and disenfranchise already vulnerable students, have resulted in an unprecedented rise in suspensions and expulsions. The Vera Institute of Justice finds that around the country, the number of high school students suspended or expelled each academic year increased "from one in 13 in 1972-'73 to one in nine in 2009-'10" -- a nearly 40 percent rise. From preschool throughout their years of schooling, black and Latino students are more likely to be punished in this way. Though schools have multiple options for disciplining students, under zero tolerance they often resort to the harshest available, despite evidence that interventions such as counseling yield better results for student health than criminalization. From the Vera report: A rigorous and detailed study of students in Texas published in 2011 by the Council of State Governments and the Public Policy Research Institute at Texas A&M University shows how the culture of zero tolerance became so pervasive in that state that harsh punishments are meted out even when they are not strictly required. Twelve researchers tracked every student who entered seventh grade in 2000, 2001, and 2002 for six years. They found that more than half (60 percent) were suspended or expelled at some point in middle or high school. Moreover, the majority of those suspensions and expulsions appear to be for offenses that did not involve behaviors that fell within the parameters of the state of Texas zero-tolerance mandate; instead, they were simple violations of the school's code of conduct, such as using tobacco or acting out in ways that teachers find to be disruptive. In other words, school administrators chose to use harsh punishments even when they had the discretion to do otherwise. Considering that a 2012 study from Johns Hopkins found that a single suspension in ninth grade potentially doubles the chances a student will drop out, the stakes are incredibly high. In 2014, the Obama administration suggested teachers and schools abandon zero-tolerance policies and consider less extreme actions. Even at the highest levels, there's new recognition that turning schools into prisons simply isn't working, and neither is turning educators into interrogators. Instituting low-grade forms of school-sanctioned terror just creates a culture of mutual distrust and antipathy and ensures that the first lesson kids learn in school is one rooted in fear. "I really didn't stop to figure it out, I just did it," she said. "I just plowed into what was wrong with the system." She was so horrified by what she saw after becoming a court-appointed advocate for children, that she felt compelled to make public what she says is a system geared more toward making a profit from abused and neglected children than caring for them. read more The post for Foster Shock, a documentary about Florida's child welfare system, premiering at the 2016 Palm Beach International Film Festival, April 6 - 13. "There's unacceptable," she says, "and then there's reprehensible." Frankel contends that Florida's child welfare system went off the rails nearly 20 years ago when then-Gov. Jeb Bush privatized foster care. Virtually all responsibility for children in the state's care went to local private, for-profit entities, whose executives often earn large salaries while warehousing children, she says. "They have a $2.9 billion dollar budget and these kids aren't getting their basic needs met," Frankel said. She recalled her first case about six years ago in which a mentally-challenged little boy had been sexually abused in a therapeutic foster home. "The second time I visited, I was with a therapist. The boy told the therapist what happened. The therapist turned to me and said, 'These kids say these things all the time. I don't believe it.' They put another kid in there that night and he was also raped," said Frankel. To help her tell the story, Frankel hired filmmaker Brian Bayerl of Wilton Manors, who immediately connected with Frankel's outrage. "People don't necessarily need the film experience to do a documentary," he said, "because I know how to make a film. What I need is the passion of someone who is fighting injustice and wants to fix it. That's what I liked about Mari." The story is told by several former foster children, now adults, who tell their stories of sexual abuse and neglect, of not having enough to eat and of group home supervisors so poorly trained they relied on police to deal with the slightest rule infraction. "Most (group homes) have more than 200 police calls a year. A lot have 500 a year. Some had more than 800 per year, in group homes that usually have 9 to 12 kids," Frankel said. Angel, now 24, grew up in more than 50 foster homes. Her dying mother was in hospice care, yet Angel's caseworker didn't notify her so she could say good-bye. In the film, Angel breaks down as she described being told of her mother's death two days after it happened. "She was so lost in the system that her caseworker couldn't find her," said Frankel. Bayerl said they hired researchers to back up claims made in the film. "Everything has been fact-checked," he said. Frankel said she's sent copies of "Foster Shock" to officials at the Department of Children and Families in Tallahassee and to a few elected officials. She doesn't yet know if any of them have watched it. IF YOU GO Foster Shock is scheduled to be shown at the Palm Beach International Film Festival. Research suggests children require stability to ease trauma of long foster care stays By Hannah Frommelt CKN Contributor MISSOULA — Limiting the time a child is in foster care improves mental health outcomes, according to Casey Family Programs research investigator Peter Pecora. For youth in prolonged foster, there are strategies for resilience. Most children enter foster care due to neglect, but research shows extended stays in foster care can also be harmful. In 2014, 46 percent of youth were in foster care for 11 months or less, but 14 percent had been there for three years or more. Pecora's study looked at the health of adults that had spent at least one year or more in foster care from the ages of 14 to 18. His research found that these adults had a significant increase in at least one mental health diagnosis in the past twelve months and over the course of their lifetime, as compared to youth that spent less time in foster care and the general population. Symptoms of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and Major Depressive Episode competed for dominance as the most common symptoms self reported by the research participants, and the vast majority of sufferers had symptoms of other mental disorders and physical illness as well. Pecora said the lack of stable support systems is potentially the main reason for these troubling outcomes. Children are often reassigned social workers, causing them to feel diminished and unable to feel a sense of stability. Pecora recalled the story a youth's experience in the foster care system. "She called him only, 'Worker Number 9,' refusing to learn the names of any more social workers," he said, illustrating the disheartening effect of trading hands between nine different caseworkers. Increasing stability through lowering the number of home placements, the rate of change between placements, and the length of time in foster care can improve the health outcomes of those in foster care. Having a school mentor; tutoring; group sports; and job placement with positive role models also improve the mental health of children in foster care. Pecora said, "Remember, the glass is half full." Pecora said that slightly less than half of the individuals with prolonged placement in foster care showed no signs of a health care diagnosis in the last twelve months. Most had completed high school, volunteered in their community, and 21 percent had a household income at least three times the poverty level. Foster care improvements were also coming from an unlikely place, said Pecora. "Even in this dysfunctional Congress," Pecora said, "legislation was passed to help children in foster care." Among them was the Chafee Act that increased resources and training for preparing for independent living; the Fostering Connections Act, which enables youth in foster care to stay in care if in school or working until the age of 21; and a key phrase change in the FAFSA to make higher education more accessible to foster care individuals. Peter Pecora is a research investigator for the Casey Family Programs, which is the largest Operating foundation that promotes improvements in child welfare practice and policy in addition to providing direct services and support to youth and families. They work collaboratively with all fifty states, and a handful of tribal entities, including, the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes. Pecora presented his research as part of the McNall Lecture Series for the Department of Sociology for the University of Montana on Wednesday, March 23. 37-year-old woman charged with sexual assault of a minor | 911 News | journalstar.com 37-year-old woman charged with sexual assault of a minor By the Lincoln Journal Star Updated 9 hrs ago \(8\) Bishop Courtesy photo A 37-year-old woman is accused of sexually assaulting a teenager in a group home in York and ending up pregnant. The 15-year-old told investigators with the Nebraska State Patrol that he was living at the Epworth Village group home in York when he and Jamie Bishop began having sex two to three times a week from January 2015 to July 2015, according to an affidavit for her arrest. Bishop was a staff member of Epworth Village at the time of the alleged assaults and was suspended last summer and then terminated, officials at the group home said. All sexual relations allegedly took place in the victim's room at Epworth Village, or outside on the facilities grounds. A Bishop and the boy were seen together several times on surveillance video and her Internet history showed she searched for the definition of degrees of sexual assault in Nebraska, consequences of lying to police and the age of consent in Nebraska, documents say. DNA test results returned March 9 show the teenager fathered Bishop's now 5-month-old son, documents say. In Nebraska, children younger than 16 cannot legally consent to sex. Bishop was arrested March 15 and charged with first-degree sexual assault of a minor Wednesday. York County Judge Linda Senff set her bail at $75,000. Judge orders state to fix Yakima mental-health facility Originally published April 11, 2016 at 12:17 pm A federal judge ordered the state of Washington to stop sending mentally ill defendants to a new treatment facility in Yakima after learning that the renovated jail poses a safety risk. Section Sponsor Share story By MARTHA BELLISLE Associated Press A federal judge in Seattle ordered the state to stop sending mentally ill defendants to a new treatment facility in Yakima after learning that the renovated jail poses a safety risk. Lawyers for the defendants had sought a restraining order to stop the Department of Social and Health Services from sending mentally ill defendants to the Yakima Residential Treatment Facility to have their competency restored. They argued that a former jail was not an appropriate setting for treating the mentally ill, and said the facility hadn't been properly renovated to ensure that patients would not harm themselves or others. U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman agreed in part and on Friday, she granted a modified restraining order against the state, saying the defendants were at risk of irreparable harm by staying at the newly opened center. "They are shut down until the risks are addressed," said Emily Cooper, a lawyer with Disability Rights Washington. Pechman's order focused on two critical issues, Cooper said. Pechman said the stairway poses a risk for jumping or hanging and needs to be fixed. She also said the state needs to modify the seclusion and restraint room before any new defendants are sent there, Cooper said. "It is unfortunate that the plaintiffs were forced again to seek judicial relief due to DSHS' failure to protect class members," Cooper told The Associated Press in an email. "We look forward to when DSHS will step up and exemplify the leadership necessary to implement a safe and effective solution to the delays in competency services." The restraining order comes after a high-profile escape last week at the state's largest mental hospital. On Saturday, department officials said security is being enhanced at state psychiatric hospitals after a man accused of torturing a 20-year-old woman to death escaped from the Western State Hospital with another patient. Both have been recaptured. The men were at the Lakewood hospital under court commitment after being found too mentally ill to understand their criminal charges. The state opened the Yakima center in March in an effort to satisfy a previous order that requires it to provide competency treatment services within seven days of a judge's order. Pechman made that order last year after finding that the state was violating the constitutional rights of mentally ill defendants who were forced to wait in jails for weeks or months before getting a competency evaluation or restoration treatment. Kathy Spears, a spokeswoman for the state agency and the private group running the center, Comprehensive Mental Health, said they have already begun to make changes to satisfy the judge's concerns. "No patients will be served on the second tier until the court's concerns about the stairwell are addressed," Spears said. "The seclusion and restraint room will not be used until the concerns with a ventilation grate are addressed." The state agency planned to meet with the court-appointed monitor on Monday to clarify any long-term solutions and address concerns so that the facility can again be used for competency services, she said. Two top leaders at the state's child protection agency stepped down this week, the latest in a series of high-level resignations to hit the flailing agency as it is battered by high profile child deaths, profound foster care troubles, fleeing employees and intense media scrutiny. Director of Field Operations Colleen McCall — whose job is to ensure that ground-level Child Protective Services operations across the state are flowing smoothly — announced her resignation to employees in an email this morning. McCall's operations have come under fire over the last few weeks because of high turnover in Dallas and a blundered child abuse case there in which a little girl was killed. Problems in Travis County are also coming under the microscope. The number of backlogged cases in Travis County has spiked 76 amid an environment former and current employees call toxic and abusive. "Delinquent" cases, as they are called, have been a factor in child deaths across the state In an email obtained by the American-Statesman, McCall said that she was proud of her career at CPS and that she felt "blessed" to have worked with CPS. "However, the work is never easy and the demands on our time are great," she wrote. "My family is calling me and I owe them some quality time after so many years of putting my CPS duties first. The email says that her last day is May 19. Meanwhile, assistant commissioner of residential child care licensing, Paul Morris, added his resignation to the list. Morris' division regulates, licenses, and investigates residential foster care operations. In an email on Monday, Morris wrote that he was leaving to take on a consulting role with an emphasis on emergency response and business continuity. "I also want you to know that it has been an honor and a privilege to work with such a dedicated team of professionals these last three years," the email states. "You've taught me a great deal about Licensing and the critical role we have in reducing risk to children in care. The volume of work this team is able to accomplish with relatively small staff and resources is demonstrative of your unwavering dedication to our children." That division was harshly criticized by U.S. District Judge Janis Jack, who ruled in December that CPS needed a massive overhaul to protect children from danger. In her ruling, Jack said that Morris' division made mistakes regarding abuse or neglect in a majority of its decisions. "This is staggering, and it means that many abused children—for whom a preponderance of evidence indicated that they were physically abused, sexually abused, or neglected—go untreated and could be left in abusive placements," Jack wrote. The departures are one of a number of resignations in recent months. Lisa Black, former assistant commissioner of CPS, resigned several months after the federal court ruling. Jackie Freeman, who ran the Dallas region CPS operations retired last week after a Dallas Morning News report exposed problems in those operations. On Sunday, the American-Statesman published a report detailing CPS problems across the state. The newspaper also reported systemic troubles at the agency last year in its extensive investigation called Missed Signs, Fatal Consequences. What we reported In early 2015, the American-Statesman published "Missed Signs, Fatal Consequences," a three-day series of stories in which the paper reviewed 779 child death reports by Child Protective Services from September 2009 through March 2014 and found nearly 400 cases in which children who died of abuse or neglect were known by CPS to be in potential danger. Last week, the story won an Innovation in Investigative Journalism award from the national nonprofit Investigative Reporters and Editors. Foster care failures Writer Posted Apr. 12, 2016 at 2:01 AM Posted Apr. 12, 2016 at 2:01 AM Posted Apr. 12, 2016 at 2:01 AM For some time, Rhode Island has faced significant problems with its foster-care program. But a new report, from the state's Office of the Child Advocate, highlights particular deficiencies that may have contributed to two recent child deaths. According to the report, children in state care are living in more than 320 unlicensed foster homes. Of that number, more than 100 have gone unlicensed for more than six months, contravening state law. The head of the licensing unit at the Department of Children, Youth and Families was recently relieved of his duties. But that will not ensure that this problem is solved. Nationally, according to the OCA's report, 25 percent of all placements of children outside the home are with relatives. In Rhode Island, the proportion is much higher, more than 60 percent. Frequently, children are taken to a relative on an emergency basis. Although even initially, the relative's home must meet certain requirements, they are less stringent than those faced by non-relatives. The law forbids leaving a child in an unlicensed relative's home for more than six months. Last December, Lillianna Burt, an infant under state care, died in a relative's unlicensed home. An autopsy linked her death to unsafe sleeping conditions. Another infant, unnamed, died in October, also while living in an unlicensed relative's home. The state child advocate, Regina M. Costa, convened a panel to look into these and two other child fatalities. Ms. Costa has reached the end of her five-year term, and is to be succeeded by Gov. Gina Raimondo's pick, Jennifer A. Griffith, who was confirmed last week. Ms. Costa's tenure has been marked by communications struggles with DCYF. Only recently has she embraced the view that her office should automatically investigate every death involving a child in state care. Under current law, such probes are optional. That puts Rhode Island at odds with most other states, as well as with common sense. It is time for the General Assembly to spell out firmer requirements in these cases, and clarify DCYF's responsibility for providing information to the child advocate. The bigger picture, unfortunately, is more daunting. Among DCYF's many challenges is that it places far too many children in group homes rather than with families. Governor Raimondo, who declared the agency dysfunctional shortly after she took office, has embarked on an ambitious restructuring, assigning a leadership role to Jamie McDonald. Unfortunately, Ms. McDonald lacks the credentials required to head a child welfare agency. The lack of a permanent director with appropriate experience could be holding the reform effort back. Recruiting more foster care providers is a key element of the state's strategy. But, given the relatively low financial support offered, the results are apt to be modest.

Page 2 of 2 - The OCA report argues that the licensing process for relatives' homes should be improved, to include greater supervision and more frequent visits by social workers. It urges that DCYF be more aggressive in disqualifying relatives, if necessary, after an emergency placement has been made. Yet while these are fine ideas, they raise staffing issues. Caseloads for DCYF workers remain quite high, and are a cause of frequent turnover. Improving the lot of children under the state's care is clearly a tall order. In the near term, certainly, it is urgent to do a better job on the licensing front. While a better system for investigating child deaths is also needed, better licensing could lead to fewer deaths. Source:

Drugging Our Kids: Foster care bill targets excessive prescribing of psychiatric drugs By Karen de Sá, kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 04/11/2016 01:18:44 PM PDT Updated: 04/12/2016 05:30:42 AM PDT Drugging Our Kids Read the Bay Area News Group investigation about psychiatric drugs in the California foster care system. SACRAMENTO -- The voices of foster youth and their advocates overcame the powerful physicians lobby in the Capitol on Monday, as a bill to identify and investigate California doctors who overprescribe psychiatric drugs to traumatized foster children won a key Senate vote. The unique legislation -- part of a series of bills inspired by this newspaper's investigative series "Drugging Our Kids" -- mirrors efforts to stop reckless prescribing of painkillers. Sen. Mike McGuire's Senate Bill 1174, which passed on an 8-0 vote from the committee overseeing the state's businesses and professions, would give the California Medical Board greater authority to crack down on doctors who engage in "repeated acts of clearly excessive prescribing, furnishing or administering psychotropic medications to a minor" without medical justification. State Sen. Mike McGuire, D-Healdsburg, testifies on Monday, April 11, 2016 at the California state Capitol in Sacramento, Calif., during a hearing on Senate Bill 1174, which would strengthen the power of the California Medical Board to identify and investigate high prescribers of psychotropic medications given to foster children. To his right is Kimberly Kirchmeyer, executive director of Medical Board of California, who also testified during the hearing. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) (Dai Sugano) California's foster care system has come to rely on powerful antipsychotic drugs to sedate troubled teens, the newspaper's investigation revealed. But while a series of bills passed last year instituted many new measures to curb the practice, the laws did nothing to target the source of the drugs: the doctors who prescribe them. "The vast majority of medical professionals are doing their job well, but as in any industry there are going to be outliers, and medical professionals are no different," said McGuire, D-Healdsburg, whose bill now heads to the Senate Appropriations Committee. "And if there is an outlier, it could cost someone their life, or cause permanent damage for a child." Advertisement Lobbyists for the California Medical Association, the California Psychiatric Association and the California Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry oppose McGuire's bill, unless it is watered down to include an "education-first" rather than an "enforcement-first" approach. They argue that the additional oversight will drive physicians from working with foster children and "add another bureaucratic layer to a process that is already highly regulated." Under McGuire's bill, the medical board would monitor physicians through quarterly reports of prescription claims that would not reveal patient names, but rather the prescribers' practices. Prescribing to very young children, high dosages of medications, and the use of multiple psychotropic medications at once could be grounds for investigation under the bill. While physicians have due process rights to defend themselves, ultimately the worst offenders could lose their licenses. The new scrutiny of psychotropic prescribing is similar in some ways to curbs on the overuse of pain medications, now tracked by the state Attorney General's Office. The California Medical Association's Stuart Thompson testified Monday that his group has no problem with the bill's data-sharing provisions between state health officials and the medical board. "But what we do have a problem with is, this is going to be a retroactive look at prescribing practices." Thompson proposed that instead of trained state investigators, an "ad hoc committee" should review physician care of foster children. However, Cal State East Bay student Tisha Ortiz, a 23-year-old former foster youth, said more serious review is urgently needed. Testifying before state senators, Ortiz said as a young teen she took as many as 12 pills a day in foster care, including a combination of an antidepressant, an antipsychotic, an anti-anxiety medication and a mood stabilizer. It left her listless, overweight and suffering from tics. The bill "will help identify doctors who are too quick to prescribe medications and who are overreliant on them," she said, and ensure that prescribers "distinguish between behavioral issues and mental illnesses." McGuire's bill expands on a series of laws passed last year to restrict the excessive use of psychotropic drugs in the foster care system, after the newspaper's investigation. The series found almost 1 in 4 foster teens on mind-altering medications, which have serious side effects. Under a second pending bill, authored by Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose, counties would be required to submit a local plan each year detailing mental health services available to children in foster care and the juvenile justice system. The plans would be reviewed by quality-control experts, and counties found lacking would be subject to sanctions, including the withholding of state and federal funds. Both bills are sponsored by the National Center for Youth Law, which was successful in passing a package of reform bills last year. Beall's Senate Bill 1291 passed a key Senate committee last week. With McGuire's bill now moving toward the Senate floor, the senator said he is hopeful that foster children will receive the same protection of other California patients. His office found that from 2014 to 2015, more than 8,000 medical board complaints were filed, but not a single one came from a parent or advocate for a foster child. "These kids don't have anyone standing up for them, and they don't have a voice, and they're suffering the consequences," he said. Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source:

Investigation Exposes Failings of Oversight in NYC Group Homes City investigators say oversight was so lax at homes for juvenile offenders that violent episodes were "all but inevitable." by Joquin Sapien ProPublica, April 13, 2016, 1:14 p.m. 1 Comment Print Print This is part of an ongoing investigation Level 14 How a home for troubled children came undone and what it means for California's chance at reform. Spur Reform in 2016 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. The Boys Town home in Park Slope from which three teenagers escaped and allegedly robbed and raped a woman in Manhattan in 2015. (David Sleight/ProPublica) Update, Apr. 13, 2016: This story has been updated to include a statement from an ACS spokeswoman. It was a disaster waiting to happen. That's what the New York City Department of Investigation concluded in a 24-page report on a violent rape committed last year by three troubled youngsters who had run away from a group home in Brooklyn. For years, the Department of Investigation found, the city's child welfare agency had failed to adequately monitor the Brooklyn home and others like it throughout the city. According to the report, the agency, known formally as the Administration for Children's Services, lacks sufficient protocols to respond to escapes or violent incidents at the homes; its inspectors do not visit the group homes nearly enough to ensure safe conditions; its contracts with the nonprofit providers who run the homes do not even contain specific safety requirements; and ACS has not developed a way to effectively evaluate the performance of the homes. A spokeswoman for ACS did not immediately respond to a request for comment on the report, but DOI notes that ACS officials agreed with the investigation department's findings and have begun implementing corrective measures — hiring more staff, for instance, and increasing the frequency of inspections. The report said such fixes were urgently needed. Given the agency's "systemic failure" to oversee the homes — small facilities meant to house juveniles who have committed low-level crimes — last year's rape was "all but inevitable," and "there can be no guarantee against further incidents," the report said. The Department of Investigation also announced the arrests of three current or former group home workers, all of whom had worked for Boys Town, a Nebraska-based nonprofit that ran the home in Brooklyn. Drawing on hours of surveillance footage recorded by Boys Town, DOI investigators found that the workers failed to monitor youth in their care and falsified logbooks. In several instances, the workers said in logbooks that teenagers were safely asleep in their beds when the video showed the workers were asleep themselves. The report represents the latest blow for a program that New York City policymakers had envisioned as the future of treatment for juvenile offenders. The program, known as Close to Home, was instituted in April 2012. Its central aim was to keep New York City youth who'd been convicted of crimes closer to their relatives and communities, in group homes that were meant to resemble a family-like atmosphere. The idea was that the homes would provide the teens a better chance at rehabilitation and reform than had the notoriously violent and scandal-ridden youth prisons upstate. The homes in the city were not locked, but the youngsters assigned to them were to be under 24-hour supervision. But as ProPublica reported in 2015, the implementation of the program was rushed and beset with problems from the beginning. The nonprofit organizations who contracted with the city complained that they were insufficiently prepared. Children ran away on hundreds of occasions, sometimes committing violent crimes. In 2014, there were 177 arrests made of children living in the homes. In June 2013, a 17 year old fled a Staten Island home and allegedly stabbed a man to death in Queens. The city had acted to curtail the number of runaways and subsequent arrests when, in June 2015, three boys ran away from the Boys Town home in the Park Slope section of Brooklyn. The boys, according to authorities, met a woman at an internet café in Chinatown, took her into the hallway of a nearby apartment building, then beat, robbed and raped her. Earlier this year, the boys pleaded guilty to rape, robbery, and burglary counts. In the summer of 2015, a ProPublica reporter interviewed one of the boys on Rikers

Island, where he had been jailed. He said that he and his accomplices had frequently and easily run away from the group home. They rigged the alarm system so that it would not alert employees when they escaped out of a window, he said. They had also routinely smuggled cocaine, marijuana and ketamine into the home and used the drugs in their rooms, the boy said. New York City terminated Boys Town's \$6.4 million dollar contract to oversee troubled youth as part of the Close to Home program in June 2015, three weeks after the rape. It was the third such agency to lose its contract following problems with runaways. Even after the 2015 rape, the Department of Investigation found that the incident had only a marginal impact on the frequency with which Boys Town employees conducted bed checks. Over the 12 nights following the rape, employees only conducted 98 of 192 required bed checks, a rate of 51 percent. In the 25 nights before the rape, employees checked beds at a rate of 15 percent. Widespread Problems With Group Home Agency Prompt City to Cut Ties Boys Town becomes third agency to fail as New York City tries new model for juvenile offenders. Read the story. According to the most recent figures available, there are currently about 30 homes caring for more than 150 boys and girls each month. In an emailed statement, a spokesperson for Boys Town said "these allegations, if true, fail to meet the core values of Boys Town and our mission of caring for at risk children and families. We have taken clear, specific steps to ensure that they do not happen in the future. Our focus remains on our core mission: changing the way America cares for children, families and communities." Update, April 13, 2016: In a statement, an ACS spokeswoman defended the Close to Home program and detailed improvements she said the agency was making to it: "Until recently, New York City's youth were shipped hundreds of miles from their homes and communities, which negatively impacted both the youth and the communities they returned to," the spokeswoman said. "Close to Home is a massive transformation in the City's approach to juvenile justice and along with other juvenile justice reforms, has led to an all-time low youth crime rate." She added that runaways had continued to decrease in recent years and that ACS was working with the New York Police Department to increase the safety of Close to Home facilities. She said that Mayor de Blasio had authorized a $4 million dollar budget increase, allowing for 35 new hires to assist in tightening oversight of the program. Correction, April 13, 2016: An earlier version of this article reported that four people had been arrested as a result of the Department of Investigation's inquiry. DOI has amended its report to say only three people had been arrested. Group Home Workers Are Charged With Falsifying Records By NIKITA STEWART/APRIL 13, 2016 Continue reading the main story Share This Page Continue reading the main story Share Tweet Email More Save One current and two former employees of a nonprofit that ran group homes in Brooklyn were arraigned on Wednesday on charges of falsifying records, the New York City Investigation Department said. The homes were closed last year after three teenagers sneaked out during the night and raped a woman in Manhattan. The three employees, Andrew Best, 23, Soraya Delancey, 36, and Stanley Stephens, 23, worked overnight at two of the group homes in Brooklyn operated by Boys Town. They failed to monitor their charges through the night and falsified the records to make it look as if they had, the Investigation Department said. Mr. Best was on duty at the group home in Park Slope where the three teenagers slipped out, while Mr. Stephens and Ms. Delancey, who the investigative agency said still worked for Boys Town, were employed at another home in the neighborhood. The investigative agency said another former employee, Orville Morgan, 25, who worked at the same home as Mr. Stephens and Ms. Delancey, would also be charged. The arrests followed a monthslong investigation that found staffing shortages, pervasive deception by overnight employees and a severe lack of oversight by the city's Administration for Children's Services. The child welfare agency was aware that there was a problem with teenagers' leaving group homes without permission but did not adequately develop policies to address it, making security lapses "all but inevitable," the Investigation Department's report said. If the child welfare agency does not take significant action to improve its oversight of group homes, the report said, "there can be no guarantee against further incidents." Advertisement Continue reading the main story The arraignments of the workers further tainted the Close to Home program, which supervised the Boys Town group homes and was started four years ago through state legislation calling for a new approach to juvenile justice. The program aims to keep juveniles who are in legal trouble in their communities and close to their families. Currently, there are eight providers with 29 locations that house 235 youths. "It's important to distinguish between the idea of a program, which is a great idea, and the execution of that idea," Mark G. Peters, the Investigation Department's commissioner, said in an interview on Wednesday. "At all levels, this program was poorly executed without appropriate regard to public safety." In a statement on Wednesday, the child welfare agency called Close to Home "a massive transformation" in how the city approaches juvenile justice and credited the program with "an all-time-low youth crime rate." The agency, which terminated its contract with Boys Town last year, is also working with the New York Police Department "to assess and further improve Close to Home safety and security, increasing staff training and monitoring instructions and allocating additional staff and resources to create more robust oversight of the program," the statement said. In a review of 37 nights of video footage after the assault on June 1, 2015, investigators concluded that 10 out of 22 overnight workers at the homes run by Boys Town did not conduct required bed checks and falsified logbooks over multiple nights. Some employees even left the homes when they were on duty; one worker was gone for an hour and a half. Kara Neuvirth, a spokeswoman for Boys Town, said in a statement that if the allegations were true, they "fail to meet the core values of Boys Town and our mission of caring for at-risk children and families." "We have taken clear, specific steps to ensure that they do not happen in the future," she said. "Our focus remains on our core mission: changing the way America cares for children, families and communities." The arrests brought more unwanted attention to the Administration for Children's Services, still grappling with the arrest last month of a longtime foster father on charges of sexually abusing five adopted sons and endangering the welfare of two foster children in a case in which prosecutors expect additional charges. Advertisement Continue reading the main story The Investigation Department report also cited widespread safety deficiencies. Over the four years of the Close to Home program, the child welfare agency warned six out of nine contractors, including Boys Town, to improve security. But the agency often deferred corrective action and monitoring to the providers. The report focused mostly on security lapses at the Boys Town homes. On June 1, 2015, three boys, who were 16 at the time, slipped through a bedroom window with a broken alarm in their home in Park Slope. They made their way to an Internet cafe in Chinatown in Manhattan, where they forced a woman into a nearby stairwell and robbed and raped her. The teenagers, Sanat Asliev, Emanuel Burrowes and Eric Pek, pleaded guilty to rape and robbery charges this month. Investigators learned that a supervisor at Boys Town knew the alarm was not working, but failed to tell the two overnight employees, so no one took precautions, such as moving the boys to rooms with functioning alarms. More troubling, however, was that no one was watching despite video surveillance and room-check requirements, Mr. Peters said. Ten days after the teenagers were arrested, Denzel Thompson, an employee, was charged with offering a false instrument and falsifying business records after he admitted he had not checked on the boys despite notes in a logbook that he had done so every 30 minutes of his shift. Mr. Thompson, who has pleaded not guilty, was not alone. Investigators found that overnight employees made required bed checks just 15 percent of the time in the 25 days before the attack, and that faking entries in logbooks — "all youth are asleep" and "all youth are in rooms" — was routine. Even after the woman was attacked, investigators found that overnight employees made bed checks only 50 percent of the time. Attorneys: Seattle foster parents abused kids on state's watch Foster children sexually assaulted, fed dog food BY LEVI PULKKINEN, SEATTLEPI.COM STAFF Published 9:01 pm, Wednesday, April 13, 2016 6 Five former residents of a now shuttered Seattle foster home say state officials failed to protect them from physical and sexual abuse. Placed as children in a Seattle foster home, the children endured physical and emotional torture for years without relief, according to their attorneys. They were forced to eat dog food, raped and molested by a man living in the home and beaten by their foster parents. Attorneys for the former foster children gave notice earlier this month that they are prepared to sue the state Department of Social and Health Services. They claim their clients are due as much as $30 million. Documents provided by attorneys Lawand Anderson, Lincoln Beauregard and Julie Kays show DSHS began receiving concerning reports about the couple within months of their licensing in December 1988. The couple maintained their license for 11 years. The children, now grown, were placed at the home between 1992 and 1999, the year child services workers staunchly the flow of children into the couple's home. A DSHS spokeswoman declined to comment on the allegations, citing a department policy against discussing potential litigation. "They want accountability, and they want the system to be a little bit better," Beauregard said. "This place was just treated like a clearinghouse for hard-to-place foster children." One August 1989 report authored by a child services worker showed a child nearly drowned at couple's home. That child had also suffered burns to his chest and feet. In the years that followed, Seattle police investigated numerous instances of suspected abuse after welts, burns and bruises were found on children living in the South Seattle home. The foster father was investigated in 1992 after a report that he angrily fired a shotgun inside his home. Reports of abuse were usually followed by in-home reviews meant to teach the couple how to discipline the children they were being paid to care for. It appears the couple collected about $35,000 annually in foster care payments during several years. Attorneys for the former residents say the foster mother failed a background check in

1995. Nonetheless, children were placed with her and her husband for years afterward. "DSHS records reflect that the ... residence was viewed as a clearing house for foster children and that (the couple) treated the home as a profit center," the attorneys said in a statement Wednesday. Each of the young adults now preparing to sue the state claim to have been repeatedly raped and molested by a man living in the home. That man had been licensed by the state to care for children as well. According to documents provided by the attorneys, Seattle Police Detective Al Cruise told state regulators in 1998 that both foster parents had been convicted of crimes in other states. Those crimes were apparently missed in background checks conducted during the licensing process. The couple's license was revoked in the following August after 11 years of operation. Attorneys for the former residents estimate that their clients are owed $25 million to $30 million. The tort claim filed April 7 given the state 60 days to reach a settlement before a lawsuit could be filed. Beauregard, whose practice has included several large lawsuits representing abuse survivors, said the Department of Social and Health Services has failed to take advantage of that settlement window in recent years. Instead, the attorney said, the state winds up paying the costs of protracted litigation once a settlement is reached. "DSHS never seems to take the opportunity to approach the clients seriously early in the process," Beauregard said. "They just don't do it. ... I think it's a complete waste." The former foster children are represented Anderson of L.A. Law & Associates in Seattle as well as Beauregard and Kays of Connelly Law Offices in Tacoma. Owner of 9 north Alabama mental health group homes decertified Print Email By The Associated Press The Associated Press on April 15, 2016 at 3:14 PM 3 shares The Alabama Department of Mental Health decertified the owner of nine group homes in northern Alabama. State officials delivered the notice Thursday to K&D Group Home executive director Katie M. Smith that the state was immediately revoking her license, the Decatur Daily reported. Smith was licensed to operate group homes in Decatur that serve patients with intellectual disabilities. "I find it necessary to immediately revoke your department certification because the deficiencies cited pose a serious threat to the safety and welfare of the consumers," Mental Health Commissioner James V. Perdue wrote in a letter dated Thursday to Smith. Perdue said the state made visits on March 1 and March 31. Smith had 15 working days in which to appeal the decision, according to Perdue's letter. The letter did detail the deficiencies, but Sabrina Gibson, who serves as facility director, said there were some issues with paperwork during the two visits. She said a disgruntled employee went to the state, but no issues were related to the "health and welfare" of clients. Smith could not be reached for comment. Some parents said they need more information, and opted to take their children home. "I think all the parents just want a little more information from the state," said Maletha Pointer, who moved her 26-year-old autistic son to another group home. "My son had some behavior problems, but since he's been with them (K&D), he has gotten a lot better." Decatur police and state officials converged at her group homes looking for the 16 patients in Smith's care. Department of Mental Health spokesman Terry Mitchell said patients in the group homes will be relocated, but the state declined to say where. There are 84 homes for people with intellectual disabilities in Decatur. The Department of Mental Health's website does not list the 2016 visits, but it references inspections of Smith's nine group homes on March 15, 2015. They all received scores of 84, which falls in the one-year certification category. State officials have said the need for group homes like this in the Decatur area increased significantly after the state closed Lurleen B. Wallace Developmental Center on U.S. 31 in 2003. Coconut Creek Police officer accused of molesting boys denied bond Posted: Apr 14, 2016 6:28 PM PDT Updated: Apr 15, 2016 3:54 PM PDT Close X Embed Video Code Link to Video Coconut Creek Police Officer Daniel Rush Broward County Sheriff Scott Israel POMPAÑO BEACH, Fla. (WSVN) -- A Coconut Creek Police officer will remain behind bars, days after, officials said, allegations surfaced that he had inappropriately touched two boys. According to the Broward Sheriff's Office, Coconut Creek Police Officer Daniel Rush was arrested at his police department, Thursday afternoon, at around 4 p.m. Rush, a five-year veteran with the department, was charged with one count of custodial sexual battery and two counts of lewd and lascivious molestation. Broward County Sheriff Scott Israel and Coconut Creek Police Chief Albert "Butch" Arenal spoke about the arrest with reporters at a news conference, Thursday night. "The allegations against the former officer are disturbing, to say the least," said Israel. Investigators said the accusations came to light on Sunday, when one of the alleged victims handed a note to a parishioner during a service at the United Church of Christ in Pompano Beach. "The victim threw the note in the garbage. The parishioner, who we're so grateful for his due diligence and attention to detail, retrieved the note from the garbage," said Israel. The note, officials said, included claims of sexual misconduct. The next day, the parishioner notified BSO's Pompano Beach district office. "He brought it to the attention of our police officers," said Israel. Detectives spoke with the alleged victim, and during an independent interview at a sexual assault treatment center, they learned the alleged incident occurred last year in Coconut Creek. Investigators said Rush, 26, attends the United Church of Christ. A second victim, another boy, was later identified. Investigators said he told them Rush had fondled him. "It's unsettling for anyone to violate the sanctity of a child," said Israel. Rush, the co-founder of the mentoring organization Men of Virtue and Ethics (MOVE), mentors troubled teens. Investigators said the victims were boys he was supposed to be mentoring. Officials said one of the boys was 12 years old at the time of the alleged sexual battery, and the other was 13. "If these allegations are true, this behavior is reprehensible," said Israel. "Our detectives will do everything within their power to fact-find and make sure justice is served." "We'll continue to work closely with Broward County Sheriff's Office investigators, and we are 100 percent committed to ensuring that justice is done in this case," said Arenal. Investigators said Rush admitted knowing the boys but indicated no inappropriate behavior took place. Rush's attorney confirmed his client insists he did not molest the boys. "[These are] serious allegations of sex offenses that he denies, yes, adamantly," said Johnny McCray. Rush was part of a Taser incident last February in which 39-year-old Calvin Reid died. The Broward County Medical Examiner ruled the death a homicide. A grand jury will reportedly be convened to look into this case by the end of June. Due to the group's affiliation with other churches, detectives are concerned there may be more victims. "For this reason, our agency is not only in a state of shock, but this has been a blow to everything we stand for," said Arenal. Rush has been placed on unpaid administrative leave until this investigation is complete. His bond was denied, Friday. McCray said he is currently preparing his defense. "He's been an upstanding officer, upstanding citizen, and we intend to fight these allegations," he said. United Church of Christ officials released a statement saying that they are deeply saddened by this devastating news. They went on to say that their thoughts and prayers are with the individuals and families involved. If you have any information that could help investigators, call Broward County Crime Stoppers at 954-493-TIPS. Remember, you can always remain anonymous, and you may be eligible for a $3,000 reward. Sparring continues over Utah charter school linked to treatment center for troubled youths By BENJAMIN WOOD | The Salt Lake Tribune First Published Apr 15 2016 07:30PM • Last Updated Apr 15 2016 09:35 pm (Rick Egan | The Salt Lake Tribune) Maria Olsen and Josh Graham, attended West Ridge Academy, a youth residential treatment center based in West Jordan. Friday, February 12, 2016. (Rick Egan | The Salt Lake Tribune) Maria Olsen and Josh Graham, attended West Ridge Academy, a youth residential treatment center based in West Jordan. Friday, February 12, 2016. Education » State wants specifics on how a separation between Eagle Summit school and West Ridge Academy resources would be enforced. A new charter school linked to a residential treatment center for troubled youths generated more debate between Utah's top school boards on Friday. During a visit to the Utah Board of Education's monthly meeting, members of the state Charter School Board were pressed for specifics on how separation would be enforced between the Eagle Summit Academy charter school and West Jordan's West Ridge Academy. The state school board initially denied Eagle Summit's charter application in February to allow for an investigation into allegations of financial insolvency and child abuse at the private school currently operated by West Ridge Academy. Board members approved the charter in March after adding caveats that prohibited the blending of funds and personnel between Eagle Summit and West Ridge, and that a safety plan be developed to protect charter school students from the youth residents of the treatment center. But Howard Headlee, chairman of the charter school board, said there was no need for the added provisions because they are already required by Utah law. "We see the concern and we agree with the concern," Headlee said. "We just plan on moving forward as required by state law and [school] board rule." Headlee told members of the state school board that identifying specific laws in agreements between Eagle Summit and the State Charter School Board could downplay the importance of other laws. "It creates ambiguity in the contract," he said. But board members Leslie Castle and Laura Belnap, who opposed Eagle Summit Academy in March, said an understanding that additional protections would be in place was a factor in the charter school securing a majority vote of board members. Belnap said the hybrid structure of Eagle Summit, which will enroll students from the West Ridge treatment center as well as trauma-sensitive youths from the area, creates unique and specific challenges within the state's public education system. "I believe that the safety plan is in board rule and in law," she said. "However, I don't believe the specificity of not commingling funds with a private and a charter entity are part of that." Eagle Summit is scheduled to open its doors next fall. It will replace the private school at West Ridge Academy and will be located on the West Ridge campus, with some buildings and spaces shared by the two entities. The charter school's board includes former members of the West Ridge advisory council, and the treatment center's academic director, Paul Keene, is slated to run the new charter school. During debate over the charter school's application, the charter board and state school board heard testimony from former students who accused West Ridge staff of using violence as a disciplinary action against rule-breaking and misbehavior. And the Utah Office of Education's investigation into the treatment center identified several lawsuits against West Ridge that were settled out of court. Representatives of Eagle Summit were joined by Dan Griffiths, a former member of the state school board, when the charter made its case before the state school board in March. A records request by The Salt Lake Tribune also revealed that Sen. Lincoln Fillmore, R-South Jordan, who works privately as a charter school consultant, texted two school board members during a March meeting to encourage support for Eagle Summit. In the text messages, sent separately to Belnap and board member Jennifer Johnson, Fillmore requested that they call him about Eagle Summit Academy. Midwest founder helped create troubled-teens industry Lee Rood, lrood@dmreg.com 9:08 p.m. CDT April 16, 2016 Cindy Iutzi/Daily Gate City The Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation conducted a search at Midwest Academy in Keokuk, above, and another site in January after a student reported being sexually assaulted. In this photo taken on Thursday, Feb. 11, 2016, a Uhaul is parked outside Midwest Academy in Keokuk, Iowa. Federal, state and county law enforcement officials have returned to the southeast Iowa boarding school for troubled teens following abuse allegations. The Keokuk Daily Gate reports officials with the FBI and the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation returned to Midwest Academy on Thursday to execute a search warrant for records following an initial search of the academy on Jan. 28 and 29. (Photo: Cindy Iutzi, Cindy Iutzi/Daily Gate City) Without the benefit of a college degree, Robert Browning Lichfield parlayed his work into a multi-million-dollar industry. Now 62, the former fundraiser for 2012 Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney worked in the 1970s at the Provo Canyon School, according to a 2003 profile published by the Los Angeles Times. Lichfield eventually came to run the Brightway Adolescent Hospital in St. George, Utah, south of Salt Lake City, in the Mojave desert near the Utah-Arizona border. Youths from that facility would eventually feed into Cross Creek Manor, the first in Lichfield's network of such schools that became the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools, also known as WWASPS. According to a series of stories published by the Deseret News in Salt Lake City, the Independent Mail in Anderson, S.C., and other media, WWASPS referred families to other residential facilities owned or run by Lichfield's founders, trustees and relatives. It also reaped payments for referrals, billing and marketing. MORE: From Utah to Iowa: Marketing a profitable fix for troubled teens Former Midwest Academy employee says student spent 47 days in isolation Fifteen years after opening the first facility, Lichfield had 10 other schools and several other related businesses based in St. George or nearby La Verkin. They included referral and marketing websites TroubledTeens.com, TeenHelp.com and Adolescent Services that directed parents and their children to the schools, according to Utah secretary of state records. In 2003, Lichfield bought the old Lee County Home near Keokuk for $500,000 to transform it into Midwest Academy. Though Midwest Academy owner Ben Trane denied any ties to Lichfield or WWASPS, he has said he got his start in the industry at Cross Creek Manor. Lichfield has been a principal, partner or trustee in about 40 other businesses in Utah — some serving the troubled-teen industry, including Adolescent Programs Consulting, Parent Teen Guide and Midwest Outsource Services. Fate of school for troubled teens rests with Legislature Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size 1 Posted: Monday, April 18, 2016 11:28 am | Updated: 11:48 am, Mon Apr 18, 2016. Fate of school for troubled teens rests with Legislature Associated Press | 0 comments COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — A public residential school that seeks to transform the lives of South Carolina's troubled teens has lost its accreditation, leaving its fate to the Legislature. Lawmakers have long wanted to revamp John de la Howe School in rural McCormick County but couldn't agree how. The state education agency's decision this month to yank the school's accreditation effectively forces the school to close unless another plan is approved. A House proposal transfers the school's money to the Department of Juvenile Justice and requires a coalition of state agencies to recommend a less costly way to help at-risk youth. State officials say the school spends $92,000 annually per student. Senators are working on their plan. Sen. Wes Hayes says he thinks the 1,200-acre property needs "to get out of the education business." Carbon County group home has license revoked Small Text Medium Text Large Text Carbon County group home has license revoked ALBRIGHTSVILLE, Pa. - A children's group home in Carbon County is in deep trouble. On April 14, The Pennsylvania Department of Human Services pulled the licenses of two Child First facilities called Williams House located in a building on Route 903 in Albrightsville. Investigators said teens at the group home are at the center of the sexual abuse and a beating, but according to a state violation report, a staff member knew about the beating that was videotaped and did nothing to stop it. Paperwork from the department cites "gross incompetence" along with "abuse" and "mistreatment." According to the state's violation report, between February and March of 2016 a teenager was sexually abused by two other teens. Then it states on April 2, several children beat the two teens accused of the sexual assault. In the report, it states a staff member was told by multiple children that an assault was going to happen and "staff member A" told the children quote "You know what needs to be done" and "you know what needs to happen." The report states one of the teens told the staff member to "go into your room" while the assault happened. It goes on to say the staff member went into an office and closed the door. The group home also has a violation for having an improper ratio of children to adults during the alleged violent incident. WFMZ knocked on the door of Williams House to get their response, but there was no answer. WFMZ also went to one of the Child First offices in Allentown, but no one wanted to make a comment. Child First has 10 days to appeal the revocations, and if they appeal they must submit a plan of correction. How School Vouchers Promote Religious Schools And Hurt Education The recent debate about Harriet Tubman replacing Andrew Jackson on the front of a twenty-dollar bill revealed broad disagreements in the country about the value of lifting up the contributions to the nation made by women and people of color. It also revealed the importance of being properly educated in American history. We're used to seeing history curriculum being altered by religious fundamentalists and conservatives to impart false ideas to schoolchildren. In Texas, state school board members recently issued geography, history, and U.S. government textbooks that pushed conservative Christian fallacies about U.S. history, including warped views of Biblical influence on the nation's founders and the importance of slavery as the chief cause of the Civil War. Also in Colorado, school board members in a district outside of Denver made national news when they rejected a highly regarded history curriculum because it didn't "sufficiently" "promote citizenship, patriotism, essentials and benefits of the free-market system, respect for authority, and respect for individual rights." But at least those controversies took place in public, so opposing points-of-view could respond. The Texas textbooks caused such a storm a publisher of one of those books, McGraw-Hill, was forced to issue an apology about a caption in the book that referred to African slaves who were forcibly brought to the Americas as "workers." The textbook controversy prompted California lawmakers to introduce a bill in the state legislature to prevent Texas-approved changes from seeping into textbooks in the Golden State. In Colorado, the actions of the conservative school board caused mass student walkouts in high schools across the district, and local parents organized a successful effort to kick the offending board members out of office. American history school curriculum has been a subject of heated debate forever, and indeed it should be as history stays alive by reflecting on and then reconsidering whose point-of-view the narrative comes from. But what if the debate, instead of taking place in the public, gets completely hidden from view? That's the question members of Congress need to consider this week as they deliberate over a bill to renew funding for the school voucher program in Washington, D.C. The Fad Over School Vouchers As an article in The Washington Times explains, the voucher program gives low-income students in the district the opportunity to transfer from public schools to private schools at taxpayer expense. Conservative Republicans champion the program as a “promising new pathway” for children out of “failed” public schools. The Obama administration, which has declared it will not veto the bill should it pass the House, opposes the vouchers because they don’t produce any statistically significant results for the children who use them. As I reported for Salon in 2014, school vouchers – which are frequently disguised with euphemistic terms such as scholarships or tax credits – have long been dismissed by liberals, yet their presence has significantly increased in state and federal education policy. These programs are now prominent features in education policies in about a third of the states in the country, siphoning billions of dollars from public service budgets. Most recently a voucher program passed in Nevada, according to Education Week, would allow all parents of public school students to “use state funding earmarked for their child toward tuition or other expenses related to a nonpublic education.” The law is currently tied up in court, but according to a report in The Washington Post, prominent conservatives, such as former Florida Governor and failed presidential candidate Jeb Bush, are already trying to push the Nevada voucher program nationwide. “Lawmakers in Georgia, Iowa and Rhode Island considered similar legislation this year,” the Post reporter explains. Track Record On Vouchers Mostly Negative There is a long track record of failure for vouchers, particularly in Milwaukee, where a 26-year program has produced little gains for the students who’ve have taken advantage of more than $1.7 billion in taxpayer money to transfer to private schools. Even more significant, the voucher program has done nothing to lift up the entire system. An analysis last year of a long-running statewide voucher program in Louisiana found the program “harms students’ academic performance,” as reported by U.S. News & World Report. The D.C. voucher program has had more mixed results producing “no conclusive evidence” in overall achievement for the students who participated but significant improvement in high school graduation rates. Although it can be argued that the quality of education in the District has improved of recent, the D.C. schools as a whole continue to produce some of the most unequal results in achievement between white students and their non-white peers. Most of the war over voucher programs is fought over quantifiable data about the academic results these programs hardly ever seem to produce and the money they redirect from public schools to private pockets. But there is an important quality issue as well. How Vouchers Promote Religious Schools First, there is the issue of church and state separation. All research shows that most of the money voucher programs redirect from public schools to private institutions ends up going to religious schools. In D.C., 80 percent of voucher users attend religion-based private schools. North Carolina’s relatively new voucher program sends 93 percent of its money to “faith-based schools.” Due to voucher programs, in all their forms, “religious schools actually are receiving large amounts of government money,” David Berliner and Gene Glass explain in their book Myths & Lies that Threaten America’s Public Schools. Berliner and Glass explain how, through various workarounds approved by ideologically driven courts, many states have reversed historical precedent to ensure the public is unwittingly funding religious-based instruction. In Arizona, a tuition tax credit program ensures that people and corporations who donate to a fund for private, mostly religious, schools can take that donation off their taxes, which decreases the amount of money the state has to spend on public services. In Ohio, government funds pay directly for parents’ tuition payments in private schools, most of which are religion-based. In New Jersey, the governor enjoys a special set-aside of $11 million for two religious schools in the state. In most of these cases, the majority of the students receiving voucher money were already previously enrolled in religious schools. So much for “opening promising new pathways” in the public school system. Voucher programs that redirect money to private religious schools are in clear violation of the federal Constitution’s establishment clause and state constitutions’ Blaine Amendment language, but the programs continue to proliferate and expand nevertheless. This Should Alarm Every American As Berliner and Glass explain, “Diversion of existing public schools resources to private schools results in taxpayer support for all kinds of religious instruction at all kinds of religious schools, with little or no oversight by states or the public.” That means public tax dollars are funding religion based curriculum that teach, for instance, a creationist view of science or a version of history that portrays slaves as happy servants to their masters. Curriculum materials that depict people of color in demeaning, stereotypical ways that have created such consternation in public schools can be readily adopted for private schools using vouchers. And how many schools getting voucher funding will choose a right-wing version of history that teaches the founders of the nation never intended the separation of church and state but sought instead to construct a Christian theocracy? Voucher proponents claim all of this is fine because parents have “made the choice.” But shouldn’t we have a choice about whether or not we fund this? Most Republicans running for president have come down firmly on the side of embracing more “choice” in education including vouchers. GOP front-runner Donald Trump’s education policy ideas are still largely a mystery. But his perspectives on American history are pretty obvious. When questioned about the decision to replace Andrew Jackson with Harriet Tubman on the $20 bill, Trump replied, according to the Wall Street Journal, he’d prefer to keep Jackson on the 20 and put Tubman on the $2 bill instead. But then again, Trump is also on record declaring, “I love the poorly educated.” Should the craze for school vouchers continue, Trump may get just the kind of electorate he prefers. Teen, Interrupted By Alex Floyd May 2, 2016 Share on Facebook Tweet Share Share Pin Ryan Lewis had been exhibiting signs of clinical depression for months. Concerned about their son, his parents decided to send him to a residential treatment center to get him help. They consulted an educational expert, who referred them to the Alldredge Academy in West Virginia, a therapeutic wilderness program in the Appalachian wilderness that promised a combination of schooling and therapy to treat Ryan. The colorful brochures and promises of healing in the outdoors appealed to both Ryan and his parents, and with some hesitation coupled with mostly hope, they sent their son away. Less than a week later, he was found dead, having hanged himself on campus property. Tragically, Ryan’s story is one of many. More than a decade after Ryan’s death, residential teen treatment centers like Alldredge Academy (later rebranded as Alldredge Wilderness Journey) are still dangerously under-regulated and can be woefully under-equipped to handle the teenagers placed in their care. In a similarly horrific case, Diamond Ranch Academy, a treatment center notorious for its deplorable conditions, charged one girl’s family $60,000 for ten months of care, over the course of which she was exposed to beatings, unsanitary medical facilities, and a rigid environment where she was not even allowed to sit down without permission. Like many other facilities, Diamond Ranch also makes use of so-called “transport” groups, organizations that forcibly remove children from their homes and place them in these treatment facilities. Since this is done with parental approval, a child is often helplessly placed into a facility where her complaints or allegations of mistreatment are discounted and ignored. Ryan Lewis, for example, was accused of trying to manipulate his counselors into letting him leave the day he killed himself. But many parents who send their children to a dangerous facility often do so unknowingly, rather than out of a lack of concern for their child. This was the case for Ryan’s parents, who hired an independent educational consultant and thought long and hard about their decision before sending their son away. In fact, treatment academies like Alldredge and Diamond Ranch often prey on the parents of children suffering from severe depression, substance abuse, or other psychological ailments, luring them in with what many describe as a highly effective and occasionally manipulative marketing campaign that promises a variety of benefits for teens. But these benefits are often difficult to evaluate, especially since independent inspections are rare and usually not state-mandated. While many of these academies were created out of a genuine desire to provide mental rehabilitation for those who were dealing with serious psychological issues, the system in place for regulating and accrediting these centers remains nearly nonexistent and incapable of dealing with the onslaught of cases involving negligence and misconduct. Yet the abuse is far from unknown. A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report noted over 1,500 cases of abuse across 34 states pertaining to facilities like Alldredge. The report also provided a disturbing reminder that while some of these facilities do close after reports of abuse or even deaths, many simply rebrand themselves without making any meaningful changes, like Alldredge did before ultimately closing in 2008. In terms of federal oversight, there are no specific regulations for these centers beyond general rules regarding child safety. States, theoretically, fill in this gap themselves, providing the appropriate regulation and protection for teens in residential treatment. But state laws are, to say the least, lacking. Riddled with loopholes and often vague, they do little to prevent abuse simply because hundreds of cases of mistreatment slip through the system. For example, a Texas law would allow a residential treatment center to rebrand itself as simply a “boarding school” to avoid having to obtain a license. And in some cases, the private accreditors of these centers do not notify the state if an accreditation is suspended or denied. The GAO report even noted that many state agencies simply remain unaware that these programs exist at all, with a full 45 states reporting that they did not have enough information about these facilities to confirm whether a teen under their care had died. In addition to the lack of oversight, limited funding often prevents state agencies from carrying out any meaningful enforcement, including conducting inspections. For instance, Utah undertook a massive overhaul of its laws regarding such centers in 2005 following numerous reports of abuse. Yet by 2012, reports of abuse were already cropping up again, involving programs that were specifically targeted by the regulatory reforms. The problem wasn't that the rules weren't stringent enough or that teens were crying wolf — the issue was funding. The state can only do so much with even the best rules if it doesn't have the manpower or the resources to enforce them. In turn, many have called on the federal government to intervene and help regulate these centers effectively. Congressman George Miller (D-CA) originally held hearings on the state of residential teen treatment centers and their shortcomings in 2007, which produced the GAO report confirming deaths and abuse due to a combination of negligence, inadequate training, and, of course, a significant lack of government oversight. Following the revelations from the report, Congressman Miller introduced the the Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act of 2008, but it failed to pass. The legislation contained many hopeful provisions, including prohibiting the abuse of minors in rehabilitation programs and punishment by withholding food and water. Congressman Miller has since reintroduced it in subsequent congressional sessions even after the Democrats lost their majority, most recently in 2013. Yet time after time, the bill is scuttled without so much as a vote, typically due to complaints by the industry that the bill unfairly targets them, in addition to a lack of Republican support. But even as Congressman Miller's bill slowly moves through the legislature, there is still a pressing need for immediate action. Many students are still in programs like Alldredge Wilderness Journey or Diamond Ranch Academy, and even more parents are considering whether their troubled teen should be sent to one of these institutions. While many of these academies were created out of a genuine desire to provide mental rehabilitation for those who were dealing with serious psychological issues, the system in place for regulating and accrediting these centers remains nearly nonexistent and incapable of dealing with the onslaught of cases involving negligence and misconduct. The Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) main tactic to prevent abuse is encouraging parents to research individual institutions and judge their merits before they make a decision. But even this can be highly confusing, given the number of accreditation agencies that a family is supposed to consult just to find out if a school is properly licensed. The FTC also advises parents to ask about background checks, noting that if the organization in question does not perform them on their employees, parents should "consider it a red flag." Yet background checks for employees are not required in every state, and there is no uniform standard for how thorough they must be. The core of the problem, however, may be just how lucrative treating teenagers has become. Residential treatment centers now comprise a billion dollar industry, and that figure is expected to grow, with institutions collectively adding around 10,000 to 20,000 teenagers each year. Thus, it seems inevitable that some facilities may become more careless by using less qualified counselors or doing minimal training and upkeep to save a few dollars. But for an industry focused on helping some of society's most vulnerable members at an extravagant price, this is simply unacceptable. Parents need a means of oversight to protect their children, and teenagers dealing with what can be life-threatening mental health problems deserve legitimate care and better conditions. A manager for one treatment center, Deb Hatland, reportedly said, "We are not a perfect organization, and...we all make mistakes." While Ms. Hatland is certainly right that everyone makes mistakes, the margin of error is simply too large when treating troubled teens for anything below the very best. Skyler Eugene Hartsough, 26, of Ogden, was charged in two cases in 2nd District Court. In one case, he was charged with 20 counts of sexual exploitation of a minor, a second-degree felony; and in the other he was charged with cultivation of marijuana, a third-degree felony; possession of a firearm by a restricted person, a third-degree felony; and possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia, class B misdemeanors. Hartsough worked at Youth Health Associates, a group home for adolescent boys in Clearfield, but was fired after his arrest. "Nothing happened here," said Brian Garlock, owner of Youth Health Associates. "It didn't involve our boys, our staff, our company. We obviously did everything that we could do as far as the protections, the background checks. There were no red flags." Advertise with us Report this ad Search warrants were served on Hartsough's house, 3210 Jefferson Ave., on Tuesday. Investigators found 10 marijuana plants growing in the basement, drug paraphernalia, a rifle and child pornography, according to charging documents. Hartsough told investigators he grew the marijuana for personal daily use, the charges state. Members of the Internet Crimes Against Children task force seized multiple electronic devices containing images and videos of child pornography, according to charging documents. "Hartsough stated during the course of the interview that he routinely and regularly views images of child pornography and that he obtained child pornographic images through a peer-to-peer network over the course of years," the charges state. Hartsough also worked for two months in 2015 as a temporary case worker in Ogden and was terminated for cause, according to the Utah Department of Child and Family Services. According to an online biography from a prior employer, Hartsough "specializes in helping children and families who have experienced trauma; especially sexual abuse, family violence, physical abuse and associated injuries come to terms with acceptance and life moving forward." He did his undergraduate internship course work with St. Anne's Center catering to mental health needs and interned for the state of Utah in Weber County for Division of Child and Family Services. ED: No Records on Closed Charters Mentioned in Its "Commitment to Transparency," CMD Appeals Submitted by Lisa Graves on May 5, 2016 - 8:23am Today the Center for Media and Democracy is filing its appeal from a claim by the U.S. Department of Education (ED) that it has no records about closed or never-opened charter schools referenced in its "Commitment to Transparency" press release. On December 23, ED publicly issued a statement called "A Commitment to Transparency: Learning More about the Charter School Program." That statement noted that it had spent more than $1.6 billion funding more than 2,600 charter schools that were "operational" in the last full school year and that it had funded 430 charters that had "subsequently closed," along with 699 "prospective schools." However, ED released data for the operational charter schools and othes and did not list data identifying which of the 1,129 charters either had closed or had not yet opened since 2006. So, in January, CMD requested records about those other charters. In April, ED denied CMD's request saying it had searched and found no records about the closed or not-opened charters that had received federal taxpayer monies, despite the specific numbers it used in its release. CMD's appeal notes that: It strains credulity and common sense that, despite spending billions in taxpayer dollars on charters and putting out this press release—among several—on the accomplishments of the Charter Schools Program, the Department claims to have no databases, no data analyses, and no internal communications about the program mentioned in its press release and charters that received funds but closed or never opened, nor any external communications with charter school grant recipients about the success or failure of those charters. The Department's article states that, "CSP planning and startup capital facilitated the creation of over 2,600 charter schools that were operational as of SY 2013-14; approximately 430 charter schools that served students but subsequently closed by SY 2013-14; and approximately 699 'prospective schools.'" Yet the Department claims that it was unable to locate any lists of what schools those are, how much federal funding they received, or any correspondence or other records relating to that data. Similarly, the Department claims that it has no records relating to an assessment of the suitability or eligibility for financial support of "prospective schools" and no correspondence regarding charter schools that closed or never opened. Accordingly, the search conducted by the Department of Education's Office of Innovation & Improvement for records responsive to our requests must have been inadequate. As CMD was first to document last year, the federal government has spent more than \$3.7 billion in taxpayer dollars fueling the charter school industry since the 1990s, and ED has now calculated that it has spent more than $1.6 billion of this sum since 2006. The Center for Popular Democracy and the Alliance to Reclaim Our Schools has tracked more than \$200 million in fraud and waste by charter operators in the past decade or so, and many—but not all—of the charters whose operators were indicted for criminal fraud were subsequently closed. Charters have closed for a variety of reasons, as CMD documented in its "Charter School Black Hole" report, including fraud, mismanagement, poor enrollment, and poor planning. Meanwhile, as CMD noted, several audits and reviews have found that federal and state overseers have failed to monitor the spending of taxpayer money by charters or to follow up adequately when charters closed after receiving federal or state taxpayer monies. In numerous instances, states could not even identify where the assets went that were purchased by failed charters to reclaim them for the government. In essence, public assets had been converted to private ones and then were unaccountable when a charter failed. And, lobbying groups like the American Legislative Exchange Council have peddled legislation in states to exempt charters from financial accountability and other rules—while federal and state charter advocates in government agencies have been giving favorable ratings to states with "flexible" rules or loopholes governing charters. Using other federal data, CMD sought to determine which charters had closed or never opened ("ghost charters") after receiving federal funds and was able to identify more than 2,000 since the inception of the federal Charter School Program more than two decades ago, but some of those had been assigned new identification numbers because they had changed their names or locations or their status in some way. So, in response to ED's "Commitment to Transparency" statement and its release of data about "operational" charters, CMD sought records used and accessible to the federal Department of Education about the 430 federally-funded charter schools that the federal government had identified as closed since 2006, along with the 699 it has funded but not yet opened. But ED claims to have no records related to those failures or to the prospective schools it claims are worthy of federal funding because their "operators are best positioned to open high quality schools." In CMD's view, it is impossible that the agency has no records about charters that were deemed to have "high quality" potential and none about those whose potential failed to manifest or measure up. ED's denial of CMD's requests under the Freedom of Information Act comes in the wake of repeated assurances that the agency will provide greater transparency and oversight over charters as it seeks continued increases in funding for charters. It also comes in the aftermath of the decision by the agency's Office of Innovation and Improvement to award its largest grant last year to Ohio, despite the public scandal over the state's charter school leader fixing test scores to misrepresent the performance of charters to the public. CMD had requested that ED make public the names of the states and applications for that Charter School Program last year, so residents could learn whether their states were seeking more charter school funding and weigh in, but the agency refused to make that information public until after it had made its decision to award \$71 million to Ohio and tens of millions more to other states. When it made those applications public after allocating taxpayer money, it turned out that the government had been provided only letters of support from the charter school industry favoring those grant awards and the government did not solicit or receive information from citizens concerned about fraud, waste, and other problems with charters—like Ohio's effort to manipulate public opinion about charters by hiding the terrible test results of virtual charters. In the meantime, CMD has documented ED's deferential culture toward charters as shown most recently by its obedience to a request by the KIPP "public school" charters to keep secret from the public information about how many of its charter students graduate from high school and enroll in or graduated from college, along with key information about how it is spending federal tax dollars, even as KIPP has spent millions of dollars on luxury trips to Las Vegas, DisneyWorld, and other resorts for KIPP charter employees in recent years. Modern boarding schools still a form of "abuse" claims therapist in new book By Xantha Leatham - May 6, 2016 0 14 SENDING children to boarding school is a form of abuse and forces youngsters to develop "survival strategies" to deal with feelings of neglect, according to a new book. The authors of "Trauma, Abandonment and Privilege" claim that despite improved pastoral care in modern boarding schools, pupils still mask their true emotions which can cause major problems in later life. The book has been written by former boarding school teacher Nick Duffell and Thurstone Basset as a guide for therapists working with former boarding school students, to whom they refer as "survivors". The authors claim that despite appearing outwardly happy, the vast majority of children are hiding psychological trauma caused by moving away from home at a young age. They report that the "Boarding School Survivors" agency they founded to help traumatised ex-boarders has had "more and more people coming forward for help" in recent years. Robin Fletcher, chief executive of the BSA, said boarding is "not right for everyone" Mr Basset, who is also a board member for the Journal of Mental Health Training Education and Practice, said: "Boarding schools aren't as brutal as they used to be and there is more potential for contact with families now because of things like smartphones and improved technology. "But a child at just eight years old still has to learn to live without parents when they start at boarding schools. It's ridiculously young really. "None of the psychological theories that I am aware of support taking children away from parents at eight years old. "I wouldn't expect an eight-year-old to turn round to their parents and say 'it's time to go now'. Mr Basset claimed that youngsters who attend boarding schools are forced to develop "coping strategies" and mask their true feelings which can cause mental issues in later life. Strategy He continued: "When a child first goes away, they have to learn to cope – a survival strategy. "The mask is a part of that because the children will keep saying they're loving it when they're not. "When they're older, the mask can start to slip and a trigger such as a relative's death or tragedy can cause a seemingly successful person's life to crack and spiral out of control. He continued: "This is because they haven't resolved the feelings of neglect at school and are used to just having to grin and bear it so in adult life it all comes out. "At boarding school, you can't go about crying so you keep a stiff upper lip but not showing emotion in adult life can cause problems." The author noted that the "Boarding School Survivors" agency that he created had seen increased numbers of former boarders coming forward in recent years. He said: "We founded the Survivors' agency and over the years we've seen more and more people coming forward, looking for help with the issues they have as a result of boarding. Suitability "The workshops every year are doubling in numbers as people are becoming more aware of their issues and see others share how they feel. "They then feel the strength to come forward themselves." But Robin Fletcher, chief executive of the Boarding Schools' Association, said: "I'm not sure a 16-year-old boy playing rugby with his mates has developed a coping mechanism, I think he's just enjoying being with his mates. "Boarding is not right for every child but there's a lot of interaction with professional staff who have lots of training before a child starts now. "It's a family conversation now which involves a long process called "suitability for boarding" in which they have taster sessions and speak to parents and the children. "It's not in the schools' interests to have kids there who don't like it so this helps to make sure you don't get kids starting at schools who aren't right for boarding." He added: "The book refers to a very different time when certain people went to boarding schools who weren't suited to it." The State Foster Care System Has a License to Be Terrible at Licensing Friday, May 6, 2016 at 6 a.m. By Craig Malisow A Facebook 4 Twitter 2 More shares recommend reddit email 0 0 On February 23, 2016, an inspector for the Department of Family and Protective Services discovered how the staff of a Children's Hope foster care facility in Levelland disciplined the kids in their care: They hit them. The state inspector noted the violation at the facility, about 30 miles west of Lubbock, and gave Children's Hope's supervisors two months to make sure their staff stopped hitting children. Twenty days before the February inspection, a state worker observed that a staff member was sleeping instead of watching kids. Less than three weeks before that, an inspector noted that three storage rooms had "clothes, boxes, trash and other hazardous objects on the floor where children in care could trip and harm themselves." This Levelland facility, it seemed, had a knack for hiring staff with unique methods of discipline. In June 2015, a staff member took to pulling a kid's hair; in February, a staff member made the kids exercise outside, inadequately dressed for cold weather, whenever they acted up. The violations — all available on the department's online database — weren't just isolated to that Levelland operation. In April 2014, at Children's Hope's other Levelland facility, a staff member gave a kid a black eye, and in another incident, one worker told children to make false accusations against another worker. At this facility, kids "consistently reported that they were left in a van while two staff [members] went inside a staff's home." And in the Children's Hope facility in Lubbock, staff got downright creative with punishment, by making kids walk or run while holding chairs above their heads. State inspectors also observed floors smeared with feces and trash; inaccurate records for medication; bathrooms without paper towels; and staff that weren't aware that children slipped off to a bathroom to engage in "inappropriate touching." But besides a personal investment in basic human decency, there was no real incentive for Children's Hope to get its act together; the department rarely if ever seriously sanctions residential treatment centers and group homes that make money off warehousing children. Which is why it seems strange that the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services is getting into the business of licensing federal detention centers for immigrants seeking asylum. As we reported earlier this week, the department has granted a provisional license to the Karnes County Residential Center, which is run by the Geo Group, a private prison company that's seen profits soar with the rise of immigrant detention in the United States in recent years. The detention facility must pass three unannounced inspections over six months before it can be permanently licensed, but that shouldn't be a problem. The licensing bar is low. As revealed in recent class-action litigation, the department had revoked the license of only one residential treatment center in the past five years — and that was only after four kids died. U.S. District Court Judge Janis Jack, who issued the damning ruling that laid bare the department's indifference to thousands of children in its care, outlined the ugly history of the Daystar facility in Manvel, which had a capacity of 141 children: Between 1993 and 2002, three teenagers died at Daystar from asphyxiation due to physical restraints. In most cases, the children were hog-tied. Beyond these deaths, there were reports of sexual abuse and staff making developmentally disabled girls fight for snacks. Numerous stakeholders, including the district attorney, spoke out against Daystar, but the facility kept its license. In November 2010, a fourth child died in what was ruled a homicide by asphyxiation due to physical restraints. Daystar's license was still not revoked until January 2011. DFPS allowed this facility—that was responsible for four deaths, numerous allegations of sexual abuse, and unthinkable treatment of developmentally disabled children—to operate for 17 years. A group called Grassroots Leadership has rallied against the department's licensure of immigration detention centers earlier this week. The group's executive director says, "By all reasonable measures, family detention camps are prisons. They are not child-care facilities." (Grassroots on Wednesday successfully petitioned a Travis County District Court for a temporary restraining order blocking the department from licensing another detention center. A judge will hear arguments May 13.) But given how the department conducts business with residential treatment centers, it might be a stretch to call them child-care facilities as well. In 2015, Austin County Sheriff Jack Brandes filed his second complaint against the department regarding the number of runaway foster children from the Five Oaks Achievement Center. Brandes told the county commissioners' court, "We are deeply concerned for the safety of the residents that run away from this facility. Deputies have previously found runaways hiding in buildings on private property, and we're concerned over what could happen if the owners of the properties approach the runaways, especially at night." Five Oaks' solution? "We are going to build a tall deer fence," Five Oaks CEO Craig Bibb told the commissioners. "The state was concerned that it could have no razor wire or barbed wire. It's going to look really nice." Nine months after the sheriff complained to the commissioners' court, at least two more kids ran away. One stole a van. Apparently, Five Oaks and the department are less concerned with why so many children seem to want to get the heck out of Five Oaks, and are more concerned about penning them in like animals. Recent inspection reports note that Five Oaks could use some fixing up. Inspectors noted cottages full of holes, and mold in a girls' bathroom. Staff fight with each other in front of kids, and sometimes swear at the kids. One staff member continually taunts kids who display self-harming behavior; it's unclear if any of these include the kid who uses the chipped "upper corners" of the restrooms to "scratch themselves." In 2010, a 17-year-old Five Oaks resident collapsed from heat exhaustion during a nature hike and died weeks later. A month earlier, state inspectors discovered that at least seven staff members lacked first aid and CPR certification. (Recent inspections noted that the first aid kits are missing many items, but are not lacking in expired medication.) Department spokesman Patrick Crimmins told the Houston Chronicle at the time, "The children there have an established relationship with their caregivers...We feel those children are very safe." This is the level of safety that the children at the Karnes County Residential Center have to look forward to. Jail officer accused of choking teen inmate Will Cleveland. @WillCleveland13 7:23 p.m. EDT May 5, 2016 Brian Miller(Photo: Provided) A Wayne County correction officer is accused of choking a teenage inmate Thursday morning. According to the Wayne County Office of the Sheriff, Brian Miller, 47, is charged with criminal obstruction of breathing or blood circulation, endangering the welfare of a minor, two counts of second-degree falsifying business records, and second-degree harassment. Deputies allege that Miller, who has worked for the department for 14 years, choked an inmate during an altercation. The inmate, who is younger than 17, was not hurt during the incident. Miller was arraigned in Lyons Town Court and released to appear at a later date. He has been suspended with pay from the jail pending a departmental hearing. Lawsuit: State Gave Child Foster Care License to Known Abuser Katherine Johnson Updated: 05/10/2016 1:29 PM Created: 05/09/2016 3:54 PM The Hennepin County Human Services Department allowed the placement of a foster care child into the home of a Brooklyn Park woman who had a record of substantiated child abuse, according to a lawsuit filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis. In December 2014, 6-year-old Kendrea Johnson was found dead in that foster care mother's home. The child was found hanging from a bunk bed in her bedroom. 5 EYEWITNESS NEWS reviewed the child's welfare record cited in the lawsuit that shows that Hennepin County child protection authorities knew in December 2000 that the foster care mother, Tannise Nawaqavou, had a record of child abuse. But because of a little-known state law, commonly known as "the look-back law," Nawaqavou was granted a foster care license by DHS in October 2011 because a defined period of time had expired since her violation, thus allowing her to become eligible to take care of abused children. All foster care applicants must undergo a background check by the state prior to a decision being made on whether to grant a license. A January 2011 DHS background studies memo stated that Nawaqavou "physically abused her child or a child in her care," according to the document reviewed by 5 EYEWITNESS NEWS and which is referred to in the lawsuit. When she was asked in an interview about the DHS record, Nawaqavou denied ever having a record of child abuse. "I don't know about that," Nawaqavou said. "That's negative. That's the first time I've heard that." Jerry Kerber, DHS' Inspector General declined to be interviewed about the look-back law and Johnson's case. He did send this statement. Following Johnson's death, Nawaqavou's foster care license was revoked in March 2015. DHS cited the fact that she had "provided false and misleading information during the child foster care license application process," according to state records. The lawsuit accuses Hennepin County child protection workers, a private foster care agency, Family Alternatives Inc., and a day treatment center, Lifespan of Minnesota, of failing to adequately protect the child before she died. Hennepin County officials and Lifespan declined comment on the suit. The attorney for Family Alternatives Inc. said the agency he represents should not be held accountable for the child's death. "It isn't the result of anything Family Alternatives has done wrong or the foster parent," said Rich Thomas. "It's just a terrible circumstance." But Jeff Storms, one of the attorneys representing Johnson's grandmother, said child protection authorities and the other named parties failed the child and her family when she was removed from her mother's custody. "Kendrea was alive at the time they took her," Storms said. "She had family members who loved her, who kept her alive, who made sure she was going to school. Knowing that they are putting that child in the home of an abuser is a clear and obvious step towards potential peril for that child. Why would we take that risk? If we were going to put money, energy and resources into anything, it should be making sure that we have good foster parents. Not giving money to known abusers." Three months before Johnson died, a Hennepin County child protection worker allegedly expressed concerns about whether the girl had been placed in the right foster care setting, according to state records cited in the suit. Monica Jochmans "had severe concerns about (Johnson's) routine, supervision plan and what Nawaqavou does to 'keep children safe that present with higher needs,'" according to the state records. Jeff Montpetit, co-counsel with Storms, said that an overall review of Johnson's records show a continuing pattern of failure. "Nobody was in charge," Montpetit said. "Nobody cared enough to take charge and do things in Kendrea's best interest. I think it's a system that in its current state is broken. In its current state it needs to be overhauled and we hope to bring some of those deficiencies to light so that things like this don't ever have to happen again." Mary Broadus, Johnson's grandmother, isn't optimistic. "These are babies," she said. "And bad things are happening to them. She (Johnson) wasn't the first and she's not going to be the last. There's someone who loves these kids out there. I'm not just fighting for Kendrea. I'm fighting for all the babies this has happened to." Lawsuit alleging abuse, neglect of teen filed against Zelenople group home Updated: May 11, 2016 - 7:32 PM 103 Share this with your friends! From To Compose your message Thanks for sharing with your followers! Lawsuit alleging abuse, neglect of teen filed against Zelenople group home <http://on.wpxi.com/1TbutGy> ZELIENOPLE, Pa. — A family is suing Glade Run Lutheran Services, a group home in Zelenople, claiming that a 13-year-old boy was abused and neglected at the facility. Attorneys for the boy and his family spoke Wednesday with Channel 11 News after filing the civil lawsuit. "The thing that gets this little boy excited is the thought that Glade Run will no longer exist," Nick Indovina of the Pisanchyn law firm said. Glade Run Lutheran Services in Zelenople Channel 11 News has covered the residential treatment facility, which cares for children and teenagers with severe mental health issues, for months. State inspectors found evidence last October of children having sex with other children on campus. As a result, the state Department of Human Services stripped the 56-bed facility of its license, which Glade Run is attempting to get back through an appeals process with the state.

The campus has three additional facilities that have remained open pending the appeal decision. No criminal charges were ever filed, but the state mandated changes, including firing the staff, hiring new employees and adding security cameras. Indovina said the changes are not enough. The lawsuit filed Wednesday details allegations too graphic for Channel 11 News to report about what the boy, now 15, endured from March to July 2015 while he was being treated at the group home for severe mental health issues. The suit alleges that the staff failed to keep him safe from other children. While Glade Run had yet to see the lawsuit, officials issued the following statement to Channel 11 News: "Glade Run Lutheran Services serves our communities' most challenging and traumatized youth, providing residential, school-based and community-based offerings to thousands throughout Western Pennsylvania each year. Many have complex mental health issues and behaviors that necessitate residential treatment for stabilization and healing. The safety of our clients remains our first priority, and we are committed to providing the safest environment for their treatment and recovery. "The provision of human services to individuals with mental health issues is not without risks. These risks include physical harm to staff and potential litigation. The privacy rights of our clients preclude us from discussing any allegation that may arise. Glade Run has a longstanding track record of more than 160 years of successful care and treatment of traumatized youth, and is dedicated to protecting the best interests of those we serve." Group home workers facing assault charges Two women accused of mistreating a special needs client in February By Eric Deabill | edeabill@pahomepage.com Published 05/11 2016 04:45PM Updated 05/11 2016 06:32PM SPRING BROOK TOWNSHIP, LACKAWANNA COUNTY (WBRE/WYOU) - Two workers from a group home are facing assault charges in what Lackawanna County prosecutors are calling a disturbing case. Investigators say the two women shoved, pushed and even slapped a person with special needs who was in their care. Detectives say what makes this case especially disturbing is that the possible victim is non-verbal and doesn't use words to communicate. Investigators say they only learned of the abuse because the woman's family set up a secret camera in her room. The group home where the alleged assault took place is on Joni Drive in Spring Brook Township. The allegations are horrifying for neighbors. "It makes me angry to think that people could take advantage of someone who can't talk or someone who can't fight back," Donna Gardner of Spring Brook Township said. Prosecutors say Rakeelia Field and Jacquelynn Moore physically abused one of the residents. Besides being non-verbal, the victim can't feed or bathe herself and needs constant supervision. The abuse allegations involve the suspects slapping her, pushing her and shoving her into chairs. "It is really shocking for someone who can't complain to anyone that she's being abused," Barbara Delmore of Jefferson Township said. District Attorney Shane Scanlon says the abuse was only discovered after family members put a hidden camera in the woman's room. Scanlon has seen the videos. "But for the family putting in the camera, which is a hidden camera, God knows how long this abuse would have continued or endured," Scanlon said. According to court papers, one of the suspects may have actually stumbled onto the hidden camera on February 29th. That is the last date in the criminal complaint that any abuse may have taken place. People in the community say what the family of the victim did was right. "I applaud them because they were taking care of their own. They must have realized something was going on," Delmore said. All of the abuse is alleged to have taken place during on a one-week period at the end of February. Both of the workers charged are currently free on unsecured bail and expected back in court next week. Keystone Community Resources, the agency that runs the group home, told Eyewitness News on Wednesday that they don't comment on ongoing investigations. Court papers indicate that both women are no longer working at the facility in Spring Brook Township. Source: <http://www.pahomepage.com/news/group-home-workers-facing-assault-charges>

Look-Back Law Allows Foster-Care Licenses for Criminals, Abusers By Katherine Johnson, KSTP TV on May 12, 2016 at 12:00 a.m. AddThis Sharing Buttons Share to Facebook7Share to TwitterShare to RedditShare to EmailShare to Copy Link News Fargo,ND 58103 http://www.wday.com/sites/default/files/styles/square_300/public/field/image/KendreaJohnson_0.jpg?itok=SpuuPsI_ Katherine Johnson, KSTP TV WDAY <http://www.wday.com> Look-Back Law Allows Foster-Care Licenses for Criminals, Abusers Fargo ND 301 8th St. S. 58103 We first told you about the Look-back Law in an investigation Tuesday morning on First News. A lawsuit alleges that 6-year-old Kendrea Johnson was placed in the foster home of a known abuser. She died less than a year after her placement. During the investigation, we found a state law that allows the Minnesota Department of Human Services to issue foster-care licenses to criminals and child abusers as long as a set period of time has passed between the conviction and the application. Some crimes, such as murder and criminal sexual conduct, permanently disqualify a person from becoming a foster parent. However, other violent crimes involving children do not. We sat down with two members of the Governor's Child Protection Task Force to see if they believe changes should be made to the law. Regarding the conviction of Manslaughter of Assault of an Unborn Child, Safe Passage for Children of Minnesota Executive Director Rich Gehrman said, "If it's a conviction, it's a disqualification. It should be." Even a felony offense doesn't disqualify the criminal from obtaining a foster care license as long as 15 years has passed. "If there are some categories here that need to be looked at again, I think this is the opportunity to do it," said Gehrman. He said there is some leeway with the law but not when it comes to violent crimes involving children. "If you're convicted of malicious punishment of a child, that's not like you got into a situation randomly that you couldn't get out of. That's a pattern," said Gehrman. According to the Look-back Law, after parental rights have been terminated, that person is disqualified from becoming a foster parent for 15 years. However, after that time has passed, they are eligible again. "It's very difficult to have your parental rights terminated," said Gehrman. "It takes years and it's not just one mistake. There's a pattern there in almost in every case, statistically, so I think that's something that should disqualify somebody." State Rep. Joe Mullery (DFL-St. Paul) supports the law. "I don't think that a person should be excluded for their entire life for something that was committed a long time ago but I think they should be excluded for a certain period of time and then you watch them after that," he said. However, he adds it only works if case workers and investigators are making the proper follow-ups. "I don't think we have a very good quality assurance program for foster care in the state," said Gehrman. "We kind of don't know about how many quality foster homes we have and ones that aren't so good." Gehrman adds to create quality assurance in foster care there needs to be better training for foster parents. In Hennepin County, foster care training dollars have been steadily dropping in recent years. It fell from almost $13,000 in 2012 to $8,000 spent on foster care training in 2015. Peruvian Man Details Sexual Abuse He Faced at 'Boot Camp' for Troubled Catholic Kids By Simeon Tegel May 13, 2016 | 7:20 am The sexual abuse began one evening in a park, says Alvaro Urbina. He was 14. A misfit at his expensive English-style school in Lima, Peru, Urbina's recently separated mother was desperate to provide him with some direction. She enrolled him in Sodalicio de Vida Cristiana. Sodalicio was a kind of Catholic boot camp, run by non-clerical volunteers, dedicated to transforming teenagers from the Peruvian elite into prominent priests or devout and influential lay members of society. "We clicked a little," says Urbina of the mentor twice his age who had been tasked with befriending the troubled adolescent. "He was quite arrogant, but funny and very assertive, and a bit of a homophobe." One evening, after taking out Urbina and several other boys for ice cream, the pair wound up alone in the park. Urbina recalls his mentor talking about how they needed to trust each other and telling him to prove his trust by pulling down his pants and underwear. "He just looked at my penis for a while, in a kind of scientific way," the now 34-year-old remembers. "After a bit, he told me to get dressed and he took me home." It was the start of a two year physical relationship, involving oral sex and intercourse, during which Urbina and his abuser met about twice a week. Two decades later, Urbina has become the first of the dozens of alleged victims of sexual abuse that took place within Sodalicio to allow his name to be used publicly. He decided to do this as the scandal around the group, which is officially affiliated to the Vatican and governed by its canonical law, has grown into a litmus test of Pope Francis' ability to fulfill his promises of "zero tolerance" towards sexual abusers and those who cover up for them. When he was 14, Alvaro Urbina was sexually abused at Sodalicio de Vida Cristiana catholic boot camp in Peru. (Photo courtesy of Alvaro Urbina/VICE News) The Sodalicio case also has had a particular impact in Peru because the group maintains close ties with the country's elite. It also directly implicated Luis Fernando Figari, the order's founder and a prominent Peruvian. Last month, Sodalicio acknowledged that Figari — who is currently "in retreat" in Rome, apparently reluctant to return to Peru — had committed abuses and moved to expel him from the group. In an online video, Sodalicio's current head, Alessandro Moroni, tacitly admitted that the abuse involving Figari was the tip of the iceberg by accepting that victims had "received no satisfactory reply" from Sodalicio for years. "I apologize to the victims of any kind of abuse or mistreatment that they may have experienced from any member of our organization," he said. But this does not satisfy some. "It's been three years since Francis became pope, with his super-tough discourse on child sex abuse, but we have yet to see real action," said Peruvian journalist Pao Ugaz, who co-authored a book on the abuses in Sodalicio that propelled the scandal onto the front pages in Peru. "There's no transparency and no real response to the victims, or even empathy, never mind justice." He just looked at my penis for a while, in a kind of scientific way' The Sodalicio case echoes the scandal around Marcial Maciel, the founder of the Mexican order Legionaries of Christ, and the decades-long systematic cover-up of his abuse of many children, including his own biological offspring. A confidante of Pope John Paul II, Maciel was treated like a living saint by the order that was close to some of the richest and most powerful people in Mexico. Although he was eventually ordered to retire to a life of prayer, Maciel was never declared guilty by the Holy See, let alone forced to face a criminal investigation in ordinary courts. Pope Francis, meanwhile, granted an indulgence, which is basically a pardon, to the order earlier this year. Related: Priest Accused of Sexual Abuse in Mexico Vanishes Sodalicio was founded in 1971 and is formally affiliated with the Vatican. Within Sodalicio, word of the horror first began dripping out in 2010, including through a Spanish-language blog, las Lineas Torcidas, dedicated to pedophilia within the Church. But it was the book — Half Monks, Half Soldiers — written by Ugaz and Pedro Salinas and published last year, that catapulted it out of the shadows. The book featured anonymous testimony about sex abuse within the organization from numerous victims of Figari and other adult members. It is only thought to have stopped in the 1990s. Salinas and Ugaz say this is because other Sodalicio members discovered it — and then promptly covered it up. It is only thanks to lobbying by the pair of journalists that Peruvian prosecutors finally began looking into the allegations last fall. The attorney general's office told VICE News that an investigation is active but the details remain confidential as it is still in a preliminary phase. But with a 20-year-statute of limitations for these sexual crimes, time is fast running out to bring the abusers to justice. 'This guy was supposed to be my spiritual guide. He was supposed to help me to grow up, to become a better person and deal with my personal problems. He wasn't supposed to fuck me' Meanwhile, last month's apology by Sodalicio head Moroni comes after months more of stalling. Sodalicio only acknowledged last October, while under considerable media pressure, that child sexual abuse allegations against its founder and other senior figures in the hierarchy were "plausible". The other figures included Figari's number two, Germán Doig, who died in 2001 and who Sodalicio had once proposed for sainthood. Related: 'Almost Sociopathic Lack of Care': Vatican Child Protection Commissioner Calls on Church Finance Chief to Resign In an emailed response to questions from VICE News earlier this year, Sodalicio's spokesman Fernando Vidal said that police were not contacted back in the 1990s, when the allegations first cropped up within the organization, because Doig was the person in charge of handling the matter. Vidal added that the group was "firmly committed to clarifying the facts", cooperating with investigators, providing compensation to the victims, and ensuring the crimes are never repeated. Of Urbina's alleged abuser, Vidal added: "We have had no ties to or contact with him since he left the institution many years ago." The response to the breaking scandal from Lima's archbishop, Juan Luis Cipriani — the ultra-conservative Archbishop of Lima who is one of just two cardinals from the famously strict Opus Dei order — has been similarly ambiguous. He ignored it entirely until commenting became unavoidable last October and he called for Figari's suspension from Sodalicio pending investigation. But Cipriani also gave a homily warning that he would not accept criticism from "false moralists who want to mistreat the Church." Related: Pope Goes Off-Script on Sex Abuse, Says 'All Responsible Will Be Held Accountable' More recently, Cipriani's office insisted that it was the Vatican, not the Lima archdiocese, which was responsible for getting to the bottom of the problems within Sodalicio. The Vatican did open an investigation in April 2015, yet the cleric appointed to head it admits he didn't get very far. 'We have had no ties to or contact with him since he left the institution many years ago' In an interview in his Lima office, Pablo Urcey, the Bishop of Chota, in the northern Peruvian Andes, said that he had met nearly 100 current and former members of Sodalicio, and had prepared a brief 30-page report for the Vatican. But although many witnesses alleged psychological abuse, the only evidence of pedophilia Urcey said he had uncovered was through two separate written statements from people he never met. He also said that he had not read Half Monks, Half Soldiers because he had been "too busy" with his other duties, including as General Secretary of Peru's Episcopal Conference. "We have been focused on how he [Figari] exercised his authority as founder," Urcey, said that this could have helped cover up "deviation" within the group. "The testimony alleges that he was authoritarian, despotic, bossy, and elitist." Urcey added that he believed Sodalicio wanted to get to the bottom of the scandal and saw his role as one of helping them do this. Related: Sex Abuse Survivors Aren't Happy With the Pope's Comments on Bishops' 'Courage' Urbina, who now runs his own bicycle business in Cologne, Germany, says his priority is to stop other children and adolescents suffering similar trauma. Though he is keen to stress he is proud of the man that he has become, he also recalls how he was expelled from school while he was being abused, and adds that the experience affects his sex life and requires him to still see a psychiatrist. "It took me a long time to realize how this has affected me, and shaped me psychologically," he says. "This guy was supposed to be my spiritual guide. He was supposed to help me to grow up, to become a better person and deal with my personal problems. He wasn't supposed to fuck me." VICE News was unable to contact his alleged abuser, who now lives in Illinois, despite repeated calls to his landline. "I've also felt guilty, not because of what happened but because I didn't speak out earlier," Urbina adds. "That is why I am talking now. If I can stop just one more kid being abused, I will be happy." Damian Lewis: Boarding school is a 'very violent' experience that 'defines you emotionally for life' Damian Lewis: Boarding school is a 'very violent' experience that 'defines you emotionally for life' Damian Lewis, the Homeland actor, was sent to boarding school aged eight Credit: JAB Photography/REX/Shutterstock Danny Boyle 15 May 2016 • 4:03pm Damian Lewis, the Old Etonian actor, has told how he found being sent to boarding school a "very violent experience". The star said children who are sent away from home to be educated are left with an experience that "defines you emotionally for the rest of your life". The son of a City broker, he was born in the wealthy London suburb of St John's Wood and was sent to boarding school Eton, whose former pupils include David Cameron and Boris Johnson. Lewis, who has two children with fellow actor Helen McCrory, said he would not send his own children to boarding school at such a young age. There's a sudden lack of intimacy with a parent, and your ability to get through that defines you emotionally for the rest of your life. Damian Lewis Recalling his own experience, he said: "I went at eight and I think that's very hard. You go through something which, at that age, defines you and your ability to cope. "There's a sudden lack of intimacy with a parent, and your ability to get through that defines you emotionally for the rest of your life. It's a very violent experience in those first few weeks. It's just, boom." Lewis also told of his "surprise" when former pupils of a state school tried to stop him attending its 50th anniversary celebrations. The Homeland star was invited to switch on the laser display to mark Acland Burghley's golden anniversary earlier this year. But a former pupil of the mixed comprehensive in Tufnell Park, north London, tried to block the actor's appearance claiming his privileged background made him unsuitable. The petition - which only attracted 124 signatures - said the school had a "long and proud tradition in comprehensive education" whereas Eton "represents the reproduction of privilege and inequality in the UK". On Lewis, it added: "We have nothing against him as an actor or local resident, but he is a wholly inappropriate choice for this celebration of a wonderful local comprehensive school." Damian Lewis attended Eton, where former pupils include David Cameron and Boris Johnson Credit: Ian West/PA Lewis told the Sunday Times Magazine the protest "missed the point". He said: "I was surprised there was so much feeling, but in the end, the petition was very small. "I think she missed the point of the occasion. It was a celebration of community. Acland Burghley is a performing arts school with a special status for that, and I am a well-known local actor. "On the day, I was surrounded by friends who had been in my kitchen endlessly over the past 10 years, going on play dates with my kids, who were at the school. So it was a misjudgment." State: Girl, 14, raped by staffer at mental health facility for troubled teens Investigators say staffer at Nexus Glen Lake assaulted emotionally troubled girl. The attack occurred on Dec. 22 at Nexus Glen Lake, a locked mental health facility located about a mile west of Interstate 494 and County Road 62, according to the state Department of Human Services (DHS). The molestation and anal rape occurred in the resident's bedroom, the DHS's maltreatment report cited the teen as reporting to three Glen Lake employees. The teen has a history of being sexually, physically and emotionally abused, and has suffered from depression and anxiety, the state investigators noted in their report. The staffer denied the allegations and said the teen would make "playful" sexual comments to him, the DHS report read. A sexual assault exam and the DNA evidence collected neither confirmed nor discounted that the assault occurred, the DHS report read. The staffer, who identity was not disclosed by DHS, no longer works at the facility. The Hennepin County Sheriff's Office has responsibility for any criminal investigation. A spokesman for the county attorney said he sees no evidence that a case was submitted by the Sheriff's Office for consideration of charges. A Sheriff's Office spokesman had no information to share about the case, including whether there was an investigation. While investigators placed the blame for the assault solely on the staff member, the DHS found in a follow-up investigation that Glen Lake committed background check violations involving other two employees and fined the facility $400. According to the DHS's findings, the staffer had a habit of saying he "liked" the teen and would slap her buttocks. On the day of the assault, the two spent much of the staffer's shift "interacting with one another," according to the DHS review of the facility's surveillance video. The two were spotted together in a supply room with the lights off and were smiling after exiting. Later in the kitchen, the girl pressed her body against the staff member, without him appearing to object. The rape occurred less than an hour later. Although the staff member "denied the allegations, given the consistent information provided by the [resident] and that video surveillance corroborated parts of [her] statement, it was determined that the [resident's] statements were more credible" than the staffer's," the DHS report's conclusion read. "Therefore, there was a preponderance ... of evidence that the [staff member] has sexual contact with [the teen] at the facility." The 12-bed Glen Lake facility serves girls ages 14 to 19 with severe emotional and behavioral problems and is operated by the Plymouth-based nonprofit Nexus, one of the largest child residential treatment and foster care providers in the state. The nonprofit has similar facilities in Minnesota in Onamia and Austin, two in Illinois and one in Baltimore. Nexus also provides foster care, adoption and in-home counseling services in Minnesota for children from birth to age 18. In a statement read to the Star Tribune by one of its executives, Nexus said that as soon as staff became aware of the incident, "the employee was removed from the area immediately and had no further contact with the alleged victim. The employee was terminated." The girl was taken to a hospital emergency room, where staff there contacted law enforcement, the statement continued. The state investigation found that a background check was done on this employee and that it "found no fault with Nexus" in connection with this incident, according to the statement. DHS records online show one other investigation of Glen Lake by the agency since 2010. That involved two allegations of physical abuse. Both claims were unsubstantiated. Oklahoma DHS pays settlement over murder of girl in foster care | News OK Oklahoma DHS pays settlement over murder of girl in foster care by Nolan Clay Published: May 17, 2016 Updated: 2 days ago 157 shares facebooktwittergoogle plusemail Alysa Horney The Oklahoma Department of Human Services has settled a wrongful-death lawsuit filed against it and a dozen child welfare workers after a 2-year-old girl was murdered by her foster mom. DHS settled the federal lawsuit for $435,000. The victim, Alysa Horney, bled to death on Dec. 8, 2013, after her liver was torn by a blow to her body. Her foster mother, Delila Ann Pacheco, 49, was convicted at a 2014 trial of first-degree murder. Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC Prosecutors alleged the foster mother struck Alysa in the main bedroom of the rural trailer home outside Tahlequah because the girl wouldn't go to sleep. Alysa and an older sister had been in the foster home less than four months. Alysa spent nights on a pallet on the floor in the main bedroom. DHS admitted mistakes were made. The supervisor who approved Pacheco's application to be a kinship foster parent was demoted. Another supervisor involved in the girl's case resigned rather than face termination. Alysa's primary care worker retired. The demoted supervisor failed to have an adequate background check done on Pacheco and failed to take action after Alysa suffered a broken leg and a bruised face at the foster home, a DHS internal investigation found. He was specifically criticized for never even getting a 2011 arrest report about Pacheco or a 2012 request by a relative for a protective order against her. Pacheco had been arrested in 2011 on an aggravated assault and battery complaint. A Cherokee County sheriff's deputy reported she admitted grabbing a large kitchen knife during a fight with her husband. The deputy reported she also admitted to using marijuana and methamphetamine in the past. The supervisor said he did not review the arrest report because Pacheco was never charged and obtaining it would have "wasted another day," disciplinary records show. The girl's estate sued DHS and the child welfare workers in January 2015, at first in Cherokee County District Court. The case was later moved to the federal courthouse in Muskogee. A federal judge there approved the settlement in April. "This entire ordeal has been heartbreaking for everyone involved," DHS Director Ed Lake said Tuesday. "Though it was agreed by the parties to not pursue this case any further, nothing can make up for the underlying tragedy that cost this precious little girl her life. "The lessons learned ... was that we needed to ensure a consistent process in evaluating background checks before approving foster families and we need to more thoroughly assess the safety of children when visiting them in foster homes," Lake said. "More training has been provided to workers and supervisors on assessing the safety of children in foster homes and evaluating the needs of foster families to ensure they can adequately care for the children in their homes." The first $275,000 of the settlement was paid May 6 from funds in the state's self-insurance program, records show. The rest will be paid from DHS funds next fiscal year. Alysa and her sister, Halia Horney, had been taken into emergency custody by DHS "against the wishes of their mother and father" on Jan. 3, 2013, according to the lawsuit. The mother, Holly N. Adair, 29, of Welling, and father, Donald Horney, 29, of Tahlequah, divorced in April after eight years of marriage. They are splitting the settlement, after attorneys' fees and the lawsuit costs are paid, records show. Also, the estate's personal representative is getting $5,000 for his services. A Cherokee County judge approved that distribution Friday. Halia, now 6, was removed from the Pacheco foster home on Dec. 8, 2013, and is now living again with her mother, records show. Pacheco is serving a life sentence and will not be eligible for parole until 2052. Her conviction and sentence were upheld on appeal in April. Source: <http://newsok.com/article/5498786>

"Our survey and this experience has shown we need to make reforms to improve accountability and transparency in all of our group homes," Elizabeth Roberts, secretary of the Executive Office of Health and Human Services, told a Senate Committee on Health and Human Services hearing on Tuesday. The so-called Validation Survey — conducted in March and April by staff from the state Department of Health and the Department of Behavioral Healthcare, Developmental Disabilities and Hospitals (BHDDH) — was prompted by the February death of Barbara A. Annis, 70, a developmentally disabled resident of the state-run College Park home, since closed. Staff abuse is alleged. Roberts told the committee, chaired by Sen. Josh Miller, D-Cranston, that while more than 100 deficiencies were found in the 30 homes — located in communities from Woonsocket to Charlestown — none were of the level of those that have been uncovered at College Park. Separate investigations of the alleged abuse of Annis continue. Among the Validation Survey's findings: — Ten of the 30 homes had residents without current Individual Service Plans. Another 15 homes had residents whose plans were "not fully executed." — Ten "failed to have medication orders currently filled." — Fourteen of the homes' staff said there were "staffing issues" at their place of employment. — Nine of the homes "failed to obtain annual physical exams" while 16 failed to see that residents had annual eye exams. Eight "failed to obtain annual dental exams." The homes have 30 days to submit plans of correction after receiving notice of deficiencies. Roberts said that larger system issues, in part the result of years of budget cuts, were confirmed in the findings. "I am committed to working with you and working with Rhode Island's very active, engaged and thoughtful community of providers, advocates and families to develop sound reforms which improve quality, accountability and safety for every resident in our system," she said. Toward that end, Roberts said she supports legislation to create a state ombudsman for developmentally disabled people, a similar position to the state Child Advocate and Mental Health Advocate. "This office would also allow for greater transparency in our group homes," Roberts said. "Public reporting on investigations is extremely limited by current statute and regulation," she said. "Current statutes restrict BHDDH from releasing information most other — if not all other — licensing bodies would be obligated to release." — A recently completed survey of 30 state-run and private groups homes for intellectually and developmentally disabled people disclosed a multitude of deficiencies ranging from comparatively minor to significant, though not apparently life-threatening, such as medication errors and overdue physical exams. 9 Deaths, No Charges Raise Questions About Oversight Agency By Michael Vartanen and Frank Eltman, associated press MINEOLA, N.Y. — May 19, 2016, 11:58 AM ET 0 Shares Email Star 0 Shares Email Little more than names and incident numbers appear on a Long Island medical examiner's list of nine developmentally disabled people who died in state care since 2013, but this much is known for sure: All the deaths came under a cloud of abuse or neglect allegations, and none resulted in criminal charges. The one-page list titled "Abuse and Neglect with Death Involved" surfaced as part of a Freedom of Information request by an advocate who called it only the latest example of how New York's oversight agency for the disabled in state care, the Justice Center, is not doing enough to pursue suspicious cases. Questioned by The Associated Press about the handling of the deaths, all in Long Island's Suffolk County, state and local officials responded with conflicting accounts. The Justice Center says it told county prosecutors about the cases, in accordance with state law, but prosecutors say that's not true. The medical examiner's office says it referred two cases to police for further investigation. After police denied for days that they got them, they acknowledged this week that they did. "It screams for a federal civil rights and criminal investigation," said Michael Carey, who became an advocate for the disabled after his son was suffocated in 2007 by a state group home worker who was later convicted of manslaughter. Carey has become a frequent critic of the Justice Center, established in 2013 to protect the 1 million disabled, addicted and mentally ill in state care. Its mandate is to probe all allegations of wrongdoing by caretakers, with the power to refer cases to local prosecutors or bring criminal charges itself. But an AP analysis last year found it rarely uses that power, with just 2.5 percent of the more than 7,000 substantiated cases of abuse or neglect resulting in criminal charges. Records released earlier this year showed the Justice Center declined to investigate most of the nearly 1,400 deaths of developmentally disabled people in state care in the past two years, leaving the majority of the investigations to the caretaker facilities themselves. Seeking to find out exactly how often the Justice Center refers deaths in state care to local officials for criminal investigation, Carey filed a sweeping public records request of every county prosecutor and medical examiner in New York. Suffolk County was the only one of 62 counties to offer up — by name — the suspicious deaths it received from the Justice Center over the past three years. Three other counties gave just numbers, a total of 15 such deaths. The list from Suffolk's medical examiner's office contained no details, and the Justice Center refused to elaborate about individual cases, citing privacy laws that entitle only relatives to health records and abuse reports. One of those families, located by the AP, plans to use those documents to sue the group home where a developmentally disabled woman lived before dying last year. Carolyn Jirak, 62, spent nearly her entire life in state-funded care, classified as nonverbal with the intellectual capacity of a young child. Her sister Catherine Jirak Monetti contends Jirak's death followed weeks of mistreatment, including an unexplained broken kneecap that was untreated for days, an ankle wound that became severely infected with cellulitis, and prescribed antibiotics that weren't given for three days. Jirak was eventually taken to a hospital with pneumonia and fever, and died 10 days later of respiratory failure. A report the family received on an internal investigation by group home operator, Independent Group Home Living Inc., found there was no abuse. But Monetti is not convinced. "She did not die of natural causes," the sister said. Another death on the list, that of 65-year-old Joseph Schuele, raised red flags with his former caregiver, Danielle Pouletos. She said she was told by a former colleague that Schuele died in November in the hospital from sepsis, a severe systemic response that followed a urinary tract infection at his Maryhaven Center of Hope group home. Pouletos, a former training coordinator for Maryhaven who helped care for Schuele from 2006 through 2013, said sepsis developing from a urinary tract infection could be a sign of negligence and may have been prevented "if he was in a different housing situation with medical oversight." Independent Group Home Living and Maryhaven Center did not respond to requests for comment about Jirak's and Schuele's cases. While the Justice Center declined to disclose its inquiries into the nine deaths case by case, it did say, in general, it has confirmed four administrative findings of neglect. Spokeswoman Diane Ward said center investigators ruled out eight other neglect allegations while confirming eight instances of caretakers or supervisors obstructing incident reporting. Three deaths remain under investigation. Under state law, the Justice Center must immediately notify the local district attorney and medical examiner of deaths involving allegations of abuse and neglect, even while the center conducts its own investigation. Whether that was followed in the Long Island deaths is in dispute. Ward told the AP that the center notified the local prosecutor and medical examiner in six cases the day it received each death report, another the next day, and another eight days later. In the ninth case, the medical examiner was notified by a hospital where the person died. As proof, the Justice Center provided the AP with notification documents, with confidential information blacked out, that were sent to the email addresses the center had for the prosecutor and medical examiner. Robert Clifford, a spokesman for the prosecutor's office, said it "has not received referrals from the Justice Center, the county medical examiner or any county or state agency regarding the deaths of these individuals." The Suffolk County medical examiner's office said that, out of the nine cases, it received seven notifications, was able to conduct four autopsies that resulted in two possible homicide cases referred to the Suffolk County Police Department. After the department initially said it never saw the two cases, Suffolk police Lt. Kevin Beyrer came back several days later to say it did, concluding one was a suicide. The other case was initially rejected for a homicide probe, he said, but now investigators are taking another look. Caregiver accused of sexually abusing girl was on hiring exclusion list The operator of a child treatment center failed to notice that the 25-year-old was barred from working there. By Chris Serres and Brandon Stahl Star Tribune May 19, 2016 — 10:20pm Text size share33 tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint A 25-year-old male caregiver accused of sexually abusing a teenage girl at a Minnetonka child treatment center in December should have been barred from working there in the first place, records show. The nonprofit operator of the center, Plymouth-based Nexus, also runs other child treatment facilities in the state where sexual misconduct occurred, state investigators have found. In three other instances since 2012, Nexus treatment centers in Austin and Onamia have been cited for allowing vulnerable children to engage in inappropriate sexual contact. Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC In addition, the company did not always comply with the state's requirements for conducting background checks of its staff, records show. The male caregiver at the center of the alleged abuse at the 12-bed facility in Minnetonka, known as Nexus Glen Lake, had previously been placed on a statewide "exclusion list" in July. He was sanctioned for improper billing of the state's publicly funded health insurance program, known as Medical Assistance, state officials said. Under state rules, this should have barred him from working at the children's treatment center. Yet he was hired there four months after he was placed on the list, according to state records and Nexus. Patient advocates say the case highlights a troubling gap in the state's system for checking the backgrounds of tens of thousands of workers who care for troubled children and other vulnerable populations. Agencies have no automatic way of knowing when a caregiver has been placed on a state exclusion list, and often do not check. An ambitious effort to close this gap, through a new electronic background check system, has stretched on for nearly two years and will not be fully complete until late fall. "The tragedy here is this horrific assault was entirely preventable," said Roberta Opheim, state ombudsman for mental health and developmental disabilities. A spokesman for Nexus, which treats about 400 boys and girls at its residential treatment centers in Minnesota and Illinois, said it has fired the caregiver, but did not know he was on a state list of excluded providers. The issue did not come up on the company's background check of the staff person, said Jack Ewing, vice president at Nexus. The man was hired in November as a youth care professional, and only began unsupervised work with clients after Nexus received a preliminary authorization from the Department of Human Services (DHS), he said. "Nexus' priority is always to protect the safety of the clients in our care," Ewing said. "However, because of the nature of our work, and the histories and trauma of the clients we treat, these types of incidents sometimes do infrequently occur despite all best efforts." According to a DHS report, a girl with a history of being sexually, physically and emotionally abused reported being raped the night of Dec. 22, 2015. The girl said that a male staff person entered her room, exposed his genitals, fondled her breasts, and then "anally penetrated" her. Staff later found the girl in her room with the lights off and a blanket around her waist, "crying, stuttering and shaking," the report said. Before that night, staff reported other incidents in which the man had touched the girl inappropriately, including one incident in which he slapped her buttocks; even so, the staff did nothing to discourage this behavior, the report said. The DHS determined that there was a "preponderance of evidence" that the male staff person at the Minnetonka facility had sexual contact with the girl. Despite the state's findings, the alleged assailant was never arrested, and the Hennepin County attorney's office decided not to bring charges against the man. A sexual assault exam and the DNA evidence collected neither confirmed nor discounted that the assault occurred, the state report said. Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman said he was "horrified" by the girl's allegations, adding that "folks are not supposed to be treated that way." Yet, Freeman said his office found "no physical evidence whatsoever" that would corroborate the girl's account. "It is a very rare case that we take when the only witness to the alleged bad conduct was the victim," he said. "It's impossible to prove these cases otherwise." Reached Thursday at his home in Coon Rapids, the former caregiver denied the sexual abuse allegations and said he did not know he was on a list of excluded providers. "I'm innocent," he said. "I didn't do what they say I did, and I will be appealing through the proper channels." The Star Tribune is not identifying the man because he has not been charged. Jeanne Ronayne, executive director of the Minnesota Coalition Against Sexual Assault, called the county attorney's decision "regrettable," arguing that a lack of physical evidence should not rule out criminal charges. In this case, she noted, state investigators had eyewitness accounts of the man touching the girl inappropriately before the alleged assault. "I certainly see quite a bit of evidence that could be used in a criminal case — more evidence than in other cases of sexual assault that are successfully prosecuted," Ronayne said. This marks the latest in a string of maltreatment cases at Nexus treatment centers in Minnesota. In March, the Nexus center in Onamia, known as the Mille Lacs Academy, was cited for neglect after two young residents, ages 15 and 17, admitted to engaging in sexual contact; one of the teens filled a bed with stuffed animals, then covered it with a blanket to avoid being detected. In other incidents, children at Nexus facilities were found inappropriately touching each other's genitals — both during a van trip and while in a storage shed during an outside activity, regulators found. Nexus, which reported $44 million in revenue in 2014, was also cited last month for failing to submit background study requests to DHS for two staff persons, resulting in a $400 fine. Staff researcher John Wareham contributed to this report. Source: <http://www.startribune.com/caregiver-accused-of-sexually-abusing-girl-was-on-exclusion-list/380186391/>

Ex-group home operator accused of rape now faces perjury charge 1:43 p.m. SHARE By Crocker Stephenson of the Journal Sentinel 1:43 p.m. 0 A man police say raped a 15-year-old boy at gunpoint while running a state-sanctioned group home for boys is now facing additional charges of concocting a fake alibi. Jermarro Dantzler, 37, of Brown Deer, was charged in October with first-degree sexual assault using a threat of force or violence. A final hearing in that case is scheduled for Monday. He now also is charged with one felony count of perjury and one felony count of bail jumping. A preliminary hearing on those charges is scheduled for Tuesday. According to court documents, the boy told police the assault occurred in Brown Deer on July 19. He said he was walking home when Dantzler, armed with a handgun, attacked him in the 6700 block of W. Brown Deer Road. Dantzler, the boy said, forced him behind some bushes and then raped him. When it was over, the boy said, Dantzler handed him two $20 bills. About a month later, police said, Dantzler tried to contact the boy on Facebook. Police matched Dantzler to DNA evidence collected by a hospital on the night of the assault. In March, according to a complaint filed in the perjury case, Dantzler's attorney, Syovata Kanini Edari, contacted prosecutors with an alibi. According to the complaint, an associate of Dantzler lied to a defense investigator, saying that, at the time of the assault, he and Dantzler were picking up a pizza, which they then brought to Dantzler's house. The friend later admitted that pizza story was not true. In addition, the friend said that he and Dantzler met with two prostitutes who became angry when Dantzler refused to pay them. "The purpose of this story," the complaint says, "would be to explain how (Dantzler's) sperm got on the (victim)." Another associate of Dantzler, the complaint says, misled the defense investigator, saying that he had heard the victim make various plans to obtain Dantzler's DNA and use it to support a false allegation of sexual assault. Both men said Dantzler orchestrated the false reports. If convicted of the assault, Dantzler faces up to 85 years in prison. If convicted of the new charges, he faces an additional 12 years in prison. A spokesman for the Department of Children and Families said Dantzler was licensed to run a group home for boys in 1999. Four days before the alleged sexual assault, a 15-year-old resident of the home committed suicide by hanging himself from a backyard tree. The state revoked Dantzler's license after he was arrested by Brown Deer police. Uncovering the Stark Disparities Behind School Money Saturday, 21 May 2016 00:00 By Annie Waldman, ProPublica | Audio Segment font size decrease font size increase font size Print Media Why do many school districts fail to meet the needs of their students? One commonly cited response is our country's disparate school funding system: because most districts rely heavily on local property tax for funding, schools in poor districts are often left with fewer resources than schools in wealthier areas. Even though school funding issues play out on a local level, in recent decades, it's risen to the forefront of national issues. This past year, for the tenth year in a row, a national Gallup poll found that Americans view lack of financial support as the largest problem facing America's schools. But can more money really fix America's struggling, poor schools? That is exactly what NPR's Cory Turner and a team of over 20 NPR member-station reporters wanted to find out. After six months of investigating, Turner and his team published a series of stories digging into school funding disparities from Chicago to Sumter County, Alabama. ProPublica education reporter Annie Waldman spoke with Turner to learn more about their investigation. A few highlights from our conversation: Annie Waldman: Nearly every state in the country has been faced with a school funding lawsuit. Cory Turner: Some 45 states have had school funding lawsuits. It also became clear to me very quickly that these lawsuits are a symptom of a much broader ailment, which is how we pay for our schools, and why it is that school money is so inequitable in so many different places, which, again, as we explained in the reporting, not every time, but quite often, boils down to disparities in local property tax revenue. The story of America's school funding system starts with an unlikely character: Satan. Well, sort of. It really goes to the back to the Old Deluder Satan Law when the Massachusetts Bay Colonists basically said, "Look. If we want every child to be able to read the Bible, then every child needs to be able to read. It is in the best interest of the Colony that every child be taught to read, and as such, any village of 50 or more people needs to pay up for a teacher." I mean, you can see it in the law too. They're not just talking to parents. They're talking to everybody. It was captured in law. It was codified in law, this idea that educating the Colony's children, or you can extrapolate that to today, the nation's children, is in the best interests of all citizens. That's what so interested me with the Old Deluder Satan Law, as it's known now. School funding inequities often stem from antiquated segregationist policies. The challenge is when so much of that funding depends on local affluence and local school district lines. It's informed in a big way by old segregationist housing policy. You know? I mean, this is the nation we live in, and the fact is, there are an awful lot of school districts that are low wealth, low income districts, and they just don't have the same capacity to fundraise as other more affluent districts. That's just a fact. Some states have been very progressive about reckoning with that and using state dollars collected at the state level to help offset some, if not much, of that imbalance. But lots of other states just haven't done much, if anything, about it. Working with a team of over 20 NPR member stations is no easy task. We created a gigantic spreadsheet that has every reporter, every reporter's phone number, email and a quick logline of the story. I mean, I spent hours with this spreadsheet. This is kind of insane, I actually at one point cut them all out into these little tiny strips of paper and I just taped them on the wall and started rearranging them or clustering them to figure out, this is very early in the process, just to see, "Do I have too much overlap? Do I have too much, too many stories that are basically rich school/poor school?" Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/36094-uncovering-the-stark-disparities-behind-school-money>

The federal agency said all the critical incidents raised a reasonable suspicion of abuse or neglect and should have been reported. After federal investigators reported the critical incidents to the Office of Protection and Advocacy, the office issued immediate protective-service orders in 14 cases and opened new investigations in 24 others. • Group homes failed to report 14 percent of critical incidents to DDS, and when incidents were reported, the homes mischaracterized the severity of the incident more than half the time. • DDS "did not adequately safeguard 137 out of 245 developmentally disabled Medicaid beneficiaries because the DDS system of reporting and monitoring critical incidents did not work as expected." That breakdown occurred, the audit reported, because staff at DDS and group homes lacked adequate training to correctly identify and report critical incidents and reasonable suspicions of abuse or neglect," the audit said. • Although DDS provided abuse and neglect training to its employees once a year, this training included limited examples of potential abuse and neglect. The audit also revealed that only about 10 percent of the state's private group home operators requested abuse and neglect training from the state for their staffs. • DDS only provided abuse and neglect training to 102 out of 961 private group homes. Advocates said that deep budget reductions over the last four years have left the state's safety net in tatters. Nearly $100 million has been cut from DDS' $1 billion budget, and group home operators and other private providers have not had an increase in funding in more than seven years. The result is a high turnover among workers and a dearth of new training opportunities in the private sector, which serves the large majority of DDS clients. Meanwhile, state-run institutions absorb a disproportionate amount of the public money. "What we're seeing here is the consequence of the chronic underfunding and slow starvation of the providers," said Leslie Simoes, executive director of The ARC Connecticut. She said the audit findings will reverberate nationally. "The report is a small piece of a larger systemic issue in Connecticut," said Simoes. "There is money in the system; there is just no public policy to shift it around to where it needs to go." She said that following the Courant's 2013 report on the string of preventable deaths, "policymakers have continued to allow devastating cuts to a system that was already exposed as broken." Murphy said the audit revealed an intolerable situation. "These residents are society's most vulnerable — they need us to speak up because they often cannot advocate for themselves," Murphy, a Democrat from Connecticut, said Tuesday. "The results of this investigation are worse than I could have imagined, and clearly the oversight agencies have failed in their responsibility to prevent and investigate incidents of abuse. The state needs to take action as quickly as possible to address the issues raised in this disturbing report." DDS officials said Tuesday that they have been working with federal authorities on a corrective plan since Commissioner Morna Murray was appointed by Gov. Dannel P. Malloy on Feb. 2, 2015. The agency "has taken this investigation with the utmost seriousness," Deputy Commissioner Jordan Scheff said in a statement, stressing that the audit covered the period of 2012 through mid-2014. "DDS has reviewed the preliminary findings, provided feedback and continued to monitor and make changes to this system as findings indicate and require," Scheff said. "We continue to work intra-departmentally and with [the office of the inspector general] ... so that we can ensure the health and well-being of all individuals we support." The federal audit also found circumstances outside the scope of the review "worthy of further discussion" and action with various state agencies. One issue was that individuals required by law to report suspected abuse or neglect, including hospital employees, police officers and group home workers, routinely failed to report potential incidents. For example, the federal investigators found that of 310 emergency room visits across 25 hospitals involving 245 developmentally disabled people, hospital employees reported only one of these incidents for potential abuse or neglect. The audit cited the example of a group home resident with developmental disabilities and behavioral issues that included aggressive outbursts who was brought to a hospital with a lacerated scalp and fractured cervical spine. The unnamed hospital's emergency room treated his injuries, which group home staff attributed to falling down a flight of stairs. The resident's medical history indicated that his clavicle appeared to have been fractured at least once before. "Because the hospital staff had reasonable cause to suspect abuse or neglect of this resident, the hospital physician and nursing staff, as well as group home staff, should have reported this incident to [the Office of Protection and Advocacy] or an appropriate State agency," the audit said. The audit also highlighted the case of a group home resident with developmental disabilities and a variety of psychiatric disorders, including self-injury and suicidal ideation. Two hospital emergency rooms treated the woman on 19 separate occasions from May 2010 through August 2011. She also was treated three more times in 2013 and 2014. Medical records show that the woman swallowed pieces of razor blades, ingested other patients' medications, suffered self-inflicted burns and inserted numerous items from eyeglasses to batteries and cigarette lighters in other orifices. However, the group home that cared for her reported only six of the 19 incidents to DDS, which in turn reported none of the incidents to the Office of Protection and Advocacy. Instead it was federal officials who informed the Office of Protection and Advocacy of the cases. The office issued a request for an immediate protective service order citing the group home's inability to properly protect the woman from further injury. It also initiated an in-depth review of her care at the group home. In the time period covered by the audit, 85 people who received Medicaid benefits died while under DDS care. The agency did an in-depth investigation of 27 of the deaths and concluded that in 10 of those cases, the care that people were receiving before they died was inadequate. DDS officials agreed that the agency's incident-reporting system "needs to be revised to ensure the health and safety of individuals" who receive its services. "Critical incidents involving beneficiary visits to emergency rooms in general should have created reasonable cause to suspect abuse or neglect." But the agency disagreed with the audit's assertion that every emergency-room visit must be reported to the Office of Protection and Advocacy. "We do not agree that every beneficiary visit to an emergency room creates a reasonable cause to suspect abuse and neglect, as illustrated by beneficiary visits to an emergency room for a known chronic medical condition, such as a seizure disorder, the acute onset of symptoms resulting in a diagnosis of pneumonia, or for a precautionary evaluation following a fall or motor vehicle accident where there is no apparent injury to the beneficiary," DDS officials wrote in their response to the audit. Jermarro Dantzler, accused of sexually assaulting teen at gunpoint, faces new charges Posted 4:57 pm, May 24, 2016, by A.J. Bayatpour. Updated at 06:39pm, May 24, 2016 Facebook Twitter Reddit LinkedIn Pinterest Email MILWAUKEE -- A man accused of sexually assaulting a teen at gunpoint is now charged with perjury and bail jumping. Jermarro Dantzler Prosecutors say Jermarro Dantzler, 37, tried to get others to testify with a false alibi -- one that took Dantzler away from the scene where the 15-year-old boy was raped in July 2015. On Tuesday, May 24th, Dantzler was appointed a public defender in the perjury case. Dantzler had been running a group home for troubled boys. He was appealing a state decision to revoke his license -- when the sexual assault allegation came to light. FOX6 News has been investigating the group home's history -- and found a long list of serious complaints that go back years. For about six years, Dantzler ran the "Rights of Passage" group home out of a house on Milwaukee's northwest side. Jermarro Dantzler Wisconsin's Department of Children and Families (DCF) removed the teenage residents after Dantzler's arrest for the alleged sexual assault of the 15-year-old boy. "The source of the DNA that was found on the victim was Jermarro Dantzler's specifically," said Amy Koeppel, Brown Deer police sergeant. It turns out, DCF had been getting complaints for years about "Rights of Passage." Jermarro Dantzler FOX6 News went to Madison and reviewed dozens of documents through an open records request. Here's what we found: In 2010, Dantzler was fined for secretly paying a resident's sister to keep the boy at her apartment. In early 2011, Dantzler got a 'non-compliance statement' over 'failed oversight by the group home manager.' One month later, Children's Hospital of Wisconsin called a case worker. A boy was discharged after being seen -- no one was there to pick him up. 'The group home left no contact information...they did not even wait,' read the complaint from a case worker filed on March 28, 2011. Less than two months later, DCF received allegations of abuse and neglect on May 3rd and May 5th. On May 7th, Milwaukee police investigated a burglary at the group home. Two computers and other property were stolen. DCR concluded there were 'conflicting stories' and because 'records were stolen, there is nothing for this licensor to review.' No further action was taken. Milwaukee police say no one was ever arrested for the burglary. Jermarro Dantzler A DCF spokesman says the agency took "took aggressive action to address issues that were discovered about the facility." "These penalties ranged from issuing non-compliance statements to imposing fines," said DCF spokesman Joe Scialfa. DCF moved to revoke Dantzler's license in April 2015 over "unallowable expenditures." But the home remained open as Dantzler appealed. During that time, the alleged sexual assault occurred. A review of the home's financial documents revealed multiple red flags, including past due notices for the water bill and billing statements from payday lenders with an interest rate of 250%. Dantzler now awaits trial for that -- and the new perjury charge stemming from it. The sexual assault trial is scheduled to begin in June. DCF tells FOX6 News that despite the financial issues, Dantzler was able to pay back the nearly $27,000 worth of fines his group home received. (Family photo | Joe Shuman / News-Sun) Duaa EldeibContact Reporter Chicago Tribune Trouble had dogged Shaquan Allen for much of his life, but after about a year at a facility that houses wards of the state, the teen had made enough progress to be cleared for discharge. A few months later, the Illinois Department for Children and Family Services placed him on a priority list of wards who could be moved to less-restrictive housing. When Shaquan did finally leave Allendale Association's residential treatment center in Lake County one year later, it was in an ambulance. The 16-year-old was pronounced dead at a nearby hospital the same day, March 30, and two Allendale employees now face criminal charges: One is accused of placing him in a chokehold; the other allegedly helped to mislead authorities about what happened. A Tribune investigation into Shaquan's history and his death reveals a series of missteps and missed opportunities and a system that ultimately failed to protect a child in its care. His prolonged placement at Allendale stemmed in large part from lengthy waiting lists, and his behavior spiraled down as his disappointments mounted over the delays, the newspaper found in its review of thousands of pages of court, police and DCFS records. A program from Shaquan Allen's funeral service. (Antonio Perez / Chicago Tribune) What's more, the chokehold allegedly used on Shaquan is strictly prohibited by DCFS and is against the protocols of Allendale, a private nonprofit that contracts with the state child welfare agency to provide round-the-clock supervision and intensive therapy to some of the system's most troubled kids. Experts and internal DCFS documents also raise questions about Allendale's use of physical restraints on Shaquan and other similarly traumatized youths. In addition, it remains unclear why Allendale's clinical staff cleared Shaquan to stop taking psychiatric medication in late 2014, despite his "severe mental health diagnoses" cited in a DCFS report about his death. "We thought he was going to be safe," said his grandmother Asiele Jones-Ayodele, who raised Shaquan for much of his life. "He didn't deserve to die. We never thought this was going to happen, especially because this was not a family that had him. This was a facility." DCFS Director George Sheldon called the delays in Shaquan's case unacceptable and emblematic of a larger problem. "We have to reduce Illinois' reliance on (residential centers), and these kinds of cases just prove it," Sheldon said. "It proves there's a point of diminishing returns. There's a point where it's no longer helping a child, and, frankly, I think that happens long before 12 months." Illinois' average length of stay at residential facilities is 18 months, DCFS officials said. That's higher than most states, where the estimated averages are seven to 12 months. Shaquan was in Allendale's care — split between its Lake Villa and southern Wisconsin campuses and a brief stint of weekday home visitation — for 2 1/2 years. State wards languishing at taxpayer-funded residential centers is a problem Sheldon and other experts recognize. A 2014 Tribune investigation found that attacks and abuse were rampant at some centers. In the past year, DCFS has sought to speed up the process of discharging eligible youths who've been at residential centers at least a year and has moved out nearly 350 youths. Although Shaquan was on that list, he never made it to another placement. The problem also highlights the state's drastic shortage of community-based alternatives. A DCFS program underway to shore up therapeutic foster homes is still in its pilot stages. "Early on, I think there was a lack of capacity, but I also think there may not have been a sense of urgency, not just on our part, but everyone's part in the system," Sheldon said. "We're talking as much about a system problem as we are an Allendale problem." (Antonio Perez / Chicago Tribune) 'A sweet little boy' DCFS involvement in Shaquan's life began at birth when it was suspected he had drugs in his system, records show. His mother, Willie Mae Allen, acknowledged in a recent interview that she has battled drug addiction and mental illness. Jones-Ayodele stepped in to assist her daughter and when Shaquan was 4 became legal guardian to him and his younger sister. Church outings and sports filled their early years together, Jones-Ayodele said. "He was a sweet little boy," she said. "He sang in the choir. He loved playing basketball." (Courtesy of the Allen family) But as he got older, she felt her grip on him slipping. She tried to keep him far away from the drugs and gangs outside their Englewood home. It wasn't easy. Shaquan had said he tried to join a gang at 7 but was turned away, DCFS records show. His father's death when Shaquan was

8 was another source of anguish. By the time Shaquan was 11, he was getting in trouble regularly at school. His grandmother sent him back to live with his mother. They stayed together for about two years, but Shaquan's problems continued: violent outbursts, school suspensions, psychiatric hospitalizations, a threat of harm against a teacher, an alleged attack on his mother and brother, records show. Doctors diagnosed him with a long list of mental health and behavioral disorders. He was at the Cook County Juvenile Temporary Detention Center when, DCFS and court records show, his mother asked the agency to take custody of him because she was "unable to control" him. Allen said she reached out to DCFS because she feared the gangs that relentlessly recruited her son. At 13, he bragged about his gang affiliation, according to DCFS records. "I believed at the time (DCFS) was the best thing for my son," Allen said. "I wanted them to get him set on his medication and show him there's a different way than being in the streets." Shaquan became a ward of the state in 2013; months later, just weeks after his 14th birthday, he was placed at Allendale. At first, he struggled. He lashed out physically at staff members, smoked, went AWOL. But eventually he seemed to settle in and showed signs of improvement, records show. He took pride in completing tasks he set his mind to, staff members reported. Though his reading and math abilities were well below his grade level, his teacher at Allendale called him a "pleasure" to have in class. He worked hard to finish his science projects and earn good grades, documents show. He tossed aside pro basketball dreams for more practical goals of getting a diploma and learning a construction trade. He made such strides that he was cleared to transfer to a group home, where he would have more freedom but still receive treatment, court records show. Although he had expressed a desire to return home to his mother on a number of occasions, it was a rare bit of good news. In anticipation of the move, he did what was asked of him. He went to school. He didn't run away. I miss everything about him. The phone calls, the 'Mommy, I love you.' I miss it all.—Willie Mae Allen, mother of Shaquan Allen

Lengthy delays, risky behaviors But Shaquan never made it to a group home. He had been accepted at two such programs, but both had monthslong wait lists. Meanwhile, his mother vacillated between wanting him back home and keeping him in DCFS custody, records show. In March 2015, she said she wanted to remain involved in his life, but she felt she could not "effectively manage Shaquan's needs in her home" because of her own mental and physical health, according to court records. Shaquan's discharge date was repeatedly pushed back. The setbacks seemed to all but wipe away the progress he'd made. The "lengthy" delays "may be the reason Shaquan continues to display risky behaviors," a June 2015 Allendale report said. He was back to missing school, getting arrested and running away, once disappearing for a week. Court records show he vented his frustration to child welfare officials that he had done his part and completed his treatment but still didn't have a placement. He said he wanted to be returned to his mother, who had also at this point requested that Shaquan come home for his safety. Though still formally in the state's care, he was then allowed to stay with his mother weekdays, returning to Allendale on weekends. That arrangement "deteriorated" after only a few months and he was sent back to Allendale full time, a DCFS report said. The report cited several factors, including both Shaquan's and his mother's mental illnesses and Shaquan's habit of running away. But in yet another breakdown of the system, it does not appear that DCFS conducted sufficient follow-up visits or provided adequate support to Allen once Shaquan moved back home with her. "It's not enough to say, 'OK, we're going to send this kid home,' and say, 'Thanks, have a good life,'" DCFS chief Sheldon said. "The real question is, were we actually actively engaged in providing those services, and I don't think there's anything in the records that indicates that we were." When Shaquan returned to Allendale, he refused to participate in treatment, records show. Around this time, Shaquan was charged with battery after he allegedly bit an Allendale staffer in December during a restraint. In February, the staff determined that he "could no longer benefit from services at Allendale," records show. Once again, efforts were made to find him a new placement — only this time it would be at another residential treatment center. He remained at Allendale until his death more than a month later. Allendale Association Joe Shuman / News-Sun Joe Shuman / News-Sun Other wards also restrained This was not the first time that youths at Allendale alleged they were harmed or choked during restraints. In December, a resident anonymously complained in writing that an Allendale employee "likes to choke you ... until you pass out," according to records obtained by the Tribune through a Freedom of Information Act request. That employee, who was on leave because of another incident, was let go, according to Allendale. Around the same time, a female ward said that an employee punched her in the eye, put her in a chokehold and slammed her head to the ground, though DCFS deemed her allegations unfounded. DCFS licensing records show that, in 2013, another employee had to agree to refrain from excessive restraints and complete a refresher course. As of March 31, Allendale reported seven pending investigations into claims of inappropriate staff conduct. Between April 2015 and March of this year, Allendale sent DCFS more than 1,500 so-called Unusual Incident Reports. Almost half involved allegations of aggression by wards, records show, and about 1 in 5 involved physical restraints of wards by staffers. In fewer than 1 percent of those cases, wards were reported to have been injured. The incident reports reveal that several youths needed medical attention following restraints, including one restraint last year that lasted 75 minutes. In another case, a girl was taken to the hospital after being restrained face down in the prone position — a tactic several advocates and experts have said should be avoided because of the risk of serious injury. Some agencies have banned prone restraints in youth residential centers. In addition, one girl's arm was broken during a restraint, records show. DCFS faulted one of the employees involved, but that finding was overturned on appeal. Allendale President Mary Shahbazian said in an emailed response to questions from the Tribune that the organization has seen a drop in overall restraints in the past year since focusing on reducing their use. She said also Allendale's practice is to notify a supervisor before or soon after a restraint and contact a nurse if there are any physical concerns. Lake Villa police officers, whose station is about a mile from Allendale's campus, are regularly called there — more than 130 times in 2015 alone — for reports including kids running away, battery and criminal damage to property. An Allendale attorney said the organization is cooperating with authorities and complying with subpoena requests in the criminal case resulting from Shaquan's death. "We remain devastated for the loss of Shaquan's life and are completely committed to doing all we can to cooperate with the reviews being conducted," Shahbazian said. "We will take all findings seriously. Improving safety and practice is our paramount goal." DCFS suspended its placements of wards at Allendale on April 1 and has increased monitoring to ensure the well-being of the wards who remain there. Chokeholds banned Authorities have released few details surrounding the events immediately leading up to Shaquan's death. Prosecutors said he became combative and employees James Davis and Justin Serak attempted to restrain him. Davis allegedly grabbed Shaquan's upper body and neck, putting him in a chokehold, and Serak held his legs. When Shaquan became unresponsive, authorities allege, one of the two employees threw a cup of water on his face, trying to revive him. When he did not respond, the men collaborated on a false story that Shaquan slipped on water and fell, according to authorities. No one called 911 for about 15 minutes, though a nurse at some point administered CPR, according to a spokesman for the Lake County Major Crime Task Force, which investigated. The cause of death was ruled suffocation due to asphyxiation, prosecutors said. Davis, 37, is charged with involuntary manslaughter, and he and Serak, 27, are both charged with obstruction of justice for the alleged coverup. Both have pleaded not guilty. Their attorneys declined comment. DCFS policy bans the use of chokeholds as does Therapeutic Crisis Intervention, a model in which workers at Allendale and a number of other residential centers are trained. Martha Holden, who helped develop the model and is director of the Residential Child Care Project at Cornell University, said a chokehold is never appropriate. She said there are so many preventive and de-escalation techniques that physical restraints should be a last resort. When they are used, joints, airways and pressure points are to be avoided, she said. Allendale officials said all employees are up to date with their TCI training. DCFS's report recommends a thorough review of Allendale's restraint policy, saying it seemed "counterintuitive" to use a restraint to manage Shaquan's behavior, given his history and diagnoses. Shahbazian also said that restraints should be used as a last resort and only to maintain safety. She noted that all youths who end up in residential care have been victims of trauma, often including prior abuse. "We would love to be a 'restraint-free' agency — but absent serving a less severe clientele, that goal is a difficult one to achieve," said Shahbazian, who added that employees will undergo additional training this summer. Sheldon also called into question what steps Allendale staff took before using physical restraint against Shaquan. "Knowing that (Shaquan's) return home was disrupted, knowing that he was beginning to act out, to some extent should we anticipate what the behavior is going to be and have a plan in place to deal with it?" Sheldon asked. "I think that's where the department shares the burden of responsibility for making sure that facilities like Allendale ... really make sure their front-line staff knows those issues." Shaquan Allen Family photo Shaquan Allen in an undated photo. Shaquan Allen in an undated photo. (Family photo) In wake of Shaquan's death, Sheldon has recommended that residential centers including Allendale install surveillance cameras. Shahbazian said she supports the concept but said a funding source would need to be identified. Questions also surround why Shaquan was taken off the medication intended to manage his mental health diagnoses and how that decision might have affected his ability to deal with adversity. "It is unclear what the rationale was for the medication changes," the DCFS report stated. "These information gaps lend concern to the management of Shaquan's mental health stability ..." Shahbazian said health privacy rules prevent her from commenting. DCFS officials in their report also lamented a failure to connect "Shaquan's early drug exposure and trauma history ... to his behaviors." A "timely (psychological) evaluation" could have provided a more appropriate treatment plan, the report said. Allen said she sensed something was wrong when an Allendale administrator called to tell her there had been an accident and that her son had hit his head. At the hospital, she cried when the chaplain approached, knowing then that Shaquan was dead. She said she was not allowed to view his body at the hospital. "I miss everything about him," she said between sobs. "The phone calls, the 'Mommy, I love you.' I miss it all." deldeib@tribpub.com Twitter @deldeib Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/watchdog/ct-allendale-shaquan-allen-death-met-20160526-story.html>

For Many of Connecticut's Disabled, Home Is Where the Harm Is Again and again, the disabled turned up in emergency rooms only to have the injuries they'd suffered in the state's group homes go uninvestigated. by Joaquin Sapien ProPublica, May 27, 2016, 7:59 a.m. 0 Comments Print Print This is part of an ongoing investigation Level 14 How a home for troubled children came undone and what it means for California's chance at reform. Spur Reform in 2016 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. The woman was sent to a Connecticut emergency room 19 times in 15 months. Her injuries were ghastly. She swallowed pieces of razor blades. She burned herself. She inserted pins, nails, metal can lids and other objects inside her vagina and rectum. She was developmentally disabled; living in a group home overseen by Connecticut state authorities. Each of her injuries should have been investigated by the state. None of them were. The woman's experience is part of a federal report formally released Wednesday by the Department of Health and Human Services Office of the Inspector General. Hers were among more than 300 emergency room visits examined by federal investigators between January 2012 and June 2014. The report found that on dozens of occasions, Connecticut group home workers failed to uphold their legal obligations to report incidents of abuse, injury, and neglect to authorities. Even when such reports were made, the state rarely took appropriate steps to find out what happened. "The results of this investigation are worse than I could have imagined, and clearly the oversight agencies have failed in their responsibility to prevent and investigate incidents of abuse," said Sen. Chris Murphy, D-Conn., who ordered the report following a 2013 investigation of Connecticut homes for the disabled by the Hartford Courant. "The state needs to take action as quickly as possible to address the issues raised in this disturbing report." Group home workers are required by law to report all injuries and signs of abuse or neglect to a state social services agency. In Connecticut, the Department of Developmental Services is then supposed to pass on particularly alarming reports—those of severe injury or that might suggest abuse at the hands of staff—to an independent state agency called the Office of Protection and Advocacy, which employs specially trained investigators. But the federal investigation found that Connecticut's oversight system failed at almost every level. The Inspector General reviewed 152 "critical incidents" where residents came to harm. It found that group home workers understated their severity in more than half the cases; that the state failed to appropriately follow up on 99 percent of incidents that should have raised "reasonable suspicions of abuse or neglect," and that hospital workers, who are also required to report such incidents, failed to do so in all but one of 310 emergency room visits. As in many other states, Connecticut's developmentally disabled were once held in large institutions with hundreds, even thousands, of beds. Some of those facilities became notorious for abusive conditions, with patients suffering severe injuries and even death. Many of them were shut down and Connecticut has moved people into smaller group homes meant to resemble a family atmosphere and provide better supervision. The report looked specifically at people whose care is paid for with federal Medicaid dollars. Currently there are more than 2,000 such beneficiaries living in scores of group homes throughout the state. "The goal of these programs is to improve the quality of the lives of people with developmental disabilities by moving them out of large institutions and into homes in their own communities," said Mary Kahn, a spokeswoman for the Inspector General. "The findings in this report suggest there is more work to be done to assure that dream is realized." The Inspector General is conducting similar investigations in other states. Curt Roy, the auditor who authored the Connecticut report, told ProPublica that those probes have thus far unearthed similar problems. The results of these investigations are particularly disturbing for Jim Conroy. In 1995, he appeared on a "60 Minutes" episode that focused on an array of abuse allegations at a large Connecticut institution called the Southbury Training School. In a recent interview with ProPublica, he recalled crying over the level of care being offered thousands of disabled residents. "I told my parents I saw 3,000 American citizens living in a place where we wouldn't put our dog for the weekend," Conroy said. Conroy, who today is a Pennsylvania-based consultant, has spent the intervening decades helping U.S. states and foreign countries improve quality of care for the disabled. He has long supported the transition to smaller, community-based group homes, pointing at reams of data he has collected showing better outcomes for residents. That neglect is now happening to residents in those alternative settings disturbs him greatly. "What we did in institutions was overcrowd, understaff and underpay," he said. "And I am fearful that we are repeating the exact same pattern in our community support systems now." For its part, the Connecticut Department of Developmental Services agreed with many of the findings in the report and an official with the agency told ProPublica it will continue to "make changes to this system." As for the woman who was hospitalized 19 times in 15 months, the Office of Protection and Advocacy issued a protective order for her after being confronted by federal investigators. It also initiated a review of her care at the group home. Peter Hughes, the director of the OPA's abuse division, said he could not comment on the status of that review due to privacy restrictions. Of the report as a whole, Hughes called it an "eye opener" and said his agency "worked for many, many hours on the report" with the Inspector General and "ultimately everyone wound up agreeing that we really need to do a better job of making reports and evaluating them." Former Middletown Group Home to Pay $1.5 Million to Settle Overbilling Allegations The group home, which provided residential and day services to the intellectually disabled and at-risk youth, settled with the government. Middletown, CT By Vincent Salzo \(Patch Staff\) - May 31, 2016 10:50 am ET MIDDLETOWN, CT — A former Middletown group home that provided residential and day services to the intellectually disabled and at-risk youth has agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle overbilling allegations with the government, according to authorities. REM Connecticut Community Services, Inc. (REM), which ceased operating in Connecticut at the end of 2014, has entered into a civil settlement agreement with the federal and state governments in which it will pay $1.5 million to resolve allegations that it received overpayments from the Connecticut Medicaid Program, U.S. States Attorney Deirdre M. Daly and Connecticut Attorney General George Jepsen announced in a joint statement. The allegations against REM arose from its submission of "cost reports" to the state related to its operation of group homes during the period from July 1, 2007 through June 30, 2014, according to the press release. The government contended that REM reported certain interest expenses as allowable costs in the cost reports that were in fact not allowable under the state's Cost Standards. As a result, the government alleges that REM received overpayments that it was not entitled to receive from the Connecticut Medicaid Program. "Providers who bill government health insurance programs, such as Medicaid, must scrupulously follow the rules and regulations, and the failure to do so will have serious consequences," Daly said in a statement. "The U.S. Attorney's office will vigorously pursue health care providers who receive payments from federal health care programs that they are not entitled to receive." To resolve its liability, REM will pay $1.5 million to the federal and state governments. Part of the settlement amount will be satisfied by the government retaining $1,189,025 that had been suspended by the state of Connecticut because of REM's questionable billing practices, according to Daly. The additional $310,975 will be paid by REM collectively to the federal and state governments at the time the settlement agreement is executed. Russell Home faces fines, closure over licensing Lacking a proper state license, the Russell Home for Atypical Children faces closure Located on Holden Avenue, the Russell Home for Atypical Children has been serving Orlando for 67 years, albeit without any official licensing from the state. With more licensing challenges ahead, the home now faces closure. Located on Holden Avenue, the Russell Home for Atypical Children has been serving Orlando for 67 years, albeit without any official licensing from the state. With more licensing challenges ahead, the home now faces closure. Kate SantichContact ReporterStaff Writer This family-run nonprofit has been helping kids and adults for 67 years without incident. For 67 years, the Russell Home for Atypical Children has cared for Central Florida's most vulnerable individuals — people who may not see, hear, walk, read, speak or otherwise fend for themselves. By most accounts, it has done an exceptional job. The home doesn't charge anyone and doesn't accept any government funding. But now, state officials have warned that the home needs to become a licensed facility — or shut down. If it doesn't, the Florida Agency for Health Care Administration wrote in its most recent letter to the Russell Home, it will face a cease-and-desist order and fines of up to $1,000 a day. "We're baffled," says executive director Vantrease Blair, whose grandmother, Vantrease Russell, started taking special-needs children into her family home in 1949. "I know there are bad people in this world who would take advantage of others, but we're not trying to do that. We're just trying to do what my grandmother did her whole entire life." The state began investigating the home last October following an anonymous complaint that it was operating without a license, says AHCA spokeswoman Mallory McManus. Negotiations with the home since then haven't resolved the state's main point of contention: "By law the facility would need a license to continue operations," McManus says. The problem, it seems, is in the limits a license might impose. There isn't a category that the home neatly fits into: It no longer qualifies as a child-care facility as it once did — the children taken in by "Grandma" Russell, who died in 2003, are now adults. And if it operates as an assisted living facility, it would have to reject the more recent clients who are younger than 18. If it is licensed as a group home, it's limited to 15 residents; the Russell Home has 25. "We don't want to turn anyone away," Blair says. "And choosing who can stay and who has to go? That's like telling me which sisters and brothers I can keep." Late Friday afternoon, the Russell Home's board of directors voted to file the group home application to avoid a cease-and-desist order but requested that AHCA sign an agreement promising not to move any of the current residents. It was not immediately clear how state officials will respond. A registered nonprofit organization, the Russell Home has earned a large and loyal following over the years. Last week, a supporter launched a Change.org petition asking state officials to make a licensing exception for the home, and the group's Facebook page has filled with messages from outraged fans of the charity. But Blair says she doesn't object to licensing on its face. In fact, the Russell Home has had licenses under various state agencies in the past, though state officials sometimes struggled to define the home. A 2006 letter from the Florida Agency for Persons with Disabilities, for instance, states the home's "size, nature and structure ... precludes APD licensure" under any of its categories. The home doesn't charge the residents who live there full time — some of whom are now middle-age and have no other family. Nor does it charge the handful of clients who come for day care, or those whose families simply need a reprieve of a week or two from round-the-clock care-giving. Instead, it raises $93,000 a month through donations and its thrift shop to cover licensed certified nursing assistants, cooks, custodians and administration costs. In addition, the home spent the past eight years raising $1.8 million to triple its cramped facility and upgrade everything to modern building codes. That construction is due to be finished this fall. "To have all this come up now..." Blair says, her voice trailing off. As she speaks, the women in the home are taking a dance class, and the sound of laughter and chatter spills into Blair's office. A nurse in the front room cradles a 12-year-old boy who was born without most of his brain. Other residents and day clients are in class or playing games. "They interact like that all day," says Kathie Post, a Winter Garden resident whose 37-year-old daughter attends day care there while Post works. "If my daughter were in some state-run facility, she'd be sitting in a chair all day. I can't say enough about the place." Jeannie Flynt of Orlando started bringing her son, Matthew, there in 2009. Born with a chromosomal disorders, he is now 29 and has severe intellectual and physical limitations. But Flynt was so impressed by his progress that, in 2013, she quit her corporate management position to become a teacher there. "Before I found the Russell Home, some of the places I checked out I wouldn't take my dog to," she says. "But you can come here any time, just drop in, and you will see the people like Matthew laughing, having fun, having a life that matters. To me, the Russell Home should be a model." The charity still hopes to resolve the matter amicably, says Tampa attorney Robert Williams, a senior litigator who has volunteered his services for the cause. "I'm prepared to go to court if it becomes necessary," he says. "But we're trying to avoid that." ksantich@tribpub.com or 407-420-5503 Source: <http://www.orlandosentinel.com/news/os-russell-home-for-children-facing-closure-20160531-story.html>

Audit: NYC agency didn't properly monitor troubled minors June 2, 2016 11:35 PM By The Associated Press By MICHAEL BALSAMO (Associated Press) Reprints + advertisement | advertise on newsday NEW YORK - (AP) -- New York City's child welfare agency failed to properly oversee a citywide juvenile justice program when its workers didn't make required visits to group homes or routinely check on the condition of children who were sent to the homes, the city's comptroller said in an audit released Thursday. The audit alleges that workers for the city's Administration for Children's Service, which oversees a program known as Close to Home, routinely failed to meet with children in the program and their families, or ensure that they were getting help from the providers who were contracted by the city. The program tries to house minors between 7 and 15 years old in residences near their relatives and schools instead of in far-off detention centers. The agency "abdicated its responsibility to oversee this program and robbed hundreds of New York City children of the opportunity to get back on the right track," New York City Comptroller Scott Stringer told The Associated Press. "It is outrageous that ACS has no idea if windows are locked, if children are receiving care or providers are doing their job. They are sounding a loud message that these kids don't deserve the necessary follow-up." Stringer said two-thirds of Close to Home group homes didn't receive a single unannounced visit in 2014, even though workers were required to make both announced and unannounced visits to every site. He also alleged that workers often failed to make required phone calls and didn't show up for required visits to check on the children. "The safety of our young people -- and communities -- is paramount," ACS Deputy Commissioner Jill Krauss said in a statement. "Over the past year, ACS has added experienced staff to monitor the safety of programs, enlisted the NYPD to assess security at all Close to Home sites, and, since 2013, we have shut down three programs that were unable to adhere to our standards." advertisement | advertise on newsday Last year, authorities arrested a worker at a now-closed Close to Home program group home after three teenage boys escaped on his watch and raped a woman. Prosecutors said the worker had made false entries in a group home logbook indicating he checked on the boys every half hour and that they were in their beds. Three additional group home staffers were arrested in April. They have all pleaded not guilty. The boys were charged as adults with raping a 33-year-old woman in Manhattan. Lawsuit demands safer conditions for S.C. foster children Lauren Sausser Email @laurenmsausser Jun 3 2016 12:05 pm The 2015 investigation "Warehousing our Children" shows South Carolina places its youngest foster children in group homes and institutions at a higher rate than any other state in the country. x The Department of Social Services announced Friday it settled a class-action lawsuit that alleged 11 children in foster care were abused, neglected, separated from their siblings and over-medicated. Part of the settlement will require South Carolina to find alternatives to group homes and institutions for children. The Post and Courier published a series of articles in 2015 titled "Warehousing our Children" that showed the state places its youngest foster children into group homes and institutions at a much higher rate than any other state in the country. Many experts find this practice troubling because research proves children tend to thrive when they live with families, not in a group setting. More than 3,000 South Carolina children have been placed in state custody. Data provided by the Department of Social Services last year shows more than 20 percent of them lived in a group home, institution or orphanage. Friday's settlement also requires the Department of Social Services to reduce caseworker loads, to improve safety oversight and to make sure foster children receive adequate medical care. "We think it's a wonderful step forward for children in foster care," said Sue Berkowitz, executive director of the South Carolina Appleseed Legal Justice Center. The settlement does not award money to the foster children, Berkowitz said, adding, "It's all systemic relief. It's class-action relief for all of the kids who are in foster care." Her group, in partnership with Children's Rights, a national advocacy organization, filed the lawsuit against South Carolina on behalf of the foster children last year. Camden attorney Robert Butcher represents former foster children who say they were sexually abused by adults and other children in state custody. He called Friday's settlement "dramatic." Similar settlements in other states have prompted major changes, he said. "In those states, they've had legislatures that have had the desire to make the changes," said Butcher, who was not involved in the class-action lawsuit. "We always talk about unfunded mandates. If it's a mandate that no one's supporting, we've got some big problems." Foster children have no voice in the Statehouse, Butcher said. "Foster kids don't have lobbyists. They don't have special interests," he said. "They're going to be the first ones our politicians drop when they need to cut costs." Berkowitz agreed that the settlement will require the state to spend more money. "They cannot help kids if they don't put resources into the services that they need," she said. "That's part of the reason they're in such a big mess to begin with." In a press release, the Department of Social Services said the settlement will avoid "prolonged, expensive litigation and allows DSS to continue to focus on implementing reforms that will improve the quality of care for children in foster care in South Carolina." Gov. Nikki Haley, a named defendant in the lawsuit, issued a prepared statement Friday through her spokeswoman. "There is nothing more important than the safety of our children and our most vulnerable citizens, particularly those under the care of DSS. Whether it's increasing the number of caseworkers or working with partners across state government and in our communities, we remain focused on strengthening DSS," Haley said. "This settlement agreement represents yet another step in this process, and I applaud the work Director (Susan) Alford and her team do everyday." Department of Social Services spokeswoman Karen Wingo said Alford was not available to discuss the settlement Friday. Alford also offered a prepared statement: "We will not reach these outcomes overnight; but our goal is to establish a strong foundation which builds a continuum of services for children that will be sustainable." New sex charges filed against ex-MK Place staff member By Debbie Bryce For the Journal Jun 7, 2016 \(6\) prev next POCATELLO — Prosecutors filed new charges against a former MK Place worker accused of having inappropriate sexual contact with underage clients at the adolescent residential center. Charges were dismissed against Julie Ann Gewarges, 30, in April. She was originally charged with two counts of felony lewd conduct related to one underage male victim. Following a preliminary hearing, Sixth District Magistrate Thomas C. Clark dismissed one count, and Gewarges was bound over to the trial court for the second charge. According to court records, the second charge was later dismissed by the prosecutor. Story continues below video The former MK Place staff member is now charged with four felony counts of sexual abuse by soliciting a minor under 16 to take part in a sexual act. Bannock County Deputy Prosecutor Zach Parris said if convicted of the charges against her, Gewarges could be sentenced to up to 25 years in prison for each count. Parris said the new charges were the result of additional investigation in the case and the new complaint involves a second victim. The deputy prosecutor said authorities are in contact with both victims and their families. The new charges were filed on June 1, and Gewarges will make her first appearance in court on June 17 when she be arraigned on the new charges. Gewarges was previously represented in the case by Shane Reichert of Pocatello. The charges against Gewarges stemmed from an incident on July 4, 2015, inside a van en route back to MK Place, 110 19th Avenue, following a Fourth of July celebration at the North Bannock County Fairgrounds. During the preliminary hearing in April, a 15-year-old male victim told the court that Gewarges made several sexually explicit comments to teens inside the van and engaged in lewd behavior with his friend. The boy's father, who asked to remain anonymous to protect his son, said he's pleased that charges were refiled in the case. "Gewarges needs to be exposed," he said. "It's like she went on a rampage against children." The underage male is currently receiving counseling, and his father said the teen is prepared to take the stand again. The man has taken no civil action against MK Place or Gewarges, but he said he wants the juvenile treatment center and the former staff member held accountable. MK place is a residential treatment center specializing in young people 13 to 17 years of age. The center has not released any statement regarding the July 2015 incident or the charges against Gewarges, and the director did not respond for this story Tuesday. Lawsuit alleging abuse, neglect of teen filed against Zelenople group home Updated: May 11, 2016 - 7:32 PM 140 Share this with your friends! From To Compose your message Thanks for sharing with your followers! Lawsuit alleging abuse, neglect of teen filed against Zelenople group home <http://on.wpxi.com/1TbutGy> ZELIENOPLE, Pa. — A family is suing Glade Run Lutheran Services, a group home in Zelenople, claiming that a 13-year-old boy was abused and neglected at the facility. Attorneys for the boy and his family spoke Wednesday with Channel 11 News after filing the civil lawsuit. "The thing that gets this little boy excited is the thought that Glade Run will no longer exist," Nick Indovina of the Pisanchyn law firm said. Glade Run Lutheran Services in Zelenople Channel 11 News has covered the residential treatment facility, which cares for children and teenagers with severe mental health issues, for months. State inspectors found evidence last October of children having sex with other children on campus. As a result, the state Department of Human Services stripped the 56-bed facility of its license, which Glade Run is attempting to get back through an appeals process with the state. The campus has three additional facilities that have remained open pending the appeal decision. No criminal charges were ever filed, but the state mandated changes, including firing the staff, hiring new employees and adding security cameras. Indovina said the changes are not enough. The lawsuit filed Wednesday details allegations too graphic for Channel 11 News to report about what the boy, now 15, endured from March to July 2015 while he was being treated at the group home for severe mental health issues. The suit alleges that the staff failed to keep him safe from other children. While Glade Run had yet to see the lawsuit, officials issued the following statement to Channel 11 News: "Glade Run Lutheran Services serves our communities' most challenging and traumatized youth, providing residential, school-based and community-based offerings to thousands throughout Western Pennsylvania each year. Many have complex mental health issues and behaviors that necessitate residential treatment for stabilization and healing. The safety of our clients remains our first priority, and we are committed to providing the safest environment for their treatment and recovery. "The provision of human services to individuals with mental health issues is not without risks. These risks include physical harm to staff and potential litigation. The privacy rights of our clients preclude us from discussing any allegation that may arise. Glade Run has a longstanding track record of more than 160 years of successful care and treatment of traumatized youth, and is dedicated to protecting the best interests of those we serve." Oregon plans to revoke another foster care license 1 / 6 foster care feb. 3, 2016 Oregon's then-interim human services director Clyde Saiki, left, and Dani Ledezma, a policy adviser for Gov. The Oregon Department of Human Services plans to revoke the state license of Chehalem Youth and Family Services in Newberg, which currently provides behavioral rehabilitation for 16 children. The agency sent out a notice of intent to revoke the license on Wednesday. According to that notice, obtained by The Oregonian/OregonLive, investigators found youth went missing from the facility overnight without the staff noticing, staff failed to notify emergency personnel when a youth was unconscious for nearly an hour, and staff did not file mandatory reports on sexual assault allegations. Gene Evans, a spokesman for the department, said Thursday morning that Chehalem was "one of those where I think the agency's finally reached an 'enough is enough.'" The state's Office of Adult Abuse Prevention and Investigations conducted multiple investigations of the facility starting in September. Human Services officials took action after an increase in reported problems at Chehalem Youth and Family Services starting last fall, according to the notice of intent to revoke the facility's license. The state also discovered Chehalem Youth and Family Services had financial problems and "is on the path to insolvency," according to the state. All of the residents are wards of the juvenile court, according to the state's notice. Evans said the state has begun seeking other placements for children at the facility, which serves children with debilitating psychosocial, emotional and behavioral disorders. Human Services officials had been tracking issues at Chehalem Youth and Family Services for a while, and had placed it on a watch list of licensed facilities with recurring problems. Evans said Chehalem Youth and Family Services was one of the facilities that spent the longest time on the department's so-called "radar list," which was created in 2012. Chehalem Youth and Family Services has 30 days from the notice to request a hearing to make the case to licensing staff that the facility should be allowed to keep its license. If the facility does not, DHS will revoke its license. — Hillary Borrud hborrud@oregonian.com Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/politics/index.ssf/2016/06/dhs_revoke_license.html

NY group home operator sued in probes of alleged abuse By - Associated Press - Thursday, June 9, 2016 ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) - A federal judge has ordered an upstate New York group home operator to provide records and access to a legal services organization representing two youths allegedly attacked by staff. Judge Glenn Suddaby says Thursday that Northern Rivers Family Services cannot block Disability Rights New York from its federally authorized monitoring of the disabled. Disability Rights received complaints about a 13-year-old punched and choked at a Schenectady group home in 2014, and a 15-year-old left unattended at a bus stop and choked there in early 2015. Northern Rivers, which initially denied access, says it's committed to protecting the rights of people in its care and welcomes any group with legal authority to monitor its efforts. It told the judge both youths left the home last year and two staff were fired. Source: <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2016/jun/9/ny-group-home-operator-sued-in-probes-of-alleged-a/>

Questions surround death of 2-year-old child in foster care By Danielle Taylor June 11, 2016 Updated Jun 11, 2016 at 12:07 AM CDT Cloquet, MN (NNCNOW.com) -- A funeral was held Friday morning on the Fond du Lac Reservation for a two-year-old girl who drowned in a plastic laundry bin in a Bemidji Foster home last Sunday. According to a criminal complaint, Kira Friedman was placed in the shower and left unattended by her foster dad, who is now facing manslaughter charges. "This didn't have to happen. This little girl didn't have to die. She should be right here with her parents at this time," said Patti Larsen, a family spokesperson. Larsen, who serves as the Sacred Hoop Coalition Director, was shepherding 2-year-old Kira Friedman's case through the St. Louis County Court system on behalf of the little girl's family, and believes her death was preventable. "The maternal grandmother identified numerous people who would be potential placements for the child," she said. Larsen wanted to ensure Kira was placed in a Native American home. Therefore, she says the County let this child down when they removed her from a Native foster home, and placed her with a white foster family in Duluth. "Kira was just a number, was shipped off to a place," Larsen said. At the family's request, Leech Lake Reservation got involved to find a Native foster home. When Kira was placed in a home in Bemidji, red flags were sent up right away. "There was too many children in that place to properly care for a child with special needs, such as Kira," said Larsen. Larsen says keeping Kira in the hands of the St. Louis County Court System is where her parents went wrong. However, a spokeswoman with the county says the child was no longer in their custody. In a written statement the county said, "This case has been under the jurisdiction of Leech Lake Tribal Court for close to a year and custody has been with the Leech Lake Band. This matter is under active investigation by the authorities involved, so we would have no further comment on it." Nonetheless, Larsen stresses the importance of applying the Indian Child Welfare Act to foster children. The act is a federal law that seeks to keep native children with native families. "Follow ICWA. It's there for a purpose. It was placed there for a purpose in 1978 when so many kids were being lost," said Larsen. In addition to the Indian Child Welfare Act, Larsen also mentioned the Minnesota Indian Preservation Act should be followed by government agencies, when dealing with Native foster children. Three central Ohio residents who endured horrific foster care child abuse have joined several young survivors going public with their stories THE ASSOCIATED PRESS June 11, 2016 - 9:36 am EDT AAA COLUMBUS, Ohio — Three central Ohio residents who endured horrific foster care child abuse have joined several young survivors going public with their stories. The Columbus Dispatch reports (<http://bit.ly/1YP0lCx>) that Julius Kissinger and his siblings, Jermaine Ferguson and Valnita Ferguson—all in their 20s—have posted accounts of their experiences online as part of a nationwide foster-care awareness campaign. Their adoptive parents, James and Vonda Ferguson, are serving 65-year sentences for the abuse. Five of the couple's children were tortured and beaten until they bled at the couple's Springfield and Marysville homes. They were rescued in 2004 and later scattered to different homes. Sandy Santana, the executive director of the New York City-based legal advocacy organization Children's Rights, says part of the campaign's aim to put a real face on foster care. Former pill mill doctor's home to become drug treatment center By WSAZ News Staff | Posted: Fri 4:26 PM, Jun 10, 2016 GREENUP COUNTY, Ky. (WSAZ) — A new treatment center is opening at a mansion owned by a former pill mill doctor who spent time in prison. Recovery Works has announced it will open its second treatment facility in Kentucky. The facility will be housed in the former home of David Procter, a doctor who ran a pill mill out of his South Shore practice. Procter moved to the US from Canada, opening his practice in the early 1980's. His practice was then converted to a pill-mill in the mid-1990's with the help of 3 former associates. Dr. Procter, as well as two other partners, traded pills for cash regularly, with prices ranging from $80 to even $120 per prescription. During the trial of one of his former business managers, Procter testified he saw as many as 80 patients per day. Procter pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to illegally distribute substances in 2003. In 2006, Procter appealed his conviction and his 200-month sentence was reduced to 141-months. He finished his sentence in 2013. Procter's old mansion will hold 32 beds once it is converted to a treatment facility and it will be an unlocked facility, meaning patients will be able to come and go. Recovery Works says, on average, their patients stay three weeks. They offer residential, outpatient and transitional living programs and 24 hour nursing coverage. The center, which will operate under the Pinnacle Treatment banner, says they plan to hire locally in order to staff their workforce. The organization says they will break ground on the new facility June 15th, with an expected opening date set for July 2016. A staffer at a state-run treatment center for troubled youth is accused of having a sexual relationship with a teen who made headlines in 2013 after shooting and killing his parents and three younger siblings THE ASSOCIATED PRESS June 15, 2016 - 4:37 pm EDT AAA ALBUQUERQUE, New Mexico — A staffer at a New Mexico-run treatment center for troubled youth is accused of having a sexual relationship with a teen who made headlines in 2013 after shooting and killing his parents and three younger siblings. Amber Lucero, 35, made her first appearance in court Tuesday. She's charged with sexual contact of a minor by a person in a position of authority. It was not immediately clear if she had an attorney. Lucero works at the Sequoyah Adolescent Treatment Center where Nehemiah Griego — now 19 — had received therapy prior to pleading guilty to charges stemming from the slayings at his family home just south of Albuquerque. According to a criminal complaint, some of Griego's family members learned of the relationship and reported it last week to administrators at the Albuquerque treatment center. State Health Department spokesman David Morgan said the allegations are troubling and that the agency, which oversees the center, is taking them seriously. "DOH placed the employee on leave Monday and we are moving forward with termination," he told The Associated Press in an email. "We have also been cooperating with state police on their criminal investigation and will continue to do so." Albuquerque television station KRQE first reported allegations about the relationship. The criminal complaint stated that Griego confirmed for investigators that he was in a romantic relationship with Lucero and that the relationship began in the latter half of 2014. The two began spending time together. Walks around the facility led to holding hands and kissing, and Griego told investigators that he had touched Lucero's breasts over her clothing. Griego was reluctant to talk about their relationship because he cared for Lucero and didn't want to get her in trouble, according to the complaint. When Griego was moved to another facility, authorities said, the two continued to exchange letters. In an interview with police, Lucero said she believed she loved Griego and that she "weakened" when he asked for a kiss. She went on to say that she overstepped her boundaries by becoming "too much of a friend with him and caring too much." During Tuesday's court hearing, the judge ordered Lucero not to have any contact with Griego or return to the treatment center. Griego will remain in state custody until he is 21 as part of a sentence handed down in March for the shooting deaths of his parents and siblings. He was 15 when he opened fire inside the family home. Prosecutors are appealing the sentence. Source: <http://www.dailyjournal.net/view/story/8dbd234b071f4b649928c5b100e17666/US--Teen-Killer-Relationship>

Rapes, Daily Beatings, and No Escape: Christian School Was Hell For These Boys Blue Creek Academy was an abusive hell on earth, former students say—and the principal who ran it is now heading up a new Bible school in another state. Jacob* dressed himself in a camouflage jacket and a matching beanie on the summer morning he ran away into the West Virginia hills. At 14 years old, he was one of the youngest, smallest, and longest-attending students at Blue Creek Academy, a religious reform school for boys from which he was desperate to escape. Blue Creek Academy was made up of an old schoolhouse and several cabins situated on a remote campground in central West Virginia. A mission of the nearby Independent Fundamental Baptist church, pastor James Waldeck advertised Blue Creek as an “alternative to today’s degenerate, secular culture and education methods,” and took in boys who had been in trouble at home—both locally and from as far away as Texas—to be reformed. Its principal, 35-year-old JR Thompson, had reopened the church’s campgrounds in 2010, renamed it Blue Creek Academy, and marketed the boarding school, which he ran with his wife, Hannah, as a godly answer for “at-risk” teens with emotional and behavioral disabilities and Christian parents with $1,000 a month to spend on their salvation. “We can’t wait to watch God move as he helps us snatch troubled souls out of Satan’s hand,” Thompson wrote on the school’s now-defunct website. What the boys found when they got to Blue Creek Academy was something else entirely—an all-too-common story for victims of Lester Roloff-inspired homes, which thrive as part of the unregulated religious teen reform industry. Along with a strict Bible-based curriculum, boys at Blue Creek Academy were allegedly subject to isolation, physical beatings and mistreatment, and at least two students reported sexual abuse by another student, according to court documents from a pending civil case brought against the school by one boy’s guardian; complaints and reports from West Virginia’s Department of Health and Human Resources obtained through a Freedom of Information Act request by The Daily Beast; and interviews—with a lawyer representing three Blue Creek Academy students, three other former students, one parent, and the Kanawha County Sheriff’s Office. Once at Blue Creek, the boys were cut off completely from the outside world, former students and their representatives claim. Bunkered in dilapidated quarters that were infested with rats and mice, the boys weren’t permitted to speak in public unless it was to sing hymns for local churches and the elderly. They weren’t taken to the doctor, and their calls home were monitored to intercept any unhappy tidings. When the boys weren’t going to church, doing manual labor, or memorizing Bible verses, they were in a kind of school—seated in desks facing the wall, completing Bible-based academic workbooks for hours. Staff at Blue Creek Academy educated children using the Accelerated Christian Education (A.C.E.) curriculum, from a homeschooling supply company whose workbooks promote the Bible as a literal history book and stress Creationism as science. (At one time the company even used the Loch Ness Monster to “disprove” Darwin’s theory of evolution.) Following A.C.E. guidelines, desks faced the wall, and were usually surrounded by dividers to block out any distractions. “They basically handed you a book and said, ‘Learn,’” one former student, who asked not to be named, told The Daily Beast. In lieu of teachers, ACE only requires “facilitators” to check students work and record grades, but even that was neglected at Blue Creek, according to several students who told The Daily Beast their time at Thompson’s school had to be made up once they returned to public school because none of their work “counted.” Even the director’s adopted son, 19-year-old Justin Thompson, who lived at Blue Creek starting in 2010, told The Daily Beast over Facebook chat, “I passed high school but [JR Thompson] never kept a lot on record, so I have no proof.” But the educational neglect was nothing compared to the punishments given by Thompson, former students allege. Attempts to run away were allegedly penalized with food: an all-bean or asparagus diet or being made to chug water then denied use of the bathroom. They were all allegedly beaten—with bare hands, paddles, and boards. Jacob—whose new guardian is now suing Thompson and Waldeck for the maltreatment the boy allegedly endured there—said he was thrown into a wall when he wouldn’t confess to breaking a bench. “Mr. Thompson was very aggressive when it came to paddlings,” said one former student, reached through Facebook, who says he was sent to Blue Creek Academy for drinking and smoking pot. The boy, who asked not to be named because of his remaining ties to Blue Creek staff, said that he was hit nearly every day with Thompson’s bare hands or a two-inch thick wood plank with holes they called “The Hillbilly Hot Seat” for lying, or cursing, even singing a secular song in the shower. “It was hell,” he said. “They forced unwanted religion on us, made us do labor that we hated, and made us run up and down the driveway. They used a board to hit us if we didn’t do what we were asked,” he said. At least two of the boys there were the victims of sexual abuse. As detailed on an intake form from the division of Child Protective Services, obtained by a FOIA request from The Daily Beast, a 17-year-old boy—who was sent to Blue Creek from another teen reform school in Wisconsin where he had been originally placed and subsequently booted for molesting boys—was sexually abusing two of the younger students in 2012. Thompson—whom two former Blue Creek families fault with failing to supervise a known abuser—did report the older boy to police. When questioned, the older boy admitted to Thompson and police that he had raped one boy and molested another; he was arrested and sent to a juvenile detention center, where he was charged with four counts of 3rd degree sexual assault and three counts of 1st degree sexual abuse. A separate allegation of sexual assault by a different boy at Blue Creek Academy is still currently under investigation, according to Sgt. Brian Humphreys, the public information officer for the Kanawha Sheriff’s Office. Blue Creek administrators had their own personal history with CPS: one had been investigated for the alleged sexual abuse of his biological children, while another had been reported for unspecified allegations against his adopted son. Both investigations were closed as “incomplete.” On the intake form, the CPS investigator noted there was not enough supervision at the school and took issue with the policy of corporal punishment, but neither concern was enough to remove the children. Besides, where would they go? “The parents of all the boys do not seem interested in coming to get any of them,” the worker wrote. Handout But Jacob wanted out. So he waited until the morning of June, 10, 2014 when Thompson would be off campus. As the other boys gathered for prayers and school, Jacob went back to his cabin, telling them he had forgotten to brush his teeth. Then he made a run for it. When the staff at BCA realized Jacob had run, they called Thompson back to look for him. After hours of fruitless searching, Thompson called local law enforcement, who helped him search the surrounding woods—but Jacob was gone. The next evening, a man found Jacob begging for change at a neighboring county supermarket 10 miles from Blue Creek and called Clay County Child Protective Services. Jacob smelled foul and the soles of his shoes had been worn bare from running. He was hungry, dirty, and scared, according to the CPS intake form. Jacob begged the sheriff not to send him back. Kanawha County Child Protective Services went out to investigate Jacob’s abuse allegations and interview the boys at Blue Creek. When they got past Thompson, who initially refused to let them in the door, they found seven boys who all disclosed allegations of abuse and neglect by Thompson. The caseworker wrote that, in her interviews, the children told her Thompson had left marks from beatings and his poor supervision allowed for the molestation of several children; guns, drugs, and alcohol were also being brought on campgrounds. The official finding was maltreatment. “There was a lack of oversight,” said Troy Giatras, the attorney litigating a case for Jacob’s guardian against Thompson, Waldeck, and Blue Creek Academy. “The corporal punishment, the manual labor, the isolation, and the allegations of abuse that were never investigated? Other kids have reached out to us, so I know this isn’t an isolated incident.” “You have a place that is operating without a good charter and not well supervised by the Department of Health and Human Resources, and parents with troubled kids who are expecting a religious school to help.” No one from Blue Creek chose to comment for this story. Calls to Wadeck and Bible Baptist Church, and calls and emails sent to JR Thompson, his wife Hannah, and two other couples who worked at the camp during the time of alleged abuse were also not returned. In answers to a number of pending lawsuits, however, including one on behalf of Jacob, Waldeck and Thompson deny all charges of neglect or mistreatment of the boys at Blue Creek Academy. After her interviews, with the help of the Kanawha County Sheriff, the Child Protective Services caseworker brought the kids to a pizza parlor while they organized a return to their homes. While the children could be removed—because Blue Creek was unlicensed as a residential home—the Department of Children and Families had no power to shut the boarding school down. Like thousands of other religious private schools around the country—many of which become havens for abuse—Blue Creek Academy operated unlicensed, unregulated, and wholly unmonitored by the state. The only avenue for closure rested with the Board of Education, an entity that until then, had also had minimal interaction with the school. As in many other states, religious private schools in West Virginia aren’t held to the same standards as their nonreligious counterparts. Though the ways in which they are exempt varies from state to state, for many schools that operate with a religious mission—80 percent of private schools nationwide—accreditation or licensing, the hiring of certified teachers or the approval of curriculum, or even simply notifying the state as to its existence is completely voluntary. “It’s a little scary when you think about it,” Betty Jordan, executive assistant to West Virginia’s Education Superintendent told The Daily Beast, explaining Blue Creek’s “Exemption K status,” a category that simply requires any religious school to send a letter to the state of its intent to operate and file annual test scores. “There is very very limited oversight. Actually there is no oversight. So basically if I wanted to tomorrow, I could write a letter to the state saying I want to open a school and I could open a school.” There are 130 such schools in West Virginia. Jordan said the exemptions are “hardly ever” revoked. State superintendent Michael Martirano did initiate Blue Creek’s closure, by revoking Blue Creek’s exemption status shortly after the children were removed. And in his September 2014 revocation letter, Martirano ostensibly put an end to any ideas of Blue Creek reopening. He wrote: “Due to the egregious nature of the non-compliance, children’s health, safety and welfare, any future attempts by the school to seek reinstatement of the exemption status will be denied by this office.” Notably, the superintendent had shuttered another school 75 miles south of Blue Creek Academy the month before, after 26 years of operation. Martirano forced Miracle Meadows, a Seventh Day Adventist boarding school for “at risk” boys and girls from 6 to 17 years old, to close after a DHHR investigation found that school officials had failed to report an instance of sexual abuse of one student by another and that a school janitor had restrained students in handcuffs until their wrists bled and choked others who misbehaved. The Department of Health and Human Resources had received 13 formal complaints about the school since 2009, four of which alleged sexual misconduct, according to an Associated Press report on records obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. Miracle Meadows’ former director Susan Gayle Clark, 69, pled guilty this year to three misdemeanors counts of child neglect creating a substantial risk of injury, failure to report by a mandated reporter, and obstructing a law enforcement officer. She was sentenced to six months and 30 days in prison. Abuse at religious schools like Blue Creek Academy and Miracle Meadows is underreported and frighteningly prevalent, according to Marci Hamilton, a professor at the Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University and author of God vs the Gavel: The Perils of Extreme Religious Liberty. “These small institutions can be very dangerous to kids because they are isolated and fly under the radar,” Hamilton told The Daily Beast. Because some fundamentalist parents agree with physical abuse as discipline and sexual abuse is often dealt with internally or covered up, Hamilton said, it can be “easy for these groups to get away with it for quite a while, while endangering a series of children.” “This is a common problem, which calls for a National Commission on child sex abuse and for states to work more cooperatively on tracking entities that permit and foment child sex abuse and neglect.” Indeed, a lack of cooperation by states is the very thing that allows abusive Christian teen reform homes closed by authorities in one state to be reopened in another, sometimes using the same name, and frequently run by the same operators. via Facebook After Olin King pled “no contest” to charges in South Carolina stemming from the isolation, imprisonment, and beatings of children in his care at The New Bethany Baptist School for Boys in 1984, he packed up and moved, opening the aptly-named Second Chance Ranch in Danbury, North Carolina. A state bill that would have licensed such boarding schools proposed in response to New Bethany’s closing was protested by local pastors who called it an “intrusion into freedom of the church’s rights.” Today South Carolina is one of the states that exempts religious schools from licensing rules that govern other residential youth homes. In 2009, a Lester Roloff disciple, Pastor Jack Patterson, was forced to close his tough-love boarding school, Reclamation Ranch in Alabama, after allegations of torture and a police raid that turned up guns and shackles. As part of a plea deal, Patterson traded in a felony aggravated child abuse for a verbal harassment misdemeanor and a \$500 fine. Though he did close Reclamation Ranch, Patterson opened a home for adult men in its place, maintained his school for girls nearby, and told a Mother Jones reporter in 2011, he planned to open more homes in Ohio, Florida, and Michigan. In 2012, Alexandra Zayas, a Pulitzer Prize finalist for her reporting on religious boarding schools in the state, wrote that Florida preacher Clayton “Buddy” Maynard was housing five children when, just two years earlier his isolated Heritage Boys Academy had been closed after a state investigation found that boys had been abused there, including one boy who was whipped 1,330 times. “None of the state agencies that oversee such facilities were aware the church was caring for children,” Zayas wrote. And Florida pastor Russ Cookston’s Lighthouse ministries school was closed in 2013 after being plagued with allegations of physical and sexual abuse and solitary confinement. According to his Facebook and LinkedIn pages, though, one month after he closed up his shop in the small town of Jay, he was working as an associate pastor at a Master’s Ranch, a home for troubled boys in Missouri, a state with notoriously lax child welfare laws. In an interview with The Daily Beast, Master’s Ranch administrator David Bosley confirmed Cookston’s position as a senior staff member, praising him as “almost too gentle for this job,” “extremely kind,” and “extremely patient.” “I do know when you get in this business—and I’ve been working with kids for almost 30 years—that you will always be accused of abuse by someone,” Bosley said. “I firmly believe every student should be heard and every allegation thoroughly investigated for the safety of all kids, but you’re always going to have one or two disgruntled kids or parents who are trying to find a way out of the program or who just hate you for trying to help him.” The Government Accountability Office found thousands of allegations of abuse at teen reform homes and camps from 1990 to 2007, some of which involved the death of a young person. The 2007 report was unable to provide a specific number however, as “it could not locate a single Web site, federal agency, or other entity that collects comprehensive nationwide data.” In fact, the only tracking of these types of homes and the abuse that often occurs in them, comes from bloggers and advocacy groups. Angela Smith, 42, runs HEAL, one of the most prominent organizations working to expose and ultimately close abusive youth facilities. Blue Creek Academy is one of some 500 past and present residential programs in the U.S. that currently make up HEAL’s watch-list of fraudulent and abusive programs in the U.S. “Abuse is rampant because many of these facilities operate with little or no oversight and accountability,” Smith said. Even in the states with licensing boards like Montana and Utah, she said, “the people who own and operate these youth programs are the ones doing the oversight.” “The fox is watching the hen-house so to speak.” Nobody seems to be watching JR Thompson. By the time the Department of Education mailed the revocation letter to Blue Creek Academy, principal Thompson had moved to Montana, to a three-bedroom single family house on 11 acres in De Borgia, a six-mile-wide town near the Idaho border that, as of the last census count, was home to 78 people. Within a year, and with the blessing of his “sending church” in West Virginia, Thompson had registered his new home as Canaan’s Land Baptist Church with the Secretary of State. By August 2015, the Canaan’s Land Boy’s Ranch, a non-public secondary school, was registered as a business. “Even though our name is Canaan’s Land Boys Ranch, we are not currently in a ranch setting,” Thompson says in a video advertisement for the $900-a-month boarding school running out of his new home. “We do plan to expand and move to a location where we will be able to acquire animals for the boys to work with.” There is space for eight children, according to the Canaan’s Land Boys Ranch website, and so far, two boys, ages 14 and 15, currently live, go to church with, and are educated by the Thompsons. The minors both appear in promotional videos for Canaan’s Land Boys Ranch, where they decry their past lives of “doing the wrong things,” and being disrespectful to their parents. They’re wearing bowties in Facebook photos as they sing hymns with the Thompsons for a church audience. The existence of Thompson’s new endeavor came as a surprise to Montana school officials. “This is the first I’ve heard anything about Canaan’s Land Boys Ranch,” said Mineral County Superintendent of Schools Mary Yarnall, who explained Thompson has yet to fill out the minimal paperwork the state requires from the operator of a boarding school. “I will try figure out an address and send him a packet. If he doesn’t acknowledge that, I can send the sheriff to at least make him sign, but in Montana there isn’t a whole lot of consequence for not registering.” Montana’s negligible yet unenforceable education requirements for religious private schools no doubt appeal to Thompson, who according to his pseudonymous activism on social media, seems particularly keen on separating himself and his boys’ home from any more government meddling. Thompson blogs under the the alias Nehemiah Flynt, “a Christian author determined to expose the evils of Child Protective Services,” according to his Facebook page, which he made private following a request for comment for this story. In a YouTube video reading from his book, “Legal Discrimination,” Thompson—speaking as Flynt, with his face blurred, but with his characteristic southern drawl intact—does speak to the controversy at Blue Creek saying, “Flynt took charge of a successful Christian-based facility for at-risk youths. He soon, learned, however, that the government of the United States is so narrow-minded that they would stop at nothing to close any facility operating under moral or religious principles differing from their own devilish agendas.” “One allegation from a non-credible source changed everything,” he says in the video. Now, attorney Troy Giatras says he’s representing at least three former students and their parents, who are hoping someone at Thompson’s former boarding school will have to answer for what went on there. Since being reunited with her son after the raid at Blue Creek, one of Giatras’ clients, Carolyn*, 32, from Evansville, Indiana, has written and called every local, state, and federal law enforcement office and lawmaker that she knows, looking for someone who will hold the operators of Blue Creek Academy accountable for the abuse she says her son withstood there for 17 months, and to make sure it doesn’t happen to other children. “They dodged my calls,” she said. “They told me that me and my son should be lucky, that I got him back and they don’t have time to do anything else, that their work is for active cases.” As for her son’s well-being, she said, “It’s a process. The damage is overwhelming. He’s been in counseling ever since he left.” Meanwhile, Thompson is being careful with his new school. The website for Canaan’s Land Boys Ranch used to have his and his wife’s names on it, but they’ve since been scrubbed clean and a warning for prospective parents has been added: “Our Ranch Isn’t For Everyone!” it says, along with the caveat that boys with a history of “sexual acting out (molestations, rapes, etc)” and “students who come from families who would not be supportive of the day to day operations of Canaan’s Land Boys Ranch” will not be admitted. *Names of children and parents have been omitted or changed to protect child victims of sexual abuse. --> California's Addiction Rehab System Desperately Needs a Fix Details Beth Cone Kramer 20 June 2016 -Last Friday, ABC's 20/20 detailed the unfathomable saga of rehab mogul Chris Bathum, (photo above) subject of an April expose in LA Weekly written by Hillel Aron. Bathum's company, Community Recovery, Inc., took in over $30 million in revenue last year, despite his record as a convicted felon and, by his own admission, that he is neither a licensed drug counselor nor a therapist. Bathum doesn't even have a college degree and the only certification he holds is from a hypnotherapy institute. His legal troubles had been the subject of an LA Weekly cover story back in December. The founder and board chairman of a chain of over 20 sober living houses and outpatient clinics in California and Colorado has been the target of three lawsuits in early 2016 for allegations ranging from wrongful termination to sexual battery. A pair of former patients at Bathum's Community Recovery Los Angeles (CRLA) facilities alleges that Bathum had "isolated and targeted (the) plaintiffs and other women to prey on their addictions by using and supplying drugs around them, moving them to isolated hotel rooms and remote locations, encouraging them to use drugs with him, and sexually molesting them when they were high and/or incapable of consent." According to various reports, Bathum is the subject of over 50 lawsuits, including former client Amanda Jester who filed a suit that he had molested her in a sweat lodge during a meditation session. Another client, Erika Bruakis, claims he provided her with crystal meth and made sexual advances toward her. Dana Reardon, the most recent patient to file a suit, claims he provided her with meth and heroin, forcing her to watch him engage in sex acts with two of his other patients. 20/20 and LA Weekly both reported that Bathum overdosed on heroin and was taken by ambulance from a Malibu motel in December, which he denies. In fact, when questioned during the 20/20 report, he denied all charges and claimed his identity had been stolen. The Los Angeles County sheriff's department says he never filed a report. He is currently countering multiple women who have filed lawsuits against him for libel. Bathum's troubles didn't start at CRLA. Last July, one of his former patients, Julie Hluchota, died of an overdose. Hluchota had entered a Malibu rehab clinic, Seasons, where Bathum was the co-founder and the director. After spending 90 days in the program, she began to work at the facility and relapsed just two months later. Hluchota alleged that Bathum made unwanted sexual advances toward her, which is denies. Just how does a convicted felon without a degree or credentials open and run a chain of sober living facilities and rehab clinics, preying upon young women in the most dire of conditions? Kenneth Whoridaz Whitfield has a lot to say about it. The 46-year old military veteran has been in recovery since 1993 and has been sober for the past six years. He shares that he made some bad decisions and relapsed in 2008, serving time in County and as a result, awakened to what recovery really is and what it isn't. "People in the Inland Empire, San Bernardino, and other areas aren't as affluent," he says. "They might not have as many resources other than 12 step-programs. It was a real culture shock when I arrived in LA in May 2010. After I was incarcerated, I got clean and sober, thanks to the VA in West LA and Henry Waxman who was committed to staying on top of things to get veterans the best care possible," he shares. "My experience at the VA wasn't perfect but they did the best with limited resources and I'm back to being a productive member of society." Following his time at the VA, Whitfield got into the field of recovery, managing a sober living facility in Mar Vista and working in marketing for another facility. When his last contract was up, he says he "didn't like the direction the treatment world was going." The U.S. is the most addicted country in the world, he says, and the consumer of 90 percent of prescription drugs worldwide. As a result, the addiction treatment centers and rehab have become a multimillion dollar industry. "Until society looks at prescription and illegal drugs as drugs anyone can get addicted to, nothing will change," says Whitfield. He continues, warning, "Big names in rehab are just about making money. It's easier to get a license as a rehab owner in California than it is to get a contractor's license. If you have a felony record, you just have to write to the governor. Doctors who have had their medical licenses revoked can open clinics and rehab facilities. There's no process to make sure they are legit and they are given carte blanche to scam insurance companies." What can be done to change the broken system? Whitfield points to the Governor. "When it comes to this issue, he's dropped the ball. He needs to put his foot down and say if you're a sober living facility, you need to be non-profit," he advises. "The East Coast has far more regulations. In New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, they don't have this stuff going on. To open a treatment center there, you have to get a license like a hospital or mental health facility." If someone owns an outpatient treatment clinic, he or she should not be able to open a sober living facility and the facilities need to be licensed, he suggests. There should be some oversight and regulation to check up on non-licensed employees handing out medication, as well. Residential treatment centers must have doctors and nurses present to provide the level of care necessary. Substance abuse and addiction come at a tremendous cost to individuals, families, and society. As the need grows for rehab and sober living facilities, it's crucial that we don't allow unscrupulous entrepreneurs to take advantage of Californians in the most dire straits. California should follow the lead of other states that place more restrictions on who can open and operate facilities, as well as how the facilities operate. Nurses at Illinois hospital file complaint over recent 'boot camp' training Written by Kelly Gooch | June 21, 2016 0 inShare Nurses at Presence Saint Joseph Medical Center in Joliet, Ill., are alleging that a recent "boot camp" training was punitive and humiliating, The Herald-News reports. The Illinois Nurses Association, which represents the workers, said the emergency room training involved forcing nurses to drink water without access to restrooms, as well as nurses sitting on a bedpan in a patient bed for 30 minutes in a public hallway while wearing goggles and headphones to simulate poor vision and hearing, according to the report. The union claims the training was disciplinary after certain patient satisfaction scores. In response to the experience, the union filed a petition with the hospital contending that the training session violated scheduling provisions in the union contract, The Herald-News reports. "I think they're looking for better dialogue on these kinds of matters going forward," Chris Martin, spokesman with the INA, said, according to the report. In a statement provided to The Herald-News, hospital officials said nurses "are held in the highest esteem," and participants found the training "a positive and productive experience." The hospital said the training provided "new best practice insights" that the nurses are eager to implement. Mandatory treatment not effective at reducing drug use, violates human rights, researchers say Date: June 21, 2016 Source: Boston University Medical Center Summary: Clinician researchers assessed current global evidence and found that mandatory treatment for people with substance use disorders is not effective in reducing their drug use. S In an analysis recently published in BMJ, which coincided with the UN High Level Meeting on HIV in New York, Boston Medical Center (BMC) clinician researchers assessed current global evidence and found that mandatory treatment for people with substance use disorders is not effective in reducing their drug use. In addition, mandatory treatment, which is defined as treatment ordered, motivated or supervised under the criminal justice system, done without a patient's informed consent violates their human rights and does more harm than benefit to the patient. Bulat Idrisov, MD, MSc, and Karsten Lunze, MD, MPH, DrPH, from the Clinical Addiction Research and Education Unit at BMC and Boston University School of Medicine, in collaboration with researchers in Canada and Malaysia, assessed global data and found that countries often lack the capacity to treat substance use disorders. This happens because they are not able to offer the diagnostic and therapeutic modalities and providers trained in addiction medicine that are necessary for effective treatment. The authors argue that in order to reach successfully reduced substance use disorder rates, countries should consider implementing approaches that have been shown to be effective in rigorous scientific studies. These strategies include community-based opioid treatment, including methadone and buprenorphine. In addition, they suggest that offering harm-reduction programs like needle exchanges and providing education about overdose medications such as naloxone to people with substance use disorders, as well as to their friends and family members. "The evidence presented in this article provides additional argumentation supporting the position of all UN organizations that mandatory treatment settings do not represent a favorable or effective environment for the treatment of drug dependence," said Fabienne Hariga, MD, MPH, senior adviser to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime during the recent meeting in New York. "The United Nations therefore calls on States to transition from mandatory drug treatment and implement voluntary, evidence-informed and rights-based health and social services in the community." (Susan Walsh/Associated Press) By Emma Brown Education June 23 at 12:01 AM The Obama administration on Thursday released new guidance explaining what states and school districts must do to meet new legal obligations to students in foster care, who are often among the nation's most vulnerable children. For the first time, schools, districts and states must publicly report on the performance of children in foster care, a requirement that advocates hope will help shine a light on the need for more attention and help. Also for the first time, schools are legally bound to work with child welfare agencies to ensure that children in foster care can stay in their school if it's in their best interest, even if they move — a measure meant to provide stability for children who often otherwise lack it. If school district and child welfare agency officials decide that moving to a new school would be in a child's best interest, then the receiving school must allow immediate enrollment, even if the child cannot produce the required paperwork. [\[These are the faces of America's growing youth homeless population\]](#) The new provisions were written into the Every Student Succeeds Act, which replaced No Child Left Behind as the nation's main education law in December. They are meant to protect the approximately 270,000 children in foster care who are enrolled in U.S. public schools; foster children are more likely than their peers to be retained in a grade level and to drop out of high school. "For far too long, we as a country have failed so many of our most vulnerable students," Education Secretary John King Jr. told reporters Wednesday. "We cannot allow the students who need our attention the most to be treated unfairly under the law." The new guidance, released Thursday by the departments of Education and Health and Human Services, explains with more specificity how states and schools should live up to the law's provisions on children in foster care. local education Orlando Shooting Updates News and analysis on the deadliest mass shooting in U.S. history. post_newsletter348 follow-orlando true endOfArticle false Please provide a valid email address. And it clarifies that if an agreement cannot be reached, then the child welfare agency should have the final say. The guidance does not, however, clear up an important ambiguity in the law: who must pay for transportation to a child's original school if the child moves outside that school's attendance zone. [\[Obama signs new K-12 education law\]](#) The law requires that transportation be provided but does not say what should happen if a school district and a child welfare agency disagree over who should cover the bill. The Education Department has proposed regulations that would require the district to pay if negotiations over sharing the cost fail. The department is accepting public comment on those draft regulations, and officials said they would incorporate feedback as they write the final rule. The department also issued guidance Thursday outlining how states and school districts should solicit feedback from their communities as they figure out how to implement the Every Student Succeeds Act. The guidance is meant to ensure that everyone with an interest in education — including parents, teachers and members of historically underserved communities — have a chance to chime in. PDT June 24, 2016 170 1 Darren and Dawnyle Durham CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN GOOGLE+ PINTEREST A Washington County grand jury indicted two former Department of Human Services foster parents accused of abusing children and forcing them to ingest drugs. Dawnyle and Darren Durham were arrested June 9. They face charges including criminal mistreatment, delivery of a controlled substance to a minor and causing another person to ingest a controlled substance. Dawnyle Durham was also charged with possession of methamphetamine. The Durhams were DHS certified foster care providers from 2001-2013. The couple adopted four of the foster children prior to their certification being revoked in 2013. "There was yelling but they kept to themselves pretty much," said neighbor Donnie Long. Long and other neighbors aren't surprised that Dawnyle and Darren Durham are in jail. The couple's four adopted kids, ages 11-17, were taken away earlier this year. Court documents described horrific living conditions. The children said the Durhams' Forest Grove home was filled with drug use, from meth to prescription pills. Neighbors, took note. "We had some challenges in the neighborhood with some unsavory characters coming in at early hours and so contacted the police a couple of times," said Michelle Rydman, who lives behind the Durhams. The kids told investigators they found syringes inside their home, and that their mother Dawnyle hit them. The children described one instance where their mother used a belt and hit one of her daughters so hard "that one child was unable to stand." The children said one of the daughters was even forced to take percocet and do a urine test for her mother. In an interview with police, Dawnyle admitted to having her daughter to a urine test for her because she was using marijuana and would not be able to get any other prescriptions if it showed up in the test. When asked if she told her daughter to take Percocet, she said she could not recall. Another child said he had thought about killing himself, telling investigators "hell would be better than my life." Washington County detectives learned that Dawnyle pawned off a wheelchair belonging to one of the children, along with some video games, according to Sgt. Bob Ray with the Washington County Sheriff's Office. "The kids were sad all the time," said Long, whose children also played with the Durham's kids. Long said the kids appeared lonely and didn't spend much time outside. "They weren't allowed to play sports, no after school activities, things that kids like to do," said Long. "They were always very sweet and polite to us. They would say hi through the fence," said Rydman. The children also said they didn't get enough food and sometimes would have to steal food from their home. The kids said they were made to stay home and clean before DHS came to their house. "I hope the state helps these kids and ... doesn't let this happen again," Long said. Washington County investigators couldn't go into many details, but said the case is complex. "They were foster parents from 2001-2013 so we have a 12 year time span there. During that time span they were foster parents for more than 50 children," said Ray. Ray said they've contacted half of the kids so far and are looking for other possible victims. "We really don't know how far reaching it may be," he said. DHS said they've asked for a review of the case because abuse in foster care continues to be an issue in the child welfare program. Both parents are still in jail. Bail for each of them is at more than $100,000. In court documents, Dawnyle denied the allegations. She said the syringes weren't hers and that they belonged to a homeless couple she allowed to stay in the family's guest house. She said her kids had plenty of food and she did not abuse her kids. Though she told an officer she "is not a bad mother but she is not proud of what she's done." According to court documents, Dawnyle's mother said her daughter's son was murdered 16 years ago and she has also been going downhill ever since her brother died three years ago. She also said Dawnyle struggles with mental health issues. Washington County detectives are asking anyone with information about unreported crimes by the Durhams to call 503-846-2500. City Files Lawsuits Against Two Alcohol and Drug Treatment Facilities by Dana Point Times on June 23, 2016 in EYE ON DP, News Headlines Leave a comment By Kristina Pritchett On Wednesday, the city filed two lawsuits against two properties that the city says are alcohol or drug abuse treatment facilities. Both lawsuits were filed with the Superior Court in Orange County, calling the properties public nuisances and stating they do not have required state license. On Tuesday night during the City Council's closed session, Council members approved for the city attorney to file the two lawsuits against Capo By the Sea and Sobertec LLC. Capo By the Sea is an exclusive drug addiction and alcohol rehab center that offers customized recovery programs. Along with Capo by the Sea, John T. Kahal is also named as the defendant. The city states in the lawsuit against Capo by the Sea that the corporation has been operating a treatment facility at the property. In the lawsuit against Sobertec LLC, the defendants are listed as Sovereign Health Group, Sober Network Properties, Edward Smilde and Grace Smilde. In both lawsuits, the City also states the properties are located in city zoning areas that do not permit the use of a treatment facility. "Alcoholism or drug abuse recovery or treatment facilities are prohibited in certain zones and are allowed in other zones within the city with the issuance of a conditional use permit," the lawsuit states and adds that the location of Sobertec is not permitted in the zone in which it resides. The lawsuits state "any facility that provides non-medical alcoholism or drug abuse recovery, treatment, or detoxification services to adults must obtain a license from the California Department of Alcohol and Drug Programs. Facilities licensed by the Department must comply with the requirements proscribed by state laws." According to the lawsuits, some facilities that are known as "sober living homes" do not need to be licensed if they do not provide any care or supervision of the residents. However, if the home serves seven or more clients and provides "alcoholism or drug abuse recovery or treatment service[s]," they must obtain a license from the state. The City believes that both of the properties are being used as a facility which provides recovery or treatment services to seven or more paying clients, who are either onsite or using the property as a residential component of a treatment facility. The city also believes the properties do not have the state-issued license. In the lawsuit against Sobertec, the city states they believe "the defendants are operating a Drug Abuse recovery or treatment facility that provides treatment services to seven or more clients in violation of state law, because it failed to obtain the necessary state-issued license, and in violation of the city's zoning code, because such uses are prohibited in the zoning district in which the treatment facility is located." During the Tuesday night meeting, City Attorney Patrick Munoz said the Council authorized for code enforcement activity against one particular licensed facility in the city. "We have reason to believe they're not complying with their licensing requirements," Munoz said on Tuesday. Munoz said the city cannot and will not discriminate, or take any action, against disabled persons. But, they can take action to ensure licensing requirements are met. They can take action to enforce laws that apply to all residences, and if the city has a legitimate reason to believe that licensing laws are being violated. Munoz said the city staff has been keeping watch on efforts made by other cities "to address the concerns that sober living home concentrations detract from the character of the community, as it is a current issue of statewide concern." Munoz said the city has received multiple emails and phone calls related to several homes and facilities in towns, and have been investigating their compliance with city and state regulations. The city instructed staff to schedule a study session to be able to explain more details during a public forum. Foster Parents Under Investigation For Abuse By Genevieve Reaume Jun. 26, 2016 Video Photos PORTLAND, Ore. -- Certified foster parents for dozens of children are now facing several charges for abusing their four adopted children. This is all according to court documents. One foster father, Darren Durham's record includes arrests for drugs, assault and harassment. Despite his record, DHS placed 54 children in his care from 2001 to 2013. In 2013, his certification was revoked, but by then he had adopted four children. One of the kids told investigators that she was beaten so badly she could barely stand. Detectives are now looking for more victims. - See more at: <http://www.kdrv.com/news/Foster-Parents-Under-Investigation-For-Abuse.html#sthash.VaUTBgbz.dpuf>

Prison officials fail to review rape allegations Catie Edmondson, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel 2:19 p.m. CDT June 26, 2016 Federal authorities are investigating a range of potential crimes at Lincoln Hills School for Boys, including second-degree sexual assault, physical child abuse, child neglect, abuse of prisoners, and intimidation of victims and witnesses. (Photo: Mark Hoffman) - Officials at a troubled youth prison failed to properly oversee more than two dozen rape and sexual assault investigations as required by federal law, with one prison leader admitting to ignorance of even basic details about the facility's system to root out abuse. The security director at Lincoln Hills School for Boys acknowledged to state investigators that he had failed over 7½ months to review any investigations of sexual abuse and had met just once with the staff tasked with probing allegations of assault, according to documents released to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel under the state's open records law. That official, Rick Peterson, was demoted in February after an investigation showed he was unable to correctly identify who on his staff was trained to investigate sexual assault allegations, the records show. With more than 30 internal sexual assault investigations open at the prison 30 miles north of Wausau, the facility's handling of abuse claims remains as critical as ever. "There are clear signals the institution isn't taking allegations seriously. They should be acting immediately (on reports of assault)," said Amy Fetting, the associate director for the Prison Project at the American Civil Liberties Union. "When you don't have leadership and supervisors taking responsibility for what's happening, there's no way they're going to effectively prevent abuse from happening. It sends a signal to other people, both staff and those in custody, that nothing is going to happen, that (assault) is not serious." Fetting, senior legal counsel for a group that frequently sues state governments, said that any facility that fails to properly investigate abuse "is exposing itself to serious litigation liability." The Federal Bureau of Investigation is probing alleged abuses at the prison, including sexual assault, abuse of prisoners and destruction of public records. The failure to review sexual abuse investigations under a key federal law could play a role in that probe or a separate U.S. Department of Justice investigation into whether the prison violated inmates' civil rights. A summary of the internal investigation of Peterson includes findings in keeping with critics' claims that allegations of sexual abuse are met with indifferent or botched responses. After he failed to provide oversight of investigations of sexual abuse under the federal Prison Rape Elimination Act, Peterson was demoted from security director to a supervisory position, and his pay was cut from about $76,000 to about $68,000 a year. A new security director — the No. 3 post at the facility — has not yet been hired. The Department of Corrections is currently developing a database that "will significantly enhance tracking and reporting of (sexual assault) allegations and investigations," according to agency spokesperson Tristan Cook. According to the investigation report, Peterson told Department of Corrections investigators that the prison did not track ongoing investigations of rape and sexual assault. He said that no such mechanism was in place because the longtime security director before him, Bruce Sunde, also failed to track such investigations. Sunde, who retired last year, declined to be interviewed for this story and Peterson didn't respond to a request for comment. Peterson acknowledged to DOC investigators that someone needed to review investigations, but said he was unable to because "there were lots of stuff going on" at the prison and he was "busy putting out fires and pulled in different directions." Despite what Peterson told investigators, Cook contended there is a tracking system for abuse allegations at Lincoln Hills and its sister facility on its campus, Copper Lake School for Girls. "DOC strongly disputes any suggestion that (sexual assault) investigations at (the youth prisons) are not being tracked, as both institutions and DOC's PREA unit track PREA investigations," Cook said in a statement, using an abbreviation for the Prison Rape Elimination Act. When asked why the prison's security director and investigator as well as DOC investigators were unaware of such a tracking mechanism, Cook repeated that "allegations were being reported and routed for investigation, investigations were being assigned, investigations were being completed, and investigation information was being provided to the PREA unit for record-keeping purposes." The lack of oversight from correctional leaders is underscored in one instance described in the report. DOC investigators found that a staffer at the prison tasked with looking into allegations of assault took it upon himself to review and approve his own report on the subject. Investigators are not vested with that authority — they are supposed to present their findings for review to their supervisor. "That should never happen in a chain of command," the ACLU's Fetting said. "There needs to be oversight to guard against bias and, frankly, sloppiness in the investigation. The fact that they're not paying attention is a big problem." Though Peterson admitted he had not reviewed any investigations of assault at the prison, he told investigators he was unaware that reports were being finalized without his oversight. In violation of the standards established by federal law, the facility also failed to conduct formal sexual abuse incident reviews following each investigation of sexual abuse and did not annually review sexual assault data, a federal audit found in February. Those two practices are intended to compel senior management to consider whether the investigations and data indicate a need to change policy or practice to better prevent, detect or respond to sexual assault. Staff at Lincoln Hills were given 180 days to meet those standards. The auditor found that after her initial visit, the facility compiled a report of aggregate sexual assault data and began holding incident reviews. Even though Lincoln Hills worked to comply with those basic federal standards, multiple reports of failing to properly respond to allegations of sexual abuse open the state up to serious risk of litigation, according to Brenda Smith. Smith, a professor at the Washington College of Law at American University, served on the National Prison Rape Elimination Commission from 2004 to 2009. "To the extent you don't take care of these things and there's a pattern of not following up on complaints, it puts the agency and the state in a place of peril with regard to liability," Smith said. "This is something that the governor's office should be looking at. There should be oversight not just from the federal level but local and state oversight." Gov. Scott Walker has defended or not commented on the way his administration responded to a year of warnings from county officials and judges about assaults at the prison. When asked if Walker was aware that staff at Lincoln Hills failed to track or oversee investigations of rape and sexual assault at the facility and whether he believed his office had appropriately responded to problems at the youth prison, spokesman Tom Evenson said that Corrections Secretary Jon Litscher "has Governor Walker's full support in addressing agency issues and instituting reforms." Last month in his first interview since returning to the Corrections Department after heading it from 1999 to 2003, Litscher told the Journal Sentinel that he believes the agency is getting past problems at the youth prison. The newly released records are the latest to document a pattern of what one judge four years ago described as "inexcusable" responses to sexual assault and inmate safety at the Northwoods facility. The Journal Sentinel reported in February that Racine County officials pulled their youth offenders from Lincoln Hills after the institution botched its response to the 2012 sexual assault of an inmate. Staff waited to take the victim to the hospital until after a basketball game finished and failed to inform law enforcement of the assault. It has also been reported that the facility has no central mechanism for tracking assaults, fights and other incidents. Many key reports are handwritten. When a female worker was groped by an inmate last fall, corrections officials initially did little in response, and instead subjected her to a seven-week probe into whether she invited the touching. Peterson, the security director, told a Lincoln County detective that he was considering formally referring the assault to law enforcement but did not provide additional paperwork for months, according to the Sheriff's Department. A former supervisor at Lincoln Hills reported that corrections officials mishandled a case of sexual assault when they dropped charges against a juvenile inmate accused of molesting his roommate after a witness claimed the act was consensual. Report: More Sex Abuse at Understaffed Juvenile Facilities By rebecca boone, associated press BOISE, Idaho — Jun 29, 2016, 7:45 PM ET 22 Shares Email Star 22 Shares Email A new report from the U.S. Department of Justice shows that youths are sexually abused more frequently in juvenile detention centers that are understaffed, have more gang violence and more offender complaints. The report, released Tuesday by the department's Bureau of Justice Statistics, examined the impact juvenile facilities have on sex abuse rates as well as the risk factors for victims. The work was intended in part to measure how effective federal rules designed to stop sex abuse behind bars actually are at reducing victimization inside youth detention centers. The study found that lower rates of sexual victimization were reported in facilities with higher staffing levels, less violence and fewer overall complaints. Lovisa Stannow, the executive director of prisoner advocacy group Just Detention International, said the findings are encouraging and exasperating. "They are encouraging because they confirm that sexual abuse is a problem that strong youth detention leaders can solve, if they want to, and exasperating because so many leaders continue to insist, against all evidence, that sexual violence is outside of their control," Stannow said in a statement released Wednesday. Congress passed the Prison Rape Elimination Act in 2003, and experts across the country worked over the next decade to create rules designed to stamp out rape behind bars. All states were supposed to be fully compliant with PREA in 2014, but some, such as Idaho, initially refused to meet the standards. Idaho officials later reversed course, and in 2015 announced that three state juvenile detention centers passed audits showing they were compliant with PREA standards. The Idaho Department of Juvenile Corrections is currently facing several lawsuits from nearly a dozen current and former juveniles who say they were sexually abused by staffers while at a detention center in Nampa. Compliance with many of the standards spelled out in the Prison Rape Elimination Act were associated with lower rates of staff sexual misconduct, the study found. Youth who have previously been sexually assaulted are more likely to be assaulted in detention, the study found, as were kids who identified themselves as lesbian, gay or bisexual. Males and black youth were much more likely to be victims of sexual abuse by staff members. The study included mostly state-owned facilities for youth being held in custody, including residential treatment centers, detention centers, training schools, group homes, boot camp or farm programs and youth homeless shelters. The highest rates of youth-on-youth sexual assault were found in facilities that only housed females, and male-only facilities tended to have higher rates of staff sexual misconduct. Richard Wexler: Family First Act Institutionalizes Institutions, Sets Up Prevention to Fail by Richard Wexler June 30, 2016 | Guest Writer Now that there finally is a bill, it is clear who has the greatest reason to oppose the so-called Family First Prevention Services Act: environmentalists. That's because of how many forests will be destroyed to provide the paper for all the new plans, reports and assorted other documents that the bill mandates as a substitute for real change. In some respects, discussed below, the bill is an improvement over previous versions, and I'm sure those who worked so hard to craft this legislation meant well. But mostly, the Family First Act proposes to solve the problems of child welfare by throwing paperwork at them. Provide a plan for this, a certification for that, and a report on something else, and America's foster-care-industrial complex can keep doing what it's been doing for more than a century: failing vulnerable children. The bill also enshrines in law the double standard that pervades American child welfare: services to keep families together must meet tests that are almost impossibly high before being deemed "evidence-based." But to keep right on using the worst form of care, group homes and institutions, no evidence is required; just more paperwork. So it's no wonder most of the foster-care-industrial complex favors the bill, and those who don't want to make it even weaker. One major supporter of the bill is the Alliance for Strong Families and Communities, a group that has little to do with either one. Rather, it is a trade association made up largely of private agencies that oversee foster homes and run group homes and institutions. These agencies typically are paid for each day they hold a child in foster care. They know a good deal when they see one. Institutionalizing Institutionalization In the earliest stages of developing what would become the Families First Act, there was an idea for dealing with the misuse and overuse of institutions that was simple and smart: Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) suggested simply refusing to fund such placements for any child under age 13. Other smart proposals over the years have included reducing federal aid for institutionalization month by month – the longer the placement the fewer the dollars. But once the foster-care-industrial complex got through with it, what emerged was a muddled mess. If the bill becomes law, the federal government would stop reimbursing states for part of the cost of group home and institutional placement after two weeks. But it creates a giant loophole: funding would continue for something called a "Qualified Residential Treatment Program." What does it take to become a Q RTP? Very little: Write lots and lots of plans filled with appropriate buzzwords. (Drop the word "trauma-informed" into every third paragraph and you should be fine.) Hire nurses during working hours and have them on call the rest of the time. Get a rubber-stamp seal-of-approval from an accrediting agency. I say rubber-stamp because one of the groups a Q RTP can choose is the so-called "Council on Accreditation." COA is a creation of another agency trade association, the Child Welfare League of America. Its "site visits" are announced well in advance and "accreditors" interview people who can be hand-picked by the agency under examination. Everything else is based on the agency's paperwork. COA doesn't accredit agencies, it accredits file cabinets. Perhaps that's why, in the 1990s, COA accredited a private agency in Ohio in which, the Dayton Daily News found, children lived in squalid group homes and the agency director had a conviction for contributing to the delinquency of a minor. More recently, COA accredited this agency. Take these simple steps and voila! That crudely old group home is now a "Qualified Residential Treatment Program!" Similarly, the Family First Act goes on for paragraphs about how an independent "qualified individual" will determine if a child needs to be institutionalized; unless, that is, the public child welfare agency gives its solemn word that someone associated with the institution itself can do the evaluation and still be objective. Then, the independence requirement can be "waived" by the Department of Health and Human Services. In short, the Family First Act institutionalizes the process of institutionalization. Perhaps that's why the Congressional Budget Office estimates that, were it to become law, the Family First Act would barely reduce the proportion of institutionalized foster children on any given day. It would decline from the current 14 percent to 11 percent, over ten years. Yet even these minimal requirements apparently are too onerous for some providers of institutional care and their acolytes in government. Whatever Happened to "Evidence-Based"? What is missing in these requirements for becoming a "Qualified Residential Treatment Program" is anything forcing the "providers" to prove that what they provide actually helps children. There's a reason for that, namely a review of the scholarly literature by the office of the U.S. Surgeon General found only "weak evidence" for the success of residential treatment. A second review, by the University of North Carolina, found "when community-based services are available, they provide outcomes that are equivalent, at least [to residential treatment]." Still another study, of children institutionalized for mental health problems, found that seven years after discharge from residential treatment, 75 percent of the children were back in the only settings they could understand: institutions. They were in psychiatric centers or jails. Even former CWLA President Shay Bilchik admitted there is a lack of "good research" showing residential treatment's effectiveness and "we find it hard to demonstrate success..." (though he claimed this was only because foundations don't want to fund the research and children aren't institutionalized soon enough.) Some of those who think even the minimal restrictions in the Family First Act go too far don't even pretend that institutionalization is good for children. Rather, they claim there's no alternative because they can't recruit enough foster homes. But, as I've noted before, the real problem is not too few foster parents, it's too many foster children. For example, Los Angeles seems to be the epicenter of the whining about the congregate care restrictions. But Los Angeles takes away children at triple the rate of Chicago, even when rates of child poverty are factored in. Yet it's Illinois where independent court-appointed monitors have found that reforms emphasizing family preservation improved child safety. No Real Help for Prevention That brings me to the second set of failings in the bill: the increased support for prevention is minimal and largely misdirected. For starters, while residential treatment programs need provide no evidence at all of effectiveness to be funded, 50 percent of all new prevention spending under the bill would have to go to programs that meet a standard, created for clinical trials in medicine, so high that almost nothing qualifies. (This is an improvement from previous drafts, where it was 100 percent.) Lisbeth Schorr, senior fellow at the Center for the Study of Social Policy, has several excellent articles on why this is an unwise approach in human services. And in child welfare, there is the additional problem of a profound bias among many of the "scholars." Even worse, the kinds of programs that can be funded are limited to three categories, two of which, mental health and parenting skills, are precisely the "public health approach" that has failed for more than a century. So after the reams of new paperwork required under this section are filed and it turns out that this failed approach failed again, it will become an excuse for the advocates of traumatizing children with needless foster care to run back to Congress and demand even more money to warehouse even more children in foster care. This bill doesn't aid alternatives; it sets them up to fail. In contrast, even though study after study finds that 30 percent of America's foster children could be home right now if their families simply had decent housing, housing aid was eliminated from the bill early on. There is not even funding for the kinds of simple, sensible and very inexpensive approaches advocated by Joanne Samuel Goldblum in the Chronicle last month. So again, it's no wonder the CBO thinks the new spending on prevention will be a drop in the bucket – an average of $130 million per year. Even with that new funding, the federal government still would spend vastly more on tearing families apart than on trying to keep them together. What's Good About the Bill There is one thing the bill gets right: the third category of funds for which states could get reimbursement under the Families First Act is drug treatment. That almost certainly got into the bill, and probably has appeal to most members of Congress, because the latest "drug plague" – opioid addiction – has a whiter, more affluent face than the drug plagues that preceded it. The other argument for the bill is that it's better than nothing, and a floor on which one can build in the future. But it's not better than the waivers available to states now, which allow them to spend a lot more money on a much wider variety of alternatives to foster care. The waiver process, which is set to expire in 2019, also includes a vital incentive that Family First Act lacks: it caps the giant open-ended entitlement to foster-care funding. This bill is more likely to be a ceiling than a floor. Once the bill becomes law, all the pressure for real reform would go away, and the ceiling will only get lower. Because from here, the bill can only get worse. Having come so far, the members of Congress behind this bill are likely to appease those who want to make the congregate-care restrictions even weaker, rather than see the whole thing fall apart. Better Alternatives I've written elsewhere about the best long-term alternative: end the foster-care entitlement and turn it into grants indexed to inflation that states can use for foster care and for better alternatives. Short term, Congress should Salvage the one part of the Family First Act everyone seems to agree on and provide $130 million per year in additional funding for drug treatment – targeted toward families at risk of losing their children to foster care. Restore the federal government's authority to grant child welfare waivers, which has expired, with current waivers scheduled to end in 2019. As for whether we ever can really get major reform, there is one hope: the lookback. That's the clumsy, bureaucratic detail that has the effect of reducing the number of children eligible for federal foster-care assistance by a tiny amount each year. If nothing at all is done, the federal government will be out of the foster-care funding business in about half a century or so. The longer this persists, the greater the pressure on the foster-care-industrial complex to accept real reform, not a pale imitation like the Family First Act. New York is plagued by diploma-mill high schools By Post Editorial Board June 30, 2016 | 8:59pm Modal Trigger Photo: Getty Images A landmark report by StudentsFirstNY just tore the mask off the supposed "success" of many city high schools: They're graduating kids without actually teaching them. Mayor de Blasio touts a 70 percent graduation rate as proof his policies are working. Problem is, half the grads aren't ready for college (or a career in the workforce). CUNY deemed only 35 percent of New York City high-school graduates college-ready last year. And some schools seem to specialize in awarding worthless diplomas to young men and women. The SFNY report flagged 65 schools with above-average graduation — but college/career-readiness rates 50 points lower. The HS for Medical Professions boasts that 95 percent of students graduate — yet only 15 percent are college-ready. The UFT Charter School sports a 78 percent graduation rate, but only 11 percent are college-ready. Chancellor Carmen Fariña just spoke at the Academy for Young Writers, whose graduation rate is 75 percent, yet with a college-readiness rate of just 6 percent. In short, the problem goes far beyond the grade-fixing and bogus credit-recovery programs The Post has exposed in recent years. It's a citywide plague of diploma mills — many of which face no pressure to improve. Of the 10 high schools with the city's worst college-readiness rates, only two are in de Blasio's Renewal program for failing schools. CUNY Chancellor James Miliken calls the lack of college readiness his system's top challenge. It's a nightmare for the kids, too: They have to waste their first year (or more) in college on catch-up classes. We don't blame de Blasio or Fariña or even the United Federation of Teachers for all the system's failings. No, we blame them for their fight against reform, and all their lies and spin as they pretend everything's just fine. Care worker at Northland Recovery Center abused two teens, DHS finds Report finds procedures are adequate but were not followed. By Brandon Stahl Star Tribune July 1, 2016 — 8:09pm Melanie Lynn Peterson A care worker at a northern Minnesota drug treatment center for juveniles helped two teen residents escape to get drugs, got high with them while at the facility, and had sex with them more than two dozen times, according to court and state records. The staff member, Melanie Lynn Peterson, 30, who court records say "was responsible for the care and well-being of juveniles housed at the facility," pleaded guilty in June to three counts of criminal sexual conduct and three controlled substance crimes. On Friday, the Minnesota Department of Human Services found Peterson responsible for sexual abuse of the two minors while she worked at the Northland Recovery Center's Adolescent Unit in Grand Rapids. Peterson's relationship with the two teens began sometime in March, according to court and DHS records. One of the boys, who was 15, had been at Northland Recovery since the start of the year. The teen told police Peterson would often help him leave the unit and not trigger the alarms so he could find drugs. He said they snorted pills and had sex about 20 times in the facility and four times at her home. When confronted, Peterson admitted to police that she used drugs with one of the teens and had sex with him. The other boy was 17 and considered a "smart and tenacious person" diagnosed with substance abuse disorders and considered vulnerable to neglect and abuse, according to the DHS report. He said Peterson helped him escape from Northland Recovery, that Peterson had sex with him at least twice in the facility and was "high for a week" from the drugs she gave him. The teen told DHS investigators that he suspected Peterson tampered with their drug tests because "none of us were getting in trouble." A staff member at Northland Recovery referred all questions to the Director of Services, Colleen MacKay, who was on vacation Friday. According to the DHS report, following an internal review Northland Recovery "determined that policies and procedures were adequate but not followed," and that "the incidents were not similar to past incidents." Still, Northland Recovery said staff members were trained on boundaries and that surveillance cameras would be "pursued." Peterson is scheduled to be sentenced at the end of the month. This is the second time in two months DHS has found a juvenile was sexually abused at a child residential center. In May, the agency determined that a staff member of a Minnetonka facility for troubled teenage girls raped a 14-year-old resident. That person was not charged. Texas Accused of Ignoring Mentally Disabled in Nursing Homes By betsy blaney, associated press LUBBOCK, Texas — Jul 3, 2016, 2:21 PM ET 0 Shares Email Star 0 Shares Email It took more than 40 years for Leonard Barefield to finally get to choose where he lived. The intellectually-disabled Texas native moved to a group home in Lubbock in September after he had first lived in near slavery conditions for more than three decades in a squalid house in Iowa and worked at a turkey processing plant there for 41 cents an hour. After being freed by social workers from that situation, he was sent in 2008 to a nursing home in Midland, Texas. His plight is not uncommon in Texas, where people with such disabilities are routinely warehoused in nursing homes, according to a lawsuit brought by Barefield and other disabled people. Advocates for the intellectually-disabled — a condition affecting reasoning and learning — say Texas is violating the Americans with Disabilities Act and other federal laws by denying services that could allow more than 4,000 people to live in the community. The state denies it is exploiting the disabled, saying it is committed to providing them with the highest quality of services. The 71-year-old Barefield has a developmental disability, suffers from depression and other mental health and medical conditions, and has high blood pressure, court records show. He wears a hearing aid and his speech is significantly impaired. But he can read, write and drive a truck. Barefield lives with three other intellectually disabled men in a well-maintained and spacious home. "It's better here," he said, nodding his head emphatically. Barefield leaves the home several days a week for a day center where he can play games and work on small projects. Even though he was exploited for decades, the outcome of Barefield's case is better than some. Andrea Padron, who suffered a severe head injury in a car accident when she was 10, died in 2013 after getting an inaccurate evaluation to determine the care she needed in a nursing home, court documents show. Padron's mother put her in a nursing home when she could no longer afford to care for her. Her mother then was deployed to the Iraq war with the military. The services promised for Padron were not provided during the mother's absence. When her mother returned to Texas, Padron couldn't even sit in her wheelchair. Padron was left to lie in bed for about 165 hours a week — without specialized services, including physical therapies. She eventually was unable to straighten her wrists, ankles, shoulders, legs or hips and developed a spine deformity, court records show. She was 29 when she died. The lawsuit against the state by Barefield and the other disabled patients was filed in 2010 and has crawled through the legal system. The federal Department of Justice joined the suit on the side of the disabled in 2012. In 2013, the state and lawyers for the disabled reached an "interim settlement agreement" that in part called for Texas to expand community services and create a service team for each disabled person. In return the suit was put aside for two years. But without explanation, the agreement was ended in 2015. Neither side will talk about why this happened because they say confidentiality rules prevent comment. The lawsuit has been reactivated. A federal judge in San Antonio ruled in May that the case could go ahead and granted class-action status to include more than 4,000 intellectually-disabled people in nursing homes. Barefield and the others aren't asking for any money in compensation. "All we're asking the state to do is comply with the (federal) law," said Robert Velevis, an attorney for the disabled clients. State aging and disability department spokeswoman Cecilia Cavuto declined to comment on the case but said the state is "committed to ensuring Texas nursing home residents, including those who have intellectual and developmental disabilities, receive the highest quality services." She said Texas care providers do evaluations for each person entering a nursing home to determine what specialized services might be needed and whether a resident wants to transition into a community-based setting. Lawyers for the disabled say the state excludes them from "any meaningful access" to Texas's system of community-based services needed to be able to live in the community. Lenwood Krause, whose 36-year-old son has a condition related to a developmental disability from a traumatic brain injury, said the state has mishandled the care of his son for years. "I can't exactly express the sentiments I feel about them," the 72-year-old said. "It's that bad." Texas was ranked in the bottom one third of states for the comprehensiveness of evaluations conducted on intellectually-disabled patients, according to a federal report by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services last year. The victim's brother also made a hotline call to state investigators. Scottie, 25, lives at the Preferred Family Healthcare Kansas City's south location off of James A. Reed Road. Skillman said a staff member called his mother to report that another employee not only hit Scottie with a belt, but admitted to it. He said overnight staff took photos of Scottie's injuries, sent them to his mother and filed a police report. "I was devastated. Scottie can't fend for himself. Not only that but he can't tell anybody he got hurt. He just doesn't have that communication," Skillman said. Scottie's brother said the company fired the employee after calling him to ask about the marks discovered by overnight staff. "It's kind of chilling to think when the manager called him and talked to him about it, I got the feeling he was very nonchalant about it," Skillman said. Scottie was still at the hospital Monday night where doctors examined him. The Department of Mental Health is investigating. Sierra Tucson fined over deficiencies in psychiatric care By Stephanie Innes Arizona Daily Star Stephanie Innes Updated Jul 5, 2016 (1) prev next The local rehab center Sierra Tucson has agreed to pay a state fine of $4,000 for failures in caring for its most seriously ill psychiatric patients. In its investigation, the state found that Sierra Tucson had repeat and ongoing deficiencies with the services provided in its acute psychiatric unit. The deficiencies "posed a high potential risk to the health and safety of patients," a state survey says. The facility holds two state licenses — a medical license for its 15-bed psychiatric unit and a residential facility license for its lower-level, 124-bed residential treatment center. The for-profit center, owned by Tennessee-based behavioral health giant Acadia Healthcare, has paid prior fines to the Arizona Department of Health Services for violating its own policies. It is also the defendant in two pending wrongful death lawsuits involving patients. In agreeing to pay the latest fine, Sierra Tucson's executive director, William D. Anderson, signed an enforcement agreement with the state, acknowledging that the facility is subject to frequent state monitoring visits and that further violations could result in further action, including losing its license. As of now, the facility is in compliance with all state rules and regulations, Arizona health officials say. In a statement to the Star on Friday, Anderson said the safety and well-being of its residents is Sierra Tucson's "utmost priority." Anderson also said his facility has a good working relationship with the Arizona Department of Health Services. "We are very proud of the care we provide and the thousands of lives that we have improved and saved because of the treatment received at Sierra Tucson," the statement says. "All of our clinicians and staff are committed to our patients and continuously work towards providing higher quality, clinical care in accordance with Arizona Department of Health Services standards." The latest civil penalty was determined after a state investigation conducted in January. The facility paid the fine May 9, state documents show. Five Sierra Tucson patients have died since 2011, all of them men. Autopsy reports concluded that three of them died of suicide. Autopsies on the other two — a man who died of drug toxicity and another whose body was discovered two weeks after he disappeared from the facility — were inconclusive. The facility helps patients with addictions, mood disorders, chronic pain, eating disorders and trauma through its "Sierra Model" of integrating therapies such as massage, yoga and acupuncture with traditional psychiatry. Sierra Tucson, on 160 acres north of Tucson, has earned a reputation as "rehab to the stars." The cost to patients starts at more than $1,000 per day. Since not all insurers cover it, many families must pay out of their own pockets. The state's findings about Sierra Tucson's care for patients, outlined in its Jan. 6 survey and supporting documents: Failed to ensure a patient with multiple medical problems, including a history of head injuries, had a physical examination within 48 hours of admission. This posed a "high risk" that the patient's medical needs would not be met, the state report says. Failed its own policy on patient rights by threatening a patient with law enforcement if she did not follow a registered nurse's instructions to be discharged and enter a transport vehicle. Failed to ensure a patient with anorexia nervosa was appropriately discharged from acute psychiatric care to a lower level of care. Failed to complete a medical discharge summary for three patients who left treatment against medical advice. Intake and meals for a severely anorexic patient were not recorded, and Sierra Tucson did not ensure a registered nurse assessed and directed the patient's care. Did not ensure a registered nurse completed an updated assessment for a patient who was readmitted to Sierra Tucson's psychiatric unit after transfer to an outside hospital. A patient was discharged and sent to an airport with no money and no identification. Sierra Tucson's lower-level residential facility was on a provisional license, with stepped-up monitoring by the state, from June 10 through Oct. 31 of 2015 after state officials found it had not been following its own policies on keeping track of patients' whereabouts. The state could have decided not to license Sierra Tucson at the end of the provisional period. Surveyors from the state ultimately determined there were enough improvements to restore the license. As part of restoring its license in October, Sierra Tucson had to pay the state $35,000 in civil penalties — $27,000 related to an investigation into the Aug. 27, 2015, patient suicide of a 59-year-old California man, plus $7,500 following an investigation into the Jan. 23, 2015, suicide of 55-year-old Richard Lecce, a Pennsylvania man whose family has since sued the facility for wrongful death. Sierra Tucson at the time also agreed to some new rules, including excluding certain patients from admission — those with a current or active diagnosis of schizophrenia; a current or active diagnosis of dementia; five suicide attempts in a lifetime; three attempts in the previous 12 months; or an attempt within 72 hours of the requested admission date. The facility has had to pay other, smaller fines to the state, including $1,000 for transferring Lecce from one of the high-level psychiatric beds to the lower-level residential facility. Lecce had been assigned one-on-one observation by a staff member while in the acute high-level psychiatric unit. When he was transferred to lower-level care, the one-on-one monitoring stopped, though there was no note in his record to discontinue it, a state report says. The other wrongful death lawsuit against Sierra Tucson was filed by the mother of a 20-year-old East Coast man who was at the facility for drug rehabilitation. He was found unresponsive at 8:45 a.m. on April 13, 2014, and died two days later. An autopsy report said he died from drug toxicity and that it was unclear whether the death was intentional or accidental. A 2014 state report into the young man's death found problems with the facility's pharmacy services, and found that staff members did not adequately check on his vital signs or follow the facility's suicide assessment protocol. The state report did not offer any clues as to how the 5-foot-8, 162-pound man acquired a toxic level of drugs in his system while in treatment. On Twitter: @stephanieinnes Sierra Tucson history Sierra Tucson was founded in 1983 by recovering cocaine addict William O'Donnell Jr. at the former Brave Bull Guest Ranch. The center has had a reputation as a rehab center to the stars, with reports of celebrity patients. Most patients are in their late 30s and early 40s. A majority of patients self-pay at a cost of about $1,300 per day or about $40,000 per month. In 2002, Sierra Tucson went from a publicly traded company to a private concern in an $82.5 million deal that consolidated ownership of Sierra Tucson and the Miraval, Life in Balance health resort under one company, NextHealth Inc. Sierra Tucson was sold to California-based CRC Health Group in 2005 for $130 million. The following year, CRC Health Group was purchased for $723 million by Boston-based Bain Capital Partners. In October 2014, Acadia bought CRC Health Group from private equity firm Bain Capital for $1.2 billion, according to Becker's Hospital CFO Report. Publicly traded Acadia has inpatient behavioral health facilities in the United States, England and Puerto Rico. In 2015 O'Donnell's younger brother, Jack O'Donnell, co-founded Sabino Recovery, a residential facility 15 miles northeast of Tucson that specializes in treating trauma as the core cause of drug addiction and other problems. Between 2002 and 2005, the younger O'Donnell served as the CEO of NextHealth Inc., the company that once owned Sierra Tucson. Statement from Sierra Tucson The safety and well-being of our residents is our utmost priority. As part of our continuous efforts to improve patient care, we conduct reviews of all facility policies and procedures and implement measures designed to improve patient safety in our residential programs. Sierra Tucson has a good relationship with the Arizona Department of Health Services and we continually work in partnership with this organization to understand guidelines for any changes with state rules and policies. Additionally, we implement extensive employee training on patient monitoring, transitioning communications and additional patient safety measures. Sierra Tucson has a longstanding legacy of clinical excellence and care for the past 32 years, resulting in recovery for thousands of people struggling with substance use disorders, trauma-related issues, eating disorders, chronic pain and mood and anxiety disorders. We are very proud of the care we provide and the thousands of lives that we have improved and

saved because of the treatment received at Sierra Tucson. All of our clinicians and staff are committed to our patients and continuously work towards providing higher quality, clinical care in accordance with Arizona Department of Health Services standards. Storytellers: Teachers turn to the guitar to reach at-risk kids 9NEWS at 10 p.m. 07/10/16. Nelson Garcia, KUSA 10:50 PM. MDT July 10, 2016 89 1 Chris Van Noy and Steve Cram offer lessons to student Michael Gabriels. (Photo: Mike Grady) JEFFERSON COUNTY - Sometimes the only way to reach a troubled teen is through the language they understand -- music. "A couple of years ago, I started working with some kids that were at risk, at risk from a lot of things, dropping out of school, running away from home," teacher Chris Van Noy said. Van Noy wanted to go beyond the walls of the classroom to try to change the path of students making bad choices. He teamed up with another teacher Steve Cram and they formed the Music Appreciation Project. "A lot of at-risk youth, they don't feel comfortable talking with adults," Cram said. Music Appreciation Project is a non-profit that provides instruments and lessons to students like Michael Gabriels. "I guess I get stressed out over a lot of things. I've always struggled with like depression, anxiety, stuff like that," Michael said. "It's very difficult for me to talk to people and express myself." But, when Michael plays guitar, he says, things change. "It just comes naturally to me and it feels like talking," Gabriels said. Van Noy says music can break barriers. "Working with the kids that we do, when they're depressed, when they're sad, when they're having a hard time, they put their earbuds in," Van Noy said. "They're listening to music and music helps them through difficult times." Michael used to just play at home. He has can play all styles of music, but he has learned to solo on his electric guitar with the energy and creativity of a heavy metal band. "It's kinda like my escape, you know, cause, I don't feel emotionally or passionately connected to anything else, you know," Michael said. But, when he started working with Van Noy and Cram, things started to change. "The relationship piece is the deal maker," Cram said. Michael says he now cares about school and feels like his mental health is improving. "It's changed my life completely, something completely different, you know," Michael said. "I feel like a completely different person, even." His father Mike says the change since becoming involved with the Music Appreciation Program is astonishing. "It has flipped his entire demeanor and his life in general, night and day," Mike Gabriels said. "Bad grades to good grades, feeling horrible, feeling exhilarated." Van Noy and Cram offer lessons to students. The nonprofit purchases equipment and instruments for needy students who cannot afford it. They want to give kids a chance to find the guitar hero inside themselves. "You can see the signs," Van Noy said. "You can see the signs that they need something else." Now, instead of just playing at home, Michael is actively pursuing a career in music. "Just a tremendous blessing to see that he's been lifted out of that place and using music as an outlet," Toni Gabriels, Michael's mother, said. Instead of being lost, Michael wants to mentor other kids who once felt like he did. "If we're teaching kids to give to help other people, that's beyond the scope of anything we could do and that's been amazing," Van Noy said. "To give them something that they can be good at, I think is what really helps them a lot," Van Noy said. 16 placements in eight years Teen details life in foster-care system Story Comments \(1\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size 9 Previous Next Aaric Bryan/Daily Inter Lake Johnny Perez Jr. Johnny Perez Jr., a 2016 Whitefish graduate, has spent most of his life moving from foster home to foster home. Posted: Monday, July 11, 2016 6:00 am Teen details life in foster-care system By HILARY MATHESON/Daily Inter Lake Daily Inter Lake | 1 comment Johnny Perez Jr. spent most of his life trying to be "normal" as he was moved 16 times in the foster-care system. Perez counts on his fingers, saying the name of each placement out loud during an interview at his current foster family's Whitefish home on June 7. Subscription Required An online service is needed to view this article in its entirety. You need an online service to view this article in its entirety. "Yes, 16 placements," Perez said. "I think throughout those 16 placements only five, possibly seven were in foster homes with foster families." Despite his success as a recent Whitefish High School graduate, state track star and talented musician, the 17-year-old had to adapt to a feeling of impermanence. To get his diploma, Perez had to attend nine different high schools. "I've been in nine high schools — nine major moves. Some high schools I've been to twice [back and forth], so I guess 11 moves," Perez said, noting that his freshman year alone he moved four times. "The last time I finished out a year at a single school was in third grade," he said. "I attended Evergreen Elementary." Because of his top achievements in sports and academics and plans to attend Grand Canyon University in the fall, Perez said he is considered a success in the foster-care world, but it hasn't been easy. "I kind of get looked at as a success story," Perez said noting that he went from punching holes in walls to playing sports such as football and competing at state in track. For a foster child to have more than 10 placements is unusual, Child and Family Services Family Resource Specialist Daniel Donnelly said, but it's always a case-by-case basis. The average number of placements for foster children in Montana is three. "I teach foster-care classes as part of licensing. Our focus is not moving kids around because of the damage it causes," Donnelly said. Underneath Perez's positive and confident disposition are the damaging effects of moving from placement to placement and facing hopelessness. "It hasn't always been the 'I can succeed mentality,'" Perez said. "I attempted suicide twice." Perez paused when asked what pulled him through, pondering the question. "If I knew I'd bottle it up and sell it — I think the strong people in my life," Perez said. What he pinpointed were the staff members of various institutions in which he's been placed in, and other kids like him. "I use the term 'family' loosely because my family is very large and I'm unrelated to almost all of them. They are mostly group-home staff and foster family and siblings and other kids in group homes I've built these life-long bonds with," he said. Placed in foster care at 9, Perez became an expert at having his bags packed at a moment's notice and moving to a group home or foster family. "When I got put in foster care my mom was put in jail," Perez said. "That began my 16-placement journey throughout the foster-care system." At first, Perez said he was upset at being taken from his family in spite of a rocky home life. "When you're that young you want to be with your family," Perez said. The ultimate goal, Donnelly said, is to reunite children with their biological families. "First and foremost, the goal is to create a reunification and treatment plan to help the family become a safe place and overcome obstacles," Donnelly said. Reunification is attempted through supervised visits, working toward unsupervised visits and onto a trial home visit. Only if a parent makes significant progress or achieves treatment goals is reunification possible. Yet supervised visits, therapy sessions and a month back with his mother when he was 10 or 11 couldn't mend a broken relationship from Perez's perspective and he went back into foster care. He said a lot of anger remained, eventually leading to expulsion from school. "That was in the heat of abuse from my family. I was acting out," he said. Perez had to learn how to make sense of and deal with emotions such as anger without parental guidance, which is something therapeutic youth group homes helped provide. "When I first got put in care, something a lot of kids go through is they have anger issues, so a lot of the stuff was for behavioral health," Perez said. "Group homes try and help us with that, however difficult to get used to, they definitely were a significant help. Some of the staff were some of the most genuinely caring and influential people I've met in my life." Being in a foster family was very different from the structured therapeutic youth group home environment. Perez described it as going from a "super tight ship" to a less-structured routine. "I've never had a foster family I didn't mesh with. I did try very hard to make everything succeed because everybody wants that next placement to be their last placement. No kid enjoys being bounced around," Perez said. For the rare occasions when children are moved to more than 10 placements Child Protective Services Specialist Melissa Cichosz said the goal is to convey to the child that the move is not their fault. "Sometimes a child is unable to understand why they are moved," Cichosz said. The length of time a child stays with a foster family is dependent on a lot of factors that a child cannot necessarily control. "I've had foster homes fall apart because the foster family got a divorce and so all of us kids were disbanded. I've had foster homes where I just showed up after school one day and everything I owned was packed," Perez said, noting one instance that happened after placed in a home for a long time. "I was told my case worker was coming in an hour and I had no idea why and that's after I had been there for two and a half years." Although he said he's remained in contact with the family, Perez still seems hurt. "I beat myself up so much for that for so long [why it happened] I just don't want to open that up again. It's six years ago. I don't mind," Perez said glancing out a window. His current placement has spanned nine months with first-time foster mother Cheryl Sausen of Whitefish. With 3,206 children in Montana's foster-care system, 6 percent are youths ages 15 and over and there is a need for families to foster and adopt teenagers. "People saying they'd only adopt 0 to 4-year-olds is very common. We've had people say 'those teenagers are broken — too much trouble' — which is not the way to be thinking," Donnelly said. Fostering a teenager hadn't occurred to Sausen, 54, until she met Perez, who had been a friend of her son, Tommy, the youngest of four children. "Tommy went off to college and I just still had Johnny in my heart to help him," Sausen said. "When I met him I didn't know if he was officially in foster-care system; I just knew I wanted to get him in a better place and get him through high school." Sausen was able to take Perez in under kinship care. Eventually she took classes to become a licensed foster parent through Child Protective Services. "We've had good stuff, some not so good, normal teenage stuff," Sausen said. She recalled one time when they had a "big blowout" where an average teen would see a disagreement or argument between parent and child as something that's normal and bound to happen. Perez

was ready to pack his bags. "He was already making his plans and knew he would have to move out and go somewhere, so I guess that's kind of the norm that he was expecting; he would just have to move onto the next thing," she said. Sausen said she knew Perez seemed to be stuck in "fight or flight" mode. "So we talked in the beginning, I'm sure you are used to fighting or flighting, I know you may self-sabotage, but hopefully, eventually you'll learn you don't have to go to that old stuff," Sausen said. And so far, it's been a good work in progress. Sausen said the classes were very helpful in opening her eyes to the reality of what some foster children are facing and how to handle different situations. "From my own background I kind of know how kids can react — even how adults react from not-so-good childhoods," Sausen said. "The classes, whew, the classes really open up your eyes to the reality of some severe things." And if she ever needed assistance there are caseworkers for families. To maintain what he considered a normal life, he kept his past and the fact that he was a foster child, to himself. "I kept very few kids from knowing my life — never told anybody any of the things I've been through. Never told them where I lived," he said. "People would ask to hang out after school and I'd tell them that I couldn't. I would say 'oh I'm grounded,' when it was because I was living in group homes where you weren't allowed to have people spend the night," Perez said. What gave him a sense of normalcy was playing sports such as football, basketball and track. He could simply be known as "Johnny the good athlete" rather than "Johnny the foster kid." What Perez considered normal was "just that kid who could go to football games without having to get it approved a week in advance first. Or go do anything on [your] own in the community without having a staff member watch [your] every action, I mean, even down to the cliché of sitting down for dinner at night with your family." Perez kept his life in foster care from most of his friends until he became a junior in high school, when he didn't see a reason anymore to be self-conscious about stigmas. "When I moved back to Whitefish I chose a more open approach. If people asked about my past I would tell them," Perez said. On social media he would share some of the hardships he went through, not always resulting in positive comments. "I started getting called Pity King. I just want understanding. There are kids who put on the facade of the happiest kid on earth when in reality they aren't," Perez said, petting his Chihuahua, Paca. "She was the runt of litter," said. "Her mom wouldn't let her feed ... I bottle-fed her; the first two months of her life she slept in my shirt to maintain her body heat." Perez said his motivation for sharing his story is to tell the public there are talented and successful foster children out there. "I want to share that foster kids are normal kids and we exist," Perez said. "You don't hear the success of foster kids. You hear foster kids live in low-income housing, don't go to college, drop out of high school, when there's so many talented kids from the foster system." In less than a month Perez will celebrate his 18th birthday and "age out" of foster care, but there are supports available such as the Chafee Foster Care Independence Program, to help foster children transition into adult independence. "The foster-care system is trying to help me with college stuff and after high school plans," Perez said. "They have independent living, which is what a lot of kids do, but I'll be living in the dorms. I have my next four years basically planned out. In the summers I'll live here with my foster family." And Perez still needs a connection to the foster-care system. He doesn't necessarily want to push the system behind him yet. Perez would like to help change the foster-care system. "Child advocacy is something I feel is not strong enough," Perez said. In college, Perez plans on studying psychology and eventually working in the foster-care system to "help kids out like myself." He would like to strengthen awareness and community involvement with foster children and families. Perez understands what the difficult job entails. "Do you think you have a heart to walk into a family and say 'I deem you unfit as a parent and I have to take your child'?" People who work at CPS have to do that. It is so difficult to do that job. It's just gut-wrenching," he said. For more information on becoming a foster parent call 1-866-936-7837 or visit <http://dphhs.mt.gov/CFSD/Fosterparent.aspx>. WA State Now Implementing E2SSB 6564: A law passed to protect the developmentally disabled from institutional abuse. This law reads in part: "Summary of Engrossed Second Substitute Bill: Within funds dedicated for this purpose, DDA must increase home visits for clients identified as having the highest risk of abuse and neglect. DDA must develop a process to determine which of its clients who receive an annual developmental disabilities assessment are at highest risk of abuse... and neglect. Factors which DDA may consider in making this assessment are specified in the bill. DDA must visit these clients at least once every four months, including unannounced visits as needed. If an unannounced visit takes the place of a scheduled visit and is unable to be completed, the case manager must schedule a follow-up visit." How Education Fares In The Democratic Party Platform Although education policy has not been a prominent issue in the current presidential race, the Democratic Party's platform gives the subject some of its just due with a fairly extensive treatment. In the current draft, which will be finalized on June 8 and 9, there are numerous mentions of education and a special section with over 1,000 words devoted to the topic. Many are saying this platform "may be most progressive platform the Democratic Party may have ever had." But is it progressive on education? Let's weigh the evidence. First let's examine how the Democratic Party platform differs from what's proposed in the Republican Party's platform. The Republican document gets education policy wrong from with the very first sentence by asserting, "Parents are responsible for the education of their children." Although it's true parents certainly need to be involved in their children's education, have a voice in how schools are run, and take responsibility for encouraging and maintaining their children's educational development, putting the sole burden for education on parents guarantees inequity of education opportunity and is, frankly, un-American. Relegating education opportunity to "consumer rights" and "choice," as the Republicans do, ensures those who are the wealthiest and most enabled in the system have the most opportunity, while less-well-off parents have the least. And since our country's founding, the American tradition is for education to be a shared burden taken on by the entire population. Virtually every state's constitution asserts government's responsibility to provide for an education for elementary and secondary students, a precedent established by the Ordinance of 1785, which predates our national Constitution. The rest of the Republican platform is studded with the usual bromides about "high standards," "high expectations," "accountability," and "choice" with very little attention to governmental responsibilities for education. In fact, Republicans bash government's role in relation to spending on education, making a false assertion that $2 trillion expenditure by the federal government since 1965 has resulted in "no substantial improvement in academic achievement." According to the best measure available, the National Assessment of Education Progress, scores are up over the past 40 years, and black and Hispanic students have made the greatest gains over that period. Specific proposals in the Republican's platform range from removing government financial support for higher education, to providing parents with vouchers to transfer their children out of the public system at taxpayer expense, to getting tough on teachers while leaving the profession open to un-credentialed, untrained recruits. In other words, remove government's responsibility to provide for a universally accessible, high quality, and equitable education for every child. Nothing progressive here. Are Democrats any better? Unfortunately, the Democratic Party's platform falls short of asserting a bedrock philosophy for education. Although, those who drafted the document include a statement about the federal government's role in "working towards an America where a world-class education is available to every child," what's missing is a statement defining education as fundamental right and a collective responsibility. As public education advocate Jan Resseger writes on her personal blog, Democrats should, at the very least, declare education to be a "common good" and call for "a comprehensive system ... that serves all children and is democratically governed, publicly funded, universally accessible, and accountable to the public." But instead, the platform highlights a series of isolated issues that, although important, further the perception that education is mostly a technocratic endeavor rather than a moral and political imperative. So, without a rudder to guide its education positions, how do the Democrats fare in their treatment of specific policy points? The section devoted to education begins with higher education, which certainly has been a prominent issue in the presidential campaign. The writing is mainly focused on addressing the dramatic increase in the cost of higher education, calling it a "barrier" that government needs to help students overcome. Specifically, the platform calls for free community college, which would guarantee at least a basic access to higher education opportunity. This idea has some practical validity, as is being demonstrated by the free community college program currently being run in Tennessee. Nevertheless, the call for tuition free community college, without extending it to four-year university, falls short of the proposal made by Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders to provide for universal tuition free college. Although the party's presumptive nominee Hillary Clinton initially eschewed what Sanders proposed, she has since reconsidered and embraced the idea. So on the subject of higher education, the Democratic platform needs to catch up with its candidates. On the subject of college student loan debt — a key issue in turning out the vote from millennials — Democrats call for a Student Borrower Bill of Rights and a pledge to allow borrowers with student loans to discharge their debts in bankruptcy. These are admirable proposals but again fall short of the student debt "jubilee" that would reflect both the values upon which this nation was founded and the economic principles that have sustained it through its greatest periods of growth and prosperity. The platform's pledge to support "minority-serving" universities, such as Historically Black Colleges and Universities, is worthy, although as classroom teacher and popular blogger Peter Greene, on his personal site, advises those who drafted the document, "You guys may want to take a look at that whole 'minority' thing, since particularly in schools ‘minority’ also means ‘white’ at this point.” The platform’s pledge to crack down on predatory for-profit colleges is also generally worthwhile; although, it’s not clear whether this puts them at odds with the Obama administration’s current effort to include Navient – the loan servicing giant with one of the worst track records for ripping off students – as one of the finalists to help overhaul federal student loan collection practices. Regarding early childhood education and K-12, the platform lumps the two issues together, a mistake because states generally have no constitutional obligations to provide for ECE. For sure, providing high quality pre-K education to little kids is vital but not just for the sake of the “workforce,” as the platform seems to suggest. Much of what is stated about K-12 education amounts to generalities that few can object to but don’t have much of a basis in research and enduring practice. Having “great Pre-K-12 schools in every zip code” is important but not without some consideration of what makes them “great.” Few would object to high standards but standards do little to actually ensure outcomes. One of the few specifics in the platform is the call for mentoring programs, which certainly have some merit but seem an odd proposal to highlight in a document with national significance. One wonders, as Greene does in his assessment, “Which genius on the committee has a bunch of money sunk in some mentor-consultant business?” The Democratic proposal wraps up with attention to the issue of charter schools, declaring support for “high-quality public charter schools” (who would support bad ones?) and opposition to “for-profit charter schools focused on making a profit off of public resources” – an empty rhetorical phrase because charters can operate as non-profits while being connected to all sorts of profitable enterprises. The issue of charter schools is complicated and hard to address in a broad document like a party platform. But here again, the platform authors could have reasserted the need for schools to be democratically controlled by and accountable to the entirety of the population that the school is intended to serve – which would be a clear statement of opposition to the rapidly expanding industrial approach to schooling being spread by large charter management companies. In sum the platform’s authors would be wise to consider advice of California education professor Julian Vasquez Heilig to focus on the solutions that have some basis in research. So does the Democratic platform support education policies that are progressive? Currently, the best answer to that question is, “Maybe.” Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/how-education-fares-in-the-democratic-party-platform/>

Don’t Make Our Most Vulnerable Children Wait Longer! 07/12/2016 10:37 am 10:37:16 | Updated 3 days ago Marian Wright Edelman. In an important show of bipartisanship, Congress is on the cusp of an historic step to help many of the most vulnerable children in our nation who are abused and neglected and at risk of entering foster care and lingering in group care. The U.S. House of Representatives passed the Family First Prevention Services Act (H.R. 5456) on June 21st to help keep these children safely with their families and out of foster care. I hope the Senate will do the same this week before it leaves for summer recess and not keep vulnerable children waiting and waiting longer. Alumni of foster care frequently say the most important step the state could have taken was to help their family early on to keep them out of foster care. They talk about what a difference it would have made if drug treatment or other supports were available to keep their families together and offer them needed stability in their lives. We often overlook the trauma children experience when they are uprooted from their home, family and school and are expected to adjust to new environments. My mother was a wonderful foster parent to nearly a dozen children, yet many of her foster children yearned for their birth families. This separation trauma can be intensified for children in group homes and lead to worse life outcomes than experienced by children in family foster homes. Many children who move frequently from family to family or one group setting to another and from school to school wish they could have a stable family all children need growing up. “You don’t age out of families,” they say, underscoring a fundamental problem with having only the state as a parent. Passage of the Family First Prevention Services Act, identical to the Senate bill introduced by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-UT) and Ranking Member Ron Wyden (D-OR), will make historic and crucial investments in prevention for children and families. Currently major federal child welfare funding is available to states only after a child has been removed from their home and placed in foster care. This has created a disincentive to help families at the front-end. For many years state child welfare agencies and a range of other providers and advocates have challenged this misalignment in federal funding which undermines the best interests and outcomes for vulnerable children and urged federal investments in prevention. The Family First Prevention Services Act finally does that recognizing that mental health and substance abuse problems bring the majority of children into the child welfare system. It allows federal dollars to be used to prevent and treat such problems and to fund home-based programs to strengthen parenting skills for children in their own families. We know quality prevention programs work and are less costly than group and congregate care. So we urge the Senate to act now. The Family First Prevention Services Act also redirects federal fiscal incentives to states to help children who must enter foster care be placed with families rather than in more expensive and less effective group care. Over the years foster care alumni have shared their experiences in group home settings with members of Congress and explained how they needed the love and support of their parents or extended families, not rotating shifts of staff in a place that felt more like a business than a home. So this long overdue bill acts to reduce the unnecessary funneling of children into group care settings. Federal dollars are available for family foster care or quality residential treatment programs for children with special emotional or behavioral needs — often the most expensive care. The bill includes enhanced protections to ensure children remain in residential programs no longer than treatment requires. States will continue to receive federal support for programs serving pregnant and parenting teens and youth 18 and older transitioning from foster care to adulthood. After more than 35 years of federal support, states and localities will now have to pick up the full tab for the care of children in other group settings to better align federal dollars with prevention and the most family-like foster care settings that offer better outcomes for children. Recognizing that this is a big change, these new funds for prevention and restrictions on group care funding will not take effect until three years after the bill is enacted. This three year delay gives state and local agencies, private providers and child and family advocates ample time to prepare and work with the Department of Health and Human Services to build on the new law’s flexibility in defining who is eligible for prevention services, how the services are defined, and the definition, structure and eligibility for residential treatment programs. There is also initial funding to build on for recruiting and retaining quality foster homes. Could some states get less federal money for group care than they have been receiving? Possibly, but only if they maintain the status quo rather than supporting more family-like settings and treatment for children with special needs. And now all states will be able to use federal dollars for services and treatment to help keep children safely in their families and out of more expensive foster care. The bottom line must be what’s best for children. A number of states already have time-limited federal waivers allowing more flexible use of federal foster care dollars to show the benefits of investments in prevention. The new federal prevention funds in the Family First Prevention Services Act will become available in 2019 as those waivers end. The new federal reforms build on what Congress has learned from states’ efforts to increase prevention investments and move children in foster care to more family-like settings, steps that improve child outcomes. The Senate should approve H.R. 5456 before summer recess in four days. Attempts to change the bill, even technical amendments, will kill it and send a hurtful message to vulnerable children across the country that continued reliance on foster care over prevention is acceptable. I urge passage of this crucial bill to ensure long awaited services and protections for abused and neglected children. Every child deserves to grow up in a safe and loving family. The Family First Prevention Services Act is a critically important step toward this goal for hundreds of thousands of our most vulnerable children. Charge: Group home leader punched, kicked resident in vehicle - Eau Claire Leader-Telegram Charge: Group home leader punched, kicked resident in vehicle posted July 13, 2016 12:00 a.m. (CDT) email article print font size - + by / Dan Holtz. bio | email | 4 Enlarge Stoner prevnext A man who runs an adult group home in Eau Claire is accused of punching and kicking one of his residents in a vehicle in Fall Creek. The 46-year-old resident sustained a bruised and swollen left eye in the incident, police said. Clinton E. Stoner, 50, of 716 Kimberly Drive was charged Tuesday in Eau Claire County Court with a felony count of causing bodily harm by intentionally abusing a patient. Stoner is free on a $5,000 signature bond and returns to court Aug. 23. As conditions of bond, Stoner was ordered not to have contact with the resident or vulnerable adults and children. According to the criminal complaint: A Fall Creek police officer received a report of possible family trouble that occurred just after 4:30 p.m. Monday in the 100 block of Wisconsin Street in Fall Creek. The officer spoke with a witness who said she was sitting on her front porch when a vehicle pulled over. The driver got out, opened the back door and started punching and kicking the passenger and restraining the passenger from getting out of the vehicle. The witness also heard the driver yelling and swearing at the passenger. The altercation lasted about two minutes. The witness got the license plate number of the vehicle before the vehicle headed westbound on U.S. 12. A second witness told the officer the male in the back seat may have been mentally challenged. The officer then spoke with Stoner, the registered owner of the vehicle. Stoner said he runs an adult group home in Eau Claire, cares for two residents and had taken them swimming. Stoner took one of the residents to his mother’s house in Fall Creek to get a swimming suit. The resident wanted to stay at his mother’s house, which he was not allowed to do. Stoner claimed the resident started attacking him in the vehicle and he had to pull over to restrain him. Stoner said the resident pulled his hair and tore off his shirt. Witnesses told police the driver of the vehicle pulled off his own shirt. The resident, who cried when speaking to an Eau Claire police officer, said Stoner hit him with a closed fist. If convicted, Stoner could be sentenced to up to three years in prison. Contact: 715-833-9207, dan.holtz@ecpc.com Source: <http://www.leadertelegram.com/News/Front-Page/2016/07/13/Charge-Group-homeleader-punched-kickedresident-in-vehicle-nbsp.html>

Report rips State Agency in charge of Group Homes Potential cases of neglect and abuse not reported By Ryan Walsh, 22News I-Team Reporter

Published: July 14, 2016, 11:04 am Updated: July 14, 2016, 5:54 pm BOSTON (WWLP) - An Inspector General report rips a Massachusetts state agency for not reporting potential cases of abuse and neglect of developmentally disabled individuals under state care. The report found that the state and group homes staff did not report critical emergency room visits to investigators 58% of the time. The Inspector General reviewed emergency room visits of developmentally disabled individuals living in group homes. The Department of Developmental Services oversees group homes. The Office of the Inspector General found that the Department of Developmental Services did not comply with Federal waiver and State requirements for reporting and monitoring critical incidents involving developmentally disabled individuals. One unnamed woman with developmental disabilities was living in a group home with psychiatric disorders. She was in the emergency room 10 times from May 2013 to May 2014. She was in the hospital for swallowing batteries, screws, bolts, soda can tabs, and a part of a cell phone charger. The Department of Developmental Services only reported one of the ten incidents to the Disabled Persons Protection Commission (DPPC).

The state agency has to report reasonable suspicions of abuse or neglect to the DPPC. Another incident showed that a resident had cuts on their head due to being restrained by the group home's aides on two separate occasions. The state agency did not report that incident to investigators either. The Inspector General's report also says that the state agency did not make sure that Group Homes reported all critical incidents to the Department of Developmental Services.

The report says that Group Homes did not report 15% of the 587 emergency room visits reviewed to the Department of Developmental Services. Group Home providers are required to do so. Due to this, the Department of Developmental Services did not review and analyze data on the 88 critical incidents group homes did not report. One incident involved a group home resident who suffered second-degree burns on his shoulder. Another resident was hit in the head with a metal chair by another resident and suffered a concussion. Neither incident was reported to the state. The Inspector General went through 2964 emergency room claims from the Massachusetts Medicaid Management Information System that the state agency paid for developmentally disabled Medicaid beneficiaries living in group homes from January 2012 through June 2014. Those individuals had 587 hospital emergency room visits that were diagnosed with at least 1 of 149 conditions that were high risk for suspected abuse or neglect. In letters to the Inspector General, the state agency disagreed with many of the findings, but did say they welcome the recommendations made in the report. In a statement sent to 22News on Thursday, the Executive Officer of Health and Human Services, which oversees the Department of Developmental Services had this to say: "DDS is committed to protecting the health and welfare of individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities who are receiving services, has carefully reviewed the findings in the OIG's report and is in the process of implementing recommendations, including additional staff training practices and new guidance on critical incident reports, to ensure quality care for the 36,000 individuals it serves are safe and protected." The Inspector General reviewed this data in several states, including Massachusetts, in response to a congressional request concerning the number of deaths and cases of abuse of developmentally disabled residents of group homes. Scathing report details failings at group homes E-Mail Share via e-mail To Add a message Your e-mail Facebook Twitter Google+ LinkedIn 29 Comments Print The Boston Globe Tweet Share 29 Comments By Michael Levenson Globe Staff July 14, 2016 A scathing federal audit released Thursday faults Massachusetts officials for frequently failing to alert authorities when developmentally disabled residents of the state's group homes suffer broken bones, burns, and other injuries potentially caused by abuse and neglect. The audit, by the inspector general of the US Department of Health and Human Services, found that 58 percent of emergency room visits that involved reasonable suspicion of abuse and neglect were not reported to investigators between January 2012 and June 2014. Advertisement In one case, a developmentally disabled man had second-degree burns on his shoulder that neither he nor an aide at his group home could explain. In another case, a woman prone to seizures and defiant behavior was brought to the emergency room on two separate occasions with cuts on her head after she was restrained by group home staff. And in a third, an autistic man had a bed sore that was so infected it was possibly gangrenous and in need of extensive surgery and reconstruction. Curtis M. Roy, the audit manager who oversaw the report, said he was flabbergasted and disturbed by the findings. "I shake my head every time I read these reports because I don't quite see how people can see somebody laying there with an infected gangrenous bed sore and not pick up the telephone," he said. "I just don't understand that. I really don't." Advertisement State officials said they disagreed with many of the findings of the report, which they said were overstated. Nevertheless, they said they had issued several new advisories to group home contractors on how to identify suspected abuse and neglect and are developing additional training for group home workers and state officials. The state "is committed to protecting the health and welfare of individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities who are receiving services, has carefully reviewed the findings in the OIG's report and is in the process of implementing recommendations," said Michelle Hillman, spokeswoman for the state health and human services agency. Private contractors operate about 1,800 group homes in Massachusetts, while the state directly runs about 200, according to the Arc of Massachusetts, an advocacy group for people with developmental disabilities. They serve a total of 10,000 residents with disabilities. The federal audit found the lack of action by state officials and group home workers placed developmentally disabled adults – some of whom cannot speak, hear, or see, and many of whom have serious physical and intellectual disabilities – at risk of harm. The state's failure to report the injuries to investigators also violated state and federal rules. "Personally, I would be at least moderately concerned, if not very concerned, if I had a relative in a group home," Roy said. "I just don't think there should be any tolerance of abuse or neglect of anybody, but in particular of developmentally disabled people." US Senator Christopher Murphy, a Connecticut Democrat, requested audits of several states' group homes after the Hartford Courant reported in 2013 that abuse and neglect had been cited in the deaths of 76 developmentally disabled people in Connecticut between 2004 and 2010. As a result, the inspector general's office reviewed the safeguards designed to prevent abuse and neglect in group homes in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, and Maine. Connecticut's audit, released in May, found that state, like Massachusetts, often failed to report possible abuse or neglect to investigators, including cases involving a man who suffered a broken spine and a woman who repeatedly swallowed razor blades. Massachusetts' audit found that state officials and group home workers, by not acting on possible cases of abuse and neglect, "failed to adequately protect" 146 of the 334 developmentally disabled residents whose emergency room visits were reviewed. The audit also found that the Department of Developmental Services, the state agency that oversees group homes, did not ensure that group homes detail the "action steps" they would take to prevent injuries from occurring again in 29 percent of cases. The report was based on a review of 587 emergency room visits made by 334 group home residents on Medicaid between January 2012 and June 2014 – cases that involved broken bones, burns, open wounds, drug overdoses, and swallowed objects. Christine Griffin, executive director of Disability Law Center of Massachusetts, said she hopes the report prompts officials to overhaul how the state handles potential abuse and neglect – including what she called the chronic underfunding and understaffing of the Disabled Persons Protection Commission, which investigates possible cases in group homes. She said the state should also implement, as others have, a registry of group home workers who have abused or neglected residents, to ensure they can't be hired again at another group home. "It's startling to me that we're this behind," Griffin said. "Especially someone who is nonverbal, we just discount what happens to them in some way. If they can't say, 'Somebody did this to me and this is who that person is,' then things that happen to them get ignored by everybody." Nancy A. Alterio, executive director of the Disabled Persons Protection Commission, said the agency fields 10,000 reports of potential abuse and neglect a year, has a $3 million budget and five investigators. Each investigator typically has 50 open cases. "In Massachusetts, we work very diligently and vigilantly to ensure the protection of persons with disabilities," she said. "We're far from a perfect system, but we're often seen as a model across the country because of our collaborative efforts and focus." Roy said it is essential that group home workers and officials understand that they must act if they are concerned that the injuries suffered by a developmentally disabled person might have been caused by abuse or neglect. "If you have to even think about it," Roy said, "you should tell someone." Michael Levenson can be reached at mlevenson@globe.com. Follow him on Twitter @mlevenson. The Caboolture-based mother, 26, and step-father, 30, of the young girl executed a bizarre torture regime after they became 'overwhelmed' by the task of parenting, Brisbane District Court heard. The five-year-old was forced to run up to 6km, in bushland behind her parents car which would pull away whenever she got close. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +3 The parents of a five-year-old girl who was tortured with an extreme exercise regime and locked in her room for up to 24 hours at a time will see less than a year behind bars. This bizarre method of punishment was supposed to make the child feel like she was being abandoned and was a 'corrective treatment' for her behaviour. Sometimes she would be joined by two other children on these runs. She was also forced to undertake up to four hours of other exercises including situps and stand ups, the Courier Mail Reports. The abuse started after the parents turned to an older man for guidance and would be administered as a form of punishment when she misbehaved. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +3 The parents appeared before Brisbane District Court where they were sentenced for the torture and abuse of the girl. This older man would force the girl to eat curry powder if she did not exercise fast enough. When the girl was at home she would often be sent to her room where the door handles would be removed so she couldn't escape. 'This is not my room, this is not my house,' she wrote on the walls of her room. The words were a 'sad and poignant' feature of the shocking case, Judge Craig Chowdhury said in a hearing on Friday. 'The girl had also smeared her own excrement around the room and suggested her spartan room had become her personal prison,' he said. The step father was ordered to spend eight months behind bars and the girl's mother was given three months. The couple, who are no longer together, had their full four and three-year terms suspended. The court heard the woman had also admitted to police she struck the girl across the face on several occasions - once so hard it had hurt her own hand. Summarising her treatment, which also included being forced to exercise excessively and being left outside with pet dogs, Judge Chowdhury said: 'The mind boggles'. 'These acts can only be designed to humiliate, demoralise and destroy whatever happy childhood this girl was ever going to have.' Groundbreaking human rights of children bill introduced in Congress By Elizabeth Bartholet & Paulo Barroz • 7/16/16 12:03 AM The Washington Examiner Share Tweet Mail Print SMS More Tens of millions of children worldwide live without parents, with an estimated 10 to 14 million of these unparented children confined to institutions. And this number is growing. These children are denied their human right to grow up in a family and to be free from the cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment, unnecessary detention, and denial of the right to life, liberty, and the security of persons characteristic of institutionalization. Their plight is the largest unrecognized humanitarian and human rights crisis of the 21st century. Human rights legislation addressing this crisis was introduced in Congress recently by Rep. Tom Marino, R-Penn., and Rep. David Cicilline, D-R.I., H.R. 5285 amends the Congressional mandate to the Department of State to prepare and publish annually Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, requiring it to include in those Country Reports violations of the above-listed child human rights. This new legislation is simple. It requires no new resources, and no new office. It creates no new sanctions, and allows the Department of State the same discretion it has traditionally enjoyed in preparing the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices. H.R. 5285 simply requires the Department of State to stop discriminating against millions of children worldwide by refusing to count as a human rights violation their denial of family life through adoption and their unnecessary institutionalization. While simple, this legislation would nonetheless be of enormous significance in the debate over whether unparented children should continue to be condemned to institutions whose destructive effects have been documented by leading social and medical sciences research, or allowed to find permanent families through adoption. Adoption gives children the permanent, nurturing, legally stable parents they need. However, few countries with large populations of unparented children have a robust domestic adoption tradition and many countries impose severe restrictions on or altogether prohibit international adoption. This deliberately denies millions of children in need their human right to grow up in nurturing homes. These restrictive adoption policies have resulted in the precipitous decline by 75 percent in the number of adoptions into the United States since 2004, and by more than 50 percent in the number of international adoptions worldwide. This represents the deliberate and unnecessary denial to well over 20,000 children per year of their most fundamental human right other than life itself — the right to grow up with nurturing parents. H.R. 5285 would help shift the U.S. position so that instead of undermining the child's right to family, the United States would take a leading role in advocating for this vulnerable population globally. This landmark legislation has the support of a broad coalition of leading human rights and child welfare experts and organizations, assisted in this endeavor by the Cyrus R. Vance Center for International Justice and Arent Fox LLP. This coalition includes the National Council for Adoption, the American Academy of Adoption Attorneys, the Center for Adoption Policy, Saddleback Church Orphan Care Initiative, and Harvard Law School's Child Advocacy Program. We call on Congress to join the fight to secure the rights of unparented children worldwide who continue to be unnecessarily institutionalized and denied the opportunity to grow up in stable loving homes by geographical accident and the policies of governments. Editorial: More questions about group home care Greenville News Editorial Page 1:03 a.m. EDT July 17, 2016 5 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A three-day investigative report published last week by The Greenville News begs many more answers about the way South Carolina and its contractors manage the care of the state's most vulnerable adults. Investigative reporter Rick Brundrett spent seven months poring over records and conducting interviews as he explored the deaths of three clients in group homes run by South Carolina Mentor, a division of a national company that operates homes for vulnerable adults. Mentor is overseen by the state Department of Disabilities and Special Needs. --> Play Video Play Mute Current Time 0:00 / Duration Time 3:05 Loaded: 0% Progress: 0% Stream TypeLIVE Remaining Time -0:00 Playback Rate 1 Chapters Chapters subtitles off, selected Subtitles captions settings, opens captions settings dialog captions off, selected Captions Fullscreen Brother and best friend lost in the care of Mentor.m4v This is a modal window. Lauren Petracca The investigation looked at a very small sample of cases, but raises important questions about how well the state is fulfilling its duty to care for these adults who have very serious intellectual or other developmental issues, and how well the state is monitoring the companies it authorizes to carry out those duties. By law, the state has a responsibility to care for vulnerable adults. Even when contracted to private companies, the state's responsibility extends to carefully overseeing those companies. Taxpayers have funded a $17.5 million annual contract (recently increased to $19.9 million) for Mentor alone, but Mentor is one of multiple companies that serve the state in this capacity. To ensure that money is being spent responsibly there needs to be a high degree of transparency over both the state and its contractors. That has not been the case. Brundrett ran into difficulty obtaining some public records — such as the addresses of group homes in the state. In addition, details about abuse reports and patient deaths in contractor-run group homes often are murky. Such a lack of transparency not only keeps the taxpayers in the dark, but also prevents relatives of vulnerable adults from having any assurance their loved ones are being properly cared for. One example from the Greenville News report provides cause for worry. Brundrett recounted the case of Jamie Rosemond who wandered away from his group home in Mauldin and was fatally struck by two cars in 2012. The window on Rosemond's room had an alarm, but the alarm was disabled when he broke the window several days before his fatal escape, according to a lawsuit. Further, employees were supposed to be checking on Rosemond every 15 minutes, but apparently had not done so — logs showed group home staff had checked on Rosemond at 6:30 p.m. and 6:45 p.m. on the day he died while police reports show he was struck by two cars at about 6:25 p.m. All of this despite that fact caregivers knew Rosemond was prone to wandering off. Families of group home residents as well as taxpayers should demand answers. Systems that are in place to protect group home clients need to be maintained and procedures followed. The state needs to follow up on maintenance. It also needs to ensure policies — those mandated by the state or put in place by the contractors — are being consistently followed. If a procedure is not being followed, it should not be used to give clients' family members a false sense of security. There also are legitimate questions about the finances of these contracts. The state contract with Mentor averages to about $85,000 per client per year. That is a significant sum for the care of one individual, and though the cost may be legitimate, contractors' books should be open so taxpayers can see how their money is being spent. Further, the quality of direct-care workers needs to be reviewed. Brundrett reported that the starting pay for direct-care staff in South Carolina is $9.79 per hour. Mentor's workers, who average 3.5 years of service, earn $9.86 per hour on average. Those low wages are concerning given the responsibility these workers have. It's easy to assume higher wages could improve the quality of care. If true, the state and its contractors should consider providing better pay for these important workers. These questions need to be answered. In the meantime, some help may be on the way. In a story on Tuesday, Brundrett reported that state

Rep. Chandra Dillard plans to introduce or cosponsor legislation to improve accountability by requiring video cameras in common areas of group homes. That would be a good first step. Michelle McCarroll, the sister of Jamie Rosemond, told Brundrett she thinks the state also should ensure there are working alarms on the doors and windows of group homes. These both are needed changes. Dillard and the Legislature should also consider other steps to improve transparency for private contractors and tighten state oversight of privately run facilities to ensure group homes are maintained and procedures are being followed. Caring for vulnerable adults is a vital state responsibility. Families depend on the state to provide care they are unable to provide on their own. These vulnerable human beings deserve to be treated with the same dignity and respect as everyone else. There are simple steps that can improve care where needed or demonstrate to South Carolinians that these standards already are being met. Those steps need to be taken. Source:

Foster care survivors fight to improve the system By Cynthia Miller The New Mexican The Santa Fe New Mexican The night she was taken into state custody was a "big mess," Palmira Ramirez said. "There were guns involved. There were policemen involved. There were bartenders involved." She and her two half-sisters hid when they heard the commotion, knowing that child welfare caseworkers wouldn't be far behind. Her two stepbrothers fled down the street to a relative's home, missing the social workers "by minutes," Ramirez said. The girls were discovered and divided, one sent to a great-grandmother's home and two placed with an aunt they hadn't seen in years. Ramirez, now 20, was 9 when she entered the state's foster care system, beginning a journey that would shuffle her to nearly a score of foster homes and residential centers in cities around the state: Las Cruces, Alamogordo, Rio Rancho, Albuquerque, Mora. Like many children who grow up in state custody, she never found a permanent home. Caseworkers came and went. Adoption procedures fell apart. She was always separated from her siblings, and she had little voice in the important decisions about where she would live and who would care for her. But she and other young adults who have aged out of the state's foster care system have been fighting to change that. Through New Mexico Child Advocacy Networks, a nonprofit dedicated to aiding foster children, these young people are playing a key role in improving policies that affect kids in a state system that operates largely out of the public's eye. Case files on abused and neglected children and their families are kept confidential under federal funding rules. Family court hearings involving children are closed to the public. The confidentiality rules are meant to preserve children's privacy, but they also shield deficiencies and injustices in a system that is meant to protect the nation's most vulnerable young people. The experiences of Ramirez and other youth involved with NMCAN offer a glimpse into that system and the difficult years after they turned 18 and were suddenly on their own, young adults with no family support, few skills and little knowledge of how to navigate the state services and benefits still available to them. "Kids really do fall through the system," said Santa Fe native Lauren Huichan, 24. State officials say New Mexico suffers from a combination of too few foster homes in some areas and overloaded social workers, despite heavy recruitment efforts to fill vacancies. A recent report by the Legislative Finance Committee said foster kids "are lingering in non-permanent care or have multiple placements meaning a lack of stability for children already experiencing trauma." Exacerbating the problem, New Mexico, which leads the nation in the percentage of children living in poverty, has among the highest rates of child abuse and neglect, state and federal reports say, and a high rate of drug use among parents and other caregivers. Huichan's advocacy work for foster kids began 10 years ago, through a youth program connected with the state Children, Youth and Families Department. She's also worked with other organizations, such as the Gerard's House program for grieving children in Santa Fe. Her efforts earned her some celebrity. In 2010, at the age of 18, she was invited to the TeenNick cable network's HALO Awards in Los Angeles, where she received red-carpet honors for her activism, and mingled with pop stars and actors. In Los Angeles, Huichan was a long way from the 22 foster homes, group homes, shelters and psychiatric centers where she had spent her teen years, sometimes locked down and often medicated. She was diagnosed with depression and PTSD, she said. "I was moved around so much because I was considered a runaway," Huichan said. "... I had just blown out of every placement." She lost contact with her twin sister for six years. The foster system is a particularly tough place for kids with disabilities or mental health issues. Robert Carbajal, 25, who was diagnosed with a mild form of a developmental disability and bipolar disorder, said he spent years doped up on medication in a foster home that CYFD eventually determined was abusive. Not long after he was born in El Paso, Carbajal's mother left him with some friends of her parents and then disappeared from his life, he said. His elderly grandparents took him into their home in Albuquerque, but they had a hard time caring for him. "I was a wild kid," he said. "I wasn't really controllable." Unable to handle a growing child with behavioral challenges, his grandparents turned him over to state custody when he was 5. He spent a few months in a mental health facility and then went to live in the foster home, where he stayed for more than a decade before caseworkers removed him and a half-dozen other foster kids the couple had collected. Carbajal's last two years in the foster system were spent in the home of a single mother and daughter. "There, I lived more of a normal life," he said. A normal life can be hard to come by in the foster care system. But for Ramirez, the confusion and instability of that system was the "lesser of two evils." As she was growing up in San Rafael, a tiny village in Cibola County not far from Grants, Ramirez and her motley pack of siblings — two half-sisters and two stepbrothers — were their own support system. Her mom had started using drugs and abusing alcohol, she said, "and not really caring anymore that she was our mom." Her dad wasn't around. She doesn't know him. "None of me or my sisters know our dads." The family had been investigated by state child protective services workers when she was 6, Ramirez said, but it was about a year later, when she was 7, that the troubles really began. That's when a new boyfriend began to lure her mom away from the responsibilities of motherhood and into a drug-fueled decline. There would be weeks or months when Ramirez's mom wasn't around much, "leaving us to kind of fend for ourselves and take care of each other." Ramirez had to help make sure the younger children got to school and that everyone was fed, she said, to fend off the social workers who had started coming around. The kids knew what would happen if their cover was blown: They'd be torn apart and put in foster care. "We were trying to keep the family together, because that was all we knew," Ramirez said. But foster care was inevitable, she added, because of how careless her mother had become. When state caseworkers did arrive during a violent scene at the home in the middle of the night, they placed her and one of her sisters with an aunt in nearby Milan. But the woman, whom they barely knew, had an abusive husband, Ramirez said, and before long, the aunt fled the home while the girls were at school. It would become a familiar scenario, Ramirez said: "You come home from school, and all your stuff is outside in a trash bag." She and her little sister bounced around to other caregivers, until it appeared they would have a permanent home with a former caseworker and his wife. The man had quit his job and took a new position in juvenile justice so he could take them in, she said. "We stayed there for a while. I was actually supposed to get adopted." But the couple decided to separate, she said, and the adoption fell through. She was 13 at the time. "That was kind of heartbreaking," she said. "I got shoved back into the foster system." It wasn't an easy transition. She said the foster mother who had planned to adopt her instead left her at a hospital. "I was shell-shocked. ... I just got abandoned again. "They put me in a psych hospital because they thought I was going to go crazy." She smiled. "But that ended up not happening." Resiliency is a common trait among the young adults involved with NMCAN. They're attending college and learning to live independently, and they've found a family there. Ramirez, who hopes to earn a degree in pediatric nursing, shares a home in Los Lunas with 22-year-old Rochelle Alvarado, also a native of the Grants area. "We call each other sisters," Ramirez said. They're both enrolled at Central New Mexico Community College. Alvarado is studying social work. She wants to work for CYFD some day. "I want to be that helping hand that my YTF is to me," Alvarado said, referring to her youth transitional specialist, a state worker who, like NMCAN, is helping to ease her path to adulthood. NMCAN began in 1990 as the New Mexico CASA Network to provide court-appointed volunteer advocates for children in the foster system. While it continues to support CASA programs, NMCAN has expanded its mission in recent years to help former foster youth build life skills and job skills, further their education, find housing and employment, deal with their years of trauma and become their own advocates, using their experiences to push for policy changes to benefit the 2,300 kids in state care. They're doing the work, Huichan said, "so that other kids don't have to go through what we went through." The group saw passage in 2014 of a bill that waives tuition and fees at state colleges and universities for students up to age 25 who have been in the foster care system. Their work also led to a "bill of rights" for foster children, legislation introduced by state Sen. Michael Padilla, D-Albuquerque, during the 2015 legislative session. The bill, which fell in line with the requirements for child welfare agencies under a 2014 federal law, would allow children in state custody to participate in normal activities, such as athletic and art programs, and attend sleepovers and summer camps. It also would give kids 14 and older a voice in creating a plan for their future, and it would require the state to give each child a list of their rights to education, health care, visits with family, safety, participation in court hearings and access to their own documents. It passed in the Senate but didn't survive the House. Still, it inspired CYFD Cabinet Secretary Monique Jacobson, who had just stepped into the job, to meet with the youth and help them achieve some of their goals by changing policies and procedures in her agency. "It was a huge win to get it into administrative code," said NMCAN Executive Director Ezra Spitzer. "... Young people had a very direct role in that process." Jacobson said the new policies ease some of the restrictions for foster parents, giving them a greater role in making decisions for kids in their care, such as allowing them to join a sports team or simply go to the mall with friends. It also empowers the kids. "One thing I heard loud and clear is that they want a voice at the table," Jacobson said. She meets with children in the state's care, sometimes in groups and sometimes one-on-one, to listen to their concerns. One message from kids during such a session still sticks with her. "They said, 'What we wish people knew is that it wasn't our fault.'" Facing blame — from family members, foster parents and caseworkers — was a common thread in the stories of the NMCAN youth. Some of them are still battling the fallout as they try to build new relationships with their biological families. Jacobson said the agency is also working to increase the number of foster families in New Mexico, so that more kids can be placed in homes close to their biological families. Moving a child to a new city "should never happen," she said. "That's not best practice." After adding 100 families over the past year, Jacobson said, the state now has about 1,200 homes for foster kids. "But we are always looking for more." Her work in improving the system is far from over, she said. "In no way, shape or form do I think we've got it all figured out." Spitzer said the nonprofit also has work to do. Its next mission might be drafting new legislation that creates a way for foster kids to file a grievance without being routed through their state caseworkers. "I really think that's a missing ingredient," he said. "It's something we've been recently talking a lot about." Ramirez said the group is also working on a measure that would allow foster kids to visit with siblings who live in other homes, separated by decisions beyond their control. Ideally, Spitzer said, a child taken into state care will be able to go home quickly. "But sometimes they don't go home," he said, "and they don't get adopted." Those who enter as teens rarely are adopted, he said, and tragically, some kids get adopted and then return to the foster system. "We do these things to protect kids, but sometimes there's trauma inside that," Spitzer said. "... We have to find solutions." If Democrats Think Mike Pence Is An Extremist, Will They Stop Supporting His Education Policies? Soon after the announcement that Indiana Governor Mike Pence would be the vice presidential candidate for the Republican Party, word came from Democrats that he was an extremist — and not just your garden-variety extremist. "The 'most extreme' vice presidential pick in a generation," an article in USA Today quotes a statement from John Podesta, Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman. Podesta elaborates, according to the reporter, calling Pence, "an early supporter of the Tea Party" and someone who "personally spearheaded" a religious liberty bill that "legalized discrimination" against gays and lesbians (which he later revised); and he was a leader in the effort to defund Planned Parenthood as a member of the U.S. House." "Mike Pence is even worse than you think," warns a report from left leaning news outlet Salon, arguing he has "the most virulently anti-gay records of any government official" and has "also built his career on restricting abortion rights." According to an article in Alternet, Pence is a favorite of Charles and David Koch, the billionaire brothers who fund extreme right wing organizations such as Americans for Prosperity and the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) that writes extremist right wing laws that have been enacted in many states. Another opinion piece in the Washington Post criticizes Pence for "mocking" working moms. As for Clinton herself, according to Politico, because the announcement of Pence's candidacy coincided with her appearance at the annual convention of the American Federation of Teachers, she focused some of her criticism of Pence on his record on education issues. In her address, Clinton "told thousands of cheering teachers union members that Pence is 'one of the most hostile politicians in America when it comes to public education.'" Clinton accused Pence of cutting "millions from higher education while he was 'giving huge cuts to corporations' ... Clinton also said Pence 'turned away millions of federal dollars that could've expanded access to preschool for low-income children.'" A more dispassionate look at Pence's education record by Chalkbeat Indiana reveals he "pushed for career and technical education, school choice, and changes to standards and tests." Despite Clinton's claim that Pence turned away "millions" in federal money for pre-k education, which is true, Pence also, according to the Chalkbeat reporter, pushed "to create a small preschool pilot program" that got "Indiana off the list of just 10 U.S. states that spent no direct state funds to help poor children attend preschool." What's also on Pence's list of education policy accomplishments are a repeal of the state's adoption of Common Core Standards pushed by the Obama administration, a prolonged battle with the state superintendent over control of education policy, and lots and lots of "school choice" legislation, including more funding for privately operated charter schools and expansions of the state's voucher program that allows parents to transfer their students to private schools at taxpayer expense. In other words, what Pence adopted as his education policies resemble a hodge-podge of what is commonly referred to as "education reform." Indeed, organizations that espouse the reform agenda give Pence's education record rave reviews. "Mike Pence Is the Veep Education Reformers Need," declares the Center for Education Reform. CER leader Jeanne Allen declares in her statement, "Mike Pence is a true pioneer of educational opportunity." Pro-reform American Federation for Children gushes, "Governor Pence is a longtime champion for educational choice, believing that every child, regardless of family income or ZIP code, deserves access to a quality education." At Forbes, reform cheerleader Maureen Sullivan's list of "seven things" to know about Pence's education stance reads like a checklist from the reform movement, including charter schools, standardized testing, merit pay for teachers, vouchers, and curriculum geared toward workforce preparation. So, although Pence has strayed from reform orthodoxy at times — voting against the No Child Left Behind law passed under President George W. Bush and steering his state out of the Common Core (which he initially embraced) — he is generally recognized as an education reform leader, making him, in fact, aligned with many Democrats who'd never want to be caught dead supporting what Pence generally espouses. For decades, both Democrats and Republicans have dined at the salad bar of education reform, with Democrats taking a heaping helping of charter schools but light on the vouchers please, and Republicans insisting on standardization but hold the Common Core now that we've gotten a taste of it. Democrats eagerly sat alongside Republicans at the same education policy table in Indiana too. Most of the education policies Pence supported as governor have been a continuation of policies created by fellow Republicans — his predecessor Mitch Daniels and state superintendent Tony Bennett, who suffered a humiliating defeat during Pence's tenure. But those policies often drew the praise of former U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan. In a visit to the state in 2011, Duncan and Bennett commended each other for their "efforts to overhaul education," according to a local reporter. In another visit to the state a year later, Duncan "complimented," according to a local news source, Bennett and Indiana's leadership on the state's expansion of charter schools and state takeovers of local schools — another popular item in the reform salad bar. A New York Times article from 2013 lumps Duncan and Daniels, along with former Michigan Governor John Engler, together in the education policy arena, writing, "They all sympathize with many of the efforts of the so-called education reform movement." Outside of the Obama administration, Indiana education leadership has drawn strong support from StudentsFirst, the education reform advocacy group created and formerly led by ex-Chancellor of Washington, DC schools and avowed Democrat Michelle Rhee. The leader of StudentsFirst Indiana state chapter has been "a key advisor to Governor Mike Pence," according to a statement from the organization. Now that StudentsFirst has merged with reform advocacy group 50CAN, which is also led by avowed Democrats, no doubt that organization's agenda will continue in the Hoosier State. The organization Democrats for Education Reform (DFER) hail Pence's education priorities and claim the influence of prominent Democrats, including President Obama, have had a lot to do with them. So why have so many Democrats shared the education agenda of an extremist the party now generally abhors? When education journalist and Washington Post blogger Valerie Strauss recently asked education historian Diane Ravitch what she would most want to tell President Obama should they ever have a face-to-face meeting, Ravitch replied she would like to tell him, "I will never understand why you decided to align your education policy with that of George W. Bush." The fact that Democrats have been supporting an education agenda that was to a great extent conceived in conservative Republican policy shops has been well known among careful observers and thoroughly documented by Ravitch in her books, The Death and Life of the Great American School, and Reign of Error. "The irony today," Ravitch explains in her interview, "is that many of the leading figures in the Democratic Party support some of the same education policies as the right-wing extremists in ALEC." In an email to me, Ravitch elaborates on more recent collusions between Democrats and Republicans on education policy. "President Obama pulled the rug out [from under public education supporters] by aligning with DFER," she writes. "DFER money managers were big supporters of his. He was the inaugural speaker when they first met in NYC. After the election, they gave Obama a list of people they wanted in the Education Department. Top on it was Arne Duncan." As Dana Goldstein documented for The Nation in 2009, Obama made a decision at the outset of his presidency to listen "to only one side of" the debate on education policy in the Democratic Party. On the winning side were DFER and its wealthy backers from Wall Street who, according to Goldstein, conducted a "highly coordinated media campaign to call into question the work of

Obama education adviser Linda Darling-Hammond, once considered a top contender for the job of education secretary.” After “DFER’s anti-Darling-Hammond talking points,” got prominent attention in major media outlets, Goldstein explains, “Less than two weeks later, Obama appointed DFER’s choice to the Education Department post, Chicago schools CEO Duncan.” By the time Obama and Duncan rolled out Race to the Top and other education initiatives that directed the course of education policy across the nation, it had “become clear,” Goldstein writes, “that DFER’s idea of education reform is the one driving the Obama administration.” But the policy ideas never had roots in populist soil. As Goldstein explains, “Lacking a membership base, [education reform’s] lobbying arm is essentially top-down, financed by New York hedge-funders, supported by research conducted at Beltway think tanks, and represented on the ground by a handful of state and local politicians scattered across the country.” So for the past eight years, the Democratic Party’s education agenda has chiefly been based on an idea conceived in right wing policy shops then pushed into the party’s most powerful circles by a very small but wealthy group of individuals with the ability to push the right levers. Based on this understanding, it’s not a surprise that extremists such as Mike Pence have been eager to adopt much of this agenda. But in calling out Pence as an extremist, is Hillary Clinton signaling there may be “shifts in her party’s education agenda,” as American Prospect’s education journalist Rachel Cohen suggests? An op-ed for the Wall Street Journal, a consistent megaphone for education reform, seems to think so. Calling Clinton’s criticism “an opening,” the author seems to relish a debate on whether policies from an extremist like Pence are best for “low- and middle-income families.” Public schools advocates in the Democratic Party are eager to have that debate too. Audit: Kansas foster care system puts children at risk MARGARET STAFFORD, Associated Press Published: July 27, 2016, 3:44 pm Updated: July 28, 2016, 10:55 am Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) 21Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) 21 Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) Phyllis Gilmore, Department for Children and Families Secretary, answers questions about the audit of her department at a Post Audit Committee meeting Wednesday, July 27, 2016 in Topeka, Kan. The Kansas Department of Children and Families continuing struggles to adequately oversee private foster care contractors is putting children in the system at risk, according to a state audit of the agency released Wednesday. (Emily DeShazer/The Topeka Capital-Journal via AP) KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — The Kansas Department of Children and Families’ continuing struggles to adequately oversee private foster care contractors is putting children in the system at risk, according to a state audit of the agency released Wednesday. Shortly after the 59-page audit was released, two Democratic senators called for department Secretary Phyllis Gilmore to resign. She defended the agency’s efforts to ensure children’s safety and said she did not intend to resign. The Legislative Post Audit found that the agency had implemented only one of nine recommendations it received after a 2013 assessment of services. The department also doesn’t ensure that background checks of individuals in foster homes, adoptive homes and those where children are returned to their families are as frequent and thorough as they should be; doesn’t complete all required monthly visits to foster homes; doesn’t determine if families have the financial resources needed to provide for the children; and approves nearly all requests for exceptions to rules governing foster care homes, auditors said. Phyllis Gilmore, Department for Children and Families Secretary, talks about the audit of her department at a Post Audit Committee meeting Wednesday, July 27, 2016 in Topeka, Kan. (Emily DeShazer/The Topeka Capital-Journal via AP) Some state lawmakers had sought the audit after reports that children died or were mistreated while in the agency’s care. The audit did not address allegations that the agency discriminates against same-sex couples when deciding where to place children. A second audit addressing privatization efforts at DCF is scheduled to be released later this year. Auditors said their findings “indicate that DCF continues to take a hands-off approach to monitoring contractors and perhaps focuses too much on whether federal outcomes are met and not on the specific steps needed to meet them.” Frequent turnover of DCF staff has led to low morale and affected employees’ ability to do their jobs effectively, auditors said, and some case-workers also complained about inadequate training. Auditors also criticized the agency’s record-keeping. Five children in the foster care system died during the 2015 fiscal year, with only one death attributed to mistreatment, according to a November report. Other causes of fatalities included illness and car accidents. One child died because of mistreatment in foster care in the 2014 fiscal year, while another child in the DCF system died that year because of mistreatment while in a family member’s care. Five children in DCF’s system died in total that year. Gilmore conceded the agency has room for improvement but contended its safety record was among the best in the nation. She cited a Child & Federal Services Review that found Kansas ranked second in the nation in protecting children from abuse and neglect, although not all states have completed the review. “That is borne out in our records, which show very few child deaths of those in custody from maltreatment,” Gilmore said in an interview before the audit was released. “We absolutely want no deaths. One is too many and grieves our heart greatly.” She agreed the agency’s turnover is too high and hoped a salary increase approved by the Legislature and an emphasis on improving staff training will help retain employees. Sen. Laura Kelly, D-Topeka, asks DCF Secretary Phyllis Gilmore a question after learning the results of an audit of the department Wednesday, July 27, 2016 in Topeka, Kan. (Emily DeShazer/The Topeka Capital-Journal via AP) But Democratic Reps. Jim Ward and Jarrod Ousley said in a statement that Gilmore should resign. “I’m not comfortable gambling the future of our children in unsafe home environments,” Ward said. “Now is the time to step up and get serious about improving a broken system that is failing Kansas kids. The first step toward that is getting new leadership at DCF.” Gov. Sam Brownback defended the agency and Gilmore. “The men and women at DCF work hard every day to protect our children through these complex and very personal cases,” he said in a statement. “It is important that we all provide them with our full support. Secretary Gilmore will continue to have my full support as she works to address the legitimate record-keeping and contractor accountability concerns cited in the post audit report and, most importantly, to improve the overall foster care system for Kansas children.” Source: <http://ksnt.com/2016/07/27/audit-kansas-foster-care-system-puts-children-at-risk/>

Ex-Children’s Home staffer accused of sexually assaulting 3 Print Email By Pamela Sroka-Holzmann | For lehighvalleylive.com The Express-Times Email the author | Follow on Twitter on July 26, 2016 at 3:59 PM, updated July 26, 2016 at 6:50 PM 347 shares A former staff member at The Children’s Home of Easton is accused of sexually assaulting three teenage girls there over two years. Troy Bussey in 2008. (lehighvalleylive.com file photo) Troy Lowell Bussey, 33, of the 100 block of North Third Street in Easton, allegedly committed the acts between Jan. 1, 2013, and Feb. 1, 2015, while a staff member at the home at 2000 S. 25th St. in Wilson Borough. Borough police said Bussey was in charge of the girls’ care and welfare at The Children’s Home during the time of the crimes. Anita Paukovits, executive director of the organization, said as soon as administrators learned of the accusations, Bussey was suspended and terminated. “This is totally against everything The Children’s Home believes in,” she said. “Safety is of the utmost importance for all of our children as we are in full cooperation with every possible authority so justice is served.” A female victim who was under age 16 told police she was placed with the organization in 2013 and the pair had sex at least 10 times. A second victim under age 17 told police she was placed at the home in 2015. She told police the pair were in a back office of the Cordina Cottage when Bussey grabbed her buttocks and later touched her breasts above her shirt while the pair were in a dining area. When it was time for her to go to bed, the girl told authorities Bussey picked her up, placed her into the bed and touched her genital area. A third victim under age 18 reported to police the pair had sex and Bussey touched her genital area. Paukovits said the organization has since made modifications following the alleged sexual assaults. “Changes have been implemented to make sure nothing like this occurs again,” she said. “The Children’s Home works very diligently to protect all the children and families we serve. We make every effort to prevent incidents like this from happening.” Bussey is charged with one count each of statutory sexual assault, aggravated indecent assault, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse of a person less than 16, and indecent assault of a person less than 16; and three counts each of institutional sexual assault, endangering the welfare of a child, and corruption of minors. Bussey was arraigned before District Judge Richard Yetter III, who set bail at $150,000, $100,000 and $100,000 for all three cases, respectively. In lieu of bail, Bussey was sent to Northampton County Prison. The judge ordered Bussey stay away from all the victims and undergo a mental health evaluation. Bussey is tentatively due back in court for a preliminary hearing before Yetter on Aug. 5. According to its website, the Children’s Home is a private, nonprofit organization established in 1885 that provides care for children in need. It provides foster care, residential and group home services. Source: http://www.lehighvalleylive.com/easton/index.ssf/2016/07/childrens_home_employee_charge.html

Services, struggle to control outbursts and talk rebellious youths into cooling down. But in the last year, at least 50 kids were “EDP’d” and taken by EMS to Bellevue’s emergency rooms, internal reports show. “They’re doping them up,” an insider charged. “We call it “booty juice” when they’re acting out. Nobody likes to be sent to the hospital.” - a 15-year-old girl at the Nicholas Scoppetta Children’s Center The Post’s findings come as Mayor de Blasio — who has pledged to protect the city’s most vulnerable children — fights a federal class-action lawsuit filed in Manhattan last year against ACS. It charges that children in the foster-care system suffer physical and mental abuse, and some get put on mind-numbing doses of psychiatric drugs. ACS said it partners with Bellevue for mental-health services. “If it is determined by doctors that a child requires medication, families are consulted . . . Children are not medicated to sedate them, but only for medically necessary reasons,” said ACS spokeswoman Carol Caceres. But ACS’s Psychotropic Medication Unit has the power to “override” parents unwilling or unable to consent to give drugs. And experts said drugs can be administered to kids in crisis. “If someone is so agitated and out of control that they’re hurting themselves or others, they absolutely could be given an injection,” said Dr. Julie Holland, a psychiatrist and author of “Weekends at Bellevue: Nine Years on the Night Shift at the Psych ER.” She said kids or adults who refuse to take oral medication may get shots of an antipsychotic such as Haldol plus sedating drugs such as Ativan and Benadryl in the arm or buttocks. Bellevue Hospital, where a city-run foster-care facility is allegedly shipping “disturbed” kids for treatment. Photo: R. Umar Abbasi The 55-bed Children’s Center houses wards of the city, from newborns to 21-year-olds. They can spend days to months in the chaotic and dangerous place. ACS insisted the center sees “very few incidents that require the attention of the NYPD,” but incident reports document many cases of assault and vandalism. Some kids kick, punch, bite, scratch and spit at staff. Some break windows, toss furniture and damage property. Most are physically restrained but not charged with crimes, even when a staffer is injured. “They refuse to arrest because it makes it harder to place these kids,” the insider said. “The agency is covering everything up.” Among the uncontrolled youths taken to Bellevue: A girl who screamed and banged on the walls, igniting “a riot” with eight roommates. When cops arrived, one girl was pepper-sprayed. The girl who started the mayhem was sent to the psych unit. A boy who ran through the building “in a state of emotional crisis” last December, ripped down a Christmas wreath and tossed garbage. He kicked a radiator, breaking it, and tried to shock himself with the inner coils. A 20-year-old man who banged his head against the window in a sleeping room, then tried to jump out a second-floor cafeteria window to kill himself. He flipped tables and wrestled with cops who handcuffed him. He suffered an eye injury. A 17-year-old boy told The Post he was sent to Bellevue after threatening to attack a worker who unplugged a TV he was watching. “I wouldn’t do that to him. Why should he do that to me?” he asked. He said he didn’t get any drugs, but other kids said meds given at Bellevue include Benadryl, which can help someone relax, and drugs for bipolar and anxiety disorders. A 17-year-old girl said she was sent to Bellevue and “they had to up the dosage of my medication.” Photo: Shutterstock Kids warehoused at the center have been abused, neglected and removed from their parents but not yet placed in foster homes. They include children with autism, conditions such as diabetes, and pregnant girls or teen moms with babies. “It’s not a jail, but it might as well be,” an insider said. Kids, who attend public schools, are searched with metal detectors upon entry, must turn over cellphones and cigarettes and sleep in rooms with up to 12 beds. “Some kids come and go in the middle of the night,” one said. Those who leave without permission or miss the midnight curfew and fail to return after 24 hours “go AWOL.” Since Jan. 1, the center has called 911 more than 600 times and filed 474 complaint reports — mostly for missing persons, NYPD Lt. John Grimpel said Friday. Guards often break up squabbles and fistfights among kids. “There’s some tension with me and a couple of the girls,” said a 17-year-old girl staying at the center for the second time. Three others tried to “jump” her because she spoke to one of their boyfriends, she said. Marcia Robinson Lowry, the lead lawyer in the federal suit, says she is appalled that kids are sleeping in what was intended as an intake center. “Foster kids don’t do well in shelters. These are troubled kids, and staying in a place like that is likely to exacerbate the problem,” said Lowry, who is also executive director of the advocacy group A Better Childhood. She said she believes the wide use of psychotropic drugs on the kids are “a form of behavior control.” Leticia James, New York City Public Advocate Photo: David McGlynn The office of Public Advocate Letitia James said Friday that it has received numerous reports of “overmedicated” foster kids. James, a plaintiff in the suit, faulted de Blasio’s management of ACS, which oversees some 10,300 children. ACS, she said, “has failed at its singular responsibility, with persistent reports of children placed in harm’s way while under its watch.” Gregory Floyd, president of Teamsters Local 237, the union that represents ACS safety officers, blasted de Blasio for “a pattern” of going easy on kids who break rules and attack others. “All that behavior is being excused by this administration,” Floyd said. “I’m not saying incarceration is the answer, but they need to acknowledge the problem and get them the appropriate treatment or it will only get worse.” ACS said it’s trying to move older kids out of the downtown center. It has a 12-bed “youth reception center” in Brooklyn for those 14 and above, and aims to add 18 teen beds in Brooklyn and Staten Island by the end of September. It also plans to open “host homes” in each borough where 30 teens can stay while awaiting a permanent placement. Poor Discipline: Why Scared Straight Programs and Boot Camps Don’t Help Teens at Risk for Substance Use and Addiction POSTED: 8/2/16 TEENS AND FAMILIES ADDICTION MYTHS Comments\(0\) For over 30 years, programs like Scared Straight and juvenile boot camps for teens have been used as a way to try and help troubled youth. These programs utilize different methods that revolve around the same basic principle: that instilling a sense of consequence, discipline, fear, and pro-social behaviors in teens struggling with behavioral issues and substance problems will provide them with healthier, more structured lives, and deter them from committing crimes. Yet these programs have come under increased scrutiny in recent years. Experts who study the justice system have questioned if they’re truly effective. Additionally, staff members in boot camp programs have been accused (and convicted) of abusing the teens they’re supposed to be helping. The History of Scared Straight and Boot Camps Scared Straight programs started in New Jersey in the 1970’s, and were popularized by the 1978 Academy Award winning documentary Scared Straight!, which followed a group of teens participating in a Scared Straight program. In this film – and in most of the Scared Straight programs – teens who are thought to be at high risk for delinquency are brought to a prison, shown the facilities, and then (often in screams), told by inmates the ways in which they’re destroying their lives by committing crimes and using drugs. These confrontational lessons reflect the inmates’ own experiences. In the documentary – and among many advocates of Scared Straight programs – it is claimed that there are low rates of re-arrest for teens who participate in these programs. In one study, it was suggested that 10 out of 12 adolescents remained offense-free in the three month follow-up. Teen boot camps – military-like training programs frequently located in rural areas – operate in a similar manner. Boot camps often revolve around grueling physical activities and tough discipline, intended to instill a sense of order in adolescents and stamp out non-conforming or oppositional behavior. Developed in Louisiana in 1985, boot camps gained immense popularity in the 1990’s. They were less expensive than putting juveniles in detention centers and thought to be more effective. Most adolescents in the boot camps complete the residential program without incident (i.e., without committing infractions that would have them removed from the program) – at rates as high as 96 percent. By 1995, 30 states had a form of adolescent boot camps for juvenile offenders. According to the Science, They Don’t Work Though a few studies suggested that Scared Straight worked, many others showed less successful results. In fact, research showed that the re-arrest rate after Scared Straight was actually higher than for teens who never participated in these programs. In other words, teens participating in Scared Straight were committing more crimes. The strict discipline provided by boot camps has also been shown to fail the troubled teens they’re supposed to serve. Re-arrest rates are high among graduates of boot camps, and many of these programs were – and continue to be – completely unregulated, without any mental health professionals on staff. There have even been a number of cases of physical and sexual abuse in boot camps and, tragically, a few teens have died while in the program. Some boot camps have been shut down as a result of abuse. By 2009 only 11 states retained boot camps for juvenile offenders. Scared Straight and boot camps fail for the reason they’re supposed to succeed: the threat or delivery of harsh negative consequences. Indeed, teens exposed to Scared Straight programs tend to idealize the structure found in prisons – an element that is often missing from juvenile offenders’ lives. For those attending boot camps, the rough conditions only seem to encourage more aggressive behaviors – obviously not what’s needed for teens already facing the legal system or suffering from a substance or behavioral problem. What You Can Do There’s no quick and easy fix for an adolescent struggling with substance use or a related behavioral disorder. Be proactive when helping your teen, and research what kind of program best suits their needs. There are many effective, safe treatment centers that offer help – but it’s important to make sure they have licensed health professionals on staff, and that the program uses evidence-based practices that take a health-promoting rather than a punitive approach. Addiction is a disease and, like other diseases, it cannot be cured through fear and punishment. State accused of segregating Minnesotans with disabilities in group homes Group home system limits options, class action says. Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint Hundreds, and possibly thousands, of Minnesotans with disabilities are being forced to live in segregated group homes, according to a lawsuit filed Wednesday that asserts that they are cut off from mainstream society and prevented from living in communities of their choosing. In a class-action suit against the state of Minnesota, attorneys with Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid allege that the Department of Human Services maintains a “discriminatory residential service system” that funnels individuals with disabilities into nearly 3,500 group homes statewide, where they are surrounded by other people with disabilities and have little control over their daily lives, while depriving them of access to housing options that would enable them to live more independently. Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC “People are stuck in these facilities, where they experience isolation, lack of control and an overall helplessness,” said Legal Aid attorney Sean Burke. “It’s no longer good enough.” A spokeswoman for the Department of Human Services declined to comment, saying Human Services Commissioner Emily Johnson Piper had not been served with the lawsuit as of late Wednesday. Minnesota has long stood out among states for its reliance on private group homes for adults who may have difficulty living independently. After the state began closing large public mental health hospitals in the 1970s, such small, four-bedroom group homes were seen as a more humane and cost-effective alternative. However, a Star Tribune investigation last year found that many people with intellectual and developmental disabilities are sent to group homes against their will, even when they are capable of taking care of themselves. Hundreds are placed more than 100 miles from their families, in settings that leave them isolated from friends, relatives and support networks. The homes are indirectly subsidized through Medicaid, the state and federal health insurance program, which covers the cost of their services. One plaintiff, Marrie Bottelson, 41, is an artist who would like to create an art studio in her own home. However, Bottelson, who has cerebral palsy, has lived in a group home for 13 years where staffing has severely limited her ability to become more involved in the community, the lawsuit states. Because of staffing patterns in the facility, Bottelson is forced to go to bed at 7 or 8 p.m. because there is no other way for her to receive care for her disability. For several years, Bottelson has asked case managers and county workers for help moving into an apartment with her best friend, but has been told repeatedly that there are no options other than her group home. “This is a person who could really be flourishing if she could actually have an apartment and an art studio,” said Justin Perl, Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid’s litigation director. Another plaintiff, Tenner Murphy, 32, has severe physical and cognitive disabilities as a result of a lifelong battle with degenerative brain cancer. Despite this condition, Murphy has developed hobbies, such as archery, and has many non-disabled friends in the community. When he moved to a group home, he was walking on a regular basis, yet the home’s managers made him use a wheelchair because they lacked the staff to assist him when he was unable to walk, the lawsuit alleges. The lawsuit alleges that such restrictions are a violation of a landmark 1999 U.S. Supreme Court ruling, known as Olmstead, that requires states to ensure that people with disabilities receive services in integrated settings. Under the ruling, public entities are required to provide community-based services when such services are appropriate and when they can be reasonably accommodated. Under pressure from a federal judge, Minnesota last year became one of the last states in the country to adopt a blueprint — known as an Olmstead plan — to expand community-based options for people with disabilities. Under that plan, the state planned to move 5,547 people by June 2019 into more integrated housing and pledged to greatly expand community alternatives for Minnesotans with disabilities, though attorneys allege the state still lacks a detailed plan for how to reduce its overreliance on group homes. “Our clients just want to live where they want and with whom they want, just like people without disabilities,” Perl said. “Unfortunately, the system Minnesota has created for them has needlessly segregated them from the rest of the society.” Source: <http://www.startribune.com/state-accused-of-segregating-minnesotans-with-disabilities-in-group-homes/389129591/>

Suit over NYC foster care system continues Hearing on state settlement on Friday Story Comments \(1\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Thursday, August 4, 2016 10:30 am Suit over NYC foster care system continues by Christopher Barca, Associate Editor Queens Chronicle | 1 comment Beatings, sexual abuse, neglect and malnutrition. That’s what countless kids in the city’s foster care system have experienced on a daily basis, according to Marcia Robinson Lowry. The executive director of A Better Childhood, Lowry is leading the class action lawsuit filed last July against the city, state and their respective agencies and commissioners that handle the foster care system. Despite nearing a settlement with the state and its Office of Children and Family Services — a fairness hearing, where a judge will consider any opposition to the settlement, is scheduled for Friday — she says the suit against the city continues. But instead of financial compensation, Lowry said all the 10 foster children listed as plaintiffs on behalf of the 11,000 kids in the system are reforms. “New York has some of the worst outcomes for kids in the country,” Lowry said. “Kids in New York City stay in foster care significantly longer than anywhere else in the country and are discharged at a far lower rate.” Some of the reforms being demanded are increased oversight, limitations on care agencies the city can contract with and an attempt to reduce caseloads of overburdened workers. In the proposed settlement with the state, many of those issues have already seen compromise. OFCS Commissioner Sheila Poole has agreed to hire a monitor to identify flaws in the system and cases of mistreatment, in addition to creating quarterly reports about the state of foster care in New York. A research expert will also be hired to review case records and evaluate the safety of foster children. City Administration of Children’s Services Commissioner Gladys Carrion, a defendant in the suit, told The New York Times in 2015 that the agency has taken “substantial strides” in reforming foster care in the five boroughs, an initiative that came directly from Mayor de Blasio. Former group home worker faces new assault charge CAROLINE GRUESKIN Bismarck Tribune 5 hrs ago Additional charges have been filed against a former employee of Charles Hall Youth Services who’s been accused of having sexual contact with a 15-year-old in the group home. The new charges against Ethmonia Barclay, 25, come as the result of a new interview with the victim. The incidents allegedly occurred about a year and a half ago. The victim told police in April 2015 that he and Barclay had sex at the home. That story was corroborated by statements from other residents, according to an affidavit filed in the original case. While preparing for trial, the victim told authorities about additional encounters between him and Barclay, according to a brief filed by Burleigh County Assistant State’s Attorney Marina Spahr. The teen was then interviewed at the Sanford Children’s Advocacy Center in May 2016, where he reported incidents of inappropriate touching, according to an affidavit filed in the newer case. Barclay was responsible for supervising kids in the group home at the time. Barclay was initially charged in May 2015 with corruption or solicitation of minors. Now she also faces charges of sexual assault and sexual abuse of wards. Barclay could face a maximum of 15 years in prison, if convicted. The cases have been joined, and she is scheduled to go to trial on all charges on Oct. 11. Barclay’s attorney declined to comment on the case. Three calls and an email to Charles Hall Youth Services were not returned Friday. THE DRUG DOCS California’s top foster care prescribers are fueling the medication of vulnerable kids. Now, lawmakers are on the cusp of reining in the practice Story by KAREN DE SÁ and TRACY SEIPEL Photographs and video by DAI SUGANO PUBLICATION: AUGUST 7, 2016 THE DRUG DOCS California’s top foster care prescribers are fueling the medication of vulnerable kids. Now, lawmakers are on the cusp of reining in the practice Story by KAREN DE SÁ and TRACY SEIPEL Photographs and video by DAI SUGANO PUBLICATION: AUGUST 7, 2016 PART 6 of 7 F or years, few questioned how doctors treated the emotional trauma of California’s abused and neglected children — and nobody monitored how often they handed out psychiatric drugs that can turn fragile childhoods into battles with obesity and bouts of stupor. Now, a Bay Area News Group investigation into the prescribing habits of the state’s foster care doctors reveals for the first time how a fraction of those physicians has been fueling the medicating of California’s most vulnerable kids. Tomorrow: Part 7 Abandoned as a child, Tasia Wright wanted love and understanding. But her foster care doctor had a different idea of how to treat her trauma. A mere 10 percent of the state’s highest prescribers were responsible about 50 percent of the time when a foster child received an antipsychotic, the riskiest class of what are known as psychotropic drugs — with some of the most harmful side effects. The startling numbers are revealed as part of a new analysis of Medi-Cal pharmacy data, which the news organization obtained through a public records request. These same doctors often relied on risky, unproven combinations of the drugs, a practice widely rejected by medical associations and other states. In San Bernardino County, one psychiatrist prescribed antipsychotics to 328 foster children — 85 percent of the young patients to whom he gave a psychiatric drug in the five years the investigation examined. And when one antipsychotic didn’t work — or wasn’t enough — Dr. Warris Walayat routinely prescribed another. Many of the highest prescribers stand out for other practices that raise questions about their judgment or objectivity: A psychiatrist who oversees treatment at a Riverside County group home for troubled children is a self-proclaimed “spokesperson for pharmaceutical companies.” A doctor training psychiatry residents at a San Diego children’s center once prescribed an antipsychotic to an out-of-control kindergartner. And a veteran Visalia child psychiatrist touts a drug approved to treat mania and schizophrenia as an effective “sleep aid.” Growing up in the foster care system, Rochelle Trochtenberg spent much of her youth in a heavily medicated state. She says her doctors weren’t especially cautious about the drugs, and when she was 18, she had a reaction that sent her to the emergency room. She was suffering from a side effect that caused much of her body to seize up. “I literally didn’t have the ability to move my body,” she recalls. “I was terrified.” The findings come as state lawmakers consider stepping up scrutiny of foster care prescribers — one of the final pieces of sweeping reforms in response to this newspaper’s 2014 investigation “Drugging Our Kids.” The series found nearly 1 in 4 adolescents in California foster care received psychotropic medication, often to control their behavior — not address the serious mental illnesses that many of the drugs were approved to treat. In the cases of seven of California’s highest prescribers, the state has been put on notice before — all were identified in 2010 as part of a ranking in a U.S. senator’s nationwide hunt for doctors “prescribing mental health drugs at astonishingly high rates.” But no action was taken; in fact, the state appears to have never disciplined a doctor for excessive prescribing to foster children. Rochelle Trochtenberg, a once-heavily medicated foster youth who now serves as California ombudsperson for foster care, called the reluctance to even monitor prescribers a failure of “staggering” proportions. “What I see in these numbers is: We don’t really treat, we use chemical restraints. We drug,” said Trochtenberg, who said doctors blithely prescribed multiple meds rather than help her recover from the deep pain and trauma of childhood abuse. “Medications are so overused — and so significantly — that it’s outrageous there’s such a lack of leadership in holding doctors accountable, and holding the system accountable.” The findings The prescription data, obtained from Medi-Cal benefit claims after more than a year of negotiations with state officials under the California Public Records Act, are limited. They omit dosage levels and diagnoses, which would reveal just how many of these drugs were prescribed for uses not approved by the FDA, a common and legal but sometimes controversial practice known as “off-label” prescribing. Nevertheless, the data reveal how the state’s most prolific prescribers helped sustain a drug-dependent system. To identify outlying prescribers, this newspaper consulted more than a dozen child psychiatrists and academic researchers across the country, ultimately focusing on the most extreme forms of prescribing found in the database: Physicians who gave their young patients multiple antipsychotics, or three or more drugs at once. The risks of administering multiple drugs to children, especially to their developing brains, have not been well-documented. But the side effects of even one antipsychotic — excessive weight gain, diabetes, extreme lethargy and tremors — can be debilitating. The data from July 2009 to July 2014 show: A select group of doctors used the riskiest drugs as regular treatment and often in dangerous combinations — Despite widespread concern over the use of antipsychotics on children, more than 100 doctors prescribed the drugs to at least 75 percent of their patients who received a psychiatric drug — more than double the average rate. And 56 prescribers gave two or more antipsychotics for more than 60 days to at least 11 of their patients. “This is definitely an outlier practice group,” said Dr. Chris Bellonci, a longtime child psychiatrist and researcher at Tufts University School of Medicine, widely known for his studies of the use of psychotropic drugs in foster care. “You can see what happens if all we have is a prescription pad. We’ll use it, and in these cases, perhaps, abuse it.” Dr. Cynthia Hunt, a Monterey psychiatrist, was the most prolific prescriber of the lengthy regimen of multiple antipsychotics, resorting to the combination for 50 of her young patients, covering 7 percent of the foster children statewide who received a similar treatment plan. Pasadena psychiatrist Dr. Eliot Moon accounted for another 6 percent of the dual prescribing, according to the data. Affiliations of many high prescribers raise questions about objectivity — An intensive review of the backgrounds and affiliations of 25 of the highest prescribers revealed seven conduct research for drug companies that manufacture and market psychotropics; 14 have worked in an outmoded residential group home industry that relies on sedation to maintain order among the troubled youth it shelters; and eight are spreading their treatment approaches by teaching the next generation of psychiatrists in medical schools. Prescribing by nonphysicians may be violating state law — “Physicians” are the only professionals who can receive authorization from the juvenile court to prescribe psychiatric drugs to foster children, but more than 600 nurse practitioners and physician assistants have prescribed the medications to thousands of patients, an apparent violation of state law that has gone wholly unnoticed. While state officials suggest nurse practitioners have legal authority to prescribe under the supervision of a physician, judges and children’s advocates say the court authorization process does not, and was never intended to, account for that. Retired Los Angeles Juvenile Court Judge Terry Friedman, the architect of that law, condemned the “alarming degree of noncompliance” as an example of the lax oversight tolerated for years. “Everything just sort of falls between the cracks because there’s been no serious enforcement of this law.” Tisha Ortiz, a former foster youth now attending Cal State East Bay, says the constant medication left her “so zoned out I couldn’t understand what was going on around me.” Although she played softball and kickboxed, her weight ballooned. The medication made her face and legs twitch and left her so lethargic she often fell asleep in school says Ortiz, 23. Doctors: Drugs often needed Psychiatrists who treat foster youth describe their urgent needs, suicide attempts, aggressive acts toward caregivers, and the depths of their grief and depression. Many doctors say medication is often the safest and most effective way to help a child in a crisis. “It’s kind of like if someone comes into the emergency room and is bleeding from an artery on their wrist, you don’t do marital therapy on them — you stop the bleeding,” said Dr. Michael Barnett, a psychiatrist who treats foster youth at two Visalia group homes and is one of the state’s highest prescribers of antipsychotics to foster youth. Eighty-five of the 104 foster youth to whom he prescribed a psychotropic drug received antipsychotics, the data show, and half were prescribed two or more for over a month. While the news organization reached out to more than two dozen of the highest prescribers, Barnett was one of only three who agreed to be interviewed. He said he wasn’t surprised to land high on the list because he prescribes low doses of the antipsychotic Seroquel as a sleep aid. “Whether the child is agitated because of bipolar disorder, schizophrenia, withdrawal off drugs, or agitated because they’re in a group home, a lot of times it’s difficult to tease out why they’re breaking things or punching holes in the wall,” Barnett said. “But I’m going to stop that behavior as quickly as I can to protect the child, so I will use any medication that I think will help with that.” However, as long-term treatments go, psychiatric drugs can be a blunt instrument, failing to address the source of a child’s pain and leaving scars that may last years, even a lifetime. Tisha Ortiz, a 23-year-old former foster youth now attending Cal State East Bay, has testified repeatedly before the Legislature about the impact of being heavily medicated throughout her childhood as she grew up in residential group homes. An examination of her foster care health records, which she shared with this news organization, revealed the names of psychiatrists who were among the state’s highest prescribers of aggressive combinations of medication. Among them was Riverside County psychiatrist Dr. Michael Ilas, who was Ortiz’s doctor when she was 15 and prescribed four medications, including lithium, used for bipolar patients; trazodone, used to treat major depressive disorder in adults but not approved for pediatric use; and the antipsychotics Abilify and Geodon. Ilas, who resorted to multiple antipsychotics for his foster care patients more than three times as often as the average doctor, declined to comment. The combinations of these drugs left Ortiz “so zoned out I couldn’t understand what was going on around me,” she said. Although she played softball and kickboxed, her weight ballooned. Her face and legs twitched, and in high school, she slept through first and second periods, failing her favorite class. When she saw psychiatrists, “they were all about upping or adding on more medication, and not about what was really going on with my mental health,” said Ortiz, who first entered foster care at age 4 and suffered flashbacks from sexual and physical abuse. “You really can’t treat trauma with just medications. It doesn’t help a child heal.” Children in the foster care system are issued “health and educational passports” that, in part, track their various prescriptions. According to an excerpt from one of Ortiz’s diagnosis and treatment documents, in January 2008, Ortiz, then 15, was diagnosed with bipolar and post-traumatic stress disorders and was prescribed four medications at once: lithium, trazodone and the antipsychotics Abilify and Geodon. Ortiz’s testimony has helped propel legislation through Sacramento that would identify doctors who prescribe psychotropic drugs inappropriately. State Sen. Mike McGuire’s Senate Bill 1174 — which faces key votes in the Assembly and Senate this month — would for the first time establish routine monitoring of prescribers and alert the state medical board about individual physicians whose patterns warrant an investigation. Last year, Gov. Jerry Brown signed a series of bills to hold the state’s judges, social workers, public health nurses and care providers more accountable for protecting foster children from inappropriate medications. But efforts to rein in prescribers ran head on into the powerful doctors’ lobby, delaying critical pieces of the legislative reform package. And the opposition this year has not wavered. Lobbyists for California psychiatrists fiercely defend their doctors’ treatment of foster children. They note that doctors already must undergo a newly mandated review process that state data suggest is reducing the use of antipsychotics and curbing questionable prescriptions. They also argue against identifying outlier doctors to the medical board, stating in testimony before the Legislature that the proposed law would single out doctors who work in juvenile halls, group homes or psychiatric inpatient units, and “may have a much higher prescription rate to children than a prescribing physician who provides services to the general population.” Hunt is one of those doctors. In a statement to the news organization, she said her high rates of prescribing multiple antipsychotics came as she was working with deeply troubled foster youth who were one step from being hospitalized or in a locked facility and suffered from serious mental illnesses. “I completely agree that it should be the exception that an adolescent has two or more antipsychotic medications,” said Hunt who worked in Merced at the time.

"In these youth, the combination of medications was necessary to keep them stable and to avoid another hospitalization. The plan was, and always is, to lower the medications for these children. To discontinue medication too quickly can also cause significant side effects or a return of symptoms." Walt Mancini/Southern California News Group Dr. Allan McDonald, a Los Angeles psychiatrist who landed among the highest prescribers of antipsychotics, said doctors can use more scrutiny: "We tend to operate in isolation." Dr. Linette Scott, chief medical information officer for the state Department of Health Care Services, said prescribing rates differ among doctors in any area of practice, such as cardiology and neurology, because specialists "will prescribe the medications that are used more rarely and carry additional risk." But Dr. Allan McDonald, a veteran Los Angeles County child psychiatrist who landed among the highest prescribers of multiple antipsychotics, said he welcomes more scrutiny. Doctors — and their patients — will only benefit from more feedback and review from peers, he said. "We tend to operate in isolation," said McDonald, 78, who still sees foster children at two group homes. He said he was surprised to learn he prescribed multiple antipsychotics to 76 foster children during the period reviewed, acknowledging, "The general rule among child psychiatrists is not to do that." There are explanations, he said. Sometimes a child is on two antipsychotics for a short period while a doctor switches drugs (the news organization's analysis suggested that was the case with about 60 percent of the children who received dual antipsychotics from McDonald). Other times, the list of medications can grow if doctors feel it's necessary to try new combinations to help a child who is not improving. But McDonald, who has treated some of the Los Angeles area's toughest-to-reach children over nearly five decades, said he believes the state has its share of doctors who overprescribe without thoroughly evaluating a child. "They are not working smart enough, not collecting enough reliable information, to support a diagnosis," McDonald said. "It is probably a sign that doctors are feeling desperate — you don't know what to do, you're throwing everything at it." Dr. Michael Barnett, a psychiatrist who treats foster youths at residential group homes in Visalia, says when a child is in crisis, it can be "difficult to tease out why they're breaking things or punching holes in the wall. But I'm going to stop that behavior as quickly as I can to protect the child, so I will use any medication that I think will help with that." Where are the high prescribers? Many of the highest prescribers of psychiatric drugs to the state's foster children can be found in California's Inland Empire, a sprawling region of San Bernardino and Riverside counties stretching east of Los Angeles to the desert. Here, child psychiatrists can spend hours on the road, driving from far-flung medical offices to residential group homes that house tough-to-place foster youth. NOT ENOUGH DOCTORS? Psychiatrists per 100,000 children: 4 in San Bernardino County 20 in Santa Clara County Number of high prescribers of anti-psychotics under one measure: 8 in San Bernardino County 2 in Santa Clara County This news organization's analysis showed the region was home to 25 percent of the state's highest prescribers in one measure — a group of 56 doctors across California who prescribed two or more antipsychotics to at least 20 children representing at least one-third of their foster care patients who received a psych drug. Twenty-three percent of the doctors from this high-prescribing group treated children in the Central Valley, and 16 percent practiced in Los Angeles. In contrast, only 10 percent from this group worked in the nine-county Bay Area. It isn't clear what's behind pockets of high prescribers, or whether doctors who choose to prescribe regularly influence colleagues to do the same. Another factor that could be driving doctors to rely on medications: too many patients, too little time. For example, with a rate of four child psychiatrists for every 100,000 children, San Bernardino County is well below the statewide average of 11. In Santa Clara County, there are nearly 20 per 100,000 children. But the news group's investigation found one more potential driver for some of this region's high prescribing: Many of these doctors are affiliated with clinical research firms that conduct paid trials for pharmaceutical companies interested in boosting sales of their drugs. Perhaps the most notable example was a group of doctors who, until recently, did business as Shanti Clinical Trials in an unremarkable medical office building, 2 miles west of Loma Linda University Medical Center. ANTIPSYCHOTIC MEDICINES Antipsychotic drugs are approved to calm or sedate mentally ill patients during psychotic "breaks" and allow patients to sleep or help make them more compliant. But they are often prescribed "off-label" to control the behavior of patients with no diagnosis of mental illness. Here are some of the antipsychotics being prescribed to foster children: Abilify Brand name for aripiprazole Approved to treat: Manic episodes of bipolar disorder in adults and children ages 10 to 17, schizophrenia in adults and children ages 13 to 17, and irritability from autism in kids ages 6 to 17. Possible side effects: Include weight gain, diabetes, tremors Geodon Brand name for ziprasidone Approved to treat: Schizophrenia and acute manic or mixed episodes associated with bipolar disorder; can be added to lithium for maintenance of bipolar disorder. Not approved for children under 18. Possible side effects: Include nausea, constipation, dizziness, restlessness, tremors, diarrhea, runny nose, cough, drowsiness. Risperdal Approved to treat: Schizophrenia in children ages 13 to 17 and acute bipolar mania in kids 10 to 17 years old. Possible side effects: Include weight gain, diabetes, bed-wetting and tremors. Seroquel Brand name for quetiapine Approved to treat: Schizophrenia in children ages 13 to 17, and bipolar mania in kids ages 10 to 17. Possible side effects: Include weight gain, diabetes and tremors. Zyprexa Brand name for olanzapine Approved to treat: Schizophrenia and bipolar disorder in adults and children ages 13 to 17. Sometime used with other antipsychotics or anti-depressants. Possible side effects: Include trouble speaking or swallowing, uncontrollable face movements, confusion, hallucinations, weakness, chills, sore throat, stomach pain, rigid muscles, increased thirst, swelling in hands or feet. Two of the highest prescribers of psych drugs in the California foster care system, Dr. Warris Walayat and Dr. Salvador Lasala, are listed as investigators at Shanti, which ran medication trials for childhood depression, attention deficits and bipolar disorder, among other research sponsored by some of the biggest names in the pharmaceutical industry. Walayat, who has offices listed throughout San Bernardino County and was a staff psychiatrist with the Riverside County Mental Health Department, was the state foster care system's most frequent prescriber of both antipsychotics and the mood stabilizers lithium and Depakote. None of the Shanti clinicians responded to repeated interview requests by phone, email or certified mail. And a visit in May to the clinic's address in the city of Colton found the office had been taken over by a new psychiatrist. Two other psychiatrists who worked at Shanti showed up in the news organization's data analysis, including Dr. Gurmeet Multani, who prescribed psych drugs to 196 foster children in less than two years. In 2010, he surrendered his medical license after being accused of having sex with five adult patients as well as the wife of a man he was treating for depression. The California Medical Board also accused him of writing prescriptions for drug addicts and people who were not his patients. He was found to have falsified his patient records in a failed attempt to deter investigators, state records show. Multani also came under fire that same year when the pharmaceutical giant Eli Lilly found serious noncompliance issues in a drug trial he was conducting, including the underreporting of "adverse events" in patients. The drug, which combined antidepressant and antipsychotic medications, was being tested on children ages 10 to 17. Leemon McHenry, a legal consultant in California who researches cases against drug companies that have misrepresented their scientific findings, described the role of high-prescribing pharma researchers — particularly those treating foster children — as "extremely problematic." "Given the vulnerability of this particular patient population," he said, "we owe it to them to have less conflicted investigators." Questionable connections Of all the juxtapositions of interests and influence, one raised the deepest concerns: the presence of doctors with drug company connections at group homes. Foster children in those homes are often the most emotionally damaged and difficult to manage, so the temptation to medicate them is strong — even without the potential intrusion of other interests. Dr. Eliot Moon, who treats foster children at Hillside, a residential group home in Pasadena, also runs a firm out of a storefront in the Riverside County city of Wildomar that conducts clinical trials sponsored by 13 pharmaceutical companies. Moon and his firm received more than $1.2 million from 2013 through 2015 from drug companies to conduct his research, according to the government's website that discloses pharmaceutical company payments to doctors. And Medi-Cal pharmacy records show he was the second-highest prescriber of multiple antipsychotics, using the combination on 46 foster children for more than 60 days in the five-year period examined. Repeated interview requests to Moon by phone, email, certified letter and visits to his offices were not answered. His dual role as a prescriber and paid researcher is not unique. About 80 miles to the south, Dr. Harinder Grewal oversees care for troubled youth "experiencing psychological, social, emotional and behavioral problems" at the Oak Grove Center in Murrieta. The group home's website also describes her as "a spokesperson for pharmaceutical companies such as Bristol-Myers Squibb, Pfizer, AstraZeneca and Johnson & Johnson." The state's data show Grewal prescribed an antipsychotic to 115 foster children during the examined period; 26 percent of them received multiple antipsychotics for more than 60 days. From 2010 to 2013, she received $471,665 for drug company research, according to company disclosures compiled by the news outlet ProPublica. An identified high prescriber of Seroquel — the brand name for the antipsychotic quetiapine — Grewal is also listed as one of the investigators in a 2013 study published in the Journal of Child and Adolescent Psychopharmacology that found the drug "generally safe and well tolerated in youth." Sponsored by the drug's manufacturer, AstraZeneca, the study listed two of its four authors as drug company employees. Seroquel is narrowly approved for older children and teens diagnosed with rare pediatric instances of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. But doctors often prescribe the medication "off-label" to treat children for everything from aggression to attention deficits. In 2010, AstraZeneca settled a federal lawsuit by paying $520 million to resolve the U.S. Department of Justice's accusation that the company illegally marketed Seroquel to child and adolescent physicians and doctors treating the elderly. Discovery in the legal case revealed questionable science behind the Seroquel promotional campaign, including internal documents describing the "cherry-picking" of data, and unfavorable scientific findings that were "buried." Grewal didn't respond to repeated inquiries from a reporter about her work. But managers at Oak Grove and

Hillside said no foster kids in their care have been involved in clinical drug trials. That assurance was of little comfort to foster children advocates who reviewed the news organization's findings. "The prevalence of industry-funded, high-prescribing doctors at group homes may be the most troubling discovery," said Carmen Balber, executive director of Consumer Watchdog, a Santa Monica-based advocacy group. "Are doctors blind to a prescribing bias created by their financial ties to the drug companies? Or have group homes become testing grounds for some of the drug industry's most lucrative products? Either possibility is chilling." LINKS TO HIGH PRESCRIBERS Loma Linda University Medical Center data shows a cluster of high prescribers of antipsychotics to foster children with connections to the university and hospital, including Dr. William Murdoch, the chair of the psychiatry department and an associate professor. Murdoch was surprised to see his name so high on the list of California prescribers, saying his philosophy on prescribing is cautious, especially among young patients. Oak Grove Center At this Murrieta group home, Dr. Harinder Grewal oversees care for troubled youth "experiencing psychological, social, emotional and behavioral problems." Between 2010 and 2013, Grewal received $471,665 for drug company research, according to company disclosures compiled by ProPublica. The group home's website describes Grewal as "a spokesperson for pharmaceutical companies such as Bristol-Myers, Squibb, Pfizer Inc., AstraZeneca and Johnson & Johnson." Shanti Clinical Trials This office in Colton until recently housed a firm that ran medication trials for childhood depression, attention deficit and bipolar disorder, among other research sponsored by some of the biggest names in the pharmaceutical industry. Two of the highest prescribers of psych drugs to foster children are listed as investigators at the clinic: Dr. Salvador Lasala and Dr. Warris Walayat, who state records show was the highest prescriber of antipsychotics to foster children from 2009-2014. Rancho Damacitas Tisha Ortiz, a 23-year-old former foster youth now attending CSU East Bay, has testified repeatedly before the Legislature about the impact of being heavily medicated throughout her childhood as she grew up in residential group homes. Ortiz spent two years of her childhood at this group home. The prescribing debate There is no dispute that many foster children have significant mental health needs, having been wrenched from abusive and neglectful parents, and then suffering the trauma of losing their families, no matter how troubled. But a fierce debate continues among psychiatrists about what medications are safe and appropriate to treat childhood trauma. Absent scientific evidence or research, prescribing often falls on a clinician's preference and personal experience. And those who most frequently opt for nonapproved drugs say they believe they are doing the right thing for kids. "If I see a 4-year-old and several other doctors have seen this child, and they're in the hospital because of out-of-control aggression, I may go ahead and prescribe medication even though it is not recommended," said McDonald, the Los Angeles-area psychiatrist. "I would start with an anti-anxiety medicine, and if it does not work, then I would look to an antipsychotic like Risperdal. ... If somebody called me up or wrote me a letter questioning my decision, I would explain the situation." Barnett, the Visalia group home psychiatrist, said he has successfully treated "a lot" of children with two — and even three — antipsychotics at once. He describes the drugs as an effective sleep aid, an "augmentation" to antidepressants, and safer than mood stabilizers and other medications that can become addictive. "I know it's not approved by the FDA or recommended and all that stuff," Barnett added. But he said the second antipsychotic can have a "booster effect," enhancing the first drug. "I cannot understand what is unsafe about two antipsychotics," he said. However, the simultaneous use of two antipsychotics is widely rejected by medical professional groups and in many states. Citing "significant risks," the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry states "there is no clear evidence to support the use of more than one antipsychotic in either adults or youths." County mental health departments in the Bay Area and Los Angeles discourage the use of two antipsychotics, as do the states of Illinois, Washington, Indiana, Texas, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan. If a child is on two antipsychotics for more than four weeks, "it's negligence," said Thomas Tarshis, an adjunct assistant professor at Stanford University School of Medicine and treating psychiatrist on the adolescent inpatient unit at Mills-Peninsula Medical Center in San Mateo. The news organization's review suggested that many doctors are finding another way. More than 2,600 prescribers gave no more than one mental health drug to their patients, often stimulants to treat attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Several psychiatrists did not prescribe a single antipsychotic, even those treating children in residential facilities. Dr. Stuart Bair, of Sunnyvale, was one of them. With more than 40 years' experience, Bair said psychiatric medication does nothing to address traumatic childhoods. "In general, they are worse than the benefit," Bair said, "and do not deal with the pervasive underlying problems that these children have suffered." One 16-year-old boy Bair treated in a group home recently was on so much Seroquel for an unspecified "mood disorder" that he was overweight, could barely keep his eyes open and slurred his speech. He sat slumped in a chair most days, barely moving. Over a month's time, Bair tapered him off the drug and watched him come back to life, becoming a "lively and talkative" boy who cried and embraced Bair when the psychiatrist moved on to a new job. "There are doctors out there trying to do the right thing," said Anna Johnson, policy advocate at the National Center for Youth Law, which has sponsored a series of bills on the issue, including McGuire's. "But the good people in the system are being weighed down by the doctors who think multiple medications are the standard of care. That's a big myth." On two different occasions, Trochtenberg, the ombudsperson, received prescriptions for two antipsychotics when she was in foster care. Never, she said, did she feel that her doctors were especially cautious about the medications. Her clearest memory is a sudden reaction to a mix of Haldol and Trilafon when she was 18 that sent her to the emergency room. Suffering from what she was told was a common side effect known as tardive dyskinesia, her fingers seized up and became rigid, then her hands, arms and legs froze. "I literally didn't have the ability to move my body," she recalled. "I was terrified. I had no idea what was happening to me, and of course when I found out it was related to the medication, I wanted to stop it all." Sen. Mike McGuire, left, is pushing legislation to closely watch foster care prescribers with SB 1174, which faces crucial votes this month in the Legislature. But Christopher Castrillo, center, a lobbyist for the California Academy of Child & Adolescent Psychiatry, and Stuart Thompson, right, of the California Medical Association say the bill unfairly focuses on doctors who treat foster youth with the most severe needs. PROPOSED BILLS SB 253 Author: Sen. Bill Monning, D-Monterey Summary: Asks doctors to provide better justification for prescriptions before judges approve them. SB 1174 Author: Sen. Mike McGuire, D-Healdsburg Summary: Creates process for Medical Board to review and investigate doctors who prescribe psychotropic medications inappropriately. SB 1291 Author: Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose Summary: Requires county mental health plans to gather data and submit annual plans on how they serve foster youth. BILLS PASSED IN 2015 Gov. Jerry Brown signed three bills curbing the use of psychiatric drugs in foster care: SB 238 Author: Sen. Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles Summary: Requires foster parents, child welfare workers, group home administrators receive training on psychotropic medication, trauma and behavioral health. Also requires Department of Social Services to alert social workers when multiple medications, high dosages or prescriptions for children 5 and younger are prescribed. SB 319 Author: Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose Summary: Expands duties of foster care public health nurses to include monitoring and oversight of children prescribed psychotropic medication. SB 319 Author: Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose Summary: Requires state to identify and inspect group homes that may be inappropriately administering psychotropic medications. What's been done? In the legislative push for more scrutiny of doctors, McGuire, the North Bay Democratic state senator, is quick to point out that the California Medical Board received more than 8,000 complaints about doctors during the 2014-15 fiscal year. None of the reports, though, appear to have been made on behalf of a foster child. "No one's looking out for them," McGuire said. Seven of the high prescribers in the foster care data also turned up in 2010-12 as part of a broader U.S. Senate Finance Committee inquiry headed by Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, into the runaway costs and prescribing of painkillers and mental health drugs on the taxpayers' dime. It appears that identifying those doctors is all officials did. Instead of cracking down on them, the state Department of Health Care Services cautioned Grassley in a letter not to misinterpret the data and jump to conclusions. Walayat, Lasala, Barnett and Grewal all appeared on that list, among Medi-Cal's top prescribers of an antipsychotic. Reforms to prescribing practices in the foster care system only took shape years later after the newspaper's series "Drugging Our Kids" spotlighted the problem. The same day the series launched in August 2014, the state medical board answered a lawmaker's call to investigate high-prescribing doctors. But that one-time inquiry has produced no results to date. One reform affecting doctors has taken hold: In October 2014, California began requiring doctors to provide far more medical justification to prescribe antipsychotics to foster children and receive authorization from state pharmacists to do so. There are signs that the requirement is leading to fewer requests to prescribe the drugs amid hundreds of denials of unnecessary prescriptions. And statistics suggest the overall number of foster children on psychiatric drugs is dropping as well. Data compiled by the UC Berkeley's Center for Social Services Research show 12 percent of the state's foster kids were on a psychiatric drug in the first quarter of 2015 — a 1.5 percentage point decline from 2012. The state also cut spending on antipsychotics for foster children in the 2014-15 fiscal year by 10 percent from the previous year, shelling out $22.9 million — its lowest bill in four years. But McGuire feels a more targeted approach is still needed. His SB 1174 stipulates that "repeated acts of clearly excessive prescribing, furnishing or administering psychotropic medications to a minor without a good faith prior examination of the patient and medical reason" should become priority cases for "investigation and prosecution." Doctors would be selected for review based on annual reports of foster children on three or more psych drugs for at least 90 days. In the most extreme cases, the state's attorney general would file a challenge to a physician's medical license. Physicians are known in the state Capitol as one of the toughest professional groups to regulate. Their lobbies are well-funded and their members are particularly resistant to anyone challenging their discretion. As to foster care prescribing, they say the state has already done enough. "I think

doctors have been getting the message that the practice of giving antipsychotic medications to foster children is at times problematic and will be subject to careful scrutiny," said Dr. Saul Wasserman, a San Jose child and adolescent psychiatrist who co-chairs the government affairs committee of the California Academy of Child & Adolescent Psychiatry, a doctors group that opposes McGuire's bill. Nonetheless, McGuire's bill is moving forward. In May it passed the Senate on a 35-3 vote but has been amended in the Assembly, so it requires approval in both chambers of the Legislature this month. One opponent, Sen. Richard Pan, D-Sacramento, echoed many of the lobbyists' sentiments, saying that increased accountability would result in fewer doctors willing to treat foster youth. "We have to be very careful we don't get into a situation where we're actually discouraging the few willing to take care of this population from deciding that they have even more reasons not to," said Pan, a pediatrician. But McGuire countered that rather than doctors being under fire, "those being punished now are the foster youth." From Trochtenberg's unique view as foster youth turned state official, it is clear: Something more must be done. "These are kids that are hurting — these are children who have been through what we know war veterans have been through," Trochtenberg said. "But where is the accountability? The person who has the authority to write a prescription is where we need accountability. "We still don't have that." How we gathered, reviewed the project data In the 2014 series "Drugging Our Kids," the Bay Area News Group reviewed a decade of data that revealed the widespread use of psychotropic medication on foster kids. Shortly after the publication, the news organization returned to the state Department of Health Care Services to begin months of negotiations for a new set of Medi-Cal prescription data. The resulting database provides a unique look at how individual doctors prescribed these drugs to children in foster care. What we reviewed The data are drawn from Medi-Cal pharmacy benefit claims and name individual prescribers but do not identify their patients. Overall, the data included information on 1,280 psychiatrists, pediatricians, nurse practitioners, physician assistants and other medical providers who prescribed psychotropic medication to foster children 17 and younger from July 2009 to July 2014. State officials excluded doctors who prescribed to 10 or fewer patients during the five-year period saying it was necessary to preserve patient privacy. For each prescriber, the data show the number of patients who received psychotropic drugs, how often those doctors prescribed multiple psychiatric drugs to their patients, and how often they chose the most powerful class of the drugs known as antipsychotics. Because of limitations in the data, it was not possible to learn whether the doctors saw patients to whom they did not prescribe drugs. For comparison, the state provided aggregate data for the overall pool of doctors and patients — 5,584 prescribers and 26,467 foster children — to yield a complete picture of average prescribing practices across California. How we defined 'top prescribers' To identify outlying prescribers, this news organization consulted more than a dozen child psychiatrists and academic researchers, and ultimately focused on what those experts deemed the most extreme forms of prescribing found in the database: Giving multiple antipsychotics or three or more psychiatric drugs at once to their young patients. The news organization reviewed doctors who prescribed two or more antipsychotics for 30-45 days and also for a longer period, 60-75 days, because the shorter period could represent a "cross-taper," a period of time when patients on medications which cannot be abruptly stopped are transitioning from one drug to another. Antipsychotic use in children is narrowly approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to treat the rare pediatric cases of schizophrenia, bipolar disorder and autism with irritability. Common side effects include rapid-onset weight gain and obesity, diabetes, irreversible tremors, and extreme lethargy. But in the foster care system, the drugs are widely used "off-label" — or outside of FDA-labeled approvals — a practice that is legal and common with many other types of drugs. The data did not include dose levels or diagnoses, but interviews with former foster youth, social workers, public health nurses, foster care providers and the doctors themselves reveal antipsychotics have been routinely used for behavior management, when children are difficult to control or threatening to harm themselves. While the use of even a single antipsychotic for children who are not mentally ill is increasingly questioned, the use of two at once is discouraged. Guards allowed fights at youth prison Patrick Marley and Catie Edmondson, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel 11:01 a.m. CDT August 7, 2016 Department of Corrections keeps quiet about log of prison incidents Lincoln Hills School for Boys is under investigation by federal officials for a variety of crimes, including abuse of juvenile inmates and intimidation of witnesses. (Photo: Mark Hoffman, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel) Madison — A guard at the state's troubled youth prison was fired in February after he got in a physical fight with a juvenile inmate and allowed other teens to throw punches at each other in an area that was out of the view of cameras, new records show. A second guard resigned amid the investigation, which found he had not stopped or reported fights at Lincoln Hills School for Boys. The Northwoods facility has been under criminal investigation for 19 months for suspicion of child neglect, prisoner abuse and misconduct in office. Another document recently released under the state's open records law details dozens of incidents that occurred at the prison in the second half of last year, many of which raise troubling questions about the staff's use of force and pepper spray. In one incident, staff sprayed a juvenile who was restrained. In another, staff blasted pepper spray into a room after an inmate prevented guards from seeing into the room. Top officials at the Department of Corrections kept mum for months about the log of incidents, even when directly asked if it existed. They didn't produce it seven months ago in part because the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel asked for a log of conduct reports, rather than incident reports. Department of Corrections spokesman Tristan Cook said in a statement the detailed accounting of hundreds of incidents at Lincoln Hills was a "tracking document" that was "not meant to serve as a comprehensive log of completed incident reports," as the Journal Sentinel initially requested. "I think that's completely absurd. The open records law does not require requesters to use magic words to get records," said attorney Christa Westerberg, the vice president of the Wisconsin Freedom of Information Council. "The department should not tie themselves in knots to avoid producing records." The Journal Sentinel recently acquired a copy of the log in response to a request for emails and attachments sent to and from John Ourada, who ran Lincoln Hills until he abruptly retired in December just days before investigators raided the facility. Ourada used the log to keep track of incidents at the facility, according to the Department of Corrections. Gov. Scott Walker and GOP lawmakers last year worked to sharply limit the public records law but backtracked in the face of public opposition. Since then Walker has emphasized the importance of open records and in March issued an executive order to speed up the release of documents requested by the public and news organizations. Despite that executive order, retrieving records from the Department of Corrections can be a months-long process, and the Journal Sentinel has had to retain lawyers to get some of them. The department says producing records takes so long because the newspaper has asked for large amounts of records, many of which include sensitive information about juveniles that must be blacked out. The log documents hundreds of incidents over six months, painting a picture of the extent and frequency of fights and assaults at Lincoln Hills. In one incident, an inmate was put in restraints after becoming disruptive and arguing with staff. The inmate was then pepper sprayed "for safety," the log said. That practice appears to contradict widely established principles of when to use the chemical agent known as oleoresin capsicum, according to nationally recognized use-of-force expert Steve Martin. "Unless there is a high-level immediate threat, OC should not be used on a restrained inmate. There's not enough information here that would justify the use of OC spray," Martin said. "There may have been something extraordinary that compelled them to use it, but it's certainly not in this description." Martin, who served as a corrections expert for the U.S. Department of Justice for over a decade, reviewed the log at the Journal Sentinel's request. Another entry describes an incident in which staff used pepper spray on an inmate who refused to go into a bedroom. In another case, staff deployed pepper spray into an inmate's room after the inmate covered the window on the door to the room and became unresponsive. "(Pepper spray) should not be deployed unless there is a live, immediate threat of harm," Martin said. Cook, the department spokesman, said pepper spray is used to prevent physical harm to inmates and staff. In cases where staff can't see inmates in a room and they won't respond to verbal directives, pepper spray is sometimes used to avoid incurring injuries when staff members enter the room, Cook said. While the log captures many fights, others at the institution went undocumented. Some of those incidents are described in reports on internal investigations into two guards, Lance Glisch and Peter Vandre, who worked together in one of the living units scattered around the prison's campus. Glisch was fired in February and Vandre quit that month. An inmate and Vandre said they saw Glisch fight in the summer of 2015 in a part of the kitchen known as the "cut" that cannot be seen by the prison's cameras. The inmate who witnessed it said he saw Glisch deliver two body punches to the inmate he was fighting, and that inmate admitted he received bruises on his back and ribs. No one answered the phone at Glisch's home last week, but he described the incident to investigators as horseplay. Glisch acknowledged to investigators he knew two inmates were going to fight in November 2015, but decided to steer clear of it instead of stop it. "I didn't want anything to do with what was going on, so I went to the kitchen," he told investigators. Afterward, he said one of the inmates had injuries on his head and hand. He said he was present while Vandre and the inmate concocted a story about the inmate falling so he could get medical attention. In an interview, Vandre denied that, saying he suspected the inmates might have fought but had no way to prove it. He told investigators he did not report his suspicions to a supervisor because he did not think they would care. Vandre said Glisch and the inmates had conspired to make Vandre look like he had done wrong in that incident and others. Glisch "was the one doing all the bad things and I was just the collateral damage," Vandre said. "I always suspected him of not being on the straight and narrow." Asked by investigators if he had used a racial epithet at work, Vandre initially replied, "Not at this facility." Glisch and inmates said they had heard him use the word many times at Lincoln Hills, where a large portion of the population is African American. "I didn't try to use any of that, but it could have come out," Vandre told the Journal

Sentinel. "It probably slipped out once or twice." Also in his interview with investigators, Vandre admitted visiting a "lingerie football" themed website at work "as long as no one was around." Since those fights, the Department of Corrections has installed more cameras at Lincoln Hills, reducing the number of areas that aren't captured on film. Officials have also equipped staff with body cameras, provided more training and replaced leaders at the institution and Department of Corrections. The fights occurred in 2015, at a time when state Attorney General Brad Schimel's office was investigating the prison. Schimel spokesman Johnny Koremenos said protecting children is a top priority of the attorney general but provided no explanation for how the fights could occur at a time when his investigators were supposed to have an eye on the facility. Schimel has since handed off the probe to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The U.S. Department of Justice is also investigating whether there has been a pattern of civil rights abuses at the prison. How Populism Is Rewriting The Charter School Narrative In a political season that's been dominated by populism it should come as no surprise that a grassroots uprising is having an effect on education policy as well. Two recent events showcase exactly how the populist fervor in the nation is redrawing the education policy landscape, and more specifically, rewriting the story of the roll out of charter schools in our communities that's been enabled by laissez faire lawmakers and the generosity of the Obama administration and wealthy private foundations. Both events – one which reflects a national response to the populist uprising, and the other, an example of the uprising itself – reveal how a grassroots rebellion against unregulated charter schools is shaking the foundations of the education policy establishment's narrative about these schools. NAACP Calls For A Charter School Moratorium First, university professor Julian Vasquez Heilig broke the story on his personal blog last week that the national NAACP has called for a nationwide "moratorium on the proliferation of privately managed charter schools." The NAACP resolution, which passed at the national convention in July but will not be official until the National Board meeting later this Fall, cites numerous problems posed by charter schools including their tendencies to increase segregation, impose "punitive and exclusionary" discipline policies on students, and foster financial corruption and conflicts of interest. (Disclosure: Heilig is a colleague of mine at The Progressive.) Around the same time Heilig made his revelation, The Atlantic reported another prominent civil rights group the Movement for Black Lives – a coalition of over 50 black-led organizations aligned with Black Lives Matter – also is calling for a moratorium on charter schools. Other civil rights voices soon joined in support of the moratorium. Journey for Justice – an alliance of grassroots community, youth, and parent-led organizations in 21 cities across the country – declares in a statement that its constituency of largely African American local activists is "demanding the end of unwarranted expansion of charter schools." Another voice for civil rights, the Internet-based collective known as Educolor, also issued a general statement in support of the MBL platform. At the Hechinger Report, Andre Perry, a university professor and one of the early advocates for charter schools in New Orleans, explains, "Why the Black Lives Matter movement has to take on charter schools." Perry writes, "Many of the theories and practices many of us are fighting against in the criminal justice arena are still openly embraced by many charter schools." Specifically, he cites the tendencies of charters to practice "no excuse" models of education that enforce strict behavior codes and produce high rates of out-of-schools suspensions. Nashville Defeats Charter School Dark Money While the reputation of charter schools took a hit at the national level, those schools and what they've come to represent in communities were also rejected at the local level in a school board election in Nashville. A year and a half ago, I reported firsthand from Nashville on how local schools in the district were under assault by the twin forces of a rightwing agenda driven by the Koch Brothers and a collusion of business interests and private foundations intent on privatizing the schools. In my article for Salon, I explained how three school board members – Will Pinkston, Jill Speering, and Amy Frogge – had determined to represent the will of their voters, rather than the interests of big money, and resist the onslaught of charters. "It's immoral to force this kind of change on people who don't want it," Pinkston told me in my interview with him. "It also diminishes the odds of success." In last week's board election, the three incumbents plus an open seat were targeted for takeover by the wealthy interests behind charter schools. As local blogger TC Weber explains, charter advocacy groups and the local Chamber of Commerce invested many hundreds of thousands of dollars to knock off their opponents and elect a pro-charter majority to the board. One of the pro-charter interests is Stand for Children that classroom teacher and popular blogger Peter Greene identifies as an "astroturf organization" backed by rich foundations and wealthy individuals connected to the investment industry. SFC's involvement included over $700,000 to pay for campaign mailers and phone-banking and direct orchestration of volunteer and paid canvassers, which likely violates federal election law. Despite the outpouring of cash and influence, as the Knoxville news outlet reports, the big money behind charter schools lost. "After spending a small fortune, all four candidates [charter advocates] backed in the Metro Nashville school board election and a handful of state GOP primary challengers lost their races." The results of the Nashville election reverberated to the national scene where education historian Diane Ravitch, on her popular personal blog, called it, "A great lesson about how parents can beat Dark Money." Rewriting The Narrative The way pro-charter advocates have responded to these two events is telling. Regarding the civil rights groups' calls for a charter moratorium, the pro-charter response has been a hissy-fit driven by fiery rhetoric and few facts. Shaffar Jeffries, president of Democrats for Education Reform, a Washington D.C. based charter advocacy financed by hedge funds, issued a statement declaring the NAACP resolution a "disservice to communities of color." In a nationally televised newscast, Steve Perry, founder and operator of a charter school chain, lashed out at Hilary Shelton, the bureau director of the Washington, DC, chapter of the NAACP, for being a sell out to the teachers' unions and for abandoning children of color. The contention that the NAACP has sold out to teachers' unions holds little water since that organization has been a recipient of generous donations from pro-charter advocates as well. And any argument that curbing charters is a de facto blow to black and brown school kids is more a rhetorical trope than a factual counter to the evidence NAACP cites, showing where charters undermine communities of color. Regarding the defeat of big money-backed pro-charter candidates in Nashville, the usual outlets for charter industry advocacy – Democrats for Education Reform and the media outlets Education Post and The 74 – have been totally silent. These responses are telling because the charter industry has heretofore been such masterful communicators. Advocates for these schools have long understood most people don't understand what the schools are. Even when presidential candidates in the recent Democratic Party primary ventured to express an opinion about charters, they horribly botched it. So for years, the powerful charter school industry has been filling the void of understanding about charters with clever language meant to define what these schools are and what their purpose is. The schools, we've been told, are "public," even though they really aren't. They're supposed to outperform traditional public schools, but that turns out not to be true either. Even when the charter industry has tried to cut the data even finer to prove some charters outperform public schools, the claims turn out to be grossly over-stated. We've also been told charter schools are a "civil rights cause." Now it turns out that's not quite the case either. Of course, charter school propagandists still have plenty of rhetorical arrows in their quiver. But what's abundantly clear is that while they've been completely free to write the charter school narrative in their own words, now the people are telling their version of the story. And the ending is no doubt going to look way different. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/how-populism-is-rewriting-the-charter-school-narrative/>

Mercury News editorial: Rein in overdrugging of foster children Mercury News Editorial Posted: 08/09/2016 10:04:31 AM PDT Updated: 08/09/2016 08:14:18 PM PDT Drugging Our Kids The full Bay Area News Group investigation, including a documentary video. Since 2014, this newspaper has been working to expose the harm done to foster children by doctors' improper use of powerful antipsychotic drugs to control their patients' behavior. Progress has been made, but as investigative stories Sunday and Monday by Karen de Sá and Tracy Seipel reveal, much work remains to provide proper oversight. California's top foster care prescribing doctors are still fueling the medication of our most vulnerable children at an unacceptable rate. This abuse needs to stop. Three bills being considered by the Legislature will help rein in the practice. The Assembly and Senate should pass the legislation, and Gov. Jerry Brown should sign them into law. On Monday, de Sá told the heartbreaking story of Tasia Wright's experience growing up in foster care in Southern California. Tasia, who is now 27, entered a residential group home at the age of 6 after her mother developed drug problems. In the 13 years she was at the group home, she was prescribed 23 different psychiatric drugs by three psychiatrists. One of the doctors who treated her was responsible for giving two or more antipsychotics to 46 foster children for longer than two months over a five-year period. The drugs often come with debilitating side effects for children. In Tasia's case, by the time she left the group home at 19, de Sá reported that she was morbidly obese and had Type 2 diabetes and medication-induced tremors. Advertisement The doctors who are prescribing the unproven combinations of the drugs are engaging in a practice that is widely rejected by medical associations in other states. The most important bill to attack the problem is SB 1174, authored by state Sen. Mike McGuire, D-Healdsburg. The legislation, which goes before the Assembly Appropriations Committee on Wednesday, would require the state Medical Board to investigate doctors who inappropriately prescribe antipsychotic medications. As McGuire points out, none of the more than 8,000 complaints to the state Medical Board about doctors during the 2014-15 fiscal year was on behalf of a foster child. When California accepts responsibility for the welfare of children, it has an obligation to look out for their best interests. San Jose Sen. Jim Beall has for years worked to improve the lives of the state's most vulnerable children. His SB 1291 would require county mental plans to gather data and

submit annual plans on how they serve foster children. The intent is to better identify problems and address them before they reach a crisis state. Sen. Bill Monning, D-Monterey, is pushing to get his SB 253 through the Legislature. Monning's bill would make doctors go to greater lengths to justify giving prescriptions before taking them to judges for approval. The reporting by de Sá and Seipel should be required reading for every member of the Legislature. Both houses should give bipartisan support to passing the bills for the governor's signature so that inappropriate drugging of foster children comes to an end. Arizona foster kids removed from 6 homes after sexual allegation Yvonne Wingett Sanchez, The Republic | azcentral.com 4:48 p.m. MST August 8, 2016 P.O.W.E.R. House Youth Facility(Photo: Screenshot) Story Highlights The operator of the facility said 47 children were removed DCS confirmed an investigation is ongoing State officials removed dozens of children in foster care from six group homes amid an investigation by the Arizona Department of Child Safety. The group homes are all run by the same operator, P.O.W.E.R. House Youth Facility. Doug Nick, a DCS spokesman, confirmed an investigation is underway and that the children have been "given other placements." Because of privacy laws he said he could not discuss the nature of the investigation, the timing of the removal of the children, when the probe began or other details. Glen Mayberry, CEO of P.O.W.E.R. House Youth Facility, told The Arizona Republic on Monday that P.O.W.E.R. reported to the state "alleged sexual contact" between two children at one of the homes. "Once we found out we followed all the mandatory reporting laws," Mayberry said. But Mayberry said state officials have not told him why they are investigating the facilities. He said one state official told him "there is an investigation for sexual contact" between minors. But "we have never been informed — officially — of what has happened," Mayberry said. Nick said 40 children were removed from the six homes. Mayberry said 47 children were removed. AZCENTRAL Fed up with excuses, red tape 3 Arizona foster moms forge new path at Capitol Mayberry said the facilities have been operating for 12 years, and during that time have not had claims of wrongdoing substantiated. Mayberry said the company operates five homes in the San Tan Valley area and one in Mesa. The number of children per home ranges from five to 10, he said. Around 7 p.m. Wednesday, "white vans started showing up and they started extracting the kids," Mayberry said. The process was traumatic for some of the kids, he said. Some cried, others posted angry messages on social media about their removal. He said multiple kids "ran away." Mayberry criticized the agency's approach to the children's removal, saying DCS forgot to remove seven children at one location. "They didn't have a plan. They came in and took all the kids, but left seven of them with us," he said. "We didn't get rid of those kids until Saturday night." He said the last of the children were removed at 9 p.m. Saturday. Investigation has resulted in 100 group homes in Prescott closing their doors By Cindy Barks Originally Published: August 12, 2016 6:02 a.m. Cindy Barks PRESCOTT – The head of an insurance-fraud investigative team made a strong case this week against the allegedly fraudulent practices of many of Prescott's sober living homes. Dan Kreitman, director of the special investigative unit for the Centene Corporation, told the city's Ad Hoc Committee on Structured Sober Living Homes Wednesday, Aug. 10, that his team had uncovered widespread insurance fraud, theft, and waste in Prescott. Photo by Cindy Barks Dan Kreitman, director of the special investigations unit for Centene Corporation, talks to the Prescott Mayor's Ad Hoc Committee on Structured Sober Living Homes Wednesday, Aug. 10, on the alleged insurance fraud at local group homes. The investigation has led to changes in the way the company pays its claims, Kreitman said, which, in turn, has brought about a dramatic drop in the number of group homes operating in Prescott. Kreitman estimates that as many as 100 have closed their doors in the wake of the investigation. Kreitman spent more than a half-hour Wednesday evening citing the instances of fraud, theft, and waste. Among his examples: • Sober living homes that were routinely charging as much as $2,000 for daily urine drug screens – tests that Kreitman said should have cost about $29. • Homes that were making claims for upwards of $5,000 a day for equine treatments – "to go out and pet a horse." • Clients remaining in treatment for 14 or 15 months, "with no end in sight." Regularly, Kreitman said, "We're finding sober home living facilities with no end game. What we're finding is our members who are being shifted from facility to facility and who are testing positive for heroin from facility to facility." • Cases of brokers working with sober-living facilities "to bring members into your area for the sole purpose of making a dollar off of them – in our opinion not to help, but to hurt." All of the fraudulent practices apparently added up. Kreitman said group home insurance claims in Prescott and parts of California spiked by nearly 500 percent during 2015. "That raised our flags," Kreitman said after the meeting. Those red flags led the Centene Corporation, which recently acquired the previous major insurance provider Health Net, to send a team of investigators to Prescott twice in recent months. Kreitman attended Wednesday's ad hoc committee meeting as a part of an eight-member team of investigators. That investigation is ongoing, and Kreitman told the committee: "We will be a presence in this town for the near future, which is something that probably we didn't see from a Health Net perspective." After the meeting, he said, "We plan to stay as long as it takes." During the course of the investigation, Kreitman said Centene changed the "payment methodology" for sober living facilities, adding, "Since we have made those changes, I believe over 100 facilities in the Prescott area have closed their doors." While the City of Prescott had long estimated its total group homes at about 170, officials recently adjusted that to about 110. City Attorney Jon Paladini said Wednesday that the number likely is even lower now, based on the information from Kreitman. "It's probably under 100 now," Paladini said. Along the way, Kreitman said Centene had obtained enough evidence to approach the offending facilities, and some of those facilities are now assisting the investigation to help determine "how this fraud was perpetrated in your area – the brokers involved in this fraud." As the insurance company acquires that information, Kreitman said, "We will either give it to the Prescott Police Department or the FBI." While several of the ad hoc committee members commended Kreitman for his team's investigative work, committee member Doug Dolan, who operates licensed facility Recovery in the Pines as well as a sober-living component, voiced several concerns as well. "First off, thank you for cleaning up the ones that are abusing the system," Dolan told Kreitman. "I believe there is fraud, theft, and waste that needs to be cleaned up." For instance, he said, "If somebody's taking an instant (urine) test read, and they're charging $2,000, that's asinine. And if somebody's charging you $5,000 for some kind of equine treatment, I'll tell you as a treatment center owner, that's asinine." But Dolan said he believes urine drug screens are a "medical necessity," and that there are different levels of testing available. While an instant-read test is one of those options, he said, "That's not as reliable as sending it to a lab, (where there are different levels of testing). $29 won't cover that cost." Dolan said his concerns center on the fact that "at the end of day, hopefully what we're talking about is the quality of care for the patient." He added that Centene's investigation had resulted in a delay in claim payments industry-wide. "There are some good programs not getting their insurance claims paid, and they're struggling because they're not getting paid," he said. Allowing that some sober living homes will take on any insured client with the attitude "let's give it a shot, and take the money," Dolan said others, such as his own Recovery in the Pines, take on clients based on whether they are ready to undergo treatment. Kreitman responded: "I feel like you are in the very small minority in this area. It's very unfortunate that people in this area have taken advantage of people who need help and have dragged your industry down the gutters." Meanwhile, Kreitman said Centene had resumed paying its claims under a restructured payment process that is a "Medicare-based payment structure." After the meeting, Kreitman said he believes Prescott is unique in the amount of fraud, theft, and waste. "It is worse here than other places we have been," he said. Although he was uncertain about the reason, Kreitman said the fraud likely stemmed in part from the fact that "there is not a lot of regulation." Albany police officer suspended after St. Anne Institute incident - Times Union Albany police officer suspended after St. Anne Institute incident Two Albany police officers suspended as brass looks into incident at St. Anne Institute By Brendan J. Lyons Published 10:55 pm, Friday, August 12, 2016 1 Albany An Albany officer has been suspended and another placed on administrative duty as the department investigates the circumstances that led to one of the officers allegedly slamming a girl to the ground last month during a police call at St. Anne Institute, group home for troubled teenagers. Officer Ervis Miftari is suspended without pay and Officer John Schueler is on administrative duty pending the outcome of the internal investigation, Chief Brendan Cox said Friday. "We're going to do a thorough and fair investigation and what comes of that I don't know at this point," Cox said. The incident involving the young girl and Miftari took place in late July and was captured on videotape, the chief said. A person briefed on the case said the internal investigation is focusing on statements Miftari made to internal affairs investigators in relation to what was portrayed on the videotape. St. Anne Institute offers "a structured and supportive environment for young women ages 12-21 that are unable to live at home, attend public school or function in the community," according to its website. In 2002, the group home on North Main Avenue installed multiple additional video cameras after sex abuse charges were filed against an aide at the school. At the time, the Times Union reported cameras were installed in hallways to help monitor more than 125 residents who ranged in age from 12 to 18 and stayed an average of six to eight months. The school for troubled women and girls often receives clients who are placed there by family courts throughout the state. Others are referred to the facility by school districts, and some of the clients attend classes at the school but don't live there. Albany police routinely respond to the school, often to help staff deal with an unruly student, officials said. Miftari is a uniformed patrol officer who joined the department almost three years ago. A spokesperson for St. Anne Institute did not respond to a request for comment Friday. Officer Kevin Flynn, president of the Albany Police Officers Union, could not be reached for comment. blyons@timesunion.com • 518-454-5547 • @brendan_lyonstu Source: <http://www.timesunion.com/local/article/Albany-police-officer-suspended-after-St-Anne-9140277.php>

The report can be found here and the complete series can be found here: extras.mercurynews.com/druggedkids/index.html For years, few questioned how doctors treated the emotional trauma of California's abused and neglected children – and nobody monitored how often they handed out psychiatric drugs that can turn fragile childhoods into battles with obesity and bouts of stupor. Now, a Digital First Media investigation into the prescribing habits of the state's foster care doctors reveals for the first time how a fraction of doctors has been fueling the rampant medicating of California's most vulnerable kids. The Inland facilities heavily using prescriptions are: Loma Linda University Medical Center: State data show a cluster of the highest prescribers of antipsychotics to foster children had a link to the university and hospital, including Dr. William Murdoch, the chair of the psychiatry department and associate professor. Murdoch was surprised to see his name so high on the list of California prescribers, saying his philosophy on prescribing is cautious, especially among young patients. Oak Grove Center: In Murrieta, Dr. Harinder Grewal oversees care for troubled youth "experiencing psychological, social, emotional and behavioral problems." Between 2010 and 2013, Grewal received $471,665 for drug company research, according to company disclosures compiled by ProPublica. The group home's website describes Grewal as "a spokesperson for pharmaceutical companies such as Bristol Myers, Squibb, Pfizer Inc., AstraZeneca and Johnson and Johnson." Shanti Clinical Trials: This office in Colton until recently housed a clinic that ran medication trials for childhood depression, attention deficit and bipolar disorder, among other research sponsored by some of the biggest names in the pharmaceutical industry. Two of the highest prescribers of psych drugs to foster children are listed as investigators at the clinic, including Dr. Warris Walayat and Dr. Salvador Lasala. Foster home operators charged for not reporting alleged sex assault by Cody Combs Wednesday, August 17th 2016 Setup Timeout Error: Setup took longer than 30 seconds to complete. I-Team THREE RIVERS, Mich. (NEWSCHANNEL 3) – The I-Team is obtaining new information about the operators of an adult foster care facility that recently had its license revoked by state regulators. According to documents obtained by Newschannel 3's I-team through the Freedom of Information Act, the operators of the adult foster care home are accused of failing to report allegations of sexual assault to authorities. A The adult care facility was located on 59296 Noah Lake Road in Three Rivers, and housed approximately 6 adults with developmental disabilities and/or mental illness. Shoheli Talukder and MD Talukder are both facing "failure to report abuse" charges as a result of the state's investigation. "Resident A has been sexually abusing Resident B for months," reads the report issued by the Michigan Department of Licensing and Regulatory Affairs (LARA). "Resident B informed me that Resident A had been bothering her for approximately the last three months," wrote Trooper Matthew Berry, who wrote about his on-site inspection of the home. The trooper then writes that Resident B said the told the Talukders about the alleged assault. "They asked Resident B not to call the police and yelled at Resident A," he wrote. The report also claims that the Talukders likely knew about Resident A's aggressive behavior as early as 2014. The charges faced by the foster care facility operators are considered misdemeanor. The Talukders are expected for a pre-trial conference on Friday. Newschannel 3 and the I-Team will continue to follow the case, and pass along any developments. Sex abuse, poor supervision alleged at Oregon foster program 1 / 6 foster care feb. 3, 2016 Oregon's then-interim human services director Clyde Saiki, left, and Dani Ledezma, a policy adviser for Gov. Kate Brown, prepare to testify to lawmakers in support of foster care reform legislation. Saiki is among those sued Thursday over treatment of two vulnerable preschoolers. Denis C. Theriault/staff Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive Print Email By Hillary Borrud | The Oregonian/OregonLive T The Oregon Department of Human Services is investigating accusations that workers at a residential program for boys and young men in Eastern Oregon provided poor supervision and failed to report alleged sex abuse by a female staffer. In its amended license for the facility, obtained by The Oregonian/OregonLive, the department said it's investigating hiring practices and training at Eastern Oregon Academy, in Hines, which is about three miles from Burns. Officials cited concerns that staffers "may be inexperienced or immature and possibly colluding with children in care to elope from the facility, consume drugs and alcohol, and participate in sexual relationships." But the department has decided not to pull the approximately half-dozen foster children in its care. Instead, it's stationed at the facility 24 hours a day since launching its investigation July 14. The department has previously assigned employees to monitor licensed care facilities. But in recent cases, those employees were present only during daytime hours, agency spokesman Gene Evans said. Eastern Oregon Academy also serves youth from the Oregon Youth Authority. But the Oregon Youth Authority decided to remove the 11 residents under its jurisdiction on Aug. 10, pending the investigation, a state official said. "We plan to continue daily monitoring and will take further action if necessary," Reginald C. Richardson, the human services department's deputy director and interim head of child welfare, wrote to state lawmakers Friday. Richardson and Sen. Sara Gelser, D-Corvallis, visited the facility in mid-August. "I had to see for myself what the situation was like," Richardson wrote. "Children's safety is our number one priority, and I will continue in this hands-on role to make sure the youth residing there are safe and their needs met." Eastern Oregon Academy provides behavioral rehabilitation services for boys and young men ages 12 to 25, according to its website. Problems at the facility do not appear to be new: It was on a "radar list" of troubled facilities the Department of Human Services maintained until December, although it was unclear Friday why or for how long human services officials included the facility on the list. Staff at Eastern Oregon Academy could not be reached for comment late Friday. The human services department faces a shortage of foster homes and space in residential programs, after losing about 400 foster homes and 100 residential beds over the past two years, spokeswoman Andrea Cantu-Schomus wrote in an email. Gelser said Friday that allowing youth to remain at Eastern Oregon Academy under human services supervision was appropriate given the shortage of other options. "When we're looking at the capacity issues in the system, if there isn't a direct danger to the kids, having them sleep in a hotel or DHS office isn't an ideal solution," Gelser said. "But having been out there, I believe at least in the short term having the 24-hour onsite supervision by DHS will help with the issue." Gelser championed legislation in the 2016 legislative session to improve oversight in the foster care system. The legislation followed several scandals and a massive shakeup of senior human services staff. Meanwhile, local law enforcement officials are investigating an allegation that a woman who worked at Eastern Oregon Academy had sexual contact with one of the boys staying there, according to the facility's amended Department of Human Services license. The state is also investigating reported bad behavior by managers at the facility. After the human services department launched its investigation, the academy's program manager allegedly "yelled and threw papers at a resident during transport, shouted loudly at two residents prior to discharge, and at one point 'shoulder checked' a resident," according to the amended license. On another occasion, Eastern Oregon Academy managers allegedly grew frustrated with a resident who refused to get into a vehicle after a nature field trip — leaving the youth alone, for more than two hours, in woods some 40 miles from the academy. Eastern Oregon Academy also allegedly failed to report these incidents to DHS. Gelser said the current situation stems, in part, from years of state officials failing to spend enough on quality programs for foster children and other youth in state care. "It's the consequence of a complete disinvestment in the system," Gelser said. "And in order for people to provide service and care for our most traumatized kids and kids with the most complex needs, it costs more than just food and some beds." — Hillary Borrud hborrud@oregonian.com 503-294-4034; @hborrud Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/politics/index.ssf/2016/08/state_investigates_allegations.html

Youth prison staff were taught abusive tactics Catie Edmondson and Patrick Marley, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel 12:10 p.m. CDT August 21, 2016 Lincoln Hills School for Boys and Copper Lake School for Girls are under investigation by the FBI for child abuse and neglect, intimidation of witnesses and other misconduct by officials. (Photo: Mark Hoffman, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel) Madison — Staff at the state's problem-plagued youth prison were taught to use abusive techniques when interacting with teenage offenders under the decade-long tenure of the facility's lead training officer, new records show. Investigators with the Department of Corrections determined that Dustin Meunier's failure to properly teach staff security techniques resulted in a "high volume" of injuries at Lincoln Hills School for Boys and Copper Lake School for Girls, including broken arms and wrists. Meunier, who was fired in May, hung up on a reporter without answering any questions. Documents released under the state's open records law reveal that Meunier engaged in serious and sweeping misconduct at Lincoln Hills School — including showing a video of another officer using unjustified force to train workers, failing to stop staff he witnessed abusing teens, overlooking incidents where excessive force was used and falsifying records. Those documents also show Meunier left a juvenile inmate unattended in a room full of pepper spray for more than five minutes and dragged a handcuffed inmate out of a van by his feet. Meunier, who was supposed to be the prison's sole use-of-force expert, was also unable to demonstrate an understanding of basic security techniques, investigators found. The records are among the first to provide insight into why incidents of excessive force — correctional officers breaking inmates' arms and wrists, putting their knees into youth and using pepper spray excessively — became common occurrences at Lincoln Hills and Copper Lake, which share a campus north of Wausau and are being investigated by the FBI for assault, child neglect and other crimes. In recent months, top officials at Lincoln Hills and the Department of Corrections have been replaced and the vast majority of the institution's staff has been retrained, said department spokesman Tristan Cook. The superintendent of Lincoln Hills was responsible for ensuring staff got proper training, and the superintendent, security director and trainers were responsible for the curriculum, Cook said. People in those positions have been replaced in the past year and a half. Wendy Peterson became superintendent in May and soon afterward fired Meunier for misconduct and negligence after an internal investigation comprised of more than 5,000 pages of interviews and incident reports found that Meunier: Failed to contact nurses to ensure inmates received medical attention. Modified techniques for securing inmates without getting permission from his bosses and trained his fellow workers in his new techniques. He also trained workers how to use pepper spray even though he went years without getting certified for such training. Reviewed incidents that "appeared abusive" but did not mark them as inappropriate. He told investigators he was too busy to properly review them. Frequently did not make staff fill out required paperwork documenting incidents in which force was used. Timothy Johnson, who worked for more than two decades at Lincoln Hills, said he had no idea Meunier had taught him improper techniques. Meunier never told him to be cautious with juveniles with the use of force because juveniles' bones are particularly fragile, as he was supposed to do, Johnson said. "It was taught if you're going to use an application of force, go as hard as you possibly can. Don't hold back," Johnson said in an interview. "If he showed us a technique, we all assumed this is an authorized technique sanctioned by the state of Wisconsin," he said. Johnson resigned in January as investigators looked into his involvement in incidents where juveniles were injured. He said he didn't do anything wrong and argued his bosses were negligent and tried to make him a scapegoat. During training sessions, Meunier showed a video of Johnson putting his knee in the back of a young inmate and said it was the right way to control inmates. Johnson said he didn't know what incident was depicted in the video and was not told it was being used for training. Department of Corrections investigators found that between 2013 and 2015, putting knees into the backs of inmates was "repeatedly used by numerous staff during numerous incidents" even though the method "was not reasonable or necessary and was not justifiable under the circumstances." The probe of Meunier was sweeping, with internal investigators looking into 19 incidents that occurred between 2013 and 2015. They cleared him in three incidents, but found he violated numerous work rules for the others. Here's a look at some of the incidents: Broken wrist. In December 2014, Meunier supervised as Johnson and another officer handcuffed a disruptive juvenile inmate, who cried and screamed and told officers his wrist was broken, according to other inmates. The incident occurred at 9:30 p.m. on a Sunday, when no nurses were on site. Meunier called and left a voicemail with the health services office, even though he knew no one would hear it until the next day, he told internal investigators in October 2015. Doctors confirmed that the youth's wrist was broken and treated it the next day — but Meunier downplayed its significance. "There was no — no gross deformity, nothing looking out of place, nothing at all," he told internal investigators of the injury. He also said the incident was "nothing out of the ordinary" and "wasn't that big of a deal at the time." The Lincoln County Sheriff's Office reviewed the incident at the time, but found there was no evidence that Johnson intended to harm the inmate. Pepper spray. In July 2015, after an inmate barricaded himself in his room, Meunier and others briefly opened his door and two of them each blasted pepper spray into the room for one second. Meunier told the inmate to lie on the floor when he was ready to be removed. Several staff members exited the hallway because the pepper spray was so thick in the air. Others removed the inmate's roommate as the inmate laid on the floor. The inmate stayed in the room unmonitored for 5 and a half minutes and then crawled out when guards instructed him to leave, investigators found. He later became noncompliant, and officers directed him to the ground and removed his clothes so he could be searched, even though one of the officers was female. Meunier told investigators that he lost control of the incident, which he described as "being a cluster." He said he didn't know that two officers, rather than one, had used pepper spray and didn't realize the inmate had been left in the room unmonitored. A use-of-force review conducted by the Department of Corrections in April 2016 found the use of pepper spray was not justified. Leaving the inmate in the room for so long after pepper spray was used "is abusive since it appears he was intentionally left in the room for this period of time and that he was willing to cooperate with staff and exit his room," the review said. Use of force. Meunier conducted a use-of-force review of a September 2015 incident in which he was involved, even though such reviews are supposed to be independent. In that review, he wrote that all reports had been filed, but he and two others had not written required reports. Meunier did not document that officer James Schmidt had placed his knee on the head and neck of a juvenile inmate as he broke up a fight. "I must have overlooked it," Meunier told investigators. His review said health officials had evaluated the inmate, however there is no record of that. A subsequent review done by the department in December 2015 using video of the incident found Schmidt's actions were unjustified. Investigators concluded that by conducting a review of an incident in which he was involved, Meunier "placed himself and the facility in a position of undue scrutiny." "Treatment Centers" for Troubled Teens Are Gothic Nightmares 228 60 254 By Nora Caplan-Bricker — "Troubled teens" don't need this kind of help. AntonioGuillem / Thinkstock Most residential treatment centers that promise they can turn around the lives of troubled teenagers are dangerous places with a proven track record of making things worse, according to a disturbing longread published Tuesday by the Huffington Post. Reporter Sebastian Murdock tells the appalling story of a facility in Utah, formerly known as Island View, and now, under new management, called Elevations RTC. But the takeaway from his extensive reporting is that the options pushed on struggling parents may be hurting, not helping, their at-risk kids. The authoritarian tack that most centers take won't turn their charges into functional adults, Ira Burnim, legal director of the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, told HuffPo. "You can teach them to be compliant in an institution because they get the reward of ... getting out," he said, "but once they get out, it's the same old problem, and they haven't learned how to better manage their condition." Worse, these centers often deeply traumatize their inhabitants. A 2014 lawsuit against Island View's parent company, Aspen Education, alleged that the center "maintained a prison-like environment where physical and psychological torture were used against students," Murdock writes. As one former Island View resident, a 25-year-old named Michelle Lemcke, told him: "Long-term treatment facilities are like ... a jail without having done anything illegal.” Anyone who wishes to understand the gothic list of abuses suffered by Island View’s teenage residents should read Murdock’s piece, but even a brief perusal is enough to make the blood run cold. A former staff member named Vlad Diaz who quit in 2008 told the journalist that he “wouldn’t treat a dog” the way he was ordered to handle the children. He claimed he saw multiple kids attempt suicide at the facility. One former resident told Murdock about being strip-searched on arrival; when he refused to remove his piercings, he said, “They restrained me on my back and physically removed each one of my piercings, which tore my flesh open ... I still have scars from it.” Teens were required to publicly criticize and humiliate one another during so-called Problem Solving Groups. They were harshly and physically restrained by staff; one family sued unsuccessfully in 2014 after the guards “mangled [a student’s] arm, causing severe and irreparable orthopedic and neurological damage,” per the suit. Murdock also found that staff’s policy was to sedate students with high doses of antipsychotics—drugs whose efficacy at combating conditions like depression and bipolar in adolescents has never been established. Perhaps worst of all, though, was the “time-out room,” described by Murdock as a “small white chamber, approximately 4 by 4 feet, with a large metal door,” where students were subjected to solitary confinement—a disciplinary tactic whose use on juveniles is outlawed in federal prisons because of its harrowing psychological effects. The doors remained unlocked when the students were inside, but staff monitored them from the other side. A site inspector for the Utah Department of Human Services told Murdock that the rooms were a place for struggling students to “cool off,” not a punishment—but that’s not what the reporter heard from Island View’s former charges. One of his sources, Emily Graeber, told him she can’t expunge the mental image of her friends trapped in the tiny cells. “I’m still really haunted by the screams,” she said. “Sometimes I have nightmares just from the screaming.” Much of this torture was probably legal. “The troubled-teen industry is almost entirely unregulated,” Murdock writes. “In 2011, a federal bill that would have banned physically abusing or starving children at such facilities died in committee. ... [L]ike most states, Utah has no rules outright prohibiting isolation, humiliation or physical restraint. So facilities like Island View still can—and do—isolate, humiliate and physically restrain children. In many states, they can withhold food and water as punishment.” So what should be done to reform nightmare institutions like Island View? Murdock suggests that the answer is to abandon this failed model altogether. Instead, parents of disturbed children should be able to get the support and expert guidance necessary to keep their young ones at home. There is a “virtual national consensus among people in the mental health field that children with mental health difficulties and behavioral problems should be treated at home,” Burnim, the mental health law expert, told Murdock. “I don’t think you need to legislate against RTCs. You just need to create an alternative that sells itself.” Of course, that’s easier said than done. Nora Caplan-Bricker is a contributing writer for DoubleX. Follow her on Twitter. Source:

John Oliver Slams Charter Schools And His Critics Totally Miss The Point Sometimes it takes a funnyman to make sense. Earlier this week, British comedian John Oliver devoted a “Back to School” segment on his HBO program Last Week Tonight to examining the rapidly growing charter school industry and what these schools are doing with our tax dollars. The Washington Post’s education blogger Valerie Strauss watched the segment and reports that while Oliver declined to address whether or not charters provide high quality education, he focused mostly on how often these schools are “terribly – and sometimes criminally – operated.” (You can see Oliver’s entire sketch here.) Editors at Rolling Stone watched Oliver’s broadcast as well and report Oliver focused much of his attention on three states – Florida, Pennsylvania, and Ohio – that have “especially depressing charter track records – including negligence in the approval process and school executives embezzling funds.” For some time now, I’ve reported on the alarming spread of charter school scandals in these states, and elsewhere, in numerous articles for Salon. So very little of what Oliver exposes is new to the public. But because of the reach of HBO, Oliver’s international popularity, and his ability to turn serious subjects into very funny – even if upsetting – material, advocates in the charter industry mustered a strong defense with numerous blogposts and press releases calling Oliver’s anecdotes “outdated,” his treatment of charters “uninformed” and unfair, and his opinions too disinterested in the needs of parents, especially from communities of color. None of Oliver’s critics seriously refuted the crux of his argument that there might be something fundamentally wrong by design, rather than by implementation or intent, with the idea that a “free market” of privately operated and essentially unregulated schools is a surefire way to improve education opportunities for all students. Indeed, charter schools are “here to stay” has become a refrain among advocates for these schools, even though there’s no doubt the controversy caused by this new parallel school system is just beginning, and no one can predict what the ongoing conflict will lead to. The charter industry is currently responsible for educating a small percentage of students – just 6–7 percent nationally and barely measurable in many communities, especially more well-to-do metropolitan and rural areas. A minority of Americans and relatively few politicians completely understand what charter schools are. And most experts have mixed views on the purpose of the schools. However, what charter advocates generally won’t admit is that many of the problems these schools cause are reflective of what inevitably seems to happen when an essential public service is privatized. The charter industry claims its schools are “public” institutions because they get tax dollars, but that’s like saying a defense contractor is a public business because it takes in revenues from the federal government. Numerous experts point out charter schools blur the line from what it means to be a public institution providing a public good and that, by their very design, they expand opportunities to profiteer from public tax dollars and privatize public assets. People in communities affected by these schools are just beginning to see the conflicts these institutions cause, and it’s just a matter of time before government officials at all levels are forced to respond to the increasing concerns with these schools. Just consider recent actions taken by the Department of Justice to curtail the expansion of the private prison industry – a privatization trend that generally predates the rise of the charter industry. As Mother Jones reports, after “a damning report on the safety, security, and oversight of private prisons,” DOJ announced it would stop contracting with these institutions. Donald Cohen, who leads In the Public Interest, an organization that researches problems posed by privatizing public services, writes for Huffington Post, privately operated prisons are fundamentally flawed because the business model they must follow encourages the companies to “actively seek new prisoners to fill facilities they own.” As ITPI has previously reported, “in an effort to provide the service with fewer resources while also maximizing profits, [private prison] companies often cut corners, reducing the quality, effectiveness, and accessibility of the service.” “The more contractors can cut costs on running their facilities, the wider their profit margins,” writes Aman Banerji for the Roosevelt Institute. “No wonder ... private prisons contracted by the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) contain one or more security deficiencies, health service deficiencies, and a greater number of food grievances.” This clear and obvious conflict of interest – between serving the public and rewarding private enterprise – led to a misalignment with DOJ’s mission to hold an essential function of government to the high standards the public demands. If the charter school industry believes it can avoid this conflict, it’s kidding itself. More than one attentive blogger has noticed the striking similarities between charter schools and the private prison industry. In one of these posts, Mitchell Robinson notes that charters, like private prisons, differ from the public counterparts by not being locally managed or controlled, not providing the same level of services and programs, and not answering to the same level or degree of regulation and oversight. Over the years, the US Department of Education has rewarded charter schools with over \$3.3 billion in federal funds, and with passage of the most recent federal education law, the every Student Succeeds Act, USDoe will send \$333 million more to these schools before the current fiscal year is over. Remarkably on the actions DOJ took to end tax dollars going to the private prison industry, Banerji concludes, “It offers an opportunity to contest the privatization of state services beyond the prison system.” Let’s hope reexamining the role of charter schools is the next step. Parents of disabled urge Malloy to scrap privatizing group homes By: Keith M. Phaneuf | August 23, 2016 View as "Clean Read" Share Email Print Parents of intellectually disabled adults expected to be transferred from state-run group homes to private care reacted Tuesday with a mix of anger and appeals for compassion. About three dozen parents, unionized caregivers and their clients argued at SEIU 1199 headquarters in Hartford that the planned privatization of 40 state-run homes would weaken care and shatter the bonds formed between workers and clients. “We’re talking about love here; we’re not talking about money,” said Lindsay Mathews of New Haven, whose 51-year-old son, George, has resided at the state-run Brook Street group home in Hamden for the past 20 years. Keith m. Phaneuf / CTCMirror.org Lindsay Mathews of New Haven, whose 51-year-old son, George, has resided at the state-run Brook Street group home in Hamden for the past 20 years. George cannot perform simple tasks, such as putting toothpaste on a brush or adjusting the water temperature in the shower, Mathews said. “Almost everything that has to happen to him is done by someone else,” she said. “These are the people we depend upon to keep our children alive.” Critics of the private, nonprofit group homes for the developmentally disabled say they receive insufficient state funding to provide comparable care. They struggle with employee turnover rates that typically exceed 20 percent — which is a big problem given the close bonds clients seek to form with their caregivers. “To take the staff away would be death for Arthur,” Martha Carney of Hamden said of the staff at the Brook Street home, where her adult son, Arthur, resides. “Please, Governor Malloy, come visit our home.” Chris McClure, spokesman for the governor’s budget office, disagreed with the assertions regarding privatization. “Let’s be clear — there should be no service level reductions involved here,” he said. “This is closely following national trends.” Since

2009, the number of individuals served directly by the state Department of Developmental Services in community-living settings have dropped from 15 percent to less than 10 percent, he said. "This step will save taxpayer dollars without affecting service levels," McClure added. "We deeply value all the work of our employees, and while we know this transition will be difficult, we are doing everything we can to make the state operate more efficiently than ever before." The Malloy administration unveiled plans last week to privatize 40 group homes and a host of services for the intellectually disabled and eliminate the need for 605 state jobs, saving Connecticut almost $70 million annually by next fiscal year. Those changes are planned to comply with a major reorganization and savings initiative the governor and the General Assembly ordered in May when they adopted the latest state budget. The administration, which already has laid off 113 DDS employees, would eliminate another 492 workers in two stages, most happening after Jan. 1. That means 25 percent of the full-time positions at the state agency are being eliminated. "Personally I think he (Malloy) should be arrested today and put on trial," Mathews said. "These folks can't speak for themselves." Keith M. Phaneuf / CTMirror.org Martha Carney, whose son Arthur resides at the Brook Street group home. Carney said many parents are frustrated with legislators as well, adding that those she spoke with about the new state budget offered no assurances that things would change. DDS Commissioner Morna Murray said her department "is working very hard to maintain current levels of services for the individuals we support in a budget environment that requires we provide high-level services more efficiently," adding that many states have turned to privatization. "While we know these changes are extremely difficult for individuals, families, and staff, they are necessary for us to maintain critical supports. We are committed to carrying out these transitions in the most effective and compassionate manner possible, and to maintaining the highest quality of care to the largest number of individuals we can support." But Debbie Albers, an 1199 member who runs the department's Manchester Supporting Living program, said state workers' have knowledge of their clients built over decades of service. "I am their family," said Albers, who has worked at the Manchester facility for 29 years. "We're like a family and we really need these staffs," said Robert Osborne, a client at Manchester. "We don't know what's going to happen." Source: <http://ctmirror.org/2016/08/23/parents-of-disabled-urge-malloy-to-scrap-privatizing-group-homes/>

Foster care film questions priority of privatized system: Money or children? PRWeb August 23, 2016 10:25am "Foster Shock" gives former foster children a voice, to say what no one would listen to while they were in the system, and shows the salaries that swelled behind it all PALM BEACH, Fla. (PRWEB) August 23, 2016 The Florida Department of Children and Families has long been questioned by newspapers, lawmakers and families for the abuse, neglect and death of children in its care. Now one child advocate is asking to what extent do these tragedies fall on a privatized system. Florida became the first state to fully privatize child welfare, when Jeb Bush was governor, giving state funds to private companies, who subcontract with even more private companies. DCF has an annual budget of $3 billion, yet as many child advocates attest, most foster children live below the poverty line. In her documentary, "Foster Shock," Mari Frankel, a Guardian ad Litem (GAL) and board member of Adopt-A-Family, discloses the six-figure salaries of the CEOs of these private companies and gives a platform to executive directors of non-profit organizations, who say when child welfare becomes a business, children become dollar bills. The film, set to screen in Orlando Sept. 2, also tells the stories of children who grew up in foster care, looking forward to the day when they "aged out" of foster care, children who were dependent on the system, but say they were not protected by the system. "It is a Guardian ad Litem's responsibility to speak for the child," says Frankel, speaking to her stirrings for the film. "There is unacceptable and then there is horrendous. What has happened to these children goes way past unacceptable. It is horrendous." Her first case as a GAL involved an 11-year-old boy with developmental disabilities, who was taken from his mother because of drug abuse, Frankel says, and placed in a therapeutic foster home. She remembers visiting him one day with his therapist. She says the boy told them he was being sexually abused by a man who was living with the foster mother. She says when she asked the therapist if he was going to report the abuse, he said no, he did not believe the boy. "No charges were ever filed against the man. No charges were filed against the foster mother. No one was fired. No one was reprimanded," Frankel says. "That is why I did this documentary." Frankel did report the abuse and the boy was removed from the home, but the very next week, another boy was placed in the same home. Too often, Frankel says, she has seen that nothing a foster child says is believed, so the narratives she shares in her film, she verifies with case files and court documents. Foster Shock will be screened at the Central Florida Film Festival on Sept. 2. Five days later, DCF will hold its annual summit in Orlando. When asked if DCF would like to comment on the documentary or the issues it raises surrounding privatization, DCF Communications Director Jessica Sims shared a link to the department's website, saying the system is privatized, but did not comment further than that. Frankel says the intent of the documentary is not to cast blame, but to catalyze change. Too often stories of foster children are so hard to bare, many turn away, but Frankel hopes by making this film, legislators and citizens will fight for more oversight, so foster children stop being abused. Foster Shock will screen during the Central Florida Film Festival (CENFLO). The showing is on Sept. 2 at 1:30 p.m. at West Orange Cinema, located at 1575 Maguire Rd., Ocoee, Fla. The film is one hour. Moviewatcher Passes are tickets available through the film festival beginning at $25 per day. A Moviewatcher Pass includes admission to all festival screenings for the day purchased, a coupon to redeem one medium popcorn and one medium soft drink, and three ballots to case for your favorite short, documentary or feature film. Mari Frankel has served as a community advocate for the State of Florida Guardian ad Litem Program for the last six years. For the last 15 years, she has been on the board of Adopt-A-Family, a non-profit that assists formerly homeless and income-challenged working families. Mari specifically assists with their after-school program, Project Grow, which serves children in grades K through five, to build their social, emotional and educational skills. Foster Shock is a Miss Mari Film. Brian Bayerl is the award-winning cinematographer and editor of Foster Shock. His work has been seen on PBS, Showtime and in numerous feature films, as well as premiering at the Sundance Film Festival and SXSW in Austin. Bayerl's films have been screened at prestigious locations such as the Andy Warhol Museum, the Whitney Museum and the British Museum in London. Portrait of America was screened in three countries and won Best Film at London's Raindance Film Festival. Uganda to close the largest chain of commercial private schools over non-respect of basic education standards For immediate release Kampala, 12 August 2016 The Ugandan Minister of Education and Sports, Hon Janet Museveni, formally announced on Tuesday during a session of the parliament that the Government will soon close the schools operated by the largest and most controversial chain of commercial private schools worldwide, Bridge International Academies (BIA), which runs 63 nursery and primary schools in Uganda. Hon Museveni indicated having based her decision on technical reports from the Ministry that revealed that the schools did not respect national standards, in particular that "material used could not promote teacher pupil interaction" and that "poor hygiene and sanitation [...] put the life and safety of the school children in danger". "This decision, which is backed up by field visits of Ministry officials, confirms the grave concerns we have had about Bridge," reacted Salima Namusobya, the Executive Director of the Initiative for Social and Economic Rights (ISER), a Ugandan NGO monitoring the realisation of the right to education in the country. "We have long been worried that BIA schools did not respect the Government Guidelines on Basic Requirements and Minimum Standards for Schools for example regarding infrastructure, purposefully used unqualified teachers in order to reduce costs, in violations of Ugandan laws, and were developing a massive for-profit business without the agreement and proper oversight of the authorities." Bridge International Academies is a for-profit commercial chain of low-cost private schools backed up by investors such as Bill Gates, Mark Zuckerberg (Facebook) and Pierre Omidyar (eBay), as well as the World Bank, and the US and British Governments. It aims at providing education to 10 million pupils by 2025 and already runs over 450 schools in Kenya, Uganda, Nigeria and soon Liberia and India. The company has been particularly criticised for using a non-transparent system of entirely scripted and standardised curriculum mostly designed in the USA, delivered by untrained teachers reading the script from a tablet, while selling this scheme as "world-class education" to poor people in developing countries in a bid to seek profits. The decision to close BIA schools follows several statements from United Nations (UN) human rights bodies as well as a report from a UK parliament watchdog that criticised BIA, suggesting that the development of these schools may lead to human rights breaches. "The Ugandan education system suffers from many shortcomings. However, it does not mean that any investors can come in and make profit out of the situation by delivering low-quality education while disregarding national authorities and standards. International treaties and a recent resolution from the UN Human Rights Council make clear that it is the duty of the government to close schools that are sub-standard or that lead to commercialisation of education, and we applaud the Government for upholding its obligations," said Frederick Mwesigye, Executive Director of the Forum for Education NGOS in Uganda (FENU). "While it was unavoidable in this case, it is highly regrettable to have to come to the point where some schools have to be closed. The Government now has to ensure that all children have access to free quality education and no child's education be disrupted. They made the wise decision to wait until the end of the term (early September) to close the Bridge schools, and we call on the authorities to use that time to help find alternative school for the children, while developing plans to build and improve the public education system," added Saphina Nakulima, from ISER. BIA has faced a series of controversies in the last three months revealing some of the company's corporate approach to education. Adding to a previous statement from May 2015 that demonstrated that, contrary to what it claims, Bridge charged fees that were unaffordable by the poorest and that there was no solid evidence about the quality of the schools, it recently emerged that the company: can be resorting to intimidation tactics such as the arrest of an academic researcher based on allegations which could not be proven, in order to avoid independent inquiry about its model; is considering using the data it collects on children for various commercial purposes, including "credit scoring and brokering to financial loan and other products" and "creation and brokering of low-cost health insurance"; is resisting requests from the Government of Liberia for an independent randomised analysis of its schools' results in Liberia. The decision of the Ugandan Government is also relevant for its neighbour, Kenya, where BIA has the largest number of schools. A few months ago, the Kenyan Government halted the development of Bridge schools over similar allegations that the company was not respecting minimum national educational standards. According to Abraham Ochieng, from the East African Centre for Human Rights (EACHRights), "the situation in Kenya is unfortunately very similar to Uganda. It seems that only a handful of the 405 BIA schools in the country are registered, the curriculum they use has not been approved by the authorities, and they employ low-paid untrained teachers. Given that BIA started operating in Kenya in 2009 and seems to still not be complying with the Government's requirements, and while recent revelations have shown the commercial motive of the company, it has become urgent to take action." Camilla Croso, the President of the Global Campaign for Education, emphasised that "as they realise that commercialisation of their schools is far from being the solution to the education challenges they face, and is in fact detrimental, governments must now increase their funding to education in order to fulfil their obligations to realise the right to education, in particular by spending at least 20% of their budget or 6% of their GDP on education." The 18 organisations that support this statement have declared that they are ready to work with the Governments of Uganda, Kenya, and other interested authorities to support the development of a quality public education system rather than a commercial system driven by foreign companies. Fort Worth mom questions how infant died in foster care Foster care death under investigation Foster care death under investigation FORT WORTH — A young mother who had her children removed from her care following a Child Protective Services investigation is now asking how her 10-month-old daughter ended up dead while in foster care. Promise Waggoner died late Monday night, according to the Tarrant County Medical Examiner. A cause of death is pending. The girl's birth mother, Trynisha Huey, says she's devastated. "It hurts because in two months she would've been a whole year. My baby is gone," said Huey as she fought back tears during an interview on Tuesday. The mother said she lost custody of Promise, and her older sister, Erica, after coming under scrutiny for allegedly having drugs in the home, and also not feeding her child. Although Huey denies the charges, the children were removed earlier this year in the 323rd District Court in Tarrant County. % Trynisha Huey (Photo: WFAA) % A CPS spokeswoman said an email that a "...thorough and rigorous investigation" was underway by Residential Child Care Licensing into what happened at the foster care home in south Fort Worth. Fort Worth police confirmed that the Crimes Against Children Unit was leading the investigation but cautioned that no criminal charges have been filed. Huey said she was told by authorities her daughter was put to bed at about 7 p.m. and found unresponsive when an adult checked on her a couple of hours later. She said Promise was born premature but that her health was now fine. She fears for her older child's safety, who remains in foster care. "Can I have my oldest child back? Can I have her back?" she said. Her attorney, Oni Groves, said she's working to file paperwork that would ask for the court to revisit the case. "This tragedy is contrary to what anyone could imagine occurring on the Department's watch," she said in an email. Police say their investigation is ongoing. Fort Collins disability board walks out during dad's public comment about group home abuse Foothills Gateway board criticized after walking out during remarks by parent Keith Liddle By Jennifer Brown | jbrown@denverpost.com PUBLISHED: August 25, 2016 at 5:41 pm | UPDATED: August 26, 2016 at 8:04 am YouTube Screenshot Keith Liddle addresses Foothills Gateway CCB. He spoke for 5 minutes & 16 seconds before he was interrupted and the subsequent walkout. They walked out on him before he was done speaking. The full version of this video is at the top of the playlist. Original recording date is 08/16/2016 in Fort Collins, CO Parents whose children have developmental disabilities are outraged after a community board that manages their benefit money walked out of a meeting while a father was speaking about his son's treatment at a group home. The walkout by the Foothills Gateway board in Fort Collins was recorded by an audience member and posted on YouTube, then distributed by e-mail to hundreds of parents. In the video, board president John Haley raises a hand and tells parent Keith Liddle that his "five minutes is up." Liddle, a frequent speaker at board meetings, responds, "OK, let me go ahead and read this." Haley repeats two more times that Liddle's time is up and then abruptly calls for a recess. The entire board stood and walked out of the room while Liddle continued reading his prepared remarks for three more minutes. The exchange sparked uproar from parents and a letter to the board from Sen. Irene Aguilar, a Denver Democrat who sponsored legislation this year that requires periodic state audits of Colorado's 20 community-centered boards that manage state and federal disability funds. The new law also requires boards to post financial documents on their websites and allow public comment at their meetings. "I encourage your board to develop alternative strategies to intervene in situations like this where families are having difficulty abiding by your expectations," Aguilar wrote. "Despite your history with this parent, I found the behavior of the board disrespectful." The senator said the board's treatment of a parent "begs the question" of whether people with intellectual and developmental disabilities "are being treated better." The board president, in a three-page letter distributed by e-mail to the parent group, said Liddle continues to bring up the same issues even though Foothills Gateway and the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment resolved the neglect case involving Liddle's son in August 2014. "While the board is willing to listen to new issues of concern with regard to services and supports to the individuals we serve, we feel that this constant focus on incidents that are many years past are neither acceptable nor productive," Haley wrote. The board allocates 10 minutes at the beginning of its meetings for public comment, and did so prior to the new law. "Each speaker, at the chair's discretion, may speak for up to five minutes," the letter said. Liddle said he was the only person signed up to speak at the Aug. 16 meeting. Friction between parents and the state's 20 boards have reached a high point this year after a Denver city audit of mill levy funds found misspending by Rocky Mountain Human Services, the board that serves Denver County residents with disabilities. The boards determine who is eligible for Medicaid and other public funds and help families arrange therapy, in-home care and group home placement. Highlands Ranch resident Dawn Caldwell, whose 15-year-old son has severe disabilities, said the video made her sick to her stomach. "How could you treat a human being this way, much less a taxpayer and a customer?" she said. "How are you treating people when there is not a camera?" "Really the message seems to be if you make waves at any given point in time then they'll do their best to silence or ignore you," said Stacy Warden of Broomfield, whose son has cerebral palsy. Liddle's 29-year-old son is non-verbal and has the function of a 2-year-old due to spinal meningitis as an infant. In 2014, a state investigation found his son was neglected at a group home and state officials asked Foothills Gateway for a "plan of action" to correct several issues. After staff noticed a rash on Liddle's son, he did not see a doctor for 11 days and then was diagnosed with shingles. The state also found staff was negligent in placing him with an abusive roommate. During his public comment at the board meeting last week, Liddle was again asking the board for a copy of a "rebuttal letter" it wrote to the state after the investigation. Liddle said the board's attorney told him Foothills Gateway is not required to release the letter. Liddle plans to return to the board's meeting next month to finish reading his statement. Letters: Old-school TLC better than kids' boot camp Updated: August 26, 2016 — 3:01 AM EDT Share Tweet Tumblr Email | Comment REPRINTS KATIE FALKENBERG / Los Angeles Times A student works on a painting at KinderPrep, a weeklong summer program in Santa Monica, Calif., for children who are about to enter kindergarten. ISSUE | EDUCATION Old-school TLC better than boot camp Many things separate the rich from the rest of us: mansions, yachts, private jets, and the $1,000 "weeklong boot camp" for their preschoolers ("Boot camp gets kids ready for kindergarten," Wednesday). I'd like to suggest another, equally good - if not better - educational tool: parenting. Read to your children daily from the day they are born; it bonds parent and child. Have them pick up their toys from the time they can bend over without falling on their heads; it teaches responsibility. Give them instructions and consequences when they don't follow through; it instills respect for authority. Discipline them when they misbehave; it demonstrates cause and effect. Talk and listen to your child; it imparts self-confidence and self-worth. Eat and do things with them; it gives them unconditional love. Morgantown foster care provider charged with felony abuse Posted by sunshinewiles on August 25, 2016 in Local News MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — A foster parent faces felony abuse charges. A West Virginia State Police Crimes Against Children unit investigation led to the arrest of a Morgantown woman.

According to Sgt. Adam Scott, Kristina Singleton, 43, injured a 7-year-old girl living in Singleton's foster care home. Scott received findings of a WV DHHR Institutional Investigation Unit report after Singleton's foster home was investigated for abuse. The girl had severe, belt shaped, bruising on her rib cage and legs. Children in Singleton's home told investigators she used belts, hands, flyswatters and plastics, wood and metal spoons to hit the children as punishment and that the victim was most severely punished. Singleton initially denied the abuse before Scott said she admitted to physically disciplining children but not causing injuries. She was charged with one felony count of child abuse resulting in injury. Source: <http://wajr.com/morgantown-foster-care-provider-charged-with-felony-abuse/>

Do Treatment Centers for Troubles Teens Inflict More Harm Than Good? By Abbie Kraft, Parent Herald | August 29, 9:11 PM A member of the gallery staff looks through a section of a rubber room which forms part of a new exhibition at the Bethlem Gallery on February 18, 2015 in London, England. (Parents would only want what's best for their kids, thus those who are faced with troubled teenagers would opt for treatment centers. Though it may seem like the right thing to do, it was revealed that taking teens to treatment centers can do more harm than good. Advertisement One write up from Huffington Post revealed that troubled teens that were sent to treatment centers are actually going through tough times. It was then mentioned that treatment centers can actually do more harm than good especially when it comes to their mental health struggles. Sebastian Murdock noted that the treatment centers are making it worse for troubled teens, thus they don't tend to lie low when it comes to aggression. It was then mentioned that the staff treated the teenage patients so bad, up to a point that some of them would opt to commit suicide. Murdock mentioned that the treatment facility already lasted for a long time, yet nothing has changed over the years. Teenagers are still being tormented and parents were paying double for their child to be treated unjustly. Sebastian Murdock specifically mentioned Island View, which charged parents around $10,000/month for their kids. Though Murdock's write-up may only be one person's opinion, Vlad Diaz, an ex-employee from the facility backed his claims. According to Diaz, he already witnessed several suicide attempts during his 11 months of employment. Diaz also added that the treatment center's way of tending the confined teens is quite shocking. He then shared that one of the reasons on why the treatment facility was the fact that he can't stand to see the teens being treated like animals. Empowering Parents then added while sending a troubled teen to teen boot camps may be ideal for some parents, it was mentioned that one of the best ways to help a troubled child is to work with them in going through tough times. The website also noted that there are not guarantees that troubled teen programs "Your child isn't a digital camera that you can mail away and get fixed and returned to you in working order," the website mentioned. "You have to change the dynamic within your family if you want to see results." Widespread abuse uncovered during investigation into Rhode Island boarding school Published September 01, 2016 Associated Press Facebook Twitter Email Print St. George's School in Middletown, R.I. (AP Photo/Steven Senne, File) An independent investigator looking at sexual abuse at the elite Rhode Island boarding school St. George's issued a report Thursday documenting widespread abuse there in the 1970s and 1980s. ADVERTISEMENT Among the findings is that at least one in five girls who attended the school in the 1970s was abused by athletic trainer Al Gibbs. It also found 10 school employees sexually abused at least 51 students in the 1970s and 1980s, and at least 10 students were abused by fellow students. "In the 1970s and 1980s, St. George's School betrayed the trust of the many St. George's students who became the targets of sexual abuse when they came to the school, and likewise betrayed the trust of parents who sent those students to St. George's with the expectation that it would be a safe place for them to live and learn," according to the report by Boston lawyer Martin Murphy. Murphy was hired in January by the school and the survivors' group SGS for Healing. Gibbs was fired in 1980 after being caught taking photographs of a naked girl in his office, but the report found that he was paid a $1,200 annual grant for "distinguished service" that continued until he died in 1996. The school acknowledged in December that he abused 17 students, but the report said that number was at least 31. Another teacher received a recommendation from the dean of the faculty despite his firing in 1988 for inappropriate sexual contact with a student, the report said. The report also suggested that the school's current headmaster did not appropriately handle reports of sexual misconduct by a teacher in 2004 and should have fired him rather than put him on leave. It also criticized the current board of trustees for "victim shaming" by issuing a statement earlier this year that cast doubt on the credibility of a student who accused the teacher of molestation. Attorney Eric MacLeish, a St. George's alumnus who represented dozens of victims at the school, called the report the most comprehensive recounting to date of sexual abuse at an American boarding school. State police previously conducted their own investigation and said they wouldn't bring charges for a variety of reasons, including the statute of limitations and changes in the laws since some of the abuse occurred. Gazette editorial: Don't fall prey to high-priced, unregulated private 'academies' September 10, 2016 Good-hearted parents who pay large fees to send their troubled teens to fundamentalist residential "academies" need to be cautious. Some such schools have ominous records. Two years ago, state officials closed Miracle Meadows Seventh-day Adventist school, in Harrison County, because a teacher allegedly choked a student unconscious and locked another in handcuffs, and because student residents alleged sexual abuse by fellow students. Miracle Meadows chief Susan Gayle Clark pleaded guilty to misdemeanor child-neglect charges and was sentenced this year. ADVERTISINGinRead invented by TeadsRecently, a Kanawha County case was in the news. Parents are suing ministers who operated the former Blue Creek Academy, near Clendenin, alleging that students were starved, beaten and sexually abused. One student said he was beaten with a board if he failed a test or didn't memorize scripture, and was put on a diet of beans and water. A long report on the Daily Beast site is titled "Rapes, Daily Beatings and No Escape: Christian School Was Hell for These Boys." It says parents paid $1,000 a month to send sons to the unlicensed Blue Creek school, which promised in advertisements to "watch God move as he helps us snatch troubled souls out of Satan's hand." The site says Blue Creek students suffered "isolation, physical beatings and mistreatment, and at least two students reported sexual abuse by another student." It says boys were "bunkered in dilapidated quarters that were infested with rats and mice." They weren't permitted to speak in public, except to sing hymns for churches and the elderly; they weren't taken to the doctor and their calls home were monitored. The national report continued: "Like thousands of other religious private schools around the country — many of which become havens for abuse — Blue Creek Academy operated unlicensed, unregulated, and wholly unmonitored by the state." State schools Superintendent Michael Martirano forced closure of the academy two years ago — and its principal moved to Montana, where he opened a Christian "ranch" in a three-bedroom house. Parents must be extremely wary of unregulated schools that prey on parents' worries and desires to give their children the best opportunities. - See more at: <http://www.wvgazetteemail.com/gazette-editorials/20160910/gazette-editorial-dont-fall-prey-to-high-priced-unregulated-private-academies#sthash.ZlcCnq3.dpuf>

Tehachapi Mountain Boys Home closes following citations BY DARLA A. BAKER dbaker@tehachapinews.com Updated 22 hrs ago Amid a slew of health and safety violations, Tehachapi Mountain Boys Home closed its doors after voluntarily surrendering its operating license with the California Department of Social Services. The group home, located on Highline Road, was a privately held company operated by Annie R. Pritchard. It was licensed in April 2007 to serve six ambulatory boys between the ages of 12 and 17 with 24-hour, non-medical care and supervision, including two clients placed by Merced and Fresno counties. "They surrendered their license at the end of May following 12 complaint investigations," Michael Weston, a spokesman for the state Department of Social Services, said Thursday. As of May 31, the group home was assessed an estimated $33,150 in civil penalties resulting from cited violations issued in March and April 2016, according to the state Department of Social Services website. Also, according to its website, Department of Social Services-licensed evaluators made a total of 32 visits to the home since May 2012, which resulted in the group home receiving 15 Type A citations and 108 Type B citations. Type A citations are classified as having an immediate health, safety or personal rights impact, whereas Type B citations are classified as having a potential impact. According to Weston, the average number of annual visits per group home is based on many factors, including the number of previously issued citations. Weston stated that the number of citations issued at the Tehachapi Mountain Boys Home was "a high number." In addition, the group home was subjected to three unannounced inspections since opening, the latest on March 28. During this inspection, citations were written for faulty fixtures, furniture equipment and supplies, expired food and sanitation of building and grounds. In addition, civil penalties were assessed for lack of documentation, including minutes from the board of directors' meetings, posting of complaint procedures, a written disaster and mass casualty plan of action, personnel records on the administrator, records of cash resources and personal property of clients, and proof of mandatory training of child care staff members. "We did not receive proper training," said Becky Gage, who served as a child care worker for 19 months until the group home's closure. "In fact, I found a phony CPR license with my name on it, and I snagged a copy of it and gave it to Community Care Licensing." According to the CDSS website, on April 20, the group home received an additional citation for Pritchard's deficiency in maintaining the hours necessary to manage and administer the facility. "In the last eight or nine months prior to her shutting down, I did not see her (Pritchard)," Gage said. According to CDSS spokesman Weston, Tehachapi Mountain Boys Homes was classified as a

Level 12 group home. The rate level is based on the experience and expertise of the staff at the group home. The higher the rate level, the higher the basic rate paid to the group home per child, per month, with Level 14 being the highest. "The average basic rate for Level 12 would be $9,182 per child, per month," said Weston, adding that this rate of pay had the potential to increase on a case-by-case basis, depending on the needs of the child, including therapeutic services. Weston said this money comes from a variety of sources, including federal, state and education funds, in addition to private parties who place their own children. Children in group homes who are under court jurisdiction may be placed there due to violations of law or as dependent children removed from their homes because of abuse, neglect or abandonment. Weston stated that children are placed in group homes by placement agencies based on the needs of the child. According to Weston, even though the group home has closed and surrendered its license, Pritchard may still face further actions. "The department is still actively involved in the investigation of the group home," Weston said. As of press time, Pritchard had not responded to requests for comment. Long Island Abuse Case Reveals Risks of Out-of-State Foster Care By NIKITA STEWART and JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN SEPT. 13, 2016 Continue reading the main story Share This Page Continue reading the main story Share Tweet Email More Save Photo Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu's house in Ridge, N.Y. Over the course of 20 years, he brought more than 100 children into his home. Credit Gordon M. Grant for The New York Times The website features photographs and short biographies of children, some with special needs. Choices can be narrowed by gender, age, race and ethnicity. The State of Washington turns to sites, like the Washington Adoption Resource Exchange, to help find adoptive parents for children. The state's goal is to keep the children near family and familiar surroundings, but if officials cannot find a suitable match, they consider homes out of state — even across the country in New York. That is how Washington first found Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu, who lives in Ridge, N.Y., on Long Island. He reached out after seeing children online in 2009. Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu eventually took in three boys from Washington, two of whom he adopted. They were among more than 100 children he cared for over some 20 years, a vast majority of whom came from New York City. But Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu, a foster parent trusted by so many social workers, is now in jail awaiting trial on charges of sexually abusing five of his adopted sons and endangering the welfare of two foster children. Advertisement Continue reading the main story Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu's arrest prompted questions about why it took so long for the alleged abuse to be revealed. But it also drew attention to the practice of sending foster children far from the communities they knew — in this case, nearly 3,000 miles — to find a home. Some states use such long-distance placement because their own systems are struggling to find a place for children with special needs. Advocates say such long-distance arrangements can be positive because they can help children find homes more quickly. But effective oversight of even local foster care providers has proved a difficult task for many child welfare agencies nationwide; distance adds another obstacle. Continue reading the main story Advertisement Continue reading the main story Records obtained by The New York Times show that social workers in Washington were confused about the status of a 2014 investigation into abuse in Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu's home across the country. At that time, they continued to actively guide Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu in his efforts to adopt a third boy because they did not know details of the investigation. "#1 Do you know anything about the investigation," Amy Herring, a social worker in Washington, wrote in an email to Erin Coyle, who at the time was a director at SCO Family of Services, a nonprofit foster care agency in New York that monitored Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu on behalf of Washington. "#2 Do you know when the adoption paperwork may be done by?" Ms. Coyle "is no longer employed by the agency," SCO said. Ms. Coyle did not respond to requests for comment through messages left by phone and sent via Facebook. For his part, Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu, who was licensed to run a therapeutic home for special needs children, continued to be paid. From September 2010 through January 2016, when he was arrested, he received nearly $145,000 from Washington for caring for children placed with him, in addition to money he received from New York City for caring for local foster children. Photo Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu has pleaded not guilty to charges of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child. Credit New York Police Department Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu, 60, has pleaded not guilty to charges of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child. His lawyer, Donald Mates Jr., said the allegations were false. The first mention of Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu's name in Washington State's records was in late 2009, and was positive. He was interested in adopting a boy listed on an adoption website. Advertisement Continue reading the main story Lori Whittaker, a social worker, wrote in a case file in December 2009 that the staff thought he would be a "good placement." Also, Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu had told them that none of the child's special needs "scare me." (The children's names, as well as confidential information, were redacted from files given to The Times.) Soon after, on Feb. 3, 2010, another social worker, Veronica L. Mo, wrote something similar and said he had also asked about another child. Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu traveled to Washington to meet one of the boys, according to the records. He soon took another child. Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu was a one-man operation used by several different agencies that considered his home a safe haven for boys who were developmentally or physically disabled, or had severe behavioral problems. That dependency proved blinding for those agencies, law enforcement officials have said. Mr. Mates said that nothing was overlooked and that his client is innocent. Over the past 20 years, Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu had been the subject of 30 to 40 complaints about abuse or other mistreatment of children, and the police or social services had investigated them all, Mr. Mates said. "Each and every time that an investigation was done, no charges were brought," he said. Today's Headlines Wake up each morning to the day's top news, analysis and opinion delivered to your inbox. Privacy Policy And records suggested that the authorities at Washington's child welfare agency were more directly involved in monitoring Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu than was New York City's child welfare agency. Although New York's agency sent more than 90 boys to him, it had outsourced oversight of Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu to the nonprofit SCO Family of Services. Through the years, there were several different agencies involved, like the boys' schools, hospitals where they went for care, and a residential treatment center called Little Flower in Suffolk County. A developmentally disabled boy from Washington whom Gonzales-Mugaburu adopted left his direct supervision to live at Little Flower. There, in 2014, he told a psychotherapist about horrific abuses inside Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu's home on a quiet cul-de-sac. The therapist, Amy D'Antonio, alerted the authorities about the allegations, prompting an investigation by Suffolk County Child Protective Services. Ms. D'Antonio had helped the young man, who was 18 years old at the time, reconnect with his biological family in Washington. She said Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu objected, once approaching her in the parking lot of the treatment center and telling her that the teenager did not have the mental capacity to make such a decision. Advertisement Continue reading the main story Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu told her the boy was a "compulsive and pathological liar," said Ms. D'Antonio, who in March sued Little Flower, her former employer, saying the agency should have acted more quickly to prevent further abuse of children in his care. Little Flower has disputed the claims in her lawsuit and says it "fully supported" her efforts to contact the authorities. Photo A car driving past the entrance to Little Flower, a residential treatment center in Suffolk County. A boy told a psychotherapist at Little Flower that Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu had abused him. Credit Heather Walsh for The New York Times Yet while that investigation was underway, social workers in Washington were trying to place a third child with Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu. At the same time, Washington officials began to question why the state was paying Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu for a child who was no longer in his direct care. Questioned, Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu became indignant, according to entries that social workers placed in his case file. He told Ms. Herring, the Washington social worker, that he resented being treated "like a crook and it hurts him." "He reported that it also angers him deeply. They make him feel 'dirty and undervalued,'" the entries read. Washington later found that Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu had, in fact, been overpaid. But Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu continued to complain. On Jan. 12 this year, Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu told Ms. Herring that he felt "once again insulted" over the disputed payments, according to records. But two days later, Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu shifted the conversation. He told Ms. Herring that he was under investigation. "He reported that two 'troubled boys' are causing problems for him, and he wanted to make sure that the SW was aware of what is going on," she wrote, using shorthand for social worker. At that point, one young man after another, including the 18-year-old adopted son from Washington, were coming forward with allegations of abuse. Two boys, 11 and 13, told the authorities about sexual misconduct in the home. Unlike allegations by boys in the past, theirs were believed, mostly because the boys did not have severe disabilities or emotional problems, said Detective Lt. Robert Donohue, commander of Suffolk County's special victims unit. Advertisement Continue reading the main story Much of the blame for the failure to alert other agencies has been placed on SCO Family of Services in New York, which coordinated the placement of boys in Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu's home, with most coming from Long Island and the surrounding area. It has acknowledged that it could have taken more aggressive action after previous complaints. "Internal and external reviews have concluded that SCO had no knowledge of sexual abuse or misconduct in this home," the agency said. "Our review of this former foster parent, however, suggests that there were other issues with the home, and in retrospect and knowing what we know now, a decision to close the home should have been made earlier." It was child welfare officials in Washington who were most dependent on getting straight answers and accurate updates from SCO about conditions at Mr. Gonzales-Mugaburu's home and the status of

investigations. Norah West, a spokeswoman for the Washington State Department of Social and Health Services, said, "We rely on information from the agency that is contracted to ensure the well-being of the child in that receiving state." The mother of the 18-year-old boy, whom The Times is not naming to protect her son's identity, grew up in the foster care system herself. She said she had struggled with mental illness and substance abuse, and could not believe her son had suffered in a system that she thought would help him. "I can't believe they put him with someone like that," she said. "Look what I did to my son." Caregiver charged with abusing autistic teen in group home Updated Sep 13, 2016 (0) NEWARK, Del. (AP) — Delaware State Police have arrested a caregiver they say hit a 13-year-old autistic resident of a group home where she works. The agency said in a news release that the caregiver worked at the Manor Group Home, which is owned by the Christina School District. Police say the caregiver was seen repeatedly hitting the boy, who is autistic and doesn't speak. Troopers say another staff member intervened and stopped the assault. Authorities say a school nurse wrote on an injury report that she saw redness and bruising on victim's right upper arm and scratches on the back of his neck. Officials say warrants were obtained and on Tuesday, 53-year-old Harrietta Kanda of New Castle was arrested. She is charged with felony child abuse and endangering the welfare of a child. Sitka Academy closes its doors Created on Wednesday, 14 September 2016 02:00 | Written by Colin Staub | inShare Share JW DISQUS VIEW COMMENTS Loss of students from CYFS program prompts school district to shutter facility Sitka Academy, a program operated by the Newberg School District to serve youths in the care of Chehalis Youth and Family Services, is not operating during this school year due to a lack of students to attend its classes. The academy was attended solely by youths living in CYFS group homes, which a Department of Human Services spokesperson and an attorney for CYFS both confirmed are no longer housing residents. The state agency notified CYFS in June of its intention to revoke the Newberg care provider's license to operate residential youth homes. The notice cited a number of incidents that came to light during a long investigation, including alleged neglect, maltreatment, lack of supervision, failure to follow procedures in mandatory reporting and protection of residents' health and safety, and financial mismanagement. CYFS has since appealed the state's decision and will contest the findings in a hearing set for this fall, but in the meantime DHS has relocated all residents of the three group homes that together housed 16 youths. "DHS began moving children upon filing an intent to revoke in June 2016," DHS spokesperson Andrea Cantu-Schomus confirmed in an email. A fourth CYFS home was shut down by DHS last fall through the same process, with similar incidents cited for the closure. For several years young people living in CYFS homes who were enrolled in public schooling received education through the Long Term Care and Treatment (LTCT) program provided by the Willamette Education Service District (WESD). Admittance into that program was automatic for students living in the group homes, Newberg School District spokesperson Claudia Stewart said. Education service districts are used to provide programs that are in limited demand and may not be cost effective for an individual school district to hire full-time. ESDs serve multiple school districts, meaning personnel are shared in an effort to reduce costs for each district. The LTCT program aims to tailor teaching to the issues the youths in CYFS homes face. "To be admitted to a group home, it's indicative that they have social, behavior and academic struggles," Stewart said. But in April 2015, the WESD told the Newberg district it would no longer provide that program for Newberg students, and that beginning in the 2015-2016 school year the district would have to find another option to educate that population. The school district could not find another program to contract with, Stewart said, so it began developing its own in-house program to educate the youths. New employees were hired and trained and when the YMCA branch on Sitka Avenue closed in August 2015 the school district leased the building to open the LTCT program. The facility was remodeled and furnished with new equipment, and was dubbed Sitka Academy. It opened in September 2015 to 35 students, a number that Stewart said fluctuated by five or six students during the year, although those who left were quickly replaced. Staffing also fluctuated from 10 to 12 employees, based on how many students there were and whether they required an individual aide. All in all, startup and operational costs for Sitka Academy came to $800,000, made up of federal funding as well as from the Newberg School District general fund. The school district hoped to expand the program so it could serve other school districts as well (similar to the WESD). "We built this program to continue to operate," Stewart said. But beginning in about April (two months before the state issued the intent to revoke notice) the numbers of students began to decline, Stewart said. In the intent to revoke notice, DHS said new admissions to the group homes were officially closed on May 19. The school year closed with 12 students at Sitka, Stewart said, only a third as many as the program opened with. The dwindling population raised questions about whether Sitka would have anyone to serve in the coming school year — questions that elicited few solid answers. Stewart said school district officials "were asking those questions for at least two months, and there was just not a clear answer." And with about a dozen staff members slated to work in that program, a decision had to be made. There were vacant staff positions in other departments that the Sitka employees could be moved into if the program was going to shut down, Stewart said. Then the news of the state's intention to revoke CYFS's license came in June. With the Sitka program populated entirely by residents of those group homes, DHS told the district there would not be any students to serve, and the school district made plans to close Sitka and move the staff members into other departments. But once CYFS appealed the state's move to revoke its license, a protective seal was ordered by the Department of Justice that barred release of most information about the case. At that point DHS stopped talking to the school district, Stewart said. In early August the school district received further confirmation from CYFS there would be no students to attend the Sitka program in the fall. All the staff members who worked in the one-year-old program have been reassigned to other school departments, Stewart said, adding that there are not yet any alternative plans for the Sitka building. There's also no definitive answer on whether the program will start back up. After all, CYFS has not actually had its license revoked (see sidebar), and if it wins its appeal youths could potentially move back into the group homes. "We've been hearing mixed messages about the residential program starting up, meaning that (the Newberg School District) would need to start up the (Sitka) program to provide services for kids," Stewart said Monday. "Despite efforts, there is no clear answer from CYFS or DHS because of the ongoing litigation." Last week the Oregon Department of Education contacted the school district, Stewart said, advising it to hold off on taking action with the Sitka building due to the potential for the program to start back up mid-year. That would presumably be the case if CYFS wins the appeal and retains its license. "So the future of the Sitka (LTCT) program remains unclear and the school district remains in a holding pattern," Stewart said. Attorney Connor Harrington, representing CYFS, said that while the residential services program no longer has any youth to serve for now, CYFS "is focusing on serving the community through its Chehalis Counseling Center, Youth Opportunity Occupation Program (YOOP) and (Lucky Finds) thrift store, which are all currently operating." CYFS Executive Director Deborah Cathers-Seymour noted the YOOP program provides education to a population that was not served by Sitka Academy: youths who have dropped out and are not enrolled in public education through the school district, and who are working to earn their GED, to receive community college credit or other certifications. The program also teaches employment skills to help students enter the workforce, she said. YOOP has two facilities, in Newberg and McMinnville, and has more than 100 youth participants right now, Cathers-Seymour said. Many of those enrolled in YOOP programs "struggle with poverty, homelessness and behavioral concerns," she said. "They have not been successful in mainstream public school settings and have typically dropped out." As for the youths who were moved out of the group homes by DHS, it's unclear where they have been relocated to. DHS declined to comment due to the protective order. Child dies in foster care; removed from home after falsified drug test By Brianna Smith Published: September 15, 2016, 3:19 pm Updated: September 15, 2016, 6:14 pm According to a new lawsuit, a 3-year-old died after being removed from his family because of a falsified drug test by Accurate Diagnostics of Laurens County. Elijah Jack Oberdier was removed from his parents home in January of 2015, after a hair strand drug test result given to Laurens County DSS said Oberdier had marijuana in his system. Elijah went to live with family members and was taken to visit other family in Western North Carolina. While there, Elijah died inside a house fire. A year and a half later, Elijah's parents were charged with Unlawful Neglect of Child, even after it was proved Elijah's test results were falsified by Lynn Craig, the owner of Accurate Diagnostics Laurens County. 7 other families have now filed lawsuits against Lynn Craig, Accurate Diagnostics, and DSS because of children being pulled from family members over falsified drug tests. GRANT/NYT) More When the state of Washington can't find local placement for children in need, it reaches out to out-of-state foster care. Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu from New York took in three boys from Washington, two of whom he adopted. Now he waits trial on charges of sexual abuse. Share story By Nikita Stewart and JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN The New York Times The website features photographs and short biographies of children, some with special needs. Choices can be narrowed by gender, age, race and ethnicity. The state of Washington turns to such sites, like the Washington Adoption Resource Exchange, to help find adoptive parents for children. The state's goal is to keep the children near family and familiar surroundings, but if officials cannot find a suitable match, they consider homes out of state — even across the country in New York. That is how Washington first found Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu, who lives in Ridge, New York, on Long Island. He reached out after seeing children online in 2009. Gonzales-Mugaburu eventually took in three boys from Washington, two of whom he adopted. They were among more than 100 children he cared for over some 20 years, a vast majority of whom came from New York City. But the foster parent, trusted by so many social workers, is now in jail awaiting trial on charges of sexually abusing five of his adopted sons and endangering the welfare of two foster children. Gonzales-Mugaburu's arrest prompted questions about why it took so long for the alleged abuse to be revealed. But it also drew attention to the practice of sending foster children far from their communities — in this case, nearly 3,000 miles — to find a home. Some states use such long-distance placement because their own systems are struggling to find a place for children with special needs. Advocates say such long-distance arrangements can be positive because they can help children find homes more quickly. But effective oversight of even local foster-care providers has proved difficult for many child-welfare agencies nationwide; distance adds another obstacle. Records obtained by The New York Times show that social workers in Washington were confused about the status of a 2014 investigation into abuse in Gonzales-Mugaburu's home. At that time, they continued to guide Gonzales-Mugaburu in his efforts to adopt a third boy because they did not know details of the investigation. “#1 Do you know anything about the investigation,” Amy Herring, a social worker in Washington, wrote in an email to Erin Coyle, who at the time was a director at SCO Family of Services, a nonprofit foster-care agency in New York that monitored Gonzales-Mugaburu on behalf of Washington. “#2 Do you know when the adoption paperwork may be done by?” Coyle “is no longer employed by the agency,” SCO said. Coyle did not respond to requests for comment through messages left by phone and sent via Facebook. For his part, Gonzales-Mugaburu, who was licensed to run a therapeutic home for special-needs children, continued to be paid. From September 2010 through January 2016, when he was arrested, he received nearly $145,000 from Washington for caring for children placed with him, in addition to money he received from New York City for caring for local foster children. Gonzales-Mugaburu, 60, has pleaded not guilty to charges of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child. His lawyer, Donald Mates Jr., said the allegations were false. The first mention of Gonzales-Mugaburu's name in Washington state's records was in late 2009, and it was positive. He was interested in adopting a boy listed on an adoption website. Lori Whittaker, a social worker, wrote in a case file in December 2009 that the staff thought he would be a “good placement.” Also, Gonzales-Mugaburu had told them that none of the child's special needs “scare me.” (The children's names, as well as confidential information, were redacted from files given to The Times.) Soon after, on Feb. 3, 2010, another social worker, Veronica Mo, wrote something similar and said he had also asked about another child. Gonzales-Mugaburu traveled to Washington to meet one of the boys, according to the records. He soon took another child. Gonzales-Mugaburu was a one-man operation used by several different agencies that considered his home a safe haven for boys who were developmentally or physically disabled or had severe behavioral problems. That dependency proved blinding for those agencies, law enforcement officials have said. Mates said that nothing was overlooked and that his client was innocent. Over the past 20 years, Gonzales-Mugaburu was the subject of 30 to 40 complaints about abuse or other mistreatment of children, and the police or social services investigated them all, Mates said. “Each and every time that an investigation was done, no charges were brought,” he said. And records suggested that the authorities at Washington's child welfare agency were more directly involved in monitoring Gonzales-Mugaburu than New York City's child welfare agency. Although New York's agency sent more than 90 boys to him, it had outsourced oversight of Gonzales-Mugaburu to the nonprofit SCO Family of Services. Through the years, there were several different agencies involved, like the boys' schools, hospitals where they went for care and a residential treatment center called Little Flower in Suffolk County. A developmentally disabled boy from Washington whom Gonzales-Mugaburu adopted left his direct supervision to live at Little Flower. There, in 2014, he told a psychotherapist about horrific abuses inside Gonzales-Mugaburu's home on a quiet cul-de-sac. The therapist, Amy D'Antonio, alerted the authorities about the allegations, prompting an investigation by Suffolk County Child Protective Services. D'Antonio helped the young man, who was 18 at the time, reconnect with his biological family in Washington. She said Gonzales-Mugaburu objected, once approaching her in the parking lot of the treatment center and telling her that the teenager did not have the mental capacity to make such a decision. Gonzales-Mugaburu told her the boy was a “compulsive and pathological liar,” said D'Antonio, who in March sued Little Flower, her former employer, saying the agency should have acted more quickly to prevent further abuse of children in his care. Little Flower has disputed the claims in her lawsuit and says it “fully supported” her efforts to contact the authorities. Yet, while that investigation was under way, social workers in Washington were trying to place a third child with Gonzales-Mugaburu. At the same time, Washington officials began to question why the state was paying Gonzales-Mugaburu for a child who was no longer in his direct care. Questioned, Gonzales-Mugaburu became indignant, according to entries that social workers placed in his case file. He told Herring he resented being treated “like a crook and it hurts him.” “He reported that it also angers him deeply. They make him feel ‘dirty and undervalued,’” the entries read. Washington later found that Gonzales-Mugaburu had, in fact, been overpaid. But Gonzales-Mugaburu continued to complain. On Jan. 12 this year, Gonzales-Mugaburu told Herring, of SCO, that he felt “once again insulted” over the disputed payments, according to records. But two days later, Gonzales-Mugaburu shifted the conversation. He told Herring he was under investigation. “He reported that two ‘troubled boys’ are causing problems for him, and he wanted to make sure that the SW was aware of what is going on,” she wrote, using shorthand for social worker. At that point, one young man after another, including the 18-year-old adopted son from Washington, were coming forward with allegations of abuse. Two boys, 11 and 13, told the authorities about sexual misconduct in the home. Unlike allegations by boys in the past, theirs were believed, mostly because the boys did not have severe disabilities or emotional problems, said Detective Lt. Robert Donohue, commander of Suffolk County's special victims unit. Much of the blame for the failure to alert other agencies has been placed on SCO Family of Services in New York, which coordinated the placement of boys in Gonzales-Mugaburu home, with most coming from Long Island and the surrounding area. It has acknowledged that it could have taken more aggressive action after previous complaints. “Internal and external reviews have concluded that SCO had no knowledge of sexual abuse or misconduct in this home,” the agency said. “Our review of this former foster parent, however, suggests that there were other issues with the home, and in retrospect and knowing what we know now, a decision to close the home should have been made earlier.” It was child-welfare officials in Washington who were most dependent on getting straight answers and accurate updates from SCO about conditions at Gonzales-Mugaburu's home and the status of investigations. Norah West, a spokeswoman for the Washington State Department of Social and Health Services, said, “We rely on information from the agency that is contracted to ensure the well-being of the child in that receiving state.” The mother of the 18-year-old boy, whom The Times is not naming to protect her son's identity, grew up in the foster-care system herself. She said that she had struggled with mental illness and substance abuse, and that she found it unthinkable her son had suffered in a system she thought would help him. “I can't believe they put him with someone like that,” she said. “Look what I did to my son.” Nikita Stewart JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN Source: <http://www.seattletimes.com/seattle-news/long-island-abuse-case-reveals-risks-of-out-of-state-foster-care/>

Teenage Girl Dies After Incident at For-profit Group Home The 15-year-old was a resident at a Delaware facility owned by AdvoServ, which has faced decades of reports of abuse. by Heather Vogell ProPublica, Sep. 20, 2016, 3:56 p.m. 4 Comments Print Print This is part of an ongoing investigation Restraints Do you know a child who has been forcibly restrained or secluded at school? Help us investigate by sharing your story. Update, Sep. 20, 2016: The Maryland Department of Human Resources said late Tuesday that it has terminated its contract with AdvoServ after determining “it is in the best interest of the children in our care” to move the children to other providers. “Our Department is moving swiftly, and with great care and consideration, to evaluate and identify placements that are the best fit, and that meet the unique needs of each child,” spokeswoman Katherine Morris said in a prepared statement. She did not say how many Maryland children are still in AdvoServ's care and how long it will take to remove them all. A teenage girl died last week after an incident at a group home in Delaware run by a for-profit company, AdvoServ, whose long record of problematic treatment ProPublica chronicled last year. Attorney Chris Gowen, who has a lawsuit against AdvoServ concerning a different teen, said he has learned workers were manually restraining the girl when she became unresponsive. He and his clients have spoken to current and former workers about the incident. “While we await further information we do hope that a full investigation into this latest incident occurs,” he said. AdvoServ did not answer questions about the death. A spokesman declined to say whether the girl was being held down — manually restrained — before staff called 911. “Our staff is heartbroken over the loss of a young woman in our care, and our deepest sympathies go out to her mother and extended family,” the company said in a brief statement. The spokesman said mechanical restraint devices, which include wrist and ankle cuffs, were not involved in the Delaware death and are not used in group homes in that state anymore. The girl, whose name state police did not release, died Wednesday in a Delaware hospital, two days after an ambulance took her from the home for youth with developmental or intellectual disabilities and serious behavior challenges. Delaware state police and regulators also haven't said what happened to the 15-year-old from Maryland. The state medical examiner's office is conducting an autopsy, but a spokeswoman said the results will not be made public. Maryland is one of several states that send difficult cases to AdvoServ because they cannot find beds and schooling closer to home. The company, which is owned by a private equity firm, is based in Delaware and reported last year that it cared for roughly 700 children and adults in that state, Florida, and New Jersey, and was expanding into Virginia. Gowen filed a lawsuit this summer in Delaware against AdvoServ, on behalf of a young resident who says he was left unsupervised and raped repeatedly by other clients at AdvoServ homes during more than four years there. His neck was also injured during a restraint performed by workers. "[W]e learned of a significant number of instances where improper restraints were used involving our client," Gowen said. Delaware state police and the state agency charged with licensing group homes and investigating abuse in institutions are looking into the girl's death. Asked whether Delaware regulators were taking steps to sanction the company or putting extra precautions in place to ensure children's safety there, Delaware Department of Services for Children, Youth and their Families spokeswoman Dawn Thompson said the agency had begun an inquiry: "Once completed we will determine any next steps if warranted." The girl is not the first child to die under questionable circumstances at AdvoServ's homes and schools. In 2013, Paige Lunsford, 14 and autistic, died at the company's Florida complex after a night in which she was restrained – at times latched to a bed and chair – while she vomited repeatedly. And in 1997, 14-year-old Jon Henley, who was autistic and had epilepsy, was found dead in his bed one morning after an apparent seizure. An autopsy revealed low levels of anti-seizure medication in his blood. Regulators in multiple states have fielded decades of complaints of abuse, neglect and inadequate medical care at AdvoServ facilities. Leslie Seid Margolis, a managing attorney with Disability Rights Maryland, said she has raised concerns about AdvoServ's care in Delaware dating back a decade. Her agency, which represents people with disabilities, has received multiple complaints about AdvoServ – including two that came in last fall alleging sexual and physical abuse. Margolis said that a few years before, she had obtained a copy of AdvoServ's policies for its Delaware homes – which she described as "draconian." They outlined the use of measures including wrist, waist and ankle restraints. Unrestrained While evidence of abuse of the disabled has piled up for decades, one for-profit company has used its deep pockets and influence to bully weak regulators and evade accountability. Read the story. What Happened to Adam It took one mother seven years to learn that the for-profit school she trusted with her son had strapped him down again and again, one time after not picking up his Legos. Read the story. "Every kind of restraint you could imagine," she said. "It was horrifying." Maryland eventually told AdvoServ it could no longer use mechanical restraints on children from the state. A former worker for AdvoServ in Delaware, who asked that his name not be used, said he left three years ago in part because he felt staff did not receive enough training in deescalating conflicts or restraining clients. The company had been trying out new restraint procedures that were supposed to make restraints less forceful by involving more staff members. But, he said, with too few staff often available to carry out the restraints as planned, "It just becomes unsafe." In response to the worker's comments, AdvoServ's spokesman pointed out that he left three years ago, but did not elaborate further. The company is one of the few group home operators that still use restraint devices to confine clients who become aggressive. As ProPublica has reported, AdvoServ staff used such mechanical restraints on clients at its 200-bed campus northwest of Orlando roughly 28,000 times. Florida officials said in June that they were moving clients out of AdvoServ's complex and stationing an investigator there to provide extra oversight during the transition, which they expected to take months. Man accused of assault on group home resident pleads guilty The Associated Press Updated 22 hrs ago (2) PAPILLION — A man who worked at a Bellevue group home for developmentally disabled people has been convicted in the sexual assault of one of the residents. Adrian Galbreath, 39, pleaded guilty Monday to attempted sexual assault and two counts of abuse of a vulnerable adult. Prosecutors lowered the assault charge in exchange for Galbreath's pleas. He's scheduled to be sentenced Nov. 21. Court records say Galbreath worked at Hands of Heartland and had invited the group home resident to Galbreath's Bellevue apartment on Sept. 23 last year. Authorities say Galbreath pushed down and began to assault the man after the man became intoxicated. A Hands of Heartland official has said Galbreath is no longer an employee. Stories of abuse at N.J. group homes spark lawmakers to demand action 1 / 24 Bill would provide oversight for developmentally disabled TRENTON - Monday, September 19, 2016 Chaired by Assemblywoman Valerie Vainieri Huttie, the state Assembly Human Service Committee meets to discuss a bill that would provide stronger oversight and investigative power of group homes and other housing for people with developmental disabilities. So why do people with developmental disabilities deserve any less of a response? Gus Egizi of Hammonton politely but firmly posed this question Monday to members of the Assembly Human Services Committee as they debated a bill that would impose stricter rules on state licensed group home operators. Egizi said his 37-year-old son, Michael, suffered a sunburn so bad he needed hospital care, as well as multiple bruises and injuries while under the care of group home and hospital staff. He's hired lawyers to get answers, but those requests have been ignored. "This would not be tolerated if it had happened at a day care center or a school," Egizi said. "This is a human rights issue. This is a civil rights issue." Aileen Rivera, a councilwoman from Wayne, said her 31-year-old son still suffers from the anxiety from enduring beatings, being restrained for hours and humiliated when a worker urinated on him. "There is an urgency to this bill," Rivera said. "Lives depend on it." The committee approved the bill by a 6-0 vote that would require: Six unannounced inspections at a group home every year; Drug testing for group home employees; Family and guardian notification within an hour after a medical emergency; Investigators to seek input from families or guardians and provide them progress reports during investigations. The bill (A2503) is named for Stephen Komninos, a 22-year-old man who died in 2007 when he was left unsupervised against medical orders, and choked to death on a bagel. Panel OKs new inspection rules for disabled Both bills require the state to make unannounced site visits, and in the event a disabled person is harmed, the agency responsible must in most cases notify the family or guardian within two hours "The protections afforded by this bill are too late to save Stephen's life. He did not survive the system," said Thomas J. Komninos of Upper Saddle River said of his son. "But today you will hear about others who have, so far, survived. Please do what is right for these people. Let's start giving them the same rights and protections enjoyed by all the other people in New Jersey. Tom Baffuto, executive director for The Arc of New Jersey, a statewide advocacy organization that has group home providers in each county, said he was "crushed" to hear the stories about their loved ones' abuse and neglect. But the remedy offered through this bill won't help and could make conditions worse, Baffuto said. The state Department of Human Services does not have the staff to perform six unannounced visits a year, and adding more inspectors will divert money away from services, Baffuto said. Three inspections is more reasonable and was included in the bill's first iteration in 2014, he said. The same committee passed a similar bill two years ago, but chairwoman Valerie Vainieri Huttie (D-Bergen) who is also the sponsor, said she abandoned that measure in order to meet with interested parties and develop "more comprehensive legislation." It's hard enough to attract a group home workforce when the average starting salary is a meager $10.50 an hour. Requiring applicants pay for the test will deter applicants, Baffuto said. "Sometimes even with the best of intentions, things that look good on paper are virtually impossible to operationalize," Baffuto said. Susan K. Livio may be reached at slivio@njadvancemedia.com. Child care home in Jackson County license suspended Jon Szerlag 3:52 PM, Sep 20, 2016 3:53 PM, Sep 20, 2016 A judge's gavel is seen on February 2, 2009 in Miami, Florida. Joe Raedle Copyright Getty Images After investigating complaints into a group child care home in Jackson County, The Michigan Department of Licensing and Regulatory Affairs (LARA) and the Bureau of Community and Health Systems issued an order of summary suspension and notice of intent to revoke the child care group home license. In a press release it states, the department received a complaint on Sept. 16 on the location, at 3800 Dormay. The license that is suspended belonged to Lisa Riggins, who has held a license to operate a group child care home since Oct. 27, 2011. The license was for 12 children. The investigation into the complaint found violations of the Child Care Organizations Act and administrative rules regarding caregiver and child care home family and caregiver responsibilities, states the release. LARA took emergency action to protect the health, welfare and safety of the children involved. The summary suspension order prohibits Riggins from operating a group child care home at the location, or any other address or location. She also cannot accept children for care after 6 p.m. Sept. 16, according to the release. The order also requires Riggins to inform all of the parents of children in her care that her license has been suspended and that she can no longer provide child care. According to the release, Michigan law defines a group child care home as "a private home in which more than 6 but not more than 12 minor children are given care and supervision for periods of less than 24 hours a day unattended by a parent or legal guardian, except children related to an adult member of the family by blood, marriage, or adoption. Group child care home includes a home in which care is given to an unrelated minor child for more than 4 weeks during a calendar year." Riggins has the right to appeal the suspension, and the case will be forwarded to the Michigan Administrative Hearing System for a hearing date. Courage House Claimed to Save Sex-Trafficked Girls. Instead, It Used Them As Funding Bait While Playing Evangelical Christian Missionary

Courage House received about $9,100 in government support per month per girl it took in. Elizabeth Nolan Brown Sep. 20, 2016 9:40 am Courage Worldwide/Facebook Once girls arrived at the house, they were expected to hand over their cellphones. Internet access was also strictly limited—Jenny's rules. For "her girls" to stay in good graces, they were expected to do as she said, go where she told them to, and be available when she wanted to show them off in photos or at events. It's the kind of controlling, exploitative situation police warn us that runaway teens are likely to end up in at the hands of human traffickers. But in this case, control came via the people ostensibly helping—and accepting a lot of private and government money to help—these girls, under the auspices of an organization called Courage Worldwide. Founded in 2011 by Jenny T. Williamson (on direct orders from God, or so she claims), the Sacramento-based organization provided housing and services for formerly sex-trafficked young women at a California group home (Courage House) as well as a sister site in Tanzania. For her work as CEO of the nonprofit, Williamson paid herself $115,000 in 2015, according to the organization's tax report. The group reported net assets of $1.4 million that year. In addition to accepting donations from numerous local businesses, it received about $9,100 in government support per month per girl it took in. Most of the girls that lived at Courage House were referred by social workers or probation officers. Once at Courage House, the girls were supposed to be able to heal in comfort and privacy. Instead, they found themselves cut off from the outside world, with services and staff lacking (one former employee said she was told there was only money for two of the six girls per month to see a psychiatrist), while being subjected to the invasive publicity demands of Williamson, according to a Sacramento Bee expose on the group. "Public documents show that Williamson voluntarily closed the six-bed facility, effective June 14, amid a flurry of state inspections that found numerous violations, including inadequate staffing levels and no current administrator working at the home," the paper reported in August. "Williamson is appealing many of the citations, and is adamant that the closure is only temporary." So temporary, apparently, that Williamson didn't bother telling her donors about the shutdown until after the Bee contacted them. A former Courage House employee told the newspaper that the group had been cited by the state 16 times between January and June of 2016, for violations including breaching residents' privacy and inadequate staffing. Last fall, it was cited for giving tours of the group home and holding lunches there, for forcing residents to attend Christian church services every week, and for not respecting residents' freedom of religion. In interviews with The Bee, six ex-employees and a former business associate described a volatile environment for workers and high turnover among line staff at Courage House. The former workers singled out Williamson as a temperamental leader with no child-development background who micromanaged her trained staff and became so swept up in her own publicity and expansion plans that the core mission began to falter. The workers described a corporate organization in which staff members were frequently countermanded or abruptly fired for raising questions about "the vision," or for expressing concerns over the corporate office's sharing of clients' confidential information in fundraising or publicity efforts. Several ex-employees said they were upset by the use of identifiable images of Courage House girls on the company's Facebook page. It sounds like Williamson acted more like the proverbial controlling pimp or madam than someone truly dedicated to helping exploited teenagers. Which would be gross enough for the sheer hypocrisy of it, but imagine how much it could also have further messed up these girls, assuming they did come to her because they had been forced or coerced into prostitution. Now the people who "rescued" them are employing the same sort of isolating and controlling techniques they escaped, treating them more like Courage Worldwide products than people, and publicizing their images and past horror stories to the whole community. DeAnne Brining, a licensed therapist who had contracted with Courage House, described the situation as "abusive" and said Williamson routinely "paraded the girls around" for marketing purposes. Another former employee told the Bee "everything was a photo op." (Read the whole damning expose here.) The publicity efforts, at least, worked: Williamson can be seen on the Courage Worldwide website posing alongside people like former San Francisco Giants pitcher Jeremy Affeldt and actresses Julianne Moore and Eva Longoria. She's been honored by the FBI and L'Oreal. Williamson complained to the Bee that caring for trafficked youth has left her tired. "It is difficult to love someone that does not love herself," she said. Courage Worldwide's website still touts the organization's expansion plan, which includes opening 10 new cottages for underage sex-trafficking victims, in both the U.S. and Tanzania. "Sex trafficking has become a 'cause celebre' in the evangelical community," notes Broadly. And as it has, church-backed "abolition" efforts and Christian group-homes for "rescued" girls have proliferated, with many evangelicals seeing the sex-trafficking angle as a new way to attack long-time opposition to prostitution and pornography. "The numbers of [houses] have surged because the issue has for ten-plus years been promoted by entities like the US federal government, which provides significant funding for rescue efforts," Laura Agustín, anthropologist and author of Sex at the Margins: Migration, Labour Markets and the Rescue Industry, told Broadly. "It is not surprising that opportunists leap on the bandwagon, with or without good intentions." In the past few years, a number of high-profile rescue groups have been exposed for shady behavior. The most well-known was Somaly Mam, whose fraudulent foundation had been celebrated by everyone from Hillary Clinton to Nicholas Kristof to Meg Ryan before it crashed in a haze of half-truths and distortions. Then Chong Kim, the poster-victim for several sex-trafficking rescue groups (and subject of the 2012 film Eden), was also found to be fudging many details about her alleged abuse. "The US anti-trafficking movement seems to be one of the few reliable growth areas in the United States' post-recession economy besides low-wage service work," Truthout reported. Its analysis found many of the groups were secretive about budgets and funding, promoted unsourced or patently false statistics about human trafficking, and offered dubious claims about the services they provide and the impact of their efforts. "All in all," concluded Truthout, "the impact numbers presented by anti-trafficking organizations—their justification for existence and, of course, funding—are simply absurd." Why we should do everything possible to avoid foster care and keep kids with their families Facebook Twitter Email 7Comments Print 1/1 File Photo/Staff Advocates for foster children, including Dallas CASA, announced a Stand Up for Children campaign in 2008 in Dallas. By Cherylee Gillispie Contributor Published: 20 September 2016 02:35 PM Updated: 20 September 2016 03:25 PM When I read about the crisis in Texas foster care system, all I can think about is my beautiful younger sister Nannette. Nannette got out of foster care, but she didn't survive. She became a statistic, a victim of the consequences of what experts call adverse childhood experiences, or ACEs. Research has shown that ACEs accumulate over time, and the number of these experiences in childhood predicts morbidity and mortality in adulthood. It doesn't say it on her death certificate, but Nannette died from too many ACEs. When I was 12 and she was 11, our mother needed treatment for alcohol addiction. But, in those days — as is true today — the foster care payment system gave priority to placing kids in foster care instead of providing treatment that their parents needed in order to care for the children themselves. What happened to Nannette and to me was unspeakable child abuse in the home of foster parents who were paid to take care of us. What we wanted was for our mother to get better and for her to take care of us. What we got from the foster care system was abuse from our foster father and neglect by the system. A bill before Congress would turn those priorities around, helping parents who are in treatment to become clean, sober, and better parents, so they can keep their kids. The Family First Prevention Services Act has passed out of the House but hit opposition in the Senate from Texas group home providers who want to protect the status quo. The legislation increases standards for residential care so kids aren't warehoused in group homes without getting the care they need. Over time, the Family First Act shifts some funding from foster care to programs that can provide treatment for parents so that they can safely care for their own kids. That's exactly what Nannette and I longed for so many years ago. My childhood experience drove me to succeed. I worked very hard to get through college and raise three wonderful boys. My family now includes a caring husband, beautiful daughters-in-law, seven fabulous grandchildren and even a new great-grandbaby. But my passion has become advocating for Texas abused and neglected children as a Court Appointed Special Advocate for more than three years. I have the responsibility to make sure that children in foster care have a caring adult who advocates for what is best for them. For the kids I work with, the best for them is to stay with their parents whenever possible. The trauma of separating from their parents just adds to their number of ACEs, and the vast majority of children who are removed in Texas are in the system because of their parents' substance abuse and mental health treatment needs, according to scientific reports and unpublished data presented by the Administration on Children Youth and Families officials. It's no longer news that the Texas foster care system is in crisis. There are not enough foster placements so kids are sleeping in social work offices. More kids are coming into the system. It is astonishing to me that in the midst of this crisis, our state policymakers don't support legislation to prevent kids from needing foster care in the first place. We need a different track for families reported for neglect, with family-based treatment centers providing on-site substance abuse and mental health services. Various studies show that family-based treatment is not only more cost effective than placement in foster care. It reduces trauma and ACEs scores so children can thrive. This legislation will save money and lives.

Foster care system doesn't meet two-thirds of requirements, audit finds Phyllis Gilmore, secretary of the Department for Children and Families, answers questions in July about the audit of her department at a Post Audit Committee meeting in Topeka. EMILY DESHAZER/THE CAPITAL-JOURN File photo i By Gabriella Dunn gdunn@wichitaeagle.com LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story Topeka The state's foster care system complies with only about a third of the federal requirements assessed by state auditors, according to a report released Wednesday. The findings come after a July audit that found the state system failed to ensure the safety of kids in foster care. The July findings prompted some Democrats to call for the resignation of the secretary for the Department for Children and Families, which oversees Kansas' privatized foster care system. Wednesday's report found that the Department for Children and Families did not consistently meet requirements aimed at providing stability for children. For example, sometimes a child's schoolwork is disrupted because the system does not try to keep the child in the same school district or school. The state also didn't meet requirements for the percentage of children who should be adopted within one to two years after entering into foster care, according to the audit. But it did consistently meet federal requirements about placing children with relatives and siblings. Three-part audit These audits are part of a three-part investigation. The first audit focused on safety concerns. The second part, released Wednesday, focused on compliance with applicable state and federal laws governing the foster care system. The final portion of the audit will research foster care costs, resources and outcomes. That audit will be released next year. Wednesday's findings showed the Department for Children and Families did not meet all federal requirements related to monitoring and paying the private companies it contracts with to provide foster care. And self-reported data showed Kansas met or exceeded about half of the federal outcome requirements for fiscal year 2016, which ended in June. A federal audit revealed the Department for Children and Families was in compliance with about a third of the areas assessed and "not in substantial compliance" with the other two-thirds.

The audit in July revealed that foster parents received initial background checks, but other people in the home did not; not all children received monthly case-management visits; and the Department for Children and Families did not ensure that licensed foster homes had enough money to care for the child. Addressing issues Phyllis Gilmore, secretary of the Kansas Department for Children and Families, spoke Wednesday to legislators about efforts to resolve the issues highlighted in the July report and ways it's already working to resolve the issues brought up in Wednesday's report. She talked about bolstering social worker recruitment and training and gave updates on regulation changes at the state level. One included expanding background checks for everyone over the age of 10 in a child's home. The state previously required background checks only for foster parents. Gilmore also said the agency plans to receive real-time updates on arrests or charges against people living in the child's home. And the department will submit an improvement plan to the federal government about how it will address areas where it was not in compliance. She also tried to address concerns from legislators by emphasizing lower rates of abuse and maltreatment. "Children are not suffering maltreatment while they're in custody," Gilmore said. "There's lots of trauma when they're removed from the home, (but) while they're in custody in Kansas, children are safe by all measurements." Sen. Laura Kelly, D-Topeka, disagreed. "I have to take exception with 'children are not in maltreatment,'" Kelly said, citing a Topeka case in which a child was being abused. "You need to be very careful making those blanket statements that are not true." Grand jury probing foster care; new charges filed in NY case By FRANK ELTMAN Sep. 22, 2016 2:09 PM EDT Share article 2 photos FILE - This undated file photo provided by the Suffolk County District Attorney's office in... This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.](#) 40.917-72.662 RIVERHEAD, N.Y. (AP) — A special grand jury has been empaneled to investigate New York's foster care system following the arrest of a Long Island man on child sex abuse charges. The man had welcomed dozens of boys into his Ridge home, dating back two decades, before allegations of sex abuse surfaced, creating questions about oversight over the foster parent system. Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota said Thursday the special grand jury, which has been meeting since mid-August and may not conclude its work until early 2017, is "assessing all of the facts and circumstances involving how he was able to take all these boys in." It also is investigating other possible crimes involving the suspect. It was not clear if the grand jury would file additional criminal charges or issue a report on its findings, with recommendations for changes in the foster care system. Various governmental agencies and private foster care organizations are being examined. Spota also told reporters the grand jury would investigate how the suspect was able to obtain some of the children in his care from out-of-state foster care agencies, including Washington. Undo Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu, 60, was arrested last winter and charged with victimizing seven children as young as 8. One count in an indictment alleges he sexually abused a dog in front of a child. On Thursday, a new indictment was unsealed accusing him of abusing one additional child and added charges involving some of the children identified as victims in the initial charges. A prosecutor also said it was likely some charges from the first indictment may be dropped because some of the alleged crimes happened too long ago to fall under statute of limitations laws. Defense attorney Donald Mates entered a not guilty plea on behalf of his client; Gonzales-Mugaburu is being held without bail. Mates told reporters after the arraignment that his client denies ever abusing children, and suggested the alleged victims were lying. Spota said previously that statute of limitations laws prevented prosecutors from filing charges involving other abuse allegations. Since the scandal erupted, separate investigations have been started by state, city and Long Island officials. Questions remain about how Gonzales-Mugaburu was able to keep getting children placed in his home despite years of concern about his conduct. Before his arrest, Gonzales-Mugaburu was the subject of nine previous investigations involving alleged abuse dating to 1998, according to a spokeswoman for Suffolk County. Each of those inquiries led to a finding at the time that the allegations weren't credible, and none of them immediately led to the removal of children from his split-level ranch home on eastern Long Island. A break came in January, when detectives said two brothers who lived in the house came forward with credible stories of abuse. Once Gonzales-Mugaburu was in custody, others felt more comfortable coming forward, authorities said. SCO Family of Services, an agency that placed 72 New York City children in Gonzales-Mugaburu's care over 20 years, said it never uncovered evidence of sexual abuse or improper sexual behavior in the home. But the organization's chief strategy officer, Rose Anello said in July that there were other issues with the home, particularly around 2013, "and in retrospect and knowing what we know now, a decision to close the home should have been made at that time." She said those issues involved Gonzales-Mugaburu being uncooperative and unwilling to accept staff guidance on parenting style, but none of the issues then hinted at anything like the allegations uncovered this year. Following the Gonzales-Mugaburu arrest, the city's Administration for Children's Services temporarily halted placing children in SCO foster homes, but announced in July that a review of 370 homes operated by SCO uncovered no indications abuse was occurring at any of those sites. ____ This story has been corrected to show children stopped being placed in SCO foster homes, not SCO facilities. Fort Lauderdale Finally Shuts Down Troubled Group Home; Director's $2.25 Million Mansion for Sale Friday, September 23, 2016 at 8:54 a.m. By Antonia Noori Farzan EXPAND Chrysalis Health executive director Manuel Menendez's home, which is currently for sale. Photo by Antonia Farzan A A Facebook 74 Twitter 4 More shares recommend reddit email - 1 For at least six years, Crescent House, a Fort Lauderdale group home for teenage boys, was the source of constant calls to the police. Neighbors found crack cocaine baggies littering the streets and said that kids pelted their cars with rocks. This summer, the city finally shut down the facility, which was run by Chrysalis Health, a for-profit company. But similar issues still persist at the five other group homes run by Chrysalis, Broward County public defenders say. "When I've visited in the past, I was shocked at the manner in which these homes are being run," Chief Assistant Public Defender Gordon Weekes says. "The lack of supervision, the autonomy that these children have to go out whenever they want, wherever they want... The kids could literally sleep all day and not go to school." Kids who end up in a group home are typically there because they've been abandoned, abused, or neglected by their families, so placing them in a situation where they have minimal oversight and receive little in the way of therapeutic treatment is a recipe for disaster. (New Times documented the consequences, including rampant drug use and teen prostitution, in a lengthy investigation last year.) Related Stories After New Times Investigation, City Moves to Close Fort Lauderdale Group Home With Lax Supervision at State-Contracted Group Homes, Teen Prostitution and Drug Use Are Rampant "We're talking about kids that are really on the cusp," Weekes says. "They just shut them down and marginalize them, and as a result, they detach." Meanwhile, as the city of Fort Lauderdale has been working to shut down Crescent House, Chrysalis Health executive director Manuel Menendez bought a mansion. According to Miami-Dade County property records, Menendez and his wife own a waterfront four-bedroom home in Coral Gables, which is valued just short of $1 million, as well as a South Miami mansion that's currently for sale for $2.25 million. The listing on Zillow.com notes that it has six bedrooms, eight bathrooms, a home office, and a theater. Oh, and a "resort-style pool area" with a changing cabana, wet bar, outdoor kitchen, and tennis and basketball courts. So $2.25 million is a pretty good deal, considering. ADVERTISING inRead invented by Teads Reached by phone, Menendez initially declined to comment, then admitted that he'd purchased the house with the intention of flipping it. "I'm a real estate investor," he said. "I haven't gotten a raise from Chrysalis in fifteen years." Furthermore, he added, the money the company makes off group homes doesn't even cover its administrative costs. (According to tax filings, Chrysalis receives more than $3 million a year from ChildNet, the nonprofit that contracts with the state to handle child welfare services in Broward and Palm Beach, for running residential group homes.) Menendez also claims that the City of Fort Lauderdale's decision to shut down Crescent House was motivated by complaints from neighbors who were solely concerned about the group home's impact on their property values. "Most of them don't even live there — they're just investing in the real estate," he said. "It's unfortunate because these kids need a place to go." Payson woman sentenced for sexual abuse of 5 boys at treatment center By Gephardt Daily Staff - September 24, 2016 Share on Facebook Tweet on Twitter Katherine Lynn Estep. Photo: Juab County NEPHI, Utah, Sept. 24, 2016 (Gephardt Daily) — A former employee of Journey Ranch, a Mona residential treatment center for troubled teenage boys, has been sentenced to prison for sexually abusing five of the juvenile residents. Katherine Lynn Estep, 45, of Payson, on Friday was sentenced to seven terms of one to 15 years in prison, with those terms to run concurrently. Estep in June pleaded guilty to seven counts of forcible sexual abuse, a second-degree felony. Additional charges were dismissed. The original charges she faced were five counts of forcible sodomy, a first-degree felony; 10 counts of forcible sexual assault, a second-degree felony; and two class C misdemeanor counts of providing electronic cigarettes to minors. Estep admitted touching boys age 16 and 17 inappropriately, according to court documents. Police said she also engaged in sex acts with the teens, and threatened two with "demerits" if they did not cooperate. The center, in Juab County, advertises that it treats boys, age 13 to 18, who suffer from moderate or severe behavioral problems and mental health issues. Estep rewarded the boys with use of her phone, e-cigarettes, pills or candy, according to charging documents. The court recommended Estep undergo therapy, according to sentencing documents: "Court recommends to the Board that the defendant participate in psychotherapy to address psychological nature of her physical symptoms as well as address her thinking errors through a cognitive restructuring therapy." Suit: Westchester Med Center 'taunted' young psych patients Michael Virtanen, The Associated Press 7:51 a.m. EDT September 27, 2016 Federal suit claims hospital staff provoked youngsters to justify medication, restraints that extended Medicaid-funded hospital stays A doctor who trained for four years at the psychiatric unit of the Westchester Medical Center said in a lawsuit Monday that adolescent patients were routinely provoked and prodded into acting out, then restrained and drugged to extend their hospitalization and Medicaid payments. Dr. Alfred Robenzadeh said supervisors at the Valhalla hospital retaliated against him when he tried to address what he says was chronic patient abuse that increased the severity of diagnoses, with usual two-week inpatient stays often extended days or weeks. He alleges the practice defrauded Medicaid. When he complained, he said he was told to "keep your head down and do not make any more waves." LAWSUIT: Read the federal claims In his 22-page complaint, Robenzadeh charged that "the nursing staff's first and preferred response to the provoked behavior was to seek an order from a physician for the administration of chemical or physical restraints to sedate the patient." In one instance, he said he was called in to administer medication to a disruptive youngster and found that the nursing staff was "encroaching on the inpatient's space and using provocative and threatening language and tone." Instead, he said he used de-escalation techniques to calm the boy. "Great, now we can't even touch him," he said the nurse told him. Westchester Medical Center officials did not return calls for comment. The lawsuit was filed under federal and New York state whistleblower laws. It seeks damages, including payment for lost employment and business opportunities, and litigation costs. It asks the court to order the hospital to certify his completion of four years of specialty training in psychiatry, saying the defendants have refused to do that. Robenzadeh said his training was terminated this year. He said allegations against him of improper moonlighting and later violating patient privacy in defending against those allegations were trumped up. His complaint named five doctors he says joined in retaliation against him and the hospital's director of labor relations. "The excessive use of force resulted in extended, unreasonable and unnecessary inpatient treatment days, for which the hospital is reimbursed by Medicaid," the lawsuit said. "Rather than using de-escalation techniques that would not require the administration of chemical or physical restraints, the nursing staff's first and preferred response to the provoked behavior was to seek an order from a physician for the administration of a chemical or physical restraint to sedate the patient." In addition, he said male patients, particularly those from residential treatment facilities who did not have parents, were particularly at risk. "Male patients were treated as second class and as troublemakers who were assumed to be aggressive and much more likely to be physically injured by staff," he said. "If the patient's complexion was any shade of brown, their concerns, e.g., pain, stress or hunger, were neglected because the culture of the unit devalued them as patients." Robenzadeh said that he proposed studying inpatient metrics to determine why stable patients were having incidents shortly before scheduled discharges and whether it was from policy and practice. Instead, he said, he was "marginalized," stymied in attempts to moonlight as other graduate trainees did, given more hospital patients than they had, and ultimately suspended and terminated from the fellowship program. (Photo courtesy: Williamson County Sheriff's Office) An employee at a Liberty Hill treatment center for children was arrested Monday for possession of drugs. According to the arrest affidavit, Kathleen Redlin, 30, is charged with possession of a controlled substance in a drug free zone, a second degree felony. It happened at the Meridell Achievement Center, a private charter school which describes itself on its website as a residential treatment center that specializes in psychiatry and neuropsychiatry for children and adolescents. Court documents say an employee of the school contacted police after they received an anonymous tip that Redlin had drugs in her locker at the school. The locker was searched and several baggies believed to contain methamphetamine and marijuana were found. Redlin admitted to school officials that the drugs belonged to her, police say. The affidavit says officers questioned Redlin and asked if the purse found in the locker with drugs inside of it was hers -- and she admitted it and the drugs were hers, and that a glass pipe in the bag was used to smoke the meth. The meth weighed out to approximately 3.1 grams. The marijuana weighed approximately .05 ounces, according to court documents. Officials with Meridell Achievement Center says Redlin is no longer employed by the center. Foster care is not good for children By Jessie Wagoner jessie@emporia.com Updated Sep 28, 2016 0 Last week the Department for Children and Families dealt with the controversy of a negative audit of the foster care services provided through the state. The report, released by the Legislature's post-audit team, found many areas of concern regarding the safety of children in foster care in Kansas. After reading through the audit report, it is obvious there are areas for improvement. Is foster care good for children? No. No, of course foster care is not good for children. If foster care was good for children we would sign all of our children up rather than sending them to summer camp. Foster care is a system designed to be used in the most serious of situations as a temporary solution. It is not intended to be where children are raised for an indefinite period of time. Yet the number of children in foster care in Kansas continues to climb at alarming rates and they are remaining in foster care waiting for reintegration or adoptive placements for far too long. Could DCF make improvements to ensure children in foster care are safer? Absolutely! But, until the state begins to value children more than saving money, that is not likely to happen. Privatizing foster care has resulted in foster care agencies bidding against one another, each contractor promising to do more with less. This has led to higher caseloads and unrealistic expectations for front-line workers. In the end it is children and those front-line workers that pay the highest price while the state saves a buck. Governor Sam Brownback has led the state into a financial crisis that has resulted in cuts to preventative services that not only keep children in their homes, but also help to reintegrate children faster. Mental health services, drug and alcohol treatment and prevention services and programs like Parents as Teachers have all been cut. All services that promote healthy families. As the Legislature places blame on DCF, it is time they turn their pointed fingers back to themselves. It is our elected officials who determine the budget. It is our elected officials who have approved budgets that don't meet the needs of our most vulnerable citizens and it is now our elected officials who should bare some responsibility for the failures of a system they have created. Some day the children in foster care in Kansas will be old enough to vote. It is our responsibility to vote with them in mind in November. Jessie Wagoner Reporter Source:

(Frances Twitty/Getty Images/Getty Images) BY Leonard Greene NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, September 28, 2016, 10:17 PM An aide at a Brooklyn juvenile detention center was convicted Wednesday on charges of raping and sexually abusing a teenage girl in his care. Barry Proctor, 47, of the Bronx, faces up to 16 years in prison for taking advantage of the girl, first by targeting the troubled teen, then by grooming her for sex. Proctor had been charged with abusing two other girls at the center, but was acquitted on those charges. The conviction stemmed from Proctor's abuse of one of the underage girls over the course of several weeks in 2014, said Patricia Gunning, a special prosecutor for the New York State Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs. Gunning said there were four separate instances during which he abused the girl. Teens incarcerated on Rikers Island will move to Bronx facility "This victim, already traumatized by violence in her life, was entrusted to the state's care," Gunning said. "In that setting, this defendant targeted her and abused her repeatedly for his own sexual gratification." The Ella McQueen center serves as a 14-day processing facility for teens — generally between 13 and 18 — bound for a juvenile detention center, according to its website. The incidents were non-forcible, but the victims cannot legally consent to the sexual activity, according to the New York State Justice Center, which investigated the case. Drugging Our Kids: Governor signs bills to curb psych drugs prescribed to California foster youth Share this: Click to share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to email this to a friend \(Opens in new window\) Click to print \(Opens in new window\) By Tracy Seipel | tseipel@bayareanewsgroup.com PUBLISHED: September 29, 2016 at 3:08 pm | UPDATED: September 30, 2016 at 5:07 am Capping years of efforts to stop California's foster care system from overmedicating the state's most vulnerable children, Gov. Jerry Brown on Thursday signed a controversial bill that for the first time puts doctors who recklessly prescribe psychiatric drugs at risk of losing their medical license. The measure is part of a series of sweeping legislative reforms inspired by this news organization's series "Drugging Our Kids" that disclosed the state's dependence on psychotropic medications to control troubled children in the country's largest child welfare system. Senate Bill 1174, by Sen. Mike McGuire, will require annual monitoring of high-prescribing doctors and allow the California Medical Board to crack down on violators — a major victory for foster youth advocates who for years had no voice to speak out against their doctors' orders. "This bill ensures the state takes a no-tolerance approach to over-prescribing and that the Medical Board and attorney general get the data they need to protect California's 66,000 foster youth," said McGuire. The Healdsburg Democrat held a series of oversight hearings to champion the rights of foster youth who said they were being overmedicated. McGuire's bill was the focus of a tense legislative battle in Sacramento with one of the state's most powerful interests — psychiatrists who argued the bill would unfairly single out doctors who treat children with severe mental health needs. A Bay Area News Group analysis of five years of prescribing data revealed a fraction of the doctors may be fueling the medication use. A mere 10 percent of the state's highest prescribers were responsible about 50 percent of the time when a foster child received an antipsychotic, the riskiest class of the drugs with some of the most harmful side effects. Veteran child psychiatrist Michael Barnett, whom the news organization's analysis identified among the higher prescribers of antipsychotics, said he supports the new oversight but will continue to prescribe the drugs — even two at once — when he believes it will help his young patients. "There are definitely times where you could easily rationalize prescribing two antipsychotics to an individual," he said. "I will still do that. And if they want to give me a speeding ticket (under the new law SB 1174) or ask me about it, I will tell them about it." McGuire's bill was one of three sent to Brown's desk this year, after the governor signed three separate bills last year in the first wave of legislation spurred by this news organization's series. On Thursday, Brown also gave his blessing to Senate Bill 1291, by Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose. It will require more transparency and tracking of mental health services for foster kids in every California county. "We cannot allow our foster care system to strictly rely on dosing foster children with mind-altering medications to manage their behavior," Beall said in a statement Thursday. "We must ensure that less invasive and safer available treatments are the first options for our children rather than a pill. The system must provide foster youth with the services that address their trauma instead of depending on drugs to mask their trauma." Beall's legislation responds to recent state audit findings that revealed the foster care system has failed to adequately oversee the use of psychotropic drugs on foster children. Advocates for foster youth, including the National Center for Youth Law, which sponsored the bills, celebrated the signings after years of pushing policy makers and state officials for reforms. Policy director Anna Johnson said the nonprofit group is "grateful to our legislative champions for holding accountable the doctors who are overmedicating foster youth" and counties that she said "failed to provide services that will help foster youth deal with trauma, abuse and neglect." But the governor also vetoed one of the group's measures, saying it was too similar to legislation he signed last year. Senate Bill 253 by Sen. Bill Monning, D-Carmel, sought to create more rigorous court oversight before doctors can prescribe potentially harmful psychotropic drugs to foster children. The governor's veto was a blow to National Center for Youth Law attorney Bill Grimm, who has always considered SB 253 the linchpin of legislative reforms to curtail the inappropriate, harmful impact of psychotropic drugs — before they can be prescribed. Still, the new laws are especially meaningful to current and former foster youth, such as Sarah Pauter, of San Diego. Growing up in foster care, she was so over-medicated with antidepressants, anticonvulsants and mood stabilizers that she went from being a straight-A high school student to attending a center for the learning-deficient. She is particularly pleased that Beall's bill will force counties to provide better mental health alternatives to medications, and she is thrilled that McGuire's bill will finally "hold psychiatrists accountable" for dangerous prescribing. "Finally," she said, "we have a law that says, 'If you don't do right by these foster kids, there will be consequences.'" Brown signs two more laws to curb overuse of meds on foster youth - SFGate Brown signs two more laws to curb overuse of meds on foster youth Published 4:41 pm, Thursday, September 29, 2016 1 California Gov. Jerry Brown Thursday signed two more bills to protect traumatized foster children from psychiatric care that is overly reliant on risky medications — cementing what is now the most comprehensive set of laws in the nation. Following three laws passed last year, the additional legislation will subject overprescribing physicians to stepped-up investigations and ensure that counties offer mental health services for foster children that include non-drug treatments. Brown vetoed a bill that would have enhanced juvenile court oversight of prescribing. But the courts have already launched a sweeping set of new standards requiring doctors to justify their prescriptions before judges approve them, and ensuring that foster children have a say in whether they want to take the untested drugs. "Unfortunately, the excessive prescribing has become the norm and it has impacted thousands of lives of California's most vulnerable youth — foster kids," said one of the bills' authors, state Sen. Mike McGuire, D-Healdsburg. "These five pieces of legislation will finally provide foster youth with the protections they need from serial overprescribers and these mind-numbing drugs." Another bill author, state Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose, said overmedication has for too long been overlooked as one of the major problems in the foster care system. Now, "it's become clear that if you just keep medicating them, they can't think clearly, they can't study and they can't be successful." Beall said the new laws are necessary because "the medication was so overprescribed, in so many different ways, and with no controls and no monitoring," adding: "So we hope to get that out of the way now, and frame a more successful foster care system in California." Lobbyists for doctors and the group home industry pushed back against the bills, arguing they overreached and could potentially harm children who needed medications. But an equally powerful lobby of foster youth also consistently showed up at policy committee hearings, testifying about debilitating side effects they suffered from antipsychotics, antidepressants and mood stabilizers, including severe lethargy, rapid-onset weight gain and irreversible tremors. McGuire said the legislation "wouldn't have been a reality without hundreds of foster youth mobilizing to fight." The two bills signed into law Thursday add more heft to related protections passed last year in California. Those laws enhanced scrutiny of residential group homes where prescribing is the highest; expanded public health nursing to monitor prescriptions, and funded training for professionals who work with and care for foster children. The six-bill package resulting in five new laws followed an exposé published in the San Jose Mercury

News and extensive advocacy by the nonprofit National Center for Youth Law. Lobbyists representing physicians and group homes argued against many of the legislative changes, saying they will drive professionals from the field and curtail their professional authority. McGuire's bill — which will hold outlying physicians responsible for their prescribing practices through greater enforcement by the state's licensing agency — led to the most bitter fights. Physician groups said the new law will unfairly affect psychiatrists treating youth in residential programs and juvenile halls. Sen. Beall's bill will hold counties more accountable for providing mental health treatment for foster youth. That means more than just a bottle of pills, said California's ombudsperson for foster care, Rochelle Trochtenberg, who was taken from her parents due to abuse, and spent her teenage years in the Los Angeles County child welfare system. "If you have a child with diabetes, you don't just give them insulin and keep feeding them sugary foods that makes them sicker," she said. "If you translate that to kids in foster care, their medical condition is often trauma, and you're not treating that trauma if you're not treating an array of issues." Gagging Kentucky's social workers won't save its children Bevin administration inherited crisis in child protection, but concealing shortcomings makes things worse. Satirical tweet about warning sent to employees of Cabinet for Health and Family Services. One of a few satirical tweets about warning sent to employees of Cabinet for Health and Family Services. 1 of 2 in LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story Governors come, governors go, but the secrecy and stonewalling around Kentucky's beleaguered child-protection bureaucracy is forever. Latest example: A memo warning employees that unauthorized contacts with news media could result in disciplinary action including firing. The warning comes at a time when the opioid crisis is devastating Kentucky families and overwhelming the decimated ranks of social workers who risk their safety to rescue children from sometimes violent situations. State officials insist the memo, which went out Sept. 23, was just a routine reminder and not a response to child-protection workers' recent public complaints about dangerous working conditions and untenable caseloads. All employees of the Cabinet for Health and Family Services, not just those working in child protection, received the memo. Even so, the warning was clumsy and insensitive coming just two days after child-protection workers had testified about their concerns to a legislative committee. A social worker told lawmakers that she was "terrified" about speaking out because "most of us have been conditioned for retaliation." Child-protection workers also are expressing concerns on a Facebook page. In response, cabinet officials pledged that "the days of retaliation for workers making constructive criticism are over" and promised openness and transparency. Bevin administration officials strengthened their credibility by saying that caseloads are higher than previous administrations have admitted. They said they are working on a more accurate count and on ways to better support case workers and children. But then out came that memo from a cabinet that fought, unsuccessfully, for years to keep secret the records of how it handled cases in which children died of abuse or neglect. No wonder the memo drew cries of hypocrisy. Stress and low pay have long taken a toll on child-protection ranks, but the turnover has worsened. In Louisville, one-third of workers have resigned or retired this year. Statewide a record-high almost 8,000 children are in foster care in Kentucky. A long overdue pay raise for child-protection workers (supervisors are now making $40,800 a year) took effect in September and is a step in the right direction. The state also should unfreeze funding for relatives who care for children of unfit parents and extend the aid to out-of-state family and qualified friends. The cost of foster care is more than double the $300 monthly stipend for Kinship Care which has been frozen for three years. Placing children in foster care because a grandparent on a fixed income can't afford to take them in is the height of false economy. The crisis in child protection has been building for a long time and was inherited by the Bevin administration which has been in office less than 10 months. But falling into old familiar patterns of talk-without-action and trying to hide the cabinet's shortcomings will only make a bad situation worse. WATCHDOG: Louisiana children sent out of state for psychiatric care Lex Talamo, alexa.talamo@shreveporttimes.com 12:03 p.m. CDT October 1, 2016 --> Due to a lack of facilities that can meet mental and behavioral needs of children, Louisiana is sending her children to out-of-state facilities. (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) Buy Photo Lonnie is a transgender adolescent with mental and behavioral issues severe enough to qualify for residential psychiatric care. But Louisiana doesn't have a facility that is adequate for meeting his behavioral needs. So he will be sent to an out-of-state facility, according to the Louisiana Department of Children and Family Services — the seventh child this year the department has referred to another state. Lonnie is not the boy's real name. Privacy requirements prevent the department from identifying him or his home parish. "We don't want to send children out of state. But if it's in the best interest of the child, we will make that choice," DCFS Secretary Marketa Walters said. "When we send a child out of state, it's because we haven't found a facility in the state." It's been well documented that Louisiana lacks a sufficient number of mental and behavioral health care services for children. That means dozens of Louisiana children needing residential psychiatric or therapeutic treatments are sent each year to out-of-state facilities, which often are not required to adhere to the same standards for supervision or safety as in-state facilities. RELATED: Children's mental health service shortage puts them at risk State agencies said they place children in other states as a last resort and closely monitor the well-being of their out-of-state wards — though the number of out-of-state placements has declined in recent years. But several Louisiana child advocates voiced concerns about the safety of children placed in other states, citing previous litigation against out-of-state facilities alleging violations of children's rights. "States should be developing their own resources," said Rick Wheat, CEO for Louisiana United Methodist Children and Family Services in Ruston. "As long as Louisiana's leaders are willing to accept gaps in services for children and are willing to fund out-of-state placements, the child welfare system in Louisiana will continue to languish, and our children will pay for it." Buy Photo Rick Wheat, president and CEO of the Louisiana United Methodist Children's Home in Ruston (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) A children's mental health crisis More than 70,000 children in Louisiana received mental or behavioral services through Medicaid in 2014, including 2,000 children in Bossier Parish and 4,000 in Caddo Parish, according to Louisiana Department of Health data. Children with needs severe enough to require residential treatment interventions are placed in therapeutic foster care homes, therapeutic group homes or psychiatric residential treatment facilities, none of which have been able to absorb the need in the state. The state has 10 therapeutic group homes — with a total of 85 beds — for the entire state. And Magellan, the former single statewide management organization for Medicaid-funded specialized behavioral health services, has been sending children to psychiatric residential treatment facilities out-of-state for years, according to the Louisiana Department of Health. RELATED: More homes needed for drug-exposed babies than ever before The number of children placed out of state fluctuates. As of July, the Louisiana Department of Health reported 15 children in out-of-state care, a decline from the peak of 41 children sent out of state in 2014. In the past five years, DCFS reported sending a total of 13 children out of state. Both departments said they closely monitor children in out-of-state facilities. "It's not that we send a child out of state and abandon them. We have people check up on them," Walters said. Buy Photo The Outdoor Wilderness Learning Center uses nature to help teach skills to children with severe mental and behavioral needs. (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) Yvonne Domingue, who heads DCFS's Behavioral Health and Placement Services, said welfare staff travel monthly to see children in treatment and meet with members of the out-of-state team. "Although the face-to-face visits occur only once a month, communication between caseworkers and treatment facilities is fluid," Domingue said. "Reports between the treatment provider and the caseworker can happen on an as-needed basis, as does communication between the worker and the youth." LDH's spokesperson Samantha Faulkner said staff from the Healthy Louisiana plans — the five Bayou Health plans available for children eligible for Medicaid — review monthly reports about children from out-of-state facilities to ensure children are receiving therapeutic interventions that meet their needs. Faulkner said the health department won't place children in unlicensed facilities. Walters said she isn't aware of a single facility DCFS has used that hasn't met standards. But Wheat said out-of-state facilities may adhere to standards that are different from Louisiana's. The Louisiana Department of Health's requirements for the staff-to-child ratio for psychiatric residential treatment facilities is 1 to 4 during the day, whereas Texas requirements for the same types of facilities are 1 to 5 (if no child requires treatment during the day) or 1 to 8 (if at least one child requires treatment.) Similarly, Louisiana requires a staff to child ratio of 1 to 6 at night, whereas in Texas the ratios can be up to 1 to 24 (if no children require treatment at night and the caregiver stays awake) or 1 to 16 (if no children require treatment and the caregiver sleeps during the shift), according to Texas licensing requirements. Louisiana also requires all therapeutic group homes to have a ratio of 1 staff to 5 children at all times, with at least two staff present at any time. Wheat also cited several cases — including the 1974's Gary W. v. Louisiana and 2015's M.D. v. Perry — where U.S. District Court judges have ruled that out-of-state facilities violated children's rights and did not adequately monitor children's care, resulting in "serious safety incidents." As recently as December 2015, a U.S. District Court judge ruled that certain Texas facilities had to change child supervision or be shut down. "They were sending them to so called residential treatment centers, which we proved at a long trial to have been bad," said Stephen Dixon, an attorney who worked the 2015 case. "That's where we were putting Louisiana children, into a system that had serious problems.” Buy Photo A children's room at a therapeutic group home in Louisiana. (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) Dixon, who also works as a lawyer for the New York-based nonprofit Children's Rights, said children placed in any out-of-state facility face additional challenges to recovery, including more barriers to communicating with their attorneys, caseworkers and families. Beth Salcedo, co-founder of the state's only therapeutic group home for adolescent victims of sex trafficking, was surprised to hear children were being sent out of state. Her home, which can house up to 10 girls, had vacancies as of September 2016. Salcedo said only one of the young women currently residing in the program had been referred by DCFS, though Salcedo frequently hears about underage victims of sex trafficking recovered by undercover police operations—or “stings.” “You hear about stings, but no one calls and asks about placement. I’ve wondered where they go,” Salcedo said. “I didn’t know there were girls being placed out of state. I have no idea why that is happening.” Faulkner said the health department places a child in out-of-state facilities for two main reasons: state psychiatric residential treatment facilities have refused placement because they can't provide for the child's needs, or a stakeholder in the child's treatment plan thinks an out-of-state facility has better programming for the child's needs. A solution that's not a last resort The Louisiana Methodist Children's Home in Ruston is one of the in-state facilities able to provide care to children with severe needs. The home provides therapeutic care for children, in part, through its Outdoor Wilderness Learning Center, which offers a high ropes course, equine-assisted psychotherapy, kayaking and team-building activities from its location in Dubach. Buy Photo The Louisiana United Methodist Children's Home in Ruston (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) Patrick Blanchard, director of development and public relations for the home, said the 800-acre outdoor center highlights the progress some of the most troubled children can make when given the right resources. “We had a 16-year-old boy who came to us with 51 foster care placements before he came here. But you take him and put him next to a horse, and he's a kid again,” Blanchard said. David Wheeler, vice president of clinical services at the children's home, said a major benefit for Louisiana's children placed at in-state facilities is proximity to their family, which makes routine family visits more feasible. Wheat said family involvement during children's treatment – unless prohibited by the treatment center – is critical to the child. Buy Photo The Outdoor Wilderness Learning Center offers equine-assisted therapy to help children with emotional and behavioral issues engage in the world in a productive way. (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) “The closer a child is to her or his family or foster family, the easier it is for the family to participate in treatment,” Wheat said. “What we know for certain is that the more a family participates in treatment, the greater chance of a successful outcome.” Karla Venkataraman, Deputy Assistance Secretary of Child Welfare for DCFS, said the department chose to send “Lonnie” to another state because the out-of-state facility would better address his behavioral needs than the available in-state facilities, but also because the out-of-state facility had a history of successfully working with transgender youth questioning their identities. Walters said her decision to sign the waiver for Lonnie stemmed from the department's mission to always do what is “in the best interest of the child.” “There isn’t a treatment facility in Louisiana that can treat that child. We are sending the child to a very specialized center,” Walters said. Following the state's transition away from Magellan in January, all five Bayou Health plans for children have been tasked with identifying out-of-state networks—already. RELATED: Children's mental health service provider in transition Buy Photo Patrick Blanchard at the Outdoor Wilderness Learning Center's maze, which is used in team-building activities. (Photo: Henrietta Wildsmith/The Times) Joshua Brett, spokesperson for AmeriHealth – one of the state's Bayou Health plans – said his agency has committed to keeping children as close as possible to family but also will ensure they receive quality care if an out-of-state facility is needed. “If a member needs treatment out of state, we will work with the member and their family to find a suitable accredited and licensed Medicaid provider,” Brett wrote in an email. Wheat said better alternatives to identifying out-of-state facilities would include: Increasing funding to established in-state therapeutic group homes and psychiatric facilities. Providing start-up funds and provisional licenses so more therapeutic group homes can be established in parishes. John Bel Edwards, said the governor is aware that the state's children are being placed out of state but said resources are limited because of the state's ongoing budget crisis. “Often times, a child's needs can best be met by an out-of-state facility,” Carbo wrote in a statement. “However, it is a priority of the governor to ensure Louisiana's children get the best help here at home as possible, and he'll continue to work with state agencies to make improvements.” Source: <http://www.shreveporttimes.com/story/news/2016/10/01/watchdog-louisiana-children-sent-out-state-psychiatric-care/85994498/>

Foster Parent, Former Teacher on Trial for Child Abuse Nicole Gomez-Vilchis is former teacher at Van Dyke Public Schools. Nicole Gomez-Vilchis, 29, is accused of abusing a 15-month-old girl in 2014. The child and her brother were placed in foster care with Gomez-Vilchis and her husband Hugo in 2013 when the children were removed from their parents' home due to drug use, the Macomb Daily reports. The trial, in Macomb County Circuit Court, began Wednesday and is expected to continue next Tuesday. If convicted, Gomez-Vilchis faces 10 years in prison. At one point, Gomez-Vilchis was ordered by a judge to have no contact with children, but that order was rescinded when she gave birth to her own child, the Macomb Daily reports. School officials say she is no longer employed by the Van Dyke Public Schools in Warren where she was a middle school teacher. Get free real-time news alerts from the St. Clair Shores Patch. State revokes licenses of two St. Paul youth group homes Assaults, neglect and 911 calls were common at youth homes. By Chris Serres Star Tribune October 5, 2016 — 9:03pm Text size comment share tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint State regulators will shut down two St. Paul-based group homes for troubled children, citing a broad range of “serious and chronic” licensing violations that exposed youth to assaults, serious injuries and inadequate medical care. The Vintage Place Inc., a nonprofit with a long history of run-ins with state regulators, failed to report incidents in which residents ran away and assaulted one another, resulting in some cases in serious injuries and medical treatment. At times, children at one of the homes went completely unsupervised, with no staff on duty. In an extensive and unusual order issued Monday revoking the operator's licenses, the Minnesota Department of Human Services cited more than a dozen incidents last year in which police or emergency medical personnel were called to respond to assaults, damaged property and threatening behavior. Employees also failed to report at least seven cases in which residents ran away or went missing from the two group homes. “The nature and severity of the ongoing violations unacceptably jeopardize the health and safety of children in your program to receive services that are crucial to their well-being and development,” the revocation order said. Established in 2002, Vintage Place cares for troubled boys at two group homes, each housing up to six children, on St. Paul's East Side. It has a history of regulatory violations dating back more than five years. In a 2011 licensing review, it was cited for 27 violations, from failing to report critical safety incidents to lacking a daily schedule of residents' activities. In more recent years, Vintage Place employees have gotten into fights with residents. In 2013, a staff member grabbed a resident by the throat and threw him onto a bed; later the next year, a staff member punched a resident in the jaw during an altercation, state records show. Roberta Opheim, state ombudsman for mental health and developmental disabilities, questioned why regulators had not acted sooner. “How many kids over these five years were subjected to substandard care?” she asked. “These types of citations and the chronicity of the problem should not be allowed, especially when [public] funds are being used to pay for it.” In early June of this year, state licensing investigators visited the Vintage Place North home at 1853 Cottage Ave. E. in St. Paul and discovered that no staff were present to supervise the children. An employee told investigators that if staff needed to leave the home while residents were away at school, they posted a sign on the front door telling children to walk to the other Vintage Place facility, approximately a mile away. In interviews, children told regulators that on several occasions they had returned to the home on Cottage Avenue E. and “no one was there.” State investigators also found the group homes repeatedly failed to provide adequate health care. Medical records indicated that one child went without lithium, an antipsychotic medication, for eight days after the child's supply had run out, while another child did not receive anti-depressants as prescribed for five days. The licensing revocation takes effect Oct. 17, though Vintage Place still has 10 days to appeal the order and can continue to operate until the appeals process concludes. Telephone calls and e-mails to the group homes were not returned Wednesday. According to its website, Vintage Place “teaches youth the values necessary to become a well-adjusted and contributing member of society through a family setting.” The group homes target boys, ages 10 to 18, who have been involved in the juvenile court system or have been diagnosed with a behavioral or mental health problem. "Many of the youth have not had a fair opportunity to succeed in life," the website says. The move to shut down Vintage Place is highly unusual. Since 2011, the state has revoked the license of only one other children's residential services facility. Federal Government Continues To Feed Charter School Beast Despite Auditor's Warning Politicians always promise they will rid government of "waste, fraud, and abuse," so let's hope at least one political leader or policy maker will denounce our federal government's new gift of nearly a quarter-billion dollars to charter schools. The cash dump to charters, courtesy of taxpayers, is from the U.S. Department of Education. As Education Week reports, the money is going to eight states and 15 charter school networks from the Charter Schools Program, a federal government operation that doles out millions every year to start new charter schools. This money is the latest installment of an over \$3 billion gravy train the federal government has funded to help launch over 2,500 charter schools across the nation. Regardless of how you feel about these schools, you should be concerned about how this new government outlay to charters will be used, based on the extensive track record of financial malfeasance in these schools. Indeed, shortly after the USDE announcement, the Department's own auditor warned that the money is very much at risk of ending up in the pockets of fraudsters and con artists rather than in the classrooms of diligent students and dedicated teachers. Again Education Week reports, the audit by the agency's inspector general's office examined 33 schools in six states and concluded that because of a general lack of oversight of charters there was a "risk that federal programs are not being implemented correctly and are wasting public money." The risk stems from the "cozy relationships," the EdWeek reporter's words, between charter schools and companies that operate them, called Charter Management Organizations (CMOs). Of the 33 charter schools the audit examined, 22 had examples, sometimes multiple examples, of how CMOs take advantage of the unusual business relationship they have with their client charters to exploit federal education funds and redirect precious taxpayer dollars to private interests that have nothing to do with education. In one of the more egregious examples the audit found, "the CEO of one CMO in Pennsylvania had the authority to write and issue checks without charter school board approval and wrote checks to himself from the charter school's accounts totaling about $11 million." At another Pennsylvania charter, a vendor that supplied services to the school was owned by the charter school's CMO and received $485,000 in payments from the school without charter school board approval. In Florida, a charter and a CMO that shared the same board entered into an expensive lease agreement for the school building, then expanded the facility, extended the lease, and increased the rental payments to the CMO. One CMO the audit examined, which operated three charters in Michigan and one in New York, required the charter schools to remit all federal, state, and local funds to the CMO and gave the CMO total responsibility, with no oversight by the charter board, for paying school expenditures. The auditor's report doesn't provide the names of these schools, so we don't know if they have received federal grant money in the past or are some of the ones getting the new money. However, three of the six states the audit looked at – California, Texas, and Florida – are the same states the Department of Education just decided to send more money to. The other three – Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York – have received federal money for charters in the past, either sent to the state or to charter organizations operating in the state. These states, and presumably many others the feds send charter money to, often don't sufficiently track how the money is used, according to the audit. Of the six states examined, half could not provide consistent funding data on charter schools with CMOs, a third could not identify which charter schools used CMOs, and a third that tracked whether charter schools used CMOs had unreliable information because charter schools self-reported their operations. The federal auditor's revelations on charter school waste, fraud, and abuse is yet another dose of reality in a long line of factual reporting about these schools. A study released last year by the Center for Media and Democracy found "charter spending is largely a black hole." That's because the "flexibility" charters have been granted by the government is often being used not to create education innovations but to "allow an epidemic of fraud, waste, and mismanagement that would not be tolerated in public schools," the CMD report found. Based on its extensive research on charters, CMD examined the list of new award grantees and noted Florida, that's getting a grant of $58,454,516, has closed over 120 charter schools in a little over a decade. Texas, which is getting $30,498,392, has "an unknown number" of charter schools "housed in churches" and "closely tied to, religious groups." Tennessee, which is getting $15,172,732, is famous for having a statewide online charter school that is so bad, the state education chief tried to get rid of it but couldn't because of political maneuvering by the charter lobby and lack of regulatory accountability. California, which is getting $27,329,904, has some of the worst charter school scandals in the nation, according to a report from the Center for Popular Democracy, which uncovered over $81,400,000 in fraud, waste, and abuse in the state. CPD call the alarming figure "likely just the tip of the iceberg." Louisiana, another grantee getting $4,836,766 from the feds, has been ripped off by "tens of millions of dollars in undiscovered losses" from charter schools in the 2013-14 school year, according to another CPD analysis. "The state has insufficiently resourced financial oversight," CPD contends, and has yet to put into place adequate reporting, staffing, and auditing. Three other states – Georgia, Massachusetts, and Washington – are getting the money just when they are deeply embroiled in heated controversies over charter schools. Georgia has a ballot initiative in November on whether to allow the state to operate an Opportunity School District that would summarily take over local schools and hand them over to charter operators. Massachusetts also has a November ballot initiative, called Question 2, that would allow the state to lift the cap on the number of charters allowed to operate in the state. And in Washington, a charter school battleground for over 20 years, court rulings, legislative shenanigans, lawsuits, and counter lawsuits related to charter schools continue to rage across the state. No doubt, this new money – over $41 million altogether for these three states – may now sweeten the pot if pro charter forces get their way. Regarding the individual CMOs the Department is sending money to, one of them, Uncommon Schools, is a charter chain which used to be led in part by the current head of USDE, Secretary John King. Uncommon is getting $8,004,576. No conflict of interest there. Another recipient – the Denver School of Science and Technology charter chain in Colorado, with a grant of $4,043,361 – has paid out between $20 to $50 million to a for-profit corporation owned by two of the charter chain's director, according to another CPD analysis. A charter school chain in Indiana getting $1,923,866 is plagued with financial problems, low enrollment, and controversy over how the CEO spends money. No doubt the infusion of federal cash will help. The federal auditor's report recommends the convening of a formal oversight group to look into charter school financial malfeasance, more rigorous review of charter school operations by federal agencies, and legislative changes in Congress to firm up government oversight. Here's another recommendation: Stop federal funding to expand these schools. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/federal-government-continues-to-feed-charter-school-beast-despite-auditors-warning/>

Is foster care protecting children? Andrew Setterholm, asetterholm@postbulletin.com Updated Oct 8, 2016 (1) 6 remaining of 7 Welcome! We hope that you enjoy our free content. The tragic death of 4-year-old Eric Dean in 2013 shocked Minnesotans to make changes to the state's child protection system. Some of the bigger changes took effect statewide earlier this year, and in some cases, the results have been drastic — and some are cause for concern, according to child protection employees at Olmsted County and the state of Minnesota. +1 This photograph of Eric Dean was taken by his daycare provider, Mindy DeGeer, and presented as evidence during the May 2014 trial of Eric's stepmother, Amanda Peltier. Eric's case came to light in 2014, after a series of articles published by the Minneapolis Star-Tribune. At the time he was killed in 2013, Eric was living at home with his mother, despite more than a dozen reports of abuse. Pope County investigated just one of those reports and found no maltreatment. In May 2014, Eric's mother, Amanda Peltier, was convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to life in prison. Later that year, the state jumped into action to address the glaring inadequacies of the system. In the years following, increased attention on child protection has driven a sizable increase in the volume of reports of child abuse. The state's changes also have had noticeable effects in 2015 and 2016: county child protective services are receiving more reports of abuse and, with new guidelines for screening reports, they are investigating more of those cases. Olmsted County is seeing another effect of the changes: More children are being placed in foster care. The county last year placed 195 children in out-of-home care. Foster care placements related to child protection cases increased 50 percent from 2014 to 2015, according to Olmsted County Jodi Wentland, director of the county's Child and Family Services Department. The state's changes to the system have provided consistency said James Koppel, Minnesota assistant commissioner for child and family services. Would the state's child services department be concerned if out-of-home placements for children continue to rise? "Absolutely," Koppel said. Following changes to the state's child protection system, Olmsted County is receiving more reports of child abuse and investigating a greater share of those reports. County staff have noticed another trend: More children are being placed in foster care. The data period for this trend is short because the changes are so recent, but it is enough to worry staff members at both the county and state levels. "I would say that, in general, a foster care placement for a child or children is a trauma. We consider that a trauma," said James Koppel, Minnesota assistant commissioner for child and family services. In addition to the immediate trauma of foster placements, children can experience mental health effects and negative outcomes later in life, Wentland said. Children who "age out" of foster care have higher likelihoods of incarceration and unemployment. The leading cause of homelessness among 18- to 24-year-old Minnesotans is aging out of foster care, Koppel said. "That cannot continue," Koppel said. "We cannot let our foster care system fail the very children that we have chosen to take out of homes due to maltreatment. We cannot fail those children in our foster care system." Out-of-home placements also are more expensive for counties and the statewide system. Spending on child protection statewide has increased 20 percent since 2014, according to a report compiled by Olmsted County. But state funding to county programs has not kept pace with changes in the system; local tax revenue has paid for about 75 percent of the spending increase, the county report said. Olmsted County last month redirected $600,000 in funding from its Child and Family Services department budget to accommodate increased costs for out-of-home placements. More attention Reporting on Eric Dean's death placed intense scrutiny on the state's child protective services. Lawmakers were pressured to review which reports of child abuse were accepted for further review — "screened in" — by county child protection agencies for assessment or investigation, when law enforcement became involved in cases and whether past reports of abuse should be considered in determining responses to reports. In 2014, Gov. Mark Dayton assembled a task force to address the issue: the Governor's Task Force on the Protection of Children. Department of Human Services Commission Lucinda Jessen chaired the task force, and Gov. Dayton appointed legislators and experts from across the state, including Mower County Sheriff Terese Amazi. The task force made 93 recommendations for changes to state law and county policies. The first was to revise Minnesota's Reporting of Maltreatment of Minors Act to state "child safety" as the paramount consideration for decision making. A second significant change was to repeal a statutory provision that prevented consideration of dismissed reports when caseworkers reviewed a new report of abuse. The task force also revised screening guidelines for child protective services, the framework for deciding which cases are reviewed and investigated. The screening guideline was reviewed by the Minnesota Legislature and became law on Jan. 1. The most immediate effects of the screening change have been an increase in the number of reports accepted for review by county child protection agencies and the intensity of counties' responses to those reports. County caseworkers have two paths of action available when a report of child abuse is received: Caseworkers can conduct a family assessment or a family investigation. A family assessment focuses on connecting parents and children with social services. Investigations take a forensic approach and involve law enforcement. An investigation also results in a legal finding — or no finding — of child maltreatment. The state's new screening requirements already have driven an increase in investigations. More than 36 percent of reports this year have resulted in investigations, Koppel said, compared to about 26 percent last year. Of those investigations, Koppel said 47 percent of cases have resulted in a finding of child maltreatment. Many, but not all, of those cases where maltreatment was discovered led to a child being placed in a foster care situation. The combined effect of counties taking more reports, screening in those reports and handling more reports as investigations could be contributing to the outcomes Olmsted County is experiencing — more children being placed in out-of-home care. "We're seeing both things, so it's a compounding effect of more reports screened in and a higher percent of the reports screened in going to an investigation," Koppel said. Olmsted County still conducts more assessments than investigations, but the balance is shifting. In 2013, the county screened in 412 cases; it conducted investigations in 77 of those cases. In the first half of this year, it has conducted 78 investigations in 269 total cases. Child protective services statewide screened in about 19,500 reports in 2013 and 20,000 in 2014. The state saw a dramatic increase in 2015 with more than 24,000 screened-in reports, and this year is on pace to show another jump to about 26,000 screened-in reports, Koppel said. Philosophical shift Investigations and out-of-home placements are what child protection workers call "back-end" services — resource-intensive responses to serious issues. Front-end services aim to address serious issues before they occur by providing social, economic and health supports, Wentland said. "There's a philosophical shift, or a philosophical pressure that's happening, at a state level around the use of out-of-home care," Wentland said. Wentland has tried to balance the department's resources to cope with new requirements while also directing adequate funding to front-end services. "My perspective, from an Olmsted perspective, we need to do even more work to try to slow this entry into (out of home) placement," Wentland said. "In clarifying that, children need to be safe. It's paramount. So placement decisions need to be around (keeping) children safe." Investing in front- and back-end services is not a "one or the other" situation but a careful balance, Wentland said. The county's investments in workforce development, education and housing could have direct effects on reports of maltreatment and out-of-home placements. "We can't do that on our own," Wentland said. "It's not going to happen in six months or a year. This is a long-term commitment for us." Supporting prevention +1 Buy Now Paul Fleissner The state's changes have seemed reactionary, said Olmsted County Community Services director Paul Fleissner. "The whole system is moving toward a reaction of pulling kids (out of homes)," Fleissner said. While the county has seen past successes in focusing on front-end services, those services are not tied to reliable funding sources. Mandated changes, such as the screening guidelines, are directly tied to funding allocated to counties. "What I've been concerned about is we've spent more time looking at what's wrong than at what's working," Fleissner said. Koppel said the changes at the state level have provided consistency that was lacking in the child protection system. "I believe that we did not have consistent practices around the state on how we treated calls and how we screened calls, how we screened cases. I think there are more consistent responses now across the state," he said. As for front-end services, the state has one prevention program, the Parent Support Outreach Program. The program has an annual statewide budget of $2 million. "That's the part that to me we ultimately need to be focused on is preventing families from entering our child protection system that is very expensive and in which children have already received, or in many cases experienced, trauma — and in too many cases (will) experience more trauma," Koppel said. Reaction to changes Olmsted County's child and family services workers regularly have updated the county's decision-makers, the Board of Commissioners, said board member Sheila Kiscaden. The move toward foster placements for children is worrying, she said. "We generally don't believe that that out-of-home placement for children is the solution," Kiscaden said. "There's real consequences to children when you take them out of their home. You might be protecting their physical safety, but there are mental health effects," Kiscaden said. The state's reforms made it clear — child safety is paramount, Koppel said. As counties continue to enact the 93 recommendations of the governor's task force, agencies at the state and county levels will continue to monitor another measure, in addition to safety: well being. "(Well being) includes that a child is safe, but it's much more aspirational, which is that a child is actually developing and has assets and is headed in a much more positive direction," Koppel said. "We want to make sure nothing bad happens to a child, but we strive for the well being." Mom Blames Youth Ranch for Son's Death By ERIK DE LA GARZA Share This WACO, Texas (CN) — A grieving mother sued a Texas youth ranch, claiming it created a "Lord of the Flies atmosphere" that culminated when her 16-year-old son was kicked to death. Elizabeth Acevedo says in her Oct. 7 federal lawsuit that Brookhaven Youth Ranch did little to protect her disabled son from being kicked to death in 2014 at the nonprofit residential treatment center in West, Texas. She sued Brookhaven Youth Ranch, its foundation, its executive director Dennis Cooke, five security guards, and the teenage boy, "A.S.," who she says was convicted of murder "and sentenced to a lengthy prison term." Acevedo says her son, Cristian Cuellar, fought with A.S. in a violent game called "King Pin," in which the stronger child attempted to restrain the weaker child on the floor to pin them. She says A.S. was older than Cristian, 6 inches taller, and outweighed him by more than 45 lbs. "Moreover, he had a documented history of physical aggression and anger management difficulties," the mother says in the complaint. However, she adds: "The staff at the youth ranch would simply observe this child-on-child violence, without making any attempt to intervene, creating a 'Lord of the Flies' atmosphere at the youth ranch." After breaking up the initial fight and separating the boys, a security guard tasked with supervising Cuellar "lost track of him," setting up the fatal incident when, "predictably," A.S. attacked Cuellar "again, as staff at the facility routinely allowed," Acevedo says. "Because the facility was understaffed, there were insufficient security officers to immediately break up the fight," according to the complaint. By the time guards arrived, A.S. had thrown her son to the floor "then viciously kicked Cristian in the head, killing him," his mother says. Brookhaven executive director Dennis Cooke told Courthouse News on Tuesday that he had no knowledge of the lawsuit and declined comment. Cooke and others at the center were not issued summonses until Tuesday because of the Columbus Day holiday, according to court records.

Acevedo claims that Cooke knew that children at the center were regularly assaulted, but he and his staff did little to prevent violence. Brookhaven describes itself online as serving up to 61 teens between the ages of 13 and 17, referred mostly by two Texas agencies and various counties. Its mission is to provide a "therapeutic sanctuary where children feel safe, parents feel reassured and referral sources feel appreciated and included in the effort to provide a compassionate, healing environment," the website states. A spokesman for the Texas Justice Juvenile Department noted in an email that it no longer contracts with the ranch, and Acevedo says state agencies have cited the center numerous times for resident-on-resident violence. An investigation of her son's death by the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services found that a staff member "was not aware of the child's ongoing activity" on the date of the attack. "As a result, the child was involved in a physical altercation with another resident," according to the letter sent from a licensing investigator to Brookhaven's executive director in 2015. The state recommended the center implement a system to ensure that all residents are accounted for. Acevedo said that in her son's case, the measures taken, if any, "were woefully ineffective," and said the staff was "wholly untrained and incapable of preventing violence at the facility." She seeks punitive damages for wrongful death, negligence, gross negligence, and civil rights violations. She is represented by Jeffrey Edwards in Austin. Maryland's Move to Pull Children From Group Homes Came Too Late for Teenager Who Died After unannounced inspections revealed deficiencies, Maryland stopped placing young people at Delaware facilities owned by AdvoServ. by Heather Vogell ProPublica, Oct. 13, 2016, 7:59 a.m. 0 Comments Print Print This is part of an ongoing investigation Restraints Do you know a child who has been forcibly restrained or secluded at school? Help us investigate by sharing your story. Spur Reform in 2016 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. Once again, government actions against a controversial for-profit company's chain of group homes for the disabled may have come too late to protect a child. ProPublica has learned that Maryland had begun pulling about 30 children out of homes owned and managed by AdvoServ in August, but hadn't yet relocated a teenage girl when she died a month later after being manually restrained by staff. Maryland's Department of Human Resources had also stopped placing children in AdvoServ homes, following inspections that identified deficiencies in quality control, record-keeping, and conditions in residential and common areas. Last year, ProPublica chronicled AdvoServ's long record of problematic treatment, its use of mechanical restraints, and its efforts to weaken regulation as it took in more people with developmental or intellectual disabilities and behavior challenges. Maryland, which plans to terminate its contract with AdvoServ at the end of this month, isn't the only state to have increased its scrutiny of the company since the ProPublica series. In March, Delaware placed the company on probation, a spokeswoman for the state's Department of Services for Children, Youth and Their Families said. In June, Florida officials said they had begun moving clients out of the company's facility in the state, and stationed an investigator there. Through a spokesman, the company declined to comment on the decisions by Maryland and Delaware regulators. AdvoServ's shortcomings add to the growing concerns about for-profit companies taking over delivery of human services, from prisons to hospice care, that were traditionally provided by government or non-profit agencies. The teenager's death, in particular, points to the limits of state officials' ability to safeguard the disabled people they place in group homes run by private contractors — even when such care is paid for with public money. Kevin Huckshorn, a national behavioral health consultant, said it matters less whether care providers are public or private — and more whether the public agency paying for services is keeping a close enough watch. "It's out of sight, out of mind," she said. "If you're not able to do due diligence on oversight and monitoring, anything can happen." She added that, because of the problems that have surfaced publicly, regulators should have been on alert for issues at AdvoServ homes. "That should have upped the ante," she said. Fractured authority and multiple players — which at times have included as many as a dozen government agencies — have clouded oversight of the company's operations. AdvoServ has expanded in the past two decades despite a stream of complaints of abuse and neglect. As far back as the 1990s, the state of New York pulled its children from AdvoServ's predecessor, Au Clair, because its inspectors had found children living in trailers that reeked of urine and feces. Officials elsewhere have repeatedly backed off from sanctioning the company, which is aided by well-connected lobbyists that include prominent former state legislators. In 2012, for example, Florida reneged on plans to bar an AdvoServ home, where both adults and a child had allegedly been punched and kicked, from accepting new clients for a year. Now owned by a private equity firm, Delaware-based AdvoServ reported last year that it cared for about 700 children and adults in that state, Florida, and New Jersey, and was expanding into Virginia. The company said then it had about 60 people age 21 or younger in its Delaware program. When Delaware officials put AdvoServ on probation in March, they established a new oversight committee with representatives from several state agencies. They also increased visits by state workers to the company's facilities, strengthened requirements for reporting complaints involving children, and tightened rules about documenting when a child left AdvoServ grounds, Delaware spokeswoman Dawn Thompson said in an email. Eight Delaware youth remain in AdvoServ homes, Thompson said. She did not provide details on why the company was placed on probation. The state has received eight complaints this year regarding alleged abuse of children at AdvoServ, as well as two complaints that resulted from the teenage girl's death, Thompson said. Most of the complaints were filed by the company. Maryland is one of several states that send difficult cases to AdvoServ homes in Delaware when they cannot find beds and schooling closer to home. Maryland's contract allows the state to pay AdvoServ up to $7.5 million a year to care for children referred either from its foster care program or after their parents had sought the agency's help. This past June, a lawsuit was filed against AdvoServ in state court in Delaware, alleging that a teenage boy from Maryland was left unsupervised and raped repeatedly by other clients during more than four years in the company's homes. His neck was injured during a restraint performed by workers, according to his lawyer, Chris Gowen. The case is pending. In early August, Maryland assembled a team of officials to make an unusual unannounced visit. Unrestrained While evidence of abuse of the disabled has piled up for decades, one for-profit company has used its deep pockets and influence to bully weak regulators and evade accountability. Read the story. What Happened to Adam It took one mother seven years to learn that the for-profit school she trusted with her son had strapped him down again and again, one time after not picking up his Legos. Read the story. The inspections, conducted on three days, prompted the pull-out of children and moratorium on new placements. As of this week, Maryland officials had moved 20 people under age 21 to new placements, with nine remaining at AdvoServ homes. Officials expected to move most of them by the end of this week and will have all removed before the state's contract ends October 31. About a month after the inspection, a 15-year-old girl from Hyattsville, Maryland, became unresponsive while being restrained at a group home in a quiet stretch of old Delaware farm country southwest of Wilmington pocked with new housing developments. The girl, whose name has not been released, died in a Delaware hospital two days later. Maryland then ordered its staff to visit AdvoServ homes every day. The girl was not the first teenager to die at an AdvoServ home. In 1997, a 14-year-old autistic boy with epilepsy was found dead in his bed with low levels of anti-seizure medicine in his blood. In 2013, a 14-year-old autistic girl died at the company's Florida home after a night in which she was restrained — at times fastened to a bed and chair — while she vomited repeatedly. "The safety of our children is DHR's top priority and we are taking this case very seriously," Maryland spokeswoman Katherine Morris said in an emailed statement, referring to the 15-year-old girl's death. The company said in a brief statement last month that it was "heartbroken over the loss of a young woman in our care." In Privatization Battle, Unions Go To Court To Block Conversions Of Group Homes Jane Vasseur Of Enfield, Sister Of Group-Home Resident Parents, siblings and guardians rally against privatizing group homes Thursday in Hartford, as unions file for court injunction blocking the conversions. Parents, siblings and guardians rally against privatizing group homes Thursday in Hartford, as unions file for court injunction blocking the conversions. Josh Kovner Contact Reporter Court filings are mounting in the battle to prevent at least 30 state group homes from going private. Two unions representing state workers who have, or face, losing their jobs in the conversion, asked a judge on Thursday to block the transfer at least until a labor board considers the unions' assertion that the contract prevents state workers from losing their jobs over privatization. Representatives of the private sector lamented what they said was an "obstructionist" position by the unions. Toting placards urging the state not to disrupt relationships between workers and clients that have formed over many years, parents, siblings and guardians of some of the group-home residents joined current and former employees of the state Department of Developmental Disabilities and union organizers at a rally Thursday outside the Superior Court's civil division on Washington Street. Gov. Dannel P. Malloy has ordered the conversion of at least 30 state-run group homes and the closing of two regional institutions to save money, and to reflect a national trend toward the privatization of services for people with intellectual and developmental disabilities. Some parents whose loved ones are in state care have expressed deep opposition to the move, saying that in some cases relationships formed with state workers over many years have kept their sons and daughters alive, and they say they distrust the private contractors who have been chronically underfunded by the state. "And they want to do this around the Christmas holidays - rip our families apart?" said Jane Vasseur of Enfield, whose brother, Billy, lives at Grey Pond group home in Simsbury. "They're selling our kids at half price -- this is the way I see it as a parent," said Lindsay Mathews, whose son, George Griffin, lives at a state group home in Hamden. She was referring to the cost of care in private group homes, which is half the state rate. Nearly 90 percent of the roughly 16,700 clients of DDS already receive services through private contractors. There are examples throughout the private sector of people with highly complex medical needs, including feeding and respiration tubes, being well cared for in private group homes, say parents with children in private care. The private sector also cares for clients with a range of difficult behaviors, including self-injury and Pica disorder, which is an appetite for non-edible objects or substances, advocates say. Local 1199 of the Service Employees International Union also represents workers in private group homes in Connecticut. Those workers haven't had raises in several years, and many qualify for Husky insurance, and must work at least two jobs to support themselves and their families. David Pickus, president of Local 1199 said, the union doesn't see this as a public-private battle. "If it was the private group homes that were being disrupted in this manner, we'd be furious at that as well," Pickus said. The state is "rushing ahead with this conversion without considering its obligation to bargain with the union," he said. The last contract, which has expired but has been extended, prohibits layoffs from private conversions, said Pickus, but state officials have argued that the provision no longer exists. The union has filed a prohibitive-practice complaint with the state Board of Labor Relations and has requested an accelerated hearing. In the petition for an injunction filed Thursday, the union is asking for a temporary halt to the conversions until the labor board can rule. Mathews has filed a separate request for an injunction on behalf of her son, and a hearing is scheduled for Monday at Superior Court in New Haven. Lawyers for advocates who support private care said a key issue is whether the state has neglected the private sector. "The idea that state-run facilities are inherently superior to private group homes is simply not supported by our experience in Connecticut," said lawyer David Shaw, who represented the Arc Connecticut in cases that closed the Mansfield Training School and helped dozens of former residents of the Southbury Training School move to private community settings. "I think the question for the court will be whether the state has provided sufficient support [to the private sector] to enable them to provide adequate care," Shaw said. Gian-Carlo Casa, a former state policy and budget official who now heads the trade group representing dozens of private group-home operators, said the private sector has demonstrated that it can match the state's quality of care and do it for significantly less money. "It is unfortunate that the union is taking an obstructionist position on a plan that experience and research shows will only benefit the individuals in state care," Casa said Thursday. He said the lower cost of private care "could allow the state to provide services for many more families who are languishing on waiting lists." The federal government is also pushing states to close outmoded institutions and place clients in less restrictive, community-based settings. Advocates in Connecticut who support private care nonetheless acknowledge that the state's underfunding of private vendors has caused high turnover and driven qualified and talented people out of the field. Local parents ask for public ratings of group homes By Bayne Hughes Staff Writer Updated 18 hrs ago 0 Buy Now By Bayne Hughes Staff Writer James Perdue prev next Two Decatur parents asked state Mental Health Commissioner James Perdue for better group home ratings and more notice of pending closures during his visit to Decatur on Wednesday. They did not leave the meeting satisfied. Suzanne Johnson and Jennifer Chase, parents of two group home residents who are developmentally disabled, said they were concerned after Perdue's town hall meeting at the Mental Health Center of North Central Alabama that the state Department of Mental Health is more interested in protecting group home providers than in protecting the disabled clients. Perdue also told Mayor-elect Tab Bowling that he would be willing to work with the city on the use of the Mental Health Center of North Central Alabama's request for a $30,000 city allocation. Chase told Perdue she received 12 hours' notice in April before the state shut down the group home on Diane Street Southwest, where her daughter was living. Chase said her daughter was happy and she was pleased with her care, so they were unaware the group home was even possibly facing closure. Her daughter has adjusted well to the new home, but Chase said she lives in fear she will be blindsided again after the traumatic experience. "We need to know when a group home receives a low rating," Chase said. Johnson's daughter wasn't involved in the closure of nine group homes in Decatur, but she said the state Department of Mental Health's website doesn't include ratings or grades of the licensed group homes. This prompted Johnson to unsuccessfully call Perdue's department. "They weren't allowed to tell us or direct us to the good homes," Johnson said. "It was like they didn't want to be responsible." Perdue said some people want a rating system for group homes similar to the health ratings for restaurants, but it's not that simple, especially when there's a shortage of group providers. "Ratings can be misleading," Perdue said. "A restaurant can get a 97, but you've still got a problem if you find a fly in your soup." Perdue said it's important to make sure the ratings "don't cause undue alarm. We also need to maintain the privacy of the individual provider." Perdue admitted his department needs to do a better job of managing the group home providers. This includes making sure they follow rules like not hiring convicted felons and not allowing medication to be left unlocked in the refrigerator, he said. The Mental Health Center's request for the city allocation has been a controversial issue since the City Council cut the funding in 2014 as part of budget reductions. The center's last allocation was $28,000 in 2013. The council refused to add the allocation back in the fiscal 2016 and 2017 budgets. However, Bowling made funding the center's request a campaign issue in the municipal election in which he was elected mayor on Oct. 4. At least two of the newly elected council members also have said they support adding the Mental Health Center's request to the new budget. Bowling asked Perdue to help the Decatur mental health center get a match to a city allocation through the federal Medicaid program. He believes the $28,000 match would create almost $94,000 for the center. "A long-term healthcare facility isn't an option, but that would be a lot of money to add to the bucket and help more people," Bowling said. Perdue said he doesn't want to micromanage the local Mental Health Center, but putting the allocation up for the federal match creates federal government oversight that might not be worth the trouble. New Mental Health Center Executive Lisa Coleman said her center would keep a city allocation local to help indigent Decatur residents with psychiatric care. She said it's hard to say how many patients an allocation would help because the cost varies with the amount of care required for each patient. Coleman said her center would need permission from Perdue on the state level to submit the city allocation for the potential Medicaid match. "It's a very complicated process," Coleman said. bayne.hughes@decaturdaily.com or 256-340-2432. Twitter @DD_BayneHughes. Grand jury probing foster care; new charges filed in NY case Updated: Thursday, September 22, 2016 @ 2:11 PM Published: Thursday, September 22, 2016 @ 1:50 AM By: Associated Press FILE - This undated file photo provided by the Suffolk County District Attorney's office in Riverhead, N.Y., shows Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu. The Suffolk County prosecutor tells the Associated Press that a special grand jury has been empaneled to investigate the foster care system and "all the facts" surrounding the Gonzales-Mugaburu case. Gonzales-Mugaburu was arrested in the winter of 2016 and charged with victimizing multiple children in Ridge, N.Y. (Suffolk County District Attorney's Office via AP, File) Riverhead — A special grand jury has been empaneled to investigate New York's foster care system following the arrest of a Long Island man on child sex abuse charges. The man had welcomed dozens of boys into his Ridge home, dating back two decades, before allegations of sex abuse surfaced, creating questions about oversight over the foster parent system. Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota said Thursday the special grand jury, which has been meeting since mid-August and may not conclude its work until early 2017, is "assessing all of the facts and circumstances involving how he was able to take all these boys in." It also is investigating other possible crimes involving the suspect. It was not clear if the grand jury would file additional criminal charges or issue a report on its findings, with recommendations for changes in the foster care system. Various governmental agencies and private foster care organizations are being examined. Spota also told reporters the grand jury would investigate how the suspect was able to obtain some of the children in his care from out-of-state foster care agencies, including Washington. Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu, 60, was arrested last winter and charged with victimizing seven children as young as 8. One count in an indictment alleges he sexually abused a dog in front of a child. On Thursday, a new indictment was unsealed accusing him of abusing one additional child and added charges involving some of the children identified as victims in the initial charges. A prosecutor also said it was likely some charges from the first indictment may be dropped because some of the alleged crimes happened too long ago to fall under statute of limitations laws. Defense attorney Donald Mates entered a not guilty plea on behalf of his client; Gonzales-Mugaburu is being held without bail. Mates told reporters after the arraignment that his client denies ever abusing children, and suggested the alleged victims were lying. Spota said previously that statute of limitations laws prevented prosecutors from filing charges involving other abuse allegations. Since the scandal erupted, separate investigations have been started by state, city and Long Island officials. Questions remain about how Gonzales-Mugaburu was able to keep getting children placed in his home despite years of concern about his conduct. Before his arrest, Gonzales-Mugaburu was the subject of nine previous investigations involving alleged abuse dating to 1998, according to a spokeswoman for Suffolk County. Each of those inquiries led to a finding at the time that the allegations weren't credible, and none of them immediately led to the removal of children from his split-level ranch home on eastern Long Island. A break came in January, when detectives said two brothers who lived in the house came forward with credible stories of abuse. Once Gonzales-

Mugaburu was in custody, others felt more comfortable coming forward, authorities said. SCO Family of Services, an agency that placed 72 New York City children in Gonzales-Mugaburu's care over 20 years, said it never uncovered evidence of sexual abuse or improper sexual behavior in the home. But the organization's chief strategy officer, Rose Anello said in July that there were other issues with the home, particularly around 2013, "and in retrospect and knowing what we know now, a decision to close the home should have been made at that time." She said those issues involved Gonzales-Mugaburu being uncooperative and unwilling to accept staff guidance on parenting style, but none of the issues then hinted at anything like the allegations uncovered this year. Following the Gonzales-Mugaburu arrest, the city's Administration for Children's Services temporarily halted placing children in SCO foster homes, but announced in July that a review of 370 homes operated by SCO uncovered no indications abuse was occurring at any of those sites. ____ This story has been corrected to show children stopped being placed in SCO foster homes, not SCO facilities. Foster care worker convicted of sex crimes against foster child KSNW-TV Published: October 14, 2016, 9:03 am Updated: October 14, 2016, 10:24 am WICHITA, Kan. (KSNW) — A former family support worker with Saint Francis Community Services is being sentenced for child sex crimes. Bridgett Martinez was convicted of consensual sexual intercourse, lewd fondling, or sodomy with a foster child. The charges stemmed from an incident that occurred on May 23rd, 2016. Saint Francis Community Services of Salina says Martinez was placed on administrative leave when they found out about the charges back in July and was terminated on July 8th. Saint Francis Community Services released the following statement to KSN Thursday evening: A statement from The Very Reverend Robert N. Smith, Dean and CEO: "Saint Francis Community Services is aware of criminal charges filed against, and the sentence given by the court to, one of its former employees, Bridgett Martinez. Ms. Martinez was employed by Saint Francis Community Services as a Family Support Worker. Saint Francis Community Services placed Ms. Martinez on administrative leave immediately upon learning of her arrest. Her employment with Saint Francis Community Services ended July 8, 2016. The mission of Saint Francis Community Services is to serve those who are vulnerable and at risk. We condemn the actions of anyone who takes advantage of individuals and violates the laws which protect them. Saint Francis Community Services extends its heartfelt sympathy to the victim in this case." Source: <http://ksn.com/2016/10/14/foster-care-worker-convicted-of-sex-crimes-against-foster-child/>

Science backs how much foster care sucks — kids suffer more health problems Science backs how much foster care sucks BY Nicole Lyn Pesce NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Monday, October 17, 2016, 1:14 PM facebook Tweet email Children in foster care are vulnerable to health and emotional problems. (Juanmonino/Getty Images) BY Nicole Lyn Pesce NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Monday, October 17, 2016, 1:14 PM Now it's a scientific fact that foster kids have a hard-knock life. Children in the U.S. foster care system suffer significantly higher risks of emotional and physical health problems, the journal Pediatrics reported Monday, such as depression, asthma and obesity. University of California, Irvine sociologists surveyed more than 900,000 children. They found those in foster care were seven times more likely to be depressed, five times more likely to be anxious, and six times more prone to behavior problems than other kids in the general population, including those in single-mother and economically disadvantaged families. Foster kids were also three times more likely to have attention deficit disorder. "No previous research has considered how the mental and physical well-being of children who have spent time in foster care compares to that of children in the general population," said study co-author Kristin Turney, UCI associate professor of sociology, in the report. Kate Middleton records children's mental health PSA And the suggested physical impact for the more than 400,000 kids in foster care was perhaps even more striking than the expected emotional fallout. Foster children were also three times more likely to have hearing and vision problems. They were twice as likely to develop asthma, become obese and experience speech problems or learning disabilities. "Foster care children are in considerably worse health than other children," noted Turney. The report suggests this stems from any maltreatment they have endured, as well as risk factors such as poverty, parental drug and alcohol abuse and neighborhood disadvantage that likely led to their foster placement. The report advises pediatricians to take note of this in treating children who have been in foster care, and calls for more research for this vulnerable group. "This is typically a difficult-to-reach population, so having access to descriptive statistics on their living arrangements, physical well-being and behavior provided an excellent opportunity to help identify the health challenges they face," Turney wrote. Posted: Monday, October 17, 2016 12:00 am Kevin Morrison: Stop and understand the life of a foster child By Ralph Schaefer TBLN Correspondent TulsaWorld.com | 0 comments Kids see the darnedest things but often suffer from those experiences. They end up on the deprived child docket in the Tulsa County Juvenile Court. They then face the possibility of being removed from their natural home. They just want and need to tell their story, and that responsibility falls to Kevin Morrison, Tulsa County assistant public defender. "We study the facts when the case is presented," he said. "Our first order of business is to have a meeting with our clients — the children — to learn their viewpoint. "Our job is misunderstood by people. Our job is to make sure the child's wishes are represented in court. Our position always will be to try to do what the child desires and get that outcome." The child may or may not want to go home with the parent. There is an increasing trend to leave kids in the home unless there is a need for judicial intervention due to neglect, abuse or other unfitness at home. Unfitness is sexual or physical abuse and is the most commonly understood, Morrison said. But there is parental drug and/or alcohol abuse as well as domestic violence that has reached a point where there is a safety risk for the children. These conditions result in children having Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) reactions, Morrison said. The court has the ability to order one or the other parent out of the home so the children can remain while issues are resolved, he said. The law allows parents no less than 90 days to take corrective action, but some cases are open ended. Oklahoma statutes provide that after a child has been in foster care for a defined period the state can file a motion to terminate parental responsibilities. The period out of the home could be as short as six months for very young children, but experience has shown that time extends to between nine and 12 months in difficult cases. Some cases last longer because parents are unable or unwilling to work on their issues. "Most kids want to go home," Morrison said, "but they want their parents to get help. Something to change at home. They don't want to be hit anymore. They don't want mommy and daddy disappearing to the back room to use drugs." Children react in different ways when they first meet with Morrison. He finds they will talk to him because he explains that he will represent them in the court proceedings so they don't personally have to attend. He tells them that it is his job to get them back with their parents — if they want. By the time intervention occurs, most have a recognition there is a problem at home and many have a heightened awareness about their situations. "I tell people the children know their parents better than anyone and their viewpoint should be trusted," he said. Morrison paused as he thought about the most significant challenge he has faced during his two decades at the Tulsa County Juvenile Court. That time includes working on the district attorney's side. "I think the greatest challenge is avoiding burnout," he said. "It's not that we get burned out. It's that we sometimes get overburdened. We deal with cases involving sexual and physical abuse daily. We look at pictures of children badly injured by parents or others. Some pictures include molestation by parents on a daily basis. That creates a pretty high level of stress. "Our legal system is adversarial by nature, and that is the way it is supposed to work. Everyone has an interest and an advocate that works against each other." Morrison doesn't get a lot of invitations to talk about his role at the juvenile court, but if he would, the message would be there are too many children in the foster care system. These children probably go to public schools, he said, and are likely struggling in class. "I live in Collinsville and am on the school board," Morrison said. "There are many people in that community who are fostering children. It is a point of emphasis that I put into the schools — that they need to understand these are kids with troubles." Many have PTSD and are acting out behaviors and symptoms, and people should be compassionate and help them. Morrison's message would be to pay attention to what is going on around them. "We live in neighborhoods where we see children being neglected, children we suspect are being abused because it happens everywhere — not just in north Tulsa where everyone assumes that it happens," he said. "Pay attention if you see something. Say something. If you see a child in need, try to help them, their parents. If you see something that looks dangerous to the child, call police. "Be vigilant. Not that I need more cases, but things to which people subject their children are surprising." Foster care raises children's risk of mental, physical health problems Written by Honor Whiteman Published: Today Published: Today email Children in the United States who have been in foster care are at significantly higher risk of mental and physical health problems, including learning disabilities, depression, asthma, and obesity, compared with children who have not been in foster care. This is the finding of a new study published in the journal Pediatrics. Researchers say children in foster care have much worse health than children in the general population. In 2014, more than 650,000 children in the U.S. spent time in foster care. On average, children in foster care spend 2 years waiting to be adopted. Previous studies have suggested that children in foster care may develop physical and mental health issues, primarily as a result of the trauma they have experienced, such as abuse and neglect. However, the authors of the new study - including Kristin Turney of the University of California-Irvine - note that no research has compared the health of children in foster care with that of children in the general population. With this in mind, Turney and team analyzed 2011-2012 data from the National Survey of Children's Health, which included more than 900,000 children across the U.S. Of these, around 1.3 percent had been in foster care. The researchers used logistic regression models to compare the risks of mental and physical health problems of children who had and had not spent time in foster care. Foster care 'a risk factor for health problems in childhood' On looking at the risks of physical health problems, the researchers found children who had been in foster care were twice as likely to have asthma and obesity and three times as likely to have hearing and vision problems, compared with children who had not spent time in foster care. When it came to mental health, children who had been in foster care were found to be at seven times greater risk of depression and five times greater risk of anxiety. Behavioral problems were six times more likely among children who spent time in foster care, the team reports, and they were also at three times greater risk of attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), and twice as likely to have learning disabilities and developmental delays. Turney says their study makes an "important contribution to the research community" by being the first to demonstrate that the health of children in foster care is much worse than children in other living conditions. "Our findings also present serious implications for pediatricians by suggesting that foster care placement is a risk factor for health problems in childhood," she adds. "This is typically a difficult-to-reach population, so having access to descriptive statistics on their living arrangements, physical well-being and behavior provided an excellent opportunity to help identify the health challenges they face. This study expands our understanding of the mental and physical health of these highly vulnerable children, but we must take a closer look if we are to understand how foster care really affects child well-being." Panhandle group home director arrested on sex charges Photo: WJHG By Associated Press | Posted: Tue 7:56 AM, Oct 18, 2016 | Updated: Tue 7:57 AM, Oct 18, 2016 By: Associated Press October 18, 2016 PANAMA CITY, Fla. (AP) -- Authorities say the director of a group home for foster children in the Florida Panhandle is accused of having sex with a child. According to a Bay County Sheriff's Office report, 34-year-old Bryan Meeder was arrested over the weekend on lewd and lascivious battery. He's the director of Claire's House and officials say the alleged abuse took place while the girl lived in the home. The News-Herald reports the girl told investigators she came to live in the home when she was 13 and began a sexual relationship with Meeder when she was 14. She says it continued through her 18th birthday. Investigators obtained text messages and recordings of conversations between Meeder and the girl. An investigation is continuing. Records don't show whether Meeder has a lawyer. Source: <http://www.wctv.tv/content/news/Panhandle-Group-home-director-arrested-on-sex-charges-397425251.html>

Families ask judge to stop planned privatization of group homes WTNH Staff Published: October 17, 2016, 6:08 pm Updated: October 19, 2016, 11:22 am Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) (WTNH) — Families of some developmentally delayed adults are fighting a move to privatize some of Connecticut's group homes. One of those families has asked a judge to stop Gov. Malloy from going through with it. The state announced its plans to let private companies take over 40 of its 60 group homes, in an effort to trim money from the state budget. This comes after two unions announced they would file an injunction to stop the conversion of those state facilities into the private sector. In response, the head of the CT Community Nonprofit Alliance, Gian-Carl Casa released a statement saying: It is unfortunate that the union is taking an obstructionist position on a plan that experience and research shows will only benefit the individuals in state care. The high quality of care already being delivered by private providers to thousands of individuals with some of the most challenging and complex needs is equal, if not superior, to state facilities. And the lower cost of private care could allow the state to provide services for many more families who are languishing on waiting lists. Change is difficult. For the union to suggest that only state employees can deliver quality care is simply false, and ignores the fact that private providers already deliver care to the majority of individuals receiving state-supported services. We are confident that private, community-based agencies can provide care that individuals now living in state facilities need and deserve." Some parents and guardians say they've had experience with private group homes, and that the move is not a good idea. "My brother was actually put in a private group home 20 years ago, and it was a total disaster. He was put into apartments, not supervised 24/7. He's in no way appropriate to be unsupervised. He was roaming the community," said Jefferey Wong. Group homes in line for privatization will do so by January 1st. Audit slams state agencies for drugging foster kids During a recent hearing at the Capitol, State Auditor Elaine Howle revealed the findings on her department's audit regarding the prescribing and oversight of psychotropic medications to children in foster care. (Oct. 19, 2016) Lilia Luciano, KXTV 6:22 AM. PDT October 20, 2016 During a recent hearing at the Capitol, State Auditor Elaine Howle revealed the findings on her department's audit regarding the prescribing and oversight of psychotropic medications to children in foster care. "The state authorized medications in dosages that exceed what's in the guidance - multiple meds - excessive meds - than the guidance. Key overarching issues," Howle said. Tisha Ortiz risked getting late to class to be at the hearing. She's studying criminal justice at California State University, East Bay. She sat among other former foster youth as she awaited her turn to testify. "How is it my fault that I was abused? It's not," Ortiz asked. "How is it my fault that I'm in a group home? It's not my fault. The foster care system is a pretty dark place." California has, according to the auditor, the highest population of foster youth in America. Senator Mike McGuire, who called for the audit and led the hearing, noted that in 2006 only one percent of foster kids were on psych meds. That number has increased to 1 in 8 children today, McGuire noted. Often being the children of drug addicted parents, many foster children begin life at a disadvantage. Some of them are abused sexually, emotionally and physically and that's how they end up in the hands of the state. For children like Ortiz, this life comes with increasing challenges. Ortiz said she suffered abuse at a group home. "My mom had just passed away," Ortiz said. "She (a staff member at the group home) told me if she ever caught me crying, I'd be in serious trouble. I would hide in the showers just to cry. One time she got upset that I was crying and pulled me to the side and said, 'Stop it, no one cares. No one is going to have empathy or sympathy for you ever. Why do you even care that your mother passed away when you weren't even close.'" Sometimes kids with behavioral problems, as many foster kids show, get into the mental health system, where they end up on prescription drugs that many say have no place in the body of a child. Dr. Stuart Bair has worked with children in foster care for decades and has observed doctors resort to pills over therapy. "It's an easy fix or at least a superficial easy fix for a lot of systems, and a lot of doctors say, 'Okay, here's the medication,'" Bair said. "'It will shut the kid up,' - very, very few of these kids have psychotic disorders for which these medications are clearly indicated.'" Ortiz's case is not rare. According to Howle's report, 12 percent of children in foster care are taking psychotropic meds, including antidepressants, antipsychotics and mood stabilizers, among others. When children under the age of 5 are excluded, the rate blows up, said Bill Grimm, a senior attorney at the National Center for Youth Law. "Then you have a problem of about 25 percent or higher of every child in foster care between 6 and 17 being on one or more psychotropic medications, and that's a huge problem," Grimm said. "Then when you look at the types of medications knowing that, at least our data seems to suggest, that half of those children are on antipsychotic medications that are only FDA-approved for a very, very limited diagnosis." "The audit concludes that the state and its counties have failed to adequately oversee the prescribing of these medications," Howle said. I asked Howle about those findings and she told me "we found that these children are receiving medications in excess of the dosages required or recommended in guidance." "The prescribing was a problem and certainly the follow-up," Howle said. "And then the other piece was in conjunction with receiving a medication like this, a child should be receiving mental health services, counseling services, and we didn't see evidence of that happening for many of these children, so they were essentially being given medications, not being seen frequently enough and then not being provided the health services they need." The audit found that in as many as 65 percent of cases, children are getting the meds without parental, guardian or court authorization, which, according to Grimm, is illegal. "In California, before a prisoner - before somebody convicted of a felony, somebody, in fact, who might have victimized and sexually molested a child in foster care - before that prisoner can be administered a psychotropic med against their will, we have a much more rigid process in place," Grimm said. "Our prisoners are entitled to more protection of their rights than our children in foster care who'd done nothing wrong, nothing that would allow them to be punished in any way." Ortiz said she often complained about the side effects of her medication. "They made me severely disabled. I couldn't wake up without wanting to go back to sleep," she said. "I couldn't function on those medications. Even with just one medication, all I wanted to do was sleep all day. "One time when I was pretty drugged up, I couldn't wake up in the morning, I was feeling very sick," she added. "I wanted to puke, and a staff member was upset that I wasn't waking up for school and decided to throw me and my bed against the wall because I wasn't waking up to go to school." "The antipsychotics are clearly the biggest problem at this point," Bair said. "Medication's side effects typically include serious sedation, movement disorders, and sometimes irreversible movement disorders. Sometimes where you just feel like you can't sit still and you're jumping around, which then looks as if you're more agitated when in fact it's a side effect of medication." I asked if this could possibly motivate another prescription. "Exactly. Exactly," Bair said. "Then there are the long-term metabolic problems of increased risk of diabetes and obesity." Ortiz said she went from 175 to 225 pounds while on the meds. "I still sometimes get the facial tics. I'll feel them; they're kind of embarrassing, especially around the eyes. I'll feel them mostly around the eyes, I'll get the facial tics. Definitely the heart problem I still suffer from, it's permanent now," she said. "The weight gain, I've been fluctuating with weight. It wasn't until recently, like the last six months, I completely came off medications, because before it was really hard to come off all those medications." Ortiz decided to share her medical records with me. On her health and education passport, I noticed that at the age of 15, she was given Lithium, usually prescribed for bipolar disorder, which she wasn't diagnosed with. Simultaneously she was prescribed an antidepressant named Trazodone. I am far from an expert on medicine, but a simple Google search will show this drug has a major interaction with lithium. A drugs.com warning reads "The risk of interaction might outweigh the benefits." Ortiz was also on Geodon, a powerful antipsychotic to treat schizophrenia and bipolar disorder; none of these diagnoses appear on her records. Among its long list of side effects, according to the National Center for Biotechnology Information, the drug may cause heart rhythm problems, a life-threatening neurological disorder, serious skin reactions, twitching, uncontrollable muscle movements, tiredness, sleepiness, increased hunger, thirst, weight gain and on and on. Dr. Bair described it as "trying to think through glue, so when you get these medications, your brain is fogged up and the things that kids need to do – they need to get educated, they need to learn how to develop peer relations." Bair thinks these side effects could significantly inhibit those processes. "We know things are not going well, so you have a kid who has essentially pharmacologically induced lack of development, immaturity," Bair said. "And you also have a young person who may be 20, 30, 50 pounds overweight who wasn't able to learn anything in school because he or she was dead on her feet most of the time, doesn't know how to establish age-appropriate relationships either with his or her peers or with the adult world in general. It's not fair." Ortiz was also placed on Abilify, with its own long list of side effects, including specific effects for teenagers like increased mental and emotional problems and thoughts of suicide. I looked up her doctor's name on the ProPublica Dollars for Doctors database, showing how much money doctors got from pharmaceutical companies, and just within a year of the study, her doctor had received \$90 dollars in meals. Another doctor who switched her to a new antipsychotic, after she landed in the hospital likely from the side effects, got \$168 dollars in food and beverage from the producers of this new medication. It doesn't sound like a lot of money but research shows even a little incentive goes a long way. "Doctors who receive payments from the medical industry do indeed tend to prescribe drugs differently than their colleagues who don't," according to the ProPublica study. It's that simple. "What happened a number of years ago was that there was move afoot to make doctors think that there was bipolar disorder all over the place in kids," Bair said. "If you have bipolar disorder, it's kind of a straight shot antipsychotic. The pharmaceutical companies were really big on this and said 'let's increase our market by having an entirely new patient population that is under 18.'" And that kind of medication isn't cheap. "Out of the 12 most costly drugs nationwide, three of the 12 were antipsychotic meds," Bair said. "That is one of the highest group of classes of drugs that are given to children in foster care. This is no doubt that these drugs are some of the most costly that are handed out to patients whose care is paid for by Medicaid. We don't even know how much money in California is spent on alternatives to medication." What we do know, thanks to a Mercury News study, is that over a decade, the state spent more than 226 million in taxpayer dollars on psych meds for foster children. "These are human beings. What we know is foster youth already have challenges related to their long-term success of their life," McGuire said. "We are the guardians. The state of California are the guardians of these youth and we failed them. It's unacceptable." McGuire's bill seeking to increase doctor accountability was recently signed by Governor Brown. "It would confidentially turn over the medical records and prescription rates of California's foster youth to the Medical Board," McGuire said. "The Medical Board would then be able to confidentially investigate serial over-prescribers via the medical and prescription records of foster youth. In addition, the bill would allow the attorney general to open up a case to go after a serial over-prescriber." I met with Jennifer Kent, Director of the Department of Health Care Services, which oversees the medical needs of children in foster care. She said her department agrees with the audit's findings. "I think, like all audits, it always provides room for improvement, points out places where we can make changes in our system to either deliver services in a better way or more efficient way," Kent said. "In this particular audit, we agree with the findings, and so we've already made most of the changes. There are some that are still in process that we are making." Kent acknowledged that this population needs more scrutiny and that her department welcomes the opportunity to work with the Department of Social Services to gradually fix the issues. Maryland girl dies in Delaware facility for disabled youth Meredith CohnContact Reporter The Baltimore Sun A Maryland girl died in a Delaware facility for disabled youth just ahead of being transferred. A 15-year-old Maryland girl died at a facility in Delaware for severely developmentally disabled youths, authorities said Tuesday, after the state already had decided to sever ties with the operators. The Maryland Department of Human Resources said that it had canceled its contract with AdvoServe effective Oct. 31, but had not found appropriate places to send all of the 31 youths housed in company institutions when the girl died. The unidentified girl died at the Bear, Del., facility in mid-September, authorities said. Neither AdvoServe nor the Department of Human Resources would provide more information Tuesday. "Understandably, our agency and caseworkers were hit hard by this tragedy," Department of Human Resources spokeswoman Katherine Morris said in a statement. "The death of a child is never news that is easy to process," she said. "We are taking this case very seriously, as the safety and well-being of youth in our care is our top priority. DHR is in close contact with the authorities in Delaware who are investigating this incident." Morris said the Department of Human Resources had canceled its contract and instituted a moratorium on new placements "as a result of an intensive review of the program, including several unannounced visits DHR made to AdvoServ." She did not specify when the decision was made to cancel the contract, but said it was before the girl died. All but one of the Maryland youths has been placed elsewhere, Morris said. One was moved from a AdvoServ facility in Florida to another in that state. Maryland's three-year contract with AdvoServ was approved in 2012 with two one-year extensions, according to documents provided by the Department of Human Resources. The contract was scheduled to expire in February. Payments to AdvoServe were not supposed to exceed about $7.9 million a year and were capped at about $39.8 million. It's unclear how much was paid to the company. AdvoServ declined to answer questions about the death. "Our staff is heartbroken over the loss of the young woman in our care, and our deepest sympathies go out to her mother and extended family," the company said in a statement. This is not the first time that a child has died in a group home managed by a state contractor. Damaud Martin, a 10-year-old Baltimore boy, died in July 2014 at a Laurel-area group home for disabled foster children. Maryland health regulators later said that they found serious violations at the LifeLine group home, including conflicting records on his care and miscommunication between staff and the emergency responders and medical personnel who labored to save him. However, they said none of the violations contributed to his death. That conclusion surprised child advocates who called the investigation flawed. Advocates for youth say the latest incident demonstrates the difficulty of providing services for children with the sometimes severe emotional and behavioral problems. Washington attorney Chris Gowen has filed a lawsuit on behalf of another Maryland child who he alleges was assaulted at a AdvoServ facility. "The state of Maryland has a real challenge to find alternative placements for youth with severe disabilities, and the answer to that challenge can't be to send them all out of state to a school that takes anyone," he said. Leslie Seid Margolis, a managing attorney with Disability Rights Maryland, said she's been warning the state of Maryland about AdvoServ's practices for years. She cited the company's use of a type of restraint prohibited under Maryland law. She said her group, a federally mandated advocate for people with disabilities, will investigate the death and determine what went wrong and how to prevent harm in the future. Maryland routinely sends children out of state when appropriate facilities are not available in the state. She called it a "system failure" that youths have to be sent away from home, in some cases far from home, for proper services and education. Margolis said some parents don't have the support or resources to care for their children and they have to allow them to be placed in facilities such as AdvoServ's. The company has facilities in Delaware, New Jersey, Florida and Connecticut. "I only wish Maryland had removed the kids sooner," she said. meredith.cohn@baltisun.com Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/health/blog/bs-hs-child-death-20161018-story.html>

Youth justice study finds prison counterproductive New report documents urgent need to replace youth prisons with rehabilitation-focused alternatives October 21, 2016 | Editor's Pick Popular Credit: iStock The youth prison model should be replaced with a continuum of community-based programs and, for the few youth who require secure confinement, smaller homelike facilities that prioritize age-appropriate rehabilitation, according to a report released today. Show more By Adam Schaffer, HKS Communications Email Twitter Facebook A new report, published by Harvard Kennedy School's Program in Criminal Justice Policy and Management \(PCJ\) and the National Institute of Justice \(NIJ\), documents ineffectiveness, endemic abuses, and high costs in youth prisons throughout the country. The report systematically reviews recent research in developmental psychology and widespread reports of abuse to conclude that the youth prison model should be replaced with a continuum of community-based programs and, for the few youth who require secure confinement, smaller homelike facilities that prioritize age-appropriate rehabilitation. The authors, who are leading youth justice researchers and former youth correctional administrators, find that the current youth prison model, which emphasizes confinement and control, often exacerbates youth trauma and inhibits positive growth while failing to address public safety. Rather, the paper argues, programs work best when youths are in their home communities with rehabilitative programs or in smaller, homelike facilities that promote opportunities for healthy decision-making and development. Corrections agencies should provide a range of options depending on the individual's needs, from smaller secure facilities to noncustodial programs. Annual youth imprisonment costs are approximately $150,000 per individual, yet recidivism rates remain close to 70 percent. The report examines the experiences of several states that have pursued alternative models and finds community-based approaches can reduce recidivism, control costs, and promote public safety. "Youth in trouble need guidance, education, and support, not incarceration in harmful and ineffective youth prisons," said PCJ Senior Fellow Vincent Schiraldi, a co-author of the report. Previously, Schiraldi directed juvenile corrections in Washington, D.C., and served as commissioner of probation in New York City. "We now know from research and on-the-ground experience that youth prisons are not designed to best promote youth rehabilitation. This report offers concrete alternatives for policymakers across the country to maintain public safety, hold young people accountable, and turn their lives around." "Juvenile-justice systems must have the clear purpose of giving each youth the tools he or she needs to get on the right path to a successful adulthood and to reintegrate into the community," said Patrick McCarthy, president and chief executive officer of the Annie E. Casey Foundation and a co-author of the report. Like Schiraldi, McCarthy is a former director of youth corrections — in his case, in Delaware. "By closing traditional youth prisons and leveraging increased political will to reform our country's dependence on incarceration, states can use the savings to begin implementing a new, more effective approach to serving young people." The report, authored by McCarthy, Schiraldi, and Miriam Shark, a former associate director at the Annie E. Casey Foundation, is one of several emerging from the Executive Session on Community Corrections at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. The Executive Sessions convene individuals of independent standing to take joint responsibility for rethinking and improving society's responses to an issue. "The Future of Youth Justice: A Community-Based Alternative to the Youth Prison Model" will be presented today at the U.S. Department of Justice. A panel discussion with leading experts on community-based models for juvenile justice can be viewed via livestream from 10 a.m. to noon (EDT). This event is hosted by the United States Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs. Henry A. Giroux | The United States' War on Youth: From Schools to Debtors' Prisons Wednesday, 19 October 2016 00:00 By Henry A. As the United States increasingly models its schools after prisons and subjects children to a criminal legal system marked by severe class and racial inequities, it becomes clear that such children are no longer viewed as a social investment but as suspects. Under a neoliberal regime in which some children are treated as criminals and increasingly deprived of decent health care, education, food and housing, it has become clear that the United States has both failed its children and democracy itself. Not only is the United States the only nation in the world that [sentences children to life in prison without parole, the criminal legal system often functions so as to make it more difficult for young people to escape the reach of a punishing and racist legal system. For instance, according to a recent report published by the Juvenile Law Center, there are close to a million children who appear in juvenile court each year subject to a legal system rife with racial disparities and injustices. This is made clear by Jessica Feerman, associate director of the Juvenile Law Center in her report "Debtors' Prison for Kids? The High Cost of Fines and Fees in the Juvenile Justice System." In an interview with the Arkansas Times, Feerman said: Racial disparities pervade our juvenile justice system. Our research suggests that we can reduce those disparities through legislative action aimed at costs, fines, fees, and restitution ... In every state, youth and families can be required to pay juvenile court costs, fees, fines, or restitution. The costs for court related services, including probation, a "free appointed attorney," mental health evaluations, the costs of incarceration, treatment, or restitution payments, can push poor children deeper into the system and families deeper into debt. Youth who can't afford to pay for their freedom often face serious consequences, including incarceration, extended probation, or denial of treatment -- they are unfairly penalized for being poor. Many families either go into debt trying to pay these costs or forego basic necessities like groceries to keep up with payments. To read more articles by Henry A. Giroux and other authors in the Public Intellectual Project, click here. According to the report, sometimes when a family can't pay court fees and fines, the child is put in a juvenile detention facility. Such punitive measures are invoked without a degree of conscience or informed judgment as when children are fined for being truant from school. In her article in Common Dreams, Nika Knight pointed to one case in which a child was fined $500 for being truant and because he could not pay the fine, "spent three months in a locked facility at age 13." In many states, the parents are incarcerated if they cannot pay for their child's court fees. For many parents, such fines represent a crushing financial burden, which they cannot meet, and consequently their children are subjected to the harsh confines of juvenile detention centers. Erik Eckholm has written in The New York Times about the story of Dequan Jackson, which merges the horrid violence suffered by the poor in a Dickens novel with the mindless brutality and authoritarianism at the heart of one of Kafka's tales. Eckholm is worth quoting at length: When Dequan Jackson had his only brush with the law, at 13, he tried to do everything right. Charged with battery for banging into a teacher while horsing around in a hallway, he pleaded guilty with the promise that after one year of successful probation, the conviction would be reduced to a misdemeanor. He worked 40 hours in a food bank. He met with an anger management counselor. He kept to an 8 p.m. curfew except when returning from football practice or church. And he kept out of trouble. But Dequan and his mother, who is struggling to raise two sons here on wisps of income, were unable to meet one final condition: payment of $200 in court and public defender fees. For that reason alone, his probation was extended for what turned out to be 14 more months, until they pulled together the money at a time when they had trouble finding quarters for the laundromat. Not only do such fines create a two-tier system of justice that serves the wealthy and punishes the poor, they also subject young people to a prison system fraught with incidents of violent assault, rape and suicide. Moreover, many young people have health needs and mental health problems that are not met in these detention centers, and incarceration also fuels mental health problems. Suicide rates behind bars "are more than four times higher than for adolescents overall," according to the Child Trends Data Bank. Moreover, "between 50 and 75 percent of adolescents who have spent time in juvenile detention centers are incarcerated later in life." Finally, as the "Debtors' Prison for Kids Report" makes clear, kids are being sent to jail at increasing rates while youth crime is decreasing. The criminal legal system is mired in a form of casino capitalism that not only produces wide inequalities in wealth, income and power, but it also corrupts municipal court systems that are underfunded and turn to unethical and corrupt practices in order to raise money, while creating new paths to prison, especially for children. Debtors' prisons for young people exemplify how a warfare culture can affect the most vulnerable populations in a society, exhibiting a degree of punitiveness and cruelty that indicts the most fundamental political, economic and social structures of a society. Debtors' prisons for young people have become the dumping grounds for those youth considered disposable, and they are also a shameful source of profit for municipalities across the United States. They operate as legalized extortion rackets, underscoring how our society has come to place profits above the welfare of children. They also indicate how a society has turned its back on young people, the most vulnerable group of people in our society. There is nothing new about the severity of the American government's attack on poor people, especially those on welfare, and both political parties have shared in this ignoble attack. What is often overlooked, however, is the degree to which children are impacted by scorched-earth policies that extend from cutting social provisions to the ongoing criminalization of a vast range of behaviors. It appears that particularly when it comes to young people, especially poor youth and youth of color, society's obligations to justice and social responsibility disappear. Modeling Schools After Prisons We live at a time in which institutions that were meant to limit human suffering and misfortune and protect young people from the excesses of the police state and the market have been either weakened or abolished. The consequences can be seen clearly in the ongoing and ruthless assault on public education, poor students and students of color. Schools have become, in many cases, punishment factories that increasingly subject students to pedagogies of control, discipline and surveillance. Pedagogy has been emptied of critical content and now imposes on students mind-numbing teaching practices organized around teaching for the test. The latter constitutes both a war on the imagination and a disciplinary practice meant to criminalize the behavior of children who do not accept a pedagogy of conformity and overbearing control. No longer considered democratic public spheres intended to create critically informed and engaged citizens, many schools now function as punishing factories, work stations that mediate between warehousing poor students of color and creating a path that will lead them into the hands of the criminal legal system and eventually, prison. Under such circumstances, it becomes more difficult to reclaim a notion of public schooling in which the culture of punishment and militarization is not the culture of education. Hope in this instance has to begin with a critical discourse among teachers, students, parents and administrators unwilling to model the schools after a prison culture. Many schools are now modeled after prisons and organized around the enactment of zero tolerance policies which, as John W. Whitehead has pointed out, put "youth in the bullseye of police violence." Whitehead argues rightfully that: The nation's public schools -- extensions of the world beyond the schoolhouse gates, a world that is increasingly hostile to freedom -- have become microcosms of the American police state, containing almost every aspect of the militarized, intolerant, senseless, overcriminalized, legalistic, surveillance-riddled, totalitarian landscape that plagues those of us on the "outside." Not only has there been an increase in the number of police in the schools, but the behavior of kids is being criminalized in ways that legitimate what many call the school-to-prison pipeline. School discipline has been transformed into a criminal matter now handled mostly by the police rather than by teachers and school administrators, especially in regard to the treatment of poor Black and Brown kids. But cops are doing more than arresting young people for trivial infractions, they are also handcuffing them, using tasers on children, applying physical violence on youth, and playing a crucial role in getting kids suspended or expelled from schools every year. The Civil Rights Project rightly argues that public schools are becoming "gateways to prisons." One estimate suggests that a growing number of young people will have been arrested for minor misbehaviors by the time they finish high school. This is not surprising in schools that already look like quasi-prisons with their drug-sniffing dogs, surveillance systems, metal detectors, police patrolling school corridors, and in some cases, police systems that resemble SWAT teams. While there has been a great deal of publicity nationwide over police officers killing Black people, there has been too little scrutiny regarding the use of force by police in the schools. As Jaeh Lee observed in Mother Jones, the "use of force by cops in schools ... has drawn far less attention [in spite of the fact that] over the past five years at least 28 students have been seriously injured, and in one case shot to death, by so-called school resource officers -- sworn, uniformed police assigned to provide security on k-12 campuses." According to Democracy Now, there are over 17,000 school resource officers in more than half of the public schools in the United States, while only a small percentage have been trained to work in schools. In spite of the fact that violence in schools has dropped precipitously, school resource officers are the fastest growing segment of law enforcement and their presence has resulted in more kids being ticketed, fined, arrested, suspended and pushed into the criminal legal system. In 2014 over 92,000 students were subject to school-related arrests. In the last few years, videos have been aired showing a police officer inside Spring Valley High School in Columbia, South Carolina throwing a teenage girl to the ground and dragging her out of her classroom. In Mississippi schools, a student was handcuffed for not wearing a belt, a black female student was choked by the police, and one cop threatened to shoot students on a bus. Neoliberalism is not only obsessed with accumulating capital, it has also lowered the threshold for extreme violence to such a degree that it puts into place a law-and-order educational regime that criminalizes children who doodle on desks, bump into teachers in school corridors, throw peanuts at a bus, or fall asleep in class. Fear, insecurity, humiliation, and the threat of imprisonment are the new structuring principles in schools that house our most vulnerable populations. The school has become a microcosm of the warfare state, designed to provide a profit for the security industries, while imposing a pedagogy of repression on young people. According to the US Department of Education Office for Civil Rights, a disproportionate number of students subject to arrests are Black. It states: "While black students represent 16% of student enrollment, they represent 27% of students referred to law enforcement and 31% of students subjected to a school-related arrest." Too many children in the United States confront violence in almost every space in which they find themselves -- in the streets, public schools, parks, and wider culture. In schools, according to Whitehead, "more than 3 million students are suspended or expelled every year." Violence has become central to America's identity both with regards to its foreign policy and increasingly in its domestic policies. How else to explain what Lisa Armstrong revealed in The Intercept: "The United States is the only country in the world that routinely sentences children to life in prison without parole, and, according to estimates from nonprofits and advocacy groups, there are between 2,300 and 2,500 people serving life without parole for crimes committed when they were minors." The predatory financial system targets poor, Black and Brown children instead of crooked bankers, hedge fund managers, and big corporations who engage in massive corruption and fraud while pushing untold numbers of people into bankruptcy, poverty and even homelessness. For example, according to Forbes, the international banking giant HSBC exposed the US financial system to "a wide array of money laundering, drug trafficking, and terrorist financing ... and channeled $7 billion into the U.S. between 2007 and 2008 which possibly included proceeds from illegal drug sales in the United States." Yet, no major CEO went to jail. Even more astounding is that "the profligate and dishonest behavior of Wall Street bankers, traders, and executives in the years leading up to the 2008 financial crisis ... went virtually unpunished." Resisting Criminalization of School Discipline and Everyday Behavior Violence against children in various sites is generally addressed through specific reforms, such as substituting community service for detention centers, eliminating zero tolerance policies in schools, and replacing the police with social workers, while creating supportive environments for young people. The latter might include an immediate stoppage to suspending, expelling and arresting students for minor misbehaviors. Legal scholar Kerrin C. Wolf has proposed a promising three-tier system of reform that includes the following: The first tier of the system provides supports for the entire student body. Such supports include clearly defining and teaching expected behaviors, rewarding positive behavior, and applying a continuum of consequences for problem behavior. The second tier targets at-risk students -- students who exhibit behavior problems despite the supports provided in the first tier -- with enhanced interventions and supports, often in group settings. These may include sessions that teach social skills and informal meetings during which the students "check in" to discuss how they have been behaving. The third tier provided individualized and specialized interventions and supports for high-risk students -- students who do not respond to the first and second tier supports and interventions. The interventions and supports are based on a functional behavior assessment and involve a community of teachers and other school staff working with the student to change his or her behavior patterns. Regarding the larger culture of violence, there have also been public demands that police wear body cameras and come under the jurisdiction of community. In addition, there has been a strong but largely failed attempt on the part of gun reform advocates to establish policies and laws that would control the manufacture, sale, acquisition, circulation, use, transfer, modification or use of firearms by private citizens. At the same time, there is a growing effort to also pass legislation that would not allow such restrictions to be used as a further tool to incarcerate youth of color. In short, this means not allowing the war on gun violence to become another war on poor people of color similar to what happened under the racially biased war on drugs. And while such reforms are crucial in the most immediate sense to protect young people and lessen the violence to which they are subjected, they do not go far enough. Violence has reached epidemic proportions in the United States and bears down egregiously on children, especially poor youth and youth of color. If such violence is to be stopped, a wholesale restructuring of the warfare state must be addressed. The underlying structure of state and everyday violence must be made visible, challenged and dismantled. The violence waged against children must become a flashpoint politically to point to the struggles that must be waged against the gun industry, the military-industrial-academic complex, and an entertainment culture that fuels what Dr. Phil Wolfson describes in Tikken Magazine as "fictive identifications" associated with "murderous combat illusions and delusions." Violence must be viewed as endemic to a regime of neoliberalism that breeds racism, class warfare, bigotry and a culture of cruelty. Capitalism produces the warfare state, and any reasonable struggle for a real democracy must address both the institutions organized for the production of violence and the political, social, educational and economic tools and strategies necessary for getting rid of it. Americans live at a time in which the destruction and violence pursued under the regime of neoliberalism is waged unapologetically and without pause. One consequence is that it has become more difficult to defend a system that punishes its children, destroys the lives of workers, derides public servants, plunders the planet and destroys public goods. Americans live in an age of disposability in which the endless throwing away of goods is matched by a system that views an increasing number of people -- poor Black and Brown youth, immigrants, Muslims, unemployed workers and those unable to participate in the formal economy -- as excess and subject to zones of social and economic abandonment. As Gayatri Spivak rightly observes, "When human beings are valued as less than human, violence begins to emerge as the only response." At issue here is not just the crushing of the human spirit, mind and body, but the abandonment of democratic politics itself. Violence wages war against hope, obliterates the imagination, and undermines any sense of critical agency and collective struggle. Sites of Resistance Yet, resistance cannot be obliterated, and we are seeing hopeful signs of it all over the world. In the US, Black youth are challenging police and state violence, calling for widespread alliances among diverse groups of young people, such as the Movement for Black Lives (M4BL), worker-controlled labor movements, the movement around climate change, movements against austerity and movements that call for the abolition of the prison system among others. All of these are connecting single issues to a broader comprehensive politics, one that is generating radical policy proposals that reach deep into demands for power, freedom and justice. Such proposals extend from reforming the criminal legal system to ending the exploitative privatization of natural resources. What is being produced by these young people is less a blueprint for short-term reform than a vision of the power of the radical imagination in addressing long term, transformative organizing and a call for a radical restructuring of society. What we are seeing is the birth of a radical vision and a corresponding mode of politics that calls for the end of violence in all of its crude and militant death-dealing manifestations. Such movements are not only calling for the death of the two-party system and the distribution of wealth, power and income, but also for a politics of civic memory and courage, one capable of analyzing the ideology, structures and mechanisms of capitalism and other forms of oppression. For the first time since the 1960s, political unity is no longer a pejorative term, new visions matter and coalitions arguing for a broad-based social movement appear possible again. A new politics of insurrection is in the air, one that is challenging the values, policies, structure and relations of power rooted in a warfare society and war culture that propagate intolerable violence. State violence in both its hidden and visible forms is no longer a cause for despair but for informed and collective resistance. Zygmunt Bauman is right in insisting that the bleakness and dystopian politics of our times necessitates the ability to dream otherwise, to imagine a society "which thinks it is not just enough, which questions the sufficiency of any achieved level of justice and considers justice always to be a step or more ahead. Above all, it is a society that reacts angrily to any case of injustice and promptly sets about correcting it." It is precisely such a collective spirit informing a resurgent politics within the Black Lives Matter movement and other movements -- a politics that is being rewritten in the discourse of critique and hope, emancipation and transformation. Once again, the left has a future and the future has a left. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/38044-america-s-war-on-youth-from-schools-to-debtors-prisons>

The Grandma Suing a Utah Prison Over Her Teenage Grandson's Suicide by Sirin Kale Oct 24 2016 2:11 PM Brock Tucker (left). Photo courtesy of Janet Crane Janet Crane alleges her intellectually disabled grandson spent most of his life being bullied, beaten and abused in various Utah facilities. Now she's fighting for justice. Before he hanged himself at age 19, Brock Tucker had experienced a life marked by instability and tragedy. As a toddler, Tucker was left brain damaged after a near fatal drowning accident. After an adolescence shunted between institutions ill-equipped to deal with his complex needs, he ended up in a federal penitentiary. According to the civil complaint filed by his grandmother, Janet Crane, Tucker was just five foot six and weighed 140 pounds when he was sent to the Central Utah Correctional Facility for auto theft and related charges at the age of 17. He resembled a child in both outlook and appearance: He had an IQ of only 70 and was highly impressionable, according to his neuropsychologist. Despite this, Tucker did have something going for him: A grandma who loved him tenaciously. Entering the Central Utah Correctional Facility (or Gunnison, as it is colloquially known), Tucker intended to use his time productively by studying for his high school diploma. Crane claims that she was not allowed to see Tucker once in his two years at Gunnison. Denied all visitation privileges, Tucker spent more than 154 days in solitary isolation. Court filings document how he spent his time: He tattooed himself; he converted to Hinduism; he contracted hepatitis. His mental condition deteriorated, and he was diagnosed in prison with unspecified psychosis and major depressive disorder. The complaint states that sometime in the afternoon of October 2, 2014—two months before he was due for parole—Tucker put a towel over his cell door's window and hung himself from his top bunk bed. He'd recently received a letter from Central Utah Academy informing him he'd be graduating high school. "Brock's siblings and I, we'll never be the same," Crane says over Skype. "It's with us every day. Someone will make a comment or I'll see a picture, and the memory of his youth will go through my mind." Her voice cracks. "He never even had a life." Now the 69-year-old is filing suit against the individuals and state agencies she believed failed her grandson. Read more: Here's Who Profits Off of Mass Incarceration After Private Prisons Close When Tucker was 12 years old, he began getting into trouble with the law, mostly for stealing cars: He'd recently moved with Crane and his two siblings to a deprived neighborhood. His grandma argues that Tucker was physically coerced into joining a gang, and that—as a result of the impulse control disorder resulting from his brain injury—he was impressionable and easily influenced. According to court filings, Tucker was in and out of juvenile institutions from the age of 13 after Utah's Division of Child and Family Services was awarded custody over him. Crane alleges that his time in two juvenile facilities in particular was characterized by repeated abuse. In 2008, he was sent to Futures Through Choice, a nonprofit that incarcerates juveniles on behalf of the state of Utah. Crane alleges that Tucker was physically assaulted by a staff member while in the care of Futures Through Choice. "One of the staff members repeatedly lifted Brock up," Crane's complaint reads, "and squeezed him until he could not breathe, then released Brock long enough to catch his breath." During the assault, the same staff member told Brock he was going to make him "cry like a bitch." According to Crane's court filings, the assault was substantiated by Utah's Child Protection Ombudsman. Brock with his nephews. Photo courtesy of Janet Crane. A 14-year-old Tucker later ran away from the facility. "He was on the run for almost a month," says Crane, bitterly. "This mentally challenged boy, running the streets. He was so hungry, and he slept behind trash bins. It was cold." In May 2009, Tucker found himself at Provo Canyon School, a for-profit facility run by Pennsylvania-based corporation Universal Health Services. For most of the preceding year, Crane alleges that Tucker received no mental health treatment. Throughout Tucker's life, doctors and psychologists gave him different, and at times conflicting, diagnoses and treatment. After Tucker began exhibiting behavioral problems in early adolescence, Crane took him to Dr. David Nilsson, a neuropsychologist. "Truth is, I don't think anyone including Dr. Nilsson could ever give Brock a definitive diagnosis. He didn't quite fit this; he didn't quite fit that," Crane says. After tests, Dr. Nilsson ascertained that Tucker had an impulse control disorder, low IQ, and brain damage. According to Crane's civil complaint, Dr. Nilsson advised courts that a traditional reward/punishment system would exacerbate Tucker's illness, mandating a neurofeedback program instead. One time we went to see him and he could hardly talk and was shaking. Ostensibly, Provo Canyon should have been able to deal with Tucker's health needs—the school offered a neurofeedback program—but Crane alleges that this was not the case. "It was horrific. They would just randomly put him on different drugs. One time we went to see him and he could hardly talk and was shaking," Crane says. She also claims that Provo Canyon school staff physically abused Tucker repeatedly. On one occasion, Tucker was allegedly knocked unconscious after having his head repeatedly beaten into concrete by a staff member. The Child Protection Ombudsman again confirmed the assault allegation, but no protective action was taken. After two months at Provo Canyon, Crane alleges that Tucker attempted suicide for the first time. Between 2009 to 2011, Crane says that Tucker bounced between institutions and became involved in gang activity. In March 2012, Tucker found himself in a familiar place: a courtroom. This time, he was being tried as an adult for auto theft and related charges. Despite Dr. Nilsson's warning—reported in the civil complaint—to the court that a federal penitentiary would "break him" in August he was sentenced to a two to five year sentence in Utah State Prison. It's clear that Crane is haunted by her failure to save her grandson. "They never even gave him a chance," she says tearfully. Repeatedly, she tells me she "fought" for Tucker: But over time, he lost hope. "We walked outside [from one courtroom appearance] and Brock had tears in his eyes. He rarely cried. And he just said, 'Grandma, it doesn't do any good, no matter how hard I try. It doesn't matter. I give up.'" After serving just over two years in prison, Tucker hanged himself. For More Stories Like This, Sign Up for Our Newsletter Utah's suicide rate is consistently higher than the national average. No one is quite sure why, and explanations range from the Midwest's cultural history of self-reliance, high rates of gun ownership, or even lower oxygen levels on account of the altitude. What's certain is that Utahns are dying in their thousands, and many of them are young people. In 2014—the year Tucker killed himself—suicide was the leading cause of death for Utahns aged 10 to 17. The number of teenagers killing themselves has tripled in the last ten years. The World Health Organization identifies the following as indicators that someone might be at risk of committing suicide: A history of suicide attempts, mental illness, being incarcerated, and being a male aged 15-49. Tucker matches all these criteria. Crane directly blames the authorities at Gunnison for Tucker's death. "You're mentally ill, they've got you in solitary confinement and they're prescribing you drugs..." She tails off. "I mean, I have it in writing from Dr. Nilsson to the court, 'If you put this kid in prison he will wind up getting killed or will commit suicide.'" Despite this, Crane's court complaint states that the Utah prison system opted to keep Tucker in isolation for more than 154 days of the last year of his life. Crane alleges that Brock was alone in a cell and allowed out for at most an hour a day. He couldn't make phone calls, watch TV, receive visitors, exercise, or use the library. He couldn't even write letters, as his commissary privileges had been revoked—meaning that he was unable to purchase writing materials. No pens, no TV, no radios or books. How long is it going to take you to go crazy? "Imagine going into your bathroom," Crane asks me over Skype. "Maybe your bathroom is even bigger than Brock's cell. Now lock the door and have no contact with another human being. No pens, no TV, no radios or books. How long is it going to take you to go crazy?" Having worked variously as a nurse and paralegal throughout her career, Crane has many unanswered questions about Tucker's death. She recounts being told by medical workers after Tucker's death that he bled heavily in the emergency room. But if Tucker hung himself, why was there so much blood? "I went to the hospital where he was taken and they told me they couldn't resuscitate him because of all the blood. They just kept pumping up blood,"

Crane explains tearfully. "I'm like, Where did all the blood come from? You don't bleed when you hang yourself. No one can answer these questions for me." Janet Conway is from the Salt Lake City law firm that's taken on Crane's case. It's a huge case, involving ten separate suits against a mixture of institutions and individuals on the basis of federal and state laws. Crane is suing the Utah Department of Corrections, Futures through Choice, and Universal Health Services (which owns and operates Provo Canyon school). All were contacted by Broadly and declined or ignored requests for comment. She's also suing individuals who worked at Central Utah Correctional Facility and senior staff at Utah's child protection agencies, including the Division of Children and Family Services and Juvenile Justice Services. Conway tells me that were it not for Crane's scrupulous note-taking—a product of her career as a nurse and paralegal—the case wouldn't stand a shot. "Prisons have become the warehouses for the mentally ill, because we're not giving them proper support," Conway tells me over the phone. She says that the authorities repeatedly failed to give Tucker basic medical care, even after he was diagnosed with mental illness. It is estimated that 80,000 to 100,000 inmates are currently being held in solitary confinement in the USA, many of whom have serious mental illnesses. This form of imprisonment is known to devastate those with mental illness and exacerbate their condition. Given the circumstances of Tucker's confinement, Dr. Nilsson's warning that Tucker would attempt suicide didn't look like medical conjecture—it looks like a prediction. Crane tells me repeatedly throughout the course of our Skype that she's not doing this for the money—this is about change. "Children are dying across the USA in these for-profit programs," Crane argues. "I want all for-profit residential facilities for children abolished. I don't want any state to put a child in a for-profit program, because there are no safeguards, none." She stresses the last word. "And I want solitary confinement completely abolished. It's barbaric." I have to believe this is Brock's purpose in life. To change the world for the better. Although Conway's hopes are couched in stoic legalese, her ambitions are equally impassioned. "I'm going to fight the good fight, otherwise things will never change," she argues. "This is how we treat our mentally ill. It's got to stop. These entities are big businesses, and the only thing that gets their attention is a public embarrassment or a hit to their pocket book. That's what this case is about." Crane and Conway are taking on organizations with enormous legal resources—Universal Health Services, for example, is a Fortune 500 company. CEO Alan B. Miller is a leading figure in the healthcare industry, and has won prestigious awards. Conway estimates the civil suit will take between three and five years, and it's possible they won't win: The deck is stacked against them. "It's a little like Erin Brockovich," I comment unthinkingly. Conway laughs. "Yes, that's exactly what it's like. It is like Erin Brockovich." Foster Parent Pleads Guilty to 5 Child Sex Charges - Story Foster Parent Pleads Guilty to 5 Child Sex Charges Published 10/25 2016 03:37PM Updated 10/25 2016 03:37PM Clarence Garretson, 65/Copyright 2016 Nexstar Broadcasting, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. FORT SMITH, Ark. – A Van Buren man pleaded guilty in court Tuesday morning to five counts of Interstate Transportation of a Minor with Intent to Engage in Criminal Sexual Activity, his attorney announced. Clarence C. Garretson, 65, appeared with his attorney before the U.S. District Court in Fort Smith. The FBI began their investigation in May 2016, when the first minor came forward. Minor #1: The first minor girl said that she had been raped by Garretson when he took her on a multi-state trip two years ago in 2014. Garretson was an over-the-road truck driver for C & T Trucking company in Van Buren, and he had requested and received a "rider waiver" from the trucking company so that the minor could accompany him on the trip. The girl was ten-years-old at the time of the incident and Garretson was 63. Garretson stipulated and agreed in the plea agreement that he transported the girl in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with her, and the sexual activity he engaged in with her was Rape, a Class Y felony. During the course of the investigation, it was learned that in 1998 Garretson and his wife were approved by the Arkansas Department of Human Services (DHS) to operate a foster home and later to become an adoptive home. The FBI Special Agent learned that DHS had received a report in 2002 from a foster child, living in Garretson's home at that time, that she had been sexually assaulted by him. Based on that information, the agent began locating individuals who had been in foster care at the Garretson residence. Minor #2: The second minor girl was interviewed in June 2016. This minor was a foster child in the home from 2000 to 2004. She said Garretson had taken her on over-the-road truck trips when she was his foster child. Garretson stipulated and agreed that he transported the minor in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with her, and that the sexual activity he engaged in with her was Violation of a Minor in the First Degree, a Class C felony. At the time of the offense, she was between 13-18 years old, and the conduct engaged in was sexual intercourse. Garretson stipulated and agreed that the second minor was a foster child in his care, custody, and control when he transported her in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with her. Minor #3: In 1999, DHS placed the third minor and his two older sisters in the Garretson home, and the third minor was legally adopted by them in 2001. This minor was interviewed by the FBI Special Agent in July 2016 and disclosed that Garretson had taken him on long distance truck trips starting in the summer of 2001 when he was 11 years old and that he had sexually assaulted him on multiple trips during summer vacation from school in 2002 and 2003. Garretson stipulated and agreed that he transported the minor in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with him, that the sexual activity he engaged in with him was Rape, a Class Y felony. Garretson stipulated and agreed that the minor was in his care, custody and control when he transported him in interstate commerce with intent to engage in sexual activity with him. Minor #4: In 1999, DHS placed the fourth minor and her two siblings in the Garretson home and she remained there until 2004. She was interviewed by the FBI Special Agent in July 2016 and disclosed that she was sexually assaulted by Garretson on an over-the-road trip to California during the summer of 2000 when she was 13 years old. Garretson stipulated and agreed that he transported the minor in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with her, that the sexual activity he engaged in with her was Rape, a Class Y felony, and that the girl was in his care, custody, and control when he transported her in interstate commerce with intent to engage in sexual activity with her. Minor #5: This fifth minor was born in 1993, and was interviewed by the FBI Special Agent in September 2016. She stated that Garretson transported her and her siblings between Arkansas and California as a favor to her family since their parents lived in different states. She disclosed that in 2002, when she was 9 years old, Garretson had her sleep nude or partially nude in the bed with him inside the truck and engage in sexual activity with her. Garretson stipulated and agreed that he transported the girl in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with her, and that the sexual activity he engaged in with her was Rape, a Class Y felony. He stipulated and agreed that the girl was in his care, custody and control when he transported her in interstate commerce with the intent to engage in sexual activity with her. The aftermath: Garretson was charged in a superseding indictment by a federal grand jury on October 4, 2016. Sentencing will be held at a later date. The maximum penalty for count one of the superseding indictment is a maximum term of imprisonment for Life; a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment for 10 years; a maximum fine of $250,000; both imprisonment and fine. The maximum penalty for counts two, four, eight, and eleven are a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years per count; a maximum fine of $250,000 per count; both imprisonment and fine. The defendant's sentence will be determined by the court after review of factors unique to this case, including the defendant's prior criminal record (if any), the defendant's role in the offense, and the characteristics of the violations. "Today's guilty plea sends a clear cut message to those who want to take advantage of our children. We will find you and you will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," stated Diane Upchurch, Special Agent in Charge at the FBI in Little Rock. "Garretson's actions are horrifying and the FBI and the United States Attorney's Office will work doggedly to put these predators behind bars. I commend the FBI personnel and the USAO in their efforts to bring justice to these young people." This case was investigated by the FBI and assisted by the Van Buren Police Department. State shuts down Philly program after teen's death in fight with staff Updated: October 25, 2016 — 1:08 AM EDT 162Share Tweet Tumblr Email Comment REPRINTS The Wordsworth Academy's residential treatment program for troubled youths in West Philadelphia is ordered to be closed. by Chris Palmer, Staff Writer Chris Palmer Staff Writer Pennsylvania officials on Monday ordered the closure of Wordsworth Academy's residential treatment program for troubled youths in West Philadelphia, less than two weeks after a teenager died in a fight with staff. Kait Gillis, spokeswoman for the Department of Human Services, said the agency "issued an order for revocation of [Wordsworth's] license and emergency closure." She said department officials would be on site every day until all 83 residents are relocated. Debbie Albert, Wordsworth spokeswoman, said the process could take weeks. Launched in 2006, Wordsworth's residential program - just one aspect of the company's services - treats young people ages 10 to 21 who have emotional, behavioral, or academic difficulties, Albert said. In the Oct. 13 incident, a 17-year-old boy died after staff members tried to restrain him, according to police. The teen had barricaded himself inside a room, and had broken furniture and fixtures, police said. When staff members entered, the teen began "yelling and striking" them, police said. Staff members - whom police did not identify - tried to "gain control" of the boy but he lost consciousness, police said. Medics pronounced the boy dead at 9:36 p.m. Police have not identified him or said where he was from. No charges have been filed in the incident, and the Medical Examiner's Office said Monday afternoon that the cause of the teen's death had not been determined. The Philadelphia Defenders Association had been planning to ask a Family Court judge during special hearings this week to move or transfer all of its juvenile clients from the program. Keir Bradford-Grey, the association's chief defender, said her office was concerned about the safety of the approximately 30 young people it represents at the facility, each of whom was sent there by a judge for treatment after an arrest or due to family issues such as neglect or abuse. "One kid dying in a placement [facility] with staff not being trained well enough to handle issues involving youth is enough for us," Bradford-Grey said Monday. "To me, that place is not equipped to handle youth that need redirection in their life." Martin O'Rourke, spokesman for the First Judicial District, said those hearings would continue and would help determine where the affected youths would be sent. The courts had called for the hearings prior to the state's action, to determine whether children should remain at Wordsworth, O'Rourke said. Lisa Campbell, assistant chief of the defender association's juvenile unit, said the association had made similar requests for mass transfers in the past. In 2007, for example, it requested that youths be removed from the Chad Youth Enhancement Center near Nashville after a Philadelphia youth, Omega Leach, was strangled there by a staff member. Albert, the Wordsworth spokeswoman, said the rest of Wordsworth's services - which include special education schools, individual and family therapy, and foster care - would continue to operate. The residential treatment facility is at 3905 Ford Rd. in the River Park section. It is one of three Wordsworth campuses in the region, according to the school's website. cpalmer@phillynews.com 215-854-2817 @cs_palmer Source: http://www.philly.com/philly/news/20161025_State_shuts_down_W_Phillly_program_after_teen_s_death_in_fight_with_staff.html

Ex-Beacon Light employee accused of having relationship with student By RUTH BOGDAN Era Reporter r.bogdan@bradfordera.com Updated Oct 26, 2016 An ex-employee at Beacon Light Behavioral Health Systems has been criminally charged on allegations he had a romantic relationship with a student who lived there. Brian Malachi McLaughlin, 29, of 431 W. Washington St., Bradford, was not on duty Monday night, when the allegations took place, according to John Policastro, director of corporate Communications, Journey Health System & Beacon Light Behavioral Health System. Court records said on Monday night, Bradford City Police responded to a report that two juveniles females ran away from the Beacon Light shelter at 8 School St. It was one of these two girls — a 16-year-old — that McLaughlin was allegedly developing a relationship with. As Policastro explained, "Beacon Light maintains multiple group homes for children throughout the Bradford community. These homes treat children with various behavioral health challenges when they have been removed from their families by the court system or their home county. Beacon Light employs staff 24/7 in these homes, in therapeutic, night watch and direct care roles." Regarding the search, "the staff on duty followed policy in notifying both Beacon Light management as well as the local police," Policastro stated. "Within a few hours, both clients were located and safely returned to the group home. Our processes that are in place for when a client is absent from a facility were then followed," he noted. Policastro indicated that employees learned one of the juveniles who ran away may have had contact with an employee when she left the group home. McLaughlin does not normally work at the home where the girl was living, Policastro said. Bradford City Police contacted Bradford Township Police when they learned one girl may have formed a relationship with a male employee who lives in Bradford Township, court records said. Bradford Township Police went to McLaughlin's home, but McLaughlin was not there. He was asked by telephone to return home to talk to police about the missing teen. Court records said the teen told police she left 8 School St. and went to the home of another juvenile who lived nearby. They walked to McDonald's, where the teen met with McLaughlin and went with him in his car. McLaughlin and the teen had discussed her running away before she did it, court records stated. The pair drove around for awhile, then parked at the McDowell Sports Center Fieldhouse parking lot on Campus Drive; they moved to the back seat and were kissing when he received the phone call from his father informing him the police wanted to talk to him, court records stated. He dropped her off in Bradford City and drove home. McLaughlin is no longer employed at Beacon Light. Policastro stated, "According to policy, when the accusations were made against an employee, the staff member in question was immediately suspended. Given the nature of the charges and subsequent arrest, the individual's employment was terminated." In his statement, Policastro described the training Beacon Light staff members undergo, as well as the policies in place to keep group home residents safe. He explained, "We are confident that the group home staff followed policy and protocol during the initial runaway incident, but are deeply disturbed to learn of the charges filed against an off-duty staff member. We will continue to cooperate fully with the investigation and have a zero tolerance policy against any staff/client interactions insinuated in the charges. "We utilize multiple levels of supervision, policy, training and accountability in our staff, and want to stress that these criminal allegations were made to an individual not on duty at the agency at the time the incident occurred. We have treated and helped thousands of children with mental illness diagnoses in our group homes over the years and take every accusation against staff seriously. We employ nearly 600 people in our clinical companies, each of whom undergo extensive background checks prior to employment, and every two years after, along with undergoing dozens of hours of training each year. We take the safety and treatment of our clients with the utmost seriousness and will continue to work with local law enforcement and other oversight agencies in the ongoing investigation." McLaughlin was arraigned early Tuesday morning before Magisterial District Judge Dominic Cercone on charges of interference with custody of children, a second-degree felony; institutional sexual assault, corruption of minors and unlawful contact with a minor, all second-degree felonies, court records stated. He was committed to McKean County Jail in Smethport in lieu of 10 percent of $25,000 bail. He is scheduled to appear in Central Court on Nov. 3. In wake of teen's death, Council to hold hearings on facilities for troubled youth Updated: October 28, 2016 — 1:09 AM EDT The exterior view of Wordsworth Academy in West Philly. by Tricia L. Nadolny, Staff Writer Tricia L. Nadolny Staff Writer Three days after the state ordered a West Philadelphia residential treatment facility to close its doors following the death of a 17-year-old patient, City Council voted Thursday to hold hearings on that facility and others that care for troubled youth. "The question becomes: There were 80 kids there. What happens to them?" said Councilman Curtis Jones Jr., who visited Wordsworth Academy last year. The facility cared for youths with emotional, behavioral, or academic difficulties. It was closed after the Oct. 13 death of a teen who, state documents allege, stopped breathing when staff members restrained his legs and punched his rib cage. The reports describe hazardous living conditions, including broken heating and air-conditioning units, holes in walls, and rusted bathroom facilities. The documents also allege that staff members were not properly trained in restraining children. Jones, whose district includes Wordsworth and who called for the hearing, said he visited the facility after developing concerns about the private Community Umbrella Agencies (CUAs) that the city's Department of Human Services contracts with to manage its cases. Wordsworth, which operates the residential facility as well as other programs, is one of those CUAs. Jones said his visit did not raise any red flags. "It was clean. The young people there seemed, on the surface, well taken care of," he said. "But that's when I was there." He said that if there were problems, he wished the facility had been open about them. "What concerns me is, that kid never gets a do-over," Jones said. In other business at Council's weekly meeting Thursday, members voted to hold a hearing on Rebuild, the program expected to launch next year that will pour an estimated $600 million into revitalizing parks, recreation centers, and libraries. Specifically, members are focused on ensuring those projects will be staffed with a diverse workforce. Though some on Council have long voiced concerns about a lack of diversity on city-funded projects, in particular those contracted to unions, Rebuild seems to be stimulating the discussions. "I want to make sure those individual projects are diverse and inclusive," said Councilman Kenyatta Johnson, who called for the hearing. "When people in the neighborhoods see we're doing ribbon cuttings and I'm asked the question, 'How can people from the neighborhood work on these particular projects?' ... we want to make sure there's a strategic plan." Lauren Hitt, Mayor Kenney's spokeswoman, said in a statement that the mayor's office is working on an agreement with the building trades that would help increase diversity in the construction industry. She said Rebuild staff members are also working to better understand the challenges facing minority- and women-owned businesses, which also create barriers that keep construction managers, contractors, and unions from reaching diversity goals. "We concur with Council that diversity must be a core principle of Rebuild's implementation," Hitt said. In a rare move, Council members on Thursday also asked all Council staff, lobbyists, guests, and media to leave the caucus room so the group could discuss a matter in executive session. The members emerged after about 15 minutes. Council President Darrell L. Clarke declined to say what was discussed other than an "administrative" matter. Sources later said the group talked about the increasing number of honorary resolutions, which eat up time during each week's Council session, being introduced by members. Without discussing the topic, Clarke insisted the meeting was not in violation of the state Sunshine Act, which limits when public bodies can meet in private, because the group was not discussing legislation. Jane Roh, his spokeswoman, did acknowledge that Clarke failed to properly announce the executive session before it took place, as required by law. She said he did announce it, but so quietly that many people apparently did not hear him. "President Clarke recognizes that he should have announced more clearly and loudly that City Council was going into executive session to discuss an administrative matter," Roh said. "He regrets the error." lnadolny@phillynews.com 215-854-2730 Source: http://www.philly.com/philly/news/politics/20161028_In_wake_of_teen_s_death_Council_to_hold_hearings_on_facilities_for_troubled_youth.html

Treatment center president charged with DUI after crash Another employee of center faces drug possession charges Updated: 6:34 PM EDT Oct 27, 2016 Kristen Carosa News Reporter LEBANON, N.H. — The president of a residential treatment center in Plymouth has been put on a leave after he was charged with driving under the influence after a crash Wednesday morning. Advertisement Police said Jeffery Caron, 48, was arrested after he crashed into a utility pole in Lebanon. His passenger, Kellen Fitzgibbon-Bizel, 31, who is also an employee of the center, was also arrested. Police said he had prescription drugs that were not prescribed to him. "A single vehicle drove into a telephone pole on Dartmouth College Highway," Chief Richard Mello said. "Two occupants were in the vehicle. Both sustained injuries that were not life-threatening." A witness captured the crash on cellphone video. "Showing that it was traveling over the double yellow line," Mello said. "It nearly had a head-on collision a few moments before the actual accident, and then the video shows the vehicle trailing off to the right side of the road and then eventually striking and taking down a telephone pole." Caron was arrested at a hospital and charged with misdemeanor reckless driving and driving under the influence. Fitzgibbon-Bizel is facing five felony counts of possession of a controlled drug. Both men work for Mount Prospect Academy in Plymouth, an all-boys residential treatment center. Officials there said that the men been put on leaves of absence. According to staff members, Caron is the organization's president and Fitzgibbon-Bizel is the director of facilities. The organization said it's reviewing the incident, but wouldn't comment further. "Certainly given the rush-hour commuter traffic, school traffic on a school day, there are a lot of things that could have happened, and we are fortunate that this wasn't a lot worse," Mello said. The men were released after posting $10,000 bail. They are scheduled to be back in court in January. Montco Child Care Agency Must Pay $5.35 Million in Child Sex Abuse Case After being sexually abused in her foster home, a 7-year-old girl was returned to the same home just months later, and was abused again. By Justin Heinze \(Patch Staff\) - October 28, 2016 3:21 pm ET A Montgomery County foster care agency must pay $5.35 million in damages for repeatedly placing a young girl in a foster home where she was sexually assaulted, according to litigators. Lawyers with Kline and Specter P.C. said that Presbyterian Children's Village, based in twice placed the child, who was 7 years old at the time, in the home of Walter and Deborah Scott, where she was sexually abused. Walter Scott, now 61, later pleaded guilty to sexually assaulting three different children in his care. A Philadelphia jury ruled in a civil trial Friday that Presbyterian must pay $5 million in compensatory damages and $350,000 in punitive damages to the victim for placing her in that situation. "This verdict is a message that child safety must be protected," said Nadeem Bezar, who tried the plaintiff's case with Emily Marks, both attorneys with Kline & Specter PC of Philadelphia. "This is a message from the jury to PCV and all foster care agencies that they must be diligent." In November 2012, the child was placed in the care of Deborah and Walter Scott for three days, litigators said. When she was moved to a new foster home, she reported the abuse to her new foster mother. Despite knowing about the report, Presbyterian continued to place children with the Scotts, even after hearing another child make the same allegations, according to the suit. They then placed the original child with the Scotts for a second time in late February of 2013. The child reported abuse for a second time, and officials soon were able to identify two more victims. Camera Catches Shoving Match with Group Home Worker Before Teenager's Heart Stopped A video shows a healthy 15-year-old going into her bedroom at a for-profit AdvoServ facility. Thirty-two minutes later, she had no pulse. Nobody's saying what happened. by Heather Vogel ProPublica, Nov. 2, 2016, 8 a.m. 3 Comments Print Print This is part of an ongoing investigation Restraints Do you know a child who has been forcibly restrained or secluded at school? Help us investigate by sharing your story. As she waited in a Delaware hospital for her daughter to die, Carla Thomas watched a silent video of the teenager's last conscious hour. The video showed Janaia Barnhart, 15, bouncing down the stairs of the group home where she lived, Thomas said. The girl from Hyattsville, Maryland, had mental illness and threw tantrums, but on that September morning her expression suggested the mischievous laugh her mom knew well. Ahead of her carrying a black garbage bag was an employee of AdvoServ, the for-profit company that owned the home. The worker stepped toward the bedroom where the girl kept her most prized possessions — her MP3 player, movies, magic markers, karaoke machine. Seeing Janaia coming, the worker threw back an arm, shoving her hard against the hallway wall. Janaia, who was 5 feet, 6 inches tall and 227 pounds, shoved back. Both disappeared into the room, which was just big enough for a twin bed and dresser. Four more workers rushed in behind them. Thirty-two minutes later, according to Thomas, paramedics arrived to find Janaia on the floor, naked, with no pulse. Since then, Thomas has buried and mourned her daughter. But she has no idea what happened in those 32 minutes. "I still don't have an inkling, nothing," Thomas said in an exclusive interview with ProPublica. Janaia's death represents another setback for AdvoServ, part of a growing, government-funded industry that provides housing and care nationwide for hundreds of thousands of people with developmental or intellectual disabilities. Both Maryland and Delaware had already sanctioned the company, which is besieged with complaints about its treatment of a vulnerable population and the conditions of its homes. Thomas's questions about her daughter's death have only multiplied since AdvoServ chief executive Michael Martin played the video for her on his laptop. The footage didn't show the inside of Janaia's bedroom. And during four crucial minutes, a worker opened a closet door and blocked the view of the room's entranceway. A photo of Janaia Barnhart, from a pamphlet handed out at her funeral. (Courtesy of Julia Arfaa) Staff at AdvoServ gave Thomas conflicting stories, acknowledging workers pinned Janaia down in her bedroom but never explaining why she lost consciousness. Doctors at the hospital told Thomas they did not know why the otherwise physically healthy teenager's heart had stopped. Thomas and her lawyer, Julia Arfaa, say that Delaware officials have stymied their efforts to secure basic information. The state attorney general's office told Arfaa that, while a police investigation was ongoing, it would not allow release of a recording of workers' call to 911. "Releasing the 911 tape at this time could potentially jeopardize the investigation, because the call contains potentially sensitive information," said Carl Kanefsky, spokesman for the attorney general's office. The office will decide whether to file criminal charges after law enforcement agencies have finished their investigations, he said. A Delaware medical examiner refused Arfaa's request for initial autopsy findings. Last week, a spokeswoman for the medical examiner said it has not completed the autopsy and will notify Janaia's family when it does. Delaware state police won't elaborate on the circumstances of the girl's death or even release her name. "We're blocked," Arfaa said. Through a spokesman, AdvoServ declined to discuss what happened to Janaia. The company, which specializes in clients with behavior challenges, said in a statement at the time of her death that its employees were "heartbroken" over her loss. One worker who was in the home that day, Tosha Skinner, told ProPublica in a brief interview that Janaia was subjected to a "wrap-up behavior" intervention shortly before she stopped breathing. Skinner was present but didn't participate, she said. It's not clear what Skinner meant by "wrap-up behavior." For years, AdvoServ has used "wrap mats" which resemble full-body straitjackets, on some of its clients. Critics say such mechanical restraints traumatize patients, and most residential programs no longer use them. Delaware bans such tactics in most cases, and Maryland officials have instructed AdvoServ for years not to mechanically restrain children or teens. An AdvoServ spokesman said last week that no "wrap up" procedure involving mechanical restraints was used on Janaia that day. There were no wrap mats in the house, he said. For Thomas, the timing of her daughter's death magnified the pain. The day after the incident, a Maryland official called to say the state had found Janaia a new home — something Thomas had been pushing for. Maryland began removing its 31 students from AdvoServ homes after an unannounced inspection in August found holes in walls, ripped mattresses, dirty kitchens, and broken furniture. One bedroom reeked of urine. A bathroom lacked hot water. Maryland's contract with the company ended Monday. Janaia's death adds to the tragic toll of the privately run residential programs, tucked away in neighborhoods across the country, that have largely replaced state institutions for the profoundly disabled and mentally ill. A ProPublica review last December found that at least 145 kids have died from avoidable causes in residential facilities over 35 years. At least 62 died after being restrained. In the last five years or so, however, as most group home providers adopted less hands-on methods for handling conflicts, restraint-related deaths became exceedingly rare — with news articles reporting only one or none a year. Owned by a private equity firm, Delaware-based AdvoServ reported last year that it cared for about 700 children and adults in that state, Florida, and New Jersey, and was expanding into Virginia. It had about 60 people age 21 or younger in Delaware programs. Delaware put AdvoServ on probation in March, and increased visits by state workers to company facilities. A lawsuit pending against AdvoServ in state court in Delaware alleges a teenage boy from Maryland was left unsupervised and raped repeatedly by other clients during more than four years in the company's homes. Workers dislocated a vertebra in the boy's neck while restraining him, according to his family. AdvoServ has grown in the past two decades despite a stream of complaints of abuse and neglect. As far back as the 1990s, the state of New York removed its children from AdvoServ's predecessor, Au Clair, because its inspectors had found children living in trailers that smelled of urine and feces. Officials elsewhere have repeatedly backed off from disciplining the company, which is aided by well-connected lobbyists that include prominent former state legislators. The company in recent years successfully lobbied against a Congressional bill that would have limited the use of restraints in schools. Janaia was not the first teenager to die under AdvoServ's care. In 1997, a 14-year-old autistic boy with epilepsy was found dead in his bed at the company's Florida facility with low levels of anti-seizure medicine in his blood. In 2013, a 14-year-old autistic girl died at the same Florida complex after a night in which she was restrained — at times fastened to a bed and chair—while she vomited repeatedly. In that case, video of the girl's final hours was accidentally deleted, AdvoServ officials said. Thomas, a certified medical assistant for the elderly who lives in a Maryland suburb, has learned more about the company's problematic track record since her daughter's death. "If I knew it was that bad, I would have signed her out," Thomas said. Born in Washington, D.C., Janaia was diagnosed in first grade as bipolar and schizophrenic, with attention deficit disorder. She was hospitalized more than 20 times when she became a danger to herself or others, and lived in residential treatment centers in Maine, Tennessee and Maryland. At one facility about five years ago, Thomas said, a worker put Janaia in a chokehold and dragged her across the floor. Janaia sometimes attended schools, but they struggled to deal with her disorders. For all her troubles, Janaia had playful moods when she teased others and played pranks. She earned A's in classes, when she tried. She loved Michael Jackson, animals, dancing and flowers. She was affectionate — a "hugger" — and needed to be reminded sometimes not to invade people's personal space. She had no serious medical problems, having outgrown childhood symptoms of asthma. Her family called her "Nae Nae." "She had her moments," her mother said, "but she was very lovable." In recent years, too, Thomas was pleased that her daughter was learning to recognize that her temper was about to flare. Janaia would let her mother know that she needed help. "It's like a teakettle when you boil it," Thomas said. "She knew when she was ready to explode." Janaia's mother, stepfather, brother and two sisters had started taking her out more, even bringing her with them on a skiing vacation last winter. Though AdvoServ bills itself as a last resort, Thomas said it was a less restrictive setting than earlier placements. She said the state sent Janaia there three years ago largely because AdvoServ offered schooling. Janaia Barnhart was living in this home on a quiet country road southwest of Wilmington when the incident occurred. (Heather Vogell/ProPublica) At AdvoServ, Janaia lived with other girls in a modest ranch home with white siding and maroon shutters on a quiet country road southwest of Wilmington, just a half-mile from the historic mansion where AdvoServ's founder first opened a boarding school for autistic children in 1969. On a typical day, the home and its basketball court out back bustled with activity, as workers came and went and buses ferried the girls in the white house and an adjacent brick one to school. Sometimes, girls burst out of the homes and ran into the neighborhood, according to a local resident. Workers would chase them and often restrain them. Onlookers watched with unease, hoping no one would get hurt. "When I see that going on, I do try to keep my eyes on them," one said. Thomas visited her daughter once a month, bringing electronics, music, supplies for arts and crafts, and foods, such as canned ravioli and instant oatmeal, that her daughter preferred over what AdvoServ provided. Sometimes, they'd stay in a hotel for the weekend and get her hair done, or go clothes shopping. This summer, Thomas worried that Janaia was backsliding. Other girls in the home were bullying her, Thomas said. During a fight with two of them, Janaia had grabbed a plastic fork and stabbed one in the ear. Police viewed Janaia as the aggressor and arrested her, her mother said. AdvoServ responded by having Janaia spend time after school in an adult home, instead of the youth home where she slept. Thomas wanted the state to find her daughter a new facility. The mother worried Janaia wasn't supervised well enough and feared the consequences if she tangled with other girls again. Thomas didn't like the adult language and behavior Janaia was picking up from the older clients. On the doorstep of her brick row house in Wilmington last week, Skinner — the AdvoServ employee — said she saw Janaia every day at the group home. "Janaia was my baby," she said. "She was my child, every single day. This is crazy." After Skinner cited the "wrap-up behavior" used on Janaia, she was asked to explain what the term meant. She said she had "nothing to hide" but didn't know if she was allowed to talk to a reporter. After calling a supervisor, who advised her not to speak, she went inside her house and closed the door. Attempts to reach other workers involved were unsuccessful. On Monday September 12, Thomas was driving to work in Washington, D.C., when her cell phonerang. An AdvoServ staff member told her that when two workers went to Janaia's room to help her dress, the girl had lost control of her bladder and bowels and passed out. Workers had called 911 and Janaia had gone into cardiac arrest. Thomas turned her car around, picked up Janaia's older sister and drove frantically toward Delaware. En route, she learned that her daughter was being moved to the Nemours Alfred I. duPont Hospital for Children in Wilmington. At the hospital, Thomas said she spoke to Janaia's case manager at AdvoServ, who told her a different version of events: Her daughter, the case manager said, had been placed in a hold before becoming unresponsive. She then headed for the intensive care unit, where a phalanx of AdvoServ administrators greeted her at the elevator and expressed their sympathies. A doctor told Thomas that her daughter appeared to be brain-dead, and was on a respirator. For the next two days, Thomas kept vigil at her Janaia's bedside. She didn't leave to shower or rest. Unrestrained While evidence of abuse of the disabled has piled up for decades, one for-profit company has used its deep pockets and influence to bully weak regulators and evade accountability. Read the story. On the second day, a Delaware detective told Thomas he had watched the video and interviewed staff. According to the workers, as recounted by the police officer to Thomas, Janaia had been very aggressive that morning. Family visits were a privilege residents could lose, and workers were considering punishing her by not letting her see her mother that Friday as planned. She became angry. Ordered to clean her room, she attacked the staff member carrying the trash bag and grabbed her hair. The other staff members hurried to pull the girl off the worker, and put her in a hold until she calmed down and was talking to them. They were helping change her out of her soiled clothes. Janaia, who was lying down, asked them to take her glasses and put them on the dresser. She then turned her head to the side and passed out. Workers dialed 911. The workers told police they had done a proper hold with one worker on each arm and leg, and no one pressing on her chest. The detective told Thomas that the workers' stories matched, and that it appeared there was no foul play, she said. Delaware state police declined comment on what the workers told them. Thomas, however, is skeptical. On the video, Janaia did not look angry until the worker shoved her. Thomas said that it would be unusual for her daughter to lose control and then suddenly calm down and start talking. And the bedroom was so small it seemed impossible that the four heavyset women she saw on the video could perform the restraint as they described it to police, Thomas said. "I'm not buying that," she said. Workers were supposed to be trained to defuse such conflicts before they occurred — instead of escalating them, she added. "They're trained to deal with behaviors like this." She pressed AdvoServ officials until Martin showed her the video. He told her specifics such as the exact time when police had left the group home that evening. But he said he didn't know what had happened in the fateful 32 minutes in her daughter's bedroom. "It was amazing," she said. "He had hands-on every single detail, but he can't tell me nothing." Thomas searched for clues as she waited in her daughter's hospital room. She found a fingernail-shaped nick on one of Janaia's fingers and a bruise on a knuckle. There was an unexplained mark in the center of Janaia's chest that looked like a puncture wound. On Wednesday September 14, Janaia's heart stopped. Thomas stayed with the body for five hours. She rubbed her daughter's hair and cut a lock as a keepsake, noticing dried blood in one ear. As the hours ticked past, dark bruises emerged on her daughter's left leg, below the knee. A nurse told her bruises often became more pronounced after death. The white house near the unincorporated community known as Kirkwood was silent on a recent day. A single SUV was parked in the driveway and no one came to the door. Thomas said AdvoServ returned Janaia's clothes, neatly laundered, and other possessions. Among the items was a composition book her daughter kept as a journal. Thomas noticed several sheets had been ripped out. Scrawled on a remaining page was a haunting passage that reminded Thomas how hard her daughter had tried to curb her temper and pay attention to the adults in her life. "I listen to my mom and dad," Janaia wrote, according to Thomas's recollection. "Because if you don't listen, you get hurt."
