Contempt order for Nebraska agency upheld OMAHA, Neb. —The Nebraska Supreme Court has upheld a contempt of court order against the Nebraska Department of Health and Human Services over its handling of a state ward's foster placement. The case involves the removal of a 12-year-old boy from a Norfolk group home where a Douglas County juvenile court had ordered him placed. But a state caseworker last year failed to inform the court, the county attorney or the boy's court-ordered representative of the boy's possible removal from the program over failed contract negotiations with the state. The court found the department and a private child welfare agency with which it had contracted in contempt, and the department appealed, saying the judge violated the separation of powers doctrine. On Friday, the high court disagreed and upheld the contempt order. Source: <http://www.ketv.com/news/contempt-order-for-nebraska-agency-upheld/30501638>

NC must rethink changes in child care subsidies January 2, 2015 2015-01-03T00:12:59Z The News and Observer Facebook Twitter Google Plus More Linkedin Reddit YouTube E-mail Print Order a reprint of this story Stephanie Wells high-fives her grandniece Jazilyn Wells, 5. Wells, Jazilyn's legal guardian for four years, will lose her child care subsidy on Jan. 1. KARA BETTIS — kbettis@newsobserver.com Today's Deal \$40 Worth of Food and Drink! $20.00 Buy Now! Recent Headlines Dwane Powell: The Berger ball of doom 2 hours ago NC should move on Medicaid 2 hours ago Another phase of Hillsborough Street improvements looks good Notable numbers: poverty, flu, alcohol deaths Elected bodies shouldn't need lobbyists Republican lawmakers had a well-intentioned goal when they shifted eligibility standards for child care subsidies. Given the extensive waiting list for the subsidy, lawmakers reduced the family income eligibility for children between 6 and 12 years old so that more children under 6 would receive the aid. The idea was that younger children benefit more from child care than older ones. But with the arrival of the new year, that change is meeting reality, and it's having unfortunate and unanticipated consequences. Perhaps the most dramatic effect was described in a recent report by The News & Observer's Kara Bettis: Many relatives who take in grandchildren or nieces and nephews will earn too much to qualify for a subsidy for after-school care. Those who can't afford the full cost face the prospect of having the child or children put into foster care. Stephanie Wells of Wendell has cared for her 6-year-old niece Jazilyn since the girl was 18 months old. "She's related, and I didn't want to see her go into a foster care home. I wanted to give her a steady place to live," Wells said. But now Wells, a state employee, may not be able to afford Jazilyn's full cost of after-school care, and she's wrestling with the prospect of having to turn her over to the foster care system. "She is like the daughter I never had," she told Bettis, her voice trailing off. "It's really tough." It's also counter-productive. Taxpayers will pay more to have the child in foster care, and her prospects for faring well afterward are diminished. North Carolina, unlike some other states, does not provide kinship support for children staying with relatives. Loss of the after-school subsidy will only increase the burden of trying to keep a relative out of foster care. And there are other problems with the change in eligibility. Rob Thompson of the child advocacy group NC Child said child care centers make money on older children who have fewer needs and lose money on infants and young children. As the change in eligibility pushes the age of enrollees down, child care centers are either closing or refusing to take younger children, Thompson said. The law also changed the measurement of family income to include not only the parent or parents but also the caretaker relative. When, for instance, a working grandmother's income is included, the subsidy is lost. Finally, the new law requires that families pay the full co-pay - 10 percent of family income - rather than a pro-rated share even if the child is going only to after-school care a few days or hours a week. That makes it too expensive for some families that used the service only during certain work shifts or family situations. Lawmakers thought they were getting more help to where it would do the most good when they changed eligibility standards. But the dynamics of real life show that the change may do more harm than good. In the upcoming session, the changes should be brought up for review and testimony taken from caregivers and social workers. The changes can then be reversed or modified. If lawmakers want more children from low-income families to have the benefit of child care, they should look for a way to fund that expansion with federal and state funds. Read more here: http://www.newsobserver.com/2015/01/02/4445704_nc-must-rethink-changes-in-child.html?rh=1#storylink=cpy

School District Administrator Charged With Dog Fighting, Animal Cruelty, Child Abuse By Phyllis M Daugherty, Mon, January 05, 2015 Palmdale School District administrator Pauline Ruth Winbush and her boyfriend Kevin Ray Williams, have been charged with four felony counts of dog fighting, 17 felony counts of cruelty to an animal and one felony count of child abuse, according to Los Angeles County Deputy District Attorney Lyle Riggs. Additionally, the complaint includes seven Los Angeles County code violations, including unsanitary conditions and failing to license and vaccinate the dogs. Winbush was formerly Interim Superintendent of Schools and currently is employed as Assistant Superintendent for Human Resources for Palmdale School District, which is the fourth-largest elementary school district in California, serving 22,000, the Los Angeles Times reports. According to the prosecutor, Los Angeles County Animal Care and Control Officers discovered a horse belonging to Winbush and Williams roaming the streets on Oct. 29. The condition of the animal subsequently led to a search of the couple's Antelope Acres home on November 26, according to Deputy DA Riggs. At that time 19 Pit Bulls were discovered in the house—some with wounds and scars consistent with being used in dog fighting. The dogs were allegedly being kept in crates filled with feces and urine inside the house where Winbush, Williams and a minor child lived, the prosecutor added. The dogs were recovered from the home but were in such poor condition that they had to be euthanized, Riggs said. The couple surrendered to Los Angeles Sheriff's deputies on December 29, and Winbush and Williams were both arrested at approximately 3 p.m., on a warrant issued on December 24, reports the AVTimes. Winbush plead not guilty and has been ordered to return to court on Jan. 12 for a preliminary hearing to determine if there is enough evidence against her for the case to be tried in court. The judge set her bail at $250,000, according to the Los Angeles Times. The prosecution recommended $440,000 bail for Williams, who was scheduled for arraignment the following afternoon. In a statement issued Tuesday, Palmdale Superintendent Raul Maldonado announced that Ms. Winbush had been placed on paid administrative leave on December 1, the first business day after the discovery at her home. "We are deeply troubled by the November 26, 2014 raid on Ms. Winbush's home by local law enforcement officials and her subsequent arrest and arraignment," Maldonado said. He said that the District was also conducting an investigation of the circumstances that gave rise to the actions by local law enforcement and "closely monitoring the criminal proceedings against Ms. Winbush." If convicted of all charges, Winbush, 52, and Williams, 50, face a possible maximum sentence of 13 years each in state prison, according to the AV Times. Sources: The AV Times, LA Times / Photo Credit: Palmdale School District Source: <http://www.opposingviews.com/i/society/animal-rights/school-district-administrator-charged-dog-fighting-animal-cruelty-child-abus>

Hancock County focusing on foster care 'crisis' By WES MULLER wmuller@sunherald.com January 5, 2015 2015-01-06T04:42:51Z By WES MULLER S BAY ST. LOUIS -- "We have a crisis," state Rep. David Baria said in his opening remarks at the Hancock County Youth Court Task Force meeting Monday night. A large crowd attended the meeting at the county's government annex building to voice their concerns and try to find solutions to having the worst per-capita foster care rate in Mississippi. In December, the county had 458 children in the custody of the Mississippi Department of Human Services, accounting for 10 percent of DHS's wards statewide. The newly created task force, spearheaded by Baria, is made up of state and local officials trying to find the underlying cause of the foster care problem. But that goal may have widened in scope after Monday's meeting. Chancery Judge Sandy Steckler said the task force should be "totally independent" and not answerable to any agency. The task force members decided to organize into five different committees: coordination of services, statistics, parent representation, public comment and Hancock County Youth Court review. Sheriff Ricky Adam said the task force should just focus on researching the cause of the high numbers. "That's going to be a hard enough mission in itself," he said. "If we can accomplish that, that will be something." Many making public comments said the DHS system in Hancock County is broken. Attorney Kelly Walker criticized youth court officials for acting too fast to take children into state custody. She said Hancock County is the only county that doesn't seek to house children with other family members when parental rights are suspended or terminated. Walker said instead of allowing the child to stay with their grandparents, the court "rips kids away" and places them in foster care if a parent fails a drug test. The sheriff supported Walker's claim. "When we go to seize a child, we don't even have the option to give them to the grandparents," Adam said. Dozens of parents voiced the same concern. Bay St. Louis resident Mindy Stigler said her daughter was seized from her in 2013, and despite having completed all of DHS's requirements to regain custody, her daughter is stuck in Michigan. Stigler said DHS required her to pass two random drug screens before she could visit her child. She said she has passed nine times and still hasn't been granted a visit. The task force's next meeting is at 4 p.m. Jan. 23. Read more here: http://www.sunherald.com/2015/01/05/6002107_hancock-county-focusing-on-foster.html?rh=1#storylink=cpy

Brother of malnourished toddler dies in foster care Filed on January 5, 2015 by Associated Press Leave a Comment Tweet CLEVELAND (AP) — The 10-year-old brother of a toddler whose death was attributed to malnourishment has died while in a Cleveland foster home. Authorities say Xavier Brothers-Bartholomew was found in full cardiac arrest Sunday and was pronounced dead at a hospital a short time later. The cause and circumstances surrounding his death are being investigated by the Cuyahoga County medical examiner and Cleveland police, which is normal procedure when a child dies. Xavier and his five siblings became the focus of attention in November 2012 when their 18-month-old brother, Isaac, was found dead in his crib in the family's home in Vermilion, west of Cleveland. Authorities ruled that Isaac had died of malnourishment and that his siblings had been neglected by their parents, James Brothers and Adrienne Bartholomew, and their grandmother and paid caregiver, Deborah Nelson. The parents and grandmother pleaded guilty last year to child endangering charges and are in state prison. Isaac, Xavier and three other siblings were born with a genetic disorder that causes physical and mental impairments. A lawsuit filed in November 2014 on behalf of Isaac's estate and the guardian for his siblings said the eldest child, a boy who is not disabled, often was left to care for the younger children. The lawsuit was filed against the parents and grandmother, officials in Erie County whose agencies were responsible for overseeing the children's well-being and doctors who had treated the children. The attorney who filed the lawsuit said the disabled children had begun to thrive in foster care and had doubled their weight. The director of the Erie County Department of Job and Family Services issued a statement Monday that said there was no indication that the boy's death "involved any concerns of abuse or neglect." The statement from Karen Balconi Ghezzi said Xavier, since November 2012, had been living with foster parents trained to care for the boy's medical needs. Social workers and medical professionals made weekly visits to the home, the statement said. The statement called Xavier's death "a very sad case." Source: <http://chronicle.northcoastnow.com/2015/01/05/brother-malnourished-toddler-dies-foster-care/>

New initiative aims to keep foster children among family Andrew Atterbury 9:44 PM, Jan 5, 2015 9:39 AM, Jan 6, 2015 local news | faith and values
Copyright 2014 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. SAN ANGLEO, Texas - More than three-fourths of children in need of foster parents around the Concho Valley are sent elsewhere, away from friends, family — their lives — by a lack of suitable homes. The Texas Department of Family and Protective Services is attempting to buck that trend with a fresh initiative, already proven worthwhile in trial runs, that could help meet the immediate needs of families and children by reaching out to local churches. Through the state's Care Portal website, churches will be able work directly with Child Protective Services caseworkers to provide needs such as financial support, child care, even a baby crib, for potential foster parents. Ideally, the program will make it easier for foster children to live with relatives, said Myrna Baquero, a foster/adoption supervisor with the DFPS. "Children need to be with their families as long as they're safe and protected," Baquero said. "If there is something that prevents them from being with a family member — furniture, food, whatever — churches want to be part of that, part of reuniting and keeping families together whenever possible." In Tom Green County there were 187 children in foster care as of Dec. 7, according to data from the DFPS website. Of those, 31 children were placed in Tom Green County. Once the Care Portal is fully operational, a state child welfare worker will identify a need and submit a request for help. Churches registered with the service receive an email detailing what is needed, allowing them to connect with their congregation to see who can meet that need. The DFPS would like for 15 churches from each city, including San Angelo, Midland/Odessa and Big Spring, to get the ball rolling. Those cities are the main hubs in Region 9, which encompasses 30 West Texas counties. Rural churches are also welcome among the Care Portal. So far the program has received positive reviews from users in Region 3 in the Dallas/Fort Worth area, the only region to use the portal thus far, said Art Mavrode, a faith based specialist for CPS. Faith-based initiatives have been a major cog in DFPS services for the better part of 20 years, Mavrode said. The state Legislature recognized they needed the community to help kids and couldn't do it alone, he said. As a pastor at Zoar Community Church of Rowena, Mavrode has seen for himself how church and family can be a support system for kids, he said. "We, as a state, know the real answer is with the faith communities," Mavrode said. "We have a passion for these children and for the families. What we're trying to do is reach out to the community and be partners." Mavrode hosts an informational meeting open to anyone interested in becoming a foster or adoptive parent on Tuesday at 6 p.m. in the San Angelo Visitors Center, 426 W. Ave. B. He will also touch on the Care Portal for any church members interested in their congregation joining the program. For more information or to register a church call 325-657-8917. To learn more about Care Portal visit bit.ly/1y257TE. Source: http://www.gosanangelo.com/news/local-news/new-initiative-aims-to-keep-foster-children-among-family_46760265

South Tucson rejects permit for treatment center South Tucson rejects permit for treatment center 6 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email Respond: Write a letter to the editor | Write a guest opinion 2015-01-05T21:00:00Z 2015-01-06T09:48:19Z South Tucson rejects permit for treatment center By Luis F. Carrasco Arizona Daily Star Arizona Daily Star January 05, 2015 9:00 pm • By Luis F. Carrasco Luis F. Carrasco lcarrasco@tucson.com × Related Photos « Buy Now » Paul Diaz Enlarge Photo The proposed substance-abuse treatment center at the heart of the recall effort targeting South Tucson Mayor Paul Diaz will not receive the permit it needs to offer services to adult clients. Pasadera Behavioral Health Network recently acquired the property at 2820 S. Eighth Ave. from the Arizona's Children Association. The group had hoped not only to use its new location to consolidate administrative functions but also as an adult residential treatment center. While the association offered similar services to juveniles under a grandfather clause, expanding them to an adult population was considered a change of use and against current zoning, said interim City Manager Benny Young. "Political implications and neighborhood issues aside, this was a straight interpretation of the zoning code," he said. The planned treatment center is across the street from Mission View Elementary School and has been a divisive issue in the square-mile city since news of Pasadera's planned arrival broke about eight months ago. The controversy is at the center of a rift between Diaz and Councilman Ildefonso Green that led to recall petitions for both. A recall election for Diaz is scheduled May 19. Diaz said his support for Pasadera's move was not specific to the group but had more to do with the city's economic development. "Everybody's saying, 'Not in my backyard.' What are other companies going to say as they look to locate in South Tucson?" Raul Green, brother of Ildefonso Green and part of Comunidad Primero, the group that spearheaded the mayor's recall over Pasadera, said everyone was pleased with the decision but that it wouldn't affect the group's commitment to oust Diaz. "We don't trust him anymore; that's not going to change anything," he said. "It's amazing that this guy (Young), within two weeks of looking at it, he determined it wasn't the right deal." Young, who became interim city manager last month, said that while he didn't know the full history behind Pasadera's arrival, it was possible his predecessor believed the group's proposal was so similar to the location's historic use that it would be entitled to retain its exemption. "Once we delved into that more extensively, we reached a position that a close reading of the zoning code would say that's not the case," he said. The group may still apply for a change of zoning, Young added, and while ultimately the mayor and council would make that decision, he called the possibility unlikely. Pasadera CEO Chuck Burbank had no comment Monday but said in an email that his organization was happy to be in South Tucson and looked forward to working with the city. Source: http://tucson.com/news/local/south-tucson-rejects-permit-for-treatment-center/article_cfc980ec-e33c-585e-8dbe-3a5feb40a70d.html

LA County Supervisors asked to act fast on reforms to child welfare system Andrea Gardner January 06 2015 Audio from this story 0:59 Listen Share this story Share via Email Share on Twitter | Share on Facebook 137 The blue ribbon commission votes on the language of a final report that took a critical look at L.A. County's foster care system on April 10, 2014. It is set to be presented to the L.A. County Board of Supervisors later this month. Karen Foshay/KPCC Leaders of a transition team for the new Office of Child Protection told Los Angeles County Supervisors Tuesday much still needs to be done to reform the county's troubled child welfare system - and asked that they do a few easy things now. The team's co-chairs said some progress was made in 2014, but many reforms recommended by a Blue Ribbon Commission last April haven't been implemented by the board - including writing up a mission statement and regularly evaluating the department's performance. The team, made up of seasoned volunteers, was formed last year to help the county execute the commission's recommendations and monitor progress. The board is in the process of hiring a "child welfare czar" to lead the new independent Office of Child Protection and oversee reform. "A mission statement at this point, would send a signal to potential candidates that the board of supervisors is committed to this important goal," Leslie Gilbert-Lurie, one of the leaders of the transition team, told Supervisors Tuesday. Some of the recommended changes are complex, and will take funding, legal counsel, and coordination with multiple county and state officials to accomplish. Supervisors agreed action was needed quickly, and that they would begin work on areas within their power. "What's lagging is implementation," said supervisor Mark Ridley-Thomas. "It baffles me that we haven't moved any more quickly than we have to date." Supervisor Sheila Kuehl said she would begin work on a mission statement, and would continue working with state lawmakers on payments to guardians who are related to kids in the foster care system, which was another issue raised by the transition team. "I think the public confidence in what we're doing is very low," Kuehl said. "They haven't seen us doing much, and they don't know that we will do much. And all I can say is, we have five policy makers here, and I think, we're all, each in our own ways, quite devoted to this, and we will move it forward." Source: <http://www.scpr.org/news/2015/01/06/49114/la-county-supervisors-asked-to-act-fast-on-reforms/>

Heath counselor gets two-year prison sentence Hannah Sparling, hsparling@newarkadvocate.com 10:01 p.m. EST January 6, 2015 Former guidance counselor Mackenzie Matthews hands off her wedding ring to attorney Kristin Burkett. Matthews, 34, was sentenced Tuesday to two years in prison, the result of a sexual relationship Matthews had in 2010 with a then- high school senior. (Photo: Michael Lehmkuhle/ The Advocate) Story Highlights A former Heath High School guidance counselor pleaded guilty Tuesday to sexual battery. Mackenzie Matthews, 34, was sentenced to two years in prison. Matthews will lose her teaching license and be classified as a Tier III sex offender. 1492 CONNECT 16 TWEET LINKEDIN 17 COMMENT EMAIL MORE NEWARK – Before he handed down the sentence, Judge Thomas Marcelain said he hopes it sends a message: Student-teacher relationships are not OK, and teachers involved will be punished. Marcelain told Mackenzie Matthews, a former Heath High School guidance counselor, that she was in a position of trust and authority, and that she abused it. "It has happened too often by people in your position," Marcelain said. Then he sentenced Matthews to two years in prison. She also will lose her teaching license and be classified as a Tier III sex offender, meaning she'll have to register every 90 days for the rest of her life. Matthews, 34, was calm throughout the hearing, pleading guilty to a bill of information and only choking up when she delivered a brief statement to the court. It was her first public court appearance in the case. "I just want to sincerely apologize to the victim and his family, and to the Heath community and my school system," she said. "I want to apologize to my friends and my family and my children, and especially my husband. I want to express the remorse I have for this, and I accept the responsibility for my actions." Matthews was charged in November with one count of sexual battery, the result of a sexual relationship she had in 2010 with a person who was then a high school senior. She was facing up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. Her attorney, Kristin Burkett, requested probation, but Burkett said after the hearing that she and Matthews were prepared for the possibility of a prison sentence. "I think she's glad to move on to the next step," Burkett said. "There's some anxiety associated to not knowing, so now that she's here, she can move forward." Matthews was hired at Heath in 2005. She was the district's only guidance counselor and, apart from this incident, her personnel file contained no disciplinary action. She was put on leave in October and resigned shortly after she was charged. There is no official state database of teacher-student relationships, but in 2014, Ohio had 35 school employees either accused or convicted of inappropriate relationships with students, according to Drive West Communications, a Texas company that has been tracking the cases using media reports. Nationwide, there were at least 747 cases this past year, an average of more than two a day, according to Drive West. Aside from

Matthews', there have been two Licking County cases the past two years: Sonya Horn, a former Johnstown High School intervention specialist, was sentenced in January 2013 to four years in prison after she was accused of sexually assaulting an 18-year-old developmentally disabled student. Anthony Miller, a former Newark City Schools band teacher, was sentenced in August to four years and 10 months in prison for engaging in sexual conduct with at least three former students. In Matthews' case, the relationship was consensual, and the student was 18 at the time. However, because the sexual conduct occurred before the student graduated, it is illegal in Ohio. Any sexual conduct occurred off school property, according to Licking County Prosecutor Ken Oswalt. The victim and his family were not in the courtroom Tuesday — a conscious decision on their part to help protect the victim's identity, Oswalt said. He said the victim's parents were hoping for no prison time — not for Matthews' sake, but for her children — and the victim himself didn't want to weight in, leaving it completely up to the court. Matthews may be eligible for judicial release in six months, and Oswalt said he'll wait until it comes up to decide whether that's something his office will oppose. For Matthews' part, it might play in her favor that she pleaded guilty and didn't force the victim to endure a trial and testify, Oswalt said. "She didn't flinch about pleading, even though she knew prison was a distinct possibility," he said. "And she's got some lifelong consequences that she'll never get rid of." hsparring@newarkadvocate.com 740-328-8822 Twitter: @hksparling Source: <http://www.newarkadvocate.com/story/news/local/2015/01/06/heath-counselor-gets-two-year-prison-sentence/21345575/>

Illinois urged to reform programs for young wards; DCFS director steps down Gary Marx, Duaa Eldeib, David Jackson Chicago Tribune 8:41 PM CST, January 7, 2015 Advertisement Illinois authorities urgently need to overhaul the state's mental health programs for impoverished youth or they will only see more of the violence and abuse exposed by a recent Tribune investigation on residential treatment centers, a panel of experts told state lawmakers Wednesday. During the nearly five-hour-long special legislative session in Chicago, state child welfare chief Bobbie Gregg sent a stir through the packed hearing room when she called the Tribune's reports "both appalling and unacceptable," and then announced that she would step down from the troubled agency Jan. 19. Sitting alone at the long wooden witness table, Gregg told the 22 lawmakers that problems exposed by the Tribune date back years and are the result of broad and complex policy failures. "I sincerely hope that the current circumstances will serve as a catalyst for meaningful and comprehensive changes," Gregg said. "Please do not waste this opportunity to improve the condition of child welfare in Illinois." Wednesday's hearing is the first step in what legislators called a determined effort to finally reform a tattered web of state programs that fail to adequately serve juvenile state wards who suffered traumatic abuse and developed psychological and behavioral problems. Hundreds of wards are assaulted and raped by their peers each year at Illinois residential centers, even as authorities fail to act on reports of harm, the Tribune's "Harsh Treatment" investigation found. Prostitution became a fact of life at several centers where experienced residents introduced others to pimps, escort websites and street corners. Education and therapy fell by the wayside as low-wage staffers struggled with the most aggressive teens. Thousands of residents fled to the streets. Some were sexually assaulted, and dozens have never been found. "The sad truth that must be faced today is that the heartbreaking and appalling reports in the Tribune of abuse and neglect of state wards in residential programs are a symptom of larger problems in DCFS," said Ben Wolf, associate legal director of the ACLU of Illinois, which monitors DCFS as the result of a decades-old federal court consent decree. Illinois must "seriously consider (a) radical, redesigned foster care system," added Mary Shahbazian, president of the Allendale Association residential center and foster care network in Lake Villa. The state badly needs to increase the number of specialized foster homes equipped to care for youth with mental health problems, Shahbazian told the lawmakers. And, she said, the state must expand its network of community mental health programs so fewer kids are placed in institutions, and those who need intensive care don't languish there. In Illinois the percentage of wards who spend more than two years in state custody is nearly twice as high as in other states, said Casey Family Programs consultant Page Walley, who once ran the Alabama Department of Human Resources. "Once you get in, there is a challenge to get out." Walley said youth rarely benefit from long stays in residential facilities because the biggest gains are often made in the first few months. Former DCFS Director Bryan Samuels, who now runs the Chapin Hall research center at the University of Chicago, said that while Illinois is about average in its use of residential centers and group homes as a placement for juvenile wards, "what is distinct is the increase in the length of stay. The length of time that they spend in those programs is getting longer." Too many wards languish in the facilities because Illinois lacks clear and standardized criteria for measuring their progress so they can transition out of the institutions and into less restrictive settings, said Samuels, who is a former DCFS ward. And the state is not using the data it collects on youths' diagnoses and treatment plans to target the appropriate residential center for them. "Children with very different needs are being placed in exact same programs," Samuels said. Eight to 11 percent of all youth in residential centers were reportedly sexually abused or physically assaulted during the six years since 2009, and more than one-third attempted to run away or went missing, according to data Chapin Hall presented Wednesday. During that period, the levels of violence in the centers have remained fairly constant, that data showed. To deal with the high numbers of youth who run away from residential centers, several of the experts and legislators said Illinois should consider implementing more protective measures — including physical barriers such as locked exit doors — to safeguard children who frequently go AWOL and are known to be prostituted. Like some other states, Illinois has laws allowing residential centers to secure their exit doors to prevent escapes by youths whose behavior creates "an established pattern of foreseeable serious risk of bodily harm to self or others." But officials in Illinois have balked at authorizing the locks, saying it could violate the human rights of children placed in state protective custody through no fault of their own. "I am an advocate for having secure facilities, particularly for children who are being exploited," said Cook County Public Guardian Robert Harris, who cautioned that any use of locked facilities must be thoughtfully planned and applied on an extremely limited basis. "I don't mean lockups or jails," he said. Many other reform initiatives were aired at Wednesday's hearing. Among them: revamping DCFS' data systems so the agency can quickly spot problematic facilities and patterns of harm to youth, and contracting with experienced independent monitors to oversee the institutions. Several experts also said residential facilities must be able to pay their direct-care workers more than a minimum wage, while offering them better training and staff-to-resident ratios. Not all of these proposals will need an influx of cash, said Robert Bloom, an adviser to DCFS and former facility director. "Before we start talking about new money, let's stop wasting the old money," Bloom said. DCFS ward Tashyla Coleman, 20, said staff mistreatment of youth was one cause of the frequent runaways. She was one of five current or former wards who admonished lawmakers to heed the voices of youth as they shape legislation and policy solutions. "We need to be involved," she said. The panelists and lawmakers effusively praised Gregg and thanked her for her service Wednesday. "She inherited a train wreck," Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart told the lawmakers. Gregg was the department's seventh director in the past three years, and that unstable leadership has only hurt the agency's ability to protect and care for youth, said Anita Shannon, senior director at Casey Family Programs. "It is a travesty for the children and families in care," she said. Gregg told lawmakers she was notified her tenure would not be extended under Gov.-elect Bruce Rauner. Rauner's team is conducting a national search for a replacement, according to one child welfare professional with knowledge of the initiative. Rauner previously pledged a top-to-bottom review of child welfare in the state in the wake of the Tribune series, declaring: "We need to fundamentally reassess the way we approach child and family services in Illinois." Gregg said at the hearing that she is working closely with Rauner's team to ensure a smooth turnover of agency leadership. "It has been my privilege to serve," she told the lawmakers. "My heart will remain in child welfare." gmarx@tribpub.com deldeib@tribpub.com djackson@tribpub.com Twitter @garyjmarx Twitter @deldeib Twitter @poolcar4 Source: <http://www.redevechicago.com/news/local/chi-dcfs-director-resigning-following-harsh-treatment-investigation-20150107.04520727.print.story>

Group home task force wants better notification, screening Story Comments Share Share Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Friday, January 9, 2015 11:51 am Group home task force wants better notification, screening By Kym Soper Journal Inquirer Journal Inquirer | 0 comments MANCHESTER — A task force charged with recommending changes for how state group homes are sited in town says that more notification, and better screenings and training should be required. The task force made a preliminary report Tuesday to the Board of Directors, which had convened the panel following concerns over the disproportionate number of group homes in town and the amount of local resources they required. Established in November, the 13-member committee has so far identified challenges for both providers and mental health patients in the community, said co-chairwoman Mary Roche Cronin, director of human services. Source: http://www.journalinquirer.com/towns/manchester/group-home-task-force-wants-better-notification-screening/article_ba50730c-981f-11e4-b5de-c3db59702515.html

Teen beaten at Carrick youth home dies from injuries January 14, 2015 10:50 AM Michael Henninger/Post-Gazette The alleged altercation between the three teens took place at Circle C Youth and Family Services on Carrick Avenue in Carrick. Share with others: 0 inShare Related Media: Family recounts troubled life of 16-year-old that ended with fatal beating at group home Assault on boy in Carrick occurred in a properly licensed group home Two residents charged with severely beating teen at Carrick group home By Madasyn Czebiniak / Pittsburgh Post-Gazette The young man who police say was choked and beaten with a vacuum cleaner by two other teenagers at a youth home in Carrick died Tuesday night, an Allegheny County medical examiner's office supervisor said. Nicholas Grant, 16, who resided at Circle C Youth and Family Services on Carrick Avenue, died at 10:17 p.m. at UPMC Mercy, where he was taken after the incident Saturday night. An autopsy is scheduled for today. The two teenagers charged in the altercation, Malik Crosby, 16, and Yusuf Shepard, 15, were taken into custody Saturday night. The two are being held at the Allegheny County Jail in lieu of $100,000 bail each. They are each charged as adults with aggravated assault, attempted homicide and criminal conspiracy. Both are scheduled for preliminary hearings Friday. Mike Manko, spokesman for the Allegheny County district attorney's office, said the office will await the results of the autopsy before determining if further charges will be filed. Also, he said the DA's office is working "closely with the police and state officials to try and determine the circumstances leading up to and surrounding the assault at this home." Mark Bertolet, spokesman for the Allegheny County Human Services Department, said the agency is conducting its own investigation. He also said a multi-disciplinary review team will soon convene as required by state law in cases of suspected child abuse resulting in child fatalities and/or near-fatalities. Nicholas had just returned to the youth home on Saturday, having been previously removed because of a verbal fight with Yusuf, police said in a criminal complaint. The two argued again on Saturday, which instigated the fight. During the fight, police said, the suspects punched and kicked Nicholas, who threw a vacuum at Yusuf to protect himself. Yusuf put Nicholas in a chokehold, and Malik beat him in the stomach and ribs with the vacuum while an employee called the police, the complaint said. Officers found Nicholas in the kitchen, unresponsive, "turning blue around his lips, forehead, and fingertips." The two other teens were in the living room. Officers administered CPR until paramedics arrived, and Nicholas regained a pulse. He was taken to UPMC Mercy in critical condition, in which he remained until his death. An official with the police bureau's homicide unit declined to comment Tuesday night. Attempts to reach Pittsburgh public safety spokeswoman Sonya Toler for comment were unsuccessful. Circle C officials released the following statement this morning: "We are deeply saddened to learn of the passing of Nicholas Grant following an altercation at our Carrick Group Home. Our focus has always been on providing safe environments for our residents and staff and that will never change." The group home said it is working with investigators to find out what led to the attack. Also officials said they are reviewing "all of our systems and processes." "The work we do for at-risk youth comes, not surprisingly, with many risks. We remain committed to helping Pittsburgh's troubled youth break these terrible cycles of violence so they can lead healthy and productive lives now and as adults," the group home's statement read. Staff writer Andrew Goldstein contributed. Madasyn Czebiniak: mczebiniak@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1269. Twitter: @PG_Czebiniak. First Published January 14, 2015 12:08 AM Source: <http://www.post-gazette.com/local/city/2015/01/14/Teen-beaten-at-Carrick-youth-home-dies-from-injuries/stories/201501140134>

Study Raises Questions About Group Homes For Kids January 10, 2015 5:37 PM Share on email 6 View Comments (Photo by Sasha/Getty Images) Related Tags: Carole Shauffer, Children's Home Society of Florida, Christina Spudeas, Department of Children and Families, Kristi Putnam, Legislature's Office of Program Policy Analysis and Government Accountability, Miranda Phillips, OPPAGA, Pinellas County, Ready for Life, Shelley Katz, Youth Law Center Top Features CBS4 Weather App for iPhone & Android YourDay for iPhone and Android CBSMiami Text Alerts Follow Us On Twitter Follow CBSMIAMI.COM: Facebook | Twitter TALLAHASSEE (NSF) – A new study shows that placing children in group homes instead of with foster families is much more expensive – and many children's advocates say it's also worse for the kids. The study, released last month by the Legislature's Office of Program Policy Analysis and Government Accountability, found that slightly more than 11 percent of children who are removed from their families are placed in group homes rather than with relatives, friends or foster families. Group homes cost the state nearly $81.7 million for approximately 2,200 children in 2013-2014 – more than $37,000 per child. In comparison, the state rate when a foster family cared for a child aged 13 to 17 was $515 per month, or $6,180 per year. On Jan. 1, foster families got a cost-of-living increase to $527 per month, according to the Department of Children and Families. "Clearly, group care is more expensive," said Kristi Putnam, a child well-being and permanency manager at the department. "It provides such a different level of staffing and services that we really need to be using it for the kids who are most appropriate to be there. ... We have a number of different things to consider when making placements." The OPPAGA study noted that the main purpose of residential group care is "to provide a setting that addresses the unique needs of children who require more intensive services than a family setting can provide. ... Community-based care lead agencies may place children in other types of group settings based on the child's needs, such as residential treatment programs, therapeutic group care or developmental disabilities group homes." The problem with that, advocates say, is that while many group homes are modeled on families, with live-in house-parents and smaller numbers of children, 57 percent of Florida group homes use shift workers who are less likely to develop positive relationships with the kids. "When we got in fights, they'd call the cops, and we'd get arrested," said Miranda Phillips, who lived in group homes from age 13 to 18. "People are going to fight, especially if you throw that many girls in a house together." Phillips is now 22 and works with Ready for Life, a Pinellas County program for kids who age out of foster care. She said the group home she lived in typically housed 40 girls. Calling the police to deal with fighting or other rule-breaking was common, she said, and often led to the teens being charged. "A lot of us wanted to be caseworkers or work with kids, and they can't do it because they have this (criminal) record," Phillips said. But Shelley Katz, chief operating officer of Children's Home Society of Florida, said some kids prefer group homes with shift workers. "There are kids who thrive with shift staff," she said. "We have some who have come back and worked for us." According to the OPPAGA study, about 25 percent of young adults who choose to stay in extended foster care after age 18 choose a group home. "Every kid is not the same," Katz said. "Some need on-site interventions all day, every day. ... In order to meet the need, we need a wide array of options." Group homes primarily serve older children and more males and minority children with identified behavioral health issues, the study noted. Physical aggression, running away, truancy and drug use were all more pronounced among children in group homes as opposed to foster families — but according to the study, those were the behaviors that landed them in group homes to begin with. Christina Spudeas, executive director of the advocacy group Florida's Children First, said she often hears that foster parents will refuse to take these "difficult to place" kids, or that the kids are so damaged they can't live in regular homes. "Foster parents have these kids and adopt them also," she said. "But foster parents need additional support and services to help them. The cost of helping them to provide a home for hard-to-place kids would be far less than keeping the kids in a group home." Carole Shauffer of the San Francisco-based Youth Law Center, who has fought against the use of group-home placements in Florida, said children who live in group homes generally lack models for parenting their own children. "How do you know how to parent?" she asked. "You already came from a home where parenting was a problem if you're in a group home." "The News Service of Florida Margie Menzel contributed to this report." Source: <http://miami.cbslocal.com/2015/01/10/study-raises-questions-about-group-homes-for-kids/>

Suit Alleges Widespread Deficiencies in South Carolina Foster Care By ALAN BLINDER JAN. 12, 2015 Inside Continue reading the main story Continue reading the main story Continue reading the main story Share This Page Email Share Tweet Save more Continue reading the main story In a new challenge to South Carolina's embattled foster care program, child-welfare activists filed a lawsuit in federal court on Monday claiming that widespread deficiencies in the system have endangered thousands of children. Eleven children, all in foster care, were listed as plaintiffs in the lawsuit, which was filed in Federal District Court in Charleston. "As a direct result of longstanding, well-documented failures, plaintiff children have been and continue to be harmed physically, psychologically and emotionally and continue to be placed at ongoing risk of such harms while in D.S.S. custody," the lawsuit said, referring to the Department of Social Services. "D.S.S. is re-victimizing the very children it is charged to protect." A spokeswoman for Gov. Nikki R. Haley said in an email on Monday that the governor would "continue to pursue reforms at D.S.S." "Governor Haley believes that protecting South Carolina's most vulnerable citizens, our children, is the state's most important job," the spokeswoman, Chaney Adams, said. "That's why the governor has been actively pursuing a new direction for the agency." In a separate statement about the lawsuit, the Department of Social Services said it would "fully evaluate the claims and respond in an appropriate forum." It also said the agency's employees were "completely dedicated and work hard every day to ensure that children in foster care receive the care that meets their individual needs." The lawsuit cited three "specific unaddressed deficiencies" in the state's foster care network: overwhelming caseloads for employees, poor health care services for South Carolina's wards and a scarcity of foster homes. The suit asks for a court-appointed monitor who would oversee caseload restrictions, the availability of regular health screenings and, for some children, sibling visitation privileges. The court filing portrayed the state's foster care system as one in which children are dehumanized, belittled and abused. In one instance, the lawsuit said, the foster parent of a teenage boy "called him the devil and choked and assaulted him in front of the private agency staff that provided the home under contract" with the state. But the filing said the South Carolina authorities did not investigate. The lawsuit also said another child reported that during a placement in a Williamsburg County foster home, she had been "forced to go up to the church altar against her will for an extremely long period in a ceremony that would remove the devil from the then 6-year-old's soul." A third child, the lawsuit said, lived in a Charleston County group home where feces remained on a shower's floor for more than a month and the food was "often expired or moldy." The lawsuit also said that employees at the same home would punish the girl, who has a history of mental illness, by withholding her medicine. "There's got to be accountability when longstanding systemic problems, like a severe lack of mental health services, gross overreliance on institutions and high caseloads, continue to harm innocent children," said Ira Lustbader, the litigation director for Children's Rights, a New York nonprofit that is involved in the lawsuit and has previously sued South Carolina officials. The Social Services Department has been a persistent headache for Ms. Haley, a Republican, who last month named Susan Alford as the agency's director. At the news conference when she announced Ms. Alford's appointment, Ms. Haley acknowledged "a lot of issues with D.S.S.," but she also said, "There is not a D.S.S. in this country that is not seeing the challenges that we're seeing." During an appearance on Monday afternoon in Columbia, the state capital, to announce her budget proposal, Ms. Haley reiterated her administration's plan to hire 200 caseworkers. But before Ms. Haley appeared at the Statehouse, advocates involved in the lawsuit said the time had come to seek federal intervention. "Since South Carolina has repeatedly ignored its own admissions about the system, we have no choice but to act and demand reform," Sue Berkowitz, the director of the South Carolina Applesseed Legal Justice Center, said in a statement. Source: http://www.nytimes.com/2015/01/13/us/suit-alleges-widespread-deficiencies-in-south-carolina-foster-care.html?_r=0

Foster Care Fix Requested for Disabled Share on facebookShare Share on twitterTweet Share on emailE-mail Share on printPrint By Margie Menzel of WLRN It's been two years since Florida's Legislature passed a law extending foster care from age 18 to 21, for youth aging out of the system who want to stay. But the law has had some unintended consequences. Barbara Palmer, director of the Florida Agency for Persons with Disabilities Credit Florida Agency for Persons with Disabilities Children's advocates say extended foster care has been a success for young adults who need more time to complete school due to bureaucratic delays. But for those who also have disabilities have run into problems: specifically it's unclear which state agency pays for which services -- the Department of Children and Families or the Agency for Persons with Disabilities. "We've struggled with this for two years, and it shouldn't be this way," said said Barbara Palmer, director of the Agency for Persons with Disabilities. "They shouldn't have to choose whether they stay in foster care or whether they want to get services from us." Listen Listening... 0:00 / 1:27 The idea behind the law was to give young adults more time to prepare for independence. But children's advocates say the state needs to come up with another strategy for those kids who can't live independently due to severe disabilities --- and who will need more services for a longer period of time. Palmer is asking lawmakers to fix that in the upcoming legislative session. "We want everyone, especially those in foster care, to get the services that they need, but also to have those nurturing families with them," she said. "We don't want them to have to make a choice." Margie Menzel is a reporter with WLRN in Miami. WLRN is a partner with Health News Florida, which receives support from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Source: <http://health.wusf.usf.edu/post/foster-care-fix-requested-disabled>

New screening law meant to prevent poor foster care By MICHAEL VIRTANEN Angel B., 15, sits under a board displaying past and present residents of Williams Cottage at the Children's Village campus in Dobbs Ferry. New York will now require local social service agencies to better screen potential foster parents to determine whether they will make good guardians. Photo by AP, January 12, 2015 New York will now require local social service agencies to screen potential foster parents to determine whether they've had previous licenses revoked or children removed from their care and to state the reasons why. The new law takes effect in June and requires the local agency commissioner to review the history of removals and revocations to close information gaps in the current system, Assemblywoman Nily Rozic wrote in her sponsor's memo. "When a child enters foster care, the state assumes the responsibility of providing a safe and secure environment," Rozic wrote. "According to agency reports and hearing testimony, there continues to be instances where children are further abused or even killed by their foster parents." Screening has required checking prospective foster parents against crime databases and the statewide child abuse registry, but that only provides information on reported and investigated cases, Rozic wrote. Where caseworkers suspect but can't confirm abuse, children may be removed, but the foster parents can apply to another agency to get paid for taking in other foster children, she wrote. Top Stories On MLK Day, two-thirds say race relations in NYS are only fair or poor; was 51 percent last year Landowners coalition weighs options in wake of fracking decision DiNapoli pledges to continue his watchdog role GOP hopes Assembly will follow Senate's lead In its first act of 2015, senate passes women's equality bills State comptroller pressures Monster to diversify its board Anti-tenure group launches social media campaign Teen's death spurs new push to ban conversion therapy Cuomo proposes \$1.5B upstate economic competition Single most important challenge Cuomo to combine budget State of the State addresses Assembly GOP urges colleagues to pass WEA bills Senate passes 8 women's equality bills DiNapoli meets with reporters to outline goals for the coming year Extras e-mail this article link to a friend letter to the editor about this article print this article facebook twitter digg it share Larger | Smaller The latest data from the state Office of Children and Family Services showed the incidence of child abuse and neglect declined from 2 percent of 41,023 children in foster care in 2009 to 1.2 percent of 34,679 children in 2012. OCFS separately reported 27 children died in New York foster care in 2008-2009, with 19 deaths attributed to natural causes, two to accidents, one homicide, and five deaths undetermined or causes pending. Later data were not available as of press time. In signing the bill this week, Gov. Andrew Cuomo said lawmakers have agreed to amendments that require screenings based on the statewide automated child welfare information system, a more comprehensive database than the child abuse registry. He noted that otherwise the records search could delay or prevent foster placements to homes where children were previously removed for valid reasons, like being returned to a biological parent or for mental health residential treatment. According to the OCFS, the welfare information system includes caseworker notes about foster care removals and is currently accessible to local social service commissioners in all 62 counties. The agency said the new law will essentially codify current practice. Another bill, signed by the governor this week, amends the social services law to allow local agencies to add written comments to child fatality reports. Legislative sponsors said those reports to OCFS do not detail circumstances that can include drug misuse, dangerous consumer products, drowning, fires, suicides, automobile crashes and window falls, or recommendations to prevent future incidents. The governor said legislators have agreed to an amendment that new law to clarify that family privacy will be considered and that added details don't disclose information confidential under other laws. Source: <http://www.legislativegazette.com/Articles-Top-Stories-c-2015-01-12-90449.113122-New-screening-law-meant-to-prevent-poor-foster-care.html>

Op-Ed: Phase out Southbury Training School and similar institutions By: Shelagh McClure and Tom Fiorentino | January 13, 2015 View as "Clean Read" ShareEmail Print Connecticut faces a budget crisis in Fiscal Year 2016, with a projected $2.8 billion shortfall before the legislature even begins its work on the biennial budget. But we face another crisis too: the crisis facing thousands of families with sons and daughters on the Department of Developmental Services waiting list for residential services with no chance of placement unless there is an emergency. How did this happen? In large part, because Connecticut spends so much on its antiquated and inefficient public sector system that there is not enough money to go around for all of those in need. This is unacceptable even in good times. In the face of massive budget deficits it is intolerable; depriving our most vulnerable citizens of services while unnecessarily burdening taxpayers. The costs of segregated state-operated institutions far exceed the costs of private, community based settings, such as group homes. The state pays over $350,000 per resident per year at Southbury Training School and over $442,000 per resident per year at the Regional Centers - vs. around $130,000 for a private group home. State-run group homes cost about $338,000 per person per year. Despite these prohibitive costs, Connecticut continues to maintain these six institutions where over 500 intellectually disabled individuals live: Southbury Training School houses 319 residents, and the five Regional Centers house a total of 186 individuals. Also Read Michelle Obama invites University of Hartford student to State of the Union WASHINGTON – Not long ago he Anthony Mendez lived with his family in an homeless shelter, now he will sit with First Lady Michelle Obama her husband's State of the Union speech to the nation Tuesday night, Mendez, a University of Hartford freshman, was invited by the First Lady because he overcame serious challenges to become the first high school graduate in his family. GOP wants to team up with Democratic treasurer to rein in 'bond premiums' Republican legislative leaders hope they have a key Democratic ally in their fight to reform state budget practices tied to borrowed funds. Both Treasurer Denise L. Nappier, a Hartford Democrat, and nearly a half dozen GOP lawmakers have said they want to restrict how the state uses proceeds from bonds sold at premium rates. This is so even though 15 years ago, the United States Supreme Court, in Olmstead vs. L.C., ruled that segregated institutions violate the constitutional rights of disabled individuals to live in the community as fully participating members of society. Connecticut keeps these institutions open even though extremely well-researched longitudinal studies have established that a move from segregation into the community greatly enhances the quality of life of our formerly institutionalized fellow citizens. What are we saying as a society when we continue to segregate and isolate more than 500 of our citizens solely because of their disability? Last legislative session, after hearing the heartbreaking personal stories of parents who lay awake at night worrying what is going to happen to their disabled adult children still living at home, the General Assembly allocated $4 million to DDS as a "down payment" toward addressing the waiting list. Ironically, the governor's recent budget recessions cut $5 million from the DDS budget. Although it may seem counter-intuitive, the time is NOW to address the waiting list crisis, because families and advocates have shown state leaders that there is a way to do so within the current DDS budget. Here's how: The Connecticut Council on Developmental Disabilities.

joined by The Arc Connecticut, the Office of Protection and Advocacy and the University of Connecticut Center for Excellence in Developmental Disabilities, have launched the 2020 Campaign. We are calling on the governor and the state legislature to close all state institutions that house individuals with intellectual disabilities by 2020 and to transition all residents to appropriate homes in integrated settings in the community. We have also called for all savings to be used to reduce the residential waiting list. If the state-run group homes are included --they cost more than double the cost of private group homes-- the savings could help eliminate the waiting list. The 2020 Campaign seeks to close state institutions because they isolate individuals solely because of their disability, and because they are budget busters, sapping hugely disproportionate resources from the system. This is not a new idea. In 2012, the General Assembly's Program Review and Investigations Committee issued a comprehensive report that unequivocally made the same recommendation --a recommendation that the governor and General Assembly, to date, have ignored. Perhaps the current budget crisis will get this report the serious consideration it deserves. To those who suggest that we who advocate closing institutions are doing so "at the expense" of those who now are living in state-operated institutions, the opposite is true. Our campaign expressly calls for moving residents to appropriate homes in the community, and we would not accept or support the loss of any needed service for those residents. To suggest otherwise is irresponsible. The time has come to do the right thing and close the institutions and move individuals living there into the community. And doing the right thing will save money, money that the Legislature then MUST redirect to expand residential services for adults with intellectual disabilities who currently are waiting for services. Shelagh McClure and Tom Fiorentino of West Hartford are the parents of an adult son with an intellectual disability who is on the Department of Developmental Services' waiting list for residential services. McClure is chair of the Connecticut Developmental Disabilities Council, the group that is leading the current campaign to close the institutions. Fiorentino is an advocate for the intellectual disabled, working with Families for Families, a group that is closely affiliated with ArcCT. Source: <http://ctmirror.org/op-ed-phase-out-southbury-training-school-and-similar-institutions/>

The State Considers Pausing Controversial Foster Care Reforms by Beth Cortez-Neavel Published on Tuesday, January 13, 2015, at 8:02 CST Vivan Farinazzo Back in 2011, when Texas legislators announced their plan to improve the child welfare system through privatization, advocates expressed alarm. In 2013, after partial implementation of the plan, an even larger chorus begged lawmakers to slow the rollout until it became clear whether it would work. Now, as the Texas legislature convenes again, a new voice is calling for a halt: the House and Human Services Committee. Last week, the key legislative committee suggested that the state temporarily stop the rollout of controversial reforms to the child welfare system. Opponents have said the partial privatization of the state system responsible for thousands of foster children—known as “foster care redesign”—is a hasty and potentially detrimental overhaul. In its interim report, the Committee recommending that the Department of Family and Protective Services stop contracting with any new private companies to manage the sprawling foster care system. The committee said lawmakers and child welfare experts need more time to study how effective foster care reforms have been so far. That's exactly what stakeholders told the Observer last year, when we reported on potential problems with redesign that have since come to pass. Foster care redesign is an effort by the Department of Family and Protective Services, which oversees administration and regulation of the foster care system, to keep children who are removed from their families due to abuse and neglect closer to their home communities. The “halt order” comes amid concern from critics about the cost of reform and safety of foster children in the new system. After a rash of child deaths in the system in 2013, child welfare advocates were wary reform efforts wouldn't keep kids safe. And last year, the redesign was called a “risky endeavor” by the Sunset Advisory Commission. The original 2011 legislation put into the motion the state's foray into foster care reform, with one caveat: the redesign must cost the same to implement as the old system. Since then only two lead companies have been tapped to take over portions of the system. But last time we checked, the first two contractors were considerably over budget, and more money will be needed to provide new services. The first company, the for-profit Providence Services Corporation, pulled out of their contract just 11 months into the rollout, citing cost as one of their reasons. After a rash of child deaths in the system in 2013, child welfare advocates were wary reform efforts wouldn't keep kids safe. And last year, the redesign was called a “risky endeavor” by the Sunset Advisory Commission, a legislative committee that monitors and has the authority to shut down government agencies. The reform set up goes like this: the Department contracts some administrative and regulatory duties to the different private lead companies. Those contractors, in turn, manage willing private child-placing agencies within their allotted region of the state, or “catchment area.” Before reform began agencies contracted individually with the state to manage and recruit foster families, or run group homes or intensive treatment centers for children who wouldn't do well in a family setting. Since Providence pulled out, only one company currently contracts with the state to provide services under the redesign model. The not-for-profit Our Community Our Kids, a branch of the 100-year-old not-for-profit ACH Child and Family Services, has managed a small seven-county region near Dallas since December 2013. The Commission's recommendation does not affect Our Community Our Kids' continuing contract and service in their area, it only asks that the Department keep from implementing reform in the other 247 counties in the state. Commissioner John Specia, who heads the Department of Family and Protective Services, said he has no plans to abandon foster care redesign. Department spokesman Patrick Crimmins sent the Observer this email response when asked what their plans were: “Our comment: We understand the committee's recommendation and we are proceeding very deliberately with [redesign], and continuing careful analysis of the data, and will not be expanding to any other catchment areas until authorized by the Legislature. We're continuing work on a long-term implementation plan for redesign as recommended by the Sunset Advisory Commission, and hope to have that completed in a few months.” Ashley Harris, with children's advocacy group Texans Care for Children, said the state should stop its privatization bid and called on the Legislature to give more direction on the issue. “It's been made pretty clear especially with this latest house interim report that the Department really needs to step back and get some things in order before they continue their privatization effort,” she said. “When it comes to kids in foster care maybe we should actually make well-informed decisions before moving forward with things that could be ultimately more detrimental, if not harmful to [kids'] stability and well-being.” Source: <http://www.texasobserver.org/state-pauses-foster-care-reform-efforts/>

Contra Costa County foster youth's mysterious death under investigation By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 01/12/2015 06:42:39 PM PST 0 Comments Updated: 01/13/2015 07:29:56 AM PST 1/5 A portrait of the family of 16-year-old Steven Unangst, who died Dec. 19, 2014, in foster care. From left, the teen's grandmother Karla Garvey; his father Steven Unangst; and his cousins Jakob Cardon, 10, and Justice Cardon, 9, at Garvey's Pittsburg home. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) This family photograph, taken by his father, shows Steven Unangst on his 16th birthday in August 2014. (Courtesy of Steven Unangst) Steven Unangst shows text messages he received late last year from his 16-year-old son Steven, who died in an Antioch foster home on Dec. 19, 2014. The text conversation centered on the medications the teen was prescribed for anxiety. The phone number at the top was blurred out for privacy. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) During an interview with this newspaper, Steven Unangst, 39, sits by a skateboard he gave his 16-year-old son for Christmas the afternoon before he died suddenly in an Antioch foster home on Dec. 19. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) See additional gallery images here. Karla Garvey, 66, of Pittsburgh, talks with this newspaper on Jan. 6, 2015 at her home in Pittsburgh. Garvey is concerned that her grandson did not receive proper medical attention as a Contra Costa County foster child. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) Guestbook: Read and sign In memory of Steven Unangst Related Stories Jan 15: State takes action against Antioch foster mother after youth's death ANTIOCH -- A 16-year-old foster youth who was taking psychotropic medications was found dead in his bed late last month -- and now police and state social services officials are investigating why he didn't receive medical care after he showed signs of being heavily impaired. Results of an autopsy and toxicology tests are weeks away, so investigators say it's still far from clear why the otherwise healthy teen died or what, if any, substances contributed. But Steven Unangst's alarming stupor and mysterious death underscore ongoing concerns about the care and supervision of California foster children who are prescribed potentially dangerous psychiatric medications -- a subject of this newspaper's yearlong investigation "Drugging Our Kids." Steven Unangst shows text messages he received late last year from his 16-year-old son Steven, who died in an Antioch foster home on Dec. 19, 2014. The text conversation centered on the medications the teen was prescribed for anxiety. The phone number at the top was blurred out for privacy. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) (Dai Sugano) Family and friends are now grief-stricken, and simultaneously angered over the Dec. 19 death of Steven, a floppy-haired skateboarder in his third year at Pittsburg High School. "A 16-year-old child does not just die peacefully in their sleep," said Steven's grandmother, Karla Garvey, who had cared for the boy for much of his life and was stunned to see him drooling and staggering around "like a drunken zombie" during a supervised visit the afternoon before he died. She said she begged the boy's social worker to take him to the hospital but was told his odd behavior may have been because he was adjusting to an increased dose of Zoloft, his prescribed antidepressant. Advertisement While psychiatrists consulted by the newspaper said it's highly unlikely that a modest change to his antidepressant could alone be responsible for Steven's death, experts say the tragedy should send a clear message to child welfare workers who care for emotionally fragile kids on psychiatric drugs. "The caregiver and the social worker, they need to feel the urgency and take action immediately to make sure the youth's health isn't in danger," said Jennifer Rodriguez, executive director of the San Francisco-based Youth Law Center and a former California foster youth who felt neglected when she experienced debilitating side effects from psych meds. Drugging Our Kids The full Bay Area News Group investigation, including a documentary video. Rodriguez said she often hears foster parents complain that they don't have enough training about "really scary side effects or how the drugs interact with over-the-counter meds or even street drugs." By all accounts, Steven's death is unusual. An average of three or four children died each year while placed out of their homes in foster care, according to state Department of Social Services numbers from 2008 through 2013. What is not rare is the questionable overuse of medication in foster care, which is now the subject of a statewide investigation by the California Medical Board, spurred by the newspaper's ongoing series. Nearly 1 out of 4 adolescents in state foster care receive psychotropic medications, the newspaper found, more than three times the rate for all teens nationwide. And since foster kids often bounce among caregivers who know little about their medical histories, experts worry they often don't receive enough monitoring. Steven had been living in the Antioch foster home of Dorothy Brown since his 16th birthday last August. Three other foster children have been moved from her home since Steven's death, according to state and county officials. Efforts to reach Brown and Steven's social worker were unsuccessful, and the agency that employed both of them -- Families for Children, a nonprofit adoption and foster family agency -- chose not to comment, as did the psychiatrist who prescribed his medication and had been treating him since 2013. At the time of his death, Steven had been prescribed Zoloft and the sedating antihistamine Vistaril to treat depression, anxiety and sleep problems, according to relatives and records. Zoloft is approved for use on children suffering from major depression and obsessive-compulsive disorder. Vistaril is sometimes prescribed with Zoloft to reduce the side effect of tremors, or to help with anxiety or sleeplessness, but it is generally used short term. Four child psychiatrists consulted by the newspaper about the medications prescribed for the roughly 5-foot-10, 150-pound teen, said they were not uncommon. But one cautioned that Zoloft and Vistaril together could cause dizziness, drowsiness and impaired thinking. According to the FDA, Vistaril can cause "hypersedation" and "stupor." Last year, Steven had been removed from his grandmother's home after police were called during a sibling's violent outburst. He had been increasingly missing school and scout meetings since then and told his girlfriend's father that he yearned to return to his grandmother. On Dec. 18, the day before his death, he slept until noon and was again absent from school. Later that afternoon, Garvey and Steven's father (who shares the same name) waited anxiously at a Subway sandwich shop for the teen to arrive for a supervised visit. They had planned to treat him to his favorite meatball sandwich and deliver his Christmas gifts. But Unangst and Garvey said they were shocked as Steven stumbled across the parking lot into the sandwich shop with his social worker's help. In a cellphone video taken by his father and shared with the newspaper, Steven struggles to eat his sandwich and keep his eyes open. He tells his father he doesn't know what's wrong and said he had taken his pill the night before, fallen asleep at 9 p.m., and slept until noon. "His eyes were rolling around in his head, he was slobbering, he couldn't sit up straight," Garvey said. "I said: 'This child needs to go to the hospital, something's wrong.' " Garvey said she convinced the social worker to call Steven's psychiatrist, but he was able only to leave a message and then took Steven to the foster home. "If this kid couldn't go to school and couldn't walk, why wouldn't you take him to the doctor?" said Todd Whitmire, Pittsburg High's principal, who described Steven as bright and highly capable. On Jan. 2, weeks after the boy's death, Garvey said she spoke with the boy's psychiatrist, who was "adamant" that the drug combination he was prescribed could not have been fatal or caused the symptoms Steven displayed in the sandwich shop. Garvey said the psychiatrist told her she had increased the dosage of Zoloft but that after hearing the social worker's phone message about an "adverse reaction," she recommended cutting it in half. Contra Costa County spokeswoman Lynn Yaney said local officials are awaiting results of the Antioch police investigation and autopsy reports. "Our job is to take care of kids and keep them safe, and when something like this happens it is absolutely devastating," she said. Meanwhile, Garvey has tried to explain to Steven's two younger cousins why he wasn't coming home. "God really, really needed him up in heaven for an important project," she said. "So the angels came and got him." Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source: http://www.contracostatimes.com/breaking-news/ci_27307607/contra-costa-county-foster-youths-mysterious-death-under Brain injury to boy in foster care prompts lawsuit against county, state Brain injury to boy in foster care prompts lawsuit against county, state Kasandra Shamas, aka Kasandra Martinsen. (Courtesy/Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department) image By YESENIA AMARO LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL The mother and maternal grandparents of a boy who suffered severe brain injury in 2012 while in foster care are suing Nevada and Clark County. The federal civil rights lawsuit alleges Clark County's child welfare system isn't compliant with state and federal laws and claims the state fails to provide oversight. The lawsuit names Clark County Manager Don Burnette, Clark County Department of Family Services Director Lisa Ruiz-Lee, former director of the Nevada Department of Health and Human Services Mike Willden and Amber Howell, administrator for the state's Division of Child and Family Services. The lawsuit centers on Alexander Laws, a 2-year-old who in 2012 was shaken so severely that his brain swelled, according to police at the time. The toddler had to have emergency surgery to remove a portion of his skull to allow his brain to expand. The boy now lives with his mother and grandparents, according to the lawsuit. His long-term prognosis is unclear. "In civil lawsuits, you hope that changes are made to policies and that the goal of protecting kids is the overriding goal," R. Todd Terry, one of the attorneys for Natalie Nelson, Alexander's biological mother, said Wednesday. Problems in Clark County's child welfare and court system are the focus of a state blue ribbon committee, which will hold its third meeting today. The committee is expected to announce five points of reform. The lawsuit was first filed in January 2013 in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas. A failed attempt was made in early 2014 to settle the case. Attorneys hope to go to trial late this year or in 2016. In a case like this one, there are a lot of witnesses to interview and it's a time-consuming process, Terry said. "We look forward to being able to have our day in court and have a jury of Clark County residents make decisions based on the evidence that we are obtaining," he said. Alexander is alleged to have been shaken by Osbaldo Sanchez, a male friend of the boy's former foster mother, Kasandra Martinsen. Martinsen disclosed that she had left Alexander and another foster child with Sanchez while she worked a 12-hour shift. At the time of the incident, Clark County Family Services in a statement said the agency did not know that Sanchez was a caregiver for the boy, and emphasized that Martinsen never got approval from the department to have Sanchez baby-sit. However, according to the lawsuit, about a day after Alexander was placed in Martinsen's home, a caseworker noted a "male friend" at the foster home. Martinsen told the caseworker that the man, believed to be Sanchez, came to her house two to three times each week. "Upon information and belief, the agency caseworker did not conduct a background check on the 'male friend,' despite collecting his information," according to the lawsuit. Attorneys representing the family haven't seen any physical evidence that a background check of Sanchez was conducted, Terry said. The lawsuit also alleges that Martinsen was approved as a licensed foster mother around Oct. 15, 2012. A few weeks later, around Nov. 1, 2012, Alexander was placed in her home. She also had a 6-year-old foster child in her care. Alexander was removed from his home after his mother was taken into custody for an outstanding warrant for an unpaid taxi fare, according to the lawsuit. The lawsuit claims Family Services did not ensure it was placing the boy with an appropriate foster parent who would be able to care for him. "Martinsen knew that she was required to use the approved day care provider, but her shift was too long and the day care provider would not be able to extend the care for duration of her shift," the lawsuit reads. "The agency (Family Services) and the foster mother Martinsen were both aware that supplemental child care was needed for Alexander and the other foster child present in the home." Sanchez was arrested soon after Alexander was injured in 2012. The boy later suffered a stroke and a series of seizures before having parts of his skull removed, according to police. Gregory Coyer, a lawyer representing Sanchez, said his client's criminal trial is scheduled for April 27. He has pleaded not guilty to two felony charges, including child abuse, neglect or endangerment with substantial bodily harm. "He is still presumed innocent," Coyer said of Sanchez, who is not in custody. T. Augustus Claus, an attorney representing Martinsen, didn't return calls seeking comment. But court records show that Martinsen also pleaded not guilty to a felony charge for child neglect or endangerment with substantial bodily harm. She also is awaiting trial. Last year, Nevada child welfare officials told the Legislative Committee on Child Welfare and Juvenile Justice, that some of the most significant injuries to foster children are inflicted by people child welfare agencies lack the authority to screen. Ruiz-Lee said in March 2014 that Family Services does conduct background checks of people who are not residents of a foster home, but are regularly or routinely found there. Clark County spokesman Erik Pappa did not respond to questions Wednesday about whether Alexander's case prompted Family Services to implement those kinds of background checks. "We are very interested to see what policies were really in effect at the time that this occurred and what county employees believed those policies were," Terry said. Contact Yesenia Amaro at yamaro@reviewjournal.com or 702-383-0440. Find her on Twitter: @YeseniaAmaro. Source: <http://www.reviewjournal.com/news/las-vegas/brain-injury-boy-foster-care-prompts-lawsuit-against-county-state>

Kendrea Johnson: Foster Care Suicide? 6-Year-Old Girl Found Hanging From Noose Kendrea Johnson was found dead with a noose around her neck inside her foster home in Minnesota. The 6-year-old's grandmother does not think the foster care death was a suicide, but agency records show the child had homicidal and suicidal thoughts up to seven days per week. Police officers have reportedly stated that the manner of Johnson's death could not yet be determined. The foster care suicide occurred in Brooklyn Par, Minnesota, on December 27. Police are reportedly strongly considering that Kendrea Johnson committed suicide. In June 2013, the 6-year-old foster child was assessed by medical professionals, who determined that Johnson was having suicidal or homicidal thoughts, and mental health treatment was ordered. Records reportedly also indicate that Kendrea Johnson also exhibited signs of "severe guilt" and allegedly felt she does not feel either "acceptable" or "lovable." Johnson also reportedly feels responsible for being removed from her home and being placed in foster care. The 6-year-old was placed in foster care last year, after a child protection agency accused the girl's mother of failing to adhere to an "action protection plan" and of drug abuse, according to the Star Tribune. While in foster care, Kendrea Johnson's behavior reportedly changed, and "one foster mother" said the little girl wanted to kill herself by jumping out of a window. Johnson also drew photos of a child hanging from a rope while at school. Healed ligature marks on the sides of her neck were discovered by Minnesota police investigators. The child protection agency report also indicate that while Kendrea Johnson had suicidal thoughts every single day of the week at one point, such feelings had allegedly dissipated to five days per week in the days leading up to the child's death. The same investigation report also states that the 6-year-old foster care girl was in "good mood" just a few hours before her body was found. Kendrea had enjoyed a second helping of her dinner, and then went to her bedroom to watch television. Johnson had been reportedly been looked in upon about 10 minutes before her lifeless body was found hanging from a rope. In the initial police report, an officer had reportedly noted that the knot in the noose appeared "too sophisticated" for a child so young to accomplish. Brooklyn Park Police Chief Mark Bruley said that law enforcement investigators ultimately decided that the medical examiner was accurate when stating that the suicide by hanging was "outside what a normal 6-year-old could think about." What do you think about the Kendrea Johnson death? Foster care suicide or murder? Source: <http://www.inquisitr.com/1758376/kendrea-johnson-foster-care-suicide-6-year-old-girl-found-hanging-from-noose/>

Foster Care: Where Precious Children Go To Die Neighborhood DT Section Commentary Where Precious Children Go To Die Foster Care in over 80% of cases does not help children. When a child is removed from biological family they lose contact with all relatives, not just their parents and siblings. These children are emotionally destroyed forever, affecting their entire lives. Over 60% of people in our prisons came through the foster care system. In America we are destroying our society by destroying our families. Tags #child protective service #children #family #family court #foster care Other articles by the same author THE FEED Black Lives Matter starts local conversation about race new 5th Annual WINTERWEST RETURNS TO GR'S WEST SIDE WITH CRAZY CARDBOARD SLED RACE new Olivia Mainville - "Some Other Day" Olivia Mainville - "Qualities" Catalyst Radio: Change U social justice series begins Jan. 23 with Confronting Structural Violence A home in Heartside: Guiding Light Mission offers food, shelter, way forward Foster Care: Where Precious Children Go To Die updated Christopher Titus to perform at Wealthy Theatre January 15 Justice: Bryan Stevenson calls for new metric Disability 101 \(Part 1\): Disability as dialogue DGRI to bring champion of data-driven goals to speaker series Multiple locations available city wide to recycle Christmas trees View more » by Citizens for Parental Rights (Citizens for Pa...) on Thursday Jan 15th, 2015 12:41am in NONPROFITS Child Protective Service / Family Court child removals also known as trafficking children for profit. Visit <http://youtu.be/P8PtKfS3Efo> and view some of the thousands of children who lost their lives in state care through Child Protective Service and the Family Court system. Across America the push is on to find more foster care homes for children who have been removed from their family. But there are questions that should be asked regarding foster care. Why do we need more foster homes? Why have children been removed? Do people bother to investigate a child's case before agreeing to foster that child? Do those who have a desire to foster truly understand what foster caring is all about? Do they desire to help a child or are they only desirous of the income received from fostering a child? After all, many children die at the hands of their foster caregiver. These questions are important. In this article we will be concerned with why any child would need a foster home. There are countless articles that address these questions. There are countless videos that address the questions. There are countless organizations that advocate for children removed from families. There are not countless people taking interest in why a child is removed from a family. Most of this information addressing the crisis of child removal is addressing how in this nation, its states or its counties, could there possibly be a need to remove so many children. <http://youtu.be/AMJJ4oCSMoU> There may be reasons most people are unaware of regarding child removals. In the 70's the "Child Abuse and Prevention Act" was adopted in Congress. In the 90's the "Adoption and Safe Families Act" was adopted. Therefore, most people believe that Child Protective Service (CPS) is providing a necessary service. To a degree that is true, but to a larger degree that is untrue. These acts provided for much federal funding being made available to Child Protective Service and their contracted agencies. Former Vice President Walter Mondale stated that he could see the Child Abuse and Prevention Act making it possible for the states to make a business out of child removals. That is exactly what has taken place across America. It is important to address this crisis of child removals right here in our own backyard of Kent County. Even now the Kent County agencies such as D.A. Blodgett, Bethany Christian Service, Lutheran Social Service, Holy Cross Children's Services and Catholic Charities are agencies involved in child removals. Most people believe these agencies are just adoption agencies and separate from Child Protective Service. However they are agencies contracted by CPS. Our Kent County Board of Commission is involved in Project 515 http://mediad.publicbroadcasting.net/p/michigan/files/201310/Project_515 - Kent County Foster Care Purchase of Services Project Plan Final 9-30-13.pdf which privatizes these agencies in the workings of Child Protective Service. This leads to control of child removals by the agencies. An Article by Richard Wexler, Executive Director (retired) of the National Coalition for Child Protection Reform (www.nccpr.org), regarding child welfare finance, titled "You Get What You Pay For" at <http://www.nccpr.org/reports/finance.pdf> is very eye opening. Reading on page 10 at page end and continuing through to page 12 is stated the following:the net work of private agencies that needs a steady supply of foster children to stay in business, and their allies, will continue with business as usual. These agencies often have blue chip boards of directors, larded with the business, civic and religious elite of their communities. They will make sure that the pressure remains on to take away at least as many children as before. Is it possible that these agencies are creating the need for foster homes by continually removing children from families unnecessarily? If we are to believe this, then we must consider why this is being done since parents are seldom if ever convicted of any crime against their children. In Kent County we have seven judges hearing CPS/Family Court cases. Are there really so many children being abused and neglected in Kent County to require a need for seven judges hearing child removal cases every day in Kent County? Could it be true that agencies and our courts wrongfully remove children for federal funding? Are they making a case, where there is no need, just to remove a child? It is stated that over 25 professions deal with child removals. These professions must have paychecks and the money for those paychecks must come from somewhere. <http://youtu.be/zEgMounuRU> The agencies have boards of directors which control them. They are mostly philanthropic people who are very knowledgeable in the workings of these agencies. An agency such as D.A. Blodgett proudly places the names of their directors on their website www.dablodgett.org under the heading of "Who We Are". Perhaps you may know some of these directors. Many families state that their children were removed wrongfully and therefore were legally kidnapped, such as this example of a D.A. Blodgett case: <http://www.wxyz.com/news/local-news/investigations/a-grandma-desperate-to-adopt-her-grandson-fought-the-state-and-lost> Citizens for Parental Rights is aware of many such cases wrongfully handled by D.A. Blodgett in Kent County. Nationwide over 80% of children are wrongly removed for the federal funding to states, which annually is many billions of dollars. Will Gaston, founder of "A Voice for Children" with his wife Pam wrote a book titled "Sui Juris". The last statement on page 16 speaks to the massive numbers of children kidnapped by the states in this nation. http://familyrights.us/bin/sui_juris If people do not rise up and stop this atrocity, we can expect untold numbers of children leaving their families. Thinking not yours? Think again! Many people who thought that way wish now they had thought differently. Joining Citizens for Parental Rights in Kent County is always an option to help change what is taking place with our children. If you do nothing then expect nothing, except maybe a knock at your door by CPS. Citizens for Parental Rights: falseallegations@mail.com "The world is a dangerous place, not because of those who do evil, but because of those who look on and do nothing" ~ Albert Einstein Source: <http://therapidian.org/foster-care-where-precious-children-go-die>

Brandi Edwards, social worker for troubled teens has sex with 16 year old student January 18, 2015 By Christopher Koulouris Leave a Comment What was Brandi Edwards thinking? Brandi Edwards, a 26 year old master's degree student working as a trainee social school at a school for troubled teens in Chicago has been charged with criminal sexual assault after having sex with a 16 year old student. During her appearance in court on Saturday the woman admitted she had a sexual relationship with the sophomore student at RISE Alternative High School starting in November. According to a report via the Chicago Tribune the relationship began when Edwards wrote her phone number on the boy's journal. Soon after, in November, Edwards allegedly picked the boy up and had sex with him in her car outside his home. Before the meeting, prosecutors say the two exchanged sexual text messages. Edwards and the boy would have sex a second time in her car and then a third time at a forest preserve. They had sex a final time at a hotel room, say investigators. Told the woman's linkedIn profile: 'I am an emerging social worker and I know that I will need to change what habits I am in order to best assess my client's needs,' 'I will also know that there will be times when I have to step back and separate personal from professional because I have such a big heart that I will not want my personal persona to interfere with my client in any way.' Reflected Cook County Judge Adam Bourgeois Jr. during yesterday's court hearing: 'Some days, I'm baffled.' Judge Bourgeois ordered Edwards to wear an ankle monitoring bracelet and to stay in her Homer Glen home. 'You better not set foot outside that house,' the judge said. Edwards' police report would also indicate she was also employed as a substitute teacher at a Naperville school. Edwards' attorney, however, would tell the judge she was no longer employed. No reason was offered as to why she was no longer employed. Edwards was also ordered not to have any contact with the boy via social media and has since had bail set at $250 000. Filed Under: Scandal and Gossip Tagged With: Brandi Edwards, Cook County Judge Adam Bourgeois Jr., RISE Alternative High School Source: <http://scallywagandvagabond.com/2015/01/brandi-edwards-social-worker-for-troubled-teens-sex-16-year-old-student/> Center for troubled girls will close, cites decision by DCFS Caption'Scared to death to return' Anthony Souffle / Chicago Tribune Michele Gans' daughter Emma, left, was attacked at Rock River Academy. The beating by peers left Emma with a broken facial bone and chunks of hair torn from her head. Gans brought her daughter home to western Illinois. Michele Gans' daughter Emma, left, was attacked at Rock River Academy. The beating by peers left Emma with a broken facial bone and chunks of hair torn from her head. Gans brought her daughter home to western Illinois. (Anthony Souffle / Chicago Tribune) See more galleries Caption'I was fighting every day' Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune Rock River Academy in Rockford is a 59-bed facility for juvenile state wards and girls with behavior problems. Many girls said they came out more damaged than when they went in. Rock River Academy in Rockford is a 59-bed facility for juvenile state wards and girls with behavior problems. Many girls said they came out more damaged than when they went in. (Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune) See more galleries CaptionWe felt caged Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune MsWhitney Holt said sexual violence was common at Rock River Academy. Today she is building a new life as a restaurant manager with a child and an apartment of her own. MsWhitney Holt said sexual violence was common at Rock River Academy. Today she is building a new life as a restaurant manager with a child and an apartment of her own. (Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune) See more galleries Caption'My experience was horrible' Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune MsWhitney Holt plays with her daughter at her apartment in Elk Grove Village. In one incident at Rock River, Holt recalled, "out of nowhere they came up and attacked me from behind." MsWhitney Holt plays with her daughter at her apartment in Elk Grove Village. In one incident at Rock River, Holt recalled, "out of nowhere they came up and attacked me from behind." (Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune) See more galleries Caption'It was a waste of time' Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune MsWhitney Holt says she had an eating disorder but got no effective therapy at Rock River. MsWhitney Holt says she had an eating disorder but got no effective therapy at Rock River. (Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune) See more galleries By David Jackson, Gary Marx and Duaa Eldeib Chicago Tribune contact the reporters Crime Sexual Assault Prostitution Juvenile Delinquency University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign Rock River Academy is voluntarily terminating its contract with the Department of Children and Family Services A prominent but troubled residential facility for youths is closing following Tribune reports that children inside the Rockford center were assaulted and lured into prostitution. The 59-bed, all-girls Rock River Academy issued a statement Wednesday saying it was forced to shut down after the state Department of Children and Family Services unfairly stopped placing juvenile wards in the facility last month. "This decision will regretfully result in the closing of the facility as Rock River does not have enough non-ward residents to remain viable," the statement said. We felt caged: Seven stories of Rock River Academy David Jackson and Gary Marx [In its investigation of Rock River Academy in Rockford, the Tribune examined thousands of pages of confidential juvenile case files and other records but also interviewed 20 former residents for their recollections of life inside the facility. In its investigation of Rock River Academy in Rockford, the Tribune examined thousands of pages of confidential juvenile case files and other records but also interviewed 20 former residents for their recollections of life inside the facility. \(David Jackson and Gary Marx.\) The Tribune's "Harsh Treatment" series, published in early December, documented dozens of alleged physical and sexual assaults of youths by other residents at the taxpayer-funded center, which serves girls with behavioral and mental health problems. Many teens fled the facility, and some were prostituted in Rockford, Chicago and beyond. DCFS quickly responded by sending monitors into Rock River, imposing the intake hold and demanding corrective actions. The facility says it will close in 90 days. As of Wednesday, 26 DCFS wards and one girl placed by another state agency remained in the center, according to state officials and the facility. Four additional residents were in hospitals, and a fifth was in detention. DCFS has completed full clinical assessments of all remaining wards and is working to place them in the roughly 50 other residential treatment centers across the state, a government official said. \[Related Harsh Treatment PDF: Rock River Academy announces closing\]\(#\) \[See all related 8\]\(#\) "We are disappointed in what's happened at Rock River," DCFS spokesman Andrew Flach said. "In the last few weeks, we feel that steps to improve the facility were taking place. Our focus is on ensuring the smooth transition and appropriate placement to address the individual needs for the youth currently residing there." The Tribune's reporting on the aggression and turbulence inside Rock River was drawn from interviews with dozens of former residents and workers as well as thousands of pages of confidential juvenile case files, police reports and other documents. Those records and interviews depicted a chaotic environment that not only led to physical assaults but often thwarted efforts to help residents with their therapy and education. Many young people spoke of developing relationships with trusted staff — only to see them quit or be fired. Others said workers mocked or ignored them, and few said they had been helped in any meaningful way or even kept safe. In its statement, Rock River said DCFS acted capriciously when it put the facility on intake hold following the Tribune articles. \[Actions prompted by Harsh Treatment series \\(timeline\\)\]\(#\) \[Chicago Tribune Graphics\]\(#\) \[Chicago Tribune Graphics\]\(#\) "The recent bed-hold placed upon Rock River by DCFS, which we strenuously dispute, was instituted without due process or fairness to the facility," Rock River said. "We have not been provided any specific information as to when or how the bed-hold will be lifted. ... This places us in an untenable situation in which we can no longer operate." A state official rejected the accusation of unfairness, saying DCFS does not put an end-date on intake holds, instead lifting those sanctions when state monitors see sustained improvement and believe residents are safe and properly cared for. State officials also said they met frequently with Rock River administrators to ensure their expectations for corrective action were clear. Rock River's statement said the facility had improved the lives of many youths. "It is unfortunate that recent media stories and DCFS's ensuing reaction have overshadowed these countless successes." \[cComments\]\(#\) Bohanan, I went thru this with my daughter she was at Rock River as you know and they allowed the children to make the rules, I could never get in touch with her meanwhile I live in NY really meanwhile we need to build a relationship instead they pulled her away from me and allowed her to... bohanan at 11:07 AM February 01, 2015 \[Add a comment\]\(#\) \[See all comments 20\]\(#\) Administrators said they hope to overhaul the facility for another use. "We hope to return sometime in the future," the statement said. The facility has disputed the Tribune's reports in recent weeks, telling Rockford media that the newspaper's account "focused on isolated cases and old allegations." The most recently available DCFS data show Rock River has remained among the most troubled facilities in Illinois by several key measures of harm to juvenile wards. During the five-month period from July 2014 through November, for example, Rock River had the highest rate of youths manually restrained by staff among the 52 residential treatment centers measured by DCFS. The rate of these physical restraints at Rock River was nearly eight times the median for all Illinois facilities. \[Graphic essay: A beating by peers, chaos during class and a bold bid for freedom\]\(#\) \[Chicago Tribune Graphics\]\(#\) \[Chicago Tribune Graphics\]\(#\) Rock River had the second-highest rate of self-inflicted wounds by wards and the second-highest rate of wards sent to a psychiatric hospital. In addition, it had the third-highest rate of wards detained by police or charged with crimes, and the fifth-highest rate of alleged aggressive acts by wards. Rock River is owned by Universal Health Services Inc., a \$7 billion-per-year company that runs more than 190 behavioral health facilities across the country. Universal is facing a widening federal probe into conditions of care and billing practices at more than a dozen of its operations, including Rock River and three psychiatric hospitals in Illinois. Universal and its executives and staff have not been accused of wrongdoing. The Justice Department probe of Universal facilities in Illinois began in 2008 after the Tribune documented allegations that youths were sexually assaulted at west suburban Riveredge Hospital, which Universal subsequently acquired in a merger. At the time, DCFS commissioned the University of Illinois at Chicago's psychiatry department to examine conditions at Riveredge. The UIC team went on to produce critical reports of other Universal facilities in Illinois and alerted DCFS to problems at Rock River. Before the Tribune published its account of conditions inside Rock River in December, Universal issued a statement warning the newspaper not to rely on the accounts of former residents. "You are receiving information from patients who have had often horrific life experiences and have mental health issues," it said. "Their characterization of issues and facts do not accurately reflect what really happened." "That really makes me upset," said Cleanna Parker-Lewis, 20, one of the former residents who spoke out in the Tribune about her experience at the facility. "I was happy to speak up. I wouldn't want other females to go through what I went through." The facility's dismissal of the girls' accounts came as no surprise to another former resident, MsWhitney Holt, 23. She said juvenile wards like her had complained for years about the facility to juvenile court judges and caseworkers, to no avail. "They were saying that we were lying and none of this stuff was true," she said. Of Wednesday's announced closure, Holt said: "This should have happened a long time ago." Across Illinois, the Tribune investigation documented hundreds of assault and rape allegations in residential treatment centers each year as authorities failed to act on reports of harm and continued sending youths to the most violent facilities. \[Related Harsh Treatment PDF: Rock River Academy announces closing\]\(#\) \[See all related 8\]\(#\) Placed at the](#) centers for safety and help, children instead were preyed on by hardened peers, subjected to gang violence and taught a life of crime — including prostitution — that affected the surrounding communities. Education and therapy fell by the wayside as low-paid and overwhelmed staffers struggled with the most aggressive teens. And some youths with histories of sexual abuse reported being attacked again by peers and even by their adult caregivers. DCFS placed four other centers on intake hold following the Tribune series. The hold on Cunningham Children's Home in Urbana has been lifted. Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/watchdog/rte/chi-youth-treatment-rock-river-20150128-story.html?page=2>

Attorney: Rape of Foster Girl Caused by Systemic Failure | NBC 10 Philadelphia Attorney: Rape of Foster Girl Caused by Systemic Failure By Harry Hairston and David Chang View Comments \(\) | Email | Print NEWSLETTERS Receive the latest investigations updates in your inbox Privacy Policy | More Newsletters Attorney: Rape of Foster Girl Caused by... Link Embed Email Copy Close Link to this video Copy Close Embed this video Replay More videos (1 of 9) «» As a man gets ready to go on trial for raping his 7-year-old foster child, NBC10 uncovers new information. The agency that placed her in the home allegedly knew of a prior sexual molestation investigation of Walter Scott, and had documentation that no other child should be placed in that home. NBC10's Harry Hairston has more. (Published Tuesday, Jan 27, 2015) Updated at 6:06 PM EST on Thursday, Jan 29, 2015 As a Philadelphia man accused of raping his 7-year-old foster daughter prepares for his trial, the girl's lawyer is speaking out, claiming the placement agency put the girl in the home after the man was accused of inappropriately touching another child. Walter Scott was arrested in 2013 after he allegedly raped his 7-year-old foster daughter on two separate occasions. He was charged with involuntary deviate sexual intercourse with a child and is currently out on $100,000 bond. His trial is set to begin Thursday and he has denied all allegations against him. Man Accused of Raping Foster Daughter The girl's attorney, Nadeem Bezar, told NBC10 Children Protective Service investigators were looking into a complaint only days before the Presbyterian Children's Village, the foster care placement agency now known as the Village, placed the girl in Scott's care. "Presbyterian Children's Village has admitted that the child should not have been placed in the respite home in February, 2013," Bezar said. "Another child had complained that Mr. Scott had patted her backside and touched her a few times so she felt uncomfortable." WATCH: Officers Foil Dunkin' Donuts Robbery According to Bezar, the Village failed to investigate the allegation. Bezar also said Scott was not arrested until five months after the first alleged rape. Bezar later filed a lawsuit against Presbyterian on the child's behalf. A spokesperson for Presbyterian denied the allegations against the agency when we first covered this story last year. 3 Hurt After Car Strikes Trolley: Officials Bezar showed NBC10 a document, written Feb. 19, 2013, stating a case manager for the Village informed the Department of Human Services that "there will be no other children placed in the home." The letter referred to another child who accused Scott of inappropriate behavior inside his home on Feb. 18. Bezar told NBC10 the girl was still placed in Scott's home on Feb. 20 despite the report. Councilman Jim Kenney to Resign: Is Mayoral Run Next? "When you have a system that's supposed to stop placement in a home because it's under investigation and you go through that system and don't abide by it, it makes us all nervous," Bezar said. NBC10 reached out to the Department of Human Services but they had no comment. NBC10 also reached out to the Village regarding the most recent allegations from Bezar. Local Police Asked to Look Out for Drone Use "We are unable to comment because of federal and state privacy laws as well as the fact that this is an ongoing legal matter," a spokesperson wrote. Bezar said that what happened to the young girl was a systemic failure. A 'Lyt' From Your Smartphone "It is a stop sign that not just one person ran through but three, four, five people ran through," he said. "If our system is supposed to protect these children then you better go out and make sure you have the right people that are sitting and taking care of them." Bezar told NBC10 he plans on filing a motion seeking punitive damages against the Village. The Department of Public Welfare is the state agency that licenses foster homes. A spokesperson from the agency told NBC10 that any foster parent accused of abusing children is automatically placed on a list preventing them from contacting foster children. Read more: <http://www.nbcphiladelphia.com/news/local/Attorney-Rape-of-Foster-Girl-Caused-by-Systemic-Failure-290007381.html#ixzz3OYP8Ttcq> Follow us: @nbcphiladelphia on Twitter | nbcphiladelphia on Facebook

State official links troubled foster care system to human trafficking Kamala Harris Jae C. Hong, Associated Press Atty. Gen. Kamala Harris was twice elected San Francisco's district attorney. She is running to replace Sen. Barbara Boxer in 2016. Atty. Gen. Kamala Harris was twice elected San Francisco's district attorney. She is running to replace Sen. Barbara Boxer in 2016. (Jae C. Hong, Associated Press) By Marisa Gerber contact the reporter UCLA U.S. Senate State Atty. Gen. Kamala Harris says the foster care system is contributing to concern about human trafficking Speaking at a UCLA symposium on human trafficking Friday, California Atty. Gen. Kamala Harris talked about how the state's broken foster care system is contributing to the problem. Related L.A. Now Andrew Do wins seat on Orange County Board of Supervisors See all related 8 "Human trafficking is not a monolith. There are many components," Harris said, adding that "of all the discrete parts contributing to our concern about human trafficking, our foster care system is a big one.... The foster care system in California is not working." eComments Foster care youth often have no where to go when they emancipate. Some estimate that as many as half will become homeless within 6 months of emancipation. Covenant House California is a non-profit agency whose mission is to reach out to at-risk homeless youth living on the streets and offer... CovenantHouseCA at 8:59 AM February 04, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 9 During her address, Harris said that 59% of children arrested on prostitution-related charges in L.A. County spent time in the foster care system. The 2010 statistic drew audible gasps from the audience of more than 100 law students, county officials and victim advocates. Harris said she had witnessed the problem firsthand years ago, while prosecuting a gang rape case in Alameda County. The victim was a teenager who lived in a group home. "She was so vulnerable to anyone who would give her attention," Harris said, noting that, as is often the case with victims of human trafficking, the girl was a difficult witness. While testifying against her attackers, the girl crossed her arms, smacked her gum and avoided eye contact. Harris chose to address the girl's attitude during her closing remarks to jurors. "I said, 'I know you don't like her,'" Harris recounted. "'And I will tell you, that's exactly what those predators counted on.'" Harris won the conviction and said that when she thinks about that girl now it reminds her of the importance of labeling her -- and others like her -- as victims, not "teen prostitutes." "That reads: mini criminal," she said. "We cannot treat our witness like a criminal." A front-runner in the race to fill Barbara Boxer's U.S. Senate seat, Harris also touched on transnational crime issues during her speech. She recounted a 2011 visit to the border town of Calexico, where she saw elaborate tunnels used to smuggle drugs, weapons and people into the U.S. from Mexico. Officials at the border told her they'd seen kids as young as 5 being trafficked through the tunnels. One of the biggest ways to stop human trafficking, Harris told the crowd, was to keep caring about the issue and to educate others. "Part of what is insidious about human trafficking," she said, "is that people don't see what they're seeing." Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/lanow/la-me-ln-foster-care-human-trafficking-20150130-story.html>

Finally, Arizona's foster children take a stand Laurie Roberts Laurie Roberts, The Republic | azcentral.com 12:08 p.m. MST February 3, 2015 (Photo: Larisa Lofitskaya, Getty Images/iStockphoto) Tags Arizona Department of Health PTSD 1360 CONNECT 41 TWEETLINKEDIN 18 COMMENTEMAILMORE Finally, the foster children of this state are standing up for themselves. Or more specifically, a pair of law firms and a national advocacy group are standing up for them. On Tuesday, they filed a federal lawsuit against the state of Arizona, contending that the Departments of Child Safety and Health Services are abusing already-traumatized kids. The lawsuit, which includes 10 children as plaintiffs, paints an alarming picture of an overwhelmed system that is seizing far more children than it can properly care for. The result is hurting the very children the state is sworn to protect. "What you are seeing in the complaint and in the stories of these children is something that's been going on for a really long time," Anne Ronan, of Arizona Center for Law in the Public Interest, told me. "It's just gotten exponentially worse with the 46 percent increase in kids removed." Actually, from March 2010 to September 2014, the number of children in foster care grew a jaw dropping 66 percent, according to state records. The lawsuit alleges: -Too many kids torn apart from their brothers and sisters and not just for a few days but for years. -Too few children helped with basic needs, like eyeglasses or treatment for the physical and mental traumas they've endured. -Too few investigators coming to the aid of children who are being abused while in foster care. -Too few foster care homes for the kids who are stacking up like cord wood, shuffled here and there, growing up in institutions rather than homes and even sleeping at times in DCS offices. It's a heck of a way to spend those precious few years of childhood. Unlike most of the country and despite last year's reforms that were supposed to start fixing the mess that was Child Protective Services, Arizona continues to yank kids out of their homes in unprecedented numbers. Despite a goal of reducing the number of kids in foster care, it actually went up another 7 percent during the six-month period that ended in September: from 15,751 children in foster care to 16,990. And rising every day, based on the crush of calls I've been getting lately, from parents and grandparents who have lost their children to DCS. The kids are theoretically being taken to protect them. The lawsuit, however, paints a picture not of protection but of state-sanctioned abuse and neglect. Like the 8-year-old girl who entered foster care in 2012 for the third time. She showed signs of PTSD and abuse yet was separated from her siblings and dumped into a group home as an "emergency shelter" — an emergency that lasted two years. The lawsuit alleges the state ignored the little girl's need for glasses, along with her limp and a nagging toothache and failed to get her proper help even though she began hearing voices and threatened to hurt herself or others. Like the 7-year-old boy who has been in foster care since he was four and already has attended eight different schools and lived in 11 different places – including one place where he was physically abused and another a Spanish speaking home even though he doesn't speak Spanish. After his fifth placement, he became suicidal and diagnosed with PTSD. This, at the ripe old age of 6. He never sees his sisters anymore – the only people who mean something to him -- because they've been adopted. And he's not getting much therapy these days, the lawsuit says, because his current placement is considered "temporary". Like the four siblings, ages 3 to 7, who didn't see their mother for the first four months they were in foster care, despite a plan to reunify the family. Like a 14-year-old boy named Bryce who has been in foster care since he was 5, shuttled from one group home to the next, cut off from his brothers, denied psychiatric care he desperately needs. "I feel like I get tossed around like a bag of chips," he said in October 2012. In December 2014, Bryce threatened suicide and in January, he was put into juvenile detention after an incident at a group home. This boy has spent most of his life in foster care and says he doesn't expect to ever find a permanent family. I could go on. Instead, I'll talk about shortages. A shortage of preventive services that could allow children to stay in their own homes. A shortage of foster homes where kids can be nurtured and cared for – or at least treated better than a bag of chips. Or a lost cause. A shortage of mental-health treatment to help them through experiences that no child should ever have to endure. Certainly, not when they are in our care, on our watch. The one thing we aren't short on in this state? An army of children being yanked out of their homes – the vast majority due to neglect, not abuse. "A lot of it is poverty and substance abuse," Ronan told me. "It's lack of child care. It's lack of jobs. If we decided we don't want to help those families then the state becomes their family and they better do a better job of being their family and they just don't." They don't. Or put another way, we don't. In addition to the Arizona Center for Law in the Public Interest, the lawsuit is being brought by Coppersmith Brockelman and Children's Rights, a national advocacy group that focuses on child welfare. Ronan says they're hoping to get the lawsuit certified as a class-action suit, in order to force, finally, the state to do its job. It's frustrating that it has come to this. Maddening that the new and supposedly improved DCS has apparently been unable to make a dent in fixing the problems plaguing woeful old CPS. But mostly it's just incredibly tragic for 16,990 Arizona kids ... and counting. Source: <http://www.azcentral.com/story/laurieroberts/2015/02/03/foster-children-lawsuit-arizona/22804043/>

Oregon Foster Youth Impacting Legislation FosterClub All-Stars talking about improving the foster care system downtown Portland. (Pictured from left to right: Royce Markley, Mellisa Gutierrez, Lora Murphy, Regina Austin, David English, and Patricia Dorr) In 2014, the Oregon Foster Children's Bill of Rights became law. The youth voice is guiding the implementation of the law and ensures foster youth are provided with support, resources, and protection. FosterClub All-Star, Royce Markley, and other Oregon foster youth are calling on Oregon lawmakers to support youth in the foster care system. The 2015 Oregon Legislature has two bills centering on foster youth: The first bill would enable youth to have a savings account beginning at age 12. Recent research indicates that when youth are empowered to have savings accounts and financial literacy training their success as adults increases substantially. Currently, barriers exist in many states to allow youth to have any type of bank account prior to leaving foster care. This strips youth of their independence and doesn't allow for youth to understand proper financial management. You can read more about the bill in its summary. The second bill would allow youth to participate in normalcy activities. These activities would range from extracurricular to community activities. Foster youth are often excluded from activities with their peers and it has long lasting effects. While much progress has been made across the country and in Oregon in recognizing the importance of normalcy, child welfare systems often leave this up to the choice of foster parents or private facilities. In doing so, youth are still often unable to have any sense of normalcy. This new bill would require participation in at least one activity as directed by the youth. This bill would be one of the first in the country to require participation. You can read more about the bill in its summary. Youth voice is difficult for lawmakers to ignore. Foster youth are the experts! Royce and other youth working to improve Oregon's foster care are highlighted in an article by the Oregonian's Amy Wang. Read the entire article here: http://www.oregonlive.com/kiddo/index.ssf/2015/02/foster_youth_are_subject_of_se.html (link is external) File attachments: Foster youth seek legislative support for extracurriculars, savings accounts.pdf Savings Bill.pdf Normalcy Bill.pdf Source: <https://www.fosterclub.com/groups/oregon-foster-youth-impacting-legislation>

Lawsuit: Arizona's neglect of foster kids shocking Mary Jo Pitzi, The Arizona Republic 2:59 p.m. EST February 4, 2015 The suit, filed on behalf of 10 children, says Arizona does not have enough foster homes. (Photo: Nick Oza/The Republic) 54 CONNECT 35 TWEET 5 LINKEDIN 1

COMMENTEMAILMORE PHOENIX -- Arizona's neglect of children in foster care "shocks the conscience" and amounts to official apathy toward the plight of nearly 17,000 children, a class-action lawsuit filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court alleges. "It is time that someone gives voice to the thousands of children in foster care who have no say about where they live, where their siblings go, or what happens in their future," Kris Jacober, president of the Arizona Association for Foster and Adoptive Parents, said in a statement accompanying the suit. "Children are still sleeping in (state agency) offices because there is nowhere else for them," she said. "They're not receiving timely or needed mental health services. The children in this lawsuit represent thousands with similar stories. The state can't simply bring them into custody and provide for them on the fly." The suit, filed on behalf of 10 children currently in the Arizona foster-care system, names the directors of the state departments of Health Services and Child Safety and alleges the state: --Neglects its duty to provide adequate health care for children in state custody. --Has a severe shortage of foster homes. --Fails to promptly investigate reports of neglect and abuse involving children in foster care. --Hampers efforts to maintain family relationships by separating siblings in foster care and not providing required parental visits. Although the state is aware of these conditions, many of which the suit documents using the state's own data, it has not corrected them, the lawsuit says. Because of that, the lawsuit says, Arizona's actions show "a policy, pattern, custom and/or practice that shocks the conscience, is outside the exercise of any professional judgment, and amounts to deliberate indifference to the constitutionally-protected rights and liberty and privacy interests" of the children named in the suit, as well as all children under state care. USA TODAY Life after foster care: Mentors help teens prepare Gov. Doug Ducey is reviewing the case and offered little comment. "Governor Ducey takes the safety and well-being of foster care children extremely seriously," his office said in a statement. "They are among the most vulnerable in our state and the governor believes it is imperative that the government protect them." The suit seeks a series of remedies, ranging from an increase in foster homes to timely medical care. The suit uses pseudonyms for the 10 child plaintiffs, who range in age from 3 to 14. It seeks class action by the court on behalf of all children in state foster care. As of September, there were 16,990 children in state custody, according to the latest data from the Department of Child Safety. The Arizona Center for Law in the Public Interest, the local law firm of Coppersmith, Brockelman LPC and the New York-based Children's Rights organization are handling the case. Children's Rights filed a similar complaint last month in South Carolina and a nearly 4-year-old suit alleging neglect of Texas children in foster care is proceeding. The filing comes seven months after the state created a stand-alone child-welfare agency in the wake of the discovery of nearly 6,600 reports of child abuse and neglect that went without investigations over nearly four years. But that highly publicized effort, which resulted in the creation of the Department of Child Safety, didn't address the issues that plague foster care, said William Kapell, lead attorney with Children's Rights, an advocacy organization. In fact, despite all of the attention on child welfare over the last year, not much has changed, said Anne Ronan, an attorney with the Arizona Center for Law in the Public Interest. "It created a more expensive investigative unit," she said. Arizona foster care rates The number of children in Arizona's foster care system has steadily risen since 2002. Sponsored by March 2011 Sept 2011 March 2012 Sept 2012 March 2013 Sept 2013 March 2014 Sept 2014 0 5,000 10,000 15,000 Department of Child Safety Ginger Rough/The Republic March 2011: 10,707 September 2011: 11,535 March 2012: 12,453 September 2012: 14,111 March 2013: 14,314 September 2013: 15,037 March 2014: 15,751 September 2014: 16,990 And if that investigative effort results in more children being removed from their homes, she said, the state needs to be prepared to cover the cost of each child's education, health care and mental-health treatment. Those responsibilities have been sorely neglected, the lawsuit points out, as it documents travails that the 10 children have endured. For example, one of the children, identified only as Charles P., had been in eight schools over a year-and-a-half. Beth K., the lead plaintiff in the case, had complained of a toothache for months while living in a group home, but got no dental care during the nearly two-year period. During that time frame, the state also failed to get her eyeglasses and did not notice that she walked with a limp, so she didn't get orthopedic shoes that would correct her walk. The lawsuit also says the state has hindered efforts to keep families together, and refers to the case of four siblings, two girls and two boys, ages 3 to 7, who were placed in state custody a year ago. They were initially placed with a relative 2 1/2 hours away from the family's home, a distance that apparently hampered the ability of state caseworkers to do "urgent responses" on their cases. Over the last year, the four, identified only as the "C-B siblings," were split into two separate foster homes, reunited for two weeks with their father before he returned them to state custody, sent to three different foster homes, and were denied the therapy the state Department of Child Safety determined they needed. In July, a Juvenile Court found the agency's action, or lack thereof, "appalling," noting DCS failed to follow through on therapy sessions, and didn't back up its promise to the father that it would help him with transportation to get the children to therapy. The case illustrates the lapses by the state in meeting its goal of maintaining family bonds, the suit says. The suit also says DCS has not coordinated visits between children in foster care and their parents, nor has it always done monthly visits with biological parents to gauge whether family reunification is possible. And while the state was trying to fix the former Child Protective Services, it did not keep up with similar complaints on foster care: Nearly three-quarters of foster care-related reports had not been looked at and resolved in the 60-day time frame required by law, the suit says. Source: <http://www.usatoday.com/story/news/2015/02/04/arizona-foster-care-lawsuit/22868815/>

Lawmakers Want To Stop The 'Foster Care To Prostitution' Pipeline February 3, 2015 8:54 PM Share on email 28 View Comments Related Tags: Becky Zal-Sanchez, Beth McCann, Child Welfare, Child Welfare System, Dan Nordberg, FBI, Foster Care To Prostitution, Foster Children, Missing Children, National Association of Social Workers, National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, National Western Stock Show, Sex Trafficking You've Earned Points for Reading! Claim points in our Reward Center, and earn more tomorrow. Claim Points DENVER (CBS4) – State lawmakers say too many children in the child welfare system are disappearing for weeks at a time without anyone looking for them. They also say most of the children rescued from sex trafficking are in the foster system. Right now lawmakers say there are 57 children missing from Colorado's child welfare system. Nobody knows where they are and too often there is little effort to find them, according to lawmakers. They say Colorado's most vulnerable children deserve better. A child sex trafficking sting during the National Western Stock Show last week was just the latest example of what state lawmakers call a disturbing trend — a foster care to prostitution pipeline. Sixty percent of children rescued from sex trafficking have at one time have been in the custody of a welfare agency or foster home, according to lawmakers. "Just having that lack of steady parenting and being exposed to abuse, neglect (and) domestic violence; they already have, usually, very low social boundaries. They can be more trusting to strangers because they've had to be able to survive and go to different foster homes," Becky Zal-Sanchez with the National Association of Social Workers said. Zal-Sanchez says many of the children have run away so often case workers write them off. They can go missing for weeks without anyone looking. Reps. Dan Nordberg and Beth McCann want that to end. They're carrying a bill that would require welfare agencies and foster parents to notify police, the FBI and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children within 24 hours of a child disappearing. CBS4's Shaun Boyd talks with Reps. Dan Nordberg and Beth McCann (credit: CBS) "What this bill says is, 'Look, these lives matter.' And when you go missing the state of Colorado is going to do everything in its power to enable local, state and federal law enforcement to find you," said Nordberg, R-Colorado Springs. "Often these kids are already emotionally traumatized," said McCann, D-Denver. "So when they leave that environment they find support in this underworld — this dark underworld. It's a very complicated and sad situation." Last year the FBI and local police in Colorado rescued nearly 100 children from sex trafficking — a 54 percent increase over the previous year. With bipartisan support the bill easily passed the House on Tuesday. Source: <http://denver.cbslocal.com/2015/02/03/bill-concerning-missing-foster-kids-easily-passes-in-the-colorado-house/>

Attorney: Former 'foster parent of the year' molested girl Eric Wilkinson reports Eric Wilkinson, KING 5 News 5:16 p.m. PST February 4, 2015 Lester Drapeaux had already served prison time for molesting a child when he was granted a license to become a foster parent in 1974. (Photo: KING) 228 CONNECT 30 TWEET 6 LINKEDIN 4 COMMENTEMAILMORE Lester Drapeaux had already served prison time for molesting a child when he was granted a license to become a foster parent in 1974. Among those he took in was a 5-year-old girl known now only by her initials, M.M. The abuse began almost immediately. "He started by doing things to her in the bath when she was little, and as she grew older the abuse escalated and got worse and worse," said Jason Amala, partner with the Seattle law firm Pfau Cochran Vertetis Amala. It all happened inside Drapeaux's Lake Stevens home where hundreds of children were cycled through by DSHS over the course of nearly two decades. Documents obtained by KING 5 show that Drapeaux had actually been under the supervision of DSHS for his sex conviction before becoming a foster parent. At the time there was no Department of Corrections and DSHS was in charge of the oversight of parolees. DSHS staff either knew or should have known that Drapeaux was a "habitual criminal, alcoholic and child molester," according to the law suit filed on behalf of M.M. But no one said a thing. "They supervised his probation. If there was any question all they had to do was walk a few blocks to the courthouse, pull his file and it was there for anyone to see, including DSHS," said Amala. DSHS's own records may indicate why this happened. The agency was trying to adhere to federal guidelines that paired minority children with minority foster parents. The victim in this case is Native American. There were apparently so few Native American foster families that DSHS even granted an exception to Drapeaux, allowing him to take in more than the standard number of vulnerable children. "It looks like DSHS was so concerned about placing a Native American child in a Native American home that they had blinders on and didn't do their normal background checks," said Amala. Amala also says the agency did not adequately investigate allegations by Drapeaux's step-daughter that her molested her. Meantime, in 1995 DSHS awarded Drapeaux with the "Foster Parent of The Year" award, according to Amala. The victim in the case has now been awarded a 2-and-a-half million dollar settlement from DSHS. Her attorneys say three more victims have come forward, and they believe many more may be out there. DSHS released a statement saying, in part that "although background check processes appropriate for the time were done when the foster home was licensed in 1978, they did not pick up that the foster father had a conviction for indecent liberties with a 17-year-old minor in 1972. The foster father consistently lied in his licensing documents about prior convictions involving minors. When statewide background checks became available in the 1980s, that conviction was not reported on those statewide background check reports. It is unknown why. Both our practices and background check procedures have been strengthened since." Lester Drapeaux died several years ago. Source: <http://www.king5.com/story/news/local/2015/02/03/dshs-foster-parents-native-americans-molestation-settlement/22825971/>

Maui mother can't hold back anguish as she testifies against 'Potty Boot Camp' owner Posted: Feb 04, 2015 10:56 PM PST Updated: Feb 05, 2015 2:42 AM PST By Jade Storms Email Connect jstorms@hawaii.newsnow.com By Chelsea Davis Email Connect chelseadavis@hawaii.newsnow.com Follow @ChelseadavisHNN Tiffany Penyy Rettich Karin Engert Rebecca Stapp WAILUKU, MAUI (HawaiiNewsNow) - It was a full day of testimony on Wednesday for the mother of the boy allegedly abused by the owner of "Potty Boot Camp" on Maui. Tiffany Penyy Rettich took the stand first thing this morning. She says her son went to Rebecca Stapp's "Potty Boot Camp" back on May 1, 2013. She said Stapp told her there were three methods to her magic: positive reinforcement, praise, and rewards. Penyy Rettich said Stapp told her most her kids were potty trained by the end of the first day and no physical force was ever used. However, after Penyy Rettich picked her son up that day, she said she noticed there were bruises all along his thighs, back, buttocks, and groin area. Penyy Rettich says she confronted Stapp about it, but she says Stapp denied ever using physical abuse. Penyy Rettich says after she left Stapp's home, she went to the Maui Police Department to file a police report and took her son to the emergency room. Penyy Rettich says she already saw signs of her son not acting like himself. "After consuming the beverage that he drank at the hospital, he ended up having an accident and he started crying uncontrollably," said Penyy Rettich as tears rolled down her face. She said her son wasn't just abused physically, but psychological as well. "There were a couple times...as I tried to give him confidence and let him know he was in a safe environment...there were a few times he would run around naked and he would have potty accidents and he would go hide and cry," Penyy Rettich said through tears. Although Penyy Rettich was the only one to take the stand on Wednesday, others came out in support of Stapp. "What she does, she does with love, with kindness, with lot of expertise and care for each individual child, and I can say that because she trained my daughter three years and three months ago," said Karin Engert. Engert says Stapp potty trained her special needs child after everyone said she couldn't be potty trained. She said the injuries on the 17-month-old boy look like diaper rash. "All we have is pictures of, to me, looked like having a diaper on a baby, the rubber band cuts into the thigh, that's exactly what that mark is," Engert said. Stapp is accused of third degree assault. If she is found guilty, she could face up to a $2,000 fine and/or one year in jail. Prosecutors will be calling more witnesses to the stand, including Stapp's daughter. It is unclear if Stapp will testify. Trial will continue on March 18, 2015. Source: <http://www.hawaii.newsnow.com/story/28029925/owner-of-potty-boot-camp-on-trial-for-allegedly-abusing-child>

BCSO: Detention center employee sexually assaulted teen inmate Juan De La Rosa, 39, accused of kissing teen inmate in elevator Posted February 04, 2015, 10:25 PM Updated February 05, 2015, 9:33 AM 104 9 By Tim Gerber Reporter SAN ANTONIO - He's paid by the county to watch over juvenile offenders, but investigators are accusing a juvenile detention employee of taking advantage of one of the inmates. RELATED CONTENT SAPD: Man charged with sexually abusing minor blames victim DPS seeking help in hunt for most-wanted sex offender Man receives 40 years for sexual assault of child La Vernia teacher arrested in sexual assault of student Juan De La Rosa, 39, was an MOD leader at the Bexar County Juvenile Detention Center. According to an arrest warrant, he was on duty and in uniform when he allegedly took advantage of the 16-year-old female inmate inside an elevator last month. De La Rosa was arrested Wednesday evening at his home located in the 7200 block of Albany Ridge and was charged with official oppression. He was arrested without incident by members of the Bexar County Sheriff's Office Fugitive Apprehension Unit. According to the warrant, the victim made an outcry to a rape crisis therapist on Jan. 21, stating she had been sexually assaulted by De La Rosa on Jan. 16. The teen told a forensic interviewer that De La Rosa kissed her on the mouth while they were in an elevator together. The incident was captured on video by surveillance cameras installed in the elevator. The video allegedly shows De La Rosa kissing the victim on the mouth, while he was in his uniform and she was wearing her juvenile detention uniform. The teen victim said aside from the unwanted kiss, De La Rosa did not have any other contact with her. Official oppression is a Class A misdemeanor in Texas. If convicted, De La Rosa faces the possibility of a year in jail. Click here to see a copy of the arrest affidavit. Source: <http://www.ksat.com/content/pns/ksat/news/2015/02/04/juvenile-detention-employee-charged-with-official-oppression.html>

Girls removed from Leesburg group home after sexual battery allegations By Elyssa Cherney Staff Writer contact the reporter Crime Sexual Assault Sexual Misconduct No more girls at group home where 3 residents reported that neighborhood boys may have sexually assaulted them All four residents at a Leesburg group home where reports of sexual battery emerged last week have been moved, according to state Department of Children and Families spokeswoman Kristin Gray. Related Lake County News Leesburg police investigate reported sexual assaults of young group-home residents See all related 8 After reports that three underage girls living in the for-profit group home may have been sexually assaulted by neighborhood boys, DCF began investigating "allegations of inadequate supervision" in the home. eComments Boys will be boys , they certainly won't be held accountable . 1chickenman at 6:14 PM February 05, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 1 "When we were in the home conducting the assessment ... and gathering information, concerns regarding the level of supervision came up," Gray wrote in an email. "The details about what information led us to those concerns aren't releasable." The group home, W.I.N. for Kids, is licensed by DCF and has served girls between ages 6 and 17 since 2007, according to its website. It receives between $92 and $184 for each bed it occupies with a child in state care, according to a rate agreement between the group home and its community-based care agency. Children in state custody have been abused, neglected or abandoned. On Jan. 20, a 17-year-old resident at W.I.N. for Kids told police she was gang-raped by a group of three to seven men. Two other residents at W.I.N. for Kids home, ages 12 and 15, told police that same week that they had participated in sex acts with boys in vacant houses. Gray said that children are relocated from their current living situation during an active investigation when a request is made by an involved party. The request can come from the group home provider, DCF or a case manager, but she said she cannot disclose who asked for the change. "If its kids are unsafe then we would move them, but in this particular situation that wasn't necessarily the case," Gray said. Kids Central, the local agency that arranges placements for children in state custody, said last week that the group home was in good standing and that it did not have a history of founded abuse or neglect allegations, according to spokeswoman Nicole Pulcini Mason. "Because of the nature of group homes, just in general, people tend to make abuse allegations and it's kind of like the nature of the beast at some point," she said. "It seems to be a little bit unusual they haven't really gone through that." Police have not made any arrests but have identified a person of interest in the gang rape, according to Lt. Joe Iozzi. The girls received forensic interviews with children's advocates and the 17-year-old and 12-year old received medical examinations. Echerney@tribune.com or 352-742-5930 Source: <http://www.orlandosentinel.com/news/breaking-news/os--group-home-assaulted-girls-moved-20150205-story.html>

Counselor who sexually abused teen in group home looks out of chances to avoid prison This is crazy' Markeem Chaplin says after sentencing on sex conviction Markeem Chaplin spoke briefly after his sentencing today in County Court. Print By Douglass Dowty | ddowty@syracuse.com The Post-Standard Email the author | Follow on Twitter on February 05, 2015 at 1:22 PM Reddit Email Syracuse, NY -- A Syracuse man who had oral sex with a Camillus group home resident can't seem to stay out of trouble. Former counselor Markeem Chaplin, 23, of Syracuse, avoided prison for sex abuse after admitting he had a sexual encounter with a special needs resident under his care. Instead, he was sentenced in February 2014 to 10 years' probation and became a Level 2 sex offender. But Chaplin violated his probation right away, failing to cooperate with probation officers. He was given a second chance in March 2014 after agreeing to talk about his crime and future plans. County Court Judge Thomas J. Miller promised him state prison if he strayed again. And it looks like he intends to keep his word. Chaplin was charged with violating his probation again in January, this time accused of failing to report to probation, as well as being discharged from sex offender treatment due to poor attitude and poor attendance, prosecutor Anthony Germano has said. Today, Miller said he'd send Chaplin to prison for 1 1/2 years if he pleaded guilty to the probation violation. Otherwise, Chaplin will be able to challenge the charges at a hearing. But if he loses the hearing, he could face up to 4 years in prison. Germano reiterated today that he's looking for the full sentence. The prosecutor noted that he wanted Chaplin to spend time in state prison all along. Defense lawyer Jessica Senn described Chaplin to the judge as being a hard worker with a difficult childhood. Chaplin is due back to court Feb. 13. He remains in jail with no bail. Source: http://www.syracuse.com/crime/index.ssf/2015/02/counselor_who_sexually_abused_teen_in_group_home_may_be_out_of_chances_to_avoid.html

DCF's Katz and Sen. Fasano Square Off Over Agency Oversight, Accountability Sen. Leonard Fasano, Joette Katz Courant File Photos (Courant File Photos) By Josh Kovner contact the reporter Juvenile Delinquency Martin M Looney U.S. Department of Justice Leonard A. Fasano Beth Bye Increased oversight of CT DCF being considered The Republican leader of the state Senate and child-protection Commissioner Joette Katz squared off Thursday at a public hearing over three GOP proposals to increase public oversight of the Department of Children and Families and create an independent ombudsman's office. Sen. Leonard Fasano's bills were among a dozen aired before the legislature's Committee on Children. Included was a separate bill to improve treatment of children who witness domestic violence. Sen. Martin Looney, D-New Haven, the president pro tempore of the Senate, and state child Advocate Sarah Eagan testified in support of that bill. Sen. Beth Bye, D-West Hartford, spoke in favor of a proposal to strengthen protection of infants, in light of an increase in the number of children under 3 in Connecticut who have died from maltreatment and unsafe sleeping conditions. The DCF has begun a public-awareness campaign about unsafe sleep and is working with a national foundation to better protect infants in high-risk households. Eagan testified that an overreliance on seclusion and restraints persists at the DCF's juvenile-justice facilities, including the Connecticut Juvenile Training School for boys and the Pueblo unit for girls, both in Middletown. She said the DCF's system of collecting data on its own performance and improving its response "remains incoherent, unreliable and opaque." Fasano, of North Haven, proposed that DCF adopt stronger quality-assurance measures at the training school, and that the Office of the Child Advocate become the primary agency reviewing child fatalities. eComments DCF should register itself into a mental health clinic. cbeachcomber at 8:22 AM February 06, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 2 The child advocate's office and its fatality review board already investigate child deaths and recommends reform, while DCF internally examines the death cases for personnel issues and flaws in any of its protocols. The theme of Fasano's remarks was that he distrusts DCF to do internal reviews. Katz, seated in the gallery waiting for her turn to speak, slowly shook her head as Fasano reported that he'd heard from parents, group-home providers and others that DCF had closed a group home with as little as three days' notice, and without an adequate plan for the displaced children. He said the youth could "find themselves out on the street." Fasano, who has been a vocal critic of the DCF, said he was relating anecdotes to the children's committee based on conversations with teenagers, DCF staff members, parents, and providers, but wasn't vouching for the truth of what he was told. Katz, joined at the hearing by an entourage of top DCF officials, said: "I have never closed a group home in three days." She said homes aren't closed until every child has an alternative placement, a process that can take weeks or months. Sen. Dante Bartolomeo, D-Cheshire, co-chair of the children's committee, asked that Fasano's allegation be addressed and that the response be made part of the hearing record. DCF's marked shift away from group care in favor of foster homes and community treatment has resulted in the closing of some group homes. There are now 829 fewer DCF children in group homes than there were in January 2011, a 56 percent drop. In turn, more relatives and mentors of children are stepping up as foster parents. But advocates have questioned whether DCF is adequately funding the community and foster-care programs, and spending enough time and money recruiting, training, retaining, and overseeing foster parents. Katz testified that DCF has saved $70 million from reducing group-home placements and has invested $49 million of the savings in community and foster-care programs, and supporting foster parents. Katz, who reviews all requests for group care, said there are more than enough residential facilities in Connecticut to handle the children who need a higher level of treatment and therapy than is available in foster homes. Fasano said he supports an independent ombudsman, as opposed to DCF's own five-person ombudsman's office, which answers, ultimately, to Katz. He said questions, grievances, and complaints would receive a more objective review by an independent office. Eagan, the child advocate, also testified in favor of an independent ombudsman, though she would preserve DCF's internal office. "An ombudsman can be a voice for children and youth confined in juvenile justice facilities (and) investigate complaints, report findings and make recommendations for change," Eagan said. She said DCF's internal office "responds to many calls and concerns from family members and child welfare stakeholders. Concurrent use of an independent ombudsman who can address the needs of youth in care, particularly those in facilities, should also be considered," Eagan said. Kenneth Mysogland, who directs DCF's ombudsman program, testified that his office handled just shy of 3,000 inquiries last year and is committed to treating each concern in a comprehensive and fair manner. Mysogland said he visits DCF's large facilities and interacts with the youth, staff members, public defenders, Eagan, and others. Sen. Henri Martin, R-Bristol, the ranking Republican on the children's committee, asked Katz if she agreed with any of Fasano's proposals. She said she didn't. "I have a hard time embracing recommendations if I feel they are built on faulty foundations," said Katz, adding that she found Fasano's proposals to be unnecessary. For example, she said, that the training school in Middletown is nationally accredited and doesn't need additional, or different, quality assessments, as Fasano suggested. But advocates have in recent months pressed DCF to adopt performance standards that better measure the conditions at the training school. Eagan testified that her office strongly supports the proposal to "strengthen quality assurance and transparency for state-run and state contracted juvenile justice facilities—thereby enabling a greater opportunity to address urgent and significant concerns about conditions of confinement for some juveniles and facilitating well-informed, collaborative juvenile justice response." Eagan noted that the Judicial Branch's juvenile services division uses a performance assessment developed by the U.S. Department of Justice to improve conditions in juvenile detention centers. Katz said she welcomes all manner of input and believes the department operates under "the public microscope." But she said the agency should monitor itself. The children's committee took no action on the bills Thursday. The panel at a later date will vote on which measures to send on to the full House or Senate, Copyright © 2015, Hartford Courant Source: <http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-dcf-bills-20150205-story.html>

<http://onforb.es/1Ch8e71> Nick Morrison Contributor Contact Nick Morrison The author is a Forbes contributor. The opinions expressed are those of the writer. Education 2/11/2015 @ 10:14AM Gaming Can Give Troubled Teens Another Shot At Learning Students who get turned off by education can struggle to see the point of schools, but one project is showing how gaming can give troubled teens another shot at learning. Games developer Kuato has already won plaudits for its work in schools, where students have to learn basic code to take a robot through an adventure/shoot-em-up game. To date, the game has proved a hit in schools from Eton to the East End of London, and has been used in more than one million coding sessions in schools across the world, the equivalent of 60,000 hours of teaching code. But in a new departure, Kuato has gone into a school for students who struggle to engage with mainstream education, to see if coding can give them a reason to learn. The Pavilion Study Centre in north London caters for teenagers who have been unable to settle in regular schools. Most have poor attendance records, and many have either already been excluded from school or were at serious risk of exclusion. So it would seem an ideal test-bed to see if coding can succeed where alternative approaches have failed. And the results suggest that creating games does have the power to switch students back on to education. The approach is simple, says David Miller, Kuato's director of learning and a former U.K. teacher of the year. Students can only play the game once they have learned to write a few lines of Javascript. The lesson taps into a fascination with gaming, while showing they can be creators as well as players. At the same time, it presents an alternative vision of the point of education. "They have a natural interest in computer games – they are the millennium generation who have grown up with games – but they're also interested to know there is a way of being creative," says Miller. "So much of mainstream school is about passing exams to go into medicine or law or engineering, and so many kids are turned off by that particular path." As the lesson progressed, Miller says the students went from suspicion at another group of 'experts' coming in telling them what to do, to an enthusiastic engagement with the project. Kevin Matthews, assistant head at the Pavilion, said learning to code – and being able to play with the results – had a dramatic effect on the students. "Most of our students are lacking in confidence and self-esteem and they often have issue with trust, and we have some who find it difficult to focus on an activity," he says. "But they really did love it. It was similar to a game they could buy in the shops so they didn't feel they were being fobbed off, and they could see immediate results. They could see the effect of what they put in." Such instant feedback is not always apparent in education, and it was also notable that some of those who picked it up quickly were eager to help the less able students, Matthews adds. Exercises such as this help students to realise they do not have to be just consumers of technology, says Richard Crick, the centre's IT co-ordinator. It's not just the Kuato project. The centre also teaches students to create their own apps, for example. This in turn helps the students believe that a worthwhile career may not be closed to them after all, despite the fact they are unlikely to leave education with a string of qualifications. "We're empowering them to control the technology they're using," says Crick. A particularly interesting element of the project is that the students were encouraged to become self-directed learners, in a way that mimics game-playing itself. "They teach themselves to play the game as well as learning from the game," says Miller. He believes projects such as this can have a domino effect, translating a new-found interest in learning into other areas. "It is a way of accessing the learning instinct," he says. Of course this project does not mean that computer games are the way to get every disaffected student interested in learning. But it underlines that where teenagers are switched off from education, then looking at alternatives to traditional teaching may not be a bad place to start. Follow me on twitter @nsdmorrison This article is available online at/Source: <http://onforb.es/1Ch8e71>

Death raises questions about Elk Grove foster home By Brad Branan bbranan@sacbee.com 02/07/2015 4:43 PM 02/07/2015 10:30 PM Allenia Bledsoe Story Comments A 2-year-old girl placed in an Elk Grove foster home died of acute pneumonia, the Sacramento County Coroner's Office concluded in a report that has done little to quell the concerns of the girl's birth family. The coroner's 10-page report details the examination of Allenia Bledsoe, including the finding of bacteria in her lungs leading to pneumonia, but does not address the circumstances of her illness or the response by her foster mother. The report about the Nov. 7 death was completed late last month. In response to questions from The Sacramento Bee, Coroner Kimberly Gin said her office interviewed the foster mother and learned she did not take Allenia to a doctor. "The child was sick with some type of cold or virus that all the kids in the house had," Gin said. "She seemed to get better, as did everyone else. The day she died she wasn't exhibiting any symptoms at all." Related Sacramento parents seek answers in foster care death of their 2-year-old Allenia's bacterial infection was likely the result of the virus that was going around the house, she said. For Allenia's birth parents, the report only adds to the questions they've had since the toddler's death, when they were told Allenia woke up upset early in the morning and was found unresponsive a few hours later. "She didn't have a fighting chance," said her mother, Jayme Wimberly. "I want to know why they didn't bring her to the hospital." Allenia's grandmother, Alicia Bledsoe, said the family is upset because neither the county nor the foster-care agency responsible for Allenia will discuss the circumstances of her death in any detail. "They should have brought her to the hospital," she said. At her home, foster mother Latasha Norman was reluctant to discuss Allenia's death last week. Asked why she didn't take Allenia to a doctor, she said, "Because I didn't know she was sick. I didn't know she had pneumonia." She then shut her front door, refusing to answer any more questions. Several children could be seen in her home. Denise Lowery, administrator of New Horizons Foster Care Agency in West Sacramento, confirmed that Norman continues to work for the agency. She said investigations by the state Department of Social Services and county Child Protective Services found that Norman had done nothing wrong. She said foster children often get sick without going to a doctor, unless the illness continues, and then the agency recommends that foster parents take them to a physician. "I feel awful for them," Lowery said of Allenia's family. Two pediatricians contacted by The Bee for their professional opinions said they did not want to get involved in a potential legal matter. Coughing, fever, chills and shortness of breath are the most common symptoms of pneumonia, according to the American Lung Association. While not common, young children can die from pneumonia, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Gin said it is not unusual for parents who have lost children to say they exhibited no symptoms of the illness that killed them. "I can't say the child did not have symptoms," she said of Allenia. "I can only say that we are often told this story of no symptoms." Laura McCasland, a CPS spokeswoman, said she could not comment about the agency's investigation because it found no evidence of neglect or abuse by the foster mother. Michael Weston, a Department of Social Services spokesman, said he could not discuss anything about Norman's record as a foster mother because of confidentiality laws. But Weston was able to discuss her record as a provider of other child care services. Norman has been licensed to provide child care since 2002 in Sacramento and Solano counties and had licensing problems with her Playful Scholars business around the time of Allenia's death, Weston said. On Nov. 10, three days after Allenia's death, the department responded to a complaint that she was providing child care without a license, records show. Sacramento County, which then licensed day care facilities, had revoked her license because she had failed to pay a license fee, Weston said. The state, which recently took over licensing duties from the county, upheld the complaint and told her to reapply, Weston said. She was given a child care license from the state last month. Norman has a history of financial problems associated with her child care business, bankruptcy records show. She filed for bankruptcy protection twice in 2013. Her income barely covered expenses and she had more than $100,000 in debt, most of it owed to the Internal Revenue Service for failing to pay income taxes five years in a row, according to records she filed with the court. She also listed a $12,000 debt to Dana Hurkens of Rancho Cordova from the settlement of a 2007 civil case in Sacramento Superior Court. Hurkens said Norman was renting her building for her child care business and moved out without telling her or turning off the water. "She said, 'I can't operate. I'm going under,'" Hurkens said. "The pipes froze and burst and caused $200,000 in damage. We couldn't use the building for three years." Call The Bee's Brad Branan, (916) 321-1065. Follow him on Twitter @BradB at SacBee. Source: <http://www.sacbee.com/news/local/article9529571.html#storylink=cpy>

Group-home supervision questioned after three girls reported sexual assaults By Elyssa Cherney Orlando Sentinel contact the reporter Crime Sexual Assault DCF is probing the quality of care at a Leesburg group home where residents reported sex offenses Teenage girls are the most difficult DCF population to manage, leading child advocate says. 3 girls who said they were sexually assaulted have been removed from the Leesburg group home where they lived

LEESBURG — Twyne Littlejohn misses the bubbly girls who lived in the modest home on her street. The teenagers, sitting outside in the high-crime community, would wave hello and ask for candy or for her homemade frozen juice cups, said Littlejohn, 63. "I talked to them, they were nice girls," she said. "They acted like regular teenagers, but they had underlying stuff... These are kids that probably have a lot of mental-health issues and self-esteem issues that started from their families." Now the girls, wards of the state, are gone. The state Department of Children and Families removed them — ages 12, 15 and 17 — from the for-profit group home in Leesburg's Carver Heights neighborhood while authorities investigate allegations that they were sexually assaulted. The accusations have raised questions about the quality of care provided by W.I.N. for Kids, which is licensed by DCF. In a one-week span, a sobbing teenager reported to Leesburg police that she was gang-raped by a group of four to seven neighborhood men, and two other residents told police they participated in sex acts with boys in abandoned homes nearby. No arrests had been made in the cases but police are following a person of interest, Lt. Joe Iozzi said. Now, DCF is investigating "allegations of inadequate supervision" at the group home, spokeswoman Kristin Gray said. Gray said the agency is considering several key questions about W.I.N. for Kids: "Were the children receiving proper supervision in this group home? Was the house parent providing the proper structure? Did she have control over this population?" cComments @SayAgain Turnover is high. It's because the agency's focus is it's budget and the advancement of career bureaucrats, not the care and safety of children. FormerHater at 3:12 PM February 09, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 4 It is unclear how many adults lived in the 1,800-square-foot home in the city of 21,000. The ranch house, which boasts a neatly-trimmed lawn with flowers and a minivan in the driveway, is licensed to take six girls. Just four had lived there recently but all have been relocated, Gray said. The girls' living arrangement wasn't unusual. Statewide, 2,125 children are placed in group homes, 386 of them in Central Florida, according to the child-welfare agency. Fewer children end up in group homes than in other placements, such as with a foster family or a relative, due in part to the fact that there aren't enough people willing to house older wards of the state, Gray said. Plus, teenage girls are challenging. Jack Levine, Florida's leading child and family policy advocate, said it's because many have been sexually or physically victimized. Even with good supervision girls can stray toward risky behavior, he said. "The mental processes that many girls go through is a very odd combination of trust and fear," said Levine, who served as president of the nonprofit Voices for Florida's Children for 25 years and now works in Tallahassee. As a result, he said, these girls may be "seeking a male model that they may not have in their own family, usually utilizing their sexuality as basically pay for emotional stability. The irony is that in the giving of herself, she is not getting stability — she is getting a new level of victimization." As the 17-year-old from W.I.N. For Kids relayed her story to police, her "arms clenched around her torso, and [an] occasional knee pulled to her chest appeared genuine," a report states. In the second case, one child told police she had never had sex before while the other said she frequently engages in group sex and that "she does this for attention," according to the report. All the girls received forensic interviews with child advocates and medical exams were done on the 12- and 17-year-olds, according to Leesburg Police Maj. Steve Rockefeller. South Carolina native Tamiko Aikens, who is listed on the group home's website as the executive director, declined to comment on the ongoing investigation. The group home appears to cater to girls who may have been victimized or who have discipline problems, according to the website. "We have a vision to guide our children into a state of realization in order that they may have the ability to talk through and manage tough situations rather than act them out," the website states. The website also notes that Aikens opened the group home, which takes girls between 6 and 17, in 2007 after "a series of life events lead Ms. Aikens to her true purpose in life, to help children." The group home was in good standing before the sexual-battery reports, according to Kids Central Inc., a community-based care agency that arranges placements for children in state custody. The group home receives $92 to $184 for each bed occupied overnight, according to a rate agreement with Kids Central and DCF. Littlejohn, who runs a male youth group for area kids called The Great Plan, said the house mother was strict with the girls but that she also gave them the freedom to make their own choices. "They weren't in jail in a locked facility," she said. "They can move around and do what they want to do." Other neighbors agreed, adding that the girls could be seen sitting on an electrical box near the house and were instructed by the house mom not to move from there, apparently as a way to keep tabs on their whereabouts. In the past two years, Leesburg police responded to the group home 35 times, most often due to a juvenile complaint or a missing person. The incident reports detail a living situation in which the house mother couldn't always manage the girls without help from law enforcement. On one occasion in June, police were called to settle a dispute between two girls after one said she accidentally broke someone else's shoe and a shouting match broke out, according to the report. Earlier that year, police arrested one of the residents for having marijuana. Levine said it's normal for any child to resist authority and that it's impossible to predict adolescent behavior. But there are still certain expectations of a house parent in a group home, he said. "You've got to set the stage for success by actually having the children understand the consequences of certain behaviors, but also to help them set their own rules," he said. "As hard as it is, there are some people who do it and do it really well." W.I.N. for Kids is classified as a "parent model," which means it's a hybrid between a foster home, in which kids are placed with families, and a more traditional group home where staff monitors the kids in shifts, according to DCF. Gray said that the W.I.N. for Kids environment is more preferable because it offers a "smaller, more intimate type of setting with less children and the same caregiver instead of people shifting in and out." Neighbor Littlejohn said she was shocked to hear about the review of the group home. "I think she [the house mother] tried to treat them like regular kids," Littlejohn said. "Every child wants to be treated like normal without distinctions... I saw her doing her job and whatever it took to make it work."

echerney@tribune.com or 352-742-5930 Source: <http://www.orlandosentinel.com/news/lake/os-group-home-sexual-assault-girls-20150209-story.html#page=1>

Memo To Civil Rights Activists: Testing Isn't Helping Is forcing every child to take annual standardized tests in reading and math a civil rights issue? That certainly seems to be one of the questions most in consideration in Washington, DC, since deliberations began on how to rewrite the federal government's most significant education policy No Child Left Behind. Back in January, when Congressional committees in both houses began their conversations, The Washington Post reported, "a coalition of civil rights groups" had released a statement urging Congress to maintain the annual standardized tests in math and reading. "The testing requirement has come under fire from a strange-bedfellows movement of teachers unions, parents, and conservative lawmakers," notes The Post's Emma Brown, "who argue that the exams represent an overreach by the federal government that has turned schools into one-dimensional test-prep institutions." Indeed, parents and teachers across the country are up in arms about their schools' overreliance on standardized tests. The blogsite Fairtest, by The National Center for Fair and Open Testing, keeps a running tally of news stories across the country reporting on resistance to the tests including boisterous street protests, demonstrations at school board meetings and state capitals, and efforts to boycott the tests. You'd be hard pressed to find a state where there isn't open and prominent rebellion against the tests. A lot of the controversy addresses not only the existence of the tests but also how the scores are used for high-stakes decisions on how schools and teachers are performing and whether to pass students onto the next grade or to graduation. The nation's largest teachers' union, the National Education Association, has come out firmly against the annual testing. So has the other national teachers' union, the American Federation of Teachers at least in terms of how they are being used in the high-stakes decision making. But the civil rights groups argue that annual testing is necessary, Brown reported. "No Child Left Behind's testing requirement has unmasked yawning achievement gaps and forced all states and school districts to focus on serving poor and minority students, including those with disabilities." "Any rewrite of No Child Left Behind should keep annual testing provisions" writes the editorial board of The Washington Post. Their editorial accused teachers unions of giving "lip service to accountability as long as their members aren't the ones held to account." "The tests were intended as a way for schools to see whether all student groups, but particularly minorities and poor students, were being taught adequately" an article in The New York Times states, noting that the Obama administration is steadfast in insisting annual tests stay in the legislation. A particularly vehement defense of annual testing appearing at the blogsite Education Post, operated by a former communications director in the Obama administration's Education Department, compares proposals to curb annual testing to efforts by the National Rifle Association to block most federal research into gun violence and deaths. The writer calls it a "blatant attempt to dump the evidence." So how bout that evidence? Are Black Males Better Off? After 12 years of test-driven education accountability aligned with a "civil rights" cause, you would expect to see substantial improvements among student populations most in need of being better served by the system. That's not the conclusion of a new report released by The Schott Foundation for Public Education. [Full disclosure, Schott is a partner of the Education Opportunity Network.] The report, the most recent edition of "The Schott 50 State Report on Public Education and Black Males," analyzed over a decade of data on the chronically troubled population of young Black males in the country and found too little progress and evidence of recent deterioration. Despite stated intentions of federal education policies, gaps in scores in reading and math tests on the National Assessment of Education Progress between black males and their white peers continue to be wide. Nationally, 38 percent of white males scored at or above proficient on the 2013 NAEP assessment in reading, but only 17 percent of Latino males and 12 percent of Black males did. In math, 13 percent of Black males scored at or above proficient on the 2013 NAEP Grade 8 math assessment, while scores were 21 percent of Latino males and 45 percent of White males. These gaps in achievement get reflected in graduation rates. Of the 48 states where data were collected, "in 35 states and the District of Columbia, black males remain at the bottom of four-year high school graduation rates. (Latino males were at the bottom in 13 states.)” Nine states and the District of Columbia still have alarmingly bad track records for graduating black males of 55 percent or less. While there has been some progress in high school graduation rates for black males over the past decade, the report’s estimate of 59 percent for the 2012-2013 school year are actually lower than the 61 percent mark the US Department of Education forecasted in 2011, which means the direction for these students may be going backward. Nationally, the graduation gap between black and white males has not only persisted, but widened from 19 percentage points in school year 2009-10 to 21 percentage points in 2012-13. Eleven states have over a 25-percentage point gap between black and white student graduation rates. In higher education, these attainment gaps are reflected in data as well, showing only 16 percent of black males eventually holding a Bachelor’s Degree or higher – half of what white males achieve and only somewhat better than the 12 percent rate among Latino males. “Black males continue to be both pushed out and locked out of opportunities for academic achievement,” the report states, “including notable disparities in their enrollment in Advanced Placement courses and participation in Gifted and Talented programming. Furthermore, Black students were more likely to be classified as students with disabilities.” These findings continue to make clear there is “a systemic problem impacting black males,” as Schott’s executive director John Jackson writes in remarks. The report calls for “tailored approaches adapted to personal educational needs, social contexts, and students’ learning styles. The current standard approach does not serve high or low achievers well.” You could argue these findings are irrelevant to issues of standardized testing – that the tests are meant to chart the academic progress of each student year to year, and eventual trajectories such as high school graduation and college degrees are affected by other factors not discernable through annual testing. But that’s the point. While so much emphasis has been focused on standardized testing, much bigger, more important issues impacting young students of color have been sorely neglected. The demands of testing have simply crowded out those issues. The Bigger Picture On Test-Driven Education “For very good reasons, many civil rights groups lined up behind NCLB (just as some now continue to support test-based reforms),” a recent brief from the National Education Policy Center states. But “it is important to note that achievement gaps were well known prior to NCLB,” the brief notes. So what have we accomplished, in terms of civil rights advancement, with 12 years of test-driven reform? “Since NCLB became law in 2002,” the researchers write, “students may have shown slight increases in test scores, relative to pre-NCLB students. Looking at the results of the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), however, any test score increases over the pre-NCLB trend are very small, and they are miniscule compared to what early advocates of NCLB promised. We as a nation have devoted enormous amounts of time and money to the focused goal of increasing test scores, and we have almost nothing to show for it.” A recent broadcast of the Diane Rehm show had a noteworthy point counter-point on the issue of testing between pro-test advocate Matthew Chingos of the Brookings Institution and Elaine Weiss of the Broader Bolder Approach to Education who advocates for a very different direction in education policy. In the discussion, Chingos claims there was “pretty good research evidence” that the goals of NCLB have been accomplished in part, but Weiss points to a study by the National Academy of Sciences that found an over reliance on test data had produced no substantial gains in student achievement and had led to narrowing of the curriculum, particularly in schools serving low-income students. The study, reported on by Valerie Strauss of The Washington Post, found, “Standardized tests commonly used in schools to measure student performance – including high school exit exams and tests in various grades mandated by former president Bush’s No Child Left Behind law – ‘fall short of providing a complete measure of desired educational outcomes in many ways.’” While Chingos argues to the radio audience that annual tests can tell us what effect a school has had on the year-to-year progress of a student, Weiss counters these tests “do a horrible job of telling us how schools are doing.” In fact, because of the strong correlation of test scores to the household income level of the student being tested – a correlation that is undeniably true all over the world – tests mostly “tell us how many poor kids are in the school,” Weiss explains. What should we be doing instead? How Bout This Instead? To begin with, “Testing should not be driving reform,” the folks at NEPC assert. The disparities among subgroups of students will not close by perfecting our testing strategies but only when we commit to “sustained investment and improvement based on proven strategies that directly increase children’s opportunities to learn.” Their conclusion is, “An incremental increase in reading or math scores means almost nothing, particularly if children’s engagement is decreased; if test-prep comes at a substantial cost to science, civics, and the arts, and schooling as a whole shifts from learning to testing.” Instead they call for “a sustained, fair, adequate and equitable investment in all our children sufficient to provide them their educational birthright.” Echoing these recommendations, the policy document from Broader, Bolder Approach linked above calls for “comprehensive supports for the disadvantaged students.” Specifically, the document advocates universal access to high-quality early childhood education and family supports, more “quality time” for enriching instruction, and a “supports-based approach” that includes attention to these students’ nutrition, health, wellness, counseling/guidance, and mental and emotional health. Another intriguing idea is to change annual testing from high-stakes assessments of every student to a sampling of students – disaggregated by race, income and other factors – for the purpose of diagnosing learning problems – a sort of schools-based NAEP. However, the civil rights argument for The Big Annual Test continues to devolve into circular reasoning: Justifications for the tests are based exclusively on what the tests produce – that we need to test every poor black and brown child every year to see what their test scores are. We know what to do when we’re going in circles. Change directions. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/memo-to-civil-rights-activists-testing-isnt-helping/>

The price of mental health: 'I'd rather be sad' After a childhood filled with periods of intense therapy, Alex, a 27-year-old New Yorker with a career in theatre, doesn't expect to go back Is therapy worth it? Seven personal tales about the price of mental health “Maybe just because I am cheap, I’d rather be sad and keep the money than engage in [therapy].” Illustration: Illustration by Chloe Cushman for the Guardian Jana Kasperkevic @kasperka Tuesday 17 February 2015 08.30 EST Last modified on Tuesday 17 February 2015 10.01 EST Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share via Email Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on WhatsApp Shares 88 88 Comments 6 This is one of seven interviews with young professionals about their experiences with therapy and its costs. Read the rest here. By the time Alex turned 18, he couldn’t remember a time when he hadn’t been on medication or in therapy. As a depressed and anxious child, Alex worried his parents, who he says “like to throw money at problems”. When he was a teenager - based on the recommendation of an educational consultant - they sent him to a residential treatment center in Utah. Alex describes the 22 months that he spent at the center as a period of intense therapy. At $6,000 a month, Alex’s stay at the center included room and board, “very bad meals”, schooling and therapy. “It was more expensive than a college education,” he says. The fundamental nature of the economic transaction bothers Alex. “For parents, it’s a strange thing because they want their kid fixed and shielded from evil, but presumably because it’s a thing you are buying, you want it done fast,” he says. “That’s the transaction: fix our kid and do it better and faster than the program down the street.” The summer before he started college, Alex decided to find out what would happen if he stopped taking his medication and stopped going to his weekly sessions. “I was curious,” he says. “Would it all fall apart?” It didn’t. “Everything was sort of the same,” he says. “It ended up being fairly OK, save for the occasional depressive episode.” He decided he’d rather get through these episodes himself than engage in more therapy. Currently, Alex has been out of therapy for about 10 years. “Maybe just because I am cheap, I’d rather be sad and keep the money than engage in [therapy],” he says. “For me, it means more to have a therapeutic conversation with a friend, who I know isn’t being paid to listen.” He says he is probably never going back to therapy. Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/money/2015/feb/17/mental-health-treatment-costs-children-medication-therapy>

Workers at Rockford girls center: Therapy included cartoons, faked records Ex-worker Rock River Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune Former Rock River Academy worker Angelia Babcock: “A lot of staff made stuff up. If you would pull some of the notes, you could look up one kid, and it would be the same intervention day after day for that kid.” Former Rock River Academy worker Angelia Babcock: “A lot of staff made stuff up. If you would pull some of the notes, you could look up one kid, and it would be the same intervention day after day for that kid.” (Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune) By David Jackson, Duaa Eldeib and Gary Marx Chicago Tribune contact the reporters Girls with troubled lives pleaded in vain for therapy at Rock River residential center, ex-workers say. At Rock River Academy, records show ‘group therapy’ might mean watching ‘Lilo & Stitch.’ Ex-worker at Rockford girls center: ‘You would feel sorry for the girls who really wanted some help.’ At Rock River Academy, hours that were billed as “group therapy” for girls with troubled histories instead were spent watching movies in a common area, with no discussion afterward, according to a state monitoring report and interviews with former workers. Direct-care workers at the Rockford facility were expected to produce daily reports stating they had engaged residents in therapy sessions for a certain number of minutes each shift, according to training materials that spelled out “The Rules.” But employees said they often were too preoccupied with breaking up brawls and defusing crises to provide any meaningful therapy. Some workers told the Tribune that their colleagues started their shifts by typing out accounts of therapy sessions they had yet to provide. Sometimes, they said, they copied and pasted clinical notes from one resident’s file to another. DCFS monitoring fails to fix problems at Rock River \(timeline\) Chicago Tribune Graphics Chicago Tribune Graphics Meanwhile, girls who had suffered traumatic abuse pleaded in vain to see a counselor, they said. “There are a lot of false reports about seeing counselors. We used to read through those reports and laugh,” said Maxine Leavy, an employee at Rock River until 2012 who now works with juveniles in a local detention center. "Kids wasn't getting any therapy or counseling. It was just like a kennel — someplace to put your animal. You would feel sorry for the girls who really wanted some help." The 59-bed, all-female facility announced last month that it would close after the Tribune's "Harsh Treatment" investigation revealed that young residents were assaulted by peers and lured into prostitution. State officials have been transferring youths to other placements, and the facility will operate at diminished capacity until its scheduled closure in April. [\[Related Harsh Treatment Graphic essays: Stories of youth without homes See all related 8\]](#) Rock River remains part of a widening U.S. Justice Department investigation into billing practices and conditions of care at 18 of the 190 behavioral health facilities run by Universal Health Services Inc., a $7 billion-per-year for-profit company. Universal has not been accused of wrongdoing in that federal probe and has said it provides compassionate, high-quality care that lifts the lives of troubled youths. For this story, the Tribune interviewed more than two dozen former Rock River workers, although many of them spoke on condition that they not be named because they feared professional and legal retribution from Universal. The Tribune also examined thousands of pages of confidential juvenile case files and other records and interviewed former residents who said there was little engaging programming or therapy at Rock River. [\[Harsh Treatment series, reactionOpen link\]](#) Universal said in a statement that it disputed the accounts of pressure to file misleading reports at Rock River. Staff were trained on how to submit proper records, and state officials audited those records, the statement said. "If employees had been found to have intentionally falsified records, such employees would have been subject to disciplinary action, including immediate termination if warranted," it said. Allegations of misleading records and lack of treatment also appear in government monitoring reports and civil lawsuits at other Universal youth treatment facilities. In one example, Universal in 2012 agreed to pay $6.85 million to settle federal and state allegations under the False Claims Act that one of its Virginia youth facilities had inflated bills to Medicaid while providing substandard psychiatric treatment to adolescents. cComments CUT THE FUNDING, GOV RAUNER! rubiconxj1998 at 7:01 PM February 21, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 11 In a separate example, in 2013, state officials in Illinois commissioned the University of Illinois at Chicago's psychiatry department to examine the treatment and safety of juvenile wards at Universal's Garfield Park Hospital in Chicago. The UIC team reported "alteration or falsification of medical records," saying a top hospital official reportedly pulled notes from one ward's chart "and had the medical director and nurse rewrite their notes to exclude any mention of the unit being volatile or unsafe." Universal said in a statement that it disputes the allegations that medical records were falsified and added that there was no finding of wrongdoing in either case. Well over half of Universal's income from its youth residential treatment facilities comes from Medicaid, the federal health care program, and Universal reports a roughly 20 percent profit margin from the centers, according to the company's Securities & Exchange Commission reports and public statements. Rock River Academy Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune Rock River Academy announced it would close after a Tribune series revealed residents were assaulted by peers and lured into prostitution. Rock River Academy announced it would close after a Tribune series revealed residents were assaulted by peers and lured into prostitution. (Anthony Souffle, Chicago Tribune) Because of Universal's intricate billing procedures, the Illinois comptroller could not determine the dollar amount state agencies paid for housing and treatment of youths at Rock River. Universal does not disclose its revenues or profits from specific residential centers, saying it focuses on high quality treatment. "A typical day in treatment includes 3-5 hours of therapeutic activity — group therapy, psychoeducational or didactic groups, activities and 5 hours of school," Universal said. But Ashley Doan, who worked at the facility for a few months last year, said "the girls have to beg to talk to therapists." Former resident Tesla Ann Wroblewski, 16, who spent more than a year at Rock River starting when she was 13, said the violent atmosphere undermined therapy. "I am glad they're closing — it's a relief to me, because at least now the girls will find actual help," she said. As a newly hired frontline worker with no counseling experience, Stephanie Burdick said Rock River didn't properly train her or other staff to lead therapy sessions or address the wards' intense needs. "They should have special therapists do groups with them surrounding their impulse control, eating disorders, suicide attempts. They should be having better therapy," Burdick said. Teresa Jones said she walked off the job after only a few days on Rock River's residential unit in July because she felt unprepared for the mayhem she encountered: "I felt like my supervisors just threw me in there. ... I felt like I had to fend for myself," Jones said. "I was a baby sitter. You watch some kids and make sure they just don't tear up the house." In at least one instance, monitors from the state Department of Children and Family Services filed internal reports on the lack of therapy at Rock River as well as misleading facility claims that treatment was provided. In 2012, DCFS monitors were called into the facility after other government agencies raised alarms about a series of violent brawls and group runaways. Reviewing 10 Rock River youth case files, the team found one mental health assessment was "obviously a cut and paste composition with repetitive errors." They also observed a facility group therapy session in which girls watched the cartoon movie "Lilo & Stitch," "which had (no) therapeutic value and was not processed with youth afterward. Monitor described group work as 'busy work' for the most part." In response to the monitors, Rock River promised "corrective action plans" and designated existing staff to "performance improvement teams," internal agency memos obtained by the Tribune show. 18 mental health facilities part of federal probe Chicago Tribune Graphics Chicago Tribune Graphics But former staff members told the Tribune that colleagues continued the practice of showing movies and calling it group therapy, even when there was no effort to pick a relevant film or have the girls discuss it in a therapeutic way. Universal's statement said that appropriate movies and TV shows are shown for recreational purposes and that Rock River does not seek payment from Medicaid without a therapeutic component. Workers also said they saw their colleagues copy excerpts from one girl's file into another girl's records to create documents used to bill the government. "It was cut and paste clinical notes," said former mental health counselor Jean Bush, who left Rock River three years ago and now works at another residential facility. Former workers said that while administrators did not order them to falsify reports, they felt relentless pressure to generate the paperwork used for reimbursement from government agencies. Cutting corners became an accepted practice among the beleaguered staff, workers said. [\[Related Harsh Treatment Graphic essays: Stories of youth without homes See all related 8\]](#) "When you're spending the night in crisis and you're trying to keep the girls safe, you don't have the time to talk to the girls, but ... if you didn't write your notes, you'd get pulled into meetings and get wrote up," said Angelia Babcock, who said she worked for Rock River for more than a year until last year. "A lot of staff made stuff up. If you would pull some of the notes, you could look up one kid, and it would be the same intervention day after day for that kid." On non-school days, workers were expected to produce reports saying they gave each child in their care 23 to 37 minutes of therapy, according to Rock River training records and interviews. Those reports were used in billing government agencies, the facility records show. Expectations about how many minutes were to be reported varied depending on the shift and whether youth were attending school. To meet those expectations, some workers would report that they held sustained therapy sessions when they had interacted with a girl only sporadically, according to Tribune interviews with former staff. Graphic essay: A beating by peers, chaos during class and a bold bid for freedom Chicago Tribune Graphics Chicago Tribune Graphics "There was a day I was told I had to do notes on girls and I didn't have any interactions with them," said one former worker who spoke on condition that she not be named. That worker said she witnessed others do just that. Employees said administrators provided examples of precise phrases and language to be inserted into notes on therapy sessions. Some said they watched colleagues start their shifts by writing up reports on interactions with residents, when they hadn't actually seen the girls yet. "How can a person type notes at 7 in the morning for an intervention that supposedly occurred at 2 in the afternoon?" one former worker asked. cComments CUT THE FUNDING, GOV RAUNER! rubiconxj1998 at 7:01 PM February 21, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 11 Burdick recalled one short-staffed weekend shift when she and a fellow worker had to handle 12 girls, including one who needed one-on-one supervision with an employee always at her side. "There were two suicide attempts. It was complete chaos," Burdick said. "And after the weekend, my supervisor asked me, 'How did the weekend go?' I told him everything, and the first question out of his mouth was, 'Did you get any notes done?' I just looked at him like, really?" dylackson@tribpub.com deldeib@tribpub.com gmarx@tribpub.com Copyright © 2015, Chicago Tribune Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/watchdog/rctc-rock-river-records-met-20150220-story.html#page=1>

New Seattle Test Boycott Erupts: Nathan Hale High School votes to refuse to administer a Common Core test By I AM AN EDUCATOR on February 24, 2015 Today, I found out from my good friend Doug Edelstein that his school community decided to collectively refuse to administer the new Common Core test, the SBAC, to 11th graders. Doug teaches at, and graduated from, Nathan Hale (in fact, my step-dad was a classmate of his). The Nathan Hale Senate—a body made up of the teachers, administrators, parents and students—voted nearly unanimously that this test was inappropriate. The vote was taken after careful consideration and much discussion and inquiry, including two school community forums — one of which included University of Washington professor of education and renowned scholar on high-stakes testing, Wayne Au. This is the first year that the SBAC is required in the Seattle Public Schools, and this action represents an escalation of the high-stakes testing resistance that erupted against the MAP test in 2013. In taking this action, Nathan Hale has become the latest focal point of what has now become the largest ongoing revolt against high-stakes testing in U.S. history and an important new escalation in the national resistance to common core testing. Doug wrote the following announcement of Nathan Hale's courageous decision to take a stand against the testocracy: This afternoon the Nathan Hale Senate (functions as Building Leadership Team) voted nearly unanimously not to administer the SBAC tests to 11th graders this year. The Senate also recently voted not to administer the PSAT test to 10th graders at all in the future. Reasons for refusing the SBAC for 11th graders included (summary): 1. Not required for graduation 2. Colleges will not use them this year 3. Since NCLB requires all students pass the tests by 2014, and since few if any schools will be able to do that, all schools will therefore be considered failing by that standard. There is thus no reason to participate in erroneous and misapplied self-labeling. 4. It is neither valid nor reliable nor equitable assessment. We will use classroom based assessments to guide next instructional steps. 5. Cut scores of the SBAC reflect poor assessment strategy and will produce invalid and unreliable outcomes. 6. Student made this point: "Why waste time taking a test that is meaningless and that most of us will fail?" 7. The SBAC will tie up computer lab time for weeks. 8. The SBAC will take up time students need to work on classroom curriculum. This is an important step. Nathan Hale is asserting its commitment to valid, reliable, equitable assessment. This decision is the result of community and parent meetings, careful study of research literature, knowledge of our students' needs, commitment to excellence in their education, and adherence to the values and ideas of best-practice instruction. This resolution does not mean NHHS will refuse the 10th grade SBAC assessments, sorry to say. But the way the school went about the decision is a powerful model for other schools, and means that anything is still possible in that regard. Yay. Doug Edelstein Source: <http://iamaneducator.com/2015/02/24/new-seattle-test-boycott-erupts-nathan-hale-high-school-votes-to-refuse-to-administer-a-common-core-test/>

Dumb And Dumber In The Republican House Education Bill For sure, there is a lot for Democrats to dislike about the current version of No Child Left Behind federal education legislation steaming toward approval in the US House of Representatives. The bill, HR5 the Student Success Act, was written completely by Republicans, passed through committee without any Democratic support, and has already drawn strong opposition from the Obama administration and others. But with Republicans firmly in charge of efforts to rewrite NCLB, it's important to identify specifics in the bill that should become bright lines Democrats can't cross and points for inclusion to fight for in Senate negotiations and joint deliberations. What's Dumb At the top of the list of what Democrats oppose in the Student Success Act is the insistence among Republicans that federal money for public schools be further constricted. While a number of state governors and prominent voices on Capitol Hill have come to the realization that levels of spending on education need to increase substantially, the bill from the Republican controlled House would ensure long terms cuts. Quick to criticize this, President Obama was quoted in Beltway news outlet The Hill saying the Republican bill would "lock in cuts to schools for the rest of this decade." A White House report elaborated, explaining how the bill would cement education cuts demanded by the 2013 sequester and ensure federal education funding will be lower in 2021 than it was in 2012. At The Huffington Post, president of the American Federation of Teachers Randi Weingarten voiced similar criticism that the Republican bill would "lock in recession-driven cuts to education. It would allow state and local governments to walk away from their responsibility to maintain funding from year to year." And as Valerie Strauss reported on her blog at The Washington Post, 115 education groups contend the funding levels proposed in the House bill "are inadequate to properly support K-12 public education." In a letter to Congressional leaders, these organizations argue, "HR5 locks in over $1.7 billion in education cuts" at a time when "public school enrollment will increase by more than 2.2 million students." There is definitive research that spending at sufficient levels is really important if we want "student success," as the Republican bill purports to legislate. And the federal government has a very important role to play in providing this funding, especially because most states are currently reliant on federal money to help them maintain education funding from year to year. What's also galvanizing Democratic Party opposition to HR5 is the bill's complete neglect of funding for preschool education. Education Week reporter Alyson Klein reported US Secretary Arne Duncan opposes the legislation, in part, because it "doesn't create any sort of new investment in early childhood education," an area that Duncan and House Democrats have been saying they'd like to see significant new investments. Democrats mostly agree with a coalition of education professionals and advocacy groups that has "urged lawmakers to consider adding dedicated funding for preschool in the bill" according to Allie Bidwell at U.S. News & World Report. These advocates argue, "Any legislation should create a dedicated funding stream for states to receive targeted federal dollars to expand early learning and child care programs in schools with high concentrations of low-income students." Federal support for preschool education would come at a time when more states are also seeing the need to increase funding for these programs. As District Administration magazine reports, "For the third year in a row, both Republican and Democratic policymakers are making significant investments in state-funded preschool programs." The article found a 12 percent increase in state investment over fiscal year 2013-14. Yet, increased spending levels for pre-k are not universal, as many states still struggle to afford these initiatives. Research continues to show that spending more money on education programs for three and four year olds produces strong gains in education achievement and other measurements later in life. So any legislation coming out of DC that would blunt the upward momentum in pre-k funding would be a step back. What's Dumber What's worse, HR5 would also eliminate progressive elements in the original Elementary and Secondary Education Act dating back to the presidential administration of Lyndon B. Johnson. Specifically, HR5 would discontinue federal enforcement of states' "maintenance of effort" in public education funding. The term maintenance of effort refers to the requirement that state and local funding levels remain relatively constant from year to year; otherwise they lose eligibility to receive federal grant support. An analysis from the National Education Association explains, eliminating maintenance of effort "will trigger a race to the bottom in state and local support for education as federal dollars would be reduced to backfilling holes in state and local support ... Removing MOE requirements also undercuts the effectiveness of the 'supplement, not supplant requirements'" that ensure states don't substitute federal money for their own responsibility to educate children. "Currently, the MOE requires districts to spend at least 90 percent of the state and local money they spent in the prior year, yet districts may reduce their spending by up to 10 percent without penalty, which provides sufficient flexibility already." The other terrible idea in the House bill is to enact Title I Portability. Title I of the original ESEA ensures federal dollars create more funding equity in education by targeting money to schools and districts with the highest concentrations of low-income students. What the Republicans are now proposing is that Title I money would "follow the child" when parents opt out of a Title I designated public school to attend a wealthier school or a charter school. As Politico reports, Secretary Duncan maintains allowing Title I dollars to follow the child would cause the money to flow out of high-need districts. A report from his department contends, "The 100 largest school districts in the country serving high concentrations of black students could lose $1.3 billion. For districts serving many Hispanic students, the loss could total $1.8 billion. Detroit City Schools stands to lose $265 million and Los Angeles Unified School District could lose $782 million." Rural schools will be harmed as well, as Jackie Mader explains at The Hechinger Report. "In Mississippi, where more than 56 percent of students attend rural schools, Title I funding could be cut by $7 million, with the largest cuts taking place in five high-poverty Mississippi Delta districts." A report from the Center for American Progress called Title I Portability "Robin Hood in reverse," stating, "school districts with a poverty rate of more than 30 percent would lose money, while districts with a poverty rate of under 15 percent would see dramatic increases in funding." Title I Portability is also flat out unworkable. States opting into it would turn the budgeting process in the most struggling schools into a guessing game. It would also rob these schools of their economies of scale. When a school would lose a percentage of students in a particular grade level or across grade levels, the school would not be able to cut its teaching staff proportionally, as that would leave the remaining students underserved. So what would have to happen instead would be to cut a support service – such as a reading specialists or a special education teacher – to offset the loss of funding. This would damage the effectiveness of the school long term and cause it to slide further into the ranks of "low performing." Title I Portability is also an especially important point of opposition because some Democrats have adopted conservative talking points that "letting the money follow the child" and allowing "parents to vote with their feet" are stands-ins for sound fiscal policy and regulation that would enforce equity and quality. Proposals like Title I Portability are the logical outcome of any argument that would base education policy on a market-based ethic rather than basic guarantees of quality and equity. That position is a slippery slope to privatization. As The Washington Post's Emma Brown explains, "Many Democrats see it as a first step toward federal vouchers that would allow students to use federal funding for private school enrollment." There's More There are certainly other things to dislike about HR5. Promoters of the bill contend it provides states with more flexibility, but then it includes the absurd condition that use of federal funding for reduced class sizes (Title II) be limited to 10 percent. The bill lifts the outmoded and damaging federal enforcement of Adequate Yearly Progress that has unfairly labeled struggling schools as "failures," yet it leaves in place much of the strict testing requirements that are broadly opposed by parents and teachers. And the bill allocates more money for charter schools but provides no new conditions or requirements for what has now become a wildly unregulated and corrupt sector. The Network for Public Education, a public education advocacy founded by parents, teachers, and education scholars, has provided an online tool to support people wanting to write their congressional representatives and tell them to vote no on the bill. Should the bill pass, as is predicted, Democrats then must continue to insist that any revision of NCLB must ensure equity and quality rather than austerity and further privatization. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/dumb-and-dumber-in-the-republican-house-education-bill/>

California foster care: Push to curb medication has failed in past By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 02/21/2015 12:49:18 PM PST 2 Comments Updated: 02/21/2015 07:04:13 PM PST Drugging Our Kids The full Bay Area News Group investigation, including a documentary video. Over the course of a decade, California lawmakers have considered a dozen bills to regulate the use of psychiatric drugs in the nation's largest foster care system. Yet, despite the alarm over children medicated as young as 4 and teens so doped they drooled and became obese, just one became law: a bill to speed up court approval so foster children could get drugs more quickly. Pushed in 2004 by residential group home directors and psychiatrists, Assembly Bill 2502 sailed to the governor's desk with no opposition even as a succession of bills that would have scaled back prescribing died in committees. Now, with youth advocates cheering a major new legislative push to curb overprescribing in foster care, the years of setbacks are forcing an uneasy question: This time, will things finally change? Joymara Coleman, a 24-year-old Cal State East Bay student, displays two of the psychotropic medications she was prescribed while in foster care. She no longer takes Abilify or Trazodone, but keeps them in her apartment as a reminder of what she has overcome. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) (Dai Sugano) Beginning Tuesday with a Senate Human Services Committee hearing, lawmakers will consider four new bills in the wake of this newspaper's yearlong investigation "Drugging Our Kids." The newspaper found that although California tasked the juvenile court with reining in reckless prescribing as early as 1999 -- making it unique in the nation -- the number of foster children receiving psychiatric drugs over the last decade remains at almost 1 in 4 teens. Well over half of those children were prescribed antipsychotics, drugs that are poorly studied in children and can cause debilitating side effects -- but blockbuster moneymakers for pharmaceutical companies. Advertisement Those numbers indicate the state has urgent work to do, said retired Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Terry Friedman, who sponsored the bill that requires California's juvenile courts to approve all psychotropic prescriptions in foster care. Friedman said while some children need medications to manage their emotional health, the current rates are "alarming and disappointing" -- given that the "clear goal" of the bill he pushed 16 years ago "was to stop overmedication." "It seemed painfully evident that kids were being medicated for behavioral-control purposes and that just seemed inappropriate, excessive and dangerous," he said. However, history shows the new controls may have difficulty passing if they increase workloads, raise costs or run into opposition from groups concerned that easy access to medications could be hampered. Lobbyists representing doctors and group homes have long had powerful voices in the state Capitol. "Care delayed is care denied," said Randall Hagar, a lobbyist for the California Psychiatric Association, "so we would look at the time elapsed between the time a doctor said, 'I think this kid needs a med,' and when they get the med. And if that's too long, then bad things happen." Carroll Schroeder, executive director of the California Alliance of Child and Family Services, said the residential group homes he represents have similar concerns. Any new controls, he said, should not prevent a child from getting "the right treatment or therapies at the right time in the right dosage." The 2004 bill his alliance sponsored required the courts to rule on med requests within seven days, addressing what his members described as harmful delays in prescription authorizations. But Senate Majority Leader Bill Monning, D-Carmel, said new legislation is needed -- and he is confident it will pass because of a heightened public awareness, a coordinated group of senators and a problem too big to ignore. Monning's bill would provide courts with second medical opinions and require health exams before a child is prescribed an antipsychotic. "I clearly see these as health care issues and fundamental human rights issues," Monning said. State Sens. Jim Beall, D-San Jose, and Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles, and Assemblyman David Chiu, D-San Francisco, are also crafting bills with guidance from the National Center for Youth Law that would ensure better monitoring of medicated foster children; require regular reports on prescribing; train caregivers and social workers; and drive down prescribing in group homes where medications are most heavily used. From 2001 to 2011, similar legislation that would have ensured patient rights as basic as having doctors review medical records before prescribing repeatedly failed. Legislative efforts to require reporting on the number of foster children prescribed drugs also failed repeatedly, even when amended versions shrank them to pilot projects in just a few of the state's 58 counties. One such bill in 2004 aimed to "reveal gaps in the state's ability to adequately regulate the use of psychotropic medications." Former foster youth Jennifer Rodriguez, now executive director of the San Francisco-based Youth Law Center, testified before the Assembly in 2006 about the need for tighter controls. She implored the state to fund "nontraditional mental health stress relief like dance lessons, gym memberships and recreational activities," as well as services to connect kids with relatives and caring, committed adults. Rodriguez spoke from experience, telling lawmakers in a videotaped hearing that at age 12 she was given sedatives in her first group home, where she had trouble sleeping. That progressed to antidepressants "and before long, I was on four different prescriptions," she testified. "I was alternately sleeping in class and then bouncing off the walls. My hands were shaking so bad I couldn't even hold a pencil." Five years later, the advocacy group Rodriguez once led, the California Youth Connection, tried again to obtain health care protections for foster youth that most kids growing up in families would receive. The Foster Care Mental Health Bill of Rights would have strengthened youths' right to refuse medications, granted them age-appropriate information on potential side effects, and required that they be informed if prescribed medication had not been tested on children. But county mental health directors expressed concerns, saying the bill could "create complicated clinical consequences." Friedman hopes California leaders will pay attention to the children's voices this time around. "What's important really should be set by the kids rather than by the professionals," Friedman said. "I'm not suggesting anarchy, but the system exists for them and we need to listen to them." Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source: http://www.mercurynews.com/health/ci_27573948/california-foster-care-push-curb-medication-has-failed

Senate panel examines why California foster care system "addicted to psychiatric drugs" Iris Hoffman, 18, a member of the California Youth Connection, testifies on Feb. 24, 2015 in a hearing in the state Capitol to address the misuse of psychotropic medication in the child welfare system. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) By Karen de Sá, Bay Area News Group Posted: 02/24/15, 7:08 PM PST | # Comments Iris Hoffman, 18, center, a member of the California Youth Connection, testifies on Feb. 24, 2015 in a hearing in the state Capitol to address the misuse of psychotropic medication in the child welfare system. (Dai Sugano/Bay Area News Group) SACRAMENTO >> California's foster care system "has grown more addicted to mind-altering medication," the chair of a powerful Senate committee told a packed public hearing in the state Capitol Tuesday, adding that "here in California, we've done little to act on this alarming issue." Vowing change on the eve of a new legislative season, state Sen. Mike McGuire said past failures to act are now "simply unacceptable," resulting in thousands of California foster youth who "have fallen victim to inaction, and at times politics." Tuesday's four-hour hearing before the Human Services Committee highlighted a package of bills he introduced this month, following Bay Area News Group's investigation "Drugging Our Kids," which revealed nearly one in four teens receive psychiatric drugs in foster care -- often to control their behavior, not to treat mental illnesses. Most are prescribed antipsychotics, a powerful class of the drugs with the most harmful side effects. Will Lightbourne, director of the state's Department of Social Services, acknowledged "there's a very deep concern about the volume" of psychotropic drugs prescribed to foster youth and vowed, "Yes, we do want to bring that number down." Lightbourne said two state-sponsored panels have spent years working to develop guidelines that would protect foster children from the excessive use of psych medications and to decrease the reliance on the drugs at residential group homes, which house some of the toughest to place foster kids. Foster children deserve "non-medical treatments whenever possible," Lightbourne said. But McGuire, D-Healdsburg, pressed state officials to explain why so little has changed since state lawmakers held a hearing nearly a decade ago on the very same issue. On Tuesday, former foster youth, child psychiatrists, a leading juvenile court judge and the director of a powerful lobby of child welfare directors said solutions are long overdue. They are urging state lawmakers to pass a series of bills that -- among other issues -- would step up court oversight of prescribing, expand the role of public health nurses to better monitor medicated children, and train caregivers to defuse disruptive or self-destructive behaviors without the use of sedating drugs. Advertisement "We need to shift our thinking away from the primacy of psychiatric medications toward relationships," testified George Stewart, a Berkeley child psychiatrist who has spent much of his career tapering severely traumatized children safely off high-risk drug cocktails. "We are going to look back on this era of great enthusiasm for psychiatric medications and either scratch our heads or beat our heads. We will look back in 20 years and say: 'What were we doing?'" Former foster youth Iris Hoffman, 18, of Sonoma County spoke to senators on behalf of youth in the child welfare system who are scared to refuse medications because they will be punished in residential group homes. "It's really hard to trust someone who's forcing you to take pills that you don't feel is right for you to be taking," said Hoffman, a member of the advocacy group California Youth Connection. "Seroquel, Abilify, Ativan -- all of the things I was prescribed before I was 16 -- they never helped me heal from the trauma I suffered." On the local level, some counties are already looking at alternatives. Toni DeMarco oversees a program for San Mateo County foster youth that includes drumming, yoga, and swimming -- "the kinds of interventions," she said, "that make the need for psychotropic medications go away." Lori Medina, director of Santa Clara County's Department of Family and Children's Services agreed. "The symptoms around these children's trauma cannot just be remediated with medication -- there has to be other approaches," Medina said. "Social workers are trained to ask questions, but there has to be more of that." Senators also said they were alarmed by the newspaper's analysis that showed how pharmaceutical companies lavish the state's foster care prescribers with millions of dollars for meals, gifts, travel, speaking engagements and research grants -- a practice Lightbourne called “deeply troubling.” The newspaper found the doctors who prescribed the most, typically were rewarded the most. State Sen. Bill Monning, D-Carmel, expressed outrage that drug companies promote prescribing of powerful psychiatric drugs that have not been approved for use on children. “How do we avoid there being a monetary incentive for prescribing these drugs?” he asked. At Tuesday’s hearing, senators McGuire and Monning discussed whether new regulations to outlaw conflicts of interest that could be harming foster youth are now needed. The head of social services responsible for California’s roughly 63,000 foster youth agreed. “To the extent that we can as a state restrict that,” Lightbourne said, “I think that’s ultimately very good.” Source:

<http://www.santacruzsentinel.com/health/20150224/senate-panel-examines-why-california-foster-care-system-addicted-to-psychiatric-drugs>

A For-Profit Foster Care Agency, Traded on the Stock Exchange, Deadly to Children Details Written by Michele Bittner Created on Wednesday, 25 February 2015 15:14 Share on email Share on print Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on linkedin Share on pinterest share Share on google plusone share More Sharing Services February 20, 2015; BuzzFeed News One of the nation’s largest for-profit foster care agencies, Mentor, has recently come under scrutiny after investigation has revealed a string of missteps leading to abuse, mistreatment, and several deaths. While organization executives have dismissed claims that National Mentor Holdings’ negligence has resulted in substandard services, the company has received some of the highest numbers of serious violations in several states, including Massachusetts, Georgia, and Texas. In some of its most severe instances of abuse, failed background checks on foster parents had detrimental results to the children in Mentor’s care. At Last Chance Farm in Maryland, boy after boy was sexually abused at the hands of foster parent Stephen Merritt. Even after reports by foster children, a letter from a former victim’s psychologist, and several police investigations, Mentor continued to place young boys in Merritt’s care for at least seven years. In Texas, failed screenings of potential parents allowed for several failed placements with Sherill Small. Mentor failed to interview adequate numbers of relatives, relying instead on the reference of Small’s daughter, who was herself convicted of aggravated kidnapping and robbery. Meanwhile, Small’s husband was also approved as a foster parent despite his admission to a long-time cocaine addiction. After several failed placements, two-year-old Alexandria Hill was placed in Small’s care, and then murdered at Small’s hand in a fit of frustration. And while both foster parents would never have been approved had adequate screening and background check policies been in place, poor decision-making by Mentor staff enabled the abuse to occur. Such cases have lead to investigations into the company as a whole, and as a result, Mentor’s organizational goals have been questioned. Instead of a strong focus on quality services to children, former staff members of Mentor claim that the central focus of operation is increased profit margins. According a former employee, “You feel the pressure. You have to make those targets. I went there because I care about services for kids. I eventually became a machine that cared about profits. I didn’t care about kids.” As a company traded publicly on the New York Stock Exchange, there were undoubtedly times when the costs of quality services at Mentor have come into conflict with the demand for higher shareholder profits. Foster care agencies are intended to serve as a safety net for vulnerable children, and the rapid expansion of corporate entities for increased market share in such human service industries capitalizes on resources that should be passed on in services to those in need. With this in mind, many foster care agencies contracted by state and local governments are nonprofit agencies focused on quality service over profits. Yet the past thirty years have seen increases in for-profit companies entering the field. While some local and state governments have restricted contracts with for-profit agencies, strong partnerships between entities such as Mentor and nonprofit sister organizations have allowed their position in foster care to continue. Similar to the relationship between charter schools and related for-profit entities, such intertwined relationships between nonprofits and for-profit entities bring questions of accountability and motive in a variety of industries.—Michele Bittner Source: <https://nonprofitquarterly.org/policy/social-context/25679-a-for-profit-foster-care-agency-traded-on-the-stock-exchange-deadly-to-children.html>

Father speaks out about foster parent allegedly abusing daughter • Wednesday, February 25, 2015 Print E-mail Share Editor’s note: It is the Boomerang’s policy not to run names of defendants in sex crime cases until a conviction, or guilty or no contest pleas, unless the accused is a person of public interest, such as an elected official, or a person of public trust, such as a teacher or counselor. By CHILTON TIPPIN chiltont@laramieboomerang.com A former Laramie foster parent faces 11 charges of sexual abuse of a minor in Converse County stemming from allegations he sexually assaulted an 8-year-old girl in Douglas. Stephen Calderon, 30, arrested in August in Converse County, is also under investigation in Albany County, the Laramie Police Department confirmed. Calderon is charged with 11 counts of first-degree sexual assault in Converse County. Each charge carries a penalty of up to 25 years imprisonment and/or a $10,000 fine, according to court documents. While the Laramie Police wouldn’t release details about the ongoing investigation or charges, a former resident whose children were under Calderon’s care in Laramie said his daughter was raped several times by Calderon. Chris Kruse, the girl’s father, said he wants to make the incident public because what happened to his family “is wrong and needs to be exposed.” Kruse said his daughters were 3, 6 and 9 when the Wyoming Department of Family Services placed them under the care of Calderon and his wife in January 2013 in Laramie. Kruse, who originally lost custody of his children following a divorce, fought to get his daughters back for more than a year. DFS returned them to his custody in November 2013. The following November, Kruse’s oldest daughter — who turned 10 under Calderon’s care — told Kruse, his partner and a trusted friend that Calderon came into her bedroom and performed sexual acts on her, Kruse said. When Kruse found out, he said, “it killed me inside.” “We believe in this system that’s supposed to take care of us, and when things aren’t right, they’re supposed to be there for our families, specifically DFS,” he said. “When they step in and take children away, they don’t do any better when they put them in this kind of care, you know, put them in a situation like that — that scars them for life. There’s nothing you can do to take something like that away. It’s going to be there forever.” The Wyoming DFS declined to discuss Calderon’s employment, such as where or for how long he was a foster parent. Nor would the agency say how many children were placed under Calderon’s care. DFS also declined to speak about the details of Kruse’s case. A report on payments made to Calderon provided by DFS following a public records request shows the first payment made to Calderon was in July 2007. The final payment made to Calderon was in August. During this time period, DFS paid Calderon about $93,000. During the time period Calderon had Kruse’s children — roughly January 2013–November 2013 — DFS paid Calderon about $26,430, records state. Tony Lewis, the agency’s spokesman, wrote in an email “Wyoming has an excellent safety record when it comes to protecting children in foster care.” “We realize, however, that it’s unacceptable for even one child to be harmed in foster care,” he wrote. “Because this case is now in the courts, DFS can’t comment on the information provided to the Laramie Boomerang without violating state statutes on confidentiality in child cases.” Divorce and protection orders Kruse provided the Boomerang with hundreds of files documenting the agency’s custody of his children and his struggle to get them back. Kruse and his ex-wife divorced in 2010, and she was granted custody of the children. Court records provided by Kruse show his ex-wife took out four protection orders against him, dating back to 2002. In the 2002 protection order, filed in Angola, Indiana, Kruse’s ex-wife alleged he “shut my hand in the door” and “verbally abuses and threatens me.” Kruse said that charge was later dismissed. In a 2005 protection order, filed in Fort Collins, Colorado, Kruse’s ex-wife alleged “he was choking me until I blacked out.” Kruse said he took a misdemeanor criminal mischief charge in a plea agreement in this matter. His ex-wife filed one family violence protection order in 2008 in Albany County. Kruse counter-sued and won the case, according to Albany County court records. Kruse’s ex-wife also filed one stalking protection order in Albany County. The case was closed without a prevailing party named. For his part, Kruse maintains he and his ex-wife argued, but he was not violent. Rather, she made the allegations because she “learned how to work the system.” “There was never any reason for (the protection orders),” he said. “She continually used the exact same reason, almost word for word.” Kruse also said he has never been convicted of a felony. A review of Albany County court records shows he has no felonies in Wyoming. Kruse said his ex-wife moved to Indiana. Attempts to contact her for this story were unsuccessful. In summer 2012, Kruse’s ex-wife dropped his three daughters off at his house for a summer visitation, he said. During the visit, which lasted several weeks, Kruse and Alisha Hood, his partner, would spank the girls if they misbehaved, he said. Before the children returned to Kruse’s ex-wife, Hood said she spanked the middle child with a spoon. Kruse’s ex-wife later saw bruises on the child’s behind and called police. According to court documents, Kruse’s ex-wife told police the bruises were from the spanking. In an interview with the Boomerang, Hood said she didn’t spank the child hard enough to leave bruises. According to court documents, Hood told police on July 27 “it was possible she had bruised (the child) while spanking, but if she had it was unintentional.” Kruse told the Boomerang the bruises came from the child falling off her scooter. He told police “if Alisha left the bruises, they were unintentional,” according to court documents. Neglect/abuse petitions were filed against Kruse and Hood in Albany County District Court. In a fall 2012 plea agreement, Hood pleaded no contest to the charge. In return, the state agreed to drop the charge against Kruse, according to court documents. Kruse’s ex-wife, however, kept custody of the children — until January 2013. DFS takes custody Following the neglect/abuse incidents, the court ordered Hood, Kruse and Kruse’s ex-wife to take parenting classes, along with several other obligations. Kruse and Hood said they hoped to begin the process of getting the children back, so they began “jumping through the hoops.” However, Hood said the court insisted the parenting classes be taken by all three adults. When Kruse’s ex-wife failed to show up for classes, thereby delaying the eventual return of Kruse's children, he sued her for contempt of court, Kruse said. During the Jan. 7 contempt of court hearing, the judge found out Kruse's ex-wife was keeping the children in the same home as a convicted felon and registered sex offender, according to court documents. DFS took the children into custody the next day, placing them with Calderon and his wife. "When they were first taken, I went to (our DFS caseworker) and said, 'Why are they going to foster care?'" Kruse said. "You have no issues with us. I've been cleared." Kruse contended the children were taken from him in the first place because of something Hood allegedly did. Moreover, the charges against him were dismissed in the plea agreement. But the caseworker told him there was a protocol for getting his children back, Kruse said. "He said, 'Give it a couple of weeks,'" Kruse said. "He told me that for months." Meanwhile, Kruse and Hood went to multidisciplinary team meetings, where case and custody matters were discussed among attorneys, counselors, DFS caseworkers, school principals and others. The multidisciplinary team was originally opposed to granting Kruse custody. But as Kruse and Hood worked through parenting classes, attended meetings, spoke with team members and complied with other wishes, the team eventually recommended transitioning custody to Kruse. For example, in a July 2013 multidisciplinary team meeting document, the entire team recommended keeping Kruse's children in DFS custody. By October 2013, however, every team member except the ex-wife's lawyer recommended transitioning the children to Kruse's care, according to the team document. Conversely, the entire team except the ex-wife's lawyer disagreed with a recommendation to transition the children to Kruse's ex-wife's care, according to the team document. Kruse got his girls back shortly before Thanksgiving 2013. Transition and Calderon Bringing the girls back into the household was difficult, Kruse said, and none of his children mentioned anything about the abuse. In time, however, Kruse said he had a feeling his oldest daughter wanted to tell him something. "I think she wanted to talk to us, but she didn't know, she was scared, she thought she would get in trouble for what had happened," he said. She first told a trusted friend of the family, Kruse said. Then she opened up about the abuse to Kruse and Hood in November 2014, a year after returning home, Kruse said. Hood and Kruse said they don't know whether the younger daughters were abused. The oldest, Hood said, has done her best to cope with the trauma. For months, she had nightmares and couldn't sleep without her dog. "She's afraid that somebody is going to come wake her up in the middle of the night," Hood said. Laramie police approached the oldest daughter to report the crime, Kruse and Hood said, but their daughter declined to comment. "She's very embarrassed," Hood said. "She's scared to talk about it." But Kruse said the family has since moved out of the state, and all three children have slowly improved since coming home. A March multidisciplinary team report stated "all three girls have expressed excitement about living with their father." As for Calderon, he remains in custody in the Converse County Detention Center. Calderon allegedly told authorities in August he performed multiple sexual acts with the 8-year-old girl during the time period of April 1-Aug. 28 in Douglas, according to court documents. Speaking with Converse County Sheriff's Office deputies, the minor child allegedly confirmed the allegations, according to the documents. Any case brought against him in Albany County is pending the Converse County proceedings, Laramie Police Lt. Gwen Smith wrote in an email. Calderon was arraigned in October in Converse County District Court. A pretrial hearing is set for March 24. He remains incarcerated in the Converse County Detention Center, where he awaits an April 6 trial. DFS official explains foster parent vetting process, Wyoming safety record Tony Lewis, Wyoming Department of Family Services spokesman, said the agency vets potential foster parents through a series of background checks, including running their fingerprints through an FBI database and checking state child abuse and neglect records. Caseworkers examine potential foster parents' residences. DFS trains foster parents on "the nature of the responsibilities that go along with having a foster kid," Lewis said. The agency also provides special services, counseling and additional resources for foster parents watching children with special needs, he said. Lewis said a state's overall performance and safety are typically measured with three indicators: the percentage of children who receive monthly visits from caseworkers; the state's average time for investigating reported cases of maltreatment; and the number of children maltreated in foster care. "On those three measures, Wyoming has good performance," Lewis said. According to the United States Children's Bureau: — In 2012, the most recent year for which data is available, 98 percent of Wyoming's foster children in the state received monthly visits from caseworkers. — In 2012, no foster children were maltreated while in foster care. — In 2012, Wyoming's average time for investigating cases involving children was 14.9 hours. "The national standard is supposed to be around 24 hours," Lewis said. "About one-third of the states can't meet that, and there are very few states that have as quick a response time as Wyoming." Source: <http://www.laramieboomerang.com/articles/2015/02/25/news/doc54ed50660b583778676995.txt>

Mom happy with boot camp murder verdict - Crime & Courts | IOL News Mom happy with boot camp murder verdict SuppliedRaymond Buys, a 15-year-old boy, died after he was kept chained to his bed, beaten with planks and hoses at a training camp in Vereeniging, that boasted of "making men" out of its young recruits. Picture: Supplied Johannesburg - The mother of a 15-year-old boy who died after being abused at a camp said she was happy that both accused were found guilty of murder by the Vereeniging Regional Court on Friday. "I have mixed emotions, but I'm happy that they were both found guilty and that it's come to an end," said Wilna Buys. Magistrate Retha Willemsse found Alex de Koker and Michael Erasmus guilty of murder, child abuse and assault. Their charges related to the death of 15-year-old Raymond Buys at the Echo Wild Rangers Camp in 2011. Wilna said the four years since Raymond's death had had a huge impact on their family and that they were only now starting to pick up the pieces. "I think he's sitting and smiling down on us and is proud of everything we've done," she said, bursting into tears. "It wasn't easy to be here all the time, but we made a promise to Raymond." Erasmus's father, Casper, said he felt guilty for sending his son to the camp. "Alex (de Koker) pulled the wool over my eyes. I feel guilty because I forced Michael to go. "But thankfully I still have my child. The Buys family is sitting without their child. It's a nightmare." Michael Erasmus's stepmother Betsie Erasmus said they were glad the trial was drawing to an end. "Michael was also just a child when he went to the camp. He was easily influenced." Operations manager of Women and Men Against Child Abuse, Tania Otto, said the judgment was excellent. "We're very surprised that the magistrate found them guilty of murder because judges seems hesitant of that." After the judgment, De Koker, wearing a bright pink shirt with his feet cuffed together, gave his wife a long hug over the dock before a number of police officers led him back to the holding cells. Michael Erasmus sat with his father, stepmother, girlfriend Sindy Nel and their five-day-old daughter outside the court room. Source: <http://www.iol.co.za/news/crime-courts/mom-happy-with-boot-camp-murder-verdict-1.1824784#VPPdWOKtGIs>

California foster dad gets 19 years to life for sex abuse of six girls LOS ANGELES Fri Feb 27, 2015 9:02pm EST inShare0 Share this Email Print LOS ANGELES (Reuters) - A former Southern California foster parent was sentenced on Friday to serve nearly 19 years to life in prison for raping and sexually abusing a half dozen girls who were 9 to 15 years old while in his care, prosecutors said. Felipe Hernandez, 68, pleaded guilty earlier this month to multiple felony counts of aggravated sexual assault on a child, lewd acts on a minor, child pornography and other sex offenses stemming from crimes committed over the course of six years, according to the Orange County District Attorney's Office. The abuse, which ranged from groping to rape, came to light in the summer of 2012 when a relative of Hernandez discovered a digital memory card containing video of him molesting one of the girls and reported it to the Santa Ana Police Department, the prosecutor's office said. A spokeswoman for district attorney's office, Roxi Fyad, said the Hernandez case marked one of the more egregious instances of serial sexual abuse in the county's foster care system. "He violated his position of trust," Fyad said. Two of his victims confronted Hernandez at his sentencing in court, saying the trauma they suffered had led them both to attempt suicide but that they had since moved on to "a better place in their lives," the prosecutor's office said. Hernandez was sentenced to a term of 18 years and eight months to life in prison. His wife, Maria Esther Hernandez, 61, was sentenced separately in 2013 to three months in jail and three years of probation for her role as an accessory after the fact in trying to cover up the abuse, prosecutors said. (Reporting by Steve Gorman) Source: <http://www.reuters.com/article/2015/02/28/us-usa-foster-rape-idUSKBN0LW02Q20150228>

Legislation needed to protect foster kids' personal funds By Daniel L. Hatcher University of Baltimore Maryland needs legislation to stop its foster care agencies from taking child resources. Our state foster care agencies are apparently so underfunded that they are taking resources from abused and neglected children. The agencies are taking control over foster children's Social Security benefits (when the children are disabled or have deceased parents) and using the children's funds to repay foster care costs. In other words, Maryland is requiring the children to pay for their own care. Maryland will even take Veteran's Assistance benefits from children with a parent who died in the military. And a state regulation was written to take "all of the child's resources" to repay foster care costs, including "the child's own benefits, insurance, cash assets, trust accounts" and even the child's own earnings — everything. This even though Maryland is rightly already legally obligated under state and federal law to provide and pay for foster care services. This isn't only in Maryland. I know of one case in Illinois where the children's SS was taken, then DCFS took the parent to court for child support. When calculating the amount of child support to be paid, they included the children's SS as part of the mother's income. It's almost out of a Charles Dickens novel — forcing orphaned and disabled foster children to pay for their own care. Other states have engaged in this practice regarding Social Security benefits, but the fact that other states may be engaged in bad policies does not make it OK for Maryland. There's more: Maryland hired a private company last year — Maximus, Inc. — to provide an assessment for how the state can obtain more resources from foster children and, according to Maximus' report, "maximize revenue gain"; the report describes foster children as a

"revenue generating mechanism." The Maryland Department of Human Resources contracted with Maximums despite litigation regarding the practice and a finding by the Maryland Court of Appeals that the agency violated foster children's due process rights by providing no notice to the children or their lawyers. Maryland foster care agencies are significantly underfunded. But taking resources from the very children the agencies exist to serve is not the answer. Luckily for our state's foster children, Sen. Jamie Raskin and Del. Geraldine Valentino-Smith sponsored legislation this year that takes an important step toward improving protection of foster children's own resources. Senate Bill 524 and companion House Bill 575 mandate that: •The foster care agency serve in a fiduciary capacity for children in its care, only serving their best interests; •In addition to deciding how to best use the children's resources for current unmet needs, the foster care agency begin conserving at least a percentage of the funds to help those children who will soon be aging out of care; •The foster care agency help children begin to understand finances and start planning for their futures. SB 524 and HB 575 help ensure that foster children's own resources are used to truly help the children, including aiding the children's struggle for future self sufficiency. Using the children's resources, a planning process is encouraged to promote saving for the children's future educational and employment goals, including already available specialized savings accounts — such as the Program for Achieving Self Support (PASS) and individual development accounts. This legislation will help our most vulnerable children to help themselves by using their available resources in ways that serve their current unmet specialized needs and assist in their difficult future struggle for independence as they leave foster care. The Senate bill, with amendments, received a unanimous favorable vote from the Senate Judicial Proceedings Committee. A hearing will soon be held before the House Judiciary Committee. Members of that committee should follow the lead of their counterparts in the Senate. Daniel L. Hatcher is a professor of law in the University of Baltimore; his email is dhatcher@ubalt.edu. Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/opinion/oped/bs-ed-foster-funds-20150303-story.html>

Board Members Of Troubled Foster-Care Company Have Little To Say About Abuses Talat Ansari BuzzFeed News Reporter Aram Roston BuzzFeed News Reporter posted on March 4, 2015, at 8:57 a.m. Tweet Bookmark it Tweet Tweet A recent BuzzFeed News investigation into the nation's largest for-profit foster care company revealed deaths, sex abuse, and serious lapses in the training and oversight of foster parents. The investigation into National Mentor Holdings found instances of long-term sex abuse in Maryland by Mentor foster fathers, widespread problems with Mentor documented by the state of Texas, and at least six deaths of children in the custody of Mentor since 2005. Mentor trades on the New York Stock Exchange as Civitas Solutions Inc., which reported $1.2 billion in revenue last year. Companies can often seem faceless, but like all public companies, Civitas is governed by a board of directors. BuzzFeed News decided to find out whether members of the board knew about the problems exposed by the recent investigation, and if so, ask what they planned to do about it. For some children, it's a question of life and death. View this image Alexandria Hill Sherill Small, a Mentor foster parent in Texas, murdered 2-year-old Alexandria Hill in 2013, smashing in her skull. Mentor had placed the little girl with Small despite warning signs that she wasn't fit to be a foster parent. From September through December 2012, Small had taken in five foster children, but every one of them had been removed as "failed placements," Small, according to an internal Mentor document obtained by BuzzFeed News, "reported feeling stressed out, and will express that she is unable to care for the children in the home." The Mentor document also warns that personnel from the Texas state Early Childhood Intervention (ECI) program "felt the children should not be in the home at that time." Less than a month after that report, Mentor placed little Alexandria with Small, the foster mother who would become her murderer. View this image Aram Roston / BuzzFeed News In Maryland, Stephen Merritt, one of several Mentor foster parents at a compound called Last Chance Farm, pleaded guilty in 2011 to sexually abusing multiple boys in his care. Another foster father on same compound, Tracy Grant Bayne, also admitted to abusing a boy. Again, warning signs weren't heeded. As far back as 2004, a boy had complained to his Mentor caseworker that he was being abused. The caseworker sent him back to Merritt. Police investigated allegations of abuse twice, but didn't find enough to press charges. A psychotherapist wrote Mentor in 2010, warning of "huge red flags" in Merritt's interaction with a child. But it would be another year before police finally arrested Merritt and stopped the abuse. An analysis of Texas data by BuzzFeed News found that Mentor ranked last among large foster placement providers in the state, based on the number of severe violations per home. Texas regulators found more than 100 serious problems in Mentor foster homes in the last two years, including, but not limited to, instances of children being slapped, hit with belts, and struck. In Georgia, where the state grades child-placing agencies, Mentor's fared poorly as well. Of the six branches Mentor runs in Georgia, not one scored an average grade above the median in the 10 most recent quarters. State and local governments have long worked with nonprofits and religious groups to help find good homes for children whose parents can't care for them. But over the past several decades, for-profit companies have started winning contracts to manage foster care placements. Former Mentor employees said that the pressure to make profits sometimes led to Mentor cutting corners on protecting the children — a charge Mentor strongly disputed in BuzzFeed News' original story. Mentor also said it has helped thousands of children, and pointed to Maryland, where state regulators recently gave the company high marks. In 2006, National Mentor Holdings was bought for $242 million in cash by Vestar Capital Partners, a giant hedge fund based in New York City. The company went public last year under the name Civitas, but Vestar still owns about two-thirds of the stock. Three Vestar employees sit on Civitas' board: Chris Durbin, James Elrod Jr., and Kevin Mundt. View this image Civitas Solutions / Via civitas-solutions.com When BuzzFeed News called Vestar to ask to interview its employees after the investigation was published, a spokesperson said, "Vestar declined to comment." Before the story ran, the spokesperson had provided this statement: "Vestar shares MENTOR Network's belief that one tragedy within any foster care program is one too many. Mentor's investments over the past decade to strengthen service quality while expanding programming have been fully supported by Vestar. We are proud to be associated with an organization that has enhanced the lives of tens of thousands of children and adolescents and adults with disabilities." View this image Federico Peña, Pamela Lenehan, Guy Sansone, and Greg Torres US Department of Energy, Civitas Solutions / Via civitas-solutions.com Federico Peña isn't a Civitas board member but he's a "senior advisor" to Vestar. He's also a powerful political figure, a former national co-chair of the Obama presidential campaign and a secretary of transportation and a secretary of energy under President Bill Clinton. Reached after the story ran, and told about the problems at Mentor, he said he had not read the BuzzFeed News story. "'I'm not involved in that matter but thank you for the call and I have to go.'" Pamela Lenehan, who was elected to the Civitas board in 2008, did not answer numerous phone calls from BuzzFeed News. Guy Sansone, a healthcare consultant, did not respond to a phone call and email placed by BuzzFeed News. Greg Torres — former president and CEO of Mentor from 1996-2004 — did not respond to a phone call and email placed by BuzzFeed News. BuzzFeed News did not reach Patrick M. Gray, an accountant and former audit partner at PricewaterhouseCoopers. View this image Patrick M. Gray, Edward Murphy and Bruce Nardella. Civitas Solutions / Via civitas-solutions.com Edward Murphy and Bruce Nardella currently work at Mentor. After BuzzFeed News had started contacting the other board members and before calling Murphy and Nardella, a Mentor spokesperson sent a statement on behalf of the entire board: "Service quality and outcomes across The MENTOR Network are of paramount importance to the entire Board. We were aware of matters raised in your story, and especially the tragedies in Maryland and Texas. We are also aware of how profoundly the organization has been impacted by these tragedies, as well as the comprehensive actions management has taken in an effort to ensure the safety and well-being of the children and adolescents served in MENTOR's programs. "As a Board, we appreciate the challenges associated with foster care, and understand that while no provider will ever achieve perfection, each, including MENTOR, has a responsibility to strive for it in partnership with public agencies. We recognize that the good work of the MENTOR team has enhanced the lives of tens of thousands of children at-risk and adults with disabilities. However, we have also insisted that the organization learn from each mistake in order to enhance its programs and protect those it is privileged to support." correction An earlier version of this story contained remarks attributed to Civitas Solutions board member Patrick M. Gray. In fact, BuzzFeed News did not speak to that Patrick M. Gray but to a different person with the same name who claimed to be a Civitas board member. March 4, 2015, at 4:12 p.m. Source: <http://www.buzzfeed.com/talalansari/board-members-of-troubled-foster-care-company-have-little-to-say-about-abuses>

Epworth Village closes G.I. group home Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Wednesday, March 4, 2015 11:00 pm | Updated: 11:46 pm, Fri Mar 6, 2015. Epworth Village closes G.I. group home By Tracy Overstreet tracy.overstreet@theindependent.com theindependent.com Posted on Mar 4, 2015 by Tracy Overstreet Epworth Village has closed its Grand Island group home. Harrietta Reynolds, chief executive officer of Epworth Village in York, said the home at 2317 N. Kruse Ave. in Grand Island was too expensive to run. "The boys would attend our school, so we had to be transporting them a lot," she said. "It wasn't really a practical thing after a while." Epworth Village was founded in York in 1889 as Mother's Jewels Home to care for orphaned and abandoned children. It was renamed Epworth Village in 1959 and took on the mission of providing services for children and families with severe emotional and/or behavioral disorders. The group home in Grand Island opened in 1999. Despite being located directly across the street from Grand Island Senior High, the group home boys were taken to York weekdays for enrollment in Epworth

Village's accredited school there. "It was so expensive to travel to bring them over to school in York," she said. "That's what had to happen because we have our own school ... accredited by the state." Reynolds said attending public schools often wasn't an option for the Epworth Village boys. "Because of behavioral issues, it was not an option in most cases," she said. "There were some times where they could be mainstreamed into certain classes in a public school, and that happened on occasion but not to a great extent." The Grand Island group home, which was licensed to hold 10 boys between the ages of 12 and 18, closed on Dec. 3, 2014, Reynolds said. It had six boys at that time. They were all taken to the Epworth Village campus in York. Reynolds said Epworth Village is in a rebuilding phase. It just announced this week the opening of a girls' group home in York. A different use of the home in Grand Island will likely begin in about two to three months, Reynolds said. It should not result in any noticeable change in the neighborhood. "We have another use in mind that would serve children and families," she said. "We want to use it as a ministry — part of our ministry to children, family and youth." Residents in the neighborhood initially objected to the group home and spoke out against a conditional use permit issued by the city in March 1999. The home had served boys who were wards of the state who had contact with the court system, had run away from home, had come from abusive homes or were preparing to return home after receiving mental health treatment. In January 2003, three boys, ages 14 and 15, at the group home reported being sexually assaulted by a female staff member there. The Grand Island Police Department responded to the incident and found older boys at the home who also reported having sexual contact with the female staff member, but they were over the age of 16 and by law were old enough to give consent, the police stated. The female staff member was dismissed. Even though the group home in Grand Island has closed, the conditional use permit allowing its continuation will remain valid for one year following its the continuous operation, Regional Planning Director Chad Nabity said. However, it's not yet known if a conditional permit may be needed in the future. Grand Island is updating its group home definitions and regulations, which may remove the need for a conditional use permit depending on the home's future use, Nabity said. Reynolds said Epworth Village is looking at several possibilities for the home, which Epworth will continue to own. "One option would be for a professional foster family. It would be a family living there that would have foster children placed by the state ... but they can only take a few," Reynolds said. "We're looking at our options," she said. Source: http://www.theindependent.com/news/local/epworth-village-closes-g-i-group-home/article_6af6ce88-c2cb-11e4-9117-832fa96a91a2.html

Lawsuit alleges assault by Carrick group home employee Circle C home is same one where teenager was fatally beaten — A group home in Carrick is being sued over an alleged assault by a staff member that happened last year. Lawyers cast doubt on police account of Carrick group... Pittsburgh police say two teens are responsible for killing a third at a home for troubled boys. A judge must decide if there's enough evidence to send both to adult court for trial. More Teens charged with homicide after alleged attack at group... Two teenage boys were charged with homicide Thursday night, accused of beating a 16-year-old boy at the Pittsburgh group home where they all lived. The case has prompted investigations by the state and Allegheny County. More It's the same home where a teenage boy was beaten to death earlier this year. VIDEO: Watch Paul Van Osdol's report In last year's incident, the lawsuit says, employee Jaymar Gilbert grabbed 16-year-old resident around the neck and threw him down the steps at the home on Carrick Avenue. Gilbert later resigned and is currently facing a charge of simple assault in connection with the incident. The lawsuit says the group home owner, Circle C Youth and Family Services, hired him despite the fact that he had an extensive criminal history. Court records show Gilbert had been convicted of illegal possession of a firearm, burglary, theft, receiving stolen property and drug charges. "When you're bringing people in to care for at-risk youth you have an obligation to provide those children with the best care you can possibly provide. Mr. Gilbert's background clearly denotes otherwise," said Todd Hollis, the attorney for the teen victim. In a prepared statement, Circle C director Richard Knouff said, "We are careful and diligent in our hiring process. All employees of Circle C, and anyone who works in this field, are required to pass three background checks: child abuse, FBI and Pennsylvania State Police. This incident was thoroughly investigated by the relevant authorities and concluded to their satisfaction." He also said employees with criminal histories can be effective at working with at-risk youths. The state cited Circle C in connection with last year's incident. The state is still investigating the January beating death of 16-year-old Nicholas Grant at the group home. Two other boys who lived at the home are awaiting trial on homicide charges in that case. Source: <http://www.wtae.com/news/youth-group-home-sued-over-alleged-assault-by-employee/31614390>

Former foster mother charged with sexual relationship with foster son Police say Dana Fouse, 38, had sex with teen in her Hyde Park home A Westmoreland County woman is charged with having an ongoing sexual relationship with her former foster son. Related View Large Photos Westmoreland County's 20 most wanted fugitives The following people have been deemed "Most Wanted Fugitives" by the sheriff's department. The sheriff says all wanted subjects have active warrants at the time of posting the information. Do not act or try to apprehend any recognized subject. More VIDEO: Watch the report by Ashlie Hardway Dana Fouse, 38, of Hyde Park, is charged by state police with statutory sexual assault, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse and other charges related to the alleged crimes. Investigators said they interviewed the teenage boy, who claimed the two had sex almost every day for nearly 11 months. "The defendant told the victim that she was unable to become pregnant," state police wrote in an affidavit of probable cause. "She would also periodically tell the victim not to tell anyone of their sexual relationship and also told him not to drink alcohol so he wouldn't accidentally tell anyone of their relationship." Police said Fouse's own children were sometimes present in the home, though in different parts of the home, when the sexual acts would occur. Investigators said the relationship ended after the boy was moved into a new foster home, but that Fouse bought him a cellphone and mailed it to him so he could still communicate with her. It was after the new foster family found the phone that the boy confessed to the relationship, investigators wrote in the affidavit. PHOTOS: Westmoreland County's 20 most wanted fugitives The Westmoreland County Children's Bureau is listed as the contact on the state website for those inquiring about foster parenting, but bureau director Shara Saveikis said the bureau only oversees children from Westmoreland County who are placed in the foster system. Because of privacy rules involving foster children, Saveikis said she could not confirm or deny if the victim in this case was a foster child from Westmoreland County or another county. Saveikis did confirm Fouse was not licensed by the bureau, so she would not have been managed by the bureau, rather by the agency from where she was licensed. The state-run website on the foster program states all potential foster parents must pass extensive background checks. "To ensure the child's safety, the agency will conduct a criminal background check and child abuse clearance on everyone in your home, age 14 and over," according to the site, adoptpakids.org. Fouse remains free on bond while she awaits a preliminary hearing in April. Source: <http://www.wtae.com/news/former-foster-mother-charged-with-sexual-relationship-with-foster-son/31655748>

Texas foster care deaths addressed in house committee By Phil Prazan Published: March 9, 2015, 2:14 pm Updated: March 9, 2015, 7:14 pm 26Click to share on Twitter Click to share on Google+ 329Share on Facebook Click to share on Pinterest Related Coverage Tales of foster care abuse in Texas sound 'like prison' Children dying in foster care spurs new set of rules CPS: Infants in foster care had bruises, broken bones AUSTIN (KXAN) — More than a dozen Texas children have died in foster care in the past two years. A string of deaths in Central Texas helped highlight the lack of oversight and accountability the state has in protecting children. A bill by Representative Cindy Burkett, R-Sunnyvale, hopes to raise the standards of care. The House Committee on Human Services will hear HB 781 Monday. Ashley Harris from Texans Care for Children says Texas has some of the lowest standards for foster parents. Around 90 percent of foster kids are in privately run foster homes. The state currently requires eight hours of training for guarding over basic (non-disabled, non-special needs children) children. The requirement goes up to 16 hours for children with special needs. "We do know going into the future, more training and better screening will lead to improved safety and placement stability for kids in foster care," said Harris. Currently on the Child Protective Services website, there's a statement saying over 16 hours is recommended for foster parents. However, CPS does not require over 16 hours. HB 781 would require 35 hours of foster parent training. That instruction would include First-Aid, CPR, behavior intervention, trauma-care, and how to give psycho-tropic drugs to children. The bill would also require private foster homes to make public their requirements and training routines. The Department of Family and Protective Services would check in and keep track of those standards. There are close to 17,000 Texas children in foster care. Ten died in 2013. Three died in 2014, including a pair (4 and 6 years old) who drowned in a Georgetown lake. No one registered to oppose the bill at the hearing on Monday. Source: <http://kxan.com/2015/03/09/texas-foster-care-deaths-addressed-in-house-committee/>

Group wants Miss. held in contempt in foster care case Jimmie E. Gates, The Clarion-Ledger 2:02 p.m. CDT March 9, 2015 A child advocacy group is once again asking that the state be held in contempt for failure to carry out mandated reforms in the state's foster care system in the long-running federal lawsuit. Kyeuna would be dead and Shyeuna would be serious injured when a vehicle plied into the women.(Photo: File photo) 84 CONNECT 10 TWEETLINKEDIN 1 COMMENTEMAILMORE A child advocacy group is once again asking that the state of Mississippi be held in contempt for failure to carry out mandated reforms in the state's foster care system in the long-running federal lawsuit. According to the most recent Monitor's Report, the state is failing to produce reliable data on many of the key elements of the settlement agreement, and of those elements on which data is available it is not meeting the required standards, said lead attorney Marcia Robinson Lowry, executive director of New York-based A Better Childhood. Lowry was originally with another New York-based organization, Children's Rights, when the lawsuit was filed in 2004 on behalf of children in state custody asserting widespread violations of the constitutional rights of children in the Mississippi foster care system. The class action, originally known as Olivia Y. v. Barbour, cited dangerously high caseloads, untrained caseworkers, a shortage of foster homes, and a widespread failure to provide basic health care services. In 2008, a settlement agreement was reached and approved by the federal court in 2008. But in 2010, the plaintiffs asked the state to be found in contempt for noncompliance. The court found that the state was in noncompliance with "virtually all areas covered by the agreements" but declined to hold the state in contempt at that time. Instead, the court directed the parties to renegotiate the agreement and to "establish realistic timelines." A Modified Settlement Agreement was approved by the court in July 2012, according to Lowry. A modified settlement agreement, approved in 2012, contained an action plan to address the state's consistent failure to meet court-ordered performance standards. But Lowry said Monday that the latest report of independent monitor assigned to the case, shows the state is still in noncompliance. "For example, there is virtually no reliable information on hiring and worker attrition and thus no reliable information on which to determine worker caseloads, no reliable information about maltreatment in care, and virtually no information about how the state addresses problems in the treatment of children," Lowry said. Even in the regions of the state in which a new "Case Practice Model" has been implemented, performance is well below the standards set in the Modified Settlement Agreement. "Lowry said she was surprised and disappointed with the state's lack of progress. "What the state agreed to do isn't that significant; it's either a lack of capacity or a lack of will to do it," Lowry said. "We felt we had no alternative but to file this action." During state budget hearings, Mississippi Department of Human Services Executive Director Rickey Berry said the state needs to spend an additional $12 million to meet requirements of the lawsuit. He also said at that time the state has seen an increase of 450 children in foster care in the past year, with many of the children entering foster care because of drug use by their biological parents. Also, he said the state had a vacancy of about 150 social workers. Contact Jimmie E. Gates at (601) 961-7212 or jgates@jackson.gannett.com. Follow @jgatesnews on Twitter Source: <http://www.clarionledger.com/story/news/2015/03/09/group-wants-state-help-contempt-foster-care-case/24656929/>

Boy, 12, in foster care accidentally hangs himself from tree, police say Child was playing alone for about 20 minutes, officials say NEXT STORY Disney's Hollywood Studios to undergo name change Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text A 12-year-old boy, who was in foster care, accidentally hangs himself, police say. Photos A 12-year-old boy, who was in foster care, accidentally hangs himself, police say. PALM BAY, Fla. —A 12-year-old boy, who was in foster care, accidentally hanged himself on Sunday night, according to the Palm Bay Police Department. Related Investigators said Palm Bay Fire Rescue responded to a call about a child not breathing in the 1300 block of Meadowbrook Road around 6 p.m. "The child was airlifted to the trauma hospital where doctors pronounced him deceased," Palm Bay police spokeswoman Yvonne Martinez said. Martinez said the child was playing in the backyard alone for about 20 minutes on a "Tarzan" style rope swing, with an open loop at the bottom, when he allegedly got wrapped in the loop and asphyxiated. Most watched: Running of the reindeer "It's a tragic, freak accident," SVU Detective Jasmine Smith said. "We are still investigating all the circumstances and are still trying to notify the boy's next of kin." The Department of Children and Families is investigating the circumstances in the home, and have relocated three other children who were also living at the home. The investigation is ongoing. DCF launched a separate neglect investigation into the foster parents, officials said. Source: <http://www.wesh.com/news/boy-12-in-foster-care-accidentally-hangs-himself-from-tree-police-say/31697856>

Woman says group home worker beat her autistic son during... | www.wftv.com Woman says group home worker beat her autistic son during argument over cornflakes 7 8 8 47 Related Photos: Special needs man's injuries View Larger A central Florida mother said this is what happened to her special needs son when she left him in the care of a Lake County group home. CLERMONT, Fla. — A central Florida mother is planning to sue after she said her special needs son, Kelvin Rosa, was beaten with a three hole punch while in the care of a group home in Clermont. It's the latest abuse allegation Channel 9's Kenneth Craig has uncovered against Central Florida Group Homes since the state filed a complaint against them last year. The victim's mother said she's taking action to prevent abuse from happening to another family. Photos: Special needs man's injuries She said the dispute between her 24-year-old autistic son and a care worker was over food, and both she and her attorney said there is no reasonable explanation for Rosa's injuries. Rosa, who is diagnosed with Asperger's, was beaten with the object when he tried to get cornflakes around bedtime, his mother told police. The female worker told investigators a different story, saying she was attacked and that Rosa fell while she was defending herself. "Nobody has the right to touch a young person," said Rosa's mother, Maria Santiago. "All the stories she told were lies." Santiago spoke with WFTV through a translator and said she and her attorney are planning to sue Central Florida Group Homes. Last year, Channel 9 exposed similar complaints against the organization, which operates more than a dozen homes. Craig also found other lawsuits involving sexual abuse and even a death at one of their homes. "That tells me that their conduct hasn't changed," said attorney Bryan Crews. "It's a sick that a company with 17 homes can allow this type of activity to occur." According to police documents, the worker accused by Santiago is no longer employed, and the organization said it stands by the fact that the case was closed, and no one was charged. Source: <http://www.wftv.com/news/news/local/woman-says-group-home-worker-beat-her-autistic-son/nkTBT/>

Former Fremont County foster parent faces sexual assault charges involving kids in his care Former Fremont County foster parent faces sexual assault charges involving kids in his care Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2015-03-11T17:30:00Z 2015-03-12T17:47:04Z Former Fremont County foster parent faces sexual assault charges involving kids in his careThe Associated Press The Associated Press March 11, 2015 5:30 pm • The Associated Press \(0\) Comments × Related Photos <> Lander Police Department Enlarge Photo RIVERTON — A 66-year-old Lander man has been accused of sexually assaulting two children about seven years ago while he was their foster father. Court papers say one child was 9 or 10 years old and the other 8 years old when they lived with the man from August 2007 to July 2008. Identifying information about the children has been redacted from court documents, and identifying the man could identify the victims. The Fremont County Attorney's Office has charged him with two counts of first-degree sexual abuse of a minor. The maximum penalty for each is 50 years in prison. Circuit Court Judge Robert Denhardt has decided there is enough information to send the case to District Court for trial. Source: http://trib.com/news/local/crime-and-courts/former-fremont-county-foster-parent-faces-sexual-assault-charges-involving/article_719360d0-50ee-55e7-8cd3-4bad5403d7d7.html

www.palmbeachpost.com Senate bill aims to shift more Florida foster kids out of group homes 4:55 p.m. Friday, March 13, 2015 | Filed in: News Comments 0 Jupiter autistic teen's parents furious with Petco after coupon arrest Access to MyPalmBeachPost.com included for Post subscribers Explore TALLAHASSEE — As lawmakers continue efforts to shore up the front lines of Florida's child-protection system, they are also eyeing the back end — that is, what happens to children who have been removed from family homes due to abuse and neglect. House and Senate committees this week examined the options for those children, with the Senate Children, Families and Elder Affairs Committee on Thursday passing a bill (SB 940) aimed at helping foster children who live in group homes. The measure by Sen. Nancy Detert, R-Venice, would push the foster-care system to rely less on group care and do more to find permanent families for children. She said it was a response to a recent study that showed that placing children in group homes instead of with foster families is much more expensive and possibly worse for kids. The study, released last month by the Legislature's Office of Program Policy Analysis and Government Accountability, found that group homes cost the state nearly $81.7 million for about 2,200 children in 2013-2014, more than $37,000 per child. In comparison, the state rate when a foster family cared for a child age 13 to 17 is $527 per month, or $6,324 per year. The study also found that group homes primarily serve older children — and more males and minority children — with behavioral health issues. Physical aggression, running away, truancy and drug use were all higher among children in group homes as opposed to foster families. "The kids in our group homes have a higher level of aggression. That's what got them here," Kenneth Bender, executive director of Boys Town North Florida, told the House Children, Families and Seniors Subcommittee on Wednesday. Bender said the youths also have a higher level of depression, which can spark aggressive behavior as well. Others, however, contend that children who have been so mistreated in their homes that they must be removed for their own safety would benefit most from loving families. "Group care is an intervention; it's not a place to live," Carole Shaffer of the San Francisco-based Youth Law Center told the Senate panel on Thursday. "Group care is designed to get kids back into the place where they can live with a family." "They need normalcy in their lives," Janice Thomas, assistant secretary for child welfare at the Department of Children and Families, told the House panel on Wednesday. "They also need adult advocates who are looking out for the best interests of the children." As of January, 8,827 children in out-of-home care had been placed with relatives; 2,034 had been placed with non-relatives such as a teacher, coach or family friend; 6,734 were in licensed family foster homes; and 2,177 were in licensed group care facilities, according to information presented by the Department of Children and Families to lawmakers. Slightly more than 11 percent of children who are removed from their families are placed in group homes rather than with relatives, friends or foster families. National surveys suggest that long-term outcomes were slightly worse for Florida children in group care. "The OPPAGA report indicates that there seems to be no effective, consistent system in Florida for determining which children are placed in which group home and assessing whether group care is appropriate or whether the child is benefiting from the placement," Detert said. "A placement for a child should not be a placement of last resort." But for some children it is. "It depends on the area and the system of care," Thomas said. "Sometimes, unfortunately, it is because we don't have enough foster homes." Detert's bill would address that by requiring the Department of Children and Families to develop a proposal for a continuum of care for foster children. It would include a method of assessing children to decide on their initial placements. Just under half of the children in group care have fewer than two placements before being placed in a group home, according to the OPPAGA report. "We hear group-home providers say that a particular child in their care was in multiple placements before coming to them," Detert said. "The need for better assessment before an initial placement is made is obvious. A child shouldn't be set up to fail a placement because of a bad initial assessment." The first version of Detert's bill would have gone further to reduce group care and would have restricted the circumstances and lengths of time that children could stay in group homes employing shift workers. But the Florida Coalition for Children, which represents group homes and community-based care agencies that subcontract with them, objected in part on the grounds that some children need more intensive therapies. "I really don't like the term 'shift care,'" Shelley Katz, chief operating officer of Children's Home Society of Florida, told the House panel. "I think it is a little bit offensive to some of our staff who have invested 25 years in the care of children." Source: <http://www.palmbeachpost.com/news/news/state-regional-govt-politics/senate-bill-aims-to-shift-more-florida-foster-kids/nkWZG/>

Arkansas Republican who gave girls to rapist used foster daughter illegally in campaign ad David Ferguson 14 Mar 2015 at 14:04 ET Harris family, their three sons and 'Jeannette' (Harris 2014 campaign) Don't miss stories. Follow Raw Story! Allegations of wrongdoing continue to pile up against Arkansas Republican state Rep. Justin Harris, who adopted two girls out of the foster system, then "re-homed" them with a man who raped one of them when the girls became too difficult to care for. According to the Arkansas Times blog, Harris violated state Department of Human Services (DHS) regulations by featuring one of the girls in a campaign ad when he ran for his state house seat. Arkansas DHS policy strictly prohibits any activity that would compromise a foster child's anonymity. Harris used the photograph of the girl when she was still a ward of the foster system. The Times reported that the girl in the ad was the eldest of the three deeply troubled sisters who the Harrises took into their home in the fall of 2012. In order to clearly tell the girls' story, the newspaper re-named the eldest girl Jeannette, the middle girl Mary and youngest Annie. The Times identified the girl in the photo as Jeannette, whom the Harrises never adopted, but sent on to another foster home. DHS spokeswoman Amy Webb told the Times that she could not comment on the Harris campaign ad directly. "If we were made aware of a situation like you described, we would immediately call the foster or pre-adoptive parent and tell him to discontinue using the picture on any campaign material. We would not be comfortable with a foster child's picture being used during a campaign. [DHS's Office of Policy and Legal Services, which according to department rules, has to approve public use of any media featuring a foster child] would not agree to that either." Numerous sources have come forward and decided the appallingly botched adoption, which Harris and his wife Marsha reportedly pushed for over the objections of the girls' previous foster parents, child care professionals and DHS officials. Harris reportedly threatened to cut the DHS budget if his family didn't get to adopt the girls in spite of the fact that he and his wife were repeatedly warned that the sisters were special needs children who would require intense counseling and other forms of therapy in order to adapt to a new home. "The problem was simple hubris," said a foster mother who worked with the girls. "He saw it as, 'I'm with God. God's going to solve this.'" The Harrises have stringently denied any wrongdoing in the case. In an emotional press conference with their attorney last week, they blasted the DHS and the media and insisted that they are being unfairly blamed for the rape of the middle sister by Eric Francis after the Harrises handed the girls over to Francis and his wife Stacey. They issued a public statement in which they insisted "Rep. and Mrs. Harris have suffered a severe injustice. Due to threats of possible abandonment charges, they were unable to reach out to DHS for help with children who presented a serious risk of harm to other children in their home." The DHS vehemently disputes the Harrises' claims, as do multiple witnesses who said that Marsha Harris was convinced that the girls were possessed by demons and could communicate telepathically. The family kept Mary, the middle girl, locked in a room for the bulk of her day with no toys or books, and monitored her with a video camera. "The first night I was over there, I just broke down and cried with this little girl because I just felt so bad for her," said babysitter Chelsey Goldsborough. Marsha Harris had stripped the girl's holding room of book, toys and colorful clothes "because a demon told [Mary] not to share," Goldsborough said. "Demons told her to not appreciate [her toys] and all that, so they took away all the toys and her colored clothes." Report typos and corrections to corrections@rawstory.com About the Author David Ferguson is an editor at Raw Story. He was previously writer and radio producer in Athens, Georgia, hosting two shows for Georgia Public Broadcasting and blogging at Firedoglake.com and elsewhere. He is currently working on a book. Source: <http://www.rawstory.com/rs/2015/03/arkansas-republican-who-gave-girls-to-rapist-used-foster-daughter-illegally-in-campaign-ad/>

Private Christian boot camp shut down, owners arrested South Floridian who alleged abuse at Alabama facility reacts Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print South Floridian who alleged abuse at shut down boot camp reacts MOBILE, Ala. - The owners of a private Christian boot camp where parents paid to send their troubled teens have been arrested and the facility is also shut down. Madison Litsky said the emotion flooded in when she heard that a so-called boot camp for troubled kids had been shut down and the two men running the place were arrested. "Yes, I did cry," Litsky said. "I was overwhelmed by what happened ... while I was there, and how it affected my life and it still affects my life today." Quick Clicks Teen: Camp pastor punched me Teenagers allege abuse at camp Litsky, who lives in Plantation, was one of numerous teens who alleged abuse at the private facility in Alabama called Restoration Youth Academy. She and another South Florida teen, William Vargas, told their stories to Local 10 in 2013. "He hit me and hit me again," Litsky recalled. "I was choked," Vargas said. William Knott and Pastor John Young, who ran the camps, denied the claims, but the Mobile Police Department shut down their current camp, now called the Saving Youth Foundation, for sanitary violations March 5 after serving a search warrant there during an ongoing criminal abuse investigation, removing all 36 teens there. Knott was arrested on an unrelated domestic violence warrant, and Young was arrested on a traffic warrant. "They didn't deserve to be in an environment like that," Litsky said. Litsky, who is now 20, is now a lifeguard on Fort Lauderdale Beach and is getting training to become an EMT. She said she's relieved the 36 teens have been rescued from the camp. "None of the kids there -- bad or not -- deserve any of that," said Litsky. "Yeah, those kids needed help, but they weren't getting the help they needed." Litsky is expected to complete her EMT training in May as the criminal investigation in Alabama continues. A Mobile, Alabama, police spokeswoman told Local 10's Bob Norman the 36 teens removed from the boot camp were turned over to the state and are being returned to their parents. Source: <http://www.local10.com/news/private-christian-boot-camp-shut-down-owners-arrested/31787210>

OUR GOOD DEEDS: High school students help homeless youth OUR GOOD DEEDS: High school students help homeless youth 2 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email <> 031515-nws-good1 Courtesy photo Central High School students in Heather Hoeye's special education English class are gathering donations to create survival bags for homeless youth. 2015-03-15T08:00:00Z OUR GOOD DEEDS: High school students help homeless youth Claudia Laws Journal staff Rapid City Journal March 15, 2015 8:00 am • Claudia Laws Journal staff \(0\) Comments Local acts of kindness To submit an item for consideration, visit rapidcityjournal.com/gooddeeds or email claudia.laws@rapidcityjournal.com Rapid City Central High School students are creating survival bags to help homeless youth. Teens in Heather Hoeye's special education English class are building 50 bags which will each contain a blanket, toiletry items, laundry soap, socks and beef jerky, as well as any other items the class can gather. "We chose this project because we've all been through hard times and we know how it feels to suffer through some of them," said junior Cody Brede, 18. "We thought it would be a great thing to bring hope to people who don't have anything." The students are partnering with Arise Lutheran Social Services, a grant-based program that provides emergency shelter for runaway and homeless youth ages 10 to 17, according to Staci Jonson, program director for the Arise Youth Center. Having something tangible to give these kids can make a huge difference, Jonson said. "At that juncture, it could be the hope that they need to go one more day," she said. "A fresh pair of socks can mean the world if you haven't had one in a long time. Your feet get wet and get cold and it can just really give that hope of, 'I can get through today and tomorrow is still there.'" Desirae Hanson, 17, knows how much a sliver of hope can help. The junior is going through a rough time herself as her father recently passed away and her home has been foreclosed. "I feel good about helping the students because I know what they go through because I've been homeless a couple times, too," she said. "I just want to help them and give them everything they need." Each student in the class has a different role: creating a project logo, reaching out to potential donors or marketing the project. The students are thrilled to be able to help others. "We're helping troubled teens who don't have anything have a little more hope in life," said senior Devyne Aufdengarten, 19. While more donations are needed, the project is gaining momentum and Hoeye is thrilled with the work her class is doing. "They're creating their own community," Hoeye said. "They're phenomenal and amazing and I'm so proud of them." To donate, email

CentralSurvivalCorps@gmail.com or call Hoeye at 605-430-3263. Of note from readers Nine members of Southwest Middle School's student council donated $80 worth of books, puzzles, snacks and also volunteered two hours of time to Youth & Family Services' Rapid City Head Start program. — Brianna Reiner / Youth & Family Services Two foster grandparents are working to teach the Lakota language to local children. Kay Allison and Barbara Basketfield volunteer at Rural Initiative Head Start in Lakota Homes. Allison is certified to teach Lakota and Basketfield has taken classes at Oglala Lakota College for two years and is close to earning her certification as well. "I love the kids because they are just sponges," Basketfield said in a news release. "They're just so ready to experience life." — Marianne Fridell, Foster Grandparent Program coordinator Source: http://rapidcityjournal.com/news/local/our-good-deeds-high-school-students-help-homeless-youth/article_a95d4cb9-44b4-5e96-94b3-08b29fbab7d4.html

How Prison Stints Replaced Study Hall America's problem with criminalizing kids. By JODY OWENS March 15, 2015 Lead image by Sharon Steinmann. Police officers in Meridian, Mississippi, were spending so much time hauling handcuffed students from school to the local juvenile jail that they began describing themselves as "just a taxi service." It wasn't because schools in this east Mississippi town were overrun by budding criminals or juvenile superpredators—not by a long shot. Most of the children were arrested and jailed simply for violating school rules, often for trivial offenses. One 15-year-old girl, for example, was suspended and sent to the Lauderdale County Juvenile Detention Center for a dress code violation. Her jacket was the wrong shade of blue. A boy served a suspension in the juvenile lock-up for passing gas in the classroom. Another landed behind bars because he walked to the alternative school instead of taking the bus. For many kids, a stint in "juvie" was just the beginning of a never-ending nightmare. Arrests could lead to probation. Subsequent suspensions were then considered probation violations, leading back to jail. And suspensions were a distinct possibility in a district where the NAACP found a suspension rate that was more than 10 times the national average. In 2012, the U.S. Department of Justice filed suit to stop the "taxi service" in Meridian's public schools, where 86 percent of the students are black. The DOJ suit, still unresolved, said children were being incarcerated so "arbitrarily and severely as to shock the conscience." We should all be shocked. The reality, though, is that Meridian's taxi service is just one example of what amounts to a civil rights crisis in America: a "school-to-prison pipeline" that sucks vulnerable children out of the classroom at an alarming rate and funnels them into the harsh world of police, courts and prison cells. For many children, adolescent misbehavior that once warranted a trip to the principal's office—and perhaps a stint in study hall—now results in jail time and a greater possibility of lifelong involvement with the criminal justice system. It should surprise no one that the students pushed into this pipeline are disproportionately children of color, mostly impoverished, and those with learning disabilities. The story of Meridian is more than an example of school discipline run amok. It's a key to understanding how the United States has attained the dubious distinction of imprisoning more people—and a larger share of its population—than any other country. It's one reason why the United States today has a quarter of the world's prisoners—roughly 2.2 million people—while representing just 5 percent of its total population. And it helps explain an unprecedented incarceration rate that is far and away the highest on the planet, some five to 10 times higher than other Western democracies. As the managing attorney for the Southern Poverty Law Center's Mississippi office, I've seen firsthand the devastation wrought by the school-to-prison pipeline, and the senselessness of it all. When SPLC advocates began interviewing children at the juvenile detention center in Meridian in 2009 we were investigating children being pepper-sprayed by guards when they were in their cells and posing no threat. But we kept hearing stories from students who were pushed out of school and into cells for noncriminal, minor school infractions. These stories would eventually spark the DOJ lawsuit and a thorough examination of how the "pipeline" operated in this town.  The origins of the school-to-prison pipeline can be traced to the 1990s when reports of juvenile crime began to stoke fears of "superpredators"—described in the 1996 book Body Count as "radically impulsive, brutally remorseless youngsters" with little regard for human life. The superpredator concept, based on what some critics have derided as junk science, is now known to be a complete myth. Former Princeton professor and Bush administration official John DiIulio, the Body Count co-author who coined the term, admitted to The New York Times in 2001 that his theory of sharply rising juvenile violence had been wrong. But the damage had been done. As these fears took root and mass school shootings like the one at Columbine made headlines, not only did states enact law laws to increase punishment for juvenile offenders, schools began to adopt "zero-tolerance" discipline policies that imposed automatic, pre-determined punishments for rule breakers. At the same time, states across America were adopting harsh criminal laws, including long mandatory prison sentences for certain crimes and "three strikes" laws that led to life sentences for repeat offenders. The term "zero tolerance" was, in fact, adopted from policing practices and criminal laws that focused on locking up minor offenders as a way to stem more serious crime. Somewhere along the way, as local police departments began supplying on-duty "school resource officers" to patrol hallways, educators began to confuse typical adolescent misbehavior with criminality. Schools became, more or less, a part of the criminal justice system. With police officers stalking the halls and playgrounds, teachers and principals found it easy to outsource discipline. Almost overnight, a schoolyard scuffle could now land a kid in a jail cell. The results have been disastrous. In some school districts, as in many African-American communities, police seem to view students as the enemy, or at least as potential criminals. In places like Birmingham, Alabama, their tactics grew ever more extreme. Officers in this former steel city—where black schoolchildren braved police dogs and fire hoses during the civil rights movement—routinely doused students in predominantly African-American schools with Freeze + P, an aerosol weapon that combines pepper spray and tear gas. A cell block in Lauderdale County Juvenile Detention Center in Meridian, Mississippi. | Photo by Marianne Todd LaTonya Stearnes vividly remembers when the chemical weapon was used on two of her daughters, one of whom is named as a plaintiff in an ongoing class action suit filed by the SPLC. The incident began after a boy pushed one of her daughters. When the girl defended herself, a police officer grabbed her from behind and sprayed her in the face. Her sister also was caught in the stinging mist. "I will never forget my daughter's red and swollen face," Stearnes said. "I sent my girls to school thinking they would be safe and protected. I never thought they would be pepper-sprayed. These are teenage girls, not criminals." But they were treated like criminals, as were many others. The SPLC found that from 2006 to 2011, chemical weapons were used on about 300 students in the Birmingham Public Schools district, which is 95 percent African American. When you take into account the bystanders inadvertently caught in a cloud of pepper spray, the number swelled to more than 1,000.  In Lauderdale County, Mississippi, children caught in the pipeline faced long odds in court. They had little time to spend with their public defender before appearing for a detention hearing—just minutes, according to the DOJ lawsuit. The public defender did not even provide a way for a child or parent to contact him or her. Instead, meetings regularly took place in the courthouse hallway before a hearing. It's little wonder that the DOJ's lawsuit charges that the public defender did not "meaningfully advise children of the possible consequences of admitting to charges or of proceeding to trial." But Lauderdale County is just one example of the confusing legal maze children and their families are sometimes forced to navigate with little help. The stakes are especially high when a state such as Florida puts the decision of trying a child as an adult largely in the hands of a prosecutor rather than a judge. This prosecutorial discretion may explain why Florida sends more children to adult court than any other state in the nation—more than 10,000 in the last five years alone. A staggering 98 percent of those children were transferred to adult court without a hearing before a judge. For these children, just the threat of adult prosecution—and prison—can often elicit a guilty plea. Florida even allows counties to incarcerate children charged as juveniles in adult jails, such as the Polk County Jail, which includes dorms designated for children. The vast majority of the children at the jail in this largely rural, central Florida county are there for nonviolent offenses. Most are simply awaiting court dates, because children charged in the juvenile system are not eligible for bail. Jail guards lacked the basic training needed to supervise children. There was little in the way of education and rehabilitative services. Children who acted up were sometimes placed in kennel-like cages and taunted by guards. They were pepper-sprayed and held in prolonged isolation. An SPLC lawsuit over these conditions was tried in federal court in late 2013 and is awaiting the judge's decision. It seems obvious that such cruel conditions do little or nothing to help troubled children become better citizens. When Lisa Jobe's son, K.J., ended up at the Polk County Jail, she could see that the 15-year-old had changed. "He was always looking over his shoulder," she said. "You never know when you're going to be the person that's going to be jumped next." When K.J. was assaulted in jail, no one bothered to call his parents. His mother learned about it when she saw his black eye. "It broke his spirit," Jobe said. "He was just a different child. He felt there was no hope." She wonders about the other children at the jail. "These are children who've made mistakes, but we shouldn't give up on them," she said. "And, that's what it seems like has happened at the Polk County Jail. They've given up on the children and they're just locking them up." In neighboring Alabama, the state allows children as young as 16 to automatically be charged as an adult for certain offenses. But juvenile court judges can transfer a child as young as 14 to adult court for any offense. When Patrick (not his real name) found himself in an Alabama prison at age 16, he quickly realized that he had better be ready to fight at any moment. He witnessed more than 30 stabbings in a little more than a year. He learned that if he didn't want to be stabbed, it was best to simply hand over his property if another prisoner demanded it. Refusing a sexual overture could also result in violence. They were tough lessons for someone barely old enough to drive. These stories may explain why the practice of housing young people in adult lock-ups is opposed or condemned by a long list of professional organizations, including the Council of Juvenile Correctional Administrators, the American Correctional Association, the American Jail Association, the Association of State Correctional Administrators and the National Association of Counties. Jailing children has also been profitable for some in the age of prison privatization. That was the case in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, where two judges were sentenced to prison in 2011 for their roles in a $2.6 million bribery scheme that sent juveniles into private, for-profit juvenile detention centers. It's believed that more than 2,500 children were affected by the scandal. One teenage girl was sent to a youth camp for delinquent girls in 2007—a stiff punishment for creating a MySpace page that poked fun at her vice principal. “Everything in my adult life blooms from the moment he boomed, ‘Adjudicated delinquent!’ and had me ushered out of the courtroom so that I could be cuffed to the sound of my mother’s desperate wailing,” Hillary Transue wrote seven years later on Vitamin W, a women’s website. “No child should have to hear her parent, her hero, the center of her universe, crumble to pieces—or the bailiff validating her guilt and shame as the cuffs are locked into place.”  Thousands of juvenile convictions have since been overturned in the wake of the Pennsylvania scandal. But many youth across the country remain needlessly entangled in the justice system. One young man in Mississippi actually became lost within the system after being sentenced to a private, for-profit prison. When Michael McIntosh attempted to visit his son, Mike, at the Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility, which housed youths convicted as adults, he was turned away by guards. They told him his son was no longer at the prison. But no one knew where Mike could be found. McIntosh launched a desperate search that, weeks later, led him to a hospital in Greenwood, hours away from Walnut Grove. That’s where he found Mike. He couldn’t speak, see or even sit up. “He’s got this baseball-size knot on the back of his head,” McIntosh recounted to the SPLC. “He’s got cuts all over him, bruises. He has stab wounds. The teeth in the front are broken. He’s scared out of his mind. He doesn’t have a clue where he’s at—or why.” McIntosh still could get no answers from the prison system about what happened to his son. Finally, he received a call from an SPLC advocate investigating the facility. “She said, ‘Your son was in a riot,’” McIntosh said. “They [the SPLC] just took bits [of information] and started putting this puzzle together.” The picture that came together was highly disturbing. Mike had suffered brain damage when the violence erupted in February 2010, only about four months after he entered Walnut Grove at age 19. His injuries left him with the cognitive abilities of a 2-year-old. Several other youths were stabbed during the incident. Mike’s cellmate was stabbed in the head. A dozen other people were hospitalized. Perhaps the most galling detail was that a guard had allowed prisoners into a cell to fight, according to a DOJ investigation. The guard was fired, but her actions were not unusual at this facility operated by a for-profit company. Guards frequently incited violence between the young charges in their care. Violence was a way of life. Drugs and weapons could be obtained throughout the prison. Sometimes guards committed the violence themselves. Some even had gang affiliations. Sexual abuse of prisoners—including brutal youth-on-youth rapes and “brazen” sexual misconduct by prison staffers who coerced youths—was “among the worst that we have seen in any facility anywhere in the nation,” DOJ investigators wrote. A federal judge later wrote that the company operating the prison “has allowed a cesspool of unconstitutional and inhuman acts and conditions to germinate.” It was no place for a young person—much less a place to rehabilitate someone. An SPLC lawsuit over these conditions led to an agreement that ended the housing of children and teens at Walnut Grove. And yet the conditions at Walnut Grove, while extreme, are fairly common. We see similar conditions in many lock-ups where children are incarcerated.  The Lauderdale County Juvenile Detention Center—a destination for far too many Meridian students between about 2006 and 2012—also wasn’t immune to abusive conditions. Staffers frequently tormented children by shooting pepper spray into their faces. A child needed only to talk too much or not sit in the back of his cell to find his or her skin and eyes suddenly burning from the chemical. But even the best behavior could not guarantee a child would be spared. When a boy threw a tissue out of his cell in November 2009, a guard couldn’t determine the culprit. An SPLC lawsuit describes how the guard handled the situation: All of the boys at the detention center were sprayed with the chemical. Other abuses were also common. Children were confined to small cells for up to 23 hours a day. They slept on mats that smelled of urine as they tried to stay warm under torn, stained sheets. Meals were frequently eaten in their cells, often near a filthy toilet. The detention center did not even provide these youths with underwear—a decision that meant they had to wear the same underwear throughout their confinement. A settlement agreement was reached in the SPLC lawsuit over these abusive conditions, but the facility was ultimately shuttered because it simply could not comply with the agreement. The “taxi service” to the detention center was put out of business.  Contrary to tough talk about scaring bad students straight, criminalizing kids does not make our communities safer. A growing body of research suggests, in fact, that the current approach to juvenile justice does exactly the opposite. Studies show that the brain does not fully develop until a person reaches his or her mid-20s. In fact, the part of the brain that governs rational decision-making is the last to develop. This means a child may engage in dangerous behavior without fully realizing the risks and consequences for themselves and others. But that child also has a unique propensity for rehabilitation as well. In other words, we shouldn’t give up on kids who get into trouble. But that’s what we’re doing. The research shows that an arrest doubles the odds that a student will drop out. The odds quadruple with a first-time court appearance, according to Justice Quarterly. And dropping out, in turn, increases the likelihood of prison. In fact, African-American men under 35 who failed to finish high school are now more likely to be incarcerated than working. Criminalizing students comes at a steep cost to taxpayers. Confining a single young person can cost as much as $148,767 a year, according to a recent survey of 46 states by the Justice Policy Institute. This costly “pipeline” disproportionately harms children of color and causes immeasurable harm to their communities, where many of them live in poverty. Black students are suspended and expelled at three times the rate of white students, according to the U.S. Department of Education’s Office for Civil Rights. Even at the preschool level, there’s a gaping racial disparity: The department found that black preschool students – a group that represents only 18 percent of preschool enrollment – make up 48 percent of preschool children suspended more than once. When there is such a disparity in discipline at 4 and 5 years old, it shouldn’t be a surprise that African Americans are incarcerated at about six times the rate of non-Hispanic whites, according to the National Academy of Sciences. Or that they are three to five times more likely to be arrested for drug offenses than whites, despite using drugs at roughly the same rates.  The court victories against harsh school discipline and brutal detention conditions are vitally important to reforming this system. But the school-to-prison pipeline has not yet been destroyed. It is still harming young lives; I see it firsthand through my work. I see it operating in school districts across the country, in juvenile courts and detention centers, and in the adult prisons that greet a new generation of young prisoners every year. We need a new way. One that does not treat ordinary children like criminals, that does not equate bad behavior with criminality. One that does not target African-American children for incarceration at an early age. One that does not place children in brutal, filthy jails and prisons where their needs are neglected and they are subjected to pervasive violence, sexual abuse and psychological torture. One that does not erode trust in law enforcement among communities of color. One that believes in the ability of children to change and invests in their futures. One that provides hope, not despair. The simple fact is that most children who act up in school or even commit minor crimes will grow out of their bad behavior—if we let them. This is not to say that children should not be held accountable or punished for committing crimes, particularly violent crimes. But most of the children now being pushed out of school and into detention need a helping hand, not a pair of handcuffs. We must spend less on prisons and more on education, counseling, therapy and other rehabilitative services. Such an investment will save taxpayer money, enhance opportunities for many communities mired in poverty and, importantly, lead to less crime in the future. While it is encouraging that people across this nation are finally asking why we imprison so many people, we will miss the bigger picture by only looking at adult prisons. We must look at the schools and the entire justice system if we hope to truly address the mass incarceration crisis. The path to prison starts at an early age. And as long as we continue to needlessly criminalize children in the name of school discipline, our prisons will only continue to overflow. Jody Owens is the managing attorney for the Southern Poverty Law Center’s Mississippi office. Read more:

<http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/03/criminal-kids-juvenile-justice-sentencing-reform-incarceration-116065.html#ixzz3V3yebDT2> Source: http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/03/criminal-kids-juvenile-justice-sentencing-reform-incarceration-116065_full.html?print=VQ30xukiG1s

Attorney general launches children’s justice unit By Dana Littlefield 5:24 p.m. March 14, 2015 Saying she wants to “double down” on issues related to children, California Attorney General Kamala Harris has launched a special unit within her office dedicated to protecting the rights of the state’s most vulnerable residents. The Bureau of Children’s Justice, which kicked off last month, will focus the efforts of state prosecutors and civil rights lawyers on a number of issues impacting minors, including juvenile justice, foster care, education, truancy and human trafficking. Among the bureau’s goals, Harris has said, is to work with local, state and national authorities to make sure laws and regulations are enforced consistently, and to identify any policy changes that may be necessary. She said one of the bureau’s first tasks will be to look for enforcement gaps in the foster care system to “ensure that government agencies are held accountable to those entrusted in their care.” And while state officials have not outlined exactly what fixes they’re looking to make or specified any failures on the part of local jurisdictions, they say the available data indicate plenty of room for improvement. For example, they note two studies published in 2013 showing that 42 percent of students in the foster care system do not graduate from high school, compared to 12 percent of all California students, and that half of all children sold into the sex-trafficking trade in the state are foster youth. “(Children) have a lot of rights, a lot of legal protections in California,” said Special Assistant Attorney General Jill Habig, who was involved with creating the new bureau. “And yet we’re seeing the outcomes that we are seeing. “There are probably some gaps that we need to fill.” Habig said the bureau is an extension of a “smart-on-crime” approach Harris advocated during her two terms as

San Francisco's district attorney. The idea is to address problems that put children at greater risk of committing crime or being targeted as victims, such as a lack of educational resources or an unstable home environment. The Attorney General's Office is also partnering with the nonprofit Center for Youth Wellness, to raise awareness about how childhood trauma — such as being exposed to violence in the home, abuse or neglect — can adversely affect a person's health and development. Cecilia Chen, a policy analyst at the San Francisco-based center, said looking at how children are affected by traumatic experiences and what stress does to the brain and body has implications for public health and public safety. "There's so much work (to do) to address the school-to-prison pipeline," Chen said. "(Childhood trauma) has implications across multiple sectors across the state. It's not something that's limited to lower-income communities of color." Last month, the Attorney General's Office sent a letter to officials in all 58 counties, stressing a need for them to meet legal obligations pertaining to foster youth, and urging them to evaluate current practices and policies. "As the bureau begins its work, I welcome your ideas, feedback and suggestions for ways we can work together on this endeavor," Harris wrote in the letter. Leaders of several agencies and organizations in San Diego County said they were pleased to learn that the state was making children's issues a priority, and they noted that local government and nonprofit organizations here have been collaborating on those efforts for years. "I'm going to take that as an offer of support," San Diego County Probation Chief Mack Jenkins said of Harris' letter. His department supervises more than 2,700 juvenile offenders, fewer than 500 of whom are in custody. Jenkins said he looks forward to discussing the county's programs and policies with state authorities. He noted two programs that seek to identify young people in the welfare system who may cross into the justice system, and then match them with counseling and other services. All San Diego County probation officers now receive training on the effects of early exposure to trauma and violence, he said. "My question is how do we take what (Harris) has launched and turn it into some tangible benefits for kids?" Jenkins said. Early this year, authorities in San Diego announced a new task force that will work to identify and rescue victims of human trafficking, as well as prosecute the traffickers. The task force has investigators from 15 local, state and federal agencies, including the county District Attorney's Office and Sheriff's and Probation departments, and city police departments in Coronado, Escondido, La Mesa, Oceanside and San Diego. The Attorney General's Office is also involved. Steven Jella, associate executive director of San Diego Youth Services, called it an "exciting" prospect that the state would be focusing on the needs of foster youth, including those who become homeless or get lured into the sex trade. "Sometimes one youth falls in all three categories," Jella said. "Any one of those focus areas could absolutely benefit from more conversation and more resources." Angela Bartosik, chief deputy alternate public defender, also welcomed the state's perspective on helping victims of human trafficking. She said her office sees many women and girls accused of being prostitutes. And she, too, pointed to the successes of local programs that target vulnerable youth, such as the annual Passport to Life Career and Education Expo, which provides information to probationers about going back to school or getting a job. "I think our county is doing a lot," Bartosik said. "I'm proud of it. But more ideas and more resources are never a bad thing." Harris, a Democrat, announced in January that she would enter the race to replace Barbara Boxer, who is retiring from the U.S. Senate. Source: <http://www.utsandiego.com/news/2015/mar/14/attorney-general-launches-childrens-justice-unit/>

The Drugging of Children in Foster Care By Philip Hickey, PhD Featured Blogs March 16, 2015 Facebook Twitter LinkedIn Email Print 33 Comments
6.39k Views It's no secret that here in America, foster children are being prescribed psychiatric drugs, especially neuroleptics, as a means of controlling their behavior. A great deal has been said and written on the matter. Politicians have declared the practice deplorable. Children's advocacy groups have expressed concern, and, of course, those of us in the antipsychiatry movement have screamed till we're hoarse. But the problem persists. For the past six months or so, the San Jose Mercury News, a California newspaper, has been running frequent articles on this topic, calling for oversight and corrective action. On February 24, 2015, Karen de Sá, a reporter with that newspaper, published an article titled Senate panel examines why California foster care system 'addicted' to psychiatric drugs. It's an excellent article, which highlights various aspects of the problem, and provides updated information on this matter. Here are some quotes: "California's foster care system 'has grown more addicted to mind-altering medication,' the chair of a powerful Senate committee told a packed public hearing in the state Capitol on Tuesday, adding that 'here in California, we've done little to act on this alarming issue.'" "Lightbourne said two state-sponsored panels have spent years working to develop guidelines that would protect foster children from the excessive use of psych medications and to house fewer kids at residential group homes, where drugs are most frequently prescribed. Foster children deserve 'nonmedical treatments whenever possible,' Lightbourne said." "'We need to shift our thinking away from the primacy of psychiatric medications toward relationships,' testified George Stewart, a Berkeley child psychiatrist who has spent much of his career tapering severely traumatized children safely off high-risk drug cocktails. 'We are going to look back on this era of great enthusiasm for psychiatric medications and either scratch our heads or beat our heads. We will look back in 20 years and say, 'What were we doing?'" "Senators also said they were alarmed by the newspaper's analysis that showed how pharmaceutical companies lavish the state's foster care prescribers with millions of dollars for meals, gifts, travel, speaking engagements and research grants -- a practice Lightbourne called 'deeply troubling.' The newspaper found the doctors who prescribed the most, typically were rewarded the most." All of which tells a familiar story. Pharma-psychiatry systematically targets foster children as potential customers. They do this because the residents of foster homes, group and individual, are a "captive audience," in the sense that the foster parent or staff member will ensure that the resident takes the pills. In this way, non-compliance -- the great drain on pharma revenue -- becomes a non-issue. Karen de Sá's article is cogent, articulate, and powerful, and undoubtedly she and her colleagues are raising awareness on this matter. But there was one paragraph in her article that I felt warranted some additional discussion. "Tuesday's four-hour hearing before the Human Services Committee highlighted a package of bills being introduced this month, following this newspaper's investigation 'Drugging Our Kids,' which revealed nearly one in four foster care teens take psychiatric drugs -- often to control behavior, not to treat mental illnesses. Most are prescribed antipsychotics, a powerful class of psychiatric drugs with the most harmful side effects." Note the phrase "...often to control behavior, not to treat mental illnesses." What the author is missing here is that, within psychiatry's spurious domain, misbehavior is a mental illness. In fact, it is several mental illnesses. If a child is frequently defiant, he has a mental illness called oppositional defiant disorder. If he is given to outbursts of anger, he has a mental illness called intermittent explosive disorder. If he is given to violating rules or infringing on the rights of others, he has a mental illness called conduct disorder. If he is given to setting fires, he has a mental illness called pyromania. If he is persistently angry and given to very frequent temper tantrums, he has a mental illness called disruptive mood dysregulation disorder. And, of course, if he is disruptive and inattentive in the classroom, he has attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. If the child's misbehavior can't be shoe-horned neatly into any of these categories, psychiatry has two residual categories: other specified disruptive, impulse-control, and conduct disorder; and unspecified disruptive impulse-control and conduct disorder. Contrary to popular opinion, no neurological pathology is required to establish these "diagnoses." So, by neatly re-labeling every conceivable kind of misbehavior as a mental illness, psychiatry has established turf in this field, and has legitimized the use of drugs to "treat" this misbehavior. This is the crux of the entire debate. There is literally no significant problem of thinking, feeling, and/or behaving that is not listed, either directly, or by implication, in the DSM. So, Karen de Sá is incorrect. In the looking-glass world of psychiatry, practitioners are not prescribing major tranquilizers to control children's behavior. Rather, they are "treating mental illnesses," with medications that have been proven by highly questionable pharma research to be "effective and safe." We have actually reached the position in our society where a physician who does not follow these practices could be held liable for failure to treat. And this is the problem. Every attempt to eliminate, or even reduce, this widespread and persistent practice, is doomed to failure as long as psychiatry's spurious diagnoses are accepted as bona fide illnesses. Because if childhood misbehavior is an illness, then psychiatrists and other physicians are not using drugs to control behavior, rather they are "treating," compassionately and effectively, these "disabling illnesses." Psychiatry, over the past five decades, has systematically and deceptively pursued a self-serving policy of medicalizing virtually every significant problem of thinking, feeling, and/or behaving. Their pharma allies have provided the money, and psychiatry has provided the credentials, in what is arguably the most widespread and destructive swindle in human history. And they have been enormously successful. Their spurious notions are widely accepted today as reality. No significant progress will be possible in these areas until the swindle is finally and utterly exposed, and sanity is restored to our conceptualizations of human activity. Until then, despite the protests of politicians, advocates, journalists, and others, the pharma-psychiatry maw will remain wide open, and the ranks of "the mentally ill" who need "treatment" will continue to grow. Source: <http://www.madinamerica.com/2015/03/drugging-children-foster-care/>

Former Foster Child Says Abuse Is Pervasive Updated: Thursday, March 19 2015, 08:26 AM CDT Scary words are coming from a former foster child about abuse he says is the norm in group home foster care. Kristopher Sharp he and others are working to change Texas law that would help other foster children get the help he says he was denied. "There's always some type of abuse whether it's physical or sexual it's very pervasive," he asserted. The allegations are strong but Sharp says it was his reality after living much of his youth in group foster care homes where he states abuse is prevalent. "One of my caregivers molested me, repeatedly. He was a predator and he did this with a lot of other young people who were in that home," Sharp said. He and other child advocates like Dr. Katherine Barillas says there is an office set up for children to report abuse problems but "they don't know about the office or they're afraid to utilize it because it's part of the agency that unknowingly and unwittingly put them in a situation in which they were abused." The proof is in the numbers in the last three years only seven children used that system to report abuse. Barillas compares that to a recent study. She said, "45 youth responded to the survey and said they didn't know who the ombudsmen office was and they were abused in foster care." House bill 1371 in part, will make that ombudsmen independent of DFPS and give the office more power to protect children this former foster asserts are often victimized. "It should be shocking to the public, it should be shocking to lawmakers and it should be shocking to policymakers because we're removing young people from their homes and we're saying we can do a better job than your family, than your family, and oftentimes that's not the case," Sharp says. Dr. Barillas says this proposal is not about any perceived DFPS shortcomings, or the agency's director. She says it's about making a permanent change to this ombudsmen office that will protect children now and in the future. By Melanie Lofton Follow us on Twitter @keyvetv and LIKE us on Facebook for updates! Source: <http://www.keyvetv.com/news/features/top-stories/stories/former-foster-child-says-abuse-pervasive-24813.shtml>

Foster care for vulnerable kids to replace residential care units in $43 million plan Foster care for vulnerable kids to replace residential care units in $43 million plan Date March 16, 2015 (29) Richard Willingham State Political Correspondent for The Age Struggling: Foster carers Keeryn and Stephen Longmuir are delighted at news of a funding injection from the state government. Photo: Jason South Vulnerable children living in residential care units will be moved into foster care under a $43 million plan from the Andrews government. The sector is struggling with a shortage of foster carers and hopes the new investment will allow existing carers to expand their work as well as encourage others to become involved. There is a major shortage of home-based care in Victoria which has seen hundreds of children placed in residential care units. At June 30 last year, more than 500 children were staying in these units. There have been reports of serious physical and sexual abuse and exploitation in residential care units. The state's commissioner for Children and Young People, Bernie Geary, is investigating sexual exploitation and abuse in residential care units. His report is due in the next few weeks. Advertisement Families Minister Jenny Mikakos on Monday announced the package saying the Napthine government had made a series of announcements for the sector, but had not spent the money. Last year, the Napthine government announced a $183 million plan to get some children out of residential care as well as boost therapeutic placements within the system. A new electronic reporting system to reduce sexual exploitation in the system was also flagged. Under the Labor government policy, targeted care packages will be available tailored to each child's needs. Features of the fund include giving extra money to carers to lease bigger cars or houses if they are looking after a sibling group who have been placed in residential care. In some cases, it will allow foster carers to get help while they work, or specialist education services if their child needs extra help. Getting children under 12 out of residential care units is the priority and there also will be a focus on the over-representation of aboriginal children in out-of-home care. Ms Mikakos said more than 100 children had already been identified to be moved out. The money will be spent over the next four years, beginning this April. Mr Geary said putting vulnerable children together in residential care units did not work. "This is positive first step, as the actual notion of residential care is a flawed one, the state needs to continue to do better," Mr Geary said. One of the major issues facing the sector is the dwindling numbers of foster carers due, in part, to the inadequate level of subsidy they receive for their work. Victorian foster carers are among the worst financially supported in the country. "We want a lot more people to step up and be foster carers, we have had an exodus of foster carers in recent years," Ms Mikakos said. Kerry Longmuir has been a carer for over 30 years and has looked after over 380 children. She said the new money would help, especially with increasing demand for services. "It's a shame so many carers are leaving," Ms Longmuir said. "There's a lot more kids coming in and lot more damaged kids coming in." The sector has been broadly supportive of the plan. Centre of Excellence in Child and Family Welfare chief executive Deb Tsorbaris said on an average day there were 7700 children unable to live with their parents, because of abuse or neglect, and were living in alternative accommodation. "A shortage of carers, a significant number of carers leaving the system and a limited range of care options has been a major concern for some time," she said. Ms Tsorbaris says the new scheme will provide some flexibility and, hopefully, encourage more people to be carers. Opposition spokeswoman Georgie Crozier said Labor had been caught out taking credit for something it had not funded. Source: <http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/foster-care-for-vulnerable-kids-to-replace-residential-care-units-in-43-million-plan-20150316-1m0fhi.html>

Child killed while in foster care Story by Adam Snider, KFOR OKLAHOMA (CNN)-- A two-year-old is dead and his foster mom is being charged with first degree murder. The child's birth mother said she lost her kids in October, but she is convinced if DHS hadn't stepped in her son would still be alive. Bryson and his six-month-old sibling had been in the care of Heather and Tyler Adams. They were moved by DHS because health officials allegedly found evidence of child abuse. According to court records, a non-responsive Bryson was found by Tyler in their home. Heather later told investigators that she hit the child with her fist. Tallgrass Family Services is the group that trained Heather to be a foster mom. Tallgrass sent a statement that said in part: "Everyone is deeply shocked and heartbroken. We are working closely with law enforcement and the Department of Human Services to fully cooperate with the investigation." Bryson's infant sibling was removed from the home and remains in DHS custody. Adam's remains in jail on $150,000 bond. Source: http://www.cbs12.com/news/top-stories/stories/vid_24440.shtml

Parents of troubled teen who hung himself sue mental-health center By CARLI TEPROFF Miami Herald March 21, 2015 2015-03-21T13:50:59Z By CARLI TEPROFF Facebook Twitter Follow Google Plus More Linkedin Reddit YouTube E-mail Print Order a reprint of this story The father of a 15-year-old boy dropped off his son at a Miami-Dade County mental-health facility, thinking he would get the help he needed to deal with his emotional demons. The demons won out. Less than one full day after checking in, the boy was found hanging by a strap from a ceiling pipe. He died the day after that. Wednesday, the teen's parents sued the operator of the center, which had admitted their child under suicide watch, according to the lawsuit. Ira Leesfield, who represents the parents of the Florida Keys teen, identified by his initials L.V., said Wednesday that someone at the facility "dropped the ball" by not keeping track of the boy. "When you entrust someone to take care of your child, you expect that that is going to happen," Leesfield said. "He was there one day." The lawsuit, filed Wednesday in Miami-Dade Circuit Court, seeks damages in excess of $15,000 against Concept Health Systems, which runs Concept House at 162 NE 49th St. in Miami. The teen was dropped off for a five-month program by his father on Feb. 7 for treatment of substance abuse and mental illness, according to the lawsuit. On Feb. 8, he was found hanging. Several calls to Concept House and to Chief Executive Officer Ed McGowan's cell phone were not returned. Concept House is licensed by the Department of Children and Families and has been operating for more than 30 years in Miami-Dade County, according to the facility's website. It offers substance abuse and mental health services for adults and teens. Leesfield said the teen's parents, identified in the lawsuit as J.G.V. and J.L.V., took the boy to Concept House after a recommendation from DCF. "At 14, [L.V.] hit an emotional wall," said Leesfield, adding the teen was depressed. "He had a lot of problems and just needed help." The boy had tried to kill himself several times before. "They were aware of his history," Leesfield said of the facility. "He should've never been left alone." On DCF's new website that details child deaths, the incident is listed. "15-year-old was pronounced dead two days after he was found hanging in his room at a substance abuse treatment facility. At the time of the incident, there was an open investigation involving the teen, who started a fire when his father refused to allow him to return to the mother's home." A DCF spokeswoman said the department is investigating the death. It was not known Wednesday night whether Concept House had any similar problems before. Leesfield said in the lawsuit that the facility "was negligent and breached its duties of care" by "failing to adequately monitor L.V.," among other concerns. "This was a needless tragedy to our son and an incomprehensible loss to our family," L.V.'s parents said in an e-mail. "A total lack of responsibility leaves us with heavy hearts." Source: http://www.keysnet.com/2015/03/21/501867_parents-of-troubled-teen-who-hung.html?rh=1

Special Report by Medical Whistleblower: Voiceless Victims: Wards of the Court (March, 2015)

Special Report by Medical Whistleblower: Accountability and Human Rights Violations Report Card Submitted to United Nations (March, 2015)

Lawmakers Aim To Regulate Abusive Youth Camps Dominic Holden BuzzFeed News Reporter Tweet Bookmark it Tweet View this image David Wernsman / BuzzFeed News "I was woken up before dawn by two large men who put a belt around my waist, and they told me this is about trust." That's the first thing David Wernsman remembers from May 30, 2006. "If you try to run, we will handcuff you, and take you where we are going," he recalled the men saying in his Colorado home. "My parents were standing there, crying, telling me, 'We love you, but you have to go with these men.'" "I was 17, and sent away because I was gay," Wernsman told BuzzFeed News. Websites that promote extreme programs for troubled teenagers tend to have common selling points: tough love — amid beautiful, natural settings — with incredible results. In promotional materials, young men and women trek through wilderness, earnest

camp counselors are beaming, and program directors describe how enrollees can undergo a metamorphosis from truculent misfit to affable wunderkind. To be sure, some programs hire qualified staff to deliver professional therapy for genuinely troubled kids with severe addiction or criminal behavior. But for many teens in positions like Wernsman — who described being forced into manual labor and receiving “beatings with a belt” during his seven-month stay with the program — privately run treatment facilities can be bastions for abuse, where there is little government regulation and youth are largely incommunicado from the parents who enrolled them. This is why California lawmakers announced Friday they are introducing bills in the state legislature and United States Congress that would regulate the therapy camps, some of which have spawned documentaries and government reports that excoriate their practices. View this image > California State Sen. Ricardo Lara introduced a bill Friday to regulate the industry. AP / Reed Saxon In California, State Senator Ricardo Lara on Friday announced he filed SB 524, the Protecting Youth from Institutional Abuse act. The measure calls for teen programs to be subject to the more stringent licensing standards currently applied to group homes “to ensure essential health and safety standards are met for youth living in these institutions.” Currently in California, “residential boarding schools are exempt from state licensing and do not have any oversight beyond filing a one-page affidavit with the Department of Education,” a preliminary legislative fact sheet from Lara’s office says. At these programs in the state, “69 reported cases of abuse were committed by 56 unique perpetrators, 15 cases of physical abuse, 45 cases of neglect or deprivation of necessities, 2 cases of sexual abuse, and 6 cases of psychological and emotional maltreatment.” By mandating more government oversight at the private facilities — which include so-called boot camps and wilderness camps — the law “will protect youth from abuse and neglect in institutions,” the fact sheet said. Sen. Lara told BuzzFeed News he thinks “there is political will this session to pass SB524,” “Over the past few years,” he explained, “we’ve heard from a growing number of survivors about the horrific treatment they’ve received in alternative youth treatment centers. This bill is about standing up against abuse and injustice and standing up for youth who can’t stand up for themselves.” U.S. Rep. Adam Schiff, meanwhile, is planning to introduce a federal bill along similar lines. His bill will be similar to a federal bill that has died in the past that called for establishing standards for the facilities, mandating reviews, and imposing penalties on companies that violate those rules. “I am working with my colleagues to introduce legislation that will hold all residential treatment programs accountable for instances of child abuse,” Schiff said in a statement. “The measure will also increase the transparency of these programs so that parents can make informed and safer choices for their children.” One of the proponents is Rebecca Lopez, 18, who said these sorts of laws could improve facilities like the one she was taken to. “My mom wasn’t okay with me being gay,” Lopez said by phone from Los Angeles. “She will say it’s about me being sent away for school, but she wanted me separated from my girlfriend.” Two men arrived in Lopez’s bedroom posing as police officers during the night when she was 15, she said, and the pair drove her several hours north to a Christian camp for troubled teens where she was kept for six months. “How do I say this without getting choked up?” she said, remembering her worst experience. Another girl had forced herself into Lopez’s bed one night, she said. “She masturbated on my bed. She was trying to touch me. I kicked her so she wouldn’t touch me.” If Lopez had complained, she believes staff would have confined her with her perpetrator as a form of discipline. Punishments also involved requiring kids to remain silent for days and restricted to a diet of only peanut butter and bread. “During 2005 alone, 33 states reported 1,619 staff members involved in incidents of abuse in residential programs,” the Government Accountability Officer reported. Malnourishment and flawed operations are among the conclusions from the most comprehensive examination of certain programs for troubled youth, conducted by the Government Accountability Office. The GAO’s 2007 report “found thousands of allegations of abuse, some of which involved death, at residential treatment programs across the country and in American-owned and American-operated facilities abroad between the years 1990 and 2007.” Truly comprehensive data simply don’t exist, the government said. But the researchers drilled down on one year in particular: “During 2005 alone, 33 states reported 1,619 staff members involved in incidents of abuse in residential programs.” Three teens died between 1990 and 2002, the report found, adding that some facilities had undertrained staff, under-nourished the kids, and maintained reckless or negligent operating practices. Wernsman, who was taken to a facility in the Dominican Republic that was run by a company in the United States, recalled how kids were treated in his program: As a punishment, “Some kids were put in solitary confinement, in an eight-foot by eight-foot windowless cell, given just toilet paper and a bucket to defecate in. They were put in there for two weeks and fed through a slot at the bottom of the door. During the day, they were forced to be outside and pointlessly dig a hole.” Both Wernsman and Lopez said all their communications to parents — allowed less than once a month — were monitored to make sure they didn’t report wanting to leave or disparaging the conditions. The Los Angeles LGBT Center, which has launched a Protect Youth from Institutional Abuse campaign, is among the nongovernment backers to rein in “programs that claim to help ‘troubled’ kids and to ‘cure’ LGBT youth.” “It definitely didn’t improve my life,” said Wernsman. “Parents get in touch with places like this and they rope you in. They prey on families who are in weak moments, who believe their child has some issue they are no longer able to help. They convince them ... they need to send their kid away. My parents thought what they were doing was right, and from the outside, the school looks like it helps kids, but it is far from that.” Lopez said she was branded at the facility as gay and banned from touching other kids, even casually on the arm. She said, “I still flinch when someone touches with me or when people interact with me.” Several reports say the program Wernsman attended shut down in 2011. The academy Lopez attended did not respond to BuzzFeed News with questions about her criticisms before this article was published. Source: <http://www.buzzfeed.com/dominicholden/lawmakers-aim-to-regulate-abusive-youth-camps#.suwPw5XJe>

Willingboro man charged with sexually assaulting 2 girls at group home Posted: Tuesday, March 24, 2015 9:30 am | Updated: 9:38 am, Wed Mar 25, 2015. Willingboro man charged with sexually assaulting 2 girls at group home By David Levinsky Staff writer Burlington County Times CAMDEN — A Willingboro man was charged with sex crimes against two teenage girls at a group home in Waterford, Camden County, where he worked, authorities said Tuesday. Larry D. Holliday, 48, was charged March 13 with one count of aggravated sexual assault, four counts of aggravated criminal sexual contact, and two counts of endangering the welfare of a child, the Camden County Prosecutor’s Office said. Source: http://www.burlingtoncountytimes.com/news/local/willingboro-man-charged-with-sexually-assaulting-girls-at-group-home/article_251b5b1c-672a-546c-bf5e-34fad67016d8.html

News Schiff to Introduce Bill to Reform ‘Troubled Teen’ Programs (Breaking) Finally, relief is on the way for teens who’ve been abused and traumatized. Now to get bi-partisan support. April 10, 2015 - by Karen Ocamb 3 Rep. Adam Schiff (D-CA) will introduce legislation next month to reform residential treatment programs nationwide, his office announced Friday. Last March, Schiff joined out State Sen. Ricardo Lara, the LA LGBT Center and Survivors of Institutional Abuse in a national campaign to reform the billion-dollar “troubled teen” industry, as the residential treatment programs are known among survivors. “We cannot ignore reports that far too many young people have died and suffered abuse at the hands of those who run and work at residential treatment programs under the guise of providing critical therapy and rehabilitation services,” Schiff said March 27. Schiff promised to introduce legislation to hold all residential treatment programs accountable for instances of child abuse and increase transparency so parents know if the treatment programs are safe. The residential programs are often the “last resort” for parents seeking to help their children with severe behavioral problems or rehabilitation from trauma or alcohol and drug addiction. However, as Survivors of Institutional Abuse notes, the programs are also used to try to change the sexual orientation or gender identity of youth. The introduction of Schiff’s bill is timely with the announcement by President Obama that he supports ending programs known as “reparative” therapy. Additionally, Schiff’s California colleague, Rep. Ted Lieu, announced Thursday that he will introduce a bill “soon” to cut federal funding to healthcare professionals that practice what is commonly now considered “junk science.” Schiff notes his legislation, to be introduced in May, is patterned on legislation introduced in 2007 by former Rep. George Miller (D-CA)—the Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act—which passed in the House twice but then hit a dead end. However, a 2008 GAO report Miller ordered while holding Congressional hearings into the “troubled teen” industry documented widespread reports of use of physical restraints, severe methods of intimidation, starvation, neglectful medical practices, physical abuse, and death, with LGBT youth at particular risk of abuse. The GAO found that 34 states had over 1,500 staff members involved in incidents of child abuse in 2005. But, Schiff’s press release noted, “these programs continue to operate with little or no accountability because of a loose patchwork of state licensing and monitoring requirements and little federal oversight, despite the fact that some programs receive federal funding. State regulations that do exist have not done enough to prevent abusive ‘boot camps’ from shutting down in one state and re-opening in another under a different name.” “We cannot ignore reports that young people have died and suffered abuse at the hands of those who run and work at residential treatment programs under the guise of providing critical therapy and rehabilitation services,” Schiff said. “This is why I am working with my colleagues to introduce legislation that will hold all residential treatment programs accountable for instances of child abuse. The measure will also increase the transparency of these programs so that parents can make informed and safer choices for their children. Families that turn to these treatment programs for help, often as a last resort, must know that their children are safe and in the care of professionals. "Schiff's legislation would: Hold all youth residential treatment programs accountable to a set of minimum federal standards including prohibiting all residential treatment programs that purport to provide youth with mental health and behavioral treatment from any form of child abuse and depriving children of water, food, or medical care; requiring that all children have reasonable access to their families and a hotline to report instances of abuse; and requiring all staff members to be properly trained to identify instances of child abuse. Establish civil penalties for any violation of these standards and ensures private right of action so that victims and their families can seek civil damages as well. Increase transparency of the "troubled teen" industry by establishing a publicly-available database of residential treatment programs and their records of criminal activity, and licensing status. Require states to work with Health and Human Services (HHS) to report and investigate instances of child abuse at residential treatment programs, and further requires them to establish standards that are at least as strict as federal standards. Also requires states to develop policies that ensure every program in their state is properly licensed and in compliance with license requirements. Source: <http://www.frontiersmedia.com/frontiers-blog/2015/04/10/schiff-to-introduce-bill-to-reform-troubled-teen-programs-breaking/>

California creates first guidelines for prescribing psych meds to foster youth By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 04/11/2015 07:17:28 AM PDT Comments Updated: 04/11/2015 07:18:04 AM PDT Drugging Our Kids The full Bay Area News Group investigation, including a documentary video.

Three years after joining forces to address the alarming use of psychotropic medications in California's foster care system, a high-level group of health care officials, attorneys and public policy leaders on Friday unveiled a sweeping set of guidelines for doctors who prescribe the powerful drugs to some of the state's most traumatized children. The nonbinding directive calls on physicians to offer non-drug therapies; to give preference to medications approved by the Food and Drug Administration for use on children; and to keep dosages to a minimum with a "start low and go slow" approach. It discourages the use of two or more meds, and suggests doctors periodically wean children off the mind-altering drugs altogether. The state's first comprehensive effort to address the issue comes after this newspaper's series "Drugging Our Kids" showed California's foster care system has come to rely on psychiatric drugs to manage behavior -- often prescribing them in heavy doses, for long periods of time, and for conditions other than the serious mental illnesses they were designed to treat. The new guidelines specifically state: "Psychotropic medications should not be used for the purpose of discipline or chemical restraint, except as acutely necessary in true psychiatric emergencies." While many youth advocates applauded the recommendations as long overdue, they say legislation in the works is needed to ensure reforms are put into practice. Advertisement "The guidelines aren't going to solve all the problems," conceded Linette Scott, chief medical information officer for the state's Department of Health Care Services, the agency that oversees the state's public health system. But she said that "they set expectations and create a common language" for offices and clinics treating California's 63,000 foster children. Scott called the 18-page guidelines "a very significant outcome" of the state-sponsored Quality Improvement Project, along with a newly posted Foster Youth Mental Health Bill of Rights, and a question list that kids and caregivers can take to doctor's visits. The recommendations also backed by the Department of Social Services come after an exhaustive effort began in 2012 -- involving more than 100 professionals, foster youth and advocates who have met 13 times in the past four months alone -- but they stop short on measures to hold doctors accountable. Experts have said that the state now needs a method to make sure doctors are following through. The federal government has called on all states to reduce the inappropriate use of psychotropic medications in foster care and to expand more effective treatment; President Barack Obama included money in his proposed budgets for both 2015 and 2016 to assist those efforts. And other states have put far more binding -- and measurable -- policies in place, according to the Center for Health Care Strategies, a New Jersey-based nonprofit monitoring the issue in 14 states. Washington, Wyoming, New Jersey and Illinois ensure that children prescribed psychotropic medications receive second medical opinions. In Texas and Connecticut, child welfare workers, foster parents and residential providers are trained on the impacts of psychotropics, including what questions to ask doctors, what side effects look like, and when to seek non-drug therapies. All experts examining the issue agree on one thing: States must regularly report on medication use in order to ensure foster children are being prescribed safely, and to identify patterns of misuse -- a practice California is only beginning. Oregon, for example, produces quarterly reports on how many children age 5 and younger have been prescribed psych meds, how many children are on antipsychotics -- a powerful class of psychiatric drugs -- as well as those receiving multiple medications at once. Child welfare advocates calling for better protections in California are focusing on the state Legislature, where four bills are being heard Tuesday in the Senate Health and Human Services Committee. Amid the flurry of legislation, a growing chorus wants to know who, precisely, is behind dangerous prescribing. In a sharply worded letter sent in March to the Health Care Services Director Jennifer Kent, Senate President pro Tem Kevin de León, and senators Bill Monning, Holly Mitchell, Jim Beall and Mike McGuire stated: "We believe the state could more aggressively police the physicians responsible for prescribing abuses." The California Medical Board, meanwhile, is seeking a list of doctors prescribing three or more psychotropic medications at once for 90 days or more to foster children, a practice considered medically questionable that it intends to investigate. And in May, the senate will hold a hearing on how to rein in foster care prescribers from accepting drug company perks that the newspaper found totaled more than $14 million between 2010 and 2013. Foster care prescribers, on average, receive more than twice as much from drug companies as the average California doctor, for travel, meals, speaking, consulting, and industry-funded research -- with those who prescribed the most, typically received the most, this newspaper found. In response to those findings, Santa Clara County Supervisor Ken Yeager received unanimous approval in March to pursue a policy banning all county-contracted physicians prescribing to foster youth "from accepting incentives from pharmaceutical companies." A similar ban is already in place for county-employed doctors, but the new policy would extend the restrictions to include the 20 agencies that the county contracts to provide mental health services. "We just have to guarantee that physicians are making decisions that are in the best interest of the foster youth and not in their best interest," Yeager said. In a budget hearing Thursday in the state Capitol, Sen. Monning, D-Carmel, described similar concerns. He questioned state health and foster care officials about whether they had considered barring Medi-Cal prescribers from accepting drug company money, a practice he said "should not be a part of what the state of California is supporting. "If we're in a system where the more prescriptions, the more financial interests for that prescribing physician, that defies any ethics code around," Monning said. "And it should be made illegal." Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source: http://www.contracostatimes.com/breaking-news/ci_27891659/california-creates-first-guidelines-prescribing-psych-meds-foster

Bill on state wards forces lawmakers to question role in Nebraska HHS overhaul Posted: Friday, April 10, 2015 9:00 pm Bill on state wards forces lawmakers to question role in Nebraska HHS overhaul LINCOLN (AP) — A proposed experiment to pay private agencies to locate relatives of state wards has some Nebraska senators questioning the Legislature's role in overhauling the state's beleaguered Department of Health and Human Services. Senators voted 26-0 Friday to advance a measure that would give $1.5 million per year to private partners such as nonprofit family service Christian Heritage to find relatives or people with significant emotional connections to the child. Proponents said the four-year pilot program could serve as a "best practices" example for what HHS should do in the future to keep children out of foster care. As of April 6, the state was responsible for 3,219 children in out-of-home placement, costing Nebraska $38.1 million last year. But some senators said the measure sets the wrong precedent by detailing to HHS exactly how it should fix the state's troubled foster care system. "We are getting more and more in the weeds of how workers do their job," said Sen. Colby Coash of Lincoln. "I want to make that part of the record, because at some point, when things go wrong, we won't be looking to the executive branch or the Department of Health and Human Services as to why they went wrong, we'll be looking right at ourselves." The bill's sponsor, Sen. Kate Bolz of Lincoln, said that HHS notifies extended family about children in the welfare system but currently lacks resources to engage and train for permanent placements. Brad Brown, executive director of Christian Heritage, said HHS does not have the time to invest in building support networks for children in the foster care system. A 2013 project between HHS and Christian Heritage in the southeast service area of the state identified more than 100 children languishing in the system and began searches to identify and educate family members. Brown said in 78 percent of the cases, Christian Heritage found at least one relative willing to offer a permanent home. "The time it takes to tell the story and how they can be involved, and (explain) the opportunity to be a part of that child's lifelong network of unconditional support: That just takes a lot of time," Brown said. Source: http://www.omaha.com/news/legislature/bill-on-state-wards-forces-lawmakers-to-question-role-in/article_472fc54c-beb4-6b06-aa68-2f5cea4194ce.html

Parents, Don't Send Your Teens into 'Hotel Hell' Written by David Heitz | Published on April 18, 2015 Los Angeles LGBT center teams up with lawmakers to demand legislation on juvenile institutions The notion of the "bad kid" has been around as long as parents have threatened to send such children off to reform schools and "scare them straight." But in recent years, it has come to light that some institutions physically and mentally torture children and even prevent them from getting an education. Such places have become a multi-billion-dollar industry, seeing business boom as parents grapple with new issues related to having a "bad kid." Those issues include the opiate epidemic that's sweeping the United States and the country's rising divorce rates. The Los Angeles LGBT Center has teamed up with Survivors of Institutional Abuse (SIA) as well as with state and federal lawmakers to bring regulation to the so-called "troubled youth" industry. California State Sen. Ricardo Lara has introduced the Protecting Youth from Institutional Abuse Act. It would not exempt religious-based groups that operate such facilities. It's outrageous that neighborhood nail salons are more regulated than the industry of residential schools, camps, and wilderness programs that are entrusted with the lives of kids. David Garcia, Los Angeles LGBT Center On a federal level, the Los Angeles center is working with Rep. Adam Schiff to get legislation introduced in Congress. In some cases, institutions will tell parents they can scare a kid "straight" in more ways than one — even promising to "help" a gay child become heterosexual. So while it was natural for the center to take up the cause, the problem of children being tortured in such facilities goes far beyond those being scared straight in terms of their sexuality. The U.S. Government Accountability Office reported that in just one year, 1,619 employees of these programs — in 33 states — were involved in incidences of abuse. SIA officials report more than 300 young people have died from abuse in these institutions or have killed themselves. "It's outrageous that neighborhood nail salons are more regulated than the industry of residential schools, camps, and wilderness programs that are entrusted with the lives of kids," David Garcia, the center's director of public policy, said in a news release. "We've heard from survivors forced to endure torture techniques that include food and water deprivation, physical abuse, and electric shocks. We've also spoken to devastated parents whose children died in these programs." Related News: Heroin Becoming an American Epidemic » Twelve Steps Plus Torture, Toxicity Filmmaker Nick Gaglia made a dramatized narrative of the time he spent in one such facility on the East Coast called KIDS. Actors are used in the film. His parents sent him and his sister to KIDS for treatment of their drug problems. Both later escaped. In the film "Over the GW," viewers see some common practices used in addiction treatment but in a setting managed by abuse and manipulation. If you admit you are powerless over yourself, that can be used against you if swung in the other direction in a toxic way. Nick Gaglia, documentary filmmaker For example, counselors are relentless in getting teens to admit they are powerless over drugs or alcohol. Admitting one is powerless is the first step in Alcoholics Anonymous. But even after a year sober, locked up in the reform facility, residents still would wail in group therapy as counselors would warn them they're doomed to a life on the streets if they ever leave the institution. "If you admit you are powerless over yourself, that can be used against you if swung in the other direction in a toxic way," Gaglia told Healthline. "If you can't trust yourself, you need to trust us," he said was the mantra at the program. "If you don't, you will die." Image Attribution Image Attribution Author: Courtesy Besides children with substance abuse problems, such institutions also promise to reform children with behavioral problems that may be medical, such as bipolar disorder or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. But often children do not receive proper medical care in such facilities. "I did need therapy, I was drinking and smoking weed, which is something a lot of kids do, especially when born into the trauma of poverty, divorce, alcoholic parents, or whatever it may be," Gaglia told Healthline. "There are going to be behavioral issues. If I had a therapist and meditation that would have been perfect for me." Related News: Teens Use Marijuana to Manage Negative Moods » No Oversight: Getting High at Rehab The issue of unregulated centers falsely claiming to find success getting people on the right path goes beyond rehabilitation of troubled teens. In Florida, legislation has been introduced to establish state oversight of alcohol and drug treatment facilities. Critics say the primary motivation of many such facilities is money, not getting someone sober. Instead of abuse, some facilities go to the opposite extreme. Patients live in luxury for 30 days in some cases and still get high on the side. In Florida, authorities have raided so-called upstart "sober houses" resulting in allegations of insurance fraud and other unethical business practices. In a news release, Bryn Wesch, chief financial officer of Novus Medical Detox Center, said such places have sprung up out of expanded access to substance abuse treatment. "The recent government raids have demonstrated that a number of those unlicensed providers engage in unethical and criminal activities, suggesting that they're motivated more by profits than the well being of their patients," Wesch said. In healthcare, many treatments not grounded in science and not endorsed by the mainstream medical community boast official sounding accreditations. While these accrediting groups look and sound official, getting their stamp of approval sometimes requires little more than paying a fee. In the case of teen rehabilitation centers, the Federal Trade Commission in its facts for consumers urges parents to ask about licensing. Legitimate accrediting organizations include Joint Commission on Healthcare (JCHC), the Council on Accreditation (COA), and Commission on Accreditation of Rehabilitation Facilities (CARF). Related News: Teens Puffing Away on E-Cigarettes » Parental Peace ... But At What Cost? Gaglia's film depicts a troubled teen coming home from a night out in what appears to be a drunken, drug-induced rage. The boy tears up the family home while fighting with his sister. Soon after, he's going "Over the GW" bridge thinking his mom is taking him on a shopping trip. Instead, she is taking him to KIDS. "If there is chaos in the home, and they put the kid in a residential treatment center, what happens the second the kid isn't there? Peace," Gaglia told Healthline. "In a lot of situations, the parent has their own problems to work through." Often times, recently divorced parents find common ground in sending away troubled children, Gaglia said. Parents should be able to visit and talk with their child in private. They should never be told not to believe their child. Nick Gaglia, documentary filmmaker... "Parents should be able to visit and talk with their child in private," he told Healthline. "They should never be told not to believe their child." And if they repeatedly are unable to see their child, consider that a red flag, too. "Isolation and restraint should never be used in addiction treatment. I was personally restrained over 100 times and never did anything violent to warrant it," said Gaglia. "They used this as a control technique." Source: <http://www.healthline.com/health-news/parents-dont-send-your-teens-into-hotel-hell-041815#6> (Only the poorly informed would recommend parents contact ASTART for help.)

Boot Camp or School? Critics Worry Charters for Minority Kids Are Too Militant April 13, 2015 Yahoo News quotes Pauline Lipman, professor of educational policy studies, on the high rates of suspension, expulsion and teacher turnover in Success Academy, a chain of charter schools known for militaristic discipline. For all its achievement, Success' pressurized environment has led to one of the higher rates of student suspension and expulsion in New York, along with a teacher turnover rate that's all but put a revolving door on the faculty lounge. "It's really quite high" compared with traditional public schools, says Pauline Lipman, a University of Illinois–Chicago educational policies professor and an expert on urban education and inequality. The tough standards and hyper-focus on test scores, she says, typically don't leave room for creativity, independent thought, or individualized education—it prepares kids to take tests instead of preparing them for college. "They basically drill kids in a good portion of the year. And when kids don't [achieve], then they are shamed," says Lipman. That approach, she says, teaches kids that "it's their own fault because they aren't putting forth the effort." That's true at Success Academy: Low-scoring students are sent to "effort academies," which The New York Times recently described as part detention, part study hall. At the same time, Success and other no-excuses charter schools have suspension and expulsion rates up to six times higher than traditional public schools, and they've been accused of pushing out students with learning or emotional disabilities. There's another problem with the approach: "I think it's grounded in race," Lipman says. "It sees poor [minority] families as pathological" and assumes they're poor because they aren't working hard enough. The student populations at no-excuses charters "are almost entirely black and Latino," says Lipman, and the schools are located in poor communities with failing traditional public schools. Those charters, she adds, convince parents—and school administrators—that tough love is the answer rather than giving chaotic, underachieving, understaffed, and overwhelmed neighborhood schools the resources they need to succeed. Source: <https://greatcities.uic.edu/2015/04/13/boot-camp-or-school-critics-worry-charters-for-minority-kids-are-too-militant/>

Laura Flanders Show Video: The privatization of public schools & the biggest uprising against high-stakes testing in U.S. history By IAM AN EDUCATOR on April 22, 2015 I recently was a guest on the Laura Flanders Show to discuss the factors contributing to the mass opt out movement that has developed around the nation, now the largest uprising in U.S. history against high-stakes, standardized testing (see the below video). I have been traveling around the country on my book tour for More Than a Score: The New Uprising Against High-Stakes Testing and meeting with an outpouring of people looking for inspiration and organizational strategies for resisting the testocracy. Last week I spoke to packed audiences in Washington, D.C., Baltimore, and Chicago where parents, students, and teachers turned my book reading event into an organizing session to forge connections and relationships that will undoubtedly lead to new testing boycotts. In my home town of Seattle, we are already seeing the greatest number of opt outs in our city's history with so many hundreds of opt outs of the new common core tests at my school that the teachers are no longer being asked to administer the test. At Seattle's Nathan Hale High School, 100% of the school's 11th graders opted out of the 11th grade Common Core test! During the past year students have refused to take high-stakes tests at unprecedented rates. The largest walkout against high-stakes tests in U.S. history happened this school year in Colorado when more than 5,000 students refused the new end-of-course exams and rallied to express their view that standardized testing is eroding the quality of public education. Then in New Mexico in March, over one thousand students walked out of school against the Common Core PARCC test. But it is in New York State where the revolt has truly reached a mass scale. Preliminary reports show over 180,000 NY families have opted their children out of Common Core testing in an unprecedented act of mass rebellion that is proelling the "Education Spring." This collective act of struggle to defend students' civil rights has the power to challenge NY Gov.

Como's test and punish policies—most recently enacting policy that mandates 50 percent of a teacher's evaluation to the state tests. In the first part of the Laura Flanders Show I explain the dynamics contributing to this uprising, but it is the second half of the show, "Perfect Storm," that explains what the real high-stakes are if our movement doesn't win. This expose explains how the testocracy moved into New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, labeled the schools failing, and converted 100 percent of the public schools into privatized charter schools. This is the vision that the testocracy has for the rest of nation: label our schools, students, and teachers failing so as to erode one of the last free and public institutions left in the U.S. The U.S. Secretary of Education, Arne Duncan, even went so far as to say Hurricane Katrina was "the best thing that happened to the education system in New Orleans." Thankfully, New Orleans parent advocates such as Karran Harper Royal, who is interviewed in the segment, have exposed that charter schools have not improved education in the city and have organized to defend the public schools. Watch the Laura Flanders Show's portrayal of two possible futures: the end of public education or the mass rebellion of students, parents, and teachers against the testocracy. Then pick which of these futures awaits our nation. Source: <http://iameducator.com/2015/04/22/laura-flanders-show-video-the-privatization-of-public-schools-the-biggest-uprising-against-high-stakes-testing-in-u-s-history/>

"Parents rights" advocates have scored a victory now that Idaho has passed House Bill 113. But what does it mean for Idaho's children? Post Date April 07, 2015 Author Janet Heimlich On April 2, Governor C.L. "Butch" Otter signed into law House Bill 113 known as the "parents rights" bill. It will become law on July 1 of this year. The bill was one of many similar pieces of legislation being lobbied around the country by the Home School Legal Defense Association, whose mission is to "preserve and advance the fundamental, God-given, constitutional right of parents and others legally responsible for their children to direct their education." According to the HSLDA, the law doesn't give parents more rights, it just codifies them, a necessary step say proponents who are convinced that the courts are beginning to strip them away. In announcing its victory, HSLDA stated on its website: "You don't have any more rights now than you did before. But the rights you already have by virtue of being a parent are now far safer." The lobbying group is particularly worried that government is interfering with parents' ability to make decisions about their children's education. According to HSLDA's website parentalrights.org, "It is no accident, no coincidence. And it's not just your imagination. There really is a steady trend by the government and the courts to remove the influence of parents from the public schools." So it's no surprise that the Idaho parents rights bill specifically mentions education as an area of childrearing in which parents are entitled to "fundamental rights." (The law does not specifically call out any other area of childrearing but instead vaguely refers to the "care, custody and control" of children.) In addition, the law states that parents who feel their rights have been violated can sue the appropriate governmental entity. In other words, if parents don't like what their public school is teaching, and the school doesn't make changes as directed by parents, mothers and fathers can take the school district to court. Furthermore, the law states that parents who prevail in court are entitled to "attorney's fees and costs." (It's an ironic twist that Idaho lawmakers who are so aggrieved by what they perceive the courts to be doing are simultaneously turning to the courts as a remedy.) The Child-Friendly Faith Project got involved as soon as we found out the bill had been filed. We could see that much of it was largely unnecessary, since numerous court decisions had affirmed that parents held fundamental rights. Still, there was still great cause for concern, because as proponents were fretting about protections for parents, few lawmakers seemed concerned about maintaining or improving protections for their offspring, especially children whose parents were abusing or neglecting them. So we set up #ProjectIdaho and encouraged child advocates to join the campaign and testify against the bill. We were extremely pleased to be joined by child advocates within and outside of the state of Idaho, including the Interfaith Alliance, the Interfaith Alliance of Idaho, Rev. Dr. C. Welton Gaddy, Professor Marci A. Hamilton, and others. We weren't the bill's only critics. Some worried that allowing parents broad rights over education would create chaos in Idaho's public schools. Currently, school administrators and teachers welcome parental involvement, but now instead of sitting down with them and discussing concerns, the law gives parents a cause of action in the courts. One editorial that appeared on the Idaho website MagicValley.com stated that the bill would "create an unworkable, a la carte education system where parents could suddenly ban the basic principles of biology, literature and U.S. history." One poll showed that more than 55 percent of Idahoans opposed the bill. Yet, in spite of this opposition, the Idaho House of Representatives passed the bill 37 to 31. When the bill got to the Senate, lawmakers were prepared to apply considerable more scrutiny. Even Republican members of the Senate State Affairs Committee acknowledged that the language of the bill had serious problems. For instance, the bill aimed to offer the same "fundamental rights" to legal guardians, a provision that conflicted with current Idaho statutes. The main point I made in my testimony before the Senate panel was that the bill offered no exceptions for parents who were abusive or neglectful. This time, criticism of the bill did not fall on deaf ears, and the Senate panel gave the bill a near complete makeover. We feel that the law that was passed is a better piece of legislation than what was originally passed by the House. However, we still have concerns about how it will impact the lives of children for these reasons: 1) The parents rights law grants "fundamental rights" to parents who don't deserve them. The bill states that actions taken under the law may not conflict with already-existing statutes that aim to protect children from maltreatment. This wouldn't be a problem if Idaho's laws did, in fact, protect children from harm. But they don't, because four state statutes provide exemptions for parents who withhold needed medical care for their children as long as the parents claim they were attempting to treat them with only prayer or other "spiritual means." 2) The parents rights law will interfere with children's right to a proper education. School districts, which have no resources to fight lawsuits, may choose to change curriculum, library materials, and hiring practices in a haphazardly fashion just to avoid being sued by disgruntled parents. Also, parents might be permitted to remove their children from classes they find objectionable, which could lead to educational neglect. 3) Professionals who are charged with protecting children from harm will be intimidated into not doing their jobs. The threat of parents suing school districts, child protective services, county health clinics, and other entities they feel have infringed on their fundamental rights is likely to have a chilling effect on the reporting of abuse or neglect. In addition, we fear that judges and juries will fail to properly protect children from unfit parents if they claim they acted according to their "fundamental rights." Some Idaho lawmakers have been equally alarmed. Senator Cherie Buckner-Webb wrote in an email that she agrees that parents have inalienable rights when it comes to their children. However, she described the bill as containing "vague language" and one that "creates a number of alarming uncertainties." She added, "Instead of truly safeguarding the rights of parents, I fear they would spur countless lawsuits and a legal free-for-all, ultimately forcing our judiciary to interpret our legislative intent. I voted no on this legislation. The parents rights law is nowhere as dangerous as it was when it was first being considered by the Idaho House, but what the state has now passed still does not bode well for children. Source: <http://childfriendlyfaith.org/2015/04/parents-rights-advocates-have-scored-a-victory-now-that-idaho-has-passed-house-bill-113-but-what-does-it-mean-for-idahos-children/>

Op-ed: How Many Kids Must Die Before Youth 'Treatment' Programs Are Regulated? The Los Angeles LGBT Center's CEO explains why 'treatment' programs to 'cure' people of their homosexuality are extremely dangerous for LGBT youth. BY Lorri L. Jean April 23 2015 6:00 AM ET 58 Above: Screen grab from Kidnapped for Christ We all know how rare it is for Congress to take meaningful action, but wouldn't you think protecting the lives of children could unite the parties? You'd be wrong. For decades, the industry of residential schools, camps, and wilderness programs that claim to treat troubled teens — including kids considered "troubled" simply because they're LGBT — has operated with less regulation and oversight than nail salons. While Congress fails, year after year, to pass sensible legislation to change that, thousands of children have been abused by these programs. Hundreds are reported to have died. Way back in 2007 there were congressional hearings on what's known as the troubled-teen industry, along with a damning investigation by the U.S. Government Accountability Office. The GAO reported that in just one year (2005), there were 1,619 employees of these programs in 33 states involved in incidents of abuse. And those were only the reported incidents. It's no wonder that a guiding principle of these programs is to deprive youth of all contact with family, friends, and the outside world, because we've heard from survivors forced to endure torture techniques that include food and water deprivation, physical abuse (beatings, electric shocks, hard labor), and weeks of solitary confinement in windowless cells. We've also heard from devastated parents whose children died in these programs. The nonprofit organization Survivors of Institutional Abuse reports the death of more than 300 people linked to these programs. When Bob Bacon sent his 16-year-old son to a program in Utah, he didn't know it wasn't regulated. Even after interviewing the owners, Bob thought this was a place where his son Aaron, a poet, would be cared for by staff who were experts at helping kids struggling with drugs and dealing with social pressure. They told him Aaron would get to explore the beauties of Utah while writing in his journal each night. Thirty days later, Aaron was dead. There was no poetry in Aaron's journal, just horrific firsthand accounts of torture. For two weeks he was deprived of any food, all while hiking up to 10 miles a day. During the freezing nights in the wilderness, he had only a thin blanket to cover him; for five nights he had nothing at all. By the 10th day he had lost 20 percent of his body weight and control of all bodily functions, but the staff refused to provide any medical treatment. When Bob saw his son's bruised, battered, and skeletal body, he couldn't believe it was him. He told us, "My wife and I will never escape our decision to send our gifted 16-year-old son to his death." During his senior year in high school, David Wernsman — whose story is depicted in the powerful 2014 documentary Kidnapped for Christ — was sent by his parents to a residential treatment program. He told us the following: "When I was 17, two large men woke me up before dawn, tied a belt around my waist and forced me out of my home. I was taken to a dumping ground — guarded by men with guns — for kids whose families didn't know how to solve their child's issue. In my case, it was the fact that I'm gay. The program was an endless nightmare of torture, including public beatings and humiliation, hard labor, and sometimes solitary confinement in a windowless cell where we relieved ourselves in a bucket." Every day at the Los Angeles LGBT Center, we see the consequences of parents sending their LGBT kids to these programs to be "cured" or because they presume their children's sexual orientation or gender identity must mean they're troubled. Most suffer lasting trauma and some depend on us for a safe place to live because they end up homeless. Joined by the nonprofit organization Survivors of Institutional Abuse and with the support of a growing list of organizations, businesses and individuals, the center has launched the national Campaign to Protect Youth from Institutional Abuse to finally regulate this rogue industry. In California we're cosponsoring landmark legislation introduced by Sen. Ricardo Lara to require these programs to be regulated by the state Department of Social Services, with no exemption for faith-based groups. In fact, the bill will get its first hearing in the state Senate Tuesday, when the Senate Committee on Human Services meets. We expect California's legislation to set an example for the rest of the country, but state legislation isn't enough. When the abuses of these organizations are exposed in the media, it's common for them to close and reopen in another state, often under a different name. And parents frequently send kids to programs outside their home state. That's why we absolutely must have federal legislation. Though we know it won't be easy, and though previous attempts have failed, LGBT groups have never been a part of the movement to regulate this industry. Now the world's largest LGBT organization is dedicated to building a broad coalition, partnered with allies in Congress, to finally bring sensible regulation to this industry. Nationally, we've secured commitments from U.S. Reps. Adam Schiff and Bobby Scott, and we're working to identify other cosponsors to build on the work started by former U.S. Rep. George Miller and finally pass critically needed federal legislation. Please join our campaign, sign our petition at PYIA.org, and help us protect youth — whatever their sexual orientation or gender identity — from abuse. LORRI L. JEAN is the chief executive officer of the Los Angeles LGBT Center. Source: <http://www.advocate.com/commentary/2015/04/23/op-ed-how-many-kids-must-die-youth-treatment-programs-are-regulated> (HEAL Comment: California's approved accreditation agencies include Joint Commission (approves abusive facilities and fails to provide proper oversight time and again), CARF (approves abusive facilities), COA (approves abusive facilities), and any bill that relies on those agencies for regulation is doing a disservice to the public and the vulnerable populations it seeks to protect.)

Is Sheltering Foster Youth Akin To Incarceration? Executive Briefing | by Howard Shiffman, M.A. | April 18, 2015 Howard Shiffman, M.A. Last month, a headline in the Los Angeles Times really caught our attention here at OPEN MINDS — L.A. County Supervisors Debate Whether To Lock Up At-Risk Foster Youth. The crux of the story — Los Angeles County (including foster care authorities, the district attorney, the sheriff, supervisors and voters) have decided "that sex-trafficked youth should no longer be tried and incarcerated as criminals but rather sheltered in foster care and offered services to protect them and help them heal." Early in my career I ran a locked unit for adolescents at a state hospital. We had prison screens on the windows and every staff including the psychiatrist was trained in dealing with assaultive behavior. We had several young adolescents on the unit that were involved in prostitution and had been recruited into this by other adolescents. In those days (the 1980s) we placed these adolescents in this type of unit because we saw them clearly as a danger to themselves. They were diagnosed as mentally ill and their behavior was clearly destructive. One night at about 2 a.m. one of them was broken out and taken back to the streets. Who were we protecting? Our patient or the community? Were we locking in our kids to protect them or locking out the community from re-victimizing them? We should not just be putting kids in locked units because of their behavior, or just to attempt to protect them. Rather, we should treat their self-destructive behavior and underlying mental health problem, in my estimation, and if a secure setting is needed this is one of our options on the continuum of available care. But, this type of setting should not be a corrections environment. Since we have closed most state hospitals and money to treat in this expensive environment is not available...what are our choices? This is a big dilemma for our society. The environment has changed but the problem still exists. I see possible "plug in telepsychiatry" solutions — virtual in-home psychiatric settings with around the clock supervision by hired staff; visiting therapists; and "school" in the home. The bottom line, however, is that the adolescent or child has to have the desire not to be recruited to this lifestyle — and building that desire is our job. And, this has drawn some strong opinions from members of the OPEN MINDS team who have had ample experience working in foster care. Patricia Wilson Patricia Wilson, Senior Associate, OPEN MINDS — This is an extremely tough one. Understandably, those trying to help are frustrated and worried about runaways. However, confinement conveys those very conditions that the intervention is trying to remediate — submissiveness and coercion. Presumably the confinement would be court ordered which means if the youth AWOL, there comes the opportunity for charges and the potential for racking up delinquency status. This is hardly what is needed. On the other hand, traditional foster care does not have a good track record with these youth. The key seems to be creating a community based foster care setting with parents (I like the phrase "foster carers" used by a foster care agency from the United Kingdom) trained in dealing with the culture of trafficking and the issues surrounding it. Perhaps for this group of youth, a small group setting in the community with 24-hour awake staff would offer the greatest opportunity for intervention, safety and normalization. Undoubtedly, child welfare and juvenile justice staff along with the Courts need all the help (education, training, resources for the youth) that can be mustered to deal with this. I would hope that they look to formerly trafficked individuals for guidance. Paul Neitman Paul Neitman, Senior Associate, OPEN MINDS — These children are victims and as such should not be locked up or placed in shelters indefinitely under the guise of protecting them. What the system is saying is that they are failing to protect these children, so the answer is to lock them up. Is that what we do with our mentally ill? The setting they are in for treatment services should be based upon clinical need, up to and including a secure treatment setting based upon a clinical assessment. It seems to me that all involved with these children — police, child welfare staff, courts, foster parents, etc. — need training in what to watch for and how to intervene in cases where these children may continue to be at risk of victimization. Overall, my belief is this is a system problem that needs system solutions other than further victimizing these children. I think that, as more states experiment with more approaches — such as locked and unlocked approaches, foster family approaches, and inter-state services (see Georgia, Alabama sign unprecedented agreement to serve victims of child abuse and neglect), providers will get a better look at what policymakers have in mind for the future. For more on the emerging market models in child welfare, be sure to join Howard and Cheryl Fisher, M.Ed., LPC, Sr. Director, Foster Care and Child Welfare, Cenpatco for their 2015 OPEN MINDS Strategy & Innovation Source: <https://www.openminds.com/market-intelligence/executive-briefings/is-sheltering-foster-youth-akin-to-incarceration.htm/>

Barnard Woman Battles DCF Over Safety Of Child Posted date: Friday, April 24 2015 In: Archive, Barnard, NewsNo Comments Barnard Resident Jennifer Duncan speaks about her fight against the state Department of Children and Families at Town Meeting Day in Barnard. (Rick Russell Photo) By Katy Savage, Standard Staff BARNARD — Jennifer Duncan had problems with the state Department of Children and Families — even before they took her foster child. In her five months as a foster parent, Duncan said she wasn't given access to information and decisions were made by the DCF without her consultation. On numerous occasions, Duncan says, the DCF failed to follow its own policies. In March, Duncan dropped off her foster child, 4, at a day care in Chelsea, where the child's maternal cousin came and picked her up. A DCF official told Duncan the child would be staying with the cousin's family for a week and would be continuing to go to school, she said. "All hell broke loose" when Duncan found out the child was permitted to go on a vacation to Massachusetts without her knowledge. The child left the Duncan residence permanently after that. "We felt like our child had been kidnapped from us," Duncan said. Now Duncan fears for the child's safety. Kate Kennedy, the attorney who represents the child, and Guardian Ad Litem Robin Goodrum who works at Have Justice Will Travel both declined to comment, citing privacy concerns. "There is no system of checks and balances," Duncan said. "DCF operates like a monarchy." No Checks And Balances The child, whose name is withheld for privacy, was four, but had the maturity of a two year old when she arrived at the Duncans' home last October, Duncan said. The child was in their care for five months. She hid under the bed, in a closet when she first arrived, didn't know her ABCs and tried to climb into the refrigerator, Duncan said. The family didn't know that the child had been physically and sexually abused before she arrived, Duncan said. In December, when the child started showing physical and sexual behavior toward her 13-year-old son, it was "shocking," she said. "I can't expand fully on the incident as it would infringe on her privacy, however, I can say that my son was hurt in the incident and quite upset," Duncan said. Duncan said the DCF deliberately withheld information about the child's case. She said she and her family "weren't prepared" and didn't receive adequate information prior to her arrival. She pointed to numerous occasions where the Department of Children and Families failed to follow its own policies and procedures. DCF Policy and Operations Manager Lisa Keller admitted to some of the policy violations in a letter to the Duncans, saying that the family should have been given information that was known about the child, documents provided by the Duncans show. An original document from the DCF listed the wrong last name as the four-year-old child in custody. When the DCF put a case plan together to ratify the situation between the child and parent, there was an incorrect first name for the child:

"Destiny." The case plan addressed "children" when there was only one child in custody and it addressed drug addiction plans for the parents, suggesting to Duncan that the document had been copy and pasted from another plan. The document was signed March 12 by three people responsible for the child's care at DCF, records show. A corrected case document was later signed in court, Duncan said. Duncan said she wasn't invited to participate in the child's case planning process, which is a violation of one of the department's policies. The child was put in DCF custody after a cousin (mother's stepsister) made a report of neglect in October, Duncan said, around the same time that the child's father was arrested for aggravated domestic assault, police reports show. Duncan believed the child was sexually abused by the way the child took her clothes off. On Feb. 9 Duncan said the child revealed to the family that her mother performed oral sex on her. Duncan reported that information to the DCF, but she isn't sure what happened with it. DCF officials declined to comment on the case. DCF policy leaves it to a social worker to address safety needs in the home if a child exhibits inappropriate sexualized behavior. DCF Senior Policy & Operations Manager Brenda Gooley sent Duncan an email at the end of February that said at the conclusion of an investigation by a trained forensic interviewer, there was no evidence to suggest that the child's mother sexually abused her or that she was sexually abused by anyone, a redacted email provided by Duncan shows. The child also underwent three months of training with a therapist to which there was no evidence of sexual abuse, Gooley wrote. The child was taken out of Duncan's care after DCF officials told her that she was trying to block the child from reunification efforts with her mother, Duncan said. Duncan thinks the real reason the child was taken was due to her questioning the department. "We're Not Perfect" The DCF has been under fire since the deaths of two children in their care last year. Last February Dezirae Sheldon sustained the injuries that led to her death two days later. Another child, Peighton Geraw, died under DCF watch last April. A number of studies have been conducted since then on the DCF to determine how it can make improvements. Although DCF Commissioner Ken Schatz couldn't speak directly to Duncan's concerns, citing privacy, he said that the DCF has been swamped with caseloads. He's seen a 20 percent increase since last year in the number of children coming into DCF custody. Each caseworker is dealing with 17.4 cases on average — too much, he said. "We do the best we can. I'm not going to say we're perfect, we're not," he said. "We have a process for (foster parents) to address concerns. They can be presented to a local district director." Other parents in the area have had issues with the DCF. Lisa Robar of Barnard was a foster parent a few years ago for teenagers 14-17 years of age. She said trying to get a caseworker on the phone was difficult. Decisions were made quickly and not communicated well to them, she said. Robar wouldn't go into specifics but said: "Sometimes decisions were made that we didn't understand. It seemed difficult for us to get help for some of the kids who needed more extensive counseling." Robar said. "It was difficult at times for us to get the support to help the kids." "High Burnout" Duncan is advocating for a bill in the legislature called S.9, which passed the Senate. The bill establishes a special investigation unit with law enforcement agencies to look at homes where children are suffering. It improves communication with the person who made the report to DCF by disclosing whether an investigation was conducted and if evidence of harm was found. It also calls for the commissioner to improve policies and make sure they are followed consistently. It asks him to determine how many cases are appropriate for each social worker. A provision in the bill that would make it a crime for failing to protect a child was eliminated recently in the House. It was one of the measures in the bill Schatz had apprehensions about. "Our concerns are that the way it's drafted now, many social workers — educators, babysitters — may be caught by what we believe is overly broad new crime through no fault of their own if harm is later caused to the child by someone else," he said. The bill initiated after investigators spoke with 700 witnesses across the state about DCF practices. There were many complaints about how system was run and the process itself, said Sen. John Campbell, who also is an attorney. "The people we have as caseworkers—a lot of them are just out of college," Campbell said. "Automatically, they're dealing with large caseloads. When you're dealing with emotional issues... that's a lot to take on, especially for a young person." There's also a higher volume of cases now than ever before. "There was a high burnout level," he said of investigations. "After being part of it, I certainly understand how that could happen." Schatz said the DCF supports most of the language in the bill, including the creation of an oversight committee. Duncan says it's not enough. She wants language in the bill to address the inequity of power between the DCF and the rest of the team that advocates for the child, including the lawyer and foster parents and guardian ad litem. Two Calls Left Duncan knows she may never see the child again, but she'll never stop fighting, until she knows the child is safe. "The manner in which she left was very traumatic," Duncan said. The DCF has allowed Duncan to have phone conversations with the child. She says she has two left before she's no longer allowed to call. This article first appeared in the April 16, 2015 edition of the Vermont Standard. Source: <http://www.thevermontstandard.com/2015/04/barnard-woman-battles-dcf-over-safety-of-child/>

Sometimes parents need to ask for help without fear of losing custody Print Email Share Tweet Next 1 of 2 Contributed photo Rep. Deborah Sanderson, R-Chelsea Contributed photo Rep. Stephen Stanley, D-Medway By Deborah Sanderson and Stephen Stanley, Special to the BDN Posted April 26, 2015, at 6:04 a.m. Nearly 2,000 children are living in Maine's foster care system, far outpacing the number of approved foster and adoptive families. While the Office of Child and Family Services issued a plea last month for more families to open their homes to children in foster care, we must do more to end this tragedy and ensure our children grow up in safe, loving homes. Eight of our colleagues in the Legislature are standing beside us to respond to this urgent need, sponsoring legislation that mobilizes the local community to prevent abuse and neglect by supporting families in crisis and helping them stay together. Our bill, LD 1065, the Strengthening Families Act, empowers parents or guardians to provide for the short-term care of a child when life circumstances prevent them from doing so. Our goal is to protect families and their rights while giving them the courage to ask for help before the challenges they face spiral out of control. In many cases, abuse and neglect happen when a parent is in crisis and, feeling overwhelmed and with nowhere else to turn, makes a series of poor choices that often make a bad situation worse. Just consider a mother dealing with job loss, eviction, domestic violence, homelessness or even a hospitalization or jail time. If she lacks supportive extended family and friends, where can she turn? Unfortunately, the foster care system often is not adequately equipped or designed to reach families until it is too late, and the state only becomes involved with a family after there is sufficient reason to believe abuse or neglect has occurred. With the Strengthening Families Act, fewer children will enter foster care because of abuse or neglect, creating a greater number of strong, intact families throughout Maine. The Strengthening Families Act improves existing law by providing greater certainty for families in need in a number of ways. First, the bill clarifies that a temporary delegation of powers does not deprive any parent or guardian of their rights with respect to the child. Second, it provides that a power of attorney providing for the temporary care of the child does not, by itself, constitute abandonment, abuse or neglect. Finally, we distinguish the type of temporary care provided under this law from foster care to further protect parental rights and ensure timely family reunification. Each of these provisions provides essential parental rights protections to give families the courage to step out of the shadows and ask for help. Although we commend our public servants for the work they do protecting children, we all understand government has the power to permanently remove children from their families. This power, while important for rescuing children from dangerous environments, can leave families afraid to approach the state when they are in need of help. Through the bill's new protections, a family can now seek the help they need without fear. This bill was inspired by the work of Safe Families for Children, a nonprofit organization already having great success helping families right here in Maine. Founded in Chicago in 2003, Safe Families provides early-intervention services to support families in crisis. Through a network of volunteer families and other local charities, Safe Families works to provide families in need with a loving, supportive community they can turn to when times get tough. The concept is simple, based on the fundamental value of neighbors helping neighbors. And, unlike foster care, Safe Families encourages the host family to build a relationship with the child's family, providing the additional benefit of a lasting friendship. Safe Families operates in Down East Maine, as well as central and southern Maine, and has hosted more than 700 children since 2009. And more than 98 percent of children hosted since 2009 have been reunited with their families without ever entering foster care. This is a bipartisan commitment to protecting Maine's children and families. Through the Strengthening Families Act and the work of community organizations such as Safe Families for Children, we can dramatically reduce the number of children who enter foster care in Maine. We encourage our colleagues in the Legislature to join us in supporting this important piece of legislation, and we want to support and expand upon the compassion already shown by our fellow Mainers who open their hearts and homes to their neighbors in need. Rep. Deborah Sanderson, R-Chelsea, represents District 88 in the Maine House. Rep. Stephen Stanley, D-Stanley, represents House District 143. Source: <https://bangordailynews.com/2015/04/26/opinion/contributors/sometimes-parents-need-to-ask-for-help-without-fear-of-losing-custody/>

SUPPORT WASHINGTON STATE SB 5870 - 2015-16 Comment on this bill Prohibiting the use of aversion therapy in the treatment of minors. Revised for 1st Substitute: Protecting youth from aversive mental health therapies. For more information and complete text of this bill, click here.

SUPPORT WASHINGTON STATE SB 5408 - 2015-16 Comment on this bill Removing references to faith-based exemptions regarding criminal mistreatment of children and vulnerable adults. For more information and complete text of this bill, click here. Also see sister bill in Washington House, HB 1476.

New Video Book Trailer--"More Than a Score: The New Uprising Against High Stakes Testing" By I AM AN EDUCATOR on May 2, 2015 VIDEO --More Than a Score: The New Uprising Against High-Stakes Testing More Than a Score editor Jesse Hagopian reads from the book at a recent tour stop in Washington, D.C. "Exceptional" --Publishers Weekly "Exciting" --Truthout "Arguments to win over even the most skeptical school reformer." --Kirkus As the opt out movement explodes nationwide, the tour for the new book, More Than a Score: The New Uprising Against High Stakes Testing has been generating inspiration, excitement, strategy, and tactics in the struggle against unfair testing across the country. Now there is a new video trailer, featuring several of the contributors, to help share the lessons of this book inspire resistance to the reduction of teaching and learning to a data point--please share it far and wide. For too long the "testocracy," mostly billionaires, politicians, and others with little or no background in teaching, have gotten away with using standardized testing to punish our nation's youth and educators. Now students are walking out, parents are opting their children out, and teachers are refusing to administer these detrimental exams. In fact, the "reformers" today find themselves facing the largest revolt in US history against high-stakes, standardized testing. More Than a Score book tour in Baltimore. From left to right: Ben Dalbey, parent of Baltimore City Public School students, preschool teacher, activist; Jesse Hagopian, editor of More Than a Score; Matthew Prestbury, a parent of Baltimore City Public Schools students; Jerry McNutt, a member of the Baltimore Algebra Project. Jessica Shiller, a parent of two public school children in Baltimore and a professor of education at Towson University. (Photo Credit: Junior Bijou) More Than a Score is a collection of essays, poems, speeches, and interviews--accounts of personal courage and trenchant insights--from frontline fighters who are defying the corporate education reformers, often at great personal and professional risk, and fueling a national movement to reclaim and transform public education. More Than a Score features the voices of students, parents, teachers, administrators, and grassroots education activists, including: Wayne Au, Carol Burris, Nancy Carlsson-Paige, Sarah Chambers, Mallory Clarke, Jeanette Deutermann, Alma Flor Ada, Rosie Frascella, Alexia Garcia, Emily Giles, Helen Gym, Nikhil Goyal, Jesse Hagopian, Brian Jones, Alfie Kohn, Amber Kudla, John Kuhn, Jia Lee, Karen Lewis, Malcolm London, Barbara Madeloni, Cauldierre McKay, Mark Naison, Monty Neill, Diane Ravitch, Aaron Regunberg, Mary Cathryn D. Ricker, Stephanie Rivera, Kirstin Roberts, Peggy Robertson, Falmata Seid, Tim Shea, Phyllis Tashlik, Dao X. Tran Source: <http://iamaneducator.com/2015/05/02/new-video-book-trailer-more-than-a-score-the-new-uprising-against-high-stakes-testing/>

Cities offer public boarding school to teens from troubled homes Education By Laura Edgill Posted May 5, 2015, 10:17 a.m. Leaders in Buffalo's chronically struggling school system are considering launching a publicly funded boarding school. The proposal aims to combat the problems many of the city's students face outside of school that dramatically impact their success such as poverty, domestic instability, transient living arrangements, lack of proper nutrition, and truancy. "We have teachers and union leaders telling us, 'The problem is with the homes; these kids are in dysfunctional homes,'" said Buffalo school-board member Carl Paladino. Paladino and other leaders have reason to be concerned; the urban district's students face tremendous odds. Eighty percent of their students meet federal guidelines for free or reduced lunch, English and math proficiency rates hover 20 points below the state average, and only 53 percent of its students graduate in four years. Source: http://www.worldmag.com/2015/05/cities_offer_public_boarding_school_to_teens_from_troubled_homes [HEAL Note-- The SEED Charter School is one of many proposed public boarding schools. The SEED is also the name of the original program from which most known abusive facilities have derived their practices including Straight, Inc., CEDU, Synanon, and more. We must unite to stop this threat to democracy and to future generations! Support families and help families, do not destroy and separate them! What is wrong with you, Buffalo?]

A. LGBT Center Holds Important Forum on "Troubled-Teen" Industry Tonight The efforts to end cruel psychological child abuse - known as so-called "conversion" or "ex-gay" therapy - are making headway but need support. May 7, 2015 - by Karen Ocamb Late last March, California State Sen. Ricardo Lara announced he was introducing legislation sponsored by the Los Angeles LGBT Center and the national Survivors of International Abuse to regulate what is known as the "troubled teen" industry. The Center has launched a campaign to support the bill, which will be discussed at a public forum Thursday night, May 7, at The Village. This billion dollar industry preys on religious and frightened parents who are at their wits' end trying to disciple or help their out-of-control children. The "troubled teen" industry offers "tough love" in a "safe" Christian environment where the behavior of the wild ones will be tamed--when in fact the facilities (such as the one in the Dominican Republic pictured above) and employees are often ill-trained, cruel and out of reach of law enforcement or authorities. In an extensive, in-depth report on this institutionalized child abuse, I detailed how hundreds youth--many of them LGBT--have suffered extreme physical, emotion and psychological abuse and even died in these programs. The timing of Lara's bill and a forum sponsored by the survivors was fortuitous, coming just before an announcement by President Obama that he supports ending programs known as "reparative" therapy. Subsequently, both Rep. Adam Schiff and his California colleague, Rep. Ted Lieu, announced their intentions to introduce congressional legislation to regulate the industry and cut federal funding to healthcare professionals that practice so-called "reparative" therapy, which is now considered "junk science." "We cannot ignore reports that far too many young people have died and suffered abuse at the hands of those who run and work at residential treatment programs under the guise of providing critical therapy and rehabilitation services," Schiff said March 27. The timing is critical--not just to save lives of LGBT teens whose only "trouble" is that they do not think they need to be "repaired." But the push for so-called "conversion therapy" may wind up as a talking point in the 2016 presidential elections now that prospective Republican presidential candidate Florida Sen. Marco Rubio "headlined a closed-to-the-media fundraiser for the Center for Arizona Policy, the group that helped push the state's religious freedom bill later vetoed by former Gov. Jan Brewer," according to BuzzFeed. One of the group's main tenets is a belief in "conversion" therapy. The public forum tonight is part of the Center's ongoing series of provocative community forums, Big Queer Convo, and will focus on the Center and the Survivors of Institutional Abuse's (SIA) campaign to regulate the troubled-teen industry in California and nationally. The Center says the forum "will reveal what really happens to many LGBT and other youth who are sent to residential programs that claim to "treat" them, the long-term consequences for those who survive these programs, and how to support the new campaign to pass statewide and federal legislation to finally regulate the troubled-teen industry." On hand for the discussion will be SIA President Jodi Hobbs, Kate Logan, director of the excellent and horrifying documentary Kidnapped for Christ, survivor Rebecca Lopez, Dr. Meghan Moody, a psychologist who specializes in childhood trauma, and David Wernsman (pictured above), a survivor whose story is depicted in Kidnapped for Christ. Alan Acosta, the Center's Director of Strategic Initiatives, will serve as moderator. The forum will start at 7:00 and run until 9:30p at The Village at Ed Gould Plaza, 1125 N. McCadden Place, L.A. 90038. The forum is free but reservations are recommended: lgbtcenter.org/theatre or call 323-860-7300. Source: <https://www.frontiersmedia.com/frontiers-blog/2015/05/07/l-a-lgbt-center-holds-important-forum-on-troubled-teen-industry-tonight/>

Troubled Youth Center Closing, Agency In Charge Shutting Down May 13, 2015 4:54 AM Share on email 5 View Comments (Photo Credit: KDKA) Related Tags: Carrick, Christine D'Antonio, Circle C, Human Services, Jaymar Gilbert, Malik Crosby, Nicholas Grant, Pennsylvania Department of Human Services, Youth Home, Yusif Shepard Christine D'Antonio Christine D'Antonio joined the KDKA-TV news team as a general... Read More You've Earned Points for Reading! Claim points in our Reward Center, and earn more tomorrow. Claim Points CARRICK (KDKA)- The operating license for the Circle C Youth center in Carrick has been revoked. The state Department of Human Services revoked the license, pointing to a series of violations, including failure to report incidents, incomplete or inaccurate health and safety assessments and not identifying or arranging appropriate medical care for acute or chronic conditions of children. According to the Post-Gazette, the letter from human services department did not specifically refer to the Jan. 13 death of Nicholas Grant at the home on Carrick Avenue. The 16-year-old was beaten by two other teens living at the youth home. The report made it clear that Grant's death did play a significant role in revoking the home's license. Yusif Shepard, 15, and Malik Crosby, 16, have been charged with Grant's murder. Police say the teenagers used a vacuum cleaner to beat Grant and they also choked him. Both have been charged as adults. Another incident happened at the youth home back in May of 2014. Jaymar Gilbert, a 36-year-old counselor at the home, was charged with grabbing a teenager by the head and tossing him down a flight of stairs outside the home. In March, the family of several teenagers at the home sued Circle C, claiming that officials were negligent in their hiring of Gilbert. Hollie Geitner, a board member with Circle C, told the Post-Gazette that the Allegheny County Department of Human Services has decided not to renew its contract with Circle C. That contract expires on June 30. On May 6, the Circle C board voted to shut down the agency. According to Geitner, everything will be closed by the end of May. Circle C also runs group homes for juveniles in Bellevue and the North Side. Those homes will close as well. Source:

<http://pittsburgh.cbslocal.com/2015/05/13/troubled-youth-center-closing-agency-in-charge-shutting-down/>

Charter School "Flexibility" Linked to Major Failures; More Than $3.3 Billion in Taxes Spent Monday, 18 May 2015 00:00 By Jonas Persson, PR Watch | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 73 Email The fact that authorizers enjoy almost complete autonomy - not only from state regulations but also from public control through elected school boards - is a feature of the anti-regulatory environment in which charters have grown, rather than a bug. (Photo: Empty Classroom via Shutterstock; Edited: LW / TO) Also see Part I: Feds Spent \$3.3 Billion Fueling Charter Schools but No One Knows What It's Really Bought Also see Part II: Lack of Oversight of Charter Schools Designed as a Plus; More Than \$3.3 Billion Spent Arne Duncan is calling for a 48% increase in the US Department of Education's (ED) quarter-billion-dollar-a-year ($253.2 million) program designed to create, expand, and replicate charter schools - an initiative repeatedly criticized by the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) for suspected waste and inadequate financial controls. The Center for Media and Democracy (CMD) has issued a series of Freedom of Information Act requests for information about charter spending from ED as well as from states, and the findings shed new light on the deep flaws in the design, implementation and oversight of the federal program. For ED "Accountability" Means Very Little Real Accountability CMD's review of state applications for the federal charter schools program shows that, in some cases, states are rewarded precisely because they lack statutory authority to hold charter school and their authorizers accountable as these states tend to score high on one of the rubrics used to evaluate applications: "flexibility offered by state law." But grant applications are also judged based on the degree of "authorizer accountability" afforded by the state. How does this paradox play out in practice? One ED reader reviewing a 2010 application from Florida notes how schools and authorizers are held to the highest standards of accountability in the state: "[Florida] provides ample examples to illustrate its commitment to continuously improve upon its already strong processes and procedures to hold accountable their authorizing LEAs ... No weaknesses noted [Score] 20/20." Another reader joins in the chorus by remarking how the Florida Department of Education "has taken smart steps to oversee the authorizers in the state." Strikingly, a 2012 OIG audit exposed a total lack of oversight and accountability in Florida: None of the three SEAs we examined [Florida, Arizona and California] monitored the authorizing agencies responsible for granting charter school licenses and monitoring charter school progress ... without proper monitoring of authorizing agencies, SEAs have limited ability to ensure authorizers were approving and granting charters to quality charter schools and providing adequate monitoring to them after they opened. Florida could not even "provide a reliable universe of charter schools that received SEA grants nor an accurate list of charter schools that received onsite monitoring, desk audits, or closed during the grant cycle." To understand how states with no statutory oversight of charter schools and authorizers could receive the highest score on the rubric it might help to realize that the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) is a patchwork of conflicting provisions. The charter schools program was created as an amendment in 1994 with the purpose to incentivize states with charter school flexibility - that is, states where charters are exempt from democratic oversight and control. The "accountability" criterion was added in 2010 following Obama's reauthorization of ESEA, after which Secretary Arne Duncan pledged in a blueprint on school choice that charter schools receiving funding under the program would now be held to even higher standards of accountability than traditional public schools. But for all the rhetoric, CMD's review shows that this new safeguard, which is flatly at odds with the original purpose of the program, was never more than a rubber-stamp rubric. In fact, reader feedback on this section of the applications spans the gamut from the Orwellian (Florida) to the nonsensical. "To be an authorizer [in Minnesota] you must show capacity and commitment to quality chartering not chartering because it politically correct," one reviewer remarks, and scores the rubric 20/20. Lack of Oversight Is a Design Feature Rather Than a Bug The fact that authorizers enjoy almost complete autonomy - not only from state regulations but also from public control through elected school boards - is a feature of the anti-regulatory environment in which charters have grown, rather than a bug. For decades, a small group of millionaires and billionaires, like the Koch Brothers, have backed a legislative agenda to privatize public education in America. Lobbying groups funded by them, like the corporate bill mill ALEC (the "American Legislative Exchange Council"), have been pushing states to create and expand charter schools outside of the authority of the state public school agencies and local school boards, confining the state to limited oversight of whether authorizers have adequate policies, not over how charters spend tax dollars. This includes pushing bills to "stomp out local control", as stated by a member of ALEC's Education Task Force - where charter school lobbyists vote with lawmakers on bills. How? The keynote speaker to the California Charter Schools Association in 2014, Netflix CEO Reed Hastings elaborated: "[T]he fundamental problem with school districts ... is that they don't get to control their boards ... Now, if we go to the general public and say 'Here's an argument why you should get rid of school boards' of course no one is going to go for that. School boards have been an iconic part of America for 200 years. So what we have to do is to work with school districts to grow steadily. By waging a war of attrition, Hastings hoped that elected school boards would be eliminated within 20 years. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/30830-charter-school-flexibility-linked-to-major-failures-more-than-3-3-billion-in-taxes-spent>

Seattle Educators Set To Strike For The Schools Our Children Deserve: Video interview with Jesse Hagopian on the rolling strike wave in Washington State By I AM AN EDUCATOR on May 18, 2015 Educators are walking out of the public schools in Seattle on Tuesday, May 18th, joining a one day rolling strike wave of educators unions around the state, with a powerful message for the State Legislature: Fully fund education. These educators will be joined by many parents and students who are asking that the Washington State Legislature do what is not only right, but what is lawful. The Washington State Supreme Court has ruled that the State Legislature is in violation of state law and has mandated that they add billions of extra dollars to fund education. Moreover, Washington State voters have approved I-1351 which would reduce class size around the state, yet the legislature is preparing to ignore that law. To make matters worse, the Washington State Legislature is getting ready to take an 11% raise, even while educators have had their voter approved cost of living adjustment revoked for the past six years, and now only offer educators a 1.8% increase. The Real News Network covers the rolling strike wave across Washington State in this special segment: DHARNA NOOR, PRODUCER, TRNN: Welcome to The Real News Network. I'm Dharna Noor joining you from Baltimore. Thousands of public school teachers went on strikes across nine Washington State school districts on Wednesday. These single-day strikes are part of a protest against the new state budget proposal. The teachers, who are members of a union called the Washington Education Association, are demanding smaller class sizes, better compensation, and less testing. Teachers of other districts are set to strike this Friday. Joining us from Seattle to discuss these strikes is Jesse Hagopian. Jesse teaches history and is also the black student union advisor at Garfield High School, where teachers just voted to join the strike. Jesse is an associate editor of the acclaimed magazine Rethinking School. He's also a founding member of Social Equality Educators. He blogs at I'mAnEducator.com and is the editor of More than a Score: The New Uprising Against High-Stakes Testing. Source: <http://iamaneducator.com/2015/05/18/seattle-educators-set-to-strike-for-the-school-our-children-deserve-video-interview-with-jesse-hagopian-on-the-rolling-strike-wave-in-washington-state/>

Charter Schools Won't Solve Racial Injustice In Baltimore, Or Anywhere Else The disturbing death of Freddie Gray in Baltimore while in police custody, and the ensuing riots after news of his death spread, have continued to prompt countless analyses of the chronic problems in our nation's urban centers. My colleague Terrance Heath correctly assigns blame to a direct source: chronic abuse committed by police against people, especially black and brown people, taken into custody. A recent report from progressive news outlet Alternet reveals "nearly 2,600 detainees" from Baltimore police were turned away from the city's detention center in the past three years because they were too injured to be accepted. Jelani Cobb, writing for The New Yorker, expanded his analysis to historic cases - including a similar event in Ferguson, Missouri - and found, indeed, incidents of police brutality sparked "every major riot by the black community of an American city since the Second World War." Cobb correctly connects police violence against communities of color to "historical roots in segregation" that plague the country yet remain largely unaddressed as incident after incident persistently calls our attention to racial discrimination. Editors of The New York Times seem to agree, declaring, "Racism doomed Baltimore." However, this common sense analyses hasn't stopped others from spinning Baltimore, and other big metropolitan communities plagued with racial inequity, into an argument de jour for more charter schools. Will Charters "Save" The City? After riots broke out in Baltimore, prominent advocates for charter schools took to Twitter to contend their schools had the power to "save" the city. Editors at The Washington Post, in an editorial, "The schools Baltimore needs" declared, "Baltimore's tumult underscores the need to go back to the drawing board and come up with a plan that welcomes high-quality charter organizations." The editors contend "competitive pressure" charters impose on public schools "might help," and they criticize Maryland state lawmakers for being "so hostile to charter schools." Similarly, editors of The Wall Street Journal make the same illogical leap in their support for charter schools while criticizing anyone who stands in the way of expanding these institutions willy-nilly. While claiming that charter schools are "an escape for poor children," the editors rail against Maryland laws that give local authorities governance over new charter start-ups - a bizarre argument coming from a conservative news outlet for sure. First, let's be clear that what plagues public schools in Baltimore, and other big cities for that matter, is not lack of charter schools. The Equity Problem Writing at his personal blogsite, Rutgers University professor Bruce Baker explains that a long time ago Maryland isolated Baltimore as a segregated, high-poverty school district with inadequate funding and support. "Baltimore City really isn't provided sufficient resources to address its extreme needs," Baker argues, pointing to data indicating that, relative to the socio-economic conditions of students across the state, Maryland earns a grade "D" for the way it funds high-poverty schools like those in Baltimore. Maryland's new Republican governor Larry Hogan is likely making matters worse. As Politico points out, in its daily education newsletter, Baltimore's mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake has demanded the governor "release $68 million in funding for school districts" including hers. And the state's teachers' union has held events "urging Hogan to release the funding," which would send nearly $12 million to Baltimore's schools. A recent report on these events in The Baltimore Sun notes that advocates want some of the money targeted to turning more city schools into community schools, which provide health and social services to children of low-income families who often come to school with learning problems associated with poverty. Further, Baker points out that given the way funds are spread within the district of Baltimore, schools serving the highest percentages of the lowest-income children spend less on teacher salaries – a pretty good indicator that the city's high-poverty schools have lower ratios of certified teachers per student and higher percentages of novice (first two years) teachers. Charter schools in particular have high ratios of these novice teachers, "a staffing model," Baker argues, that "isn't likely sustainable in the long term, unless as a matter of policy, large shares of teachers are annually dismissed." Although charter schools advocates like to point to data indicating charters in Baltimore serve some of the city's neediest kids, these statistics are skewed in a really crafty way. As Baker points out in an older post, charter schools located in lower poverty zip codes in the district tend to enroll the lowest income kids. "But, in the higher poverty zip codes, charters tend to be serving lower poverty populations." See how that works? Get your poverty cred from serving the lowest income students in the part of town where families are generally better off, and then cream the best students in neighborhoods where families are really struggling. How clever. So Baltimore public schools are by no means an example of "throwing money at the problem" of racial inequity, and charter schools, rather than helping to solve racial inequity, may be adding to it. Public School Progress Also, rather than contributing to chronic poverty and racial injustice, Baltimore's public schools may be one of the city's few institutions that is creating some genuine progress. As Baker finds in his first blog post, "Baltimore has shown reasonable average gains, given expectations," on the most common measure of academic achievement, the National Assessment of Education Progress. "Although nearly all the pro-reform commentators insist Baltimore schools are failing, statistics suggest otherwise," Take Part's Joseph Williams points out. "According to the school district's website, 83 percent of pre-kindergarten students emerged ready to learn, state standardized assessment reading test scores jumped nearly 20 percent from 2004 to 2013, and math scores climbed more than 25 percent during that same time frame." In the wake of the turmoil in Baltimore, the city's public schools are promoting some genuine understanding and community healing. According to a report in Education Week, school leaders have declared their intentions to conduct "classroom activities and events to help students process what happened." How is that effort helped by adding to the divisiveness that has become one of the primary features of charter school expansions? Further, there are some indicators that new efforts to change from zero tolerance discipline policies to more positive restorative justice practices may be taking hold in Baltimore, which would reduce student suspensions and expulsions and de-escalate tensions that lead to school and community violence and end the city's school to prison pipeline. Instead Of More Charters Instead of adding to the numbers of charter schools in Baltimore, Maryland state lawmakers made the right decision by putting the brakes on Governor Hogan's plan to expand these schools for what amounts to ideological reasons. State lawmakers, rather than ignoring the plight of poor kids as they are accused of doing by newspaper editors, are likely paying attention to recent revelations that charter schools expel students at a higher rate than traditional schools and are plagued by millions of dollars in waste, fraud, and abuse nationwide. The federal government has spent billions on charter schools with virtually no accountability. Where there are cases of charter schools out-performing public schools on standardized tests, there doesn't seem to be anything especially innovative about these schools to indicate they've found new approaches that need to be rapidly expanded throughout a school system like Baltimore's. Rather than calling for unproven gimmicks like charter schools, advocates for racial equity and social justice would do more for their cause by urging government and policy leaders to actually address these problems directly. In communities like Baltimore, what's more likely to advance real progress are new policies that take real steps to end racial discrimination in law enforcement, alleviate the chronic underfunding of high-poverty schools, promote racial integration in housing and education, and transform punitive education policies to practices that advance understanding, cooperation, and respect. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/charter-schools-wont-solve-racial-injustice-in-baltimore-or-anywhere-else/>

Congress to Consider Scaling Down Group Homes for Troubled Children At a hearing in Washington, a renewed call for addressing the violence and neglect that plagues group homes for foster youth. by Joquin Sapien ProPublica, May 20, 2015, 12:47 p.m. 5 Comments Print Print This is part of an ongoing investigation: Level 14 How a home for troubled children came undone and what it means for California's chance at reform. Spur Reform in 2015 Support ProPublica's mission to expose abuses of power and corruption. Donate Latest Stories in this Project Investigations of California Group Homes Marked By Delays and Uncertainty Podcast: Reporting the How and Why After a Disaster Level 14 Investigative Journalism, Illustrated: A Q&A With Level 14 Creators How We Reported 'Level 14' Sen. Ron Wyden talks with Sen. Orrin Hatch, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, in April. Hatch proposed shutting down group homes and Wyden circulated draft legislation that aimed to prevent children from entering foster care. (Tom Williams/CQ Roll Call) When 17-year-old Lexie Grüber first entered the Allison Gill Lodge group home for girls in Manchester, Connecticut, she said it felt less like a home than a business. Instead of family photos, the walls were covered in informational posters and licensing certificates. When her emotions got the better of her, she said, the only conversations she had were with a doctor with a prescription pad at the ready. Now 22 and a recent college graduate, Grüber came before the Senate Finance Committee this week to testify about the experience. She recalled being medicated to the point that she developed a facial tic. She said she lost basic privileges like phone calls and television time for what she now considers normal teenage behavior. "Often, the group home residents were treated like second-class human beings," she said in her testimony. "I could not understand why I had to act perfectly just to have the basic social privileges of a child. Why was I being penalized for having been removed from an abusive home?" Grüber was one of roughly 57,000 children who live in group homes for foster youth across the country. Many child advocates believe that's far too many. The Senate Finance Committee, which authorizes roughly $12 billion a year for child welfare programs, held this week's hearing to examine alternatives. The homes are supposed to offer intensive care for the nation's most troubled youth. But the homes have come under fire in recent years – as a failed model of care, and as places vulnerable to violence and sexual predation. Earlier this year, a ProPublica examination showed how one of California's largest group homes descended into chaos – an unraveling that took place with the full knowledge of the home's staff, state regulators and the local police. Children disappeared for days at a time and began living in local parks. They became involved in fights, sexual assaults and drug abuse. Reports of neglect and abuse poured into the Department of Social Services, which oversees group homes in California, but the department did not aggressively act against the home until an 11-year-old girl from the facility was allegedly raped by two older boys from the home. ProPublica also found that the Department agency failed to reach any conclusion in investigating hundreds of allegations of abuse at similar homes throughout the state. As well, the Chicago Tribune last year published a scathing series of stories on group homes in Illinois, finding that children had repeatedly been sent to facilities that were rife with abuse and that had become known recruiting grounds for pimps. "Group homes, sometimes referred to as 'congregate care,' are literally breeding grounds for the sexual exploitation of children and youth," Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said in a statement Tuesday. "As the committee heard during a hearing on domestic sex trafficking and of children and youth in foster care, traffickers know where these group homes are and target the children placed in them for prostitution." Hatch has proposed a simple solution to longstanding problems in group homes: begin shutting them down. In 2013, Hatch introduced legislation that would have cut off funding for children under age 13 living in group homes for longer than 15 days. The bill also sought to end funding for children over 13 after they had spent a year in such a facility. The bill didn't pass, but child welfare experts expect him to introduce a similar version of it at some point after this week's hearing. "Here's how I look at it: No one would support allowing states to use federal taxpayer dollars to buy cigarettes for foster youth," said Hatch in his statement on the hearing. "In my view, continuing to use these scarce taxpayer dollars to fund long-term placements in group homes is ultimately just as destructive." Earlier this month, Sen. Ron Wyden, the ranking Democratic member of the committee, circulated draft legislation that aimed to prevent children from entering foster care by better funding, training, and supporting biological parents and relatives of at-risk children. Both bills echo recommendations in a report released yesterday by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, one of the nation's largest child welfare organizations. The report encourages state agencies to place children with relatives as opposed to foster families or group homes, only using group homes as a last resort for children who need intensive mental health care. "There is tremendous momentum and truly bipartisan support for this right now, so hopefully we're at a real turning point," said Rob Geen, director of policy reform and advocacy for the Casey Foundation. "There are far too many children being separated from their families and being placed in what is available instead of what is best for them. Now we have an agreement that there is a problem and a growing consensus on how to fix it." According to the report, 40 percent of children living in group homes don't have a diagnosis that warrants such a placement. The report suggests that children are often sent to the homes because there is nowhere else for them to go. President Obama's 2016 budget proposal aims to address that need. There is a $78 million dollar line item in it that would go toward specialized training for foster parents who agree to care for mentally ill children. Joo Yeun Chang, a representative for the Department of Health of Human services who handles child issues, described the budget draft in her written testimony for the Senate hearing yesterday. In addition to foster parent training, the proposal would also require periodic mental health assessments for children living in group homes and smaller caseloads for social workers. Chang estimates that the proposal would save $69 million in foster care dollars over the next 10 years. "The Administration believes that children are best served when raised in safe, loving families, and congregate care use should be limited to children who need intensive residential care due to medical issues, and only for as long as those interventions are needed," Chang said at the hearing. Child welfare policy over the decades has regularly swung back and forth between efforts to keep troubled or vulnerable children in their homes and aggressively seeking to remove them at the first evidence of risk. The Miami Herald, over the same months that the Chicago Tribune series of articles was running, published a devastating investigation of how Florida's push to keep families intact had led to the deaths of scores of children. Grüber, the former foster child who testified at the hearing, said she certainly would have preferred staying with a family member as opposed to living in a group home for two years. In an interview, she told ProPublica that when she was first removed from her biological parents' home at age 15, she was placed with her uncle and his three sons in a three-bedroom home. She wanted to stay there. But she said that the Connecticut Department of Children and Families moved her to a homeless shelter and then into a foster home based on a technicality: that there weren't enough bedrooms for all the children living in her uncle's home. "If I had stayed with my uncle, I would've had more stability. It would've been so much better to feel more involved with my family. My uncle is very involved in the church. He's really strict, but I think that would've been helpful to me. I needed that structure," Grüber said. Kari Sisson, executive director for the American Association of Children's Residential Centers, told ProPublica that Australia closed its residential programs in the 1990s because foster care was cheaper. In time, she said, foster parents got overwhelmed and quit. Many youngsters ended up homeless or in jail. And Australia had to reopen the homes with more intensive therapeutic services in the mid-2000s. "The conversation is fair, but it's not informed," she said. "I worry that they are making decisions that will seriously affect children who need therapeutic residential treatment. I've been a foster parent for many years and there are a lot of kids in the system that can't live in my house, because it's not safe for us and it's not safe for the community. They need a lot more intensive care than a foster parent can offer. It's very challenging." Sisson was not called to testify. Source: <http://www.propublica.org/article/congress-to-consider-scaling-down-group-homes-for-troubled-children>

Report: Thousands of Arizona children living in group homes Share Story Tweet Share Share Share Print By Mac & Gaydos, | May 19, 2015 @ 5:08 pm Listen: 17,000 Arizona Children Removed - Dana Wolfe Naimark - President / CEO of the Children's Action Alliance Mac and Gaydos talk with Dana Wolfe Naimark, the President/CEO of the Children's Action Alliance, to try to find out why 17,000 kids have been removed from their homes and what to do about it. 00:00 08:09 Pop Up In Player | Download\(Right Click + Save As\) Update Required To play the media you will need to either update your browser to a recent version or update your Flash plugin. In this Thursday, April 24, 2014 photo, Jose Osario, 20, a resident of the transition cottage, sits in the living room of another cottage at the Children's Village campus in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y. (AP Photo/Seth Wenig) With Arizona children getting removed from their homes at record-high numbers, officials have attempted to identify a cause for the removals. A recent policy report from Kids Count found that out of the 17,000 children removed from their homes, about 2,100 of them are placed in congregate care settings. These settings include emergency shelters and group homes, which cost the state approximately $123 per child, per day. Licensed foster family housing costs around $23 per day. Dana Wolfe Naimark, president and CEO of the Children's Action Alliance, spoke with KTAR News 92.3 FM's Mac and Gaydos about the reasons children are being taken from their homes. "One (reason) is that families are struggling here in Arizona," she said. "Even though the Great Recession is technically over, many families are struggling and still facing unemployment or underemployment. Families have a lot of overwhelming stress and sometimes that stress makes them unable to take good care of their children." Naimark said although the number of Arizona children removed from their homes is bigger than ever, the state is an outlier compared to the rest of the country. "In other states they are reducing the number of children and care," she said. "They are spending time and energy on helping children stay home safely with their parents instead of being removed into foster care." More children are being placed into congregate care settings due to a shortage of foster families, Naimark said. "We have a shortage of foster families, but the shortage is not because we've lost the number of foster families," she said. "It's because the number of children we've taken out of their homes has grown. The demand of foster care has outstripped the supply." Arizona made a commitment to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, promising to reduce the number of children in congregate care settings last year in order to qualify for a greater amount of flexibility in federal fund use. The Arizona Department of Child Safety pledged to develop service reforms to prevent placement into these services, place children in less restrictive forms of care and reunite families. DCS must prevent specific strategies within the next month. One former foster child, Desaray, whose last name was withheld, said living with her relatives after being removed from her mother's care allowed her to experience a continued sense of encouragement and support. "I feel fortunate to have grown up in a family setting," she said in an interview with the Children's Action Alliance. "I know people who lived in group homes, and they didn't have the same support system that I continue to have. Their care ended when they turned 18, but I continue to have encouragement and guidance from my family." Desaray, a member of the Fostering Advocates Arizona Young Adult Leadership Board, said being able to grow up beside her siblings granted her the ability to establish a close bond with them. "Those bonds I have with my siblings are among the strongest in my life," she said. "I know that if I had ended up in a group home without them, I would have missed out on the relationships that helped me be successful." In order to reduce the number of children being placed into congregate care settings, Naimark said there needs to be changes with state funding and leadership. "It comes down to money and leadership and you need both combined," she said. "You certainly need money into the system to provide families with services in their home, but it also takes leadership to make that a priority." Source: <http://ktar.com/95/1835425/Report-Thousands-of-Arizona-children-living-in-group-homes>

Report warns about effects of group homes on W.Va. kids By Samuel Speciale, Capitol reporter West Virginia's child welfare system places more kids in group homes than most states, a practice a national report released Wednesday says has left more than 1,000 children without immediate attention from an extended or foster family. That report, compiled by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, suggests the absence of family in such placements is harmful to a child's development and hinders them from forming strong, nurturing attachments. Children who don't grow up with families are at a greater risk of experiencing trouble in school and having run-ins with the law later in life. Of the 4,403 children in the care of West Virginia's child welfare system, 27 percent have been placed in residential group settings, putting the state in a tie with Wyoming for the third highest percentage of children in group homes in the country. About 57,000 out of 400,000 American children in the custody of their respective states live in group homes, the report says. "Far too many West Virginia children under the care of our child welfare system are missing the support of a family because they are being unnecessarily placed in long-term, residential care," said Margie Hale, executive director of West Virginia KIDS COUNT, a subsidiary of the Annie E. Casey Foundation that aggregates state-level data on child and family well-being. Hale went on to say that group placements are taxing on both children and the state. Placing a child in a group home costs seven to 10 times more than sending them to a relative or foster family, the report says. "These group placements exact too high a price," Hale said. "As a state, our top policy priorities should be keeping kids connected to family or kin and strengthening the foster care system so that foster parents are available to nurture and protect children until they can live with a permanent family." In recent years, state officials have made efforts to reduce the high number of children in group homes as well as reduce state reliance on residential care through a program called Safe at Home West Virginia. In a statement responding to the KIDS COUNT report, West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources Cabinet Secretary Karen Bowling said the program, when it launches in October, will serve adolescents in 11 counties. The long-term goal is to go statewide within two years, she said. "The department's goals with the Safe at Home project are to ensure youth remain in their home communities whenever safely possible," she said, adding that the program will seek to reunite children with their families. Bowling went on to say the program will provide services to children, family members and caregivers and that the department's Bureau for Children and Families is working to recruit more foster and adoptive parents through awareness events, social media and advertisements. While some states are attempting to reduce the number of children placed in group homes, efforts vary widely between states and often are not consistent within a state, the report says. The report goes on to say that one in seven children live in group homes, even though federal law requires they live with families whenever possible, and that many who do have no documented behavioral or medical need that warrants such placement. The rate of children living in group placement around the country range from as low as 4 percent in Oregon to as high as 35 percent in Colorado. Contact writer Samuel Speciale at sam.speciale@dailywv.com or 304-348-4886. Follow him at www.twitter.com/samuelspeciale. Source: <http://www.charlestondailywv.com/article/20150519/DM01/150519173/1298>

Hamblen County group home owner accused of abusing patients Updated: Wed 6:04 AM, May 20, 2015 Home / Headlines List / Article MORRISTOWN, Tenn. (WVLT) - The owner of a group home in Hamblen County has been charged with abuse after an investigation by the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation's Medicaid Fraud Control Unit. The TBI says Rebecca Ann Rogers, 44, say from September 2, 2014 to September 7, 2014, two patients at her home became ill and were taken to a local emergency room. The investigation showed that both patients had controlled substances in their system that had not been prescribed to either of them. On Monday, the Hamblen County Grand Jury returned indictments charging Rogers with two counts of intentional abuse, neglect or exploitation of a dependent adult and two counts of Delivery of a Controlled Substance. On Tuesday, Rogers was booked into the Hamblen County Correction Center, where she is being held on a $20,000 bond. Source: <http://www.local8now.com/home/headlines/Hamblen-County-group-home-owner-accused-of-abusing-patients-304347661.html>

Ohio coroner: Disabled boy's death in foster care accidental Associated Press Share on emailShare on facebook Share on facebookShare on twitterShare on twitterMore Sharing Services Published: May 19, 2015 - 04:54 PM Ohio coroner: Disabled boy's death in foster care accidental May 19, 2015 08:54 PM CLEVELAND: An Ohio medical examiner says the death of a 10-year-old disabled boy at a foster home in January was an accident. A spokesman says the Cuyahoga County medical examiner has ruled that Xavier Brothers-Bartholomew died of positional asphyxiation on Jan. 4 at a home in Cleveland. The boy, who had a genetic disorder that left him physically and mentally impaired, was found in full cardiac arrest. Xavier and his five siblings were sent to foster homes in November 2012 after their 18-month-old brother, Isaac, was found dead in his crib at the family's home near Vermilion, west of Cleveland. Authorities say Isaac died of malnourishment and that his siblings were neglected. The children's parents and their paternal grandmother pleaded guilty to child endangering charges and were sentenced to prison. Source: <http://www.ohio.com/news/break-news/ohio-coroner-disabled-boy-s-death-in-foster-care-accidental-1.593206>

Marion Police Investigating Death of Foster Care Infant Tools 0 Comments Email this article Dig Print this article By Matthew Searcy By Jared Roberts Story Created: May 20, 2015 at 5:52 PM CDT Story Updated: May 21, 2015 at 9:01 AM CDT Related Content Death of 10-Month-Old Under Investigation MARION -- Marion Police have launched an investigation into the death of a 10-month-old girl, who died Wednesday morning. Foster parents had cared for the girl since birth, and the cause of her death remains undetermined. At the same time, her biological parents have begun speaking out about the tragedy. "You (DCFS) took her from good parents and turned around and gave her to somebody," said biological mother Katrina Hill. "Now she's dead!" Katrina Hill cries outside the Cairo DCFS office, just hours after she learned from case workers, her youngest child died in foster care. "All they (DCFS) can tell me is that they found her unresponsive, that's it," asked Hill. "I don't get to see my daughter, I don't get to hold my daughter!" The girl's father, Issac Hill says, since he lost custody DCFS has documented incidents of child abuse against his children at the hands of foster parents. "This ain't the first time," said Issac Hill. "This resulted in the death of my daughter. And three times my kids have been abused. Three times!" Marion Police and DCFS investigators have launched an investigation into how the child died. Marion Investigators call the cause of death "undetermined", while DCFS says it has put a task force on the case Issac Hill says he wants to see his daughter before doctors complete an autopsy. "Everybody in this country has the right to identify their dead relative," said Issac Hill. "These foster parents are put above the biological parents. They have more rights. Right now these people know more about what happened to our daughter than we do." Katrina and other family members say they want their children back. They don't want harm to come to another child. "Don't tell me she (Katrina) ain't a good mother," said relative Annette Welch. "Her kids were alive when they were with her. I know that much!" "I have nine other children besides my dead baby," said Katrina. "I want my children home before they end up dead with these foster parents!" The Williamson County coroner has scheduled an autopsy for tomorrow. Source: <http://www.wsilv.com/home/top-story/Marion-Police-Investigation-Death-of-Foster-Care-Infant--304491291.html>

Report: Too many foster kids institutionalized Adam Rodewald, Press-Gazette Media 7:05 p.m. CDT May 22, 2015 Brown County stands out as a bright point in an otherwise dismal report released this week on the state of the nation's foster care system. (Photo: File/Press-Gazette Media) 59 CONNECT 1 TWEET 11 LINKEDIN 1 COMMENT EMAIL MORE Brown County stands out as a bright point in an otherwise dismal report released this week on the state of the nation's foster care system. The study published Tuesday by the Annie E. Casey Foundation says the system puts too many foster youths into group homes and institutions when they should, and could, live with a family. Nearly 1 in 8 Wisconsin foster kids lived in a group setting in 2013, according to the report. Nationwide, about 1 in 7 lived in a group setting. The problem is many of those kids shouldn't be there. The foundation estimates 40 percent of foster youths in a group home or institution have no mental health diagnosis, disability or behavioral problem that might warrant such a setting. By contrast, Brown County, one of the state's most populated areas, placed only 4 percent of foster kids in those settings, according to data from the state Department of Children and Families. County foster care staff couldn't be reached for comment. In the past, they've touted the region's abundance of resources as a boon for children. There are more than 80 licensed foster homes in Brown County. Research shows children raised in family settings have healthier physical, social, emotional and psychological development in life. On the other hand, youth who do not grow up in families are at greater risk of being abused in group placements and of being arrested, according to the Annie E. Casey report. The report also notes that group placements can cost seven to 10 times as much as a family placement. "Most of us live in family settings most of our lives where we're learning what it means to be a family member and a member of society. If you're removed from that and are in some sort of institution, it's just not as good for you," said Ken Taylor, executive director of the Wisconsin Council on Children and Families. Taylor said he's concerned about the wide variation in placements from county to county in Wisconsin. The rate of group-home placements across the state ranges from zero in Kewaunee County to 38 percent in Sawyer County. He said he sees the greatest opportunity for improvement as giving financial support and training for relatives of children removed from their homes who are willing to become the caregivers. Taylor said Wisconsin also needs to strengthen its preventive programs to support families. He said services focus heavily on families after their children are removed from the home, but there isn't support for struggling families. Several Brown County agencies have partnered to bolster those preventive programs. One initiative connects families to support services if they are reported for possible abuse and neglect but the incident doesn't rise to the level of a government intervention. Another initiative, called Parent Cafes, provides a support network for moms and dads. —arodewald@pressgazette.com and follow him on Twitter @AdamGRodewald and on Facebook at Facebook.com/AdamGRodewald. Source: <http://www.greenbaypressgazette.com/story/news/local/2015/05/22/report-many-foster-kids-institutionalized/27814987/>

Salem group home closing after break-ins lead to questions about management Published May 22, 2015 7:43PM Updated May 23, 2015 2:07PM By Jessica Hopper 4 1 1 Salem — The group home on Witch Meadow Road, which was a source of controversy following neighborhood break-ins by a resident earlier this month, will be closed. The three remaining residents will be relocated and the house will be sold. In a release sent out Thursday evening, First Selectman Kevin Lyden said the remaining residents will be relocated within the next 60 days. He said the "isolated and unfortunate incident" at the Witch Meadow group home, operated by Key Human Services, will not affect the other group home currently in town or any group homes that may come to Salem in the future. At a special town meeting called last week to address neighbors' concerns, Lyden and residents of the Witch Meadow neighborhood said it was mismanagement that allowed for the break-ins on May 2 and another similar incident in December. Representatives from Key Human Services could not be reached for comment. Lyden said that, while he had not requested the group home be closed entirely, he is pleased Key took action. "I think they decided it was best just to close and relocate to another place and I don't disagree. It is more than I asked for, but that's their choice," Lyden said. He called the closure bittersweet, saying that neither he nor the Witch Meadow neighbors wanted to displace the remaining residents of the group home, but the move has provided peace of mind to the neighbors whose homes were broken in to. Lyden quoted an email from a neighbor, saying "I'm grateful Key decided this is the best thing for the community and (that they are) following through with it, but it's unfortunate their gross failures make it necessary." j.hopper@theday.com Twitter: @JessHoppa: undefined Source: <http://www.theday.com/local/20150522/salem-group-home-closing-after-break-ins-lead-to-questions-about-management>

Sexual assault allegation in province's foster care system CTV Saskatoon: Foster care neglect allegation Child care workers in Sturgeon Lake say a child was sexually assaulted in foster care in 2010 17 6 21 CTV Saskatoon Published Thursday, May 21, 2015 6:40PM CST Last Updated Thursday, May 21, 2015 6:54PM CST More allegations have surfaced about the neglect of children in foster care. Child care workers in Sturgeon Lake said a child was sexually assaulted while in the care of the province in 2010. "Our First Nation has lost two young children who were in the care of the province within six months of each other. A third child was sexually assaulted by (another) child in care during the same interval," Eleanor Brazeau, executive director of Sturgeon Lake's Child and Family Services, said. Related Stories Sask. children's advocate says foster care plagued by systemic problems Photos Eleanor Brazeau and Shirley Bighead of Sturgeon Lake Child and Family Services The allegations come a day after the Ministry of Social Services apologized following the 2010 death of 22-month-old Evander Lee Daniels, also from Sturgeon Lake. The community's child and family services organization said the system failed another child from Sturgeon Lake in 2010. The organization said it found out about the sexual assault in September, but the incident happened in 2010. "It's going to be coming up and it's another tragedy for our community," the organization's board of director's chair Shirley Bighead said. The Ministry of Social Services wouldn't confirm or deny that a child from the community was sexually assaulted. But, a spokesperson told CTV News, if a child was injured there would be a comprehensive review. Sturgeon Lake's Child and Family Services would likely be involved. "If you're not performing your job and if you're missing and making big mistakes, and children are dying in care, it just doesn't add up," Brazeau said. "Someone's got to be held accountable." A report released earlier this week revealed gaps between what social services says it will do and what actually happens. The ministry said its policies weren't being followed in 2010 when Daniels ended up in an overcrowded foster home. That's where he was burned and drowned in a bathtub after being left unattended by his foster mother. She was acquitted of a charge related to his death. The ministry said it's added 93 new case workers since Daniel's death and said fewer children are in need of foster care. Source: <http://saskatoon.ctvnews.ca/sexual-assault-allegation-in-province-s-foster-care-system-1.2385206>

Carrick group home shuts down months after teen resident beaten to death —A group home for children that was the scene of a deadly beating early this year has now shut down permanently, and the other homes run by the same organization will close soon. Related Pittsburgh bike-share program to debut Sunday morning Former Pittsburgh Police Chief Nate Harper out of prison Kenny Chesney concert guide: Everything you need to know Norris' grand slam lifts Padres to win vs Pirates Woman dies, kids flown to hospital after school van crash Circle C Youth and Family Services board member Hollie Geitner said Tuesday that the organization will essentially shut down at the end of the month after 47 years of operation. The organization's group home in Carrick was temporarily closed after 16-year-old resident Nicholas Grant was beaten and later died in a fight with other residents in January. The other teens allegedly involved, 16-year-old Malik Crosby and 15-year-old Yusuf Shepard, have been charged with homicide. In 2014, an employee at the Carrick home was accused of pushing a resident down stairs. In an email, Circle C's executive director Rich Knouff, said the group was forced to shut down. "Circle C operates three other group homes in addition to the Carrick house, and Geitner said all are expected to be closed soon. Source: <http://www.wtae.com/news/group-home-shuts-down-months-after-teen-resident-beaten-to-death/32990456>

Meriden group home counselor charged with assaulting intellectually disabled client Published: May 13, 2015 | Last Modified: May 13, 2015 09:36PM By Andrew Ragali Record-Journal staff MERIDEN — A counselor at a group home has been charged with assaulting a disabled client. Victor Forbes, 57, of New Haven, turned himself in on May 9. He is charged with third-degree assault of an intellectually disabled person, a misdemeanor. He posted $10,000 bond and is due to appear in Meriden Superior Court on May 22. The charge stems from a reported incident on Jan. 9 at Continuum of Care, 480 S. Colony St., a provider that serves clients through the state Department of Developmental Services. On Jan. 12, a man accompanied by a Continuum staff member reported that he had been assaulted by Forbes, said police spokesman Lt. Sal Nesci. The man told police he suffers from an intellectual disability and had been assaulted three days earlier but hadn't reported it because he feared no one would believe him. Nesci said the man who filed the complaint had been listening to music on another counselor's smart phone the morning of the assault. Every so often, the screen would freeze and require a password. So the man went to the kitchen to look for the counselor who provided him with the phone so that he could enter the password and continue listening to music. The man went to the kitchen and asked Forbes where the counselor was, Nesci said. According to a police investigation, a verbal altercation ensued. "At some point (Forbes) engaged the client by pushing him up against the wall, actually indenting the wall before punching him on the right side of face," Nesci said. The altercation was broken up by another counselor. Police obtained photos of the indented wall and bruises on the man's face, according to the arrest warrant. The counselor who broke up the fight told police he was shoveling snow outside when he heard an argument inside. He found Forbes and the client yelling at each other. After breaking up the altercation, the counselor went back outside, and a short time later heard another altercation. He went inside and witnessed Forbes pinning the client against the wall and punching him in the face, the arrest warrant states. Representatives from Continuum of Care couldn't immediately be reached for comment. Forbes' employment status with the group home is unclear. Joan Barnish, spokesman for the state Department of Developmental Services, said Forbes was an employee of Continuum of Care. Source: <http://www.myrecordjournal.com/meriden/meridennews/7263641-129/meriden-group-home-counselor-charged-with-assaulting-intellectually-disabled-client.html>

Hatch to Hold Finance Hearing on Foster Care Group Homes on 12 May 2015. Posted in Featured Articles Senate Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) will convene a hearing on Tuesday, May 19, to examine the problems facing foster children in group homes and how Congress can work to achieve better outcomes. The hearing, titled "No Place to Grow Up: How to Safely Reduce Reliance on Foster Care Group Homes," will take place at 10:00 a.m. in Room 215 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. "Children who experience long term placements in foster care group homes face high rates of incarceration, homelessness and other negative outcomes. What's more, these group homes are three to five times more expensive to taxpayers than family-based placements. It's clear there needs to be change, and this hearing will allow members to hear about the need to reduce the reliance on foster care group home and learn about effective strategies that can connect vulnerable children and youth with a permanent, loving family," Hatch said. Source: <http://utahpolicv.com/index.php/features/featured-articles/5641-hatch-to-hold-finance-hearing-on-foster-care-group-homes>

Former Tunkhannock Teacher Sent to Prison 5 05/13/2015 05:40 PM 05/13/2015 06:59 PM Former Tunkhannock Teacher Sent to Prison By Associated Press 05/13/2015 06:59 PM Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on email Share on print Share on gmail Share on pinterest Share on favorites Share on reddit More Sharing Services A former Wyoming County teacher is going to prison for sending inappropriate text messages to a female student. A former teacher from Tunkhannock Area High School is going to prison. Michael Chase was sentenced Wednesday in Wyoming County for sending inappropriate text messages to a female student. Chase will spend between one month and 18 months behind bars. He pleaded guilty to one count of corruption of minors. He could have spent up to five years in prison. The former Tunkhannock Area High School history teacher and drama coach admitted crossing the line with text messages he sent to a teenage girl. "He was talking to them about sex, showing them videos, things of that nature," Wyoming County District Attorney Jeff Mitchell said. "It was just completely inappropriate. Teachers, of course, are professionals and they're held to a higher standard especially in a school setting." Stacy Altenhain has two kids who went to Tunkhannock Area High School. Her son just graduated and had Chase as a teacher. "He's like wow, that's just surprising. I wouldn't have thought he would have done that," Altenhain said. Besides inappropriate texts, investigators say Chase also gave the girl money to buy a phone card so her parents wouldn't know they were talking and also gave her money to buy the morning-after birth control pill. "Kids look at you as their role model and parents send their kids to school thinking they're safe and so he was wrong," Altenhain said. "He should be professional enough to know not to do that. That is somebody's child!" parent Shana Worsham of Meshoppen said. District Attorney Jeff Mitchell hopes the prison sentence handed down will send a message but also not paint all teachers with a broad brush. "Most teachers do an excellent job. They're great people. This is an exception but I believe that he got the message," Mitchell said. As part of his plea, the Wyoming County District Attorney says when Chase is released from prison he will no longer be able to be a teacher. Source: http://www.pahomepage.com/story/d/story/former-tunkhannock-teacher-sent-to-prison/19249/8p-sOhAW_0ys3ibgeViCWw

Human Rights Youth Awards honor students for public service Andy Davis, aldavis@press-citizen.com 9:53 p.m. CDT May 13, 2015 Buy Photo Joey Trom is honored during the Iowa City Human Rights Commission's Youth Awards at the Englert Theatre on Wednesday. (Photo: David Scrivner / Iowa City Press-Citizen) Buy Photo 50 CONNECT 6 TWEETLINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE The Englert Theatre was filled with applause and appreciation Wednesday night for the work and community service of local high school students. Thirty-two students from City High, West High and Regina High were recognized by the Human Rights Commission for their volunteerism and received Human Rights Commission Youth Awards during the 12th annual ceremony. After comments from members of the Human Rights Commission and Iowa City Mayor Matt Hayek, the awards were presented by Shams Ghoneim, vice president of the American Civil Liberties Union of Iowa board of directors. "We the commission are very pleased to have so many of you being recognized tonight," said commissioner Harry Olmstead. "We're here to recognize the annual contributions of youth in this community and your acts of goodwill, and to encourage humanitarian actions regardless of age." Iowa City Human Rights Coordinator Stefanie Bowers said the awards were started in 2003 as a way to recognize young people who make an impact on human rights in the community. "These awards are not only to recognize the students, but to also encourage them to continue making human rights contributions toward the community," Bowers said. Among the recipients was 16-year-old West High junior Joey Trom. Trom said last year, as part of earning his Eagle Scout merit, he reached out to the Arc of Southeast Iowa — which serves children and adults with intellectual and developmental disabilities — to lend a hand in creating a recycled tire dragon for an accessible park at the Arc's facility at 2620 Muscatine Ave. Trom said he was inspired to help with the project so his older brother, Jackson, could enjoy the park. "I helped build the dragon because my brother has special needs and we spend a lot of time at the Arc," Trom said. "I wanted to help build something he and the other people there can enjoy. This award ceremony shows that youth here are involved in community service and know there's a need for help." Buy Photo Emma Hartwig shakes hands with Mayor Matt Hayek as she and fellow Regina classmates are honored during the Iowa City Human Rights Commission's Youth Awards at the Englert Theatre on Wednesday. (Photo: David Scrivner / Iowa City Press-Citizen) Emma Hartwig, 17, a Regina High senior, said she spends her time volunteering at Mercy Hospital, a YMCA summer camp and also does fundraising for the University of Iowa Operation Smile, a chapter of the international organization that helps to fund cleft lip and cleft palate surgeries around the world. "This is a great way to show other people our age that it's very important to give back to the community. I am blessed enough to be able to share my time with those who really need it," Hartwig said. The commission also honored Henri Harper, executive director of KoNec, with the Youth Ally Award during the ceremony. Bowers said the commission created the award in 2012 to recognize an adult in the community who consistently works to inspire young people to become involved in community service. KoNec is an organization that helps seventh- to 12th-grade students select and stay involved in extracurricular activities and after-school programs around the city. It also works to keep parents involved and accountable for their children's success. Harper said this is one of the most meaningful awards he has received. "This nomination actually came from a student that went through the program years ago and is doing very well," Harper said. "She wrote in the nomination for me this year, so this award in itself is probably one of the most rewarding ones I've had because it came from a young person that I worked with in 2007 and 2008." Buy Photo Mayor Matt Hayek speaks to guests at the Iowa City Human Rights Commission Youth Awards at the Englert Theatre on Wednesday. (Photo: David Scrivner / Iowa City Press-Citizen) Hayek reminded the students during his comments to continue their work and consider the opportunities volunteerism offers. "You're here because you have given of yourselves and you have engaged in an act of service in this community," Hayek said. "There is so much need for this kind of service in this community and the state, across the country and around the world. You don't have to look far to see that need, and there's always something you can do, no matter what age you are." Reach Andy Davis at 319-887-5404 or at aldavis@press-citizen.com, and follow him on Twitter as @BylineAndyDavis. 12th annual Human Rights Youth Awards recipients Molly Arndt Cora Bern-Klug Akash Borde Laura Cornell Daniel Dagle Aaron Demory Abby Dickson Anoushka Divekar Sonali Durham Emma Hartwig Grant Hogan Emily Hollingworth Lauren Hudachek Badra Kalil Molly Kuehn Riley Lewers Molly Lipman Kathryn Lorenger Maggie Morony Thomas Nepola Max Otoadese Willem Paul Sarah Rinehart Anna Schuchert Haley Steffen Nathan Stenger B.J. Sullivan Gabby Thomsen Joey Trom Anna Utech Morgan Welter Ken Westrick Youth Ally Award recipient Henri Harper, executive director of KoNec Source: <http://www.press-citizen.com/story/news/local/2015/05/13/human-rights-commission-youth-awards/27280889/>

NC bill targeting group home abuse heads to governor NEXT STORY Father, son found shot in Dobson Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text RALEIGH, N.C. — The General Assembly has agreed to put new rules in place targeting people who harm group-home residents and increasing responsibilities on those who work at the homes to report abuse they see. The Senate agreed Thursday to its measure after the House made a small change. The bill now goes to Gov. Pat McCrory's desk. The measure increases the severity of the misdemeanor against someone found to have knowingly injured or caused pain to residents, who often have disabilities or mental illness. New or more severe misdemeanors also are proposed for home employees or volunteers who witness abuse or are aware of harm caused but don't tell authorities. Parents of a group-home resident lobbied for changes after allegations surfaced that their son was sexually abused but workers didn't report it. Source: <http://www.wxii12.com/news/NC-bill-targeting-group-home-abuse-heads-to-governor/33039984>

State House Approves Bill To Form Task Force On Group Homes Commissioner Rehmer Department of Mental Health & Addiction Services Commissioner Patricia Rehmer testified before a state panel in February about a related bill. Department of Mental Health & Addiction Services Commissioner Patricia Rehmer testified before a state panel in February about a related bill. By Jesse Leavenworth contact the reporter Laws and Legislation State house approves bill on group home task force - grew from #Manchester officials' concerns The state House of Representatives has approved a bill that grew out of Manchester officials' concerns about the number of state-contracted group homes in town. The House voted 129-15 in favor of a bill to establish a task force to study the distribution of group homes throughout the state and whether the placement of homes is equitable. The Senate has not acted on the bill, which was introduced by state legislators representing Manchester. cComments @MJD For one task force, consider the "Gun Control" Task Force set up by Malloy. They proposed a whole slew of additional "gun control" laws that our law makers are seriously trying to get passed. That's in addition to the 2013 draconian Sandy Hook Gun Control Laws (all... RICHARD PIECZARKA at 4:52 AM May 16, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 3 "I think that's very positive," town General Manager Scott Shanley said Friday. "I think it moves us in the direction we need to go — and that is to have a better understanding statewide of how these decisions are being made, with the hope for better coordination in the future." The focus on group homes in Manchester followed a raucous meeting in October over residents' objections to a halfway house for convicted sex offenders on Clinton Street. East Side residents and local leaders criticized the state Department of Correction for failing to notify the town when the facility was established in a neighborhood with many single women and children. The problem, however, is much bigger than one group home, local leaders said. Figures from the state Office of Legislative Research show that Manchester hosts many more state placement facilities than other area towns. Some residents in those facilities, town officials have said, repeatedly turn to local police, fire and human service agencies rather than the state officials and state-contracted agencies appointed to care for them. A local task force appointed by Mayor Jay Moran recommended that municipal leaders receive notification before the placement of group homes or like facilities and that an administrative appeal process be established, among other proposals. "Group homes provide vital services to people in need," said Rep. Jeff Currey, a Democrat whose district covers parts of Manchester, East Hartford and South Windsor. "But at the same time, there is an inequity in the location of homes such as in Manchester, and they need to be spread out more evenly across the state so that all towns better serve the people who need help. This study will help us to address this important issue." "There is a clear disparity in the use of municipal services for cities and towns that have larger numbers of group homes and community-based residential facilities. This is unfairly costing many of our municipalities a lot of money," said Rep. Mark Tweedie, a Republican who represents Manchester and Glastonbury. If the bill becomes law, the state task force will examine the question of notification, how group homes are placed and whether towns need additional resources to offset costs related to group homes, among other issues, said Rep. Jason Rojas, a Democrat representing East Hartford and Manchester. "The big thing is notification," he said. "Can we do that? And to what extent are we limited by federal law?" State officials told a legislative panel in February that advance notification of group home placement would violate federal laws on fair housing and patient information protection. Patricia Rehmer, commissioner of the state Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services, also said community-based care is much less expensive than hospitalization, which costs $1,200 each day. Source: <http://www.courant.com/community/manchester/hc-manchester-group-home-bill-0516-20150515-story.html>

California reforms to cut use of foster care psych meds will cost millions By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 05/18/2015 05:48:33 AM PDT2 Comments Updated: 05/18/2015 12:05:29 PM PDT Drugging Our Kids Read the Bay Area News Group investigation about psychiatric drugs in the California foster care system. California will have to invest millions of dollars to better protect its 63,000 foster children from the excessive use of powerful psychiatric medications in a state where prescribing physicians, caregivers and the courts have long supported the drugging of as many as one in four foster teens. Cost estimates for a package of bills moving swiftly through the state Senate vary, but spending could reach $8 million a year -- and possibly more than $22 million -- to curb the child welfare system's heavy reliance on mind-altering medicine for behavior management. That cost is significant but not excessive in populous California, and the legislation has so far received unanimous, bipartisan support. Now, all eyes are on Gov. Jerry Brown, who will weigh the investment this fall if the bills pass both houses of the Legislature. "When you consider the long-term harm and consequences to the kids being doped up like this, it's really pennies -- I personally believe $8 million is budget dust," said Mike Herald, a legislative advocate with the Western Center on Law and Poverty. "But in my experience, just about anything is subject to his rejection if it's going to cost millions of dollars." In an early sign of possible support, however, Brown's $115.3 billion budget plan released Thursday included two surprises: $149,000 to improve data on prescribing to foster children, and an increase of $1.5 million for social worker training that includes psychotropic medication issues. Advertisement "This is an exciting development," said Kathryn Dresslar, who was chief of staff to former Senate President Pro Tem Darrell Steinberg and is with the nonprofit advocacy group Children's Partnership. "The fact that there are dollars in the budget right now that specifically mention training for psychotropic drugs, and the kind of tracking that we need, is good news -- I think that means that the administration intends to address this problem in some way to a greater extent than they have in the past." Under four bills inspired by this newspaper's ongoing investigation "Drugging Our Kids," a mix of federal and state funds would be used to hire 38 new public health nurses; provide second medical opinions, and train social workers and caregivers to watch out for side effects and to advocate for alternatives to mind-numbing meds. Juvenile court judges could not approve prescriptions for foster children without lab tests and ongoing monitoring and unless kids 14 and older consented in writing. Social workers would be alerted about prescriptions for young children and those on multiple meds; and there would be new oversight of residential group homes, where the medications are most frequently prescribed. Policy analysts say the four reform bills authored by Sens. Jim Beall, D-San Jose; Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles, and Bill Monning, D-Carmel, will save the state money, with fewer costly and unnecessary drugs billed to the public health system. California taxpayers spend more on psychotropics than on drugs of any other kind for foster children, this newspaper found, more than $226 million over a decade. As his two bills sailed through the Human Services Committee last month, Sen. Beall touted the return on investment, saying: "I can't wait for this to get to the appropriations committee, because this is going to save the state of California a lot of money." The precise cost of the reforms is still in dispute. The most costly bill, authored by Mitchell, could total more than $12 million alone, according to an early analysis prepared for the Senate. But Frank Mecca, executive director of the County Welfare Directors Association of California, said its costs are not yet final and that federal funding will be available for as much as three-fourths of the social worker training. "The authors of all of these bills know that there's going to be some investment to put the reforms in place on a mandatory basis," Mecca said. "But there's a consensus that the state needs to do more, and none of these bills are bank-breakers." The Judicial Council has not taken a position on the two bills that would improve court oversight. But it projects a $9.4 million annual cost for new administrative duties and additional hearings. That figure was found to be "greatly overstated," by the National Center for Youth Law, however. And the court costs may soon be revised downward, according to the council's government affairs office. The $8 million to $22 million expense places the bill package well within the cost range of other foster care reforms. Dependency court attorneys are seeking $33 million to lower caseloads, and the governor's January budget proposes $7 million in state general funds aimed at reducing reliance on residential group homes. Leslie Heimov, executive director of the Children's Law Center of California, which represents 33,000 children, supports the psych med bills. But she said her lawyers cannot fulfill the work they require unless the statewide average of 248 kids per attorney is significantly reduced; in at least one county, caseloads are as high as 1,000. Judges rely on the attorneys to relay how foster kids are faring on meds and to ensure they appear in court to speak for themselves whenever possible. Under the pending bills more hearings could be needed, requiring more attorney time for interviews with clients, teachers, doctors and caregivers. "There's a very obvious intersection between the psych meds issue and caseloads," Heimov said. "And without us, the court will not know what the child is experiencing." Source: http://www.mercurynews.com/breaking-news/ci_28135541/california-reforms-cut-use-foster-care-psych-meds

Too many foster children are in Michigan group homes, report finds Print Email By Kyle Feldscher | kylefeldscher@mlive.com MLive.com on May 19, 2015 at 10:53 AM Reddit Email LANSING — Too many foster children in Michigan are in residential programs or group placements instead of being placed with foster families, according to a new report. Courtesy logo In its quarterly Kids Count report, the Michigan League for Public Policy expressed concern over their findings that 1 in 5 children in Michigan's child welfare system live in a group home. The national average is 1 in 7 children, according to the report. The report states the percentage of Michigan foster children in group placements is 18 percent, tied with Kentucky and Alabama for 36th in the nation. That's an increase of 3 percent since 2007. Jane Zehnder-Merrell, project director of Kids Count in Michigan, said there is cause for concern. "All the research tells us this is not a good idea to put these kids in residential placements," she said, "unless they really need the services being provided in those settings, and as soon as possible, you move those kids out of those settings." According to the report, court-appointed monitors of Michigan's child welfare systems reported last year the state still places hundreds of children in shelters for long periods of time. This despite a court agreement in 2008 requiring children be placed in an emergency or temporary facility no more than once in 12 months, and for no more than 30 days. The last report from September shows 40 percent of 355 children placed in temporary homes between July 2013 and December 2013 were there for more than 30 days. Nationwide, 40 percent of children in group placements do not have a clinical need to be in those settings, the report states. Staying in a group home for long periods of time instead of going to a foster family can have traumatic effects on children, Zehnder-Merrell said. "If those children age out of those settings, they're not going to have any support systems," she said. "It's really critical, especially for teenagers, that they have a connection to a family. Kids never stop needing a family." The report recommends the state increase services for families so children can stay at home and not enter the system. The report also recommends recruiting more relative and foster families, providing support for those families, keeping residential treatment short and requiring justifications for restrictive placements and prohibiting group placements for very young children. The state has many programs at the community level that work, but the report states the Michigan Legislature cut funding for prevention services from $57 million in 2006 to $42 million in 2014. However, the focus needs to be on keeping kids with their biological parents, Zehnder-Merrell said. "You want to first prevent the removal," she said. "And then, you want to make sure that the child's next setting (if removed from their home) is successful." •Read the full report here. Kyle Feldscher is the Capitol education and MSU reporter for MLive Media Group. Reach him via email at kylefeldscher@mlive.com or follow him on Twitter at @Kyle_Feldscher. Read more stories here. Source: http://www.mlive.com/lansing-news/index.ssf/2015/05/too_many_children_in_michigans.html

Too Many Abused, Neglected Children in Group Homes Too Long, Report Says By: Matt Smith | May 19, 2015 View as "Clean Read" Print Click to read the full report "Every Kid Needs a Family" by the Annie E. Casey Foundation. More than 20,000 American children were placed in group homes unnecessarily and for longer periods than they should, at higher cost to taxpayers and often to the kids' detriment, according to data from 2013, the latest available. Those findings are at the heart of the Kids Count report released today by the Annie E. Casey Foundation. Even though both research and federal law now emphasize keeping children who suffer from abuse or neglect with relatives or in foster homes, some states still put more than a quarter of those kids in group placement, the study found. "A small number of kids have such complex needs that they will need specialized care in a residential setting," said Rob Geen, the Casey Foundation's policy reform director. "But that should be a small number. It should be used like an emergency room, as a short-term intervention to stabilize kids." The report recommends keeping children with their families whenever possible, with the help of services "that are designed to come to them." Child welfare authorities should try to recruit and train more foster parents, courts should have to provide "substantial justification" for placements in settings like group homes and agencies should be keeping detailed data on both placements and outcomes to guide their decisions, the foundation urged. Geen said there's bipartisan support to move public policy in that direction. The Senate Finance Committee, which oversees foster care legislation, is holding a hearing on the issue today, and President Obama's latest budget includes increased support for foster care and treatment. "We feel like we're at a tipping point," he said. "We've got momentum. We know from research what the right thing to do is, and we're aligning our resources and our policy with what we now know." Courtesy of the Annie E. Casey Foundation But of the more than 400,000 kids in the care of child welfare agencies in 2013, about 57,000 — roughly one in seven — were placed in group homes rather than in the care of relatives or foster families. And about 23,000 of those had "no documented clinical or behavioral need that might warrant placing a child outside a family," according to the report. Geen said that figure is likely to be "just the tip of the iceberg." "There are lots of other kids who have clinical needs who could be cared for in their own families or in another family setting," he said. "I think if you apply the 'my child' test to these kids — what would we do if this child was ours? — just because a child has depression doesn't mean you send a child off to an institution." Children in group homes are more likely to test lower than their peers in English and math, less likely to graduate from high school and more than twice as likely to be arrested as those placed in foster homes. In addition, young children in group placements are at high risk of attachment disorders, experts say. More than 11,000 of the group-home population was under 13, the report found. "Those are particularly concerning, because child developmentalists will tell you the family setting is even more critical for young kids," Geen said. As if that's not bad enough, Geen said the average group-home stay is far longer than most experts recommend. Most children see improvement in three to six months, after which the gains tail off or even reverse — but the average stay is now eight or nine months, at a cost to taxpayers that can run up to 10 times the cost of family placement. "We're keeping kids long past the time that's long past any therapeutic value that's being provided by the residential setting," he said. "So we've got to prevent kids from coming in in the first place if they don't need it, then using the residential setting for what it's meant — to stabilize them so that they can perform and succeed in a family setting." The states with the lowest share of kids in group homes were Oregon, Kansas, Maine and Washington, where the numbers were 5 percent or less. In four states — West Virginia, Wyoming, Rhode Island and Colorado — the share of children and teenagers placed in group homes topped 25 percent. The highest was in Colorado, at 35 percent. In part, Geen said, that's because different states have adapted more quickly to the shift in policy that now emphasizes keeping youths in a family setting whenever possible. They've set up mechanisms to train and support relatives who can take in traumatized children or recruited more foster families; the states that haven't done that are sending more kids to group homes "because that's all that they've got," he said. "Until recently we thought that institutional care with nice buildings and rolling hills was actually good for kids," Geen said. "What we know now from the research is that family is critical for a child to overcome the trauma they've experienced from abuse and neglect." Source: <http://jiiie.org/too-many-abused-neglected-children-in-group-homes-too-long-report-says/>

Smaller Role for Residential Care, Witnesses Urge Senate Finance Committee By John Kelly, May 19, 2015 Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY

Group settings should only be used for brief and emergency interventions in the foster care system, a panel of witnesses told members of the Senate Finance Committee today. "There is a wide consensus that children are best served in a family setting," said Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) ranking minority member on the committee, who added that group care should last "only for as long as necessary to stabilize the child...before returning to a family setting. "This theory is finally catching on," Wyden said, noting that the number of youths in congregate care is down 33 percent over the decade. The hearing continues the Congressional discussion on child welfare financing, which has taken shape over the past three years. Limits on federal support for foster care, greater flexibility for the use of federal funds by states and curbing the use of psychotropic medication on foster youths are among the reform concepts that have been pressed by various members of congress and national advocacy groups. Today's hearing focused on the use of group care, also known as congregate care. About 57,000 (14 percent) of the nation's foster youth live in group care, according to a report by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, released just hours before the hearing. The rate of group care use is erratic from state to state. Twelve states hold more than 20 percent of foster youth in group settings, and 15 hold less than 10 percent, according to the Casey report. Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) who called for the hearing, introduced legislation two years ago that would cut off federal IV-E dollars after 15 days for children under age 13 who are placed in congregate care. For all foster youths placed in child care institutions or emergency group settings, officials would have to appear in court to demonstrate that efforts to locate potential homes for the child were made in order to receive IV-E funds. Hatch was forced to miss the hearing because of the major trade bill on the Senate floor. Senators on both sides of the aisle shuffled in and out of the hearing to ensure it could continue as the trade bill was discussed. Sen. Charles Grassley, who also co-chairs the Senate's Foster Care Caucus, chaired the hearing on his behalf. "Foster youth want the same thing as other children, a place to call home," Grassley said. Meanwhile, he said, group homes "create conditions that make young people vulnerable to homelessness, substance abuse, and poverty." All of the witnesses acknowledged a need for residential care as part of the child welfare continuum, but urged limits on the use of it. Group care is "simply the wrong intervention for most youth, including teens," said Jeremy Kohomban, CEO of Children's Village, a major provider of residential and community-based family services in New York City. "There is a belief that most children in group care need to be there because of serious mental health problems. That's not true. They are children in pain, and born in poverty. And they are predominantly black and increasingly brown." Asked by The Chronicle how many of the youths placed in Children's Village residential care by the city could be served in their homes or with foster families, he said, "at least 50 percent or more." Kohomban said that changes to federal law should address the "perverse incentives" that steer most federal child welfare dollars into foster care, including group settings. "When we are paid by the day for each child, we are forced into business models that require keeping kids in beds" instead of "helping them live with families." Matthew Reynell, an adoptive parent from Rochester, N.Y., who testified at the hearing, said time limits should be placed on residential care, and that group care providers should be required to have family inclusion policies and "always be trying to identify a permanent home resource." In its 2016 budget request, the Obama administration proposed the inclusion of increased reimbursements for specialized foster home placements and greater oversight requirements for congregate care, said Children's Bureau Associate Commissioner Joo Yeun Chang, who testified today. But further reining in congregate care, she said, will require Congress doing "something bold for the states that says, 'This is what we expect of you, and we're going to give you the resources to do it.'" John Kelly is an editor for The Chronicle of Social Change. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/news/smaller-role-for-residential-care-witnesses-urge-senate-finance-committee/10214>

Chris Minor Investigates: Teen sex abuse allegations at youth-treatment facility Posted 5:00 pm, May 18, 2015, by Chris Minor, Updated at 05:43pm, May 18, 2015 Facebook52 Twitter5 Google Pinterest LinkedIn Email

A state agency is investigating a former youth worker at Arrowhead Ranch over allegations of abuse. The Coal Valley facility has already fired the case worker and now the Department of Children and Family Services is looking into what happened. Michaela Rosenow was court ordered to the state-licensed juvenile facility after aiding with an armed robbery. While in custody at Arrowhead, the now 17-year-old says her caseworker came on to her in a series of text messages and inappropriate contacts, including kissing on the lips in the juvenile's room and a staff office. "She would go underneath the blanket and rub my feet and she tried touching my vagina. She also touched my butt when we were making popcorn and when we had an "individual" (which is a one-on-one session) she went in my room and pulled down my pants and told me my panties were cute," Michaela said. Michaela eventually told her mother, Kelly Fullington, what was happening. "She said that some lady at Arrowhead Ranch has been flirting with her. I asked her details and she wasn't telling me so I went through her Facebook," Fullington said. Fullington said messages sent from the case worker's account include: "Just let me know how to please you," "Don't be afraid to show yo freak," "I got you something for Christmas, I got lip gloss from Victoria's Secret. I wanna see them babies shine," "I work with kids. I could get that on my record and not be able to do what I wanna do later in life. But I trust you 100," and "Your secret's safe with me." "I thought it's disgusting. There's more going on. This lady should not be there working with these kids. She's there to help my daughter, not to hurt her," Fullington said. The teen says the case worker threatened her as well. "She did come in my room, and her exact words were if I were to say anything to anybody, that she'd catch a murder case," which Michaela says is slang for "she'd kill me." Fullington notified Arrowhead about the allegations, and it conducted an internal investigation, which led to the caseworker's dismissal. "The Illinois Department of Children and Family Services is currently investigating a former employee of Arrowhead Ranch for allegations of abuse. Arrowhead Ranch has fired that employee," said Andrew Flach, a spokesman for DCFS. The Rock Island County Sheriff's Department also launched a criminal investigation into the allegations, and Michaela's mom believed some kind of criminal charge would follow. According to police reports obtained by WQAD, the case worker was questioned by investigators and admitted kissing the teen and said she might have tried to touch the teen's vagina, but never made contact because she had on baggy sweatpants. She said she may have said something about "catching a murder case," and said the text messages were all a joke, that she likes to "play." She admitted flirting with the teen, but said she "would never let it go too far." In the end, the Sheriff's Department and the State Attorney's Office declined to press charges. Sheriff Gerry Bustos says there wasn't enough evidence of a crime that could be proven in court. "There was inappropriate texting. I just have to keep referring back that it didn't raise to the level of a crime within the State of Illinois," Sheriff Bustos said. "We could not substantiate it had gotten to that point and I'm not saying it couldn't have. Luckily we were able to get it stopped," he said. DCFS says after it concludes its investigation, it could red-flag the caseworker, making it tougher to find work in her field. But Fullington and her daughter believe that is not enough to protect the public and future troubled teens. "I don't feel it's right since I was in a residential facility and she had taken advantage of me," said Michaela, who had suffered sexual abuse at the age of 11. Michaela said she told the caseworker about her past. "She's been sexually abused before, she spills her guts to a staff member and then she takes advantage of her? She should never be allowed to work with children again. She needs to be arrested for what she's done," Fullington said. "I don't know what to do. I don't know what to do as a mom. She deserves to be arrested." Arrowhead CEO Angela Moody says she can't talk about the case, calling it a "personnel issue" but said any questionable allegations get turned over to DCFS. "We feel it's important that our kids feel safe. We have very strict policies," Moody said. Source: <http://wqad.com/2015/05/18/chris-minor-investigates-teen-sex-abuse-allegations-at-youth-treatment-facility/>

Report: Too Many Foster Kids Unnecessarily in Group Homes Share on facebook Share on twitter Tweet Share on email E-mail 0 Comments Share on print Print

By New Mexico Voices For Children ALBUQUERQUE—A new report from the Annie E. Casey Foundation shows that, nationally, one in every seven children in the welfare system is in a group home. This, despite the fact that more than 40 percent of these children have no clinical need to be in such restrictive settings. The Casey Foundation report, "Every Kid Needs a Family," makes the case that children do better when they are placed in a family setting. "We have an obligation to help all of our kids succeed," said Patrick McCarthy, president and CEO of the Casey Foundation. "If our children couldn't live with us, we would want them to live with someone close to us — and if that couldn't happen, with a caring foster family who could provide them with as normal a life as possible during a turbulent time. This report shows more kids can live safely in families and get the nurturing they need while under the care and protection of our child welfare systems." New Mexico does better than many states in terms of placing children in family settings, according to the report. While 84 percent of foster children nationally are in family placements, the percentage in New Mexico is 92. Just six states have a higher percentage of children in family placements than New Mexico. New Mexico also does well in terms of the percentage of children who are placed in kinship care—in the care of a relative such as grandparents. Five percent of New Mexico's foster kids are in the care of relatives. Only four states have a higher percentage. "I think the kinship care rate speaks to our cultural roots and history—New Mexico is very family-focused," said Veronica C. García, Ed.D., executive director of New Mexico Voices for Children, which is a grantee of the Casey Foundation. "As a state we must do our best to support these special families and the children in their care by ensuring that they can access the benefits those children are entitled to and that they have assistance in navigating those systems," she added. The Casey Foundation report, "Every Kid Needs a Family," is available online at <http://www.aecf.org/resources/every-kid-needs-a-family/>. Source: <http://krwg.org/post/report-too-many-foster-kids-unnecessarily-group-homes>

West Virginia third highest in percent of kids in residential group care Last updated: May 19, 2015 12:20PM - 256 Views By Fred Pace - fp@cvitasmedia.com Story Tools: Font Size: Social Media: Tweet CHARLESTON — On any given night, about 57,000 children under the care of our nation's child welfare systems are going to bed without the care and comfort of a family, according to a new report from the Annie E. Casey Foundation. In West Virginia, that number is 1,189, which means that 27 percent of the 4,403 kids in our child welfare system are being placed in residential group care, as opposed to with immediate, extended or foster families. That puts West Virginia in a tie with Wyoming for the third highest percent of children in residential group care nationwide. These placements also have been shown to be harmful to a child's opportunities to develop strong, nurturing attachments. Group placements can also cost seven to 10 times the amount it takes to place a child with a relative or foster family. In its latest KIDS COUNT® policy report, Every Kid Needs a Family: Giving Children in the Child Welfare System the Best Chance for Success, the Annie E. Casey Foundation highlights this and other sobering statistics that point to the urgent need to ensure, through sound policies and proven practices, that everything possible is being done to find loving, nurturing and supported families to help raise more of these children. Specifically, Every Kid Needs a Family emphasizes making and keeping a lifelong connection to a family. The report also highlights the promising ways that state and local government leaders as well as policymakers, judges and private providers can work together as they strive to help these 57,000 children who are living in group placements - and overall, the more than 400,000 children in the care of child welfare systems. According to the report, 40 percent of young people who live in group placements while in the care of child welfare systems in the United States have no clinical need to be in such restrictive settings, threatening their well-being and chances for finding a permanent family. Every Kid Needs a Family recommends how communities can widen the array of services available to help parents and children under stress within their own homes, so that children have a better chance of reuniting with their birth families and retaining bonds important to their development. And it shows ways in which residential treatment — a vital option for the small percentage of young people who cannot safely live in any family during treatment — can help those young people return to families more quickly and prepare them to thrive there. "Kids do best in families. Kids who live in families, supported through the tough times, have the best chances for life success," said Margie Hale, Executive Director of West Virginia KIDS COUNT. "Far too many West Virginia children under the care of our child welfare system are missing the support of a family because they are being unnecessarily placed in long-term, residential care. These group placements exact too high a price - in both human terms and taxpayer dollars. As a state, our top policy priorities should be keeping kids connected to family or kin; and strengthening the foster care system so that foster parents are available to nurture and protect children until they can live with a permanent family." Research shows the secure attachments provided by nurturing caregivers are vital to a child's healthy physical, social, emotional and psychological development throughout his life. Young people who do not grow up in families are at greater risk of being abused in group placements, and of being arrested. Despite this, many children - especially teens - are sent to a group placement as their very first experience after being removed from home. "We have an obligation to help all of our kids succeed," said Patrick McCarthy, president and CEO of the Casey Foundation. "If our children couldn't live with us, we would want them to live with someone close to us - and if that couldn't happen, with a caring foster family who could provide them with as normal a life as possible during a turbulent time. This report shows more kids can live safely in families and get the nurturing they need while under the care and protection of our child welfare systems." While more jurisdictions are finding ways to increase the number of children being placed with families, these efforts vary widely from state to state, and even within states. Among the report's findings across the United States: • One in 7 children under the care of child welfare systems live in group placements, even though federal law requires that they live in families whenever possible. • Forty percent of the children in group placements have no documented behavioral or medical need that would warrant placement in such a restrictive setting. • While research shows children who need residential treatment likely need to stay no longer than three to six months, young people are staying in group placements an average of eight months. • Percentages of young people in group placements within states range from as low as 4 percent in Oregon to as high as 35 percent in Colorado. • The Foundation reports that common-sense policies and practices can safely reduce use of group placements, and that these placements may be used when caseworkers feel they cannot find an appropriate family quickly. Jurisdictions that employ strategies to improve decision making, for example, see more children safely return home; use of kinship care often goes up as group placements go down. Policy and practice change can improve in four ways: • Increase service options. Communities that provide a wide range of services have more options that enable children to remain safely in families. For example, state and local child welfare and Medicaid agencies should work together to ensure adequate support by the behavioral health system for services that can be conveniently provided in a home setting. • Strengthen pool of families. Public and private agencies should do more to find families for children and to make sure those families have the support they need to help children thrive. Washington, D.C.'s Child and Family Services Agency, for example, has created a rapid-response program for locating and licensing kin that finds relatives for children in need day or night. • Keep residential treatment short, with family in focus. Residential treatment should be strengthened to meet children's acute needs in a customized, short-term way that equips young people to live in a family and to maintain family connections throughout treatment. In New York, Children's Village — one of the country's first residential treatment centers for children — has greatly expanded its community services and network of foster families in recent years, including foster families prepared to take on the older teens receiving treatment in the facility's residential cottages. • Require justification for restrictive placements. Substantial justification should be required by child welfare systems and by the courts before young people are sent to group placements. In Connecticut and Philadelphia, for example, the top child welfare executive must approve all group placements. Judges can require caseworkers to provide regular updates to make sure a child still needs residential treatment. Every Kid Needs a Family will be available May 19 at 12:01 a.m. at www.aecf.org. Additional information is available in the KIDS COUNT Data Center, which also contains the most recent national, state and local data on hundreds of indicators of child well-being. The Data Center allows users to create rankings, maps and graphs for use in publications and on websites, and to view real-time information on mobile devices. Fred Pace is an editor for Civitas Media. He can be reached at 304-369-1165, ext. 1661, in Madison; at 304-752-6950, ext. 1729 in Logan; by email at fp@cvitasmedia.com or @fcp62 on Twitter. Source: <http://www.coalvalleynews.com/news/news/153539191/West-Virginia-third-highest-in-percent-of-kids-in-residential-group-care>

Scared child or troubled son? Boy found in basement testifies Elisha Anderson, Detroit Free Press 7:53 p.m. EDT May 20, 2015 Charlie Bothuell IV, left, and Monique Dillard-Bothuell appear in court in Detroit on April 15, 2015. (Photo: Paul Sancya/AP) 6 CONNECT 38 TWEETLINKEDIN 1 COMMENTEMAILMORE DETROIT -- Different descriptions have emerged of a 13-year-old boy discovered in the basement of his family's home last June during an ongoing court hearing for his father and stepmother, who are accused of abusing him. The first was of a scared kid, disciplined by his father, Charlie Bothuell IV, with a PVC pipe, required to complete twice-daily workouts, and forced into the basement by his stepmother, Monique Dillard-Bothuell. The second depicted a troubled child, who lied, stole, got in fights at school and got poor grades. He was sent to live with his dad and once lied about being kidnapped by a man with gray hair. The teen, who is not being identified by the Free Press, was cross-examined for more than three hours today — his third day on the stand — as the defense pointed out contradictions with his version of events. He testified that he left the basement and went upstairs to use the bathroom when nobody was around. But according to a transcript from an interview last June, the boy, then 12, said he hadn't gone to the bathroom in 10 days. Shawn Patrick Smith, Bothuell's attorney, also brought up the boy's interview with the FBI in July when he was asked if his stepmother brought him food. He responded "No, I got it myself," according to a transcript. In court, he testified she brought him cereal and protein shakes and told him if he heard anything to be quiet and not say anything. He said he obeyed because he didn't know what would happen to him if he didn't. "I was afraid that nobody would believe me," he said. USA TODAY Boy found in basement testifies he was afraid Bothuell and his wife, Dillard-Bothuell, face charges of second-degree child abuse and torture. Their preliminary examination before 36th District Judge Shannon Holmes will determine whether the couple will stand trial on the charges, which are felonies. Defense attorneys maintain the boy wasn't abused and have accused him of making up his story about being in the basement the whole time. He was found behind boxes in the basement on June 25 during a police search of the home 11 days after he was reported missing by his family. Defense attorneys also contend the teen wanted to be lose weight and was on board with working out. "I liked the way I looked," he testified of the results he got from exercising. The teen denied trying to poison his family by mixing cleaning solutions on a sponge. Smith introduced a document the teen said he wrote, dated Feb. 6, 2014. "I washed the dishes with the same sponge that I used to clean the table, countertops, and cabinets," it said. "I used bleach to clean the counters. I used the window cleaner to clean the table. I used bleach to clean the cabinets." "I did it because I thought everybody would get sick ... and I thought they would send me back to my mom's house," the document said. USA TODAY Sheriff: Boy 'kidnapped' to teach him a lesson The teen testified the letter wasn't an apology, "it was what Monique believed that she thought I did." Later, during questioning by Wayne County Assistant Prosecutor Carin Goldfarb, the boy was asked if those were his words on the document and he said "no", adding they were his stepmother's words. He explained he had one sponge for washing the dishes and another for cleaning things, said they looked the same and sometimes he had mixed them up by mistake. "I never purposely tried to poison anyone," the teen said. The hearing resumes June 8 at 9:30 a.m. Prosecutors said they expect to call up to two more witnesses. Source: <http://www.usatoday.com/story/news/nation/2015/05/20/detroit-boy-basement-testimony/27679941/>

Many Children Placed in Group Homes Unnecessarily, Report Finds May 22, 2015 Facebook 5 Twitter 32 LinkedIn 8 Google Email Share 44 Print One in seven children under the care of the child welfare system lives in a group placement, even though federal law requires that children in the system be placed with a family whenever possible, a report from the Annie E. Casey Foundation finds. The KIDS COUNT policy report Every Kid Needs a Family: Giving Children in the Child Welfare System the Best Chance for Success (HTML or PDF, 20 pages) found that 40 percent of the nearly fifty-seven thousand children in group placements have no documented behavioral or medical need warranting such a restrictive setting, and that stays in group homes average eight months, despite research showing that even those who need residential treatment are unlikely to need a stay longer than three to six months. According to the report, the secure attachments nurtured by caregivers and the stability of routines in family settings are vital to a child's healthy physical, social, emotional, and psychological development, while young people who do not grow up in families are at greater risk of being abused in group placements and of being arrested. Although the rate of group placement ranges from as low as 4 percent in Oregon to as high as 35 percent in Colorado, the report calls for changes in policy and practice to limit the use of such placements to situations in which caseworkers cannot find an appropriate family quickly. Recommendations in the report include greater collaboration between state and local child welfare and Medicaid agencies to increase options for providing behavioral health services at home; increasing the pool of and support for relatives and foster families; keeping residential treatment periods short; and requiring justification and stricter approval procedures for group placements. "We have an obligation to help all of our kids succeed," said Casey Foundation president and CEO Patrick McCarthy. "If our children couldn't live with us, we would want them to live with someone close to us — and if that couldn't happen, with a caring foster family who could provide them with as normal a life as possible during a turbulent time. This report shows more kids can live safely in families and get the nurturing they need while under the care and protection of our child welfare systems." "Too Many Kids in U.S. Child Welfare Systems Not Living in Families," Annie E. Casey Foundation Press Release 05/19/2015. Source: <http://philanthropynewsdigest.org/news/many-children-placed-in-group-homes-unnecessarily-report-finds>

Foster parent facing charges in 22-month-old girl's death COVINGTON, La. (AP) - A 40-year-old Lacombe woman faces charges in connection with the death of a 22-month-old foster child who had been placed in her care. Meanwhile, the state family services department says it has launched an investigation and placed staff on leave. Authorities said Trenique Faciane (treh-NEEK' fah-SHAHN') had already been booked on a count of second-degree cruelty to a juvenile after she told detectives she used a hairbrush to beat the little girl. The child died after being taken to a hospital. George Bonnett (bah-NET'), a spokesman for the St. Tammany Parish Sheriff's Office, said Friday that authorities were seeking a warrant on a more serious charge. St. Tammany Coroner Charles Preston identified the child as Madison Parrott, whose biological mother lives in Bogalusa. Source: <http://www.katc.com/story/29141942/foster-parent-facing-charges-in-22-month-old-girls-death>

State lifts admissions ban after northern Idaho home for troubled youth promises changes THE ASSOCIATED PRESS First Posted: May 23, 2015 - 3:49 pm Last Updated: May 23, 2015 - 3:53 pm AAA We also have more stories about: (click the phrases to see a list) Places: Lewiston (14) Idaho (243) LEWISTON, Idaho — A northern Idaho facility for troubled youth can accept new kids after promising to address problems found during a state inspection. The Lewiston Tribune reports (<http://bit.ly/1BiLALK>) that the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare lifted the ban on admissions Thursday after the Northwest Children's Home submitted a plan of correction. The state barred the home from accepting new children on April 1 after identifying issues ranging from unresolved maintenance problems to mishandled assault reports. The inspection was prompted by a complaint that claimed a teen from the Lewiston facility broke into a neighboring house and attacked a resident. State officials conducted a progress review at the home before lifting the ban and will assess the facility again in June. The acting executive director of the facility says state inspectors were satisfied with their most recent inspection. Source: <http://www.dailyjournal.net/view/story/d58a9ac033ae42fcb32d909aaf557dc0/ID--Childrens-Home/>

What is the School-to-Prison Pipeline? Tuesday, 26 May 2015 02:01 PM By Erica Baum Close More ways to share... Stumbled LinkedIn Vine Reddit Delicious Newstrust Tell my politician Technocrati Short URL Email Article Contact Print A A 0 inShare inShare0 There are currently over four times as many police officers stationed in the nation's public school system than are stationed in the nation's capital. VOTE NOW: Should Convicted Felons Be Allowed to Vote? The School-to-Prison Pipeline, a term coined to characterize the policies and practices within the U.S. school system that, as the ACLU says, "reflects the prioritization of incarceration over education" is blamed for the increasing police presence in schools. The School-to-Prison Pipeline is an explanation of why certain minority groups tend to go straight from the public school system into the prison system. The ACLU attributes zero-tolerance policies including expulsion and suspension, policing of school hallways, and disciplinary alternative schools as 3 of the main causes of the School-to-Prison Pipeline. Zero tolerance policies impose severe punishments without proper due process protections. Such policies that remove students who are in trouble from school leads to students becoming disengaged with their studies, further encouraging them to drop out of school, which ultimately increases the likelihood of ending up in the prison system. Rather than hiring trained administrators to deal with student conduct, the number of school resource officers, police officers stationed to police school hallways, has increased in recent years. As a result, school based arrests for disruptive behavior has become more common, further contributing to the School-to-Prison Pipeline issue. The New York Times reports that there are over 17,000 police officers in the public school system. TELL US: How Do You Feel About Voting Rights for Convicted Felons? Disciplinary alternative schools send students from regulated public schools to inferior facilities with no educational standards. Disciplinary alternative schools hinder students' abilities and opportunities to learn, placing them at a disadvantage even after returning to the public school system. The School-to-Prison Pipeline is an issue that has sparked advocacy throughout the country. Texas Appleseed, a non-profit organization that reports the effects of school disciplinary policies issued a report in March 2015 that identified African-American and Hispanic students and students with disabilities as being most harmed by the School-to-Prison Pipeline. The Texas organization has issued multiple statements and lobbying efforts to end policies that contribute to the Pipeline. Californians for Safety and Justice, another non-profit organization, has launched the #SchoolsNotPrisons public education campaign. The campaign has created multiple petitions and PSAs to educate the populace about the effect of the Pipeline as well as making a social media mark. Read Latest Breaking News from Newsmax.com <http://www.newsmax.com/FastFeatures/school-prison-pipeline/2015/05/26/id/646797/#ixzz3bldbkltl> Urgent: Rate Obama on His Job Performance. Vote Here Now! Source: <http://www.newsmax.com/FastFeatures/school-prison-pipeline/2015/05/26/id/646797/#>

China executes boarding school teacher who molested or raped 26 girls as young as 4 | Fox News China executes boarding school teacher who molested or raped 26 girls as young as 4 Published May 29, 2015 Associated Press Facebook 6 Twitter 11 Email Print BEIJING — A former Chinese elementary school teacher has been executed for molesting or raping 26 students, some as young as 4 years old. The intermediate People's Court in the western province of Gansu says it carried out the sentence against Li Jishun on Thursday after it was upheld by the nation's Supreme People's Court. ADVERTISEMENT In its ruling, the Supreme Court said all of Li's victims were girls younger than 12 who attended his village boarding school. It said Li took advantage of his status as teacher and the girls' fear and shyness to repeatedly assault them in the classroom, dormitories and surrounding forest. The ruling said many of the girls had been left in the village by parents working in cities. Source: <http://www.foxnews.com/world/2015/05/29/china-executes-boarding-school-teacher-who-molested-or-raped-26-girls-as-young/#>

Parents sentenced to 7 years in prison for caging autistic son in O'Fallon, Mo. : News Parents sentenced to 7 years in prison for caging autistic son in O'Fallon, Mo. Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2015-05-30T00:05:00Z 2015-05-31T09:14:04Z Parents sentenced to 7 years in prison for caging autistic son in O'Fallon, Mo. By Mark Schlinkmann St. Louis Post-Dispatch stltoday.com May 30, 2015 12:05 am • By Mark Schlinkmann Mark

Schlinkmann mschlinkmann@post-dispatch.com Loading... × Related Photos « × Close Ad A 6-year-old autistic boy in O'Fallon, Mo., was kept in this cage, according to police. P Terry and Victoria Smith, formerly of O'Fallon, Mo., were each found guilty of child endangerment. Read more St. Charles County parents of autistic boy kept in cage say on stand that they did their best Family physician says Smiths were exemplary parents. Read more Custody of children in cage case is in limbo Child at the center of the abuse case could face institutional care. Read more Cage for autistic boy in St. Charles County never OK'd by state, official testifies Police, paramedics testify about trying to open the cage and the boy's condition. Read more Couple charged with keeping autistic son in cage in O'Fallon, Mo., basement A plywood roof was secured to the top of a metal crib with zip ties and bungee cords, police say. Read more ST. CHARLES COUNTY • A couple were sentenced Friday to seven years in prison for keeping their severely autistic son in a makeshift cage. Terry and Victoria Smith, formerly of O'Fallon, Mo., had been convicted last month of child endangerment in the case. Circuit Judge Ted House also ordered the Smiths to each pay a $500 fine. "The court finds no compelling reason to deviate" from the jury's recommendation of seven years and fines, House said. In 2010, authorities found the Smiths' son, Josiah, then 6, in a urine-and-feces-soaked enclosure held together with zip ties and bungee cords. Police, paramedics and a case worker had gone to the Smiths' home following a tip to a state child abuse hotline. The Smiths also have five other children. County Prosecutor Tim Lohmar's office sought prison time for Victoria Smith, 44, and Terry Smith, 45, but didn't specify how much. "They are not responsible adults under any circumstances," assistant prosecutor Becky Shaffar said at the sentencing hearing Friday. She pointed out that the Smiths hadn't apologized. Attorneys for the Smiths argued that jailing them would also punish Josiah and their other children. They urged House to put them on probation. They said since the 2010 incident, the couple had done everything they had been told to do for the children by authorities. "Their large family needs two parents," said Courtney Harness, Victoria Smith's attorney. "This case is about what's best for Josiah" and the other children. Shaffar, however, said it's about punishing the defendants for what they did — "putting the child in a cage over and over because he was an inconvenience to them." It's unclear what will happen to the Smiths' children now. Steven Kobal, another assistant prosecutor, said that will be up to the Missouri Department of Social Services. Department officials could not be reached for comment. The family now lives in Elsberry in Lincoln County. The seven-year sentence imposed on the parents is the maximum allowed. However, Shaffar predicted during the hearing that the Smiths as first-time offenders might spend only a year in prison before they're released by the state Board of Probation and Parole. Lohmar has said previously he understood the challenges facing the couple but that child neglect, endangerment or abuse isn't an option for overwhelmed parents. The defense had argued that the state failed to provide an appropriate safe bed and that the Smiths did the best they could for their child under bad circumstances. Victoria Smith testified in the trial that she had been told by state officials to keep him in the makeshift device until she could get funds for a new bed. That was disputed by Allison Haney with the Missouri Department of Mental Health, who testified that the state never provided or approved the cage. At the hearing Friday, Shaffar repeated their argument that the case was really about money — a reference to the state and federal money the Smiths receive for Josiah's care. "They just keep having more children and expect all of us to take care of them," Shaffar said. The defense, in arguing that prison terms would damage a happy family, showed a recent video of the Smiths with Josiah and the other children in everyday activities at home and a park. In the video, Victoria Smith, her voice cracking, said she didn't know if she would ever see Josiah while she's imprisoned because he might not be able to handle being in a visiting room with other people. Terry Smith said Josiah doesn't understand how to use a phone. Shaffar said the Smiths "pretend their children are important" to them but that the jury in recommending prison time "could see through this fake facade." During the trial, witnesses supporting the Smiths included their family physician, Dr. David Easterday, who said they had always been exemplary parents and that Josiah appeared to be well cared for when brought in for office visits. Dr. John Constantino, a professor of psychiatry and pediatrics at Washington University, testified that the makeshift cage was completely inappropriate. He suggested that the Smiths should have used a "timeout room" where Josiah could be safe from harming himself or running away. Source: http://www.stltoday.com/news/local/crime-and-courts/parents-sentenced-to-years-in-prison-for-caging-autistic-son/article_92ac01a9-c00b-537d-9bb7-3643e68194e7.html

'We need to rebuild: Residential school report to show extent of abuse Residential school survivor Kim Good, of the Snuneymuxw First Nation near Nanaimo, B.C., wipes away tears as she listens to Truth and Reconciliation Commission Chair, Justice Murray Sinclair release the commission's interim report during a news conference in Vancouver, B.C., on Feb. 24, 2012. (Darryl Dyck / THE CANADIAN PRESS) 11 8 18 1 Chinta Puxley, The Canadian Press Published Friday, May 29, 2015 7:15AM EDT Mike Cachagee was just four-and-a-half when he was taken from his home and sent to a residential school in northern Ontario. For the next 12 years, he never celebrated a birthday. He was never hugged. Related Stories Highway of Tears emails deleted, alleges former B.C. ministry staffer Child welfare agencies must follow hotel ban or risk gov't takeover: Manitoba minister Music was an 'outlet' for Inuit 'throat boxer' during turbulent childhood Photos Residential school victims Mick Cachagee, Crystal Merasty and eldest surviving victim Wabano Marguerite, left to right, listen to Prime Minister Stephen Harper officially apologize for more than a century of abuse and cultural loss involving residential schools in Ottawa, June 11, 2008. (Chris Wattie / THE CANADIAN PRESS) He never heard "I love you." He was never encouraged or praised. He was beaten and sexually abused. When he and his younger brother finally returned home, his mother had remarried and started a new family. She barely recognized her sons. It took Cachagee two failed marriages, years of alcohol and drug abuse and therapy before he started to come to grips with what happened to him. His brother never did. He descended into a life of addiction on Winnipeg's streets. "He was only three years old when he went there," Cachagee said. "He came out when he was 16 and the rest of his life was just a mess with alcoholism. Just horrid. He never had a chance -- all because he was sent off to a residential school." The brothers rarely speak now. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission examining Canada's Indian residential schools is to release a summary of its final report Tuesday after hearing testimony from 7,000 survivors. The final report marks the end of a five-year exploration of one of the darkest chapters in Canada's history. About 150,000 First Nations, Inuit and Metis children were taken from their families and forced to attend government schools over much of the last century. The last school closed outside Regina in 1996. For survivors such as Cachagee, the torment doesn't abate with the commission's report. "We don't need to heal, we need to rebuild," said Cachagee, who now counsels other survivors in Sault Ste Marie, Ont. Ken Young remembers the day in the 1950s when he was taken from his home at age eight along with his brothers and sisters. He remembers boarding a train with other aboriginal children and the laughter while on the novel journey. Then they reached the Prince Albert Indian Residential School in Saskatchewan. "We were lonesome," Young said. "I remember a lot of us crying a lot." There were public floggings in the dining hall. Children had their heads shaved and their legs shackled in pyjamas because they had tried to go home. The school was more like a prison, he said. "I thought it was normal because I was just a young guy. Later, I realized how bad that was that adults would treat children like that," said Young, a Winnipeg lawyer. "I was ashamed to be who I was because that's what we were taught." It took a long time to let go of his anger. Young is hoping the commission will recommend a healing strategy developed by survivors that will address the aftermath of Canada's failed policy to "take the Indian out of the child." But he suspects the commission's report will go the way of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. "There'll be recommendations made and then it will go on a shelf like all the other reports that have been sanctioned by government. "I'm not overly optimistic." David Harper is more interested in what happens after the final report. Harper's mother was in a residential school, but the first time he heard details of her abuse was at her compensation hearing with adjudicators before she died. "Every word that came out of her mouth, I kept thinking, 'How dare you Canada, allowing this to happen to my mom.'" Just recently, Harper, who is the grand chief of Manitoba Keewatinowik Okimakanak representing Manitoba's northern First Nations, learned one of his uncles was in a residential school and was whipped until he defecated. Those stories are just starting to be told, Harper said. Harper points to Israel where one of the Holocaust memorials includes an eternal flame. "I would like to see something like that for our First Nations, where they could go and sit down and tell their stories to their children," he said. "We want to make sure we don't pass on this generational curse." Source: <http://www.ctvnews.ca/canada/we-need-to-rebuild-residential-school-report-to-show-extent-of-abuse-1.2396854>

Child Dies While in Foster Care, Parents Want Justice Tools 0 Comments Email this article Digge Print this article By Craig Choate Story Created: May 30, 2015 at 4:26 PM CDT Story Updated: May 30, 2015 at 10:05 PM CDT CAIRO -- The birth family of 10-month-old Kalisha Hill laid her to rest Saturday. It's been a rough three years for this large family. In 2012, after the father, Isaac Hill, admitted abuse, he and Katrina Hill lost custody of each of their ten children. "They took me to jail, I admitted my wrongs," Isaac said. Since losing their kids, DCFS has admitted to documented evidence of abuse to several of the Hills' kids inside the foster care system. "They kept my kids in danger," Hill exclaimed. "This is the fourth time. There's three times our kids have been abused." Then, last week they learned their youngest child, 10-month-old Kalisha, died while in foster care. They say if it wasn't for one person they still wouldn't know the cause of death. "Had it not been for the coroner, we wouldn't have known anything," Isaac added. The news the coroner delivered was horrifying. "It was rough hearing what he had to say," Isaac continued. "He said that my daughter had blood stress behind her eyes and in her lungs and that she had struggled to fight to breathe and said that it was either from co-sleeping or layover." Isaac and Katrina Hill want their kids back and they want justice. "This ain't going unchecked. So they can try as they may to try to hide this one but it's not that simple, it's not gonna happen," Isaac explained. "We want the rest of our kids back." Little Kalisha's death is now under investigation by the Child Death Task Force and the Williamson County State's Attorney's Office.

Source: <http://www.wsiltv.com/news/local/Child-Dies-While-in-Foster-Care-Parents-Want-Justice-305577601.html>

Residential schools findings point to 'cultural genocide,' commission chair says Final report from Truth and Reconciliation Commission to be released June 2 By John Paul Tasker, CBC News Posted: May 29, 2015 9:04 PM ET Last Updated: May 30, 2015 10:29 AM ET Justice Murray Sinclair interview 9:03 14967 shares Facebook Twitter Reddit Google Share Email Related Stories 'Cultural genocide is probably the best description of what went on here' Residential schools: Promises of reconciliation saved in bentwood box Truth is hard but residential school reconciliation harder: Murray Sinclair Justice Murray Sinclair on Truth and Reconciliation External Links Canadian Press interactive: Residential schools by the numbers (Note: CBC does not endorse and is not responsible for the content of external links.) At least 6,000 aboriginal children died while in the residential school system, says Justice Murray Sinclair, the chair of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Sinclair, who has been tasked with studying the legacy of the residential schools, says that the figure is just an estimate and is likely much higher. Residential schools were established in the 19th century and the last ones closed in 1996. A history of residential schools in Canada Aboriginal nutritional experiments had Ottawa's approval How ballet slippers, broken chalice are helping to heal residential school wounds "We think that we have not uncovered anywhere near what the total would be because the record keeping around that question was very poor," Sinclair told Rosemary Barton of CBC's Power & Politics. "You would have thought they would have concentrated more on keeping track." Sinclair offered the figure of 6,000 in a later interview with Evan Solomon to air Saturday on CBC Radio's The House — much higher than earlier estimates that put the number of school children who died in the system at less than 4,000, but still possibly far short of the real outcome. Sinclair, who was Manitoba's first aboriginal judge, said one estimate made in the early part of the 20th century was that 24 to 42 per cent of aboriginal children who attended the residential schools died at school or shortly after leaving school. Source: <http://www.cbc.ca/news/politics/residential-schools-findings-point-to-cultural-genocide-commission-chair-says-1.3093580>

Authorities Investigate Child Abuse Claims At Police-Run Boot Camp Posted: Jun 03, 2015 7:28 AM PDT Updated: Jun 03, 2015 7:30 PM PDT By: Phil Shuman, Reporter / Anchor BioEmail_Connect_Biography_phil.shuman@foxtv.com Authorities Investigate Child Abuse Claims At Police-Run Boot Camp More>> on Twitter: @mariofoxa on Twitter: @mariofoxa E-mail Mario Ramirez E-mail Mario Ramirez Like & follow us on Facebook here: FOX 11 Los Angeles Like & follow us on Facebook here: FOX 11 Los Angeles Comment and share our stories with your Facebook friends. Comment and share our stories with your Facebook friends. E-mail Phil Shuman E-mail Phil Shuman on Twitter: @FoxPhil on Twitter: @FoxPhil San Luis Obispo, CA - (FOX 11 / AP) Authorities are investigating claims that seven children from Southern California suffered physical abuse while attending a police-run boot camp on the Central Coast. From Phil Shuman: The seven mothers weren't happy to be in front of television cameras and reporters, but they wanted their story told. They say they thought they were helping their troubled teens by sending them to a "tough love"-style police sponsored and staffed boot camp called "LEAD", which stands for leadership, empowerment, and discipline. The moms say the stories their kids told when they came home after a week were outrageous and possibly criminal. Veronica Bernal has a 16-year-old son and she tells me "he said they beat him, slammed him against bus, and handcuffed him". Aracelli Pulido has two daughters, twelve and 14. "They said they were hit in the face, kicked, and when they didn't do exercises correctly, they were stomped in the back", according to Pulido. Bridget Salazar, the mother of a 13-year-old boy tells a similar story. "They were socking him in the stomach, kicking him, telling him to get up." The boot camp is operated by Huntington Park Police, South Gate Police, and the California National Guard. It's held in San Luis Obispo at an old military base. It has been operating for some 15 years without any apparent problems, until now. The county sheriff's department in San Luis Obispo is now investigating the claims. They've done interviews. They aren't saying anything more. Huntington Park's Police Chief Jorge Cisneros, when I asked him if these claims of physical and emotional abuse could be true, answered this way. "The intent of this program is to redirect children to a more positive role in society. The allegations that I've heard are not part of the program". That statement should be obvious, even though the program is designed for so-called "troubled" kids, though not violent and not with any drug problems. So, we'll see if these complaints are substantiated. The accused South Gate officers are off the street. Their counterparts at Huntington Park have not been reassigned as of this writing. RELATED: LAUSD Settles Remaining Miramonte Sex Abuse Lawsuits For \$139M RELATED: Former Miramonte Teacher, Pleads No Contest To Molestation Charges San Luis Obispo County sheriff's officials said Tuesday the investigation began May 28 after one child claimed abuse by drill instructors at a Leadership Empowerment and Discipline Boot Camp. The event from May 17 to 24 was put on by Huntington Park and South Gate police using the Army National Guard's Camp San Luis Obispo facilities. The program is for children between 11 and 17 years old. Sheriff's spokesman Tony Cipolla says when investigators went to Southern California to interview the 39 children who attended the camp they identified six more potential victims. Police chiefs from both departments met with parents and pledged a thorough investigation. From Susan Hirasuna: The mothers of four youths came forward Tuesday to allege their children had been abused at a disciplinary boot camp. This is a voluntary program called LEAD, affiliated with the Huntington Park Police Department, South Gate Police Department and the California National Guard. The cost of the program is $400 per child for a 3-month program that includes a one week trip to a camp in San Luis Obispo. The mothers would only give their last names and each shared a look of distress or guilt on their faces for sending their children somewhere that wasn't safe. Miss Salazar said she had a 13-year-old son who came home from the trip in tears. He told her he had been taken into a dark room where he was beaten and kicked. He was then handed a towel to wipe away the blood. Salazar said, her son told her he was hurt so badly he couldn't move. Miss Pulido sent her daughters, age 12 and 14 to LEAD. She claims that the abuse was done by two Huntington Park police officers known as the Gomez brothers. The abuse included face slapping, hair pulling and when the kids were told to do push-ups, apparently one of the officers would step on the teen's back. Greg Owen, the attorney, representing the youths say, the Gomez brothers have been removed from the LEADs program but are still on patrol for the Huntington Park PD. At a news conference in Commerce, he said, that if the allegations are true, the officers need to be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. He said, the abuse was discovered when a boy came back with bruises. His parent apparently took him to the hospital where the injuries were so severe, the hospital apparently called the Department of Child Protective Services. Owen says, 7 to 10 of 30 youths from last month's session have claimed to him some sort of abuse. I tried to get some kind of response from both the Huntington Park and South Gate Police department, to no avail. I did get a response from the California National Guard. The statement released basically read; no comment while there's an ongoing investigation. And, indeed, the San Luis Obispo County Sheriff's Department is investigating the abuse allegations. Source: <http://www.myfoxla.com/story/29228359/authorities-investigate-child-abuse-claims-at-police-run-boot-camp>

Lebanon County to close group homes for troubled teens in cost saving move By John Latimer johnlatimer@ldnews.com @johnlatimer on Twitter Updated: 06/04/2015 05:44:13 PM EDT Jim Holtry, director of Lebanon County Children and Youth Services, explains why he believes the county's two group homes for teenage boys and girls should be closed at Thursday's Lebanon County commissioners' meeting. (John Latimer — Lebanon Daily News) The Lebanon County commissioners on Thursday authorized the closing of two county-owned group homes for teenage boys and girls that were operated by the county's Children and Youth Services agency. The vote to close the homes was unanimous and was done on the recommendation of Children and Youth Services Director Jim Holtry after he determined the services could be provided by private group homes at a significant cost savings. The homes — one for boys between 13 to 18 in Fontana and another for girls of the same age in Lebanon — each have room for six troubled youth who are not suitable to remain with their families or be placed in traditional foster homes, Holtry said. The county opened the group homes in 1977 at a time when there was a need for them because the only placement options were foster homes and institutions, Holtry told the commissioners. "There was no go between," he explained. "Counties developed group home placements that were a little more structured than foster care but not nearly as structured as institutional placements." In the intervening years as more private homes offering specialized foster care opened, counties began closing their group homes, Holtry said. Lebanon County is just one of two counties in the state that still operates its own facilities, he added. Holtry came to his decision that it's time for Lebanon County to close its group homes after reviewing the cost of operating the homes and their occupancy rates over the past five years. Advertisement "Our occupancy rate over that period was a little over 60 percent," he said. "I also found our per diem rate over that same time period was a little over $178 a day." Through the first 10 months of this fiscal year, Holtry said, the per diem cost has risen to $214, nearly double the $110 per diem cost of a private provider. At the current occupancy rates projected over the entire year, if the county switched to a private provider, it would result in about $262,000 in savings, Holtry said. Because the agency receives most of its funding from the state and about 20 percent from the county's general fund, the savings for the county by switching to private providers would be about $52,000. The remaining money could be diverted to the agency's other program needs that are over budget, Holtry said. Another consideration in making his recommendation, Holtry said, is the difficulty in staffing both of the homes. The agency has been short-staffed most of the year and is on pace to pay $75,000 in overtime expenses. "The bottom line is, I just really truly feel the group homes have not been as cost effective as they have been in the past," he said. "I just think it has come to a point that we really should close them. I think we can get as good a service, if not better service, from the providers we have." Holtry said every effort would be made to place the teens currently living in the homes in privately run homes located in Lebanon County. However, he had no timetable for when that might happen. "I assure you that in no way will the youth that are at our group homes suffer in any way by not having our own group homes," he said. "We have contracts with some very good providers who will provide very adequate care for these children. ... Because the private providers have more staff than we do, they are able to provide many more activities and functions for the kids than we are able to provide." The five full-time employees working at the two homes were informed of their potential closing earlier this week and efforts will be made to place them in other suitable county jobs, said county administrator Jamie Wolgemuth. The children's homes are owned by the county, and once they are closed will likely be sold and their contents auctioned, Holtry said. In other news related to Children and Youth Services's budget, Holtry told the commissioners that the state Department of Children, Youth and Families has agreed to his appeal for reimbursement of its portion of the $1.5 million in county expenses that were over budget last year. "The state has agreed, and in a couple of weeks, you will be getting a check for almost $952,000 in additional revenue for the county to offset those over expenditures," Holtry told the commissioners. "I was optimistic that we would get something, but I never anticipated it would be the full amount, and that is good news." Source: http://www.1dnews.com/local/ci_28252103/lebanon-county-close-group-homes-troubled-teens-cost

Lara Moves Bill to Regulate 'Troubled Teen' Industry Finally, proponents of "cures" for homosexuality are being regulated and called frauds! June 4, 2015 - by Karen Ocamb 7 Out California State Sen. Ricardo Lara (D-Bell Gardens) has followed up his promise last March to start regulating the billion dollar "troubled teen" industry—and it looks like he's bringing the Legislature on board. On Monday, June 1, the Senate passed Lara's SB 524 by a bipartisan vote of 31 to 1. The bill "defines private residential facilities for youth and requires them to obtain a license from the Department of Social Services (DSS) to protect youth health and safety," according to a press release. As Frontiers reported in an in-depth look at what critics call the "troubled teen industry," many residential facilities throughout California, the country and the world prey on desperate parents with emotionally or behaviorally difficult teenagers with promises to "cure" the teens through "tough love" and often, religious fervor. The young people are sent to boarding facilities that use military boot camp tactics to change their attitudes and behavior, often around alcohol and drug abuse. But the facilities are also often promoted with promises of "curing" young people suspected of being gay. Lara's bill requires private facilities to provide the same protections and receive the same oversight as state-funded and state-licensed institutions. A 2008 Government Accountability Office Report found 69 reported cases of abuse, 15 cases of physical abuse, 45 cases of neglect or deprivation of necessities, 2 cases of sexual abuse, and 6 cases of psychological and emotional maltreatment in California. "Over the past few decades hundreds of facilities have been established nationally for youth with emotional or behavioral problems nationwide and abroad, including camps that claim to scare the gay away or cure homosexuality," Lara said in a statement. "Tragically, many young people have experienced horrendous abuse, neglect, and even death at these unregulated institutions. My bill would require private residential facilities to meet basic standards of care and ensure essential health and safety standards are met to protect youth." Lara's bill also got a boost from gay Los Angeles City Councilmember Mitch O'Farrell, who introduced a resolution of support last April. "Breaking someone's spirit because of who they are is unconscionable," O'Farrell said in a press release. "We must stop the abuse of those forced to live in the shadows because of their sexual identity. I applaud Senator Lara for his work on this issue, as well as the LA LGBT Center and Survivors of Institutional Abuse, who helped co-author the senate bill. Through this action, we will provide protection to minors who will otherwise be vulnerable." O'Farrell's resolution was seconded by Councilmembers Paul Koretz, Nury Martinez, Mitchell Englander and his fellow gay colleague, Mike Bonin. At the Lara news conference last March, the LA LGBT Center also launched the website www.PYIA.org for its "Protect Youth from Institutional Abuse" campaign with an online petition to members of congress and the California legislature. "No institution should be free to abuse children," said Dave Garcia, Director of Policy and Community Building at the LA LGBT Center. "This legislation is an important step toward providing common sense supervision, regulation and oversight of an industry that for far too long has been able to operate in the shadows. The Los Angeles LGBT Center, along with The Survivors of Institutional Abuse, are proud partners in this important effort and we will not stop until all youth, whatever their sexual orientation or gender identity, are adequately protected." It seems almost impossible to those who remember lobotomies as a "cure" for homosexuality—that the whole premise that being gay is a perversion is finally being deeply challenged and proponents of "cures" are being called "frauds." Last month, Rep. Ted Lieu introduced the federal "Therapeutic Fraud Prevention Act" and there is a trial underway in New Jersey now in which plaintiffs claim the non-profit organization JONAH violated state consumer fraud laws when it promised to turn gays into heterosexuals, using techniques such as having them get naked and spend time with their fathers. In 2013, Gov. Chris Christie signed a law banning so-called "conversion" therapy in the state, joining California, Washington DC and the state of Washington. Lara's bill, SB 524, now goes to the State Assembly. Source: <https://www.frontiersmedia.com/frontiers-blog/2015/06/04/lara-moves-bill-to-regulate-troubled-teen-industry/>

How Standardized Testing Reveals Stark Inequalities Between Rich and Poor Friday, 05 June 2015 00:00 By Molly Knefel, AlterNet | News Analysis font size decrease font size increase font size Print 58 Email Classes are let out at Bennett Intermediate School, part of the Onteora school district, in Boiceville, New York, April 29, 2015. By the first day of testing, two of every three students in the district who were expected to take the exams had opted out; part of a small, if vocal, movement across the state urging parents to have their children sit out standardized exams that took off this year. (Emma Tannenbaum/The New York Times) Last month, USA Today reported on the hundreds of thousands of children across New York State who opted out of the state standardized English Language Arts (ELA) tests. Data from the tests is high stakes all around; it's linked to individual students' academic advancement, teacher evaluations, and overall school performance ratings. Proponents of testing usually argue that collecting such data is necessary to measure student achievement and hold educators accountable, but the state director of Democrats for Education Reform (DFER), Nicole Brisbane, offered USA Today a surprising explanation for why students really ought to take these tests: "Schools are one of the biggest differentiators of value in the suburbs," Brisbane told USA Today. "How valuable will a house be in Scarsdale when it isn't clear that Scarsdale schools are doing any better than the rest of Westchester or even the state? Opting out of tests only robs parents of that crucial data." The opt-out movement was bigger than ever this year, with an estimated 200,000 New York children refusing the state exams that test ELA and math. After a budget season in which Governor Cuomo pushed hard to have student test scores count for 50% of a teacher's evaluation, critics of high stakes testing had even more evidence to argue that the so called "education reform" agenda has more to do with firing teachers and closing public schools than it has to do with ending inequality. Following Brisbane's statement about potential Scarsdale homebuyers to its logical conclusion would suggest that testing is actually about maintaining inequality, not fighting it. "It is apparent that this competition, market-based ideology accepts that there will be inadequate resources for some and an abundance for others," says Jia Lee, a New York City public school parent and teacher. "I would argue that all public schools should and could be excellent places for all of our children and communities." Lee rejects the premise of pro-testing reformers that standardized tests are reliable indicators of quality education. "Historically, standardized tests have been reliable indicators of access to resources and nothing more." When it comes to resources, there's no question that wealthy school districts in New York State have an abundance compared to those that serve poorer children. According to data from the Education Trust, the highest poverty districts in the state receive 10% less funding per student in state and local revenues than those with the lowest poverty rates. Adjusted for the needs of students in poverty - who, according to the federal Title 1 formula, cost at least 40% more to educate - the poorest districts actually receive 16% less than those with the least poverty. On top of that, districts serving the most students of color receive 11% less per student than those serving the fewest students of color. Given these funding disparities at the state and local level, on top of the individual advantages that wealth provides students, like access to school supplies, tutoring, and enrichment, it becomes clear that students in a place like Scarsdale aren't on remotely the same playing field as students in the Bronx, where there is a 45% child poverty rate. Using the data provided by standardized tests to argue that wealthier neighborhoods have "better" schools further entrenches that inequality. Wealthier neighborhoods simply have wealthier schools. "It makes me so angry that there are people who have so much money and so much power who are using that power to keep my students in poverty, by putting policies in place that they know will keep some property values high and some property values low," says New York City public school teacher Megan Moskop. For Moskop, Brisbane's quote is significant because it unveils what's beneath the successful narrative of so many education reformers who advocate for closing public schools in the name of equality. "The narrative of DFER has been so carefully constructed and thoughtfully worded to call it a civil rights narrative. I think there are a lot of well intentioned people that buy into that narrative," including passionate teachers who believe in the charter school movement, says Moskop. "They're not seeing the other side of that, which is that this is a competitive system where kids are losing more and more." Victoria Frye, a New York City public school parent whose son has chosen to opt out of the tests since fifth grade, was surprised to hear DFER's focus on wealthy communities, given that the organization's agenda is all about focusing on accountability for schools in under-resourced communities. (A national reform organization, DFER advocates for "policies which stimulate the creation of new, accountable public schools" (particularly charter schools) "and...simultaneously close down failing schools.") "They're supposed to be concerned with the so-called 'failing' schools that are failing poor students, not with suburban property owners," Frye says. Her son is now a seventh grader and is opting out this year even though the tests are a determining factor in high school admissions; his current school goes through 12th grade, and he's happy to stay. "[Opting out] really diminishes your opportunities for applying to different schools, which is, of course, part of the whole market-based consumer model of education ushered in by Bloomberg," says Frye. Frye and her husband are both scientists and firm believers in quantitative measurement. But as her son lost increasing amounts of instruction time to test prep, and as the tests became further connected to teacher evaluations, "it just became more and more obvious that they were used for political reasons and not for pedagogy." Indeed, according to DFER's website, the organization's mission is to support leaders who "champion America's public schoolchildren." But Brisbane's USA Today quote is not an outlier. She expressed a similar sentiment in a DFER blog post, writing: "How will suburban communities maintain their draw if there isn't a measure of how the schools are actually doing in comparison to those across the state?" She went on to argue that test data has "sparked so many positive changes for low income students." In a statement to AlterNet, Brisbane claims it is the opt-out movement, not testing, that really harms low-income students: "The people who are opting out of tests are largely those who already feel like their child has access to a high-quality education, and are doing so in a way that directly harms low-income and minority students throughout New York. We should be supporting students and teachers throughout New York, whether they are in Scarsdale or the Bronx, and making sure all students have a fair shot at a quality education. Rather than maintain the status quo where wealth determines a quality education, data can and should highlight where the gaps are so we can invest in schools that need it the most." Brisbane's suggestion that the resistance to testing is populated by people who have no stake in the matter is evidently an attempt to make the protest seem less legitimate than it actually is; it is, however, an accusation that is demonstrably untrue, as reports of just who is opting out make clear. New York principal Carol Burris, for example, has written about her district, Brentwood, which had a 49% opt-out rate for ELA tests, and a 57% rate for the math tests administered the following week. Burris notes that, "Ninety-one percent of Brentwood students are black or Latino, and 81 percent are economically disadvantaged. Brentwood is not unique - Amityville (90 percent black or Latino, 77 percent economically disadvantaged) had an opt-out rate of 36.4 percent; Greenport (49 percent black or Latino, 56 percent economically disadvantaged) had an opt-out rate that exceeded 61 percent; and South Country opt outs (50 percent black or Latino and 51 percent economically disadvantaged) exceeded 64 percent." Those numbers clearly run counter to the narrative that the movement is exclusively white and middle-class. And while new data analysis from the New York Times reveals that districts with the highest opt-out rates had 50% or fewer students receiving free and reduced lunch, the opt-out numbers were higher this year in nearly every district where data is known. Critics of testing also point out that there are a number of factors making it harder for low-income families to refuse, from language barriers to a lack of educational options. "Families who are struggling financially are in even more difficult situations because they've been pressured to raise the scores to keep their schools open," parent and teacher Jia Lee says. "High stakes standardized tests are a distraction when we already know what the problems are. That is why families, especially in the shrinking middle class, are realizing more and more that the only way to push back against policies that deepen inequities, is to refuse the tests." Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/31199-how-standardized-testing-reveals-stark-inequalities-between-rich-and-poor>

Refugee group home caretaker accused of sexual abuse Written By Michael Lansu Posted: 06/01/2015, 04:16pm Jose Cerda | Supplied photo A 28-year-old caretaker at a U.S. Department of Human Services group home for refugees has been charged with sexual abuse after prosecutors claim he had sexual contact with a teenage resident. Jose Cerda is accused of touching the buttocks of a 16-year-old resident lying on a couch at the home in the 5800 block of South Indiana Avenue on April 10, Assistant State's Attorney Enrique Abraham said. The girl got off the couch and started doing chores, but Cerda followed her and rubbed up against her, Abraham said. The girl pushed Cerda away and went back to the couch, where Cerda touched her buttocks again, he said. Prosecutors claim Cerda rubbed up against the teen several more times that night and eventually went to lie in her bed. Later that night, Cerda went into the girl's room, kissed her and asked her to watch a movie on the living room couch, Abraham said. The two had sexual contact on the couch and then the girl eventually ran to her room, he said. The girl told a friend and counselor the next day, and Cerda was asked to leave the home, Abraham said. Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC After being asked to leave the home, Cerda went on a planned vacation out of the country, his lawyer said. He was arrested May 30 upon his return and charged with aggravated criminal sexual abuse. Cerda was born and raised in Chicago, graduated from Farragut Career Academy in 2004 and has "substantial contacts with the community," his lawyer said. Cerda was sentenced to one year's probation for a felony aggravated unlawful use of a weapon conviction eight years ago, authorities said. On Monday, Judge Maria Kuriakos Ciesil ordered Cerda held on $50,000 bail and said he is to have no contact with children except his own. He will be back in court June 23. Source: <http://chicago.suntimes.com/crime/7/71/653448/group-home-caretaker-charged-sexual-abuse>

Gateway to Shutter Six Group Homes by August Seventy residents will be affected in North Kingstown, Woonsocket, West Greenwich, South Kingstown and Central Falls. By Mark Schieldrop \(Patch Staff\) June 1, 2015 Share Comments Citing declining reimbursement rates and budget deficits, Gateway Healthcare has announced that it is closing six group homes in Rhode Island. The closure will affect 70 residents, of which 15 are children and adolescents. "We did not make this decision lightly. It followed an extensive and exhaustive review of each of our programs and all of our options," said Richard Leclerc, president of Gateway Healthcare. "The reality is these programs have been losing money for many years and reimbursement rates have been cut. It is no longer possible to sustain the level and quality of services we provide at the current reimbursement levels." The company said that the decision comes after "a decade of reimbursement rates that have remained flat or have been cut significantly," including a 40 percent cut four years ago. The group homes affected include four for adults with mental health or substance use/abuse issues - LaBelle House (North Kingstown), Central Street (Central Falls), King House (Woonsocket) and Men's House (Woonsocket), and two for children and adolescents -- the Arcadia Children's Home (West Greenwich) and Lighthouse for Youth (Waketfield), which was already scheduled to close at the end of June. We've had to subsidize these services for well over a decade and we are at a point now where we can no longer do that and maintain the quality and level of care needed for this population," Leclerc said. "As the major provider of community behavioral and mental health services, we need to make difficult decisions to ensure that we are able to protect and maintain our mission of providing services to 25,000 people each year in Rhode Island." As required by state law, Gateway Healthcare has notified the Rhode Island Department of Behavioral Healthcare, Developmental Disabilities and Hospitals, and the Rhode Island Department of Children, Youth & Families about the decision to close the six group homes within 90 days. Gateway Healthcare will still maintain operation of eight adult group homes and four group homes for adolescents. The company said it is trying to find work for 60 affected staff members elsewhere in the organization. The cuts come at a time that state leaders are grappling with significant substance abuse and mental health issues among Rhode Islanders. Source: <http://patch.com/rhode-island/coventry/gateway-shutter-six-group-homes-august-0>

Girl missing from foster care shot to death in Kansas City - SFGate Girl missing from foster care shot to death in Kansas City Updated 11:25 pm, Monday, June 1, 2015 KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) — A girl who was reported missing from the Kansas foster care system in 2012 has died after a shooting. Kansas media outlets report 16-year-old Jamie J. Hernandez-Zubia was shot early Saturday morning in Kansas City, Kansas. Police say they responded to calls about shots being fired and found the victim dead in the street. According to police, the occupants of two vehicles fired shots at each other and Hernandez-Zubia had been a passenger in one of those vehicles. She had been listed as missing since running away on June 9, 2012, from a foster care placement in Wathena in northeastern Kansas. Police said they are searching for a late-1990s or early-2000s white Ford F-150 pickup in relation to shooting. It may have a bullet hole in its tailgate and tinted windows. Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/crime/article/Girl-missing-from-foster-care-shot-to-death-in-6300730.php>

Former Foster Care Provider Charged with Child Sex Assault in Delaware Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on gmail Share on email Share on print More Sharing Services 7 Posted: Jun 02, 2015 8:32 AM PDT Updated: Jun 02, 2015 8:35 AM PDT By Ryan Dennis, Web Producer Email Connect Ryan.Dennis@FOXTV.com Officers say Lazarus Rougier, 61, has been charged with numerous counts of sexual abuse of a child. Newark, DE - New Castle County Police have arrested a 61-year old man following a sexual abuse investigation. Officers say Lazarus Rougier has been charged with numerous counts of sexual abuse of a child. The Criminal Investigations Unit, Family Services Squad began an investigation of sexual abuse of a young child in March of 2015. Investigators learned the victim was subjected to abuse at the hands of Rougier over a number of years. Detectives also learned the Rougier family fostered young children in their home starting in 2003 and ending in 2012. The children were as young as 10 years of age and resided in the Rougier home before being adopted. Lazarus Rougier has been charged with (two counts) unlawful sexual contact in the first degree, continuous sexual abuse of a child and sexual abuse of a child by a person of trust in the first degree. He has been arraigned and committed to the Howard R. Young Correctional Institution in lieu of $265,000 cash bail and issued a no contact order. Source: <http://www.myfoxphilly.com/story/29218169/former-foster-care-provider-charged-with-child-sex-assault-in-newark>

Managing Conflict and Anger with your Tweens and Teens By Kortney Peagram, Monday at 8:38 pm With our parent training we often get on the discussion of anger and conflict. Below are some strategies to use when managing your child's anger outbursts. Managing Angry Outburst Pick a time when your child is calm and more apt to listen. We recommend soon after the emotional meltdown but leave enough time for your child to calm down. Phrase the conversation as you are looking to better understand him/her and help with the anger. Replay the scenario and say something like: "I would like for you to tell me what happened. I might have missed something when you got into a fight with your brother or sister and I want to see your point of view." Have your child replay the situation and find out what is triggering the anger. You can share that you don't know how to communicate sometimes. Explain that you hate to yell, but when he/she does not listen or is mean you resort to yelling. I could also share that you don't know how to communicate with him/her when situations escalate. Add in that he/she is growing up so fast and you don't want to treat your child like a kid anymore, so if he/she could help you better learn how to communicate, you will make an effort to yell less. Honestly, this conversation will really help you. It will clear the air and give you a chance to start over with your child. When asking that question make sure you are genuinely asking and do not sound accusatory. Again, you are looking to understand. Then try to identify with him/her triggers that set your child off. Ask your child: How can we avoid these incidents? What would he/she recommend to do? What can he do to not be mean or volatile? What could you do to help him/her? Come up with strategies to manage your child's anger. Walk away from the situation Go to his/her room Go listen to some music until he/she calms down Have a code word that you and your child use when anger strikes Take deep breaths Close his/her eyes and count to 10 Remember you are doing a great job and this is so difficult. Be yourself and show your child that sometimes you don't know what to do...and that is ok. You are an amazing parent filled with love and you are doing everything in your power to help your child grow. Until Next Time... Kortney Peagram Be Brave*Be Strong*Be a Bulldog Source: <http://www.chicagonow.com/bully-boot-camp/2015/06/managing-conflict-and-anger-with-your-tweens-and-teens/>

Nine reported over abuse at Catholic boarding school Fort Augustus. Picture: WikiCommons/Colin Wilson CHRIS MARSHALL 18:23 Tuesday 02 June 2015 NINE men have been reported to prosecutors in connection with historical abuse at a former Catholic boarding school. Police have now concluded their investigation into allegations of physical and sexual abuse at Fort Augustus Abbey in the Highlands. The men are alleged to have been involved in incidents dating from September 1967 to December 1992. In a statement, the Crown Office said: "The procurator fiscal at Inverness has received reports concerning nine men in relation to incidents alleged to have occurred between September 1967 and December 1992. "The reports remain under consideration." The school was run by Benedictine monks but closed down in the 1990s. Police began their investigations in 2013 following a report from a former pupil and further allegations which were made in a BBC documentary. The programme contained allegations against seven monks. Two headmasters were also accused of covering-up the abuse. The documentary heard accounts from former pupils at Fort Augustus and its East Lothian prep school, Carlekemp. The accounts included allegations of physical violence and sexual assault. Source: <http://www.scotsman.com/news/scotland/top-stories/nine-reported-over-abuse-at-catholic-boarding-school-1-3790546>

Abuse allegations in Pueblo group homes a key factor in DHS turmoil By Joey Bunch The Denver Post Posted: 06/03/2015 12:01:00 AM MDT 14 Comments Updated: 06/03/2015 01:02:44 PM MDT Colorado DHS director Reggie Bicha put 11 people on paid leave in the wake of the abuse investigation that he says he instigated. (Craig F. Walker, Denver Post file) May 27: Colorado faces \$1 million sanction for federal infractions related to food-assistance program May 24: Colorado human services director Reggie Bicha pledges better communication May 19: Previous letter sent to Hickenlooper raised similar complaints about human services May 14: Gov. John Hickenlooper defends human services director Reggie Bicha PUEBLO — After four years and a string of controversies, one of the key criticisms from lawmakers of Colorado human services director Reggie Bicha was his handling of a search for physical abuse in a cluster of Pueblo group homes for people with intellectual and developmental disabilities. Some of the homes have had a series of incident reports that were self-reported and self-investigated that included sexual abuse, physical abuse, theft and neglect that ranged from a resident being left in her feces to a field trip that left one behind and home alone. There was also a mistake over what "Do not resuscitate" meant when a patient was unresponsive. Bicha said he lost trust in what his staff in Pueblo was telling him. He sent a team of nurses to the city to search for evidence in March without permission from any of the 62 residents' guardians — family members, individuals or charities with the legal rights to speak for individual residents. Investigators performed intimate examinations, or "body audits," of residents to determine whether wrongdoing had taken place. As a result, the Department of Human Services may have to answer questions in court about civil rights issues. That could compound the problems for the beleaguered political appointee of Gov. John Hickenlooper. More than 80 lawmakers signed a no-confidence letter directed at human services leadership last month. Advertisement "There's no doubt that it was very, very inappropriate and was an overreach of authority," said Jim Malila, whose 43-year-old son lives in one of the Pueblo homes. "I don't see any way that they didn't violate those people's rights. And if they did that, then I don't see how Reggie Bicha can keep his job." The state Department of Public Health and Environment is investigating a civil rights complaint by guardians against DHS. The health department report could be available in a matter of days, a spokesman said. Although it is still confidential, four people who were informed about the preliminary findings said the report cited "deficiencies" in how the department handled residents' civil rights. If deficiencies are found, the health department will ask DHS to submit a plan to correct its actions, but the American Civil Liberties Union, other organizations or the guardians could file suit on residents' behalf. "I feel certain the Pueblo situation is going to lead to some kind of litigation," said Denise Maes, policy director for the ACLU of Colorado. "I think everyone is waiting to see what this report says." Bicha put 11 people on paid leave in the wake of the abuse investigation he says he instigated. Bicha's critics, including the Pueblo Regional Center director who resigned after the abuse investigation began, claim he is aiming eventually to close or consolidate the regional centers in Pueblo, Grand Junction and Wheat Ridge. They point to dwindling numbers of residents there during Bicha's tenure. They say the abuse investigation was a means of harming their reputation. "If you can denigrate, degrade, call into question, it makes it a lot harder for people to defend it," said Valita Speedie, who resigned as head of the Pueblo Regional Center in April. Working on the case Bicha said he could not discuss the investigation. Neither would the Colorado attorney general's office, because its lawyers are working on the case. "What I can tell you is those medical professionals asked each and every one of those clients if it was OK," he said. Bicha calls opponents' concerns unwarranted suspicion and misplaced blame. Several outside agencies are looking into issues at the Pueblo Regional Center, including the Pueblo Adult Protective Services and Disability Law Colorado, an independent nonprofit that represents the legal rights of people with disabilities that specializes in civil rights and discrimination issues. The Pueblo County Sheriff's Department is investigating 10 cases related to the center, Bicha said. Bicha said intentions were in the best interest of the residents. "It really was done under an abundance of caution to make sure those residents were safe," Bicha said. He added: "In hindsight, I wish we had stopped and picked up the phone to call the guardians." Events were set in motion when Bicha learned in March of a potential abuse case that happened last fall. He would not elaborate on the case, but he said he had reason to doubt he got a straight story from the center's staff. He said he talked to the Pueblo Sheriff's Department and Adult Protective Services in Pueblo County and "connected the dots" about the three agencies' shared concerns. "At that point, I didn't know who we could rely on to give us good, accurate information," Bicha said. "A strip search"? "Let's call it what it was," Speedie said of the body audits. "It was a strip search." She said when a team of nurses showed up at the center, they wanted to bring all the residents to one home and search them in a restroom. DHS disputes that. Ultimately residents were checked in their bedrooms. Speedie is convinced the abuse allegations are part of Bicha's goal to close or consolidate the three regional centers. The three homes have 356 beds total, and over the past five years, the vacancy rate has grown from 6 percent to 25 percent, according to DHS documents. Speedie said she told Bicha he was moving too fast on closing or downsizing the centers, because a lot of residents have nowhere to go. Their home for years has been in a group home in Pueblo. She said the plan would uproot fragile people who have a history of not being able to make it in private nursing homes. "I made a decision to speak up, and politically it was the wrong thing to do. And I knew at the time I'd done the wrong thing," Speedie said. "I knew there would be consequences for not going along with the marching orders." Bicha doesn't deny having conversations with Speedie about the future of the regional centers, but he denied having any vendetta against her or any intention to close the centers, since legally that's a decision for legislators, he said. Group of guardians Lynne Parker Crooks, whose 46-year-old son lives in the Wheat Ridge regional center, was among a group of guardians who formed Save Our Regional Centers after a meeting with Bicha in 2013. She and others in attendance said Bicha told them about plans to downsize and possibly close some of the centers. Bicha said his conversations about the future of the centers is being mischaracterized. Colorado has been trending toward fewer residents since the 1960s, when there were more than 2,000 people in the regional centers, he said, adding that privatization and less desire from guardians to use the state homes has driven the decline. Some states have eliminated group homes entirely after the U.S. Supreme Court's Olmstead vs. L.C. ruling in 1999 that said government should move to end "isolation and segregation of individuals with disabilities as a serious and pervasive form of discrimination." That same year, DHS issued a report on "downsizing initiatives" for the group homes. The number of people in Colorado's group homes has been nearly cut in half since then. "This started long before Bicha came to Colorado," Bicha said. Moreover, Bicha said he doesn't personally support closing them. He said a home for people with disabilities who have no place to go will always exist, and no one has been moved to a private facility without the consent of guardians. A report to legislators in December said that as of September, 85 of the three centers' 266 residents at the time were ready to be transitioned to private care. Guardians of 67 of them declined the offer. In 2014 the Colorado legislature created a 15-member task force to study whether it could feasibly close the centers and still care for the people who need the level of care the group homes provide. Not unusual Speedie said the 86 incidents reported at the Pueblo Regional Center during the past three years are not unusual, based on the 8½ years she was there. The "homes of last resort" typically are for those whose behavior is so severe that private nursing homes won't take them. The 86 incident reports since 2012 are less than half the 180 that were filed the previous three years, including some that involved accusations against staff members, according to the state health department. "We can't get rid of people who are hard to deal with," Speedie said. "We have to figure out how to deal with them. It's not easy." Bicha would not discuss his specific reasons for suspecting abuse, but the publicly available incident reports show a handful of problems. On May 23, 2014, a female resident said a male staff member touched her inappropriately at a Pueblo home. An internal investigation by the Pueblo Regional Center said the allegation was substantiated and the employee was fired. In another Pueblo home on Feb. 7, 2014, a resident in his 70s died after he was found unresponsive. A senior staff member misinterpreted a directive on the person's chart as "Do not resuscitate." The directive, however, meant "full resuscitation." Staff told investigators they were confused. Another resident in his 70s had a digital home theater and other valuable electronics stolen from his room the day after Christmas in 2012. The DHS incident report indicated the case was unsolved, but "the facility implemented a new system to keep track of residents' property," the report states. There are other accounts of staff manhandling or neglecting individual care, including one resident inadvertently left behind at the home when the rest left in a van for a field trip. Stephanie Garcia, executive director of the ARC of Pueblo, which has guardianship of seven of the 62 residents who were searched, said the investigation and uncertainty have weighed on the residents. Some residents are worried they did something wrong, and some are concerned they might live in an unsafe place, she said. "The residents are internalizing all of this," Garcia said. Joey Bunch: 303-954-1174, jbunch@denverpost.com or twitter.com/joeybunch Follow @joeybunch on twitter Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_28239934/abuse-allegations-pueblo-group-homes-tipping-point-dhs

For Advocates, Push to End Solitary Confinement in Prison Only Begins With Youth Isolation Saturday, 06 June 2015 00:00 By Victoria Law, Truthout | News Analysis font size decrease font size increase font size Print 24 Email (Image: Jared Rodriguez / Truthout) DeAngelo Cortijo was 11 years old when he locked himself in a group home van. For that, he was sent to a juvenile prison in San Francisco. There, he got into a fight and was kept in his room for four days. Locking a person in a room or cell is frequently referred to as isolation, isolated confinement or solitary confinement. That was his first time. But it wasn't his only time. During the seven years he spent in and out of California's juvenile legal system, Cortijo also spent increasing amounts of time in isolation. When he was 13, he recalled, he spent four or five months confined to his room for 23 hours a day. He was supposed to be allowed out of his room for half an hour at the start of each day and for half an hour at the end of the day, but most days, he remained locked in for the full 24 hours. Being locked in his room did not protect Cortijo from physical violence. Once, he recalls, a guard asked him for his lunch tray. "He was being very disrespectful about it," Cortijo said. "I told him to talk to me with more respect." In response, the guard, along with several other staff members, entered Cortijo's cell and "began punching me and kicking me. They cuffed my left wrist to my right ankle, stripped all the clothes off my back, cut my pants off me, left me naked in my cell, took everything out of my room, turned the fluorescent lights on high and left me on the cement floor for about an hour and a half." Cortijo was 14 years old. "We began looking at the laws and realized there was no uniform definition around the use of solitary confinement." At age 17, he spent seven and a half months in isolation. After the first couple of days, he said, "everything just turned into one. I would wake up and there would be white walls everywhere and a gray toilet. I'd be highly depressed." He remembered lying on his bed for three or four hours, thinking about all the different ways he could end his life. Sometimes he felt extreme rage, and banged and kicked at the door in the hopes that someone would talk to him; sometimes, he would cover the lights and lay in his bed for hours. Cortijo's experience is far from rare. Court documents reported 249 uses of solitary confinement at five juvenile prisons in California during a 14-week period in 2011. California's Senate Bill 124, which passed the State Senate on June 2, would change that practice, drastically curtailing the use of isolation in the state's juvenile prison system. SB124 is one of several efforts across the nation focused on ending the placement of children in extreme isolation. The bill is, in part, a result of research and publicity about the effects of solitary confinement particularly on the still-developing brain of adolescents and teenagers. In children and adults, the effects of solitary confinement, also referred to as isolated confinement or isolation, often include depression, hallucinations, panic attacks, cognitive deficits, paranoia, anxiety and anger. In adolescents, who are still developing socially, psychologically and neurologically, the results can be particularly devastating. One study found that, among those who died by suicide in juvenile prisons, half occurred in solitary confinement, and 62 percent had a history of being in isolation. Since 2012, eight states have prohibited placing youth in solitary for punitive reasons. In May 2015, a federal judge approved new rules limiting the use of isolation in Illinois' juvenile prisons. In New York City, the Board of Correction, which makes rules governing the city's jail system, voted to end solitary for 16- and 17-year-olds and to develop alternatives to solitary for people ages 18 to 21. In New York State, two class-action lawsuits have pushed the Department of Corrections and Community Supervision into settlement agreements requiring that, even in isolation, 16- and 17-year-olds be allowed out of their cells for five to six hours on weekdays and for two hours on weekends. On May 19, 2015, in response to a lawsuit, California's Contra Costa County Probation Department agreed to a settlement ending solitary confinement in its juvenile hall. These efforts come after years of advocacy. In California, the impetus for SB124 began in 2011, when several family members contacted the Ella Baker Center for Human Rights about their children held in youth prisons. One mother told advocates about her son, who had attempted suicide six or seven times while in a youth prison. Each time, the boy was placed in solitary confinement. "We began looking at the laws that were in place and realized there was no uniform definition around the use of solitary confinement," said Jennifer Kim, director of programs at the Ella Baker Center. Different terminology - such as "secure housing unit" and "behavior treatment program" - also made it difficult for advocates and family members to talk about their children's experiences of being locked in their rooms 23 hours a day without programs or services. The following year, in 2012, the Center brought the issue to the attention of State Sen. Leland Yee, who, Kim said, was horrified at the practice and introduced SB1363. The bill drew fire from the California Correctional Peace Officers Association, which represents guards in juvenile and adult prisons, as well as the Chief Probation Officers of California, the California Probation, Parole and Correctional Association, and the California State Sheriffs' Association. In January 2015, State Sen. Mark Leno introduced the bill again, this time as SB124. "This is an opportunity for California to be proactive rather than reactive," Kim said. "We don't want a young person dying in isolation to be the impetus for the legislature to act." Limiting Teens in Isolation Elsewhere As advocates in California are learning, the fight to limit solitary - for youth or adults - often requires years of organizing, including advocacy by those who have experienced it firsthand. Johnny Perez, who has spent time in isolation in New York prisons, is one of those advocates. Though Perez was placed in solitary as both a teenager and an adult, all of the occurrences took place in adult facilities. New York is one of two states that automatically charge people 16 and over as adults. Shortly after he arrived at Rikers Island, New York City's island jail complex, Perez got into a fight when he tried to use a gang-controlled phone. He was sent to isolation for 60 days. There, he said, he lost all sense of time. When it got dark, he tried to go to sleep. But the cell was cold and the one thin blanket was little help. He remembers feeling sad and helpless. He spent a lot of time crying. "My self-esteem took a hit," he told Truthout. "After a while, you start to think, 'Wow, maybe I really am a bad person. Maybe I do deserve to be here.'" He was 16 years old. An officer sat outside their cells and was able to watch them dress, undress or go to the bathroom. Perez spent eight months on Rikers before being released. Four years later, he was back at Rikers where he spent eight months in isolation. "It affects the value that you see in yourself. It teaches you to shut your emotions down, but what you're doing is keeping everything inside." Comparing his two experiences, he says, "It's hard when you're younger. You're not understanding what's going on. If someone walks by your cell and doesn't talk to you and you want to talk to them, you think it's something about you. Especially if they do it over and over. As a youngster, I internalized it and thought there was something wrong with me." In contrast, he said, "As an adult, you don't internalize it. You know, it's not me; it's you. You're the problem." Trauma stemming from isolation doesn't stop once a teenager hits 18. "Lilia" is now a writer and activist with the HerStory Writers Workshop, which conducts writing workshops at the Suffolk County Correctional Facility, a local jail on Long Island, New York. She herself experienced the devastating effects of solitary when, at 19, she was placed in the jail's protective custody. "The way that they have the cells set up is that anyone who's either in isolated confinement or protective custody, it's the same amount of time in lock," she told Truthout. Each person spent 22 hours in her cell. The cells in the jail's isolation unit each had three solid walls and one "wall" that was a row of bars facing the jail's corridor. For the women inside, the lack of a fourth wall also meant a lack of privacy. An officer sat outside their cells and was able to watch them dress, undress or go to the bathroom. "There was always an officer in front of you," she said. The officer was usually a man. Being in protective custody also didn't "protect" anyone from the violence of the jail, Lilia recalled. "They would do random cell searches for drugs and things that you shouldn't have," she said. "The way in which they went about it was that they would bring in a group of very large officers who were in combat gear from head to toe with black masks over their face, helmets - riot gear really was what it was. They would come marching in and they would, in five minutes, ransack everybody's individual cells. I specifically remember seeing peanut butter and jelly go flying across the wall, hitting the other wall and sliding down." It wasn't only food and inanimate objects that were subject to violence. The unit also housed women with severe mental illnesses. Lilia remembers a woman who talked, paced and shouted incessantly from her cell. "They came into her cell in riot gear," she said. "From the sounds that I heard and the force of them, I'm assuming holding her down. It was terrible to even hear. She lay in her cell for two days after that, totally quiet and sedated." When the woman left her cell, she was black and blue. No one ever told Lilia why she was in isolation. "I never knew to ask," she said. "I had never been in jail or prison before. For half of those six months, I didn't know there were other units that were run differently. I just thought everyone was in isolated confinement or, as they would say, protective custody. The level of understanding was just not there." Nearly 20 years later, that experience still affects her. "You internalize the fear in a very deep way," she said. "If I'm ever locked in a small area or confronted with officers in riot gear, it definitely brings up post-traumatic stress disorder. I have to say to myself, 'This is not jail. They're not going to do anything to me.' There was also the impending threat that your life might have been at risk. Whether it was perceived or real, it was definitely palpable." They had no contact with other people. They were deprived of education, mental health services and, often, even something to read. In some states, litigation has forced changes. Adam Schwartz is the senior staff counsel at the American Civil Liberties Union of Illinois. In 2012, after investigating conditions in the state's juvenile prisons and interviewing youth, the ACLU filed R.J. v. Jones, a civil rights class-action lawsuit around conditions and services in youth prisons. Four years ago, Schwartz explained, youth confined by the Illinois Department of Juvenile Justice were placed in isolation for days - or in some cases, weeks - at a time. They had no contact with other people. They were deprived of education, mental health services and, often, even something to read. The isolation induces further anxiety, depression and post-traumatic stress disorder. "It's fundamentally counter-therapeutic and destructive," he said. Moreover, solitary confinement was often used as a form of punishment. Under a settlement agreement, the Illinois Department of Juvenile Justice agreed to change its policies around solitary confinement. On April 24, 2015, a federal judge approved the new policies, under which, Schwartz explained, isolation cannot be used specifically to punish a youth for breaking a rule. Instead, isolation can only be used temporarily to remove a person from the immediate situation. The policies also impose time limits if a youth is separated from others for exhibiting aggressive or violent behavior (24 hours maximum), disruptive behavior (four hours maximum), for administrative reasons (72 hours maximum) or because of an investigation (four days). In addition, the new rules require that any youth confined for 24 hours or more must spend eight hours out of their cell each day in the company of staff members and have the ability to talk to a staff member. They also will no longer be excluded from programming, such as school. In 2012, the New York Civil Liberties Union and Cardozo School of Law filed Peoples v. Fischer, challenging solitary confinement practices in the adult prison system. The following year, the suit was expanded to a class action, encompassing not only the plaintiffs, but those in similar situations. In February 2014, the Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS) agreed to an interim stipulation, including a requirement that 16- and 17-year-olds be allowed out of their cell five hours daily on weekdays and that a separate disciplinary confinement unit be created for 16- and 17-year-old boys. On weekends, however, youth can still be confined to their cells for 23 to 24 hours. That same year, Prisoners' Legal Services of New York filed Cookhorne v. Fischer, challenging DOCCS policies around 16- and 17-year-olds in solitary. In fall 2014, DOCCS entered a settlement agreement, which expanded the amount of time out-of-cell for 16- and 17-year-olds to six hours on weekdays. In addition, four of those six hours had to be for educational or other programming unless the youth was deemed a risk to himself or others. Every youth in solitary had to be offered two hours of recreation every day. Cookhorne also specifically required that 16- and 17-year-old girls in isolation be allowed the same opportunities as boys in isolation. "Solitary Confinement Is Torture for All People" Scott Paltrowitz, the associate director of the Prison Visiting Project of the Correctional Association of New York and a member of the Campaign for Alternatives to Isolated Confinement, monitors prison conditions statewide. He notes that practice can often be different than written policy. "In practice, many people in SHU [secure housing unit] often do not go out to recreation due to a variety of reasons and thus are held in solitary confinement 24 hours a day," he told Truthout. "Fear of a confrontation with security staff on the way to recreation, cold or inclement weather without proper clothing, the fact that the recreation itself involves just being alone in a cage without any equipment, and simply being denied the opportunity by staff are some common reasons people do not participate." One of the prisons he has visited is Greene Correctional Facility, a medium-security prison in which the median age is 22. Many sent to Greene are between the ages of 16 and 21. Greene is also one of eight New York State prisons with an S-Block or SHU200, a solitary confinement unit of 200 beds in 100 cells. "Solitary confinement is torture for all people." Younger people are disproportionately sent to the SHU, Paltrowitz told Truthout. In October 2014, 70 percent of the 185 people in Greene's S-Block were under 30. The median age of a person confined in S-Block was 24. In addition, people in the S-Block were disproportionately people of color: 57 percent were Black, 25 percent were Latino and 14 percent were white. "Solitary confinement is torture for all people," said Paltrowitz, noting that the UN special rapporteur on torture has stated that no person should be subjected to isolation for 15 days or more because of its devastating mental, physical and psychological effects. "We believe that no person should be subjected to the torture of solitary." Paltrowitz and others are advocating for the HALT Solitary Act to limit solitary to 15 days regardless of age. It would also end the practice altogether for people ages 21 and younger. Under the act, Paltrowitz explained, after spending 15 days in solitary, people would be sent to a residential rehabilitation unit (RRU) where they would be allowed out of their cell for seven hours each day. Six of those hours would be spent in programs in congregate settings - in other words, not just exercising in a solitary cage or sitting in an empty classroom. Johnny Perez is now an adult, and works as the safe re-entry advocate at the Urban Justice Center in New York City. He's also working to ensure that no one ever has to go through a similar experience. In September 2014, the New York City Department of Correction ended the practice of placing teenagers under 18 in solitary. In January 2015, one month after hearing approximately six hours of testimony from Perez and many others, the Board of Correction unanimously voted to phase out solitary for people ages 21 and younger in all New York City jails. The phaseout remains contingent on funding for alternative programming. In California, advocates are hopeful that youth solitary will end soon. Cortijo is now 21, a college student and juvenile justice advocate. He has testified about his experiences before the Senate Public Safety Committee to emphasize SB124's urgency. Dredging up these memories is painful, he says, but he is committed to speaking about them publicly. "I keep in mind I'm doing it for the tens of thousands of youth," Cortijo said. "It's my life goal to help youth who don't have a voice - whether in the foster care or juvenile justice system. They should have the chance to live a normal life and not have to spend life in prison or be dead or be on probation." Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/31166-for-advocates-push-to-end-solitary-confinement-in-prison-only-begins-with-youth-isolation>

California boot camp for at-risk kids leaves 7 with injuries consistent with abuse, police say | Fox News### California boot camp for at-risk kids leaves 7 with injuries consistent with abuse, police say Published June 04, 2015 Associated Press Facebook Twitter Email Print LOS ANGELES – A weeklong boot camp run by Los Angeles-area police departments that was meant to turn around misbehaving youth left seven of the kids with injuries consistent with abuse, investigators said. Those seven were among 39 children who attended the boot camp from May 17 to 24, and all were being interviewed along with the drill instructors, the San Luis Obispo County Sheriff's Office said Wednesday. Sheriff's spokesman Tony Cipolla declined to describe the injuries and said no charges have been filed. The agency has never gotten a complaint about the 17-year-old camp before, Cipolla said. Greg Owen, an attorney representing the parents of the children who had injuries, said most of them had cuts and bruises after being beaten bloody at times, and that one boy had a fractured hand. He said the lasting injuries will be emotional. "Talking to the parents today, their kids can't sleep through the night, they don't want to go out of the house," he said. "That will never go away." He said the parents are considering filing a lawsuit in the case but that they're waiting for his office and the sheriff's office to finish their investigations first. Meanwhile, he said the parents want the police officers who were drill instructors at the camp to be taken off the streets and California boot camp for at-risk kids leaves 7 with injuries consistent with abuse, police say | Fox News### held accountable. The program is run by the Huntington Park and South Gate police departments, and drill instructors are employed with those agencies, Cipolla said. "Both agencies believe in complete transparency and take all allegations very seriously," South Gate police Capt. James Teeple said in a statement. He said the police chiefs of both agencies met with the parents involved in the most recent program Sunday "to provide assurance that any matters of concern will be investigated thoroughly." He and a spokesman for Huntington Park police did not respond to calls for further comment. The LEAD program began in 1998 as an intervention for troubled California boot camp for at-risk kids leaves 7 with injuries consistent with abuse, police say | Fox News### youths from Southern California. Participants can range from kids who've joined gangs or use drugs to children with bad grades or attitude problems. Veronica Bernal said her 16-year-old son came back from the boot camp in tears with an untreated fractured hand. "They put him in a dark room, and they would beat him," she said. Aracely Pulido said her 14-year-old daughter came back with bruises covering her arms, and said that drill instructors had slapped and kicked her, and stomped on her back. "She's traumatized," Pulido said. Parents pay $400 for children ages 11 to 17 to join the voluntary, 20-week LEAD program, short for Leadership, Empowerment and Discipline. The camp includes a one-week boot camp at the California National Guard's base in San Luis Obispo, and then daylong Sunday sessions. ____ Follow Amanda Lee Myers on Twitter at <https://twitter.com/AmandaLeeAP> Source: <http://www.foxnews.com/us/2015/06/04/california-boot-camp-for-at-risk-kids-leaves-7-with-injuries-consistent-with/#>

State shuts down Hutto group home By Sophia Beausoleil Published: June 3, 2015, 8:45 pm Updated: June 4, 2015, 6:44 am 12Click to share on Twitter Click to share on Google+ 453Share on Facebook Click to share on Pinterest HUTTO, Texas (KXAN) — The state has terminated its contract with a group home in Hutto after multiple violations. The Department of Aging and Disability Services said it is in the process of canceling of A Step Beyond's contracts and certification. The agency provided services for people with intellectual disabilities. Cecilia Cavuto, a spokesperson for DADS, said the state decided to terminate the contracts after investigations in May and April showed the agency did not fill and administer medications to clients. The state also said A Step Beyond did not have a nurse to monitor medications. Concern with group home after man pounds on doors in middle of night "I started putting everything together and realized it was really bad, it was scary, and I didn't want to be apart of it," said a former employee who asked KXAN News to conceal her identity. "Ashley" was a former nurse who worked at the home part-time between August 2014 and April 2015. "I had tried to make changes and tried to get training for the staff and had been met with defiance," said Ashley. "I wanted to stay and protect the clients, but at the same time, it was bigger than I was. "The staff wasn't trained, wasn't prepared, didn't know what to do," she added. "There was no behavioral plan in the home." The state said during its investigation it found A Step Beyond staff members were not trained on client behavioral support plans. Officials also found there were more clients living in at least of the group homes than the number allowed by regulations. Hutto Mayor Pro-Tem Michael Smith is listed as the CEO and Director of A Step Beyond. KXAN News went to the company's location, but Smith had left. However, he did send a statement. We are currently in the process of helping the individuals we serve find new homes and are unavailable for an on camera interview. These individuals are like family to us and we are doing everything in our power to ensure a smooth transition and would appreciate your respect and privacy in regards to them. In relation to the state's decision to terminate our contracts; we disagree with the allegations that have been brought forth and were given no chance to prove our innocence. The majority of infractions were caused by a previous RN. That RN had already been terminated and the new RN was rectifying their mistakes. The state refused to acknowledge that and allow us to show the progress that had been made." Ashley said Smith is referring to her, but she denies that claim. "I resigned; I gave two weeks notice because I couldn't deal with what was going on anymore," she explained. Hutto Mayor Pro-tem Michael Smith According to public franchise tax papers for A Step Beyond, Sahn Moss, the mother of Michael Smith, has been listed as director of the group home as recently as Feb. 2, 2015. Police arrested her earlier on Jan. 29, 2015 on a DWI charge after she crashed her Suburban in Hutto, according to court records. Those documents said Moss "confessed to taking (ingesting) two Lorazepam pills that she stole from consumers at the group home where she is employed." Court records said police found a "pill bottle" in the open glove box which was prescribed to her ex-husband and officers also found multiple prescriptions belonging to different individuals in the trunk. DADS said local law enforcement notified them about the situation when it happened. The state said A Step Beyond, the contract owner, program director and HR director are banned from contracting with DADS for eight years. They are able to keep their day-rehabilitation program since that is not regulated by DADS. What happens to residents? DADS said during its investigation, A Step Beyond had 23 home and community-based services clients. According to the state, the program provides services and support to people with intellectual disabilities who are living with their families, or in group homes with no more than four people. During the investigation, A Step Beyond also had 14 clients in its Texas Home Living, also known as TxHmL, program. The state said that provides selected essential services and supports to people with an intellectual disability or a related condition who live in their own home or their family's home. Clients who receive services in their own homes or in the homes of family members will not need to relocate. Clients who live in group homes operated by A Step Beyond might choose to relocate. Some of the clients will remain in their current group homes, because home modifications were designed specifically for their individual needs. A search for a different provider to take over services at the home is currently under way. The local authorities are monitoring them and we have staff visiting in person and via phone daily," said Cavuto. Billing DADS said home and community-based services providers, like A Step Beyond, bill the state for the number of units they provide to a person and are reimbursed for the services based on rates by the Texas Health and Human Service Commission's Rate Analysis Department. The average is $5,200 per month for an individual in a group home and $2,645 per month for an individual living in their own home, with their family or foster care. Source: <http://kxan.com/2015/06/03/state-shuts-down-hutto-group-home/>

Lebanon County to close group homes for troubled teens in cost saving move By John Latimer johnlatimer@ldnews.com @johnlatimer on Twitter Updated: 06/04/2015 05:44:13 PM EDT Jim Holtry, director of Lebanon County Children and Youth Services, explains why he believes the county's two group homes for teenage boys and girls should be closed at Thursday's Lebanon County commissioners' meeting. (John Latimer — Lebanon Daily News) The Lebanon County commissioners on Thursday authorized the closing of two county-owned group homes for teenage boys and girls that were operated by the county's Children and Youth Services agency. The vote to close the homes was unanimous and was done on the recommendation of Children and Youth Services Director Jim Holtry after he determined the services could be provided by private group homes at a significant cost savings. The homes — one for boys between 13 to 18 in Fontana and another for girls of the same age in Lebanon — each have room for six troubled youth who are not suitable to remain with their families or be placed in traditional foster homes, Holtry said. The county opened the group homes in 1977 at a time when there was a need for them because the only placement options were foster homes and institutions, Holtry told the commissioners. "There was no go between," he explained. "Counties developed group home placements that were a little more structured than foster care but not nearly as structured as institutional placements." In the intervening years as more private homes offering specialized foster care opened, counties began closing their group homes, Holtry said. Lebanon County is just one of two counties in the state that still operates its own facilities, he added. Holtry came to his decision that it's time for Lebanon County to close its group homes after reviewing the cost of operating the homes and their occupancy rates over the past five years. Advertisement "Our occupancy rate over that period was a little over 60 percent," he said. "I also found our per diem rate over that same time period was a little over $178 a day." Through the first 10 months of this fiscal year, Holtry said, the per diem cost has risen to $214, nearly double the $110 per diem cost of a private provider. At the current occupancy rates projected over the entire year, if the county switched to a private provider, it would result in about $262,000 in savings, Holtry said. Because the agency receives most of its funding from the state and about 20 percent from the county's general fund, the savings for the county by switching to private providers would be about $52,000. The remaining money could be diverted to the agency's other program needs that are over budget, Holtry said. Another consideration in making his recommendation, Holtry said, is the difficulty in staffing both of the homes. The agency has been short-staffed most of the year and is on pace to pay $75,000 in overtime expenses. "The bottom line is, I just really truly feel the group homes have not been as cost effective as they have been in the past," he said. "I just think it has come to a point that we really should close them. I think we can get as good a service, if not better service, from the providers we have." Holtry said every effort would be made to place the teens currently living in the homes in privately run homes located in Lebanon County. However, he had no timetable for when that might happen. "I assure you that in no way will the youth that are at our group homes suffer in any way by not having our own group homes," he said. "We have contracts with some very good providers who will provide very adequate care for these children. ... Because the private providers have more staff than we do, they are able to provide many more activities and functions for the kids than we are able to provide." The five full-time employees working at the two homes were informed of their potential closing earlier this week and efforts will be made to place them in other suitable county jobs, said county administrator Jamie Wolgemuth. The children's homes are owned by the county, and once they are closed will likely be sold and their contents auctioned, Holtry said. In other news related to Children and Youth Services's budget, Holtry told the commissioners that the state Department of Children, Youth and Families has agreed to his appeal for reimbursement of its portion of the $1.5 million in county expenses that were over budget last year. "The state has agreed, and in a couple of weeks, you will be getting a check for almost $952,000 in additional revenue for the county to offset those over expenditures," Holtry told the commissioners. "I was optimistic that we would get something, but I never anticipated it would be the full amount, and that is good news." Source: http://www.ldnews.com/local/ci_28252103/lebanon-county-close-group-homes-troubled-teens-cost

Pasadena youth group home sued for teen's alleged abuse Posted by Colleen Park on June 3, 2015 in Crime | 202 Views | Leave a response A teen was physically and mentally abused by adult staff members who were supposed to protect him while he resided at a Pasadena youth group home, according to a lawsuit filed on his behalf. The lawsuit was filed by John Stewart, guardian of the now-14-year-old boy, against Five Acres – The Boys' and Girls' Aid Society of Los Angeles, alleging assault, battery, intentional infliction of emotional distress and negligence. The complaint seeks unspecified damages. A representative for Five Acres did not immediately respond to a request for comment. According to the lawsuit, the boy was placed in Five Acres' Solita group home in 2011 after a judge declared him a ward of the court. The boy's mother died and his father was in prison, leaving no other family members available to care for him or raise him, according to the complaint. The suit states that a "significant incident of mental and physical abuse" against the boy occurred last September when an adult staff member with a history of attacking and choking the plaintiff punched and knocked him down in an isolation room. The boy was 13 years old at the time. "The staff member then jumped on plaintiff, continuing to beat him with his fists, until another staff member finally intervened and pulled the attacker off of plaintiff and told the staff member to leave the room," the lawsuit alleges. The alleged assailant left, but returned with a pair of scissors and cut the boy on his back, causing him "significant fear, pain and bleeding" and requiring him to be taken by ambulance to a hospital emergency room for treatment, according to the complaint. On other occasions, staff members elbowed the boy until his face bled and stomped on his head after knocking him down during a basketball game, the suit alleges. The employees also threatened the plaintiff with more beatings, ridiculed him and told him his parents were "retarded," according to the suit. He was additionally kept in isolation for lengthy periods and "made to feel that he was worthless and unprotected," the complaint says. Source: <http://mynews1a.com/crime/2015/06/03/pasadena-youth-group-home-sued-for-teens-alleged-abuse/>

This Teen Is Using Her Graduation Dress to Support Human Rights Around the Globe Nora Crotty June 3, 2015 Photo courtesy of Erinne Paisley At first, Erinne Paisley, an 18-year-old from Victoria, British Columbia, simply wanted to create a high school graduation dress from recycled materials. "Someone I know made a grad dress out of newspaper a few years ago, and then her other friend did a different dress out of neckties, so the idea of recycled dresses had kind of always been in the back of my mind," she says. Outdoor Clothing & Gear Appalachian Outdoors Sponsored I don't like this ad Thank you for your feedback We'll review and make changes needed. Undo Why don't you like this ad ? It's offensive to me I keep seeing this It's not relevant to me Something else But soon, that initial idea took a much more meaningful turn. "As graduation got closer, the fact that 62 million girls around the world don't have access to secondary education as I was preparing to celebrate my own secondary education was something that was really moving to me." So, instead of shopping for a dress like her peers, Paisley gathered up her old precalculus homework papers, along with some velvet and satin ribbon, and transformed it into a skater-esque frock. She finished the look off by writing on the skirt, "I've received my education. Not every woman has that right," along with "MALALA.ORG." 17 Unbelievable Recolored Historical Images Answers Did You Know Sponsored I don't like this ad Thank you for your feedback We'll review and make changes needed. Undo Why don't you like this ad ? It's offensive to me I keep seeing this It's not relevant to me Something else The latter, of course, is the website for the Malala Fund — the charitable initiative founded by human rights activist Malala Yousafzai, the Pakistani teen who survived a brutal gun attack by the Taliban and was awarded the Nobel Prize for her work in advocating female education around the world. Though Paisley was aware of Malala's plight before ("I've been interested in activism, charity, and giving back for as long as I can remember," she tells Yahoo Style), her interest piqued after hearing Malala speak in person at last year's We Day UK, a rally to help inspire young people to contribute to global change. 27 Memories Every 90s Kid Has About Grade School Answers Offbeat Sponsored I don't like this ad Thank you for your feedback We'll review and make changes needed. Undo Why don't you like this ad ? It's offensive to me I keep seeing this It's not relevant to me Something else Malala Yousafzai. Photo: Getty Images "Being in the same room as her was absolutely moving to me; something I can't even describe," Paisley says of the experience. "The fact that she's the same as me or any other teenage girl that I know, there's really no difference — it's just the circumstances that she was born into, and the extent that she had to fight to receive her education was something that really resonates." Source: <https://www.yahoo.com/style/this-teen-is-using-her-graduation-dress-to-support-120620890688.html>

Treatment center director accused of raping patient By FNS on Jun 5, 2015 at 11:49 p.m. Email Sign up for Breaking News Alerts news Fargo, 58102 Fargo ND 101 5th Street North 58102 EAST GRAND FORKS, Minn. — The director of an East Grand Forks residential treatment center pleaded not guilty this week to charges he raped a then 28-year-old patient. Bruce Lee Biddlecome, 40, of Crookston, is charged with one count of third-degree criminal sexual conduct in Minnesota 9th District Court in Crookston, a felony with a maximum penalty of 15 years imprisonment. Biddlecome, a licensed drug and alcohol counselor, was the director of the Douglas Place, a residential treatment center in East Grand Forks, according to court records. The charges were filed against him on May 20 after East Grand Forks Police received a report from Polk County Social Services in late December, saying a female patient at the center told a counselor she had recently been sexually assaulted by Biddlecome, according to an affidavit of probable cause, a court document that details the charges against a defendant. When interviewed by police in February, the woman told investigators Biddlecome sexually assaulted her twice in his vehicle while she was a patient at the Douglas Place, the affidavit says. Both times, she told police, Biddlecome demanded she have sex with him and threatened she would go back to where she came from — she understood him to mean jail — if she did not comply, according to the affidavit. The woman, now 29, told investigators Biddlecome raped her a third time on Christmas Eve when he went into her room at the Douglas Place and woke her up around 8 a.m. by stroking her hair, the affidavit says. The woman told investigators he said he had come for an early Christmas present and that it was her, according to the affidavit. He then raped her, she told investigators. A Douglas Place counselor gave police what the victim claims to be Biddlecome's semen, which the victim said she provided, the affidavit says. A Minnesota Department of Human Services investigator told police condoms were found in Biddlecome's office, according to the affidavit. Biddlecome entered a not guilty plea to the charges Monday. His next scheduled court hearing is a motion hearing at 9 a.m. June 15. Biddlecome posted bond and has been released from the Northwest Regional Corrections Center in Crookston. According to the Minnesota Board of Behavioral Health and Therapy, Biddlecome's license to practice alcohol and drug counseling is active and is effective until July 31. Source: <http://www.inforum.com/news/3760816-treatment-center-director-accused-raping-patient>

Teen incarceration leads to less school, more crime "Some judges are more likely to have children placed in juvenile detention than others, but it's effectively random which judge you get," said study co-author Joseph Doyle. By Brooks Hays | Updated June 9, 2015 at 4:32 PM Comments A new study suggests juvenile detention may result in recidivism and lower high school graduation rates. Photo by Alexander Rath/Shutterstock BOSTON, June 9 (UPI) -- If you want troubled teens to shape up and stay in school, new research suggests jail isn't the ideal strategy. According to a new study, students who spent time in juvenile detention were less likely to finish high school and more likely to end up in prison later on in life. On the surface, it doesn't sound like much a revelation. A bad seed is a bad seed, a skeptic might argue. But the latest study, conducted by economists at the MIT Sloan School of Management, accounts for the bias. Researchers say they've isolated the effects of juvenile detention by honing in on a group of very similar teens -- teens whose legal fates were decided on the whims of local judges, not necessarily on the merits of their character. "Some judges are more likely to have children placed in juvenile detention than others, but it's effectively random which judge you get," study co-author Joseph Doyle explained in a press release. "Some kids get a judge who will place them in juvenile detention, other ones get a judge who will be less likely to do so, and comparing the outcomes of the kids across the judges, we can actually say what the causal outcome is of placing the kids in juvenile detention." By comparing seemingly similar teens -- all of whom were guilty of offenses that offered judges leeway in determining punishment -- researchers showed that time spent in juvenile detention was linked to less time in school and more trouble later. The correlation was especially strong for those around the age of 16 at the time of their sentencing. In analyzing the outcomes of more than 35,000 juvenile offenders in Chicago over a ten-year period, researchers found that a juvenile detention sentence lowered the average graduation rate by 13 percent and boosted the chance of adult incarceration by 23 percent. "The kids who go to juvenile detention are very unlikely to go back to school at all," Doyle said. "Getting to know other kids in trouble may create social networks that might not be desirable. There could be a stigma attached to it, maybe you think you're particularly problematic, so that becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. It would be great to see more research like this done in other locations with different criminal justice systems, and see if the results continue to hold." The work of Doyle and lead author Anna Aizer was published in the Quarterly Journal of Economics. Source: http://www.upi.com/Science_News/2015/06/09/Teen-incarceration-leads-to-less-school-more-crime/9141433874513/

Worker at NYC group home for troubled youth is arrested BY JAKE PEARSON and COLLEEN LONG - Associated Press - Thursday, June 11, 2015 NEW YORK (AP) - A worker at a now-closed city group home for troubled youth has been arrested on charges he doctored a logbook to falsely show he was checking regularly on three teenage residents the night they slipped out and raped a woman, authorities announced Thursday. Denzel Thompson, 24, pleaded not guilty at his arraignment and was released following his arrest on charges of falsifying official documents, officials said. Thompson's lawyer said there was no criminal intent and that he hoped the case wouldn't turn into a "political football." Department of Investigation Commissioner Mark Peters, whose officers arrested Thompson with investigators from the Brooklyn district attorney's office, said in a statement that the arrest shows the "tragic results" of not following protocol. Thompson made checks every half hour on the teens as required from 11 p.m. May 31 until 1:30 a.m. at the six-bed Boys Town facility in a Brooklyn brownstone, officials said. But for the next five hours, he wrote in the logbook: "All youths down in bed" every half hour, but never made the checks and was actually on a floor below, they said. The Associated Press first reported the arrest. Meanwhile, a window alarm on the boys' floor had been disabled and the teens escaped and made their way to Manhattan, where they encountered a 33-year-old woman at an Internet cafe in Chinatown at around 3 a.m., police said. Surveillance video shows the boys pawing at the woman, prosecutors said. They pulled her outside, then to a nearby building where they raped her in a stairwell, prosecutors said. They took her keys, cellphone and credit cards and left her there, prosecutors said. The woman, missing her camisole and underpants, eventually made her way to a nearby deli. While she was being taken to a hospital, the boys were using her keys to get into her building - but fled when they discovered someone inside, prosecutors said. Police said they also have video of the boys at her apartment. The nonprofit Boys Town had been contracted by the city's child welfare agency to operate the home. A spokeswoman for the Nebraska-based organization said in a statement that the nonprofit is cooperating with investigators and conducting their own probe. Thompson and another worker at the home were fired last week. The second worker was also being investigated. The Administration for Children's Services said last week that they were closing the home, which was part of a citywide juvenile justice program called Close to Home that tries to house minors in residences near their relatives and schools instead of in far-off detention centers. The boys were the only three residents there. The teens, Emanuel Burrowes, Sanat Asliev and Erik Pek, have been charged as adults with crimes including rape and attempted rape. An attorney for Burrowes said last week that the boy just finished ninth grade and was a month away from completing a program for juvenile delinquents. Asliev's lawyer said his client was an emigrant from the former Soviet Union and was placed in the group home by a family court judge. An attorney for Pek hasn't returned a phone message. A live-in companion of his mother's told The New York Times last week that Pek "would never do something like this." —

This story has been corrected to show that Thompson was a worker, not a supervisor. Source: <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2015/jun/11/apnewsbreak-nyc-supervisor-at-troubled-group-home-/print/>

Berrick: California must bolster education outcomes for foster children By Ken Berrick Tools Twitter Facebook Google Bookmarks Reddit StumbleUpon Email Print Save to Instapaper Favorite Saving... Bay Area residents and all Californians should take the opportunity to focus our attention on the needs of some of the most vulnerable among us — our foster youth. Our responsibility to the over 60,000 youth in the California foster care system and 6,000 foster youth in the Bay Area, cannot be overstated. Not only do they face the day-to-day challenges of children living in more traditional circumstances, foster youth also confront a myriad of stressors that impact their ability to thrive in the very setting we rely on to support their safety, stability and development—our schools. The nature of California's educational funding has changed dramatically in recent years, moving control away from the state and closer to local school districts where decisions about program design and implementation can be tailored to the community's individualized needs. This shift marked a significant change in the autonomy and control of each school district, but was asserted with one important caveat: districts would be held accountable to the public for the educational outcomes in their schools. One of the most significant and positive implications of this change was the impact on foster youth, a group previously overlooked in California's education system. The regulations now require districts to be accountable for the educational outcomes of the state's most vulnerable children. This should have been unremarkable; indeed, one might assume that school districts track, monitor and report the educational outcomes for all youth in their schools, including foster youth. Unfortunately, many districts could neither identify the foster youth in their schools, nor report their educational outcomes. The decision to track the outcomes of foster youth came about after a landmark study by the Stuart Foundation, which found that foster youth were the single most disadvantaged study-group. Graduation rates were abysmal, hovering at 45 percent, and the academic achievement of foster youth was astonishingly poor. It became clear that California had failed to provide for one of the primary parental responsibilities of its foster youth — their education. While it is easy to place blame with school districts, foster homes, or county social service departments, this is a whole-system failure. Recognizing the importance of remediating the educational needs of the children we are responsible to parent, the revised regulations communicated a powerful statement by simply requiring school districts to track their outcomes. Tracking and monitoring outcomes itself, however, is not enough. Foster youth are affected not only by the educational system, but by the profound impact of the abuse and/or neglect that initially resulted in their entry into the foster care system. The state needs a solution that does not segregate foster youth from the broader community, but instead facilitates opportunities for schools and communities to embrace them. Assembly Bill 741 and Assembly Bill 1025 are two important examples that help generate a solution. Independently, each supports critical and unmet needs of all youth, including foster children. Together, they begin to fill significant gaps in our educational and social systems by creating comprehensive stabilization services for youth experiencing acute mental health crises and implementing integrated and inclusive, whole-school reform efforts. Both bills have found wide-sweeping support across disciplines, departments, funders and consumer groups, not only because there is consensus of the needs of our foster youth, but more importantly, because these needs are not new and there is agreement that significant reform and attention to them is needed now. With a system finally prepared to act, it is our responsibility to take the courageous step toward delivering on the promise to support our schools with policies and processes that ensure that foster youth can succeed. Ken Berrick is Chief Executive Officer of Seneca Family of Agencies (www.senecafoa.org) based in Oakland. He is co-author of the book, Unconditional Care: Relationship-Based, Behavioral Intervention with Vulnerable Children and Families. Source: <http://archives.sfxaminer.com/sanfrancisco/berrick-california-must-bolster-education-outcomes-for-foster-children/Content?oid=2932552>

Boarding School Syndrome review – education and the pain of separation A gripping study of the mental wounds inflicted by classic British institutions Character forming: boys at Eton watching the Wall Game. Photograph: Christopher Furlong/Getty Images Alex Renton Monday 8 June 2015 01.30 EDT I once knew an American psychoanalyst who worked in a Bangkok practice, specialising in expats. He'd first come to east Asia on contract for an international church whose missionaries kept getting into trouble. He never went home: there was more than enough work. "Specifically," he said, "with people like you. Middle-aged, middle-class Brits who went to your crazy private schools may just about be the most damaged social sub-group I've ever come across." It's long been known that the practice of sending young children off into the care of strangers is not wholly safe. The ancient "public" schools worried the Victorians as much or more than did the workhouses: three parliamentary commissions sat in the 19th century to look at the financial frauds, riots and the astonishing numbers of deaths – from suicides, assaults by teachers and pupils, starvation, epidemics – in the schools of the rich. Tom Brown's Schooldays only scraped the surface. Does boarding school really help disadvantaged students? While disadvantaged students who are already academically strong can benefit from being sent away to be educated, weaker pupils tend to struggle, new research finds Read more In the 20th century a clutch of authors, from George Orwell to Roald Dahl, wrote in their different ways about the systemic cruelty, psychological and physical, and of its wider effects. One of those was the establishment of the principle, among the elite and the ordinary, that to have been brutalised at a boarding school was key to becoming the right sort of Briton – one that might run an empire or a corporation, or a cricket team. Naturally, as the proven best way to educate a ruling caste, the system spread across the English-speaking world. Psychology seems to have taken a long time to catch up with the issue, perhaps because Freud famously dismissed most of his child patients' allegations of abuse by adults as fantasy. Given the importance the boarding-school class had and still has in running modern Britain – from the City to Westminster, not forgetting the BBC – that seems to have been an omission. Joy Schaverien coined the term "boarding school syndrome" only a decade ago, though she follows in the footsteps of Nick Duffell, a psychotherapist who started work in the field in 1990 and wrote a passionate and influential book about the wounds boarding can inflict, The Making of Them. Back to school Kathryn Hughes Tom Brown's Schooldays is more a junior Pilgrim's Progress than the jolly romp most of us remember. Kathryn Hughes on the moral fable written for a son who died before he was old enough to go to Rugby Read more Duffell is himself a "boarding school survivor" – his own term – and that inevitably fuels his work. But Schaverien, a Jungian psychoanalyst, did not go to boarding school: it was as a practitioner that she became intrigued, noting how often boarding school featured in the past of surprising numbers of her patients. That makes her book – an academic work, academically priced, though a gripping read – all the more important. There's a confused debate going on about private boarding schools, with arguments about class and unfair privilege mixed up with a bewildering range of notions about children's emotional health. Schaverien brings a clear eye and the experience of 25 years of collecting data to an issue that should concern everyone worried about how children fare in professional care – which, of course, is what boarding school is. She's not impartial. In Britain, you don't have to have gone to a private boarding school to be affected by them and their product. Schaverien's experience comes from her father, who, in old age, told his family how he still ached at memories of being left at his boarding school in Brighton, in 1916, aged six. The fact that he arrived in short trousers and wearing a velour hat with elastic under the chin ensured that he was savagely bullied from the first minute. "If I was so precious that mother dressed me this way, why then did she part with me?" he was still wondering, 70 years later. That's by no means the most upsetting story to be found in Schaverien's awful case studies. But it does go to the heart of the issue, both for angry ex-boarders, their spouses and children and anyone bemused by the system. I've talked and corresponded with all of those since I started writing for this newspaper about sexual abuse and bullying in British boarding schools, state and private. The many hundreds of emails I've received make it pretty clear that the schools of the elite suffered the same cover-ups and the same astonishing failings in regulation and in policing as did the hospitals, care homes and young offenders' prisons. The difference? As several correspondents put it, in anger or amusement, "Posh people's parents paid to have them abused." That, of course, is what most hurt Hymie Schaverien, and thousands of others. "Boarders cannot console themselves with the thought that their parents did not want them to go," Professor Schaverien states. Their parents chose to send them from home into hell or prison – words her patients frequently use – and so to break the bond with their child. Advertisement Attachment – the crucial establishment of trust and security through a primary carer – is the basis of modern child development psychology. Boarding schools could not have broken or redirected healthy attachment more effectively, as Schaverien illustrates. From the moment the parent drove away, a child had to adjust to the fact that not only was privacy and safety no longer guaranteed – let alone the consolation of a hug – but that their parents had chosen this future. John Bowlby, the psychologist famous for first coming up with attachment theory in the 1960s, described public school as part of "the time-honoured barbarism required to produce English gentlemen". Bowlby boarded at 13: he was against it. Schaverien has, of course, accounts of children who enjoyed boarding school: though some patients inform her that that was because home life was so deficient in love or structure that the necessary attachments were better made at school. It's hard not to conclude that boarding schools were meant to do this job: replace infantile loyalties to mummy with the bonds that tie you to the team. It worked: but the side-effects of this abrupt intervention in a six- or eight-year-old's development could be savage. Symptoms that a therapist in boarding school syndrome addresses are problems with anger, depression, anxiety, failure to sustain relationships, fear of abandonment, substance abuse and so forth. A common effect is amnesia: many of Schaverien's patients – and my correspondents – have sad gaps where, in a normal childhood and adolescence, there would be a wealth of memory. Forgetting the pain is yet another coping mechanism. In a fascinating account of four years' analysis with one deeply traumatised patient, Theo, Schaverien takes us to the point where she believes boarding school syndrome is born. On the way we see Theo – often using drawings – recover memories of awful injustice. That is a key issue for many boarders – children, she says, have an ethical sensibility from an early age and it is traumatic when something – like brutality on the part of an adult – violates it. Trauma affects the normal development of a child's brain. Eventually, and in Theo's case this happened dramatically, a traumatised child, exhausted by perpetual fear, may be forced for their own survival to separate their selves – the normal, vulnerable home self, and the boarding-school self. That's the syndrome, and though sceptics of Jungian theory may be dubious, my correspondence has many people who talk unhappily of the child they left behind at the school, their other self who was never able to grow up. It's a profound effect, an "encapsulation of self... that may last a lifetime", Schaverien says. It's obvious enough that these institutions, full of emotionally needy and incompetently supervised children, have provided havens and hunting grounds for sexual criminals since their beginning. Hence the extraordinary wave of allegations about historic child abuse in institutions. Schaverien devotes an interesting chapter to sexual abuse but, for her, it is not the main issue. Theo never experienced sexual abuse. It grabs the headlines, but I suspect that for those who want truly to protect and succour healthy children, the shocking revelations about paedophiles in institutions may be a distraction. Again, while my correspondence contains many awful allegations, it's also full of people apologising for not having a story of sexual predation to tell. "It was only bullying," people write, "not what you'd call abuse." But emotional cruelty is what exacts the greatest toll on the developing mind. Children are resilient, they can recover from physical hurt: it's clear from reading Schaverien that what most reliably damages children is long-term emotional neglect, the absence of safety, the failure of justice, the loss of love. We need the psychological abuse of children to be properly outlawed – a long-awaited "Cinderella law" came into force last month, but it is weak – and we need to ask the rich and aspirational to think again before they put their children into care. They should read this book: it could save them a lot of money. Boarding School Syndrome is published by Routledge (£27.99). Click here to order it with free UK p&p. Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/books/2015/jun/08/boarding-school-syndrome-joy-schaverien-review>

Detention center receives child care license from state of Texas Nuri Vallbona | Jun. 10, 2015 Share on facebook Share on twitter More Sharing Services 11 PrintemailPDF Austin, Texas A corrections corporation that manages a family detention center for Immigration and Customs Enforcement received a child care license from the state of Texas in May, raising questions among attorneys and activists as to whether the company is trying to comply with a court ruling forbidding the detention of minor children in unlicensed facilities. A second company is still awaiting approval for its license, according to Patrick Crimmins, media relations manager of the Texas Department of Family Protective Services, the department that oversees the licensing. The applications were filed by the Corrections Corporation of America for the South Texas Residential Center in Dilley, Texas, and by GEO Group for the Karnes County Residential Center in Karnes City, Texas. Both facilities, which house children typically accompanied by their mothers, paid a $35 application fee in addition to background check costs. "Dilley got its Temporary Shelter Program (TSP) certificate on May 22 for a capacity of 24," Crimmins said in an email. "On Karnes City, we just received their application June 2. The inspection is scheduled for June 16." The move to apply for licensing puzzled activists and attorneys who wondered if this is an attempt to comply with the 1997 Flores v. Meese Settlement Agreement that says unaccompanied minors may not be held in restrictive unlicensed facilities. Attention subscribers and donors! We're rolling out an online account management tool. Don't miss out. Add or confirm your email address today. "I think that they filed the applications first as a Band-Aid effort, as an attempt to be able to say that they've received some kind of licensing," said Jonathan Ryan, executive director of RAICES, a non-profit organization that provides legal representation to immigrants. RAICES, which means "roots" in Spanish, stands for Refugee and Immigrant Center for Education and Legal Services. Family detention had all but ended in 2009, but when large numbers of immigrants came across the southern border last year, overwhelmed immigration officials revived the practice. Attorneys for the U.S. government filed a motion in February to amend the Flores Settlement saying the influx of immigrants made it "impossible to mandate full and strict compliance with all terms of the nearly two decades-old agreement while expecting DHS to fulfill its core function of protecting the public safety and enforcing U.S. immigration laws." Lawyers representing detainees countered by filing a motion to enforce the settlement leading to a tentative ruling in April by Judge Dolly Gee of the Ninth Circuit in Central California. "The court's tentative order indicated that the court agreed with plaintiffs that putting children in secure facilities that are not licensed by the state violated the language and spirit of the settlement agreement," said a memo outlining the ruling and circulated to attorneys and advocates representing detained clients. Both sides in the case are now working out a plan to implement Gee's ruling and are expected to complete the process by mid-June. But corrections companies did not appear to be seeking a broad childcare license, rather one for a small subset of children in detention, according to the applications. The Corrections Corporation of America was granted a temporary shelter day care license in its Dilley center for the supervision of 24 children, Crimmins said. The license applies to children whose mothers need to attend court hearings or visit their doctors, according to the application. It does not mention extended overnight care. "Neither Karnes nor Dilley have applied for a license from Residential Child Care Licensing (RCCL) — that is separate from a day care license," Crimmins said. Residential treatment centers, emergency shelters or child-placing agencies are examples of the types of facilities that would fall under that type of license. "I can tell you that in September 2014, Karnes submitted a request that they be exempt from residential child care licensing regulations, which we granted," Crimmins said. It was unclear why the center in Karnes is exempt while the one in Dilley is not. When asked about the license applications, both companies issued statements. "CCA sought and obtained this licensure for the facility pursuant to the contractual requirements of our government partner, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE)," said Steve Owen, managing director of communication for Corrections Corporation of America. "GEO has and will continue to work in conjunction with ICE to ensure that the Center adheres to all pertinent standards and requirements," said Pablo Paez, vice president for corporate relations. Both companies referred further questions to ICE. While ICE did not reply to requests for comment, in the past it has issued statements about the quality of its care for residents. "We are constantly assessing our ability to provide care for those in our custody that meets the highest standards, and we welcome the ongoing dialogue with stakeholders to ensure that we are transparent and consistent in our approach," said ICE press secretary Gillian M. Christensen. Ryan and other advocates do not think this move satisfies the requirement set forth in the Flores Settlement Agreement. "Flores speaks to the entirety of the custodial setting environment," Ryan said referring to the 24/7 operation of family detention centers. "Cordoning off a small area within it that is deemed child appropriate by no means sanctions the remaining 99.9 percent of the facility." Michelle Mendez, training and legal support attorney with the Catholic Legal Immigration Network thought it was more of a practical solution. "It's hard to tell why they're moving forward with this, but it seems to be more beneficial for the staff than it does for the women and the children because fewer children in the courtroom is going to be easier on the staff; it's going to be easier on the court that is presiding over the hearings for the judges." [Nuri Vallbona is a freelance documentary photojournalist. She [worked for the Miami Herald from 1993 to 2008 and has been a lecturer at the University of Texas and Texas Tech University.] Source:

<http://ncronline.org/news/politics/detention-center-receives-child-care-license-state-texas#>

The truth about 'boarding school syndrome' - Telegraph The truth about 'boarding school syndrome' As a new book suggests our classic British institutions inflict lifelong mental wounds, boarding school 'survivor' Wendy Leigh examines the lifelong effect of being sent away from home, aged 10 Facebook 1K Twitter 101 Pinterest 1 LinkedIn 13 Share 1K Email The author at school By Wendy Leigh 8:00PM BST 09 Jun 2015 547 Comments The nightmares come more often these days, but lose nothing of their intricacy for their increase in frequency. They all begin on a cold morning in 1968, when I am 12 years old and standing on the platform at Charing Cross Station, surrounded by a gaggle of girls dressed, as I am, in navy blue uniform. In the near distance, my mother's image is already fading – I've long since learned that the last thing I need is to draw any more attention to the tears beginning to brim than having her taking me right up to the carriage before she leaves. Even when I wake at 4am in a cold sweat in my flat overlooking the Thames, my home for the past ten years, I still can't shake the smell, noise and desolation of my nightmare's destination: St Margaret's, Folkestone, the boarding school where I was incarcerated for four years of my life. I don't use the word "incarcerated" lightly; even (perhaps, especially) as a child, it always seemed more akin to Wandsworth Prison than an educational establishment for the upper classes. But it is one that seems all the more fitting now I have read Boarding School Syndrome: The Psychological Drama of the 'Privileged Child', a newly published study of former boarders like me, by Professor Joy Scheverin. Wendy Leigh as a child (Photo: Jeff Gilbert) A Jungian psychoanalyst, Schaverien first coined the term "boarding school syndrome" a decade ago, after seeing a multitude of former pupils among her patients – characterised by problems with anger, depression, anxiety, a failure to sustain relationships, fear of abandonment, substance abuse, and so forth. She, herself, was following in the footsteps of Nick Duffell, a psychotherapist and author of influential study, The Making of Them, about the wounds such schooling can inflict. Duffell defines ex-pupils, and indeed himself, as "boarding school survivors" – a term that resonates strongly with me, given I still feel scarred by the six formative years I spent attending two of the (minor) cornerstones of the British establishment. Before St Margaret's, I was sent to Hookstead, Crowborough, when I was 10; ostensibly because my parents had just divorced, and also because my mother, a teacher, was certain that boarding school would provide me with the best and most gilded start in life. I was keen it wouldn't disappoint her, and initially, given I had been steeped in Enid Blyton's St. Clare series – bracing books about boarding schools, populated by top drawer, kind and jolly girls, each one a brick – I was happy to be going. •Could boarding school be the best thing for your child? •Inside the most expensive boarding school in the world But nothing could have prepared me for the pain of being far from home, and the mother I adored. A sensitive loner of a child, I struggled with the lack of privacy by isolating myself from the other girls – an odd and ungainly peg rammed into an ill-fitting hole. The only consolation was that I could spend every weekend at home with my mother – the only moments of love and happiness punctuating long weeks of cold baths, regulation knickers and barebones dinners of baked beans and bread. Much, I know, has changed for today's pupils, which Schaverien readily acknowledges. But however warm and cuddly modern boarding schools may be in comparison to mine, she insists children sent away to school – no matter how well they are looked after – will still suffer trauma at being separated from those who love them best. My two years at Hookstead were a holiday camp compared to the four years I spent at St Margaret's, from which I was only allowed to escape three times a term. These rare weekends at home compensated somewhat for my increasing unhappiness at school – my mother made sure each was akin to a party, filled with my favourite food on hand, a trip to see any movie I wanted (even the musicals she hated). But however pampered I was, I could never forget each tick of the clock brought me closer to the moment we would have to part again at Paddock Wood Station in Kent. Somehow these partings never got easier. Although I was outwardly stoic and careful never to cry in front of her, the jaunty carefree air I managed to maintain up to the carriage would turn to flood of tears as soon as we pulled out of the station – and then I would hate myself for my babyishness as much as I hated the return to my nightmare ahead. I never told my mother that I loathed school with every fibre of my being, or begged her not to send me back; even then, I understood her subconscious motives for dispatching me, her cherished only child. I knew she was doing everything she could to give me what she thought was a superior education. And that, never mind money, it had cost even more pride to get her to convince my father – who was dead set against the idea of wasting money on my education – to foot the bill. It was only many years later, when I was 28, and my maternal grandmother's death overwhelmed me with enough grief to seek therapy, that distinguished psychoanalyst Dr Erika Padan Freeman helped me join up more dots. My mother, Marion, had been traumatised as a child herself when, at the age of 11, in July 1939, she was sent out of Germany on the Kindertransport, which spirited her and 10,000 other children to safety in England. The train, of course, left from the railway station, where little Marion was forced to part from her father on the platform, never to see him again. As Dr Freeman explained, in sending me away at a similar age, and continually re-enacting that heartrending scene on the railway station, my mother was unconsciously repeating the pattern of her past. Putting me on the train, separating from me and unconsciously hoping that I wouldn't be hurt like she was, I wouldn't suffer, and that, this time, the story would end happily. Of course, it didn't. Instead, just as Schaverien posits, it forged a kind of dual identity within me. She explains: "One of the characteristics of the child coping with leaving home and living without love is that they form a psychological split into two aspects of personality, which I call the 'home self' and the 'boarding school self'." So there was the fragile Wendy, beset by separation anxiety, crying late at night under her counterpane. And there was tough Wendy, who developed a thread of steel in her soul, and knew she needed to protect herself from this pain as much as her mother. Uncannily enough, both those sides of me are currently merging, as my mother, now 87, has been diagnosed with terminal non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. She has been in hospital since April, and may have very little time left. While my softer self is reliving the trauma and heartbreak of that first enforced separation, at just 10 years old, my tough boarding school self would still die before crying in front of her when I visit each day – determined to bring nothing but love and cheer to her bedside. Instead I busy myself, when tears threaten, with the pragmatic details of palliative care. Here, at least, I am able to see one boon to being a boarding school survivor: however tough it may be when my mother leaves me again, for good, I know that I have already forged the strength I'll need to endure it. Source:

<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/education/secondaryeducation/11662001/The-truth-about-boarding-school-syndrome.html>

Former Houston hospital exec sentenced to 45 years in prison for fraud - Modern Healthcare Former Houston hospital exec sentenced to 45 years in prison for fraud By Lisa Schencker | June 9, 2015 The former president of a Houston hospital, his son and a third person were sentenced to prison Tuesday for billing Medicare $158 million for mental health services that were medically unnecessary or never provided. Earnest Gibson III, the former president of Riverside General Hospital; his son Earnest Gibson IV, who operated one of the hospital's satellite locations; and Regina Askew, a group-home owner, were convicted in October of conspiracy to commit healthcare fraud, conspiracy to pay kickbacks and related counts of paying and receiving illegal kickbacks. The Gibsons also were convicted of conspiracy to commit money laundering, according to a U.S. Justice Department release. The elder Gibson was sentenced to 45 years in prison and his son was sentenced to 20 years. Askew was sentenced to 12 years in prison. Dick DeGuerin, an attorney for the elder Gibson, said Tuesday he's frustrated the federal sentencing guidelines were applied in "such a harsh manner." "Perhaps more importantly I'm frustrated with the government's efforts to prosecute criminally violations of policy and procedures rather than real criminal acts," DeGuerin said. "It seems to me that the partial hospitalization program is fraught with traps for the unwary where mere failure to follow procedures can end up in criminal court, things that would ordinarily be handled by either a refund or a civil penalty." Attempts to reach attorneys for Earnest Gibson IV and Askew were not immediately successful Tuesday afternoon. Earnest Gibson III was also ordered to pay restitution of $6,753,180; Earnest Gibson IV was ordered to pay restitution of $7,518,480; and Askew was ordered to pay $46,255,893. Between 2005 and 2012, Riverside and its satellite locations billed Medicare for partial hospitalization program services for Medicare beneficiaries who did not need or qualify for the services, which are a form of intensive outpatient treatment for severe mental illness, the Justice Department said. The beneficiaries rarely saw psychiatrists and did not receive intensive psychiatric treatment. Some were suffering from Alzheimer's, meaning they couldn't have participated in treatment even had they qualified for it. Earnest Gibson III also paid kickbacks to patient recruiters, owners and operators of group-care homes, including Askew, in exchange for them sending ineligible Medicare patients to the hospital's partial hospitalization programs, according to the government. Earnest Gibson IV also paid patient recruiters to do the same for his program, prosecutors said. Proceeds from the fraud were used to further the scheme by paying kickbacks to patient recruiters and group-home owners for sending their Medicare beneficiaries to the programs, according to the government. A number of other individuals have also pleaded guilty in connection with the fraud. Source:

<http://www.modernhealthcare.com/article/20150609/NEWS/150609882>

Chester Co. boarding school teacher charged in sex assault of student He was a teacher at a prestigious private school, but now he's at the center of a sexual assault investigation. Wednesday, June 10, 2015 04:48PM MALVERN, Pa. (WPVI) -- Police have arrested a teacher at a Chester County boarding school for the alleged sexual assault of a former student. 31-year-old Matthew Scavitto, who worked as a teacher, coach, and dorm supervisor at the Phelps School in

Malvern, was arrested on Tuesday. Investigators say the incidents happened on the campus of the school where Scavitto lived in campus housing. The former student alleges that the abuse occurred from 2013 to 2014 while he was enrolled as a full time boarding student. The victim explained that he had become friends with Scavitto, and that in May of 2013, when the victim was 17-years-old, Scavitto began to sexually assault him at his on-campus apartment. The abuse allegedly continued through the summer of 2013 while both were at a camp in New Hampshire and throughout the victim's senior year, authorities said. In addition, Scavitto would allegedly communicate with the victim by cell phone and text messages, which allegedly contained code words for sexual activity. The victim says Scavitto would then instruct him to delete the messages immediately after the conversation. Scavitto was immediately fired by the Phelps School upon learning of the accusations, and authorities say the school is cooperating fully with law enforcement. The school released a statement Wednesday, which reads in part: "The Phelps School was shocked and saddened to learn of the arrest of a faculty member late yesterday evening. We can assure members of The Phelps School community that the safety and well-being of our students is paramount, and the staff member in question will not be returning. We are cooperating fully with the authorities on this matter, including the District Attorney's Office of Chester County." First Assistant District Attorney Michael Noone says, "This is another example of a person in a position of trust grooming a victim and abusing that trust. This defendant manipulated a student who he was responsible for teaching and coaching." Scavitto is charged with Institutional Sexual Assault, Corruption of Minors, Unlawful Contact with a Minor, and Endangering the Welfare of Children. He is currently being held in lieu of $250,000 cash bail. Police are concerned that there may be other victims. Anyone with additional information is encouraged to contact authorities. Source: <http://6abc.com/news/chester-co-teacher-charged-in-sex-assault-of-student/776393/>

15:16 Thursday 11 June 2015 A pervert has been convicted of abusing two under-age girls while they were in foster care. Kevin Gillan had access to the youngsters – one of them aged just nine at the time – because he was staying in the house where they were placed for emergency respite care. The younger girl claimed Gillan groped her when she was alone in the living room with him. The older girl, 19, who was 14 at the time of the offence, gave evidence that he touched and handled her breasts over her clothing and smacked her on the bottom after entering her bedroom. Neither of the victims can be named for legal reasons. Sheriff Susan Craig ordered that Gillan's name be placed on the sex offenders' register with immediate effect and called for background reports before sentencing. Gillan, 24, of Katherine Street, Livingston had denied committing a total of four sexual offences against two girls between May 12, 2010 and June 25, 2013. He was convicted of using lewd, indecent and libidinous practices towards a nine-year old in 2010 and sexually assaulting the 14-year-old in 2013. During his trial at Livingston Sheriff Court he was cleared of making sexually indecent remarks and a further charge of sexual assault. The court was told he has no previous convictions. He will be sentenced on July 30. Source: <http://www.edinburghnews.scotsman.com/news/crime/pervert-abused-children-in-foster-care-1-3799767>

Berea group home employee accused of punching teen in face An OhioGuidestone staff member is no longer employed there after being accused of punching a 13-year-old resident in the face June 5, according to police. (Evan MacDonald, Northeast Ohio Media Group) Print Email By Evan MacDonald, Northeast Ohio Media Group, Sun News Email the author | Follow on Twitter on June 12, 2015 at 11:30 AM, updated June 12, 2015 at 12:52 PM Reddit Email BEREa, Ohio -- A former Berea group home employee could face charges after she punched a 13-year-old resident in the face, according to police. No charges have been filed in the June 5 incident but the investigation is ongoing, Berea police Lt. Joseph Hedinger said. The 26-year-old Cleveland woman is no longer employed at OhioGuidestone, the organization said in a statement. "OhioGuidestone reported the incident to and is cooperating fully with ongoing police and department of children and family services investigations, and will take any appropriate steps to ensure its mission of safety," an OhioGuidestone spokeswoman said in the statement. The two were arguing when the woman pulled the resident's hair and punched her in the face. The resident retaliated by pulling the woman's hair before other staff members could break up the fight, another employee wrote in a statement to police. Erie County Job and Family Services is also investigating the incident. The agency was not immediately available for comment. Source: http://www.cleveland.com/berea/index.ssf/2015/06/berea_group_home_employee_accu_1.html

Social work diary: "A teenager in care says his foster carer starves and beats him" A children's social worker talks about late nights, flat car batteries and a difficult child protection enquiry June 15, 2015 in Monday I return to an area where I had previously worked to give evidence in care proceedings. The social worker complains about everything not done on the case. I point out I had done everything possible in the time and wrote a detailed transfer summary. I wonder why colleagues so often tend to look on the negative side? Tuesday It's duty day for my team; it can be easy or a nightmare- today it's the latter. A teenager in care presents saying his foster carer starves and beats him. As he looks well nourished with no visible injuries, we are sceptical. However, neither the fostering social worker nor his leaving care social worker are available so we have to find him a new placement and organise a child protection enquiry. The foster carer is shocked - it was their first placement. Hoping fervently that nothing else as challenging comes in on top of this, the duty team divide up the tasks and get the young person placed locally. We advise the foster carer not to be alone with him. Wednesday My car battery is flat and I miss a looked-after child review. Luckily it was straightforward and we don't have to reschedule since we are already in the middle of care proceedings. However, on arriving at the office I am drawn back into the care leaver's child protection enquiry, as his social worker is on leave. This takes up the rest of the day. A colleague covers a child protection visit for me after much juggling of schedules. By 5pm three of our departments, the police and a doctor are drawn into the investigation as the young person alleges they have internal injuries that cannot be seen. Thankfully, the allocated social worker is back tomorrow, so will take over. I wonder if the internal injuries are really feelings of hurt at leaving care, but say nothing. The investigation has a direction that I know won't be changed now. Thursday With all the time taken up yesterday I had to postpone a visit to a child's aunt and uncle. They want to take up Special Guardianship Order but have not visited much. I get a lift from a colleague to catch a train but don't get back till very late. I've no alternative but to get a taxi home but wonder if I will get the cost back in my expenses claim. Friday I visit some children in primary school who come from a very deprived home where the parents struggle to provide basic needs. The boy tells me he only has margarine on his sandwich today. He and his sister tell me they want to become space tourists and go to Mars. They have seen it on the internet, so it's possible – they have the charming, innocent optimism of childhood. My manager confirms I won't get yesterday's taxi fare reimbursed. One day, there will be an acknowledgement of the hours needed to do this work. Just about the time those children reach Mars, I think. Source: <http://www.communitycare.co.uk/2015/06/15/social-work-diary-teenager-care-says-foster-carer-starves-beats/#>

Anti-SLAPP Law Crosses State Lines By JONNY BONNER ShareThis SALT LAKE CITY (CN) - A California woman who claimed a "therapeutic boarding school" starved and abused students may apply her state's anti-SLAPP law to defamation proceedings in Utah, a federal judge ruled. Diamond Ranch Academy sued Chelsea Filer in 2014, claiming "maliciously and falsely" defamed it on her website, Facebook and elsewhere. The website drasurvivors.com is devoted to denunciations of the boarding school for "troubled teens," in Hurricane, Utah. The school claimed Filer defamed it by calling it a "private prison" that abused, starved and strip-searched students, scamming their parents "out of millions of dollars." In a June 9 ruling on Filer's motion to strike, U.S. District Judge Tena Campbell found that "much of" Filer's speech "likely originated in California" and applied that state's anti-SLAPP statute. However, Campbell also found that though "California has the most significant relationship to the immunity issue raised by Ms. Filer in her Special Motion to Strike ... Utah's and California's anti-SLAPP statutes materially conflict." She ordered the parties to brief the issue of whether discovery is needed before they fully brief the merits of Filer's Special Motion to Strike. After ruling on the school's motion to stay briefing on the motion to strike, Campbell will either set a discovery schedule or set deadlines for filing briefs on whether California anti-SLAPP law bars the school's defamation claims. A typical "strategic lawsuit against participation" accuses a litigant of using the judicial system to silence or intimidate a critic on a matter of public interest. "Ms. Filer, apart from one trip at the age of 11, has never been to Utah, so it is safe to say that she did not post anything on her website from the State of Utah," Campbell wrote, in weighing whether to apply Utah or California anti-SLAPP law. "Filer's California residence, California's strong interest in protecting its citizens' free speech activities, and the court's conclusion that the record, fairly construed, shows that much of the speech likely originated in California, all weigh strongly in favor of applying California's, not Utah's, anti-SLAPP law." The judge said the California law does not conflict with federal rules of civil procedure.

Diamond Ranch's attorneys at Bangerter Sheppard & Frazier of St. George, and Filer, now Chelsea Papciak, did not respond to requests for comment. In a separate federal lawsuit in December 2014, four teenagers called Diamond Ranch a "private prison" that "sadistically and verbally" beat teens down and forced them to go barefoot in winter. "At Diamond Ranch Academy, there was no forum for complaint, explanation, appeal, or grievance against the placement, before, during, or after it occurred," they claimed. "The only option available to the hapless youth there confined was to 'fake it in order to make it,' for Diamond Ranch Academy is a lock down, closely guarded private prison, where punishments are harsh for any rule infraction, real or instigated by the Diamond Ranch Academy staff for their amusement." Filer was not a party to that lawsuit. In May, the Washington Supreme Court found that state's anti-

SLAPP law unconstitutional. Justice Debra Stephens wrote that Washington's state law "seeks to protect one group of citizen's constitutional rights of expression and petition by cutting off another group's constitutional rights of petition and jury trial." In Nevada, the Assembly Judiciary Committee is studying a bill that would impose much tighter deadlines to that state's anti-SLAPP law. The bill sailed through the state Senate in April. Source: <http://www.courthousenews.com/2015/06/16/anti-slapp-law-crosses-state-lines.htm>

State fails to meet foster care lawsuit requirements Jimmie E. Gates, The Clarion-Ledger 8:52 p.m. CDT June 16, 2015 The latest report by an independent federal court monitor says Mississippi doesn't have the capacity to meet many of the court order's basic requirements to improve the state's foster care system. CONNECT 4 TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE The latest report by an independent federal court monitor says Mississippi doesn't have the capacity to meet many of the court order's basic requirements to improve the state's foster care system. "The evidence shows that in most instances defendants did not meet Period 4 performance requirements," said Grace Lopes, the Washington, D.C.-based monitor appointed by a Mississippi federal judge. "Based on the history of defendants' performance since 2008 when the remedial stage of this lawsuit began, it appears that defendants do not have the capacity to meet many of the MSA's most basic requirements. Defendants' ongoing failure to meet these requirements has a substantial and continuing impact on the safety and well being of the thousands of children in defendants' custody every year and their timely placement in permanent and nurturing homes." Lopes said the parties and the court must confront reality and determine a course that will protect the children in defendants' custody on an urgent timeline. Marcia Robinson Lowry, head of New York-based A Better Childhood Inc., said the monitor's report that was issued Monday reinforces the organization's petition to seek to hold the Mississippi Department of Human Services in contempt of court for allegedly failing to implement settlement agreement of more than seven years. Lowry said the court order in the Olivia Y lawsuit was entered in 2008 to resolve the original lawsuit filed more than a decade ago claiming widespread constitutional failings in the state foster care system. "The contempt motion will include the issues that are in this report," said Lowry, an attorney who was part of the initial group filing the lawsuit. The contempt citation, which was already filed, will be updated to include the latest monitor's report, according to Lowry. Lowry was with another New York-based organization, Children's Rights, when the lawsuit was filed in 2004. The suit asserted widespread violations of the constitutional rights of children in the Mississippi foster care system. The class action, originally known as Olivia Y. v. Barbour, cited dangerously high caseloads, untrained caseworkers, a shortage of foster homes, and a widespread failure to provide basic health care. In 2008, a settlement was approved by the federal court. But in 2010, the plaintiffs asked the state to be found in contempt for noncompliance. A modified settlement was approved in July 2012. According to Lowry, the modified settlement contained an action plan to address the state's consistent failure to meet court-ordered performance standards. U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has set Aug. 10 for an evidentiary hearing on the contempt motion. The Mississippi Department of Human Services has not commented, citing pending litigation. During state budget hearings last year, Mississippi Department of Human Services Executive Director Rickey Berry said the state needs to spend an additional $12 million to meet requirements of the lawsuit. Contact Jimmie E. Gates at (601) 961-7212 or jgates@jackson.gannett.com. Follow @jgatesnews on Twitter. Source: <http://www.clarionledger.com/story/news/2015/06/16/state-fails-meet-foster-care-lawsuit-requirements/28843645/>

Sheriff Recommends Charges For Group Homes Accused Of Abuse By: AP Posted: Wed 8:56 AM, Jun 17, 2015 By: AP Home / Headlines List / Article To join the conversation on this story and others, "like" our KKTU 11 News Facebook page! The Pueblo County Sheriff's Office is asking the district attorney to file charges in six cases involving residents at state-run Pueblo Regional Center group homes who say they were abused. The Pueblo Chieftain reports Sheriff Kirk Taylor and his deputies investigated 19 complaints of long-term abuse, maltreatment and unlawful sexual contact. The office ultimately referred six of those cases to the district attorney for review. Taylor says his office is still investigating four cases. Pueblo Regional Center is operated by the Colorado Department of Human Services and runs 11 group homes in Pueblo West. It's unclear which specific group homes the allegations stem from. Department Director Reggie Bicha said in an email that the investigations strengthen the state's commitment to stabilizing the center. In April, eight staffers including the center's director joined three others on paid administrative leave. Source: <http://www.kktv.com/home/headlines/Sheriff-Recommends-Charges-For-Group-Homes-Accused-Of-Abuse-307890891.html>

Former Monticello group home counselor convicted on felony sex charges MONTICELLO – A former counselor employed by the Orange/Sullivan Division of Rehabilitation Support Services was convicted of having a sexual relationship with a female resident in his care from June to December 2013. The group home is licensed by the state Office of Mental Health. Michael Cubero, 37, of Monticello, was convicted by a jury of two counts of criminal sexual act and one count of endangering the welfare of an incompetent or physically disabled person, all felonies, and two misdemeanor counts of sexual abuse. He faces up to eight years in prison and will be required to register as a sex offender when sentenced in September. The investigation was conducted by the New York State Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs, Monticello and State Police. Rehabilitation Support Services cooperated in the investigation and prosecution. Cubero was terminated from his job. Source: http://www.midhudsonnews.com/News/2015/June/20/Cubero_guilty-20Jun15.html

Families 'strong-armed' by St. Amant By David Larkins, Winnipeg Sun First posted: Friday, June 19, 2015 04:56 PM CDT | Updated: Friday, June 19, 2015 05:03 PM CDT Tony Warzel of the St. Amant Family Association is concerned that patients requiring 24/7 care are being moved into group homes. Warzel's brother has been in St. Amant for over 40 years. (Brian Donogh/Winnipeg Sun) Article 1 Change text size for the story Print this story Report an error An association concerned for the well-being of their family members who suffer from developmental disabilities say they are being "strong-armed" by the very organization enlisted to care for them. Members of the St. Amant Family Association say the non-profit St. Amant organization, which cares for people with severe developmental disabilities and autism, is going back on its word and forcing some residents to move out of the River Road facility into community group homes. Association spokesman Tony Warzel said the group isn't opposed to residents being moved to community facilities, but said family members were initially told those moves would be voluntary. "We were consulted, but told it was voluntary," Warzel said. "We were not told this was a forced move. When it became forced, they were wanting to meet with us only to explain why they should be moving into the community, not to talk about options, not to hear our point of view." Warzel, whose brother Mark is a resident, said the association struck a sub-committee to meet with St. Amant's board. He said "it's really been a one-way conversation." "We feel we're being strong-armed and given no options," Warzel said. "The conversation has only been about why they are moving." Warzel said his brother, 49, needs 24-hour supervision and, in 2013, claims he told St. Amant management he did not want his brother to be placed in a group home, citing his health concerns. In November 2014, according to Warzel, he was told his brother had been identified as someone capable of transition. "No discussion, no options given, no consultation," said Warzel, noting a number of other families have the same concerns. However, John Leggat, St. Amant's CEO, said his board meets with the family association monthly and a "sub-group" that meets every two weeks "to work through any concerns or questions they might have." Leggat said discussions on a strategic plan were launched internally three years ago to help the facility, which currently holds 167 residents, transition down to 115 by 2018. "For 30 years, we've been transitioning people from River Road to community homes," Leggat said. "This isn't new for us. What we did introduce to the process is that people who need 24-hour nursing care, they will remain here at River Road. For the remaining individuals, we definitely know we can support them in the community, because we support both kids and adults with challenging developmental needs already." Warzel fears those being moved from River Road are being subjected to a change they'll find very stressful. "There is no way for them to assess the reaction of someone to something as stressful as a move like this," Warzel said. Leggat, however, said the community homes offer more privacy and amenities to residents, as well as a 3-to-2 resident-to-caregiver ratio, which he said surpasses that of St. Amant. "We offer what we think is a better life in our community homes," Leggat said. david.larkins@sunmedia.ca Source: <http://www.winnipegsun.com/2015/06/19/families-strong-armed-by-st-amant>

Foster parents accused of sexual abuse may have earned $1.6 million from state By Aaron Martinez / El Paso Times / Follow @AMartinez31 Posted: 06/19/2015 06:14:18 PM MDT Related >> El Paso foster parents accused of sexual abuse An El Paso couple arrested in April on suspicion of sexually abusing two foster children might have earned as much as $1.6 million from the state as foster parents over 14 years, documents show. The actual amount is not exact because three child-placing agencies took a share of the money in administrative fees. Sandra Huerta, 55, and Antonio Huerta, 62, had been foster parents to 36 children since they were licensed in 2000, officials said. The Huertas were arrested after two former foster children in September reported to police that they were sexually abused by the couple 13 years ago, officials said. One of the victims told police she was 7 years old at the time, while the other victim said he was 10 years old when the incidents happened, an arrest affidavit states. The woman told police that Sandra Huerta would take her into a bedroom, force her to watch pornographic movies and then tell her to mimic what she was watching, the affidavit states. The victim claims she was forced to touch both the Huertas and have sex with Antonio Huerta while his wife watched, according to the affidavit. Related » Police affidavit: Couple accused of having sex with foster children The man told police he was forced to watch porn in the couple's bedroom, watch the Huertas engage in foreplay and then have sex with Sandra Huerta, according to the affidavit. Sandra Huerta was arrested April 24 on suspicion of indecency with a child and aggravated sexual assault of a child, officials said. She was booked into the El Paso County Jail on a $175,000 bond. She bailed out of jail the same day. Antonio Huerta turned himself over to El Paso police April 30. He was arrested on suspicion of two counts of aggravated sexual assault of a child. He was booked into the El Paso County Jail on a bond totaling $175,000. He bailed out of jail the same day. Attempts to reach the Huertas were unsuccessful. El Paso District Attorney's Office officials said the cases against the Huertas are still being reviewed. If the cases are approved, they will be presented to a grand jury, which will decide if they will be indicted. According to records released by the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, the Huertas were paid, either directly from the department or through a private child-placing agency, about $1,684,000 during their 14 years as foster parents. The money is given to foster parents to help cover child care related costs such as food, clothing, recreation, transportation and housing, officials said. Between 2000 to 2002, Sandra Huerta was paid by the department about $79,187, according to the payment records. Beginning in January 2002, the Huertas were moved under the management of several child placing agencies, officials said. The agencies are in charge of placing children in foster homes and managing the homes. The state pays the agencies, which then pays the foster parents. Each agency takes a portion of the money as an administrative fee before giving the rest to the foster parents, officials said. The amount taken by each agency was not disclosed. The Huertas were placed under the Bair Foundation of Texas between January 2002 to May 2003. During that time, the state paid $92,766 to the Bair Foundation to help pay for the cost of the children under the care of the Huertas, according to the payment records. Officials from the Bair Foundation, which is headquartered in New Wilmington, Pa., said their office in El Paso is closed. They declined to comment on the amount of money paid to the Huertas while they were foster parents under the Bair Foundation. Between May 2003 to July 2014, the Huertas' foster home was under the El Paso Center for Children. The state paid $1,495,525 to the Huertas through the El Paso Center for Children, according to the payment records. Officials from the center could not be reached for comment on how much of that money went to the Huertas. The last few months of the Huertas' time as foster parents were under the Children's Hope Residential agency. The state gave Children's Hope Residential $16,628 to cover the cost of children under the Huertas' care. James Aldrich, director and founder of Children's Hope Residential, said the payments made to the Huertas were private information and could not be released. "I am not able to release the payments made to any foster family," Aldrich said. "I can tell you that we pass through DFPS funds to verified homes in the amount required by statute to the families and often times it is in excess of the minimum pass through rate." According to the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services' website, the minimum daily amount paid to a foster family varies from about $23 to $92, depending on the needs of each child. Aaron Martinez may be reached at 546-6249. Source: http://www.elpasotimes.com/news/ci_28348278/foster-parents-accused-sexual-abuse-may-have-earned

Sexually trafficked girl endures new torment — in foster care Judge Maria Sampedro-Iglesia blasted child welfare administrators for what happened to a 17-year-old girl in foster care. Peter Andrew Bosch Miami Herald Staff By Carol Marbin Miller cmarbin@MiamiHerald.com [LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story] It was the kind of encounter that gives child welfare judges nightmares: A 25-year-old male "transporter" with all of three days on the job, and no real background check. And a 17-year-old girl who wound up in foster care partly because she had fallen victim to forced prostitution. When the eight-hour drive was over, the foster child had been victimized yet again, and the driver was under investigation for rape. It was also the kind of encounter that prompts child welfare judges to write scathing orders, which is what Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Maria Sampedro-Iglesia did late last month, when she called the actions of a private social service agency borderline "reckless." "The Court feels impotent as to what actions or sanctions it can legally take," Sampedro-Iglesia wrote in an order dated May 29. "Nothing that this Court can do or order the agency to do can fix all the wrongs this child has suffered. The agency is one more entity that has failed this child." Our Kids, the organization that oversees foster care and adoption services in Miami-Dade and Monroe counties under contract with the Department of Children & Families, declined to discuss the 17-year-old, whose case was being managed by the Family Resource Center, an Our Kids subcontractor. The Family Resource Center's director, Oren Wunderman, at first agreed to discuss the girl, but, later, inquiries were referred to a Miami law firm, which also declined to comment. "The alleged abuse this child suffered, at the hands of the employee of the Family Resource Center of Miami, is outrageous," a spokeswoman for DCF said. "Upon learning this information, the department immediately contacted law enforcement. We will continue to work with our law enforcement partners to ensure they have what they need during their active investigation, in order to bring a just resolution to the issue." The girl, who is not being named by the Miami Herald to protect her privacy, first came to the attention of the Department of Children & Families in the winter of 2013. Court records say she was abandoned by her parents, struggled with mental health, and had been forced into prostitution by human traffickers — the term child welfare and other authorities use for pimps who prey upon children or vulnerable adults. For about a year, the girl lived on the streets as a runaway. Currently there are about 226 such children in Florida — 62 of them from Miami-Dade or Monroe — who have fled their foster or group homes. Last March, records say, the girl returned to court from the streets and "begged" Sampedro-Iglesia to allow her to live with her mother, whose legal rights to the child had earlier been terminated. "While with her biological mother, the child stopped running, was doing well and finally began to engage in services," the judge wrote in her order. But there was a small glitch, which led to a big mistake with colossal consequences: When the teen registered for school, she was told she had to first resolve an outstanding warrant with state juvenile justice authorities. And that required a trip to Palm Beach County. The Department of Juvenile Justice took care of the first leg of the trip, records say. For the teen's return to Key West, the privately run Family Resource Center sent a "transporter" to drive her. What occurred during the eight-hour drive now is the subject of a criminal investigation by both the Monroe County Sheriff's Office and the FBI. The federal agency, a DCF report said, "would be filing charges" against the man. The girl's mother became concerned that something terrible had happened when she found "inappropriate sexually [explicit] text messages on her daughter's phone [sent] by the 'transporter,'" the judge wrote. In an interview with the State Attorney's Office, the girl disclosed details of her encounter with the man. The driver, the girl said, stopped at a Walmart along the way and bought Smirnoff Ice, a citrus-flavored malt drink, and cigarettes, which he shared with her. He "asked the victim how she would feel if he kissed her." After the two had sex, the driver dropped the teen off at home at 3 a.m. "The Court finds that the actions of the agency are not only negligent, but border on reckless," Sampedro-Iglesia wrote. "The agency is entrusted with caring for and protecting those most vulnerable to our society: the voiceless children. Clearly, the agency has failed to do this." For Sampedro-Iglesia, the incident itself was only part of the problem. Though the four-county drive took place on May 1, administrators of the Family Resource Center, or FRC, did not disclose it to the judge until almost two weeks later — at a routine hearing. The judge has ordered child welfare authorities to report adverse incidents involving children under her jurisdiction "immediately." Sampedro-Iglesia said she suspected something was amiss when a number of "higher ups" from FRC and Our Kids, South Florida's lead foster care agency, showed up for the hearing unexpectedly. In her order, Sampedro-Iglesia called the event "criminal in nature." Then, she blasted child welfare administrators, both for leaving a human trafficking victim alone with an unvetted young man and for failing to quickly disclose the results. FRC did not help itself, the judge wrote, by suggesting that what an incident report called "sexual abuse" or "sexual battery" could have been prevented by better training. "It shocks the conscience of this Court that the incident report indicates 'the issue in this case was not of negligence, but of one where additional training would have helped and guided process development,'" Sampedro-Iglesia wrote. "It is insulting to this Court that the agency feels that any type of training would have educated a transporter that perhaps having sex with a child [who] was entrusted to him is inappropriate and criminal in nature," Sampedro-Iglesia wrote. "It is equally repugnant to this Court that the agency testified that, had it known 'that the child was a victim of human trafficking, perhaps a male transporter would not have been the most appropriate person' for the several-hour drive. 'The agency's remarks make it sound as if the incident that occurred was actually the child's fault and not the adult that the agency entrusted her to.'" Details of the 25-year-old driver's background are unclear. The Herald was given his name by a source with knowledge of the investigation, but the name cannot be matched to a person in any available database. His name is not in court records reviewed by the newspaper. And FRC administrators did not quickly release the man's employment records. In her order, Sampedro-Iglesia said the agency's "background check" on the man was confined to Miami — though he "had lived most of his life [in] Tampa" — and relied instead "on the fact that the 'transporter' was recommended [by] and related to one of FRC's 'good employees.'" What is known about the man: He got his job driving kids partly upon the recommendation of another FRC employee, a case worker, to whom he is related, records say. The driver had been working for the foster care and adoption agency three days when he was assigned to transport the teen. Said the DCF incident report, written by an employee of a Key West shelter that is working with the family: "Mother and myself do not understand how a 17-year-old girl with her background [redacted] was released to a single male transporter and why a female transporter was not accompanying her." Source: <http://www.miamiherald.com/news/local/community/miami-dade/article25021960.html>

East Lansdowne KO's group home for troubled youth By Linda Reilly, Times Correspondent Posted: 06/20/15, 10:37 PM EDT | Updated: 2 hrs ago #Comments EAST LANSDOWNE >> After a zoning hearing, borough council denied the application for a group home for troubled youth in the former St. Cyril parish rectory. The Academy was seeking a special exception to change or reinstate a preexisting nonconforming use and/or a variance to permit the use of the property for offices in the R-Residential zoning district. According to officials, the participants would be assigned by the Commonwealth Court and attending either Upper Darby or William Penn School Districts. Consultant Mark DuFrayne, of Lansdowne, testified the children would be in school all day and picked up by a counselor and transported to The Academy. Advertisement "The Academy is not a school, it's a guidance service for students," DuFrayne said. "We can make a difference. They live here and they deserve a second chance. During the summer they will be supervised all day long. Our plan is to go to local parks and local schools with rakes and keep them occupied." The board voted to deny the application after a closed session to make decision. Marian Fitti, of Hirst Avenue, a school director on the William Penn School Board, was disappointed in the council's decision. "I mentor these kids," Fitti said. "The program is awesome. I'm sorry the council didn't approve it." Council also conducted a public hearing for an ordinance to limit the number of day care centers in the borough and voted in favor of limiting the number to six. "We want to cap the number of day care homes in the borough at any one time to six," Councilman William Callahan said. "That's what this ordinance does. It caps it at six. We now have six." Source: <http://www.delcotimes.com/general-news/20150620/east-lansdowne-kos-group-home-for-troubled-youth>

Chaotic midtown boarding house shuts its doors Chaotic midtown boarding house shuts its doors 6 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email Respond: Write a letter to the editor | Write a guest opinion » City of Tucson news 2015-06-21T19:11:00Z Chaotic midtown boarding house shuts its doors By Joe Ferguson Arizona Daily Star Arizona Daily Star June 21, 2015 7:11 pm • By Joe Ferguson Joe Ferguson jferguson@tucson.com 3 An unregulated, unlicensed group home in midtown Tucson has shut its doors — but the city's chronic shortage of authorized, affordable housing for those needing mental health treatment means other unregulated homes will crop up. In recent weeks, city and county officials descended on the home at Broadway and Craycroft, uncovering various problems during their inspections. Issues ranged from serious health concerns like a massive bed bug infestation to smaller infractions like needing to replace a fire extinguisher. In early June, homeowner Sally Le said she was evicting the last two tenants so she could shut down the house and remodel it. Several years ago, social service agencies like La Frontera referred some clients to boarding houses, including the five owned by Le. "We have clients, and we have had clients historically — low-income clients with a mental illness — that may not need to be in a group home where treatment is provided and staff is provided," said State Sen. David Bradley, the chief development officer for La Frontera. Le says she never offered services for the mentally ill — and unless she did, federal Fair Housing laws could make it difficult to shut down a boarding house, Bradley said. "Unless there is some evidence that the facility is providing treatment, then there is no state licensing law that would apply," he said. La Frontera no longer refers clients to boarding houses or pays to house people in them, said Dan Ranieri, the president and CEO of La Frontera. But sometimes clients voluntarily sign over a portion of their Social Security check to pay for rent in a group-home setting. The homes have mostly fallen out of favor with the expansion of Medicaid in Arizona. It has allowed some La Frontera clients to afford better living conditions, Ranieri said. Police, TFD called in When Le bought the house next door, neighbor Cindy Ramirez had high hopes that the home, which had fallen into disrepair, would be fixed up and a family would move in. Instead, the home sat vacant. Eventually, a parade of strangers started flowing in and out of the house. Two trailers were parked on the front lawn, along with a red sedan the Les would periodically pick up and move a few feet — presumably to make it appear it had been recently driven, Ramirez said. Frustrated, Ramirez turned to City Councilman Steve Kozachik for help last month. Soon, police and emergency personnel became a regular sight in front of the red-brick house. In the first six months of the year, Tucson police and fire departments responded to calls to the home 38 times, records indicate. Calls have ranged from minor health-related issues to police matters such as fights, disturbances, mental-health issues and general poor behavior. "Obviously these calls are a drain on our first responders, but also disturb the quality of life of the surrounding neighbors," TPD Capt. Michael Gillooly wrote in an email to Kozachik. Curious about the influx of visitors next door, Ramirez began approaching cars dropping off people at the group asking how they learned about the home. Their answers varied, but some said they were referred to the house by various social service agencies. Bradley says his agency no longer refers people to the five homes operated by the Le family under the Blessing House Boarding name, but it did have a client living inside the home. "The La Frontera worker has tried repeatedly to help him move, but he has so far declined the help," Bradley said. Ranieri said the patient has since been moved into another boarding home. Inspections pile up Over several weeks, inspectors have forced the Le family to make improvements. The fire department found no working fire detectors in the home, and required a ventilation hood over the kitchen stove. The Pima County Health Department was allowed into the house by an occupant, who told the inspector there was no management on-site at the time. Staff observed a bed bug infestation and believed mosquitoes were breeding in the house. City code enforcers told the owners to fix a portion of the roof, remove nonworking vehicles and trailers and clean up debris around the house. They were also concerned about the pool, labeling its condition as "hazardous." It is unclear how many people were staying in the home, although one resident was sleeping on a couch before it caught fire, said Kozachik. Failed attempt to help those less fortunate Le said she had tried to help those with few alternatives to homelessness. But now she intends to remodel her homes and offer them to more traditional renters. Fewer group homes is good news for neighbors who have similar complaints as Ramirez. But there is a downside, Ranieri said. Some of his clients, ineligible for certain benefits, simply don't have enough money and can't earn enough to afford traditional housing. With few alternatives other than these group homes in some circumstances, he said, the only other choice is to live on the streets. Contact reporter Joe Ferguson at 573-4197 or jferguson@tucson.com On Twitter: @JoeFerguson Source: http://tucson.com/news/local/chaotic-midtown-boarding-house-shuts-its-doors/article_49624e85-e770-5fc0-b556-e15fc2af441b.html

Disproportionality in Foster Care Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY SOURCE: National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges SUBJECT: Child Welfare TYPE: YEAR PRODUCED: 2015 The National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges (NCJFCJ) annually publishes Disproportionality Rates for Children of Color in Foster Care Technical Assistance Bulletins, which identify national and state level disproportionality rates. In most states, there are higher proportions of African American/Black and American Indian children in foster care than in the general child population, and in some states, Hispanic/Latino children are disproportionately represented, according to the 2015 Bulletin. NCJFCJ uses the most current (2013) Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System (AFCARS) data and 2013 census data to calculate current disproportionality indexes for the nation, every state, and Washington, D.C. This index demonstrates whether children of different races and ethnicities are overrepresented or underrepresented in the foster care system. The Bulletin makes comparisons between 2000 and 2013 disproportionality rates to illustrate changes that have occurred in the last decade. Click here for the full report. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/research/disproportionality-in-foster-care/10524>

Pennsylvania Latest State To Try To Curb Psychotropic Prescribing To Foster Children In The News June 23, 2015 Facebook Twitter LinkedIn Email Print 4 Comments 197 Views Like in many other states, foster children in Pennsylvania are being given psychotropic drugs by physicians at rates that are "disturbing" and "unacceptable," according to a press release and new report from the state's Department of Human Services (DHS). The state government also announced its plans to try to rein in the practice. DHS Secretary Ted Dallas said in the press release that, "The research confirms our concerns and shows an unacceptable use of these medications for children in foster care. The steps we are announcing today are designed to address this disturbing analysis. Starting with the Department, all of us have a responsibility to make sure children in foster care receive the care they need." The commissioned investigation from PolicyLab in Philadelphia reported that, "For youth ages 6-18 years old in 2012, the use of psychotropic medications was nearly three times higher among youth in foster care than youth in Medicaid overall (prescribed at 43% versus 16%)." The researchers also found that the use of antipsychotics was four times higher among youth in foster care (22%) than youth in Medicaid overall (5%) in Pennsylvania, and that half of the antipsychotic users in Medicaid had a diagnosis of ADHD but no appropriate clinical indication for being prescribed the antipsychotics. In addition, four times as many youth in foster care were being given multiple drugs (12% versus 3%). The investigators further found that the youth in foster care in Pennsylvania "were more likely to have not received any visits within the year with a provider for their behavioral health concerns while on psychotropic medications." Some of the report's recommendations that DHS decided to take action on included offering telephone consultations to physicians and encouraging the use of trauma-screening tools. DHS said it would also more closely monitor prescribing. The report, however, also recommended that Managed Care Organizations that oversee children and youth in foster care should be required to obtain prior authorization from independent experts before prescribing antipsychotics to a child, as most other organizations in Medicaid in Pennsylvania currently do. And it recommended that DHS "expand investments in and reimbursements of non-pharmacological behavioral health interventions(.)" The DHS press release did not address these recommendations. Pennsylvania Takes Action to Address

Psychotropic Medication Use among Medicaid-Eligible Foster Children (DHS press release on PRNewswire, June 16, 2015) Psychotropic Medication Use by Pennsylvania Children in Foster Care and Enrolled in Medicaid (PolicyLab, June 2015) --Rob Wipond, News Editor Source: <http://www.madinamerica.com/2015/06/pennsylvania-latest-state-to-try-to-curb-psychotropic-prescribing-to-foster-children/>

Safe Families: An Alternative To Foster Care Matt Vespa | Jun 24, 2015 Share on Facebook SHARES I admit to total ignorance on this issue, though it usually forms the basis of any crime drama story regarding missing or abused children in the media. It's foster care, and how it's failing our nation's children. The basis for foster care is to make sure the well being of the child is properly maintained. It's a good principle, but one that is lacking in today's government-based system, which is fraught with failure. Right now, there are over 400,000 children in foster care, with 24,000 aging out of the system every year. Seventy percent are placed into the system over neglect. The average length of time a child stays in the system is 717 days. The cost to taxpayers is between $25,000-30,000. Around 50 percent of the time the child is reunited with their families. It's not a shining example of government in action taking care of those who have truly fallen on hard times. When it comes to children, I'm pretty sure both political parties will do all they can to ensure that the general welfare is being met adequately. Thus, isn't it rational to have as many allies making sure that goal is met besides just saddling it with government-run Child Services? Yes, and there is an amazing organization that's pitching in to help families that are in dire straits. The Chicago-based Safe Families for Children (SFFC) began in 2002. It rallies the faith-based community to volunteer and open their homes and hearts to children whose parents are simply overwhelmed with hardship. Whether it is a medical emergency, lay offs, drug abuse, or domestic abuse, Safe Families' goal is reunification. They also offer job-training programs for parents who are undergoing financial hardship. Katie Couric did a segment on this organization on CBS' Evening News in 2010, adding that there's a stigma attached with parents giving up one's child due to the severity of their circumstances. There's guilt, shame, and feelings of inadequacy. Yet, at Safe Families, it's more of an extended sleeper for the kids, as parents work to get back on their feet either by gaining new employment or getting sober. Safe Families also has an impressive record of success. Families are reunited 90 percent of the time; the average length of a child residing with a host family is 45 days; and the average cost is $1,500. All efforts are privately funded. Another positive aspect is that it's volunteer-driven. Only the truly passionate are within the ranks of Safe Families. The host families are vetted, and do not have parental rights over their host child; that right still remains with the parents who can visit or pick up their child from a host family at any time. This dramatically reduces the risk of a child becoming lost in the system. Furthermore, one could look at SFFC as a first-strike vehicle regarding family welfare. Usually, Child Protective Services arrive when a family's issues become overwhelming; SFFC is known to reach families before conditions reach a critical point. These conditions usually are based around homelessness, domestic abuse, drug abuse, or a medical crisis. Yet, with success comes trouble in the form of government regulation concerning this humanitarian effort. The Child Welfare complex has allies who think SFFC is illegal, or must be regulated in order to continue its operations. There are 27 states where Safe Families are operating, but only three—Oregon, Wisconsin, and Oklahoma—have specific SFFC laws on the books. Earlier this month, the Foundation For Government Accountability hosted a conference in Atlanta, Georgia that discussed this issue. They are dedicated to sustaining the SFFC model by promoting the Supporting and Strengthening Families Act in other state legislatures where SFFC has a presence. The bill protects the rights of the parents, bars host families from receiving compensation for their participation in SFFC, clarifies that SFFC is not foster care, offers limited decision making authority to the host family, and removes the stigma of asking for assistance. When it comes to serving children, SFFC appears to be a better alternative. Source: <http://townhall.com/tipsheet/mattvespa/2015/06/24/safe-families-the-alternative-to-foster-care-n2016508>

Cadet Crisis 06.24.15: 25 AM ET Kiddie Boot Camp Accused of Abuse A group of parents is suing a boot camp-style private school, along with the state of Wisconsin, over the alleged abuse of children in its care. A group of parents is suing a boot camp-style private school in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, claiming the teachers there abused seven children without the parents' knowledge in the name of turning young lives around. Their complaint, filed this week in Milwaukee County circuit court, alleges seven elementary and middle school students enrolled at Right Step—a school program for some 200, mostly low-income students—were the victims of the organization's structure and disciplinary system, one meant to instill self-control into students who have previously failed in a traditional school setting. According to the complaint, in the 2014 fall semester, these students were: pushed, kicked, and punched; threatened and called derogatory names; forced to stay in smoke-filled rooms until they passed out; and exercised to exhaustion with limited food and water. The complaint goes on to list specific mistreatments by instructors. Instructors allegedly urinated on a student's clothes, held a student on the ground by placing a foot on his back, forced a student to drink a beverage that the instructor had spit in, and regularly flipped them from their beds in the middle of the night. One student was made to lie in his vomit for half an hour, according to the complaint. "[These children] were taken to a boot camp in central Wisconsin and physically abused and humiliated. Their parents had no idea that physical abuse and humiliation was part of the school's program. They felt deceived by the school and were upset that they enrolled their kids in the school, thereby subjecting them to this abuse," said Aaron DeKosky, the lawyer representing the three parents in their civil suit. via Facebook Calls by The Daily Beast to the school were returned by Right Step's Rebecca Fitch—a named defendant in the suit. She said one of the defendants, Randy R. Martus, hadn't worked with Right Step for three or four years, but she wasn't familiar with the current case and couldn't comment on the allegations. Fitch said a similar sounding case had been brought against the school last year. Since its founding in 2006, Right Step Inc. has marketed itself as a lifeline to what its founders call Milwaukee's "lost youth." Its mission, as advertised on its website, has been "to develop the minds, bodies, and spirits of the community's most challenging youth, through discipline, and motivation toward positive outcomes." "Our kids have been weapon-carrying, drug-using habitual truants," Fitch, Right Step's director of education, told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel in 2008. The boot camp and school are part of the Milwaukee Parental Choice Program administered by the Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction. Government subsidies enable a large majority of the students to attend. As such, the parents are also suing the state of Wisconsin and its education arm, the Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction, arguing the extensive voucher program there uses public and taxpayer dollars to fund private, mostly religious and sometimes—as in this instance, critics say—unregulated schools, effectively turning the majority of the private institution public. "The state does not require that schools in the Milwaukee Parental Choice Program provide parents of prospective students with information on the school's academic achievements or punishment practices," DeKosky said. Instructors allegedly urinated on a student's clothes. Despite the advertised achievements of Right Step cadets, numerous studies of juvenile boot camps have found the "scared straight" model to be ineffective and claim the highly-structured routine and intense physical labor often results in a temporary obedience. Children often leave these programs more hostile and distrusting of authority figures than when they entered and most reoffended in short order—at similar rates to juveniles in traditional correctional institutions. These studies, however, are mostly for camps where juvenile offenders go to be reformed and then return to their normal lives. Right Step and other boot camps that also operate as schools and have students for years may have better success rates. A promotional video for the school shows students—known as cadets—running military drills in the yard as well as receiving instruction in a classroom. Several members of the student body—90 percent of whom are at least three grades behind, according to a drill sergeant quoted in the video—offer testimonials of how the tough love of Right Step kept them off the streets, away from gangs and criminal activity. Along with low graduation rates and test scores and high truancy rates, Milwaukee's public school system boasts one of the largest black-white achievement gaps in the country. Furthermore, the area consistently ranks on the country's most dangerous cities lists and at least 28 city children have been shot there this year. In light of those abysmal statistics, there's no denying that Milwaukee children—particularly the poor, black children Right Step primarily enrolls—are in need of quality educational alternatives. Whether Right Step is saving or harming the children entrusted to its care will be for the courts to decide. Source: <http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2015/06/24/kiddie-boot-camp-accused-of-abuse.html>

The Anti-Union Bosses' Group Fighting Fast Food Organizing Is Now Going After Home Care Workers Can workers centers and unions create a movement strong enough to fight back? BY Mariya Strauss, Political Research Associates Email Print For-profit home care employers are taking federal dollars and using them to hire workers at subminimum wages—with virtually no public accountability. The home health aide in scrubs pushing a client's wheelchair up the ramp from street to sidewalk may appear to have little in common with a cashier at McDonalds or Pizza Hut. But chances are, the company that employs the home care attendant is part of the same type of national franchise structure that the burger giant and other fast food companies use. And just as it has for fast food corporations, the industry's lobbying outfit, the International Franchise Association (IFA), is suing on behalf of home health corporations to keep workers' pay low. The IFA has already emerged as one of the primary opponents of the Fight for 15, the SEIU-backed movement that advocates for a $15-an-hour minimum wage and the unionization of fast food workers. Wherever employers lash back against the Fight for 15, the IFA is there: helping McDonald's argue to the National Labor Relations Board that it is not responsible for franchisees' wage theft and workplace abuses; trying to block a new rule at the NLRB that would speed up the union election process; suing to suppress Seattle's recent minimum wage increase to $15 per hour. "The [Seattle] ordinance is clearly discriminatory and would harm hard-working small business owners who happen to be franchisees,” railed IFA President and CEO Steve Caldeira after the groups’ argument failed the first round in court. “Those who have set out to destroy the long-accepted, time-tested and proven franchise business model must be stopped.” And now, the IFA is suing the federal government in an attempt to keep home health aides from earning the minimum wage and overtime pay. Profiting from care Instead of selling burgers or pizza, for-profit home care staffing agencies such as BrightStar sell the care, companionship and feeding services that seniors and people with disabilities once typically received in a nursing home. Many people, such as Rosa Hendricks, who was profiled in a 2011 National Public Radio series that examined the benefits of home care versus nursing homes, prefer to live at home. Hendricks put it this way: “It makes you feel so much better and know that you are somebody.” “[Home-based care] is preferable to nursing home care for many reasons. But we have gotten it on the cheap,” says Eileen Boris, a women’s studies professor at the University of California/Santa Barbara. Taking advantage of a Jim Crow-era loophole in federal labor law known as the “companionship exemption,” companies like BrightStar can legally pay the nearly 2 million home care workers in the United States at less than the minimum wage (as little as the market allows), and have the option to not pay overtime. Like agricultural workers, another then-mostly African-American sector, home care workers were carved out of the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) (which set wage and hour protections for nearly all other workers) and again when Congress amended the FLSA in 1974. Home care workers can be paid less than the $7.25 per hour federal minimum wage and aren’t entitled to overtime pay in roughly half of the 50 states. Such low wages have a profound impact on home care workers. “I’m not able to save anything,” says 53-year old Marilyn Blackett, who has been a homecare worker in Brooklyn, New York for the past 14 years. “I try not to ask family members [for money]. You don’t let people know what’s happening to you.” Since the mid-20th century, Boris says, “the structure of the [home-care] industry was built in part on this exemption.” According to an August 2014 study in Health Affairs, the majority—62 percent—of the home care industry consists of for-profit franchises. It’s a lucrative model: the industry rakes in $84 billion a year, with median revenue for a single franchise at around $2 million, according to one industry study. The relatively low start-up cost of home health care franchises (around \$150,000 or less, compared with around a half million dollars to start a fast food franchise), combined with the cheap labor, has triggered a home-care boom. Franchisors such as BrightStar, run by CEO Shelly Sun (who also serves as IFA treasurer), are taking advantage of this burgeoning demand. Sun and her husband and business partner, as Sarah Jaffe wrote recently in Dame magazine, have boasted that they “had no medical, home-care, or health-care experience when they started their business, and that would-be franchisees need none either.” Franchisors and franchisees leave such health care expertise to the actual home care attendant—the person who lifts the client, helps her eat, mops up her messes, reminds her to take her medication, reads to her, takes her to the grocery store. What’s more, federal dollars are flowing to these for-profit staffing agencies. In most states, the person receiving care can pay for it out of his or her Social Security check—or have it paid for by Medicare or Medicaid. “It was the availability of hiring people using federal monies ... that allowed the franchise industry to blossom,” says Boris. In other words, for-profit home care employers are taking federal dollars and using them to hire workers at subminimum wages—with virtually no public accountability. “For-profit home care agencies are bleeding Medicare,” Steffie Woolhandler, a professor at the City University of New York’s School of Public Health and senior author of the Health Affairs analysis told Modern Healthcare magazine in August 2014. And lack of regulatory oversight means quality of care also suffers. Woolhandler and her co-authors concluded that, “Overall, it appears that proprietary (for-profit) home-care agencies deliver slightly lower-quality care at a substantially higher cost.” David Weil, head of the U.S. Department of Labor’s Wage and Hour Division, recognizes that action is needed to reverse this race to the bottom. In September 2013, his agency issued a final rule to close the companionship loophole. The home care industry promptly sued Weil, with the IFA as one of the lead plaintiffs. The case, Home Care Association of America v. Weil, is now in federal court; the DC Circuit Court of Appeals has expedited the case and could issue a decision at any moment. In the meantime, the exemption remains in place. With the U.S. senior population projected to reach 88.5 million, or 20 percent of the total population, by 2050, the demand for home care services is on the rise. The job of home health aide is now the third fastest growing occupation in the United States, according to Forbes. If the IFA and home health companies are able to persuade the courts to keep the companionship exemption, CEOs like Sun will see their profits grow while workers remain in poverty. A common foe With home care workers and fast food workers facing a common enemy, the question arises: Can they join and create a single movement for workplace justice in the franchised economy? Two separate, non-traditional worker organizing campaigns are underway in the fast food and home care industries. But the franchised structure of these industries presents unique challenges for workers who may wish to actually form labor unions: it isn’t always clear whether the franchisor (the brand) or the franchisee (the storefront owner/operator) is responsible for setting wages and workplace conditions. What’s more, home care workers are in some states explicitly prohibited from forming labor unions—and where they can form unions, the Supreme Court last summer ruled in Harris v. Quinn that the workers cannot be required to join or pay the fees that would keep the union running. Because of these and other challenges, the two campaigns—SEIU’s Fight for 15 for the fast food workers and the coalition-based Caring Across Generations for the home care workers—focus more on advocating for worker-friendly policies and regulations than on unionizing these growing workforces. That said, SEIU is forging ahead with organizing fast food workers through Fight for 15, using short-term strikes to protest and raise awareness about the need for a living wage and the right to unionize. Domestic workers, with their solitary shuttling between clients’ homes, have historically been a tough group to bring together. But the National Domestic Workers’ Alliance (NDWA) and the SEIU have been organizing them in recent years, with some success. NDWA is an alliance of over 40 local domestic worker groups that organize domestic workers for expanded rights and dignity on the job, and push for laws to improve rights for domestic workers at the local, state and federal levels. Both groups say their campaigns aim to raise wages and benefits for the entire industry. NDWA and its partners have won legislative victories on a Domestic Workers’ Bill of Rights in New York, California, Oregon, Hawaii and elsewhere by building common cause with home care clients. With its Caring Across Generations campaign, NDWA has formed regional and state-based coalitions with the families of the elderly people and people with disabilities that home care workers serve. NDWA founder and director Ai-Jen Poo says that Caring Across Generations is building a counterforce to the franchised home care industry’s unscrupulous pursuit of profit over quality care. “In its own complaint, the IFA said that their mission is to ‘protect, enhance and promote franchising.’ You have to ask, should a trade association like this be determining the future of homecare for millions of workers and consumers?” As an alternative to the franchise system, workers’ organizing efforts are starting to include developing more worker-friendly models of employment, such as worker-owned cooperatives. Jaffe writes that in New York, “worker-owned Cooperative Home Care Associates has more than 2,000 worker-owners who make $16 an hour (more than twice the federal minimum wage) plus benefits and have a guarantee of working hours.” Home care workers are already organizing through Caring Across Generations, and SEIU’s participation provides a national infrastructure that could allow Fight for 15 and home care workers to join forces to challenge the IFA. SEIU’s own home care and fast food campaigns began in April to link up with a series of teach-ins and protests in SEIU Healthcare’s Midwest region, and such solidarity actions could extend to other regions in the future. But these are only beginnings. As Maria de Fatima Moscani, a Mineola, New York home care worker with 14 years on the job, says: “Something has to be done about low pay, and the money is there. This is not acceptable at a human level. The cost of living is skyrocketing, food is up, and rent is so much. How can we live?” With a juggernaut of major franchised brands moving against home care workers’ rights, another question surfaces: Can fast food and home care workers create a movement powerful enough to fight back against the corporate forces up against them both? Kelsey Howe and Jacey Rubinstein contributed research to this article. Source: <http://inthesetimes.com/article/18108/international-franchise-association-fast-food-home-care-workers>

Former Berea group home employee charged with assault, accused of punching resident A former Berea group home employee is charged with assault in connection with a June 5 incident involving a resident, according to court records. (Evan MacDonald, Northeast Ohio Media Group) Print Email By Evan MacDonald, Northeast Ohio Media Group Sun News Email the author | Follow on Twitter on June 25, 2015 at 10:42 AM, updated June 25, 2015 at 10:45 AM Reddit Email BEREa, Ohio -- Charges have been filed against a former Berea group home employee accused of punching a 13-year-old resident in the face. Larquisha Davis, 26, of Cleveland, is charged with assault in the June 5 incident. Her arraignment is scheduled at 9 a.m. July 1 in Berea Municipal Court. Detectives spent several weeks investigating the incident and interviewing witnesses before the charge was filed in court Wednesday, according to police. Davis is no longer employed at OhioGuidestone, the organization said in a statement released June 12. “OhioGuidestone reported the incident to and is cooperating fully with ongoing police and [Erie County Job and Family Services] investigations, and will take any appropriate steps to ensure its mission of safety,” an OhioGuidestone spokeswoman said in the statement. Davis and the resident were arguing when Davis pulled the resident’s hair and punched her in the face. The resident retaliated by pulling Davis’ hair before other staff members could break up the fight, another employee wrote in a statement to police. Erie County Job and Family Services, which provides services to the resident, is also investigating the incident, director Karen Balconi Ghezzi said earlier this month. She declined to elaborate, citing healthcare privacy laws. Source: http://www.cleveland.com/berea/index.ssf/2015/06/former_berea_group_home_reside.html

Report: Human services violated rights of disabled in body checks - The Denver Post Report: Human services violated rights of disabled in body checks Ordered to produce corrective action plan after violating residents' rights By Jennifer Brown The Denver Post Posted: 06/26/2015 04:50:26 PM MDT 17 Comments Updated: 06/27/2015 01:49:53 AM MDT Department of Human Services director Reggie Bicha talks to The Denver Post. (Craig F. Walker, The Denver Post) Jun 20: Colorado to pay \$1 million sanction to settle a federal complaint that DHS misused money Jun 3: Abuse allegations in Pueblo group homes a key factor in DHS turmoil May 27: Colorado faces \$1 million sanction for federal infractions related to food-assistance program May 24: Colorado human services director Reggie Bicha pledges better communication May 19: Previous letter sent to Hickenlooper raised similar complaints about human services May 14: Gov. John Hickenlooper defends human services director Reggie Bicha Colorado human services officials violated the "privacy, dignity and respect" of people with disabilities — disregarding state policy and federal law — during body checks to determine whether residents at state-run group homes had been abused, the state public health department said Friday. The report, from the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment, was another blow for embattled human services director Reggie Bicha, already under fire after 84 state lawmakers signed a letter last month calling for leadership changes at his department. The health department's findings, based on interviews with group-home staffers and residents' guardians, said human services officials failed to adhere to policies regarding "mistreatment, abuse, neglect and exploitation." Human services officials "could not provide a specific explanatory catalyst" for the body inspections, which happened in late March, the report said. Relatives of the residents complained that 62 people were "strip-searched" at 10 community group homes and a day center for people with developmental disabilities. Human services officials did not allow the patients or their guardians to "give informed consent to inspections of their bodies," the health department found. Also, the "body audits" or skin checks were conducted without adequately informing patients of their purpose. Advertisement "It was found in numerous instances that the search was conducted in such a way as to cause significant distress," according to the findings. Bicha, in an e-mailed statement, said he regretted not asking for guardian permission before the skin checks but that he had "significant factual basis to believe residents in all 10 group homes and the day program were subject to unacceptable and imminent risk to their health and safety." Among those searched, 40 residents previously were found incompetent in court to make decisions about their own health. Their guardians were not contacted, investigators found. Patients who are nonverbal indicated through "behaviors" that they did not want to participate, "yet the inspections were conducted in spite of the persons' protests," state health officials said. "Ultimately, the body inspections resulted in the persons being confused, scared, and some were distraught to the point it negatively affected their behavior." The state health department investigation was prompted by a March 30 complaint alleging medical staffers entered the Pueblo Regional Center group homes "in mass" and "strip-searched" all of the residents. State health officials called for a corrective action plan from human services officials, who released the plan in conjunction with the release of the investigative findings. Human services executives in February and March learned of several allegations of resident abuse by center staffers — including some not reported to state health officials or law enforcement, Bicha said. There were reports that words were scratched into the backs and stomachs of nonverbal residents, that two unsupervised residents stole a vehicle, and that staffers had struck, choked, shoved and humiliated residents, he said. "Due to the significance and severity of the allegations that had come to our attention, we needed to take swift action to ensure the safety and well-being of our residents," Bicha said. "However, in hindsight, I wish we would have engaged the parents and guardians sooner." The body checks uncovered 10 suspected incidents of maltreatment. Pueblo County Sheriff Kirk Taylor recently announced he is seeking charges against seven current or former Pueblo Regional Center staffers who were involved in six cases of abuse, neglect or sexual misconduct. As part of its corrective-action plan, the human services department will appoint a committee to review incident reports, medication and nutrition at the group homes. The department will create a "standardized consent process" for body checks. Also, staffers will have to report any allegations of abuse or exploitation to department executives within 24 hours. Jennifer Brown: 303-954-1593, jenbrown@denverpost.com or twitter.com/jbrownpost Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_28390716/report-human-services-violated-rights-disabled-body-checks

Report: Human services violated rights of disabled in body checks Ordered to produce corrective action plan after violating residents' rights By Jennifer Brown The Denver Post Posted: 06/26/2015 04:50:26 PM MDT Updated: 06/27/2015 01:49:53 AM MDT Department of Human Services director Reggie Bicha talks to The Denver Post. (Craig F. Walker, The Denver Post) Jun 20: Colorado to pay \$1 million sanction to settle a federal complaint that DHS misused money Jun 3: Abuse allegations in Pueblo group homes a key factor in DHS turmoil May 27: Colorado faces \$1 million sanction for federal infractions related to food-assistance program May 24: Colorado human services director Reggie Bicha pledges better communication May 19: Previous letter sent to Hickenlooper raised similar complaints about human services May 14: Gov. John Hickenlooper defends human services director Reggie Bicha Colorado human services officials violated the "privacy, dignity and respect" of people with disabilities — disregarding state policy and federal law — during body checks to determine whether residents at state-run group homes had been abused, the state public health department said Friday. The report, from the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment, was another blow for embattled human services director Reggie Bicha, already under fire after 84 state lawmakers signed a letter last month calling for leadership changes at his department. The health department's findings, based on interviews with group-home staffers and residents' guardians, said human services officials failed to adhere to policies regarding "mistreatment, abuse, neglect and exploitation." Human services officials "could not provide a specific explanatory catalyst" for the body inspections, which happened in late March, the report said. Relatives of the residents complained that 62 people were "strip-searched" at 10 community group homes and a day center for people with developmental disabilities. Human services officials did not allow the patients or their guardians to "give informed consent to inspections of their bodies," the health department found. Also, the "body audits" or skin checks were conducted without adequately informing patients of their purpose. Advertisement "It was found in numerous instances that the search was conducted in such a way as to cause significant distress," according to the findings. Bicha, in an e-mailed statement, said he regretted not asking for guardian permission before the skin checks but that he had "significant factual basis to believe residents in all 10 group homes and the day program were subject to unacceptable and imminent risk to their health and safety." Among those searched, 40 residents previously were found incompetent in court to make decisions about their own health. Their guardians were not contacted, investigators found. Patients who are nonverbal indicated through "behaviors" that they did not want to participate, "yet the inspections were conducted in spite of the persons' protests," state health officials said. "Ultimately, the body inspections resulted in the persons being confused, scared, and some were distraught to the point it negatively affected their behavior." The state health department investigation was prompted by a March 30 complaint alleging medical staffers entered the Pueblo Regional Center group homes "in mass" and "strip-searched" all of the residents. State health officials called for a corrective action plan from human services officials, who released the plan in conjunction with the release of the investigative findings. Human services executives in February and March learned of several allegations of resident abuse by center staffers — including some not reported to state health officials or law enforcement, Bicha said. There were reports that words were scratched into the backs and stomachs of nonverbal residents, that two unsupervised residents stole a vehicle, and that staffers had struck, choked, shoved and humiliated residents, he said. "Due to the significance and severity of the allegations that had come to our attention, we needed to take swift action to ensure the safety and well-being of our residents," Bicha said. "However, in hindsight, I wish we would have engaged the parents and guardians sooner." The body checks uncovered 10 suspected incidents of maltreatment. Pueblo County Sheriff Kirk Taylor recently announced he is seeking charges against seven current or former Pueblo Regional Center staffers who were involved in six cases of abuse, neglect or sexual misconduct. As part of its corrective-action plan, the human services department will appoint a committee to review incident reports, medication and nutrition at the group homes. The department will create a "standardized consent process" for body checks. Also, staffers will have to report any allegations of abuse or exploitation to department executives within 24 hours. Jennifer Brown: 303-954-1593, jenbrown@denverpost.com or twitter.com/jbrownpost Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_28390716/report-human-services-violated-rights-disabled-body-checks

Tulane study says foster children in stable homes fare best in adolescence June 25, 2015 Keith Brannon Phone: 504-862-8789 kbrannon@tulane.edu Foster children placed in a consistent, stable home throughout their development have fewer emotional and behavioral problems as they reach adolescence — even if they experienced significant neglect as infants, according to a new Tulane University study published in The Lancet Psychiatry. "Our study provides greater evidence for the importance of high-quality foster care that is consistent across the child's life," said lead author Kathryn Humphreys, a postdoctoral fellow in infant mental health at Tulane University School of Medicine. "The reality is that often children move between families if they are in foster care, and those disruptions from stable placements are likely to be harmful for their psychological health." The study, which is part of the Bucharest Early Intervention Project, followed 110 children abandoned in Romanian orphanages in the early 2000s. Half were randomly assigned to foster care while others continued in institutional care. These groups were compared to a separate group of children raised by their families. Researchers found that abandoned children placed in the same high-quality foster families by age 12 had low levels of internalizing disorders, such as anxiety and depression, and externalizing symptoms such as oppositional behaviors or defying adults. They were no different than community comparison children who were raised by their own families. However, children who were disrupted from their original foster family had worse outcomes with higher levels of both internalizing and externalizing symptoms that were no different than children in the institutional care group. "Our study found that it isn't just placing children in foster homes that is beneficial for long-term psychological health, but rather having the same foster family over time that results in those benefits," Humphreys said. The study was co-authored by Tulane researchers Dr. Charles Zeanah, Dr. Mary Margaret Gleason, Dr. Stacy Drury and Devi Miron in collaboration with Dr. Charles Nelson of Harvard University and Nathan Fox of the University of Maryland. Source: <https://tulane.edu/news/releases/tulane-study-says-foster-children-in-stable-homes-fare-best-in-adolescence.cfm>

State agency accused of violating rights of disabled Google Survey FAQ The Associated Press • Updated: June 27, 2015 at 4:12 pm • Close Advertisement Skip Ad » 00:00 | 00:00 DENVER — The Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment has determined that human services officials violated the privacy, dignity and respect of people with disabilities during body checks to determine whether residents at state-run group homes had been abused. + caption DENVER, CO. - MAY 22: Reggie Bicha, executive director of the Colorado Department of Human Services during an interview in Denver, CO May 22, 2015. (Photo By Craig F. Walker / The Denver Post) Related Information Related Articles (5) US Supreme Court wants another review of Colorado TABOR suit Colorado Springs NAACP chapter airs issues, vows to move forward Suthers wants no sitting, lying on sidewalks and planters in downtown Colorado Springs Colorado officials praise progress of restorative justice programs Colorado's senators take bipartisan 'wheat tour' + show more The health department's findings, based on interviews with group-home staffers and residents' guardians, said human services officials failed to follow policies regarding mistreatment, abuse, neglect and exploitation. Relatives of the residents complained that 62 people were strip-searched at 10 community group homes and a day center for people with developmental disabilities. It was found in numerous instances that the search was conducted in such a way as to cause significant distress, according to the findings. Human services director Reggie Bicha said in a statement that he regretted not asking for guardians' permission before the skin checks but that he had "significant factual basis to believe residents in all 10 group homes and the day program were subject to unacceptable and imminent risk to their health and safety." Human services officials learned in February and March of several allegations of resident abuse by center staffers, Bicha said. There were reports that words were scratched into the backs and stomachs of nonverbal residents, that two unsupervised residents stole a vehicle, and that staffers had struck, choked, shoved and humiliated residents, he said. Among those searched, 40 residents previously were found incompetent in court to make decisions about their own health. Their guardians were not contacted, the Denver Post reported (<http://tinyurl.com/q5nmzjdj>). Source: <http://gazette.com/state-agency-accused-of-violating-rights-of-disabled/article/1554576>

Mob beat boarding school director to death after two pupils aged 10 and 11 are found drowned in a pond on the grounds in India and teachers are accused of murdering them Images show an enraged mob beating a school director with huge sticks Locals blamed the school staff for killing two students, aged 10 and 11 The students' bodies were found in a pond and tests showed they drowned Indian police are now investigating after the man died from his injuries By Corey Charlton for MailOnline Published: 09:56 EST, 29 June 2015 | Updated: 18:01 EST, 29 June 2015 13shares 9 View comments An angry mob in northern India has beaten a school director to death after claiming the facility's staff were responsible for killing two students aged 10 and 11. Shocking footage broadcast on local TV stations showed the man being beaten with sticks and writhing on the ground as others watched and stomped on his chest, stomach and limbs. The students had disappeared a day earlier from the school grounds, and villagers accused school staff of killing them and dumping them in a pond. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +1 The school director died from his injuries on Sunday night after being beaten by an angry mob Post-mortem examinations later showed the boys had drowned, while the school director died from his injuries on Sunday night. When police arrived at the scene of the lynching, the enraged mob pelted them with stones, injuring six officers, while police also suspended an officer for failing to stop the attack. RELATED ARTICLES Previous Next The terrifying moment a passenger plane's engine catches... Now ISIS brings its evil to Egypt: Terror group kills... Incredible footage taken by Tunisian hotel worker as he... Share this article Share 13 shares Residents of the director's home village held angry protests after the man's death, blocking road and train traffic and setting a vehicle on fire. The breakout of violence occurred in Nirpur village, about 55miles (90km) southeast of Patna, the capital of Bihar state, and police have vowed to investigate. Despite authorities' attempts to crack down on vigilante justice, there have been several reports of lynchings throughout India in recent months. In March, Indian police charged 42 people after the killing and lynching of a rape suspect who was dragged from his prison cell. Police charged the men with rioting, arson and unlawful assembly over the widely-condemned attack by a frenzied mob on Syed Farid Khan in northeastern Nagaland state. Thousands of people stormed the Dimapur Central Prison on Thursday to snatch Khan, stripping him naked and beating him to death with sticks in the streets before stringing him up to a clock tower. Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3143313/Mob-beat-boarding-school-director-death-two-pupils-aged-10-11-drowned-pond-grounds-India-teachers-accused-murdering-them.html#ixzz3exlJInoQ> Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

Foster care will not be privatized, officials say Justin A. Hinkley, jhinkley@lsj.com 6:30 a.m. EDT June 29, 2015 In this 2007 LSJ file photo, Michigan foster children and supporters gather for the kickoff of the Michigan Heart Gallery exhibit at the Capitol. Countering rumors, state officials said they're not planning 100% privatization of foster care case management. (Photo: Rod Sanford/The Lansing State Journal) Story Highlights State officials said no plans for 100% private case management State employees say clues point in the other direction 244 CONNECT 3 TWEETLINKEDIN 2 COMMENTEMAILMORE LANSING — Despite official statements to the contrary, state employees and some private providers suspect Michigan is working toward fully outsourcing foster care services in the state. Currently, the more than 12,000 foster care cases in Michigan are split about evenly between private providers and the more than 700 foster care workers at the state Department of Health & Human Services. The division varies by county, but state employees and others look to Kent County — where recent legislation fully privatized foster care case management and established a pilot program for a performance-based funding model — as one of several clues that 100% outsourcing is coming down the pike. READ MORE: The state's contract with Public Consulting Group BACKGROUND: Task force report on performance-based funding Several private providers separately told the State Journal they expected the state to move that direction. But Steve Yager, executive director of DHHS' Children's Services Agency, speculated folks conflated two separate issues to form an incorrect theory. Private agencies already handled about 90% of the caseload in Kent County, Yager and others said, and language in the 2014 state budget that gave all cases to private agencies was spurred by community members there. The county's selection as the test site for performance-based funding was a separate issue, Yager and others said. "I've not heard anyone say the performance-based funding work is tied to 100% privatization," Yager said in a recent interview, adding the state wants "a balanced system" of public and private services. State Rep. Earl Poleski, R-Jackson, chairman of the state House Human Services Committee, said in a separate interview that private, nonprofit agencies "do an excellent job" and he'll "press for using the not-for-profits to the extent we can." But he said full privatization wouldn't work because nonprofits have no presence in some of Michigan's most rural areas. RELATED: Child care workers rip pricey, glitchy computer system "We try to employ them as best we can." "I believe the state and locals should do what works specifically for their community and more importantly what's best for children in their communities," state Sen. Peter MacGregor, R-Rockford, Poleski's counterpart in the Senate, said in an emailed statement. "What we have in Kent County isn't easily replicated in other counties." Janet Snyder, executive director of the Michigan Federation for Children & Families, an advocacy group for private providers, said separately she's spoken to agencies about privatization "in the areas of the state where it makes sense to do that," but "there's no intent or desire from the private agencies to eliminate state jobs. The goal is looking at how we provide service to the kids." But privatization could solve a complex arrangement in which DHHS currently pays, regulates and in some cases competes with private agencies, said David Gehm, president and CEO of the Flint-based Wellspring Lutheran Services. RELATED: Outsource state jobs 'in the sunshine,' reps say "I think what you need to talk about is, is this the best role for government in all of this?" Gehm said. Private agencies said they offer some advantages over the state, such as more flexibility and a more direct connection to the community. The state in April approved a five-year, \$1.6 million contract with Boston actuary firm Public Consulting Group to help it develop the new funding model "for all public and private child welfare providers." But Ray Holman, legislative liaison for the United Auto Workers Local 6000, which represents most DHHS workers, said performance-based funding is meant to remove one of the union's chief arguments against privatization: That current payments to private agencies for the amount of time they care for kids provides "a perverse incentive" for them to keep kids in foster homes. Performance-based funding would pay providers for results, including more quickly getting kids into permanent homes. But Holman said private agencies, nonprofit or no, still have the incentive to cut costs and make money, while state workers' only incentive is to do good work for kids. The five private agencies piloting performance-based funding in Kent County have collectively been paid nearly $300 million over the past four-and-a-half years, according to state

transparency records. "Child welfare is not a good; we're not selling screw drivers or batteries or tires," Holman said. "It's a service (and) when you farm out and deputize other people to be responsible for human lives, you're often going to have bad outcomes." Holman said there are other clues the state wants to outsource: There's increased lobbying by private agencies, the state's encouragement of outsourcing in recent years, and the involvement of MacGregor, who in the 2016 budget successfully pushed to close the state's W.J. Maxey Boys Training School so youth there could be sent to private juvenile justice facilities. Then there's the fact that, as Michigan implements child welfare reforms, officials are trying to learn from Florida, which outsourced foster care beginning in the late 1990s. Florida privatized its service despite four of five pilot projects failing in the early years, and it's posted mixed results since then, according to a 2010 analysis from the Seattle-based Casey Family Programs. Privatization didn't save money, the report said. But Jim Paparella, president and CEO of the Grand Rapids-based D.A. Blodgett-St. Johns, said the state's "a little guilty by association" with Florida but "there's no hidden agenda of we're gonna privatize the entire state." "Where it goes is where all the stakeholders think it should go together," he said last week, fresh from a meeting with DHHS officials. Foster care, by numbers •12,248: Total number of foster care cases in Michigan, as of June 1 •6,413: Number managed by the state Department of Health & Human Services, or 52% •5,835: Number managed by private agencies, or 48% Source: DHHS report to the Legislature Source: <http://www.lansingstatejournal.com/story/news/local/capitol/2015/06/29/foster-care-will-privatized-officials-say/29365631/>

Child sex abuse inquiry: High turnover rate of foster families, youth workers leaves children vulnerable, royal commission hears By Lucy Carter Updated Sun at 8:14pm Sun 28 Jun 2015, 8:14pm Photo: The royal commission heard from a panel of four youth workers who were themselves foster children. \(Supplied: Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse\) Related Story: Foster carers' register 'could make situation worse for Aboriginal children' Related Story: Ratios of FACS caseworkers to children in care 'doesn't meet standards' Map: Sydney 2000 Instability caused by the high turnover rate of foster families and youth workers leaves children in care vulnerable to being targeted by sexual predators, an inquiry has heard. The Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse this week resumed public hearings into allegations of child sexual abuse in out-of-home care. Today it heard from a panel of four youth workers from around Australia who were themselves foster children. India Spicer told the commission that children and young people struggled to speak about abuse because they had trouble making "real connections" with their foster families and youth workers. "There's a lot of worker turnover which makes it hard for the young people to build a rapport with the workers, the people who they're involved with in a professional basis," she said. "It takes a lot of time to get to know and trust these workers and then the workers leave." He was moving every six months at one stage and he was never able to form a support system with a carer or an agency worker, or with the school system; he always knew he was going to be moved on. Youth worker Kate Finn told the inquiry that she believed the current system, with its high staff turnover rates, made it hard for children to feel any stability. "We work with someone who has moved like, 22 times across [Victoria]," Ms Finn said. "He was moving every six months at one stage and he was never able to form a support system with a carer or an agency worker, or with the school system; he always knew he was going to be moved on. "If you don't have the support system, you've got no one to fall back on, so when you're feeling isolated you reach out to anyone who's offering you friendship, which is why I suppose you'd have sexual abuse happening in out-of-home care, especially through the internet because they're looking for something they don't have," she told the commission. Ms Finn agreed with counsel assisting the commission Gail Furness, who suggested that people trying to "groom" children in-out-of-home care might try and provide the affection and connections that foster children were missing. The panel of youth workers recommended more funding for the sector as well as better social media and online training for children in care and their foster families. Foster children unlikely to report abuse: youth worker The commission also heard from a youth worker that foster children are reluctant to speak up about issues like abuse because they lose government support when they come of age. Tash Dale told the inquiry that many foster children turn 18 and lose their home and support services and feel they have nowhere to turn to. "When you're in care, you stop being a ward of the state when you're 18, you stop getting help, you stop getting anything, so you're on your own and there's a fear behind that," she said. "[It's] like you're in the big bad world by yourself so I really don't think that a lot of people will then come forward about what happened to them in care unless they have support from somebody else." The hearing continues. Source: <http://www.abc.net.au/news/2015-06-29/foster-families-youth-worker-turnover-leaves-kids-vulnerable/6580090>

IG: Group home supervisor charged with identity theft Posted on June 30, 2015 at 4:51 pm by Rick Karlin, Capitol bureau in Inspector General, Office for People with Developmental Disabilities Email Print Comments The supervisor of a cluster of Long Island group homes for the disabled is charged with stealing the identity of a client. Blossom Officer Thame is charged with using a client's name to open a PSE&G electricity account. She is a treatment team leader for the State Office of People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD). Here are the details: New York State Inspector General Catherine Leahy Scott and Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas J. Spota announced the arrest of a supervisor of seven Long Island group homes for the developmentally disabled for identity theft in connection with her alleged use of a service recipient's personal information to obtain electric utility service for her own home. Blossom Officer Thame, 55, of, Ridge, New York was arrested on one count of Identify Theft in the Second Degree, a class E Felony. Thame is employed as a Treatment Team Leader for the State Office of People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD). The arrest follows an investigation by Inspector General Leahy Scott's office that revealed that Thame used her position as Treatment Team Leader to gain access to a service recipient's name and personal information which she then used to open a PSE&G electricity account at her personal residence. The investigation determined Thame, since early March 2014, received more than $1,400 worth of electric utility service at her residence using the name and information of the service recipient. Separately, On April 3, 2015, Thame was charged with allegedly providing false information on an application for a New York State Driver License. She was charged with one count of Offering a False Instrument for Filing, a class E Felony. In that matter, Thame allegedly applied for a second license using the name "Blossom M. Officer-Thame" and failed to disclose that her license under the name "Blossom Thame" had been suspended. The case remains pending. Inspector General Leahy Scott said, "This employee took advantage of an individual she was tasked to protect and care for, violating her professional responsibilities and violating the public's trust, and she will be held accountable for her actions." District Attorney Spota said, "The investigation by Inspector General Leahy Scott's office uncovered this appalling scheme to exploit the vulnerability of a developmentally disabled person – a crime that this defendant will be formally charged with at her arraignment in a few weeks' time. Inspector General Leahy Scott and her team did a thorough job establishing the facts of this crime and our office will continue to work with the Inspector General as we move toward trial." At the time Thame allegedly stole the service recipient's identity, she was responsible for seven sites that are operated by OPWDD, five Independent residence alternatives (IRA's) and two Independent care facilities (ICF's). The facilities housed 57 service recipients. Since late March, Thame has been out on administrative leave. Thame is due to be arraigned in Suffolk County First District Court on August 25. The defendant is presumed innocent until and unless proven guilty in a court of law. Source: <http://blog.timesunion.com/capitol/archives/237971/ig-group-home-supervisor-charged-with-identity-theft/>

Mother files lawsuit over son's treatment at residential center By Julie McClure - The Republic (jmccclure@therepublic.com) Published: 7/1/15 11:43 am EDT Updated: 7/1/15 5:03 pm EDT AAA Follow The Republic: Recommended for you Area man arrested in robbery at center www.therepublic.com The Republic - Photos: 2 children killed in SUV accident on I-65 www.therepublic.com The Republic - Photos: Murder suspect calls others before 911 www.therepublic.com Police raid two massage spas in Columbus www.therepublic.com Add This A Clark County mother has filed a lawsuit against Columbus Hospital LLC, alleging a staff member at the company's Columbus Behavioral Center held her son in a choke hold. Cynthia Wall alleges in the lawsuit that when her then 9-year-old son was an in-patient at the center from October 2013 to February 2014, staff members there used unwarranted physical force on the boy. For more on this story, see Thursday's Republic. Source: http://www.therepublic.com/view/local_story/Mother-files-lawsuit-over-son-1435765415

Rebekah King, who was beaten and sexually abused while in care, vows to change foster care system True stories by: EMILY MOULTON From: news.com.au 4 days ago July 01, 2015 11:20AM Share Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share on Google+ Google Plus Share on LinkedIn Share inShare2 Share on Reddit Text Size Increase Text Size Decrease Text Size Print Email Increase Text Size Decrease Text Size Print Email Share Add to Digg Add to del.icio.us Add to Facebook Add to Kwoff Add to Myspace Add to Newsvine What are these? Rebekah King with her husband Darren. Source: Supplied WHEN Rebekah King was just six years old, her mother went to children services and told them she didn't want her and her brothers. When it refused to take them in, she then allegedly told them she would "kill them". According to Rebekah, her mother, an alcoholic prostitute, would regularly threaten to end their lives. It wasn't until she allegedly admitted trying to strangle Rebekah that the Department of Community Services (DOCS) began to take notice, however she claims they still placed her and her two brothers back into the care of the woman who didn't want them. It was months before the children were finally removed and placed into a group home. But, sadly, for Rebekah and her brothers, the abuse did not end. Instead, the trio were subjected to varying degrees of physical and emotional abuse for their decade-long stint in the NSW foster care system. Rebekah was made a ward of the state at the age of eight and by the time she turned 13 she had tried to take her own life. She was beaten regularly and was emotionally and verbally abused. She was also sexually abused twice. Once, she claims, by a man who had come to visit her mother, another time while she was in a group home. Rebekah King when she was in foster care. Source: Facebook

Almost two decades on, Rebekah, who is now a mother of three, says she has dealt with her demons. However, she has not forgiven the system that failed her. And she claims that it still fails hundreds of children every day. Rebekah has set up a Facebook page, The Little Girl that Nobody Wanted, and posted her case file in a bid to share her experience with others. The Sydney mum also started a Change.org petition calling for the NSW Government to set up an independent complaints commission that will investigate and stamp out the abuse of children in the foster care system. So far, more than 35,000 people have signed the petition and Rebekah met NSW Family and Community Services Minister Brad Hazzard today to discuss her campaign. "We just have such a messed-up system," Rebekah explained. "It's broken. There's no common sense in it. "I was sexually abused both in my mum's care and in foster care. But it took [DOCS] a long time to get me counselling. I was sexually abused when I was seven or eight years old but they did not get me counselling until I was 12. By then I had learnt to block it out." An extract from Rebekah King's case file. Source: Facebook

In this extract from Rebekah King's case file, a social worker writes how a young Rebekah describes being sexually abused. Source: Facebook

Rebekah explained that, besides the sexual abuse, she was subjected to varying levels of physical abuse and neglect. But it there was one home that was particularly emotionally and physically abusive, the place she refers to as the "house from hell". "I remembered being placed with this woman who would put me in the garage for 90 per cent of the day," she said. "I wasn't allowed to talk to anybody in the street because I had let people know in the past what was happening. "So she hid me, so to speak. I was only allowed inside to go to the bathroom, shower and eat and go to bed." Rebekah said the woman's cruelty also extended to her brother, whose face the foster carer once rubbed in vomit. He was only five years old. "This woman used to belt me across the head," she said. "She told me I was never allowed to smile in photos because my smile was ugly. "She dragged me at least 50m to 100m by my hair to a public cubicle to do whatever she wanted to out of spite. "After that, I was placed into another family and it was pretty much the same. I was about nine or 10 then." Rebekah King with her husband Darren and two of their children Keiara and Jed. Source: Supplied

Rebekah said that when she turned 18 she became her brothers' carer, to spare them from further years in the foster care system. Since then she has managed to rebuild her life, married her loving husband Darren, and had their three beautiful children Keiara, 9, Jed, 6, and Braxton, 1. But she still bears the scars of her past. Rather than wallow in them, she wants to raise awareness of what she says is a flawed and broken system in desperate need of repair. "My mum abandoned me, but then my life became hell. The system that was meant to care for me descended into abuse and neglect," she said. "This system has had so many inquiries, reviews and commissions yet nothing has changed in over 30 years. That's not good enough anymore. "These kids (foster kids) just want some hope and a future to look forward to. Please don't let the abuse and deaths continue unchecked." Source: <http://www.news.com.au/lifestyle/real-life/rebekah-king-who-was-beaten-and-sexually-abused-while-in-care-vows-to-change-foster-care-system/story-fnq2o7dd-1227422346290#>

Denver man sentenced for trying to hire inmate to kill abuse victim Scot Copher sentenced to 32 years to life in prison By Anthony Cotton The Denver Post Posted: 06/29/2015 04:08:15 PM MDT Add a Comment Updated: 06/30/2015 12:08:02 AM MDT A Denver man was sentenced Monday to 32 years to life in prison after soliciting a fellow inmate to kill a child he had sexually abused. According to the 18th Judicial District Attorney's Office, Scot Alan Copher, 53, provided the other inmate with a physical description of the child, a map to where the child lived, a detailed description of how the child should be killed, and how the inmate could make it look like an accidental drug overdose. Five counts of sexual abuse were filed against Copher in January 2014 after an Englewood Police Department investigation found that he repeatedly sexually assaulted the child while he was in elementary school in the early 2000s. The abuse lasted approximately three years. Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_28402651/denver-man-sentenced-trying-hire-inmate-kill-abuse

LAUSD misspent money on special education that was meant for foster care, English learners, lawsuit alleges By Thomas Himes, Los Angeles Daily News Posted: 07/01/15, 11:39 AM PDT | Updated: 3 days ago 0 Comments A lawsuit filed by civil rights groups claims the Los Angeles Unified School District violated state law when it spent hundreds of millions of dollars on special education students. The state funding was supposed to help students living in poverty or foster care or those struggling to learn the English language, according to the lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union, Public Advocates and the law firm Covington and Burlington LLP. A non-profit group, Community Coalition of South Los Angeles and an LAUSD parent, Reyna Frias, were claimants in the civil action that alleges $400 million last school year and next is misspent on special education. "LAUSD is breaking its promise to provide my children and millions of other students in the future with the services they need and the law says they should receive," said Frias, whose children are among those meant to be helped by the new state funding plan, called Local Control Funding Formula, or LCFF. LAUSD General Counsel Dave Holmquist denied the allegations. The district's spending, he said, follows state law. District officials have been working with the civil rights groups in hopes of avoiding a lawsuit, Holmquist said. "We're disappointed they chose to file a lawsuit," Holmquist said. A recent report from the University of California, Berkeley, and United Way of Greater Los Angeles criticized the district for its spending on special education, while leaving few dollars dedicated to students for whom the increased state funding was meant to help. Last month, this news organization reported that with nearly 14 percent of all students in special education, LAUSD officials had identified more pupils with learning disabilities than the statewide average and the other four largest school districts in the state. According to the lawsuit, LAUSD was already obligated to fund special education programs when the state allocated additional funding to help students who are low-income, in foster care or English learners. "If every district uses its new LCFF funds to pay for things it's already legally required to do like LAUSD, the promise of California's new funding law will evaporate overnight," said John Affeldt, managing attorney with Public Advocates. "LCFF requires that LAUSD use these hundreds of millions of dollars to deliver new and better services to targeted students." Source: <http://www.dailybreeze.com/general-news/20150701/lausd-misspent-money-on-special-education-that-was-meant-for-foster-care-english-learners-lawsuit-alleges>

Juvenile detention mentor had sexual relationship with teen, police say Print [Font \[+\]](#) [\[-\]](#) 1 Comment » By Pat Reavy, Deseret News Follow @DNewsCrimeTeam Published: Thursday, July 2 2015 12:05 p.m. MDT Updated: Thursday, July 2 2015 3:43 p.m. M Sat Jul 04 16:50:34 2015 Police are investigating an alleged sexual relationship between a 15-year-old girl and a woman who was assigned to mentor her in the Salt Lake Valley Detention Center. Shutterstock.com Enlarge photo» Sat Jul 04 16:56:26 2015 WEST VALLEY CITY — Police are investigating an alleged sexual relationship between a 15-year-old girl and a woman who was assigned to mentor her in the Salt Lake Valley Detention Center. As of Thursday, the 22-year-old woman had not been arrested or charged. In May, police started an investigation involving a 15-year-old girl who had been placed in the 3rd District Juvenile Court's Village Project. The project is a mentor program that uses community volunteers who are willing to work with troubled youths, according to the Utah State Courts website. Mentors and youth offenders are matched up based on common interests and location. The teen was assigned a mentor employed by Salt Lake Valley Detention, according to a search warrant affidavit. Investigators say the two developed a relationship. "During this time Salt Lake Valley Detention Center had documented concerns of an inappropriate relationship between (the adult mentor) and (the teen), which came from a third party. Salt Lake Valley Detention ended the relationship and advised (the mentor) not to continue communication," the affidavit states. Yet after the teen was released from the detention center in January, the same woman was again assigned as the girl's mentor by the Village Project, according to the warrant. A third party later discovered nude pictures of the mentor and the teenager on the teen's cellphone, the affidavit states. The girl's stepfather was notified of the photos and called police. He later discovered two of his stepdaughter's journals and turned them over to detectives. Investigators wrote that the journals described "grooming behaviors" by the woman and that the teenager "continues to write passages about their sexual activity together." During an interview in June, the woman admitted to sexual activity, the exchange of nude photos and knowing the girl was 15, according to the affidavit. West Valley police this week confirmed they are investigating the case, but declined comment, saying it has been turned over to the Salt Lake County District Attorney's Office for possible charges. Utah state court administrators issued a brief statement Thursday saying the mentor has been suspended from the program pending the outcome of the investigation. According to the state court website, mentors for the Village Project are volunteers who are at least 21 years old and "must be willing to attend an initial interview and pass a criminal record check." Email: preavy@deseretnews.com, Twitter: DNewsCrimeTeam Source: <http://www.deseretnews.com/article/865631837/Juvenile-detention-mentor-had-sexual-relationship-with-teen-police-say.html?pg=all>

An atrocious use of body checks by Department of Human Services By The Denver Post Editorial Board Posted: 07/01/2015 05:00:00 PM MDT 3 Comments Colorado Department of Human Services executive director Reggie Bicha. (Denver Post file) There is no question the Colorado Department of Human Services made a deplorable decision to conduct body checks on residents of state-run group homes without their guardians' permission. A state health department report released last week said the the body checks, which occurred in March, violated the "privacy, dignity and respect" of the clients. Indeed, the report notes, the body inspections resulted in residents being "confused and "scared," with some "distracted to the point it negatively affected their behavior." Human Services Director Reggie Bicha admits it was a bad call and regrets the decision. The incident is being seized by some legislators and critics of the department to again question the quality of DHS leadership. That's their prerogative, but it seems to overlook the larger story here. The body checks were authorized in the first place because of suspicions that state-run group homes were a terrible mess — and it turns out they were. In November, nonverbal residents in a Pueblo home were found with threatening words scratched into their backs and stomachs. The incident wasn't reported by staff. In February, two residents — one of whom needed intense supervision — stole a staff vehicle and left the facility. Further investigation found staff had covered up abuse and a staffer had reportedly threatened to kill a resident. After gathering the facts, Human Services took swift action — putting 14 group home staffers on leave and coordinating with law enforcement. And last month, the Pueblo Sheriff's Office asked the district attorney to file charges in six cases. Advertisement The director of the group homes has retired. Even the bungled body checks resulted in 10 new cases of neglect and improper care. In its response to the health department's findings, Human Services originally argued that informed consent does not require guardian approval for investigations into abuse or neglect. But Bicha told The Denver Post this week that the issues around consent need "further understanding and clarity." He will put together a group of stakeholders "to look into this issue of consent and provide us with recommendations." He also acknowledged once again that not involving guardians before the March body checks was a bad mistake — even if done with the goal of finding wrongdoing. It's a mistake that must never be repeated. To send a letter to the editor about this article, submit online or check out our guidelines for how to submit by e-mail or mail. Source: http://www.denverpost.com/editorials/ci_28416681/an-atrocious-use-body-checks-by-department-human

Death at Van Vleck under investigation Jackson Hole News & Guide So far no leads indicate a crime was committed in incident at group home for kids and teens. Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Wednesday, July 1, 2015 4:30 am Death at Van Vleck under investigation By Emma Breyse Jackson Hole News&Guide | 0 comments Police are investigating the death of a student at Van Vleck House this week. Teton Youth and Family Services, which runs the facility, confirmed the death Friday. The student, whose identity, age and gender were withheld by authorities, was found unresponsive just after 10 p.m. Thursday, according to Teton Youth and Family Services and call logs from Teton County Dispatch. Staff members discovered the student and began resuscitation efforts, which all of the organization's staff members are trained to perform. The student could not be revived. The Jackson Police Department is investigating the matter to determine whether a crime was committed, Lt. Cole Nethercott said. "At this point there are no leads that suggest that is the case," Nethercott said Monday. Teton Youth and Family Services spokeswoman Sarah Cavallaro issued a statement on her organization's behalf, confirming the death and giving scant detail due to the age of the student. "This is a terrible tragedy," Cavallaro said. "We've been meeting with the student's mother, and we've let her know that we share her grief, and we're doing whatever we can to support her and other family members." Cavallaro also said her organization is assisting the police "in any way possible." "Members of the TYFS staff and community grief counselors [are] working with other residents of the group home to help them deal with the tragedy," Cavallaro said. Police also declined to give details of the death or the student due to the age of the deceased and the ongoing nature of the investigation. They referred all questions to Teton County Coroner Brent Blue. A call to Blue on Tuesday went unanswered. Van Vleck House, one of three programs that Teton Youth and Family operates, serves students between the ages of 10 and 18. The goal is provide a temporary living arrangement and a "safe and structured environment" for children in those age groups facing struggles at home. Residents are usually placed at the group home via a court order in juvenile court, according to the Van Vleck House's website. Students considered for admission are able to attend public school, and do not exhibit severe risk factors, including a recent history of violent episodes, active suicidal tendencies or severe medical or psychiatric conditions that are not stabilized, the website says. Contact Emma Breyse at 732-7066 or courts@jhnewsandguide.com. Source: http://www.jhnewsandguide.com/news/cops_courts/death-at-van-veleck-under-investigation/article_67831770-631c-56a2-ab00-f40bb1b6c3dc.html

Longtime foster parent arrested for sexual assault Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size 1 Previous Next Stephen Darrell Taylor Posted: Thursday, July 2, 2015 8:38 am Longtime foster parent arrested for sexual assault SBSD HighlandNews.net | 0 comments Stephen Darrell Taylor, 68, of Yucaipa and his wife served as a foster family for the Arrowhead Foster Family Agency, Inc. between the years of 2002 and 2008. During that time, Stephen Taylor allegedly sexually abused two of the female foster children placed in his care. Taylor allegedly sexually abused the children for several years. The victims ranged in age from five to eleven and were eventually adopted by the Taylors. The family resided in three different homes during that time frame on Crestline Road, Mile High Road, and Fir Lane in the Crestline community. The sexual abuse continued until the children were removed by the San Bernardino County Children and Family Services in 2008 due to allegations of physical abuse. The sexual abuse was reported to the Twin Peaks Sheriff Station and turned over to the Crimes Against Children Detail because it involved a certified foster family. Detectives from the Crimes Against Children Detail assumed the investigation and determined approximately 27 foster children were placed with the Taylor family from 2002 to 2008. The Taylor family lost their status as a certified foster family after allegations of physical abuse to the children. On July 1, 2015, Stephen Taylor was arrested by detectives on an arrest warrant for: Oral Copulation, Sexual Intercourse with Force, Aggravated Sexual Assault of a Child, and Continual Sexual Assault of a Child. Taylor was booked at the West Valley Detention Center on July 1, 2015, at 4:31 p.m., where he was being held in lieu of $500,000 bail. Detectives are releasing his booking photograph due to concerns Taylor possibly abused other children who were in his care during that time. Anyone with information pertaining to this investigation is urged to contact Detective Jason Frey or Sergeant Dana Foster at (909) 387-3615. Callers wishing to remain anonymous are urged to call the We-tip Hotline at 1-800-78-CRIME (27463) or you may leave information on the We-Tip Hotline at www.wetip.com. Source: http://www.highlandnews.net/news/crime_and_fire/article_6294d588-20d0-11e5-a9ba-a3e7ffbe4fc4.html

Police: Springfield teacher sexually abused child in her foster care Trevor J. Mitchell, Springfield News-Leader 6:57 p.m. CDT July 2, 2015 Jessica Jones (Photo: Greene County Sheriff's Office) 1033 CONNECT 7 TWEETLINKEDIN 15 COMMENTEMAILMORE Police say a teacher at a Springfield elementary school repeatedly sexually abused a juvenile who had been in her foster care since 2013. Jessica A. Jones, 32, is currently employed as an art teacher at Watkins Elementary School in Springfield and also taught at Springfield Option Site, a school on Great Circle's campus (formerly Boys and Girls Town). Jones was charged June 27 with statutory sodomy and endangering the welfare of a child. According to court documents, the victim originally met Jones when she was a student of hers, although it is not specified at which school this occurred. The victim later requested to be placed into the foster care of Jones, who completed the necessary steps to become a foster parent for the victim, court documents say. The victim moved into Jones' home in May 2013. Another child was later taken into Jones' home as well. Police say the disclosure of an inappropriate relationship between Jones and the victim was first made in 2014. The victim was the subject of a forensic child interview at the Child Advocacy Center on July 1, 2014, but did not disclose any information regarding a relationship. However, during a July 10, 2014 interview, the second child under Jones' care told interviewers that Jones and the victim slept in the same bed together and had visited an adult entertainment store to purchase pornography. The second child also told interviewers she had located pictures on a phone of Jones and the victim kissing. The phone of the victim was collected by a detective investigating the case on Aug. 1, 2014, but the investigation was suspended based on "conflicting information," according to court documents. Police later obtained a warrant on June 10, 2015, to review the materials from the seized cellphone and said there were pictures of Jones and the victim kissing, which corroborated the victim's interview. On May 26, 2015, a new police report was made by a Children's Division investigator after the victim disclosed she was involved in a sexual relationship with Jones, documents say. Those documents also say: ■In a June 9, 2015 interview, the victim told interviewers that Jones had sexually abused her since she was 14. She also said she had lied in the last interview because she liked living with Jones and "felt she had nowhere else to go, so she did not want Jessica to get in trouble." ■The victim told interviewers that after the previous year's report, Jones had started acting "more like a parent," but had tried to continue the relationship. However, the victim said she began to spend more time with friends, and this upset Jones. ■The victim said she believed she was taken to the behavioral unit of a local hospital based on lies Jones told — specifically that she was aggressive and suicidal. ■The victim said the first incident of sexual abuse occurred in July 2013, after she and Jones had been drinking together. Jones performed oral sex on the victim, and the next morning Jones asked her if they were "together." ■The victim said the two had performed oral sex on each other "so many times she could not remember." She said the last time was in May 2015. ■The victim said Jones had told her that if someone found out what happened between them, "I'd probably go to prison because of statutory rape." ■The victim also said she smoked marijuana with Jones and in one instance was given $80 by Jones to purchase marijuana. Jones' bond was set at $25,000, which was posted on June 30. At an arraignment Thursday morning, a preliminary hearing was set for 10:30 a.m. on July 30. Teresa Bledsoe, public information officer with Springfield Public Schools, said the district is aware of the charges and had no other comment. She also said that as it is summer, Jones is not currently in contact with children. Jones' attorney, Roger Jones, declined to comment. Source: <http://www.news-leader.com/story/news/crime/2015/07/02/police-springfield-teacher-sexually-abused-child-foster-care/29648567/>

Sexually trafficked girl recounts litany of horrors under DCF's watch Judge Maria Sampedro-Iglesia assured a foster child who was sexually trafficked she would be sensitive to the girl's wishes. | Peter Andrew Bosch Miami Herald Staff By Carol Marbin Miller cmarbin@MiamiHerald.com LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story Neglect and abandonment landed the girl in foster care. But it's what happened next, she said, that nearly destroyed her. In a hushed courtroom in Miami's gleaming new downtown Children's Courthouse, a teenage foster child inventoried the traumas she had endured at the hands of those who were assigned to protect her: She had been starved and beaten, molested and forced to fight during her two years in foster homes and group care. As a runaway, she was trafficked into prostitution. And, just as her life appeared to be mending, the girl was raped by a driver in whose care she was entrusted by a privately run child welfare group, records say. Earlier this week, Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Maria Sampedro-Iglesia allowed the girl to read a long letter in court, detailing her many grievances against the state. The Department of Children & Families "has messed me up mentally and emotionally. I know I can never get my childhood back," the girl said in court, reading from the letter she had written to Sampedro-Iglesia, who is overseeing her case. "But I refuse to let my past take my future." The girl arrived in court Monday afternoon dressed in a crisp patterned dress, clutching a teddy bear. She hugged Sampedro-Iglesia, calling the judge "the only one working for the state who has ever looked into my care, and who has ever tried to fix the errors others have made." She then told the judge she wanted to fire her court-appointed lawyer, and chided the state for failing her still. The teen, who is not being identified by the Herald to protect her privacy, came into state care in the winter of 2013. Records say her parents abandoned her, which left mental and emotional scars. In her remarks to the court on Monday, the girl did not talk in detail about what sent her to foster care. "By the age of 14, I had already been through the worst," she said, adding: "so I thought." As to what followed, the girl had plenty to say. "Since my involvement in DCF, I have always been a throwaway case, and I knew it. I personally didn't think I'd even make it." In one foster home, the girl said, parents "starved us, and turned off the electricity for punishment at night. No air, no light. We couldn't open windows or doors; they were locked." "So, that's usually how fights started." In another group home, the caregivers themselves "instigated" fights among the children. "It's literally a war over who's gonna make it out alive or not." So the girl ran. As a runaway, she told the judge, the girl sold and abused drugs. She called her caseworker to report she'd been "trafficked" into prostitution — "having guns pointed to my head and having to put guns to [other] people's heads." A DCF spokeswoman said on Friday that the agency was investigating both the teen's accusation that she was raped in May, as well as other allegations of mistreatment while in state care. "The horrors described by this young girl are absolutely intolerable," said Michelle Glady, a spokeswoman for DCF, which contracts with a private foster care agency in Miami, called Our Kids, to oversee child welfare in Miami-Dade and Monroe counties. Our Kids, in turn, subcontracts with another agency, the Family Resource Center, in whose care the teenager had been placed. "DCF opened an investigation immediately following the allegations of sexual abuse by an employee of Family Resource Center of Miami. All additional allegations of abuse or neglect will be investigated. DCF is reviewing her case history and will work with Our Kids ... on providing her the care she needs to support her recovery." A spokeswoman for Our Kids said the agency "is working diligently with all parties to carefully address the matters raised in court on Monday. In doing so, Our Kids wants to ensure the child receives the best available care and services, while also making sure the child is, and feels, safe in her surroundings. The safety and well-being of every child in our care is the only acceptable outcome for us — as is the case here." Sampedro-Iglesia scheduled Monday's hearing after child welfare administrators reported in May that the girl had been raped by a 25-year-old "transporter" hired by the Family Resource Center to drive her from West Palm Beach to the Keys. The judge was outraged: "The Court finds that the actions of the agency are not only negligent, but border on reckless," she wrote in a tartly worded order. The transporter, who recently moved here from New York and had been hired by FRC three days before he was assigned to drive the teen, quit days later. He now is under investigation by the Monroe County Sheriff's Office and the FBI. The girl told authorities that he stopped at a Walmart during the eight-hour odyssey to buy Smirnoff Ice, a citrus-flavored malt drink, and then began to kiss her. Records obtained by the Miami Herald show he had been recommended for the job by a relative of his who then worked for the foster care agency, and the relative's spouse. Both references appear to have been written by the same person. The driver has not been charged with any offense. Tensions between the teen and DCF persisted throughout Monday's hearing. The girl told Sampedro-Iglesia she was willing to see a female psychologist to address mental health issues, but was opposed to speaking with a male therapist. Her current caregiver said she had found a counselor the girl liked. DCF, however, was reluctant to retain the therapist, because the state's insurance carrier couldn't pay her. And the teen began to weep when DCF's lawyer suggested she might have to move from her current home because it wasn't appropriately licensed. "I'm not moving," the girl shot back. "You try to move me and I'm running." The girl's current caregiver urged the state to let her remain where she is finally happy. "She is a victim here," the caregiver said. "If everyone can just remember she's a victim. She feels stable now, and we ask everyone to remember that." Sampedro-Iglesia reassured the girl: "I think I've proven to you," she said, "that I've kept what you want in mind. They are not going to move you without court approval." What's left, the girl said, is to somehow craft a happy ending. She likes where she is living. She is making plans to go to college, and maybe law school, with scholarship money the state will give her. "I am a reborn [person]," she said, "and I have rewritten my story. I gave my life to the Lord and I have goals and dreams to accomplish." "I don't look for sympathy. Nor do I want a pity party," the girl said. "Actually, all I'm worried about is the other children's safety who have been labeled 'a lost case.'" Read more here: <http://www.miamiherald.com/news/local/community/miami-dade/article26423824.html#storylink=cpy>

Survey Results Prompt Public Advocate To Call For Reform Of NYC Foster Care System July 6, 2015 1:18 PM Share on email 9 View Comments Letitia James (credit: Getty Images) Related Tags: Administration for Children's Services, foster care, Letitia James, NYC Foster Care Hotline, Rich Lamb NEW YORK (CBSNewYork/AP) — New York City's public advocate says children are spending too much time in the city's foster care system and between multiple homes. Letitia James conducted a survey by setting up a hotline for foster parents, birth parents and children, WCBS 880's Rich Lamb reported. She called the findings "disturbing." Fifty-seven percent of respondents said a child had been placed in more than one foster home, James said. Of those children, more than a quarter spent time in five or more placements, according to the survey. Public Advocate Calls For Reform Of NYC Foster Care System Rich Lamb reports playpause The public advocate said 71 percent of those surveyed said children spent more than two years in the system. James' survey also found a significant number of reports of physical, emotional and psychological abuse. "Thousands of children in our foster care system have been allowed to languish for years on end in abusive, unhealthy situations," James said. She said it's clear the Administration for Children's Services needs to be significantly reformed. An ACS spokesman said the city has reduced the number of children in foster care from 45,000 in the 1990s to 11,000 today. He said the drop was largely due to the agency working to keep families together. Source: <http://newyork.cbslocal.com/2015/07/06/public-advocate-foster-care-survey/>

Former foster dad pleads guilty to sex charges | The Columbus Dispatch Former foster dad pleads guilty to sex charges C More Articles By John Futtty The Columbus Dispatch • Monday July 6, 2015 3:54 PM A South Side man who had been considered "an exemplary foster parent" was sentenced today to two years in prison for having sexual relations with a 17-year-old boy in his care. Herbert C. King Jr., 42, of Barkwillow Lane pleaded guilty to four counts of sexual battery. Franklin County Common Pleas Judge David E. Cain imposed the prison sentence on two counts and put King on probation for five years on the other counts, which will begin when King is released from prison. If King violates the terms of probation, he will go back to prison for another five years, the judge said. He also must register as a sex offender every 90 days for the rest of his life. King did not speak during the hearing, which the boy did not attend. Assistant Prosecutor Jennifer Hunt said the boy was placed in King's home in April 2014. In mid February, King solicited sex from the boy, she said. From then until March 7, they engaged in oral and anal sex six or seven times. The boy told his grandmother about the relationship, and both contacted Columbus police on March 8. A hospital examination of the boy on March 9 recovered semen containing King's DNA, Hunt said. There was no evidence that King instigated any of the conduct through force, she said. Although the age of consent in Ohio is 16, state law prohibits anyone who is acting as a guardian or in place of a parent from engaging in sexual conduct with a person in their care. Hunt didn't ask for a specific sentence but recommended that the judge impose "substantial prison time." Defense attorney Sam Shamansky said the two-year sentence followed by probation "was appropriate given that my client had no record and the alleged conduct was consensual." He said King disputes the facts "but didn't want to go to trial or put the young man through a trial." The boy was placed by Franklin County Children Services with King, who had been certified through Buckeye Ranch, a foster-care provider. At the time of King's indictment in April, Nick Rees, the president and CEO of the Buckeye Ranch, said King had been licensed since 2010 and often handled the type of youths whom agencies struggle to place. King's clean criminal-background check and dedication, Rees said, made him seem "an exemplary foster parent." He had been caring for four teenage boys at the time the investigation was launched. All were removed from his home on March 9. Buckeye Ranch asked for his license to be revoked by the state when he was indicted. @johnfuttly Source: <http://www.dispatch.com/content/stories/local/2015/07/06/former-foster-dad-pleads-guilty.html>

Boy says foster carer dictated 'angry' letter to mother Boys made allegations of sexual abuse against relative after being taken into care As part of a review of the case, Judge Brendan Toale was told that the boy said he refused to see his parents for a year because his former foster mother told him he would have a better life with her. Photograph: Michaela Rehle/Reuters Fiona Gartland Topics: News Crime & Law District Court Dublin District Family Court Brendan Toale More Topics Director of Public Prosecutions Child and Family Agency Mon, Jul 6, 2015, 01:00 First published: Mon, Jul 6, 2015, 01:00 More Sharing Services A boy in care who wrote his mother a "why I'm angry" letter has now said his former foster carer told him what to write, the Dublin District Family Court has heard. As part of a review of the case on Friday, Judge Brendan Toale was also told that the boy said he refused to see his parents for a year because his former foster mother told him he would have a better life with her. The boy and his brother, taken into care due to neglect, have since moved placement to a rural foster family. Allegations After they were taken into care, the boys, both at primary school, made allegations of sexual abuse against a relative. The Child and Family Agency social worker said she understood a file was due to go to the DPP on those allegations. She also said recently that one of the boys had made allegations against his birth parents. At a meeting with gardai, officers said they would not be questioning the boy about the allegations at present. The social worker also said that at a recent child in care review – a meeting between social workers, the children, a court-appointed guardian and parents – the older boy was very upset and said he didn't go on access visits with his parents because his previous foster parents discouraged it. His younger brother had separately complained that he had been punched by this foster carer, who was appointed through a private fostering organisation. The organisation had brought the concerns to the agency's attention. Concerns Asked whether the complaints about the children's previous foster carers had been referred to gardai, the social worker – appointed after the boys had moved to their current placement – said no. They were dealt with under the "serious concerns policy" and she had investigated them. She said the younger boy said his brother was present when he was punched, but the older boy said he never saw it, she said. The social worker believed the complaints did not warrant Garda notification. She said the boys were now settled in their rural placement, though they consistently said they wanted to go home. Giving evidence, the boys' mother said that at the care review her elder son said "I missed a year of my ma's life because I was told not to go to access because I'd have a better life with her [the foster mother]". He told her he wrote the "why I'm angry" letter because "she put things into my head and told me what to say and told me what to write". The solicitor for the agency said the social worker denied this was said at the meeting. The case was adjourned to a date this week. Source: <http://www.irishtimes.com/news/crime-and-law/courts/district-court/boy-says-foster-carer-dictated-angry-letter-to-mother-1.2274508>

No water, no heat, walls coated in feces: A tragic death at a Hamilton group home INQUEST File photo A coroner's inquest is looking into the circumstances surrounding the April 29, 2012 death of Guy Thomas Mitchell, who fell into a cistern at an Ancaster assisted living home. JERSEYVILLE ROAD Cathie Coward, The Hamilton Spectator A barn at a group home property at 2226 Jerseyville Rd., where Guy Mitchell died in 2012. The house is at the end of a long treed lane. FRIDGE Evidence photo Photos from the Ancaster home where Guy Mitchell died in 2012 after falling into a cistern. These were presented as evidence in the coronor's inquest into his death. ROOM Evidence photo Photos from inside the home where Guy Mitchell died in were presented as evidence on Monday. next play/pause pre 3/4 Hamilton Spectator By Susan Clairmont SEE MORE articles from this author Perhaps the mother of Guy Mitchell can find some comfort knowing that when her childlike son was found dead at the bottom of a well, he inadvertently rescued two other vulnerable souls from the hell they lived in. Related Stories CLAIRMONT: Caregiver disappears... Agencies were told about group home... Police officers who responded to the well call in Ancaster stumbled upon a group home so squalid that two veteran police told a courtroom it was the worst house they had ever seen. There was no heat or running water. Toilets and bathtubs were full of human waste. Feces was smeared on walls, floors and furniture. The fridge was a filthy mess containing nothing more than old condiments. Beds were stripped bare and smeared with vomit. The smell was horrendous. Yet this is where Guy Mitchell, 38, lived. With him, in that house, was another man with profound special needs, David, and an 11-year-old girl with autism, Jennifer. It is believed Guy — who had difficulty seeing and hearing and was "clumsy" — was fetching water from a deep cistern when he fell in and drowned. On Monday, a coroner's inquest began searching for answers to basic questions about Guy's death on April 29, 2012. The jury of two women and three men will spend two weeks determining where, when, how and by what means Guy died, at the end of which they may make recommendations in the hopes of preventing another similar death. Guy was three when his mother, Diane Paton, took him to doctors. Though a specific diagnosis has never been arrived at, he was determined to have a "developmental delay." All his life, he couldn't read or write or dress himself. He could not cross a road and was "clumsy," says Paton, tripping over things regularly. He didn't speak much and could be a handful. "He had outbursts and wouldn't want to do what he needed to do," Paton explained during her sometimes tearful testimony. "He just became kind of hard to handle at times." Paton was raising Guy on her own and when he turned 12, the Children's Aid Society introduced her to Karen and Bill Santor. They took Guy into their Jerseyville Road West home in Ancaster. That was 26 years ago. Oversight of Guy's care transferred to an agency called Choices, which operates with funding from the Ministry of Community and Social Services (MCSS). The Santors moved in 2000 from a small house on their property to a larger one they built farther back from the road. For many years Paton — who remained very involved with her son — was pleased with the care Guy received from the Santors, she told the inquest. "Guy was a very happy person. Always wanted to talk to people." The Spectator has previously reported that Guy was a Special Olympian, earning medals for snowshoeing. He was also a championship bowler. Bill died in 1999, Karen died suddenly in August 2011. The Santors' daughter, Keri Santor was 26 when her mother passed. She vowed to continue her mother's work and care for Guy as well as David and Jennifer. Under Keri's watch, the house became unfit for living. And Guy died. But Keri will not be testifying at the inquest. Coroner's counsel Karen Shea told the jury police have no idea where Keri is. Parties with standing at the inquest are Diane Paton, Choices and MCSS. Weeks before Guy's death, Paton had dinner at the Jerseyville Road home. She described the house as "cluttered" but said the first floor — the only floor she saw of the three storey home — gave her no great concern. However, she also testified she once heard Keri shouting at her son, and that made her worry. Just after 7 p.m. on a Sunday night three years ago, Const. Adam Brown answered a 911 call. He pulled Guy from the open cistern. He had no vital signs. Meanwhile, Acting Sgt. Doug Hall arrived at the scene and went into the house. "It stunk ... It was absolutely disgusting," he testified. "It's probably one of the worst homes I've ever been in in 32-plus years of policing." "It was very dirty ... There was vomit. The bathtub was full of feces. It was terrible." Forensic officer Det. Const. Doug Moon took photos and measurements. "As soon as I walked in the home itself ... there was a very foul odour of feces and urine," he told the jury. "It was the worst I have seen." "Deplorable." Susan Clairmont's commentary appears regularly in The Spectator. sclairmont@thespec.com 905-526-3539 | @susanclairmont Source: <http://www.thespec.com/news-story/5710565-no-water-no-heat-walls-coated-in-feces-a-tragic-death-at-a-hamilton-group-home/>

Auditor Blasts California Foster Care Agency By NICK CAHILL ShareThis SACRAMENTO (CN) - Thousands of foster children may have been exposed to sex offenders due to California's failure to verify addresses of registered sex offenders, the state auditor says. A blistering audit, released July 2, revealed breakdowns in the state's Social Services Department, which may have allowed as many as 8,600 foster children to be placed near the workplace or home of a registered sex offender, due to a faulty method of cross-checking addresses. The 31-page report also found that the state could save more than $100 million by paying private foster agencies the same rate as county agencies. The audit found that for 21 months Social Services did address-comparisons on sex offenders who were recently registered or active and "incorrectly excluded" addresses from previous months. Social Services failed to use the entire sex offender registry and may have unintentionally placed foster children in the same facility as sex offenders. "This error could have prevented Social Services from promptly identifying registered sex offenders who may have been living or working in licensed facilities or foster homes during the 21 months in which it used this flawed methodology," said State Auditor Elaine Howle. Howle's report was a follow-up to a 2011 audit in which she criticized Social Services for not using the sex offender registry. The follow-up report uncovered 216 cases of foster children coming into contact with sex offenders who lived, worked or were associated with foster care facilities between 2011 and 2014. In one instance, a foster home caregiver knowingly allowed a registered sex offender to live in the facility while he was on parole. Investigation found that both the caregiver and the sex offender struck and abused one of the foster children. The sex offender's parole officer let him stay at the facility because she thought the foster children were actually his. Three foster children were removed from the facility after investigation. In a response letter to Howle, Social Services Director Will Lightbourne said his agency has improved its safeguards to protect children. "The department developed comprehensive processes to ensure a consistent and thorough approach to evaluate and investigate addresses of RSOs [registered sex offenders] as matched against all state and county licensed facilities," Lightbourne wrote. The audit credits Social Services with improving its address checking process, but says it failed to implement cost-saving recommendations from the 2011 audit, involving reimbursement rates for private caregivers. The audit reiterated that private foster agencies receive considerably higher compensation rates than county foster homes and that the department could save $116 million over the next five years if it adjusts the pay structure. Howle blasts the department for its decision to wait until 2017 to revise its rate structure. "Social Services is causing counties to continue to pay rates that do not have adequate justification," the audit states. Howle recommends that the state improve its mechanism to track and monitor addresses of registered sex offenders and require counties to give licensed foster homes higher priority over family-run foster homes. Source: <http://www.courthousenews.com/2015/07/07/auditor-blasts-california-foster-care-agency.htm>

Foster mom warned to keep closer watch on missing autistic boy, 9, says caseworker 1 / 49 Police search for missing 9-year-old boy in Davison Township Davison Township Police Chief Rick Freeman briefs the media during a press conference concerning the search for 9-year-old Omarion "Mars" Humphrey Thursday, July 9, 2015, at the Davison Township Office. During the press conference, Freeman encouraged tips and information to be directly reported to investigators and not through social media. Danny Miller | MLive.com Danny Miller | dmille17@mlive.com Print Email By Ron Fonger | rfonger1@mlive.com The Flint Journal on July 07, 2015 at 4:00 PM, updated July 08, 2015 at 1:02 PM Reddit Email Missing 9-year-old boy No foul play in death of missing boy found in lake, police say Prayer vigil for Omarion Humphrey draws hundreds to Davison park Parents of missing 9-year-old believe foul play responsible for son's death Facebook post by Genesee County Sheriff confirms identity of body found in Lake Callis Police working to confirm body in lake is missing boy Omarion Humphrey All Stories | PONTIAC, MI -- The foster mother of a missing 9-year-old boy with autism who vanished from a Davison Township park Saturday, July 4, was warned that same day to keep a closer eye on him, a caseworker testified in Oakland County Probate Court today, July 7. Geneva Harvey, a representative of Alternatives for Children and Families, which placed Omarion "Mars" Humphrey, a severely autistic boy who doesn't speak, in the foster home, said she learned of the warning after talking to police after the boy's disappearance. Mother of missing boy believes someone has taken her son Khisha Humphrey says she believes her son was taken from the Davison Township area after he was reported missing by his foster family at Lake Callis Recreation Complex. Harvey testified at an emergency probate hearing today, and an attorney for Humphrey's father questioned her about the boy's disappearance, asking if the foster mother had been warned by park workers to keep a closer watch on him. The foster mother was not named in testimony at the hearing. "Yes," said Harvey, who also said there had been another, unrelated complaint about the same foster home that was lodged with the agency because of another accusation of improper supervision of another child in the past. "He should have been watched ... every second of the day," said H. Elliot Parnes, an attorney for Humphrey's father said. "I'm troubled by many of the answers we received today." Davison Township police and hundreds of volunteers have been looking for Omarion Humphrey since his disappearance. Khisha Humphrey, the biological mother of the missing boy, said 11 of her children were placed with relatives and in foster care in February because she had inadequate housing for them. I'm troubled by many of the answers we received today. Khisha Humphrey said she was shocked by what she heard in court today and believes more accountability is needed in the foster system. "If I would have did that, I would be in jail," she said of the situation in which her son disappeared. Probate Judge Lisa Langton ordered today that Omarion Humphrey be placed on the state's missing and AWOL docket, and ordered Alternatives of Children and Families to submit a report on its investigation of the incident, including whether the foster home had any training in dealing with autistic children. Khisha Humphrey said she was surprised to discover today that the foster home where her missing son was placed had been the subject of another complaint regarding supervision of another child in their care. "That was a shock to me ... I was just like, 'What?'" she said. Khisha Humphrey, who is fighting to regain her children, said she believes her son was taken from the park. "I think he's been taken ... I want my son back," she said. Source: http://www.mlive.com/news/flint/index.ssf/2015/07/caseworker_says_foster_mom_was.html

Study Shows '80s Metalheads, Groupies Are Well Adjusted Three Decades Later July 7, 2015 61 Comments Share25K Tweet261 Share27 Reddit2 Share25.8K image: http://assets.blabbermouth.net/media/80smetalfans_638.jpg According to Pacific Standard, a newly published study has found that 1980s heavy metal fans "were significantly happier in their youth, and better adjusted currently" compared to their peers who preferred other musical genres, and to a parallel group of current college students. Research in the 1980s suggested that young "metalheads" were at risk for poor developmental outcomes. No other study has assessed this group as adults; thus, a research team led by Humboldt State University psychologist Tasha Howe examined 1980s heavy metal groupies, musicians, and fans at middle age, using snowball sampling from Facebook. Online surveys assessed adverse childhood experiences, personality, adult attachment, and past and current functioning in 377 participants: 154 who were heavy metal fans growing up in the 1980s (including musicians and "groupies"); 80 who typically listened to other types of music during their teen years; and 153 current students at a California university. Results revealed that metal enthusiasts did often experience traumatic and risky "sex, drugs, and rock-and-roll" lives. However, the "metalhead" identity also served as a protective factor against negative outcomes. They were significantly happier in their youth and better adjusted currently than either middle-aged or current college-age youth comparison groups. "Despite the challenges of adverse childhood events, and other stressful and risky events in their youth," the researchers wrote, former metal fans "reported higher levels of youthful happiness" than peers with other musical tastes as well as today's college students. "They were also less likely to have any regrets about things they had done in their youth." In fact, non-metal fans "sought psychological counseling for emotional problems more than any other group, indicating a less happy and fulfilling perspective on their 1980s adolescence." The study, published in the journal Self And Identity, added that participation in fringe style cultures may enhance identity development in troubled youth. "Social support is a crucial protective factor for troubled youth," researchers wrote. "Fans and musicians alike felt a kinship in the metal community, and a way to experience heightened emotions with like-minded people." The full text of the article, titled "Three Decades Later: The Life Experiences and Mid-Life Functioning of 1980s Heavy Metal Groupies, Musicians, and Fans," can be downloaded for $40 at this location. Read more at <http://www.blabbermouth.net/news/study-shows-80s-metalheads-groupies-are-well-adjusted-three-decades-later/#k1PyJ6lRclCoTGYm.99>

Lawsuit says NYC has one of the worst foster care systems in US By Bruce Golding View author archive Get author RSS feed Name(required) Email (required) Comment(required) July 8, 2015 | 2:12pm Modal Trigger Public Advocate Letitia James is one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. Photo: Helayne Seidman Social service officials are turning a blind eye to the horrific physical and mental abuse of kids languishing in New York City's foster care system — which is costing taxpayers more than $2.4 billion, according to a new class-action suit. Around 11,000 city kids are stuck in "one of the most dangerous foster care systems in the country," according to the Manhattan federal court filing. The massive complaint — which runs to 256 pages with exhibits — alleges systemic violations of their "right to be free from harm" and other rights granted by the Constitution and various federal and state laws. It was filed Wednesday on behalf of 10 foster kids, including "Eliza W.," 16, who was 4 when she was taken from her abusive, 19-year-old mom by the city's Administration for Children's Services, or ACS, and was "shuffled ... through so many foster placements that she is unable to account for all of them," the suit says. She also allegedly suffered repeated instances of sexual abuse, beatings and intentional starvation that were ignored by her caseworker — and led to her asking to be committed to a mental hospital in July 2014. "Since her hospitalization, she has been placed on heavy doses of psychotropic medication; she reports that, as a result, she can barely string a sentence together and no longer looks people in the eye because she gets nervous," court papers say. The plaintiffs also include Public Advocate Letitia James, who the suit says "has received myriad constituent complaints concerning foster care." "Lives of #fostercare children are being ruined during their most formative years," she tweeted Wednesday morning. The suit seeks a court order requiring that ACS immediately address "the systemic failures that have been plaguing New York City's foster care system for too long." "That the responsible state and city officials have known about these problems and done nothing to fix them is inexcusable," the suit says. Defendants named in court papers include the city, ACS and the state Office of Children and Family Services. In a statement, ACS touted "great strides in reducing the number of children in foster care from a high of 45,000 in the 1990s" and said that "in the last 18 months ACS has taken significant steps in preventive work designed to keep families together and avoid placing children in foster care in the first place." "The de Blasio administration is deeply invested in improving the lives of vulnerable children, and working very closely with many partners to improve our foster care placement system," the statement said. OCFS declined to comment, saying it didn't discuss "potential or pending litigation." Tami Steckler, head of the Legal Aid Society's Juvenile Rights Practice, blasted the suit as "short-sighted" and warned that it could "stall the progress being made by those of us actually working with these families and children." "As the organization that represents almost all the children in New York City foster care, we have been working very closely with the current Commissioner to improve outcomes," Steckler said in a prepared statement. "This lawsuit is being brought by attorneys who have never represented clients in New York City's foster care system, yet purport to know how to fix it, at a time when foster care numbers are at an all-time low and collaboration is at an all-time high." Source: <http://nypost.com/2015/07/08/lawsuit-says-nyc-has-one-of-the-worst-foster-care-systems-in-us/>

The Girls Matter Too: Addressing the Girls' Sexual Abuse to Prison Pipeline Posted: 07/09/2015 6:34 am EDT Updated: 07/09/2015 8:59 am EDT Tim Pearce Los Gatos | Flickr Share 304 Tweet 427 Email 1 Comment 35 Tumblr fark stumble It is time to talk about our girls and criminal justice reform. I have devoted many years to fighting for significant reforms to our broken criminal justice system. I have called for an end to mass incarceration because of its devastating impact on men and boys of color. But, like so many others, I did not focus on our girls enough. I believed that our girls were, comparatively, less harmed by the failures of our criminal justice system. However, it has become painfully clear to me that our girls of color are suffering too--and we must have a greater acknowledgement of what is happening to them. The Human Rights Project for Girls, Georgetown Law Center on Poverty and Inequality, and the Ms. Foundation for Women just released a report The Sexual Abuse to Prison Pipeline: The Girls' Story that exposes how Black and Brown girls are being criminalized. And, it is not because girls are suddenly becoming violent or joining gangs at any greater numbers. It is because they are arrested for their experiences of sexual abuse and trauma. Sexual abuse is one of the primary predictors of girls' entry into the juvenile justice system. The most unbelievable example of the sexual abuse to prison pipeline is what happens to girls who are trafficking victims. When I served as The United Nations Goodwill Ambassador to The Permanent Memorial to the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade, I attempted to bring more attention to human trafficking that is happening right now, including in our very own country. I thought and still think it is important to deal with our issues at home, instead of pretending that they only happen abroad. The sad reality is that when our girls are bought and sold for sex, they are not seen or treated as victims. Instead, they are arrested for prostitution. In fact, according to the FBI, for prostitution arrests under the age of 18, African American children comprise 59 percent of all prostitution-related arrests in the U.S. As the Executive Director of the Human Rights Project for Girls, Malika Saada Saar, has pointed out to me "Our girls are criminalized for being subject to commercial rape. They are not treated as the victims and survivors of child rape that they are--instead they are unjustly arrested, jailed and detained as prostitutes. Even though many are not of the legal age to consent to sex." There are other ways that girls are pipelined into the sexual abuse to prison pipeline. For instance, over the past twenty years, girls have accounted for approximately 60 percent of runaway cases. It is a status offense to run away, so girls are getting locked up for running away--even though running is a common (and necessary) response to sexual and physical violence. We tell women to run from violence, but when girls run, we arrest and detain them. The Sexual Abuse to Prison Pipeline: The Girls' Story maps out those key points in the pipeline--the detention of girls who are victims of sex trafficking; the arrest of girls who run away from home or become truant; and those who cross from the child welfare system into juvenile justice -- to create an understanding of the ways that girls are wrongly punished after their experiences of sexual and physical abuse. We must see what is happening to our girls at the intersection of race, gender and poverty. The terrible truth is that if you are a poor Black or Brown girl who is victimized by sexual or physical violence and trauma, your suffering is denied. Instead, you are punished for it. You are told you are not a victim of child rape, you are a child prostitute; you are not a scared, hurt girl trying to run away from an abusive parent, you are a delinquent; you are not a survivor of the sexual assault perpetrated by those you were suppose to trust, you are a bad girl. For too long, our girls' lives have been lost, disregarded, or forgotten. As we continue on our path for true criminal justice reform and an end to mass incarceration and the school to prison pipeline, we must include how our Black and Brown girls are also being wrongly criminalized. We must see, name, and dismantle the sexual abuse to prison pipeline for our girls so that they have a chance to live out their full potential. I commit to giving voice to our girls, as the father to two, as a human rights defender, and as one of many Americans demanding an end to the criminalization of our young people of color. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/russell-simmons/the-girls-matter-too-addr_b_7760366.html

DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment Jody Holt, left, a former supervisor with the Department of Family Services, and her son Josh Holt appear in Regional Justice Center, 200 Lewis Avenue, on Wednesday, July 8, 2015. Jody Holt agreed to plead guilty to a gross misdemeanor, and her son agreed to a class C felony. Jeff Scheid on Twitter @jlscheid (Jeff Scheid/Las Vegas Review-Journal) DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment Jody Holt, a former supervisor with the Department of Family Services, appear in Regional Justice Center, 200 Lewis Avenue, on Wednesday, July 8, 2015. Jody Holt agreed to plead guilty to a gross misdemeanor, and her son Josh Holt agreed to a class C felony. Jeff Scheid on Twitter @jlscheid (Jeff Scheid/Las Vegas Review-Journal) DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment Josh Holt appears in Regional Justice Center, 200 Lewis Avenue, on Wednesday, July 8, 2015. Josh Holt agreed to a class C felony while his mother Jody Holt, a former supervisor with the Department of Family Services, agreed to plead guilty to a gross misdemeanor. Jeff Scheid on Twitter @jlscheid (Jeff Scheid/Las Vegas Review-Journal) DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment Josh Holt, right, and his mother Jody Holt, a former supervisor with the Department of Family Services, appear in Regional Justice Center, 200 Lewis Avenue, on Wednesday, July 8, 2015. Jody Holt agreed to plead guilty to a gross misdemeanor, and her son agreed to a class C felony. Jeff Scheid on Twitter @jlscheid (Jeff Scheid/Las Vegas Review-Journal) DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment Josh Holt appears in Regional Justice Center, 200 Lewis Avenue, on Wednesday, July 8, 2015. Josh Holt agreed to a class C felony while his mother Jody Holt, a former supervisor with the Department of Family Services, agreed to plead guilty to a gross misdemeanor. Jeff Scheid on Twitter @jlscheid (Jeff Scheid/Las Vegas Review-Journal) DFS worker struggled to keep own grandchildren in safe environment Josh Holt, right, and his mother Jody Holt, a former supervisor with the Department of Family Services, appear in Regional Justice Center, 200 Lewis Avenue, on Wednesday, July 8, 2015. Jody Holt agreed to plead guilty to a gross misdemeanor, and her son agreed to a class C felony. Jeff Scheid on Twitter @jlscheid (Jeff Scheid/Las Vegas Review-Journal) image By DAVID FERRARA LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL Jody Holt was overwhelmed and outnumbered, working overtime as a supervisor with the Department of Family Services to ensure her own grandchildren were safe, often arriving home to a mess. For more than a year, as her son Joshua Holt and his wife, Veronica, struggled with meth addiction, they raised their children in the elder Holt's home. She would throw out one bag of garbage only to quickly be inundated by more trash, her lawyer, Michael Smith, told the Review-Journal after a court hearing Wednesday. She washed so many clothes her washing machine broke, so she began doing laundry at a relative's house. Her grandchildren, ages 2 and 5, wandered through the filth during the day, but slept in Jody Holt's bedroom -- the only clean spot in the entire house. She paid for her 27-year-old son and 25-year-old daughter-in-law to go to methadone clinics, but that did not seem to help. Jody Holt even mentioned her concerns about her home situation to co-workers, looking for answers. When she told her son she wanted to call the police, he threatened to take her grandchildren away, her lawyer said. They would live on the streets, and she would never see them again, Joshua Holt told his mother. "She was placed in a situation I don't think anybody wants to be placed in," Smith said. "That is: tolerate the mess or know that your grandchildren are living on the street. She's charged with a crime for loving her grandchildren. Jody's not a villain." But the children had no bruises or injuries and they were well-fed, Smith said. A Family and Youth Services manager visited the home in the 5600 block of North Riley Street in March, after Child Protective Services received a report of "environmental neglect," according to police. The 56-year-old former supervisor at Child Haven and long-time Clark County employee was charged two months later with two counts of child abuse, neglect or endangerment after authorities found her northwest valley home "a significant threat to the safety of the children." As an adult living in the home, she had a responsibility to make sure the children were safe. Police said that as a supervisor for the Department of Family Services, Holt was required by law to report child abuse or neglect, but did not do so. Under state law, mandatory reporters who suspect child abuse "in his or her professional or occupational capacity" must notify authorities. Holt simply did not want to risk losing her grandchildren, her lawyer said. "When you have a professional responsibility to contact somebody, the reason that duty to report exists is because third-party people have sort of an outside perspective," Smith said. "When it's your family, you have sort of clouded vision." Holt's last day as a county employee was March 19, according to county officials. She started as a county word processor on Feb. 18, 1981 and was promoted several times. On Dec. 15, 2007, she went to work as a child development supervisor. On Wednesday, she agreed to plead guilty to gross misdemeanor child abuse, neglect or endangerment, and her son agreed to the same charge as a class C felony. Prosecutors said they would not oppose probation for both. Last month, Veronica Holt also pleaded guilty to felony child abuse, neglect or endangerment. When Child Protective Services received a report about the environment in her home, Jody Holt kicked the children's parents out. When she learned of the police investigation, Holt moved the children to an uncle's home, authorities said. The children are now in foster care, Smith said, and their grandmother visits them a couple times each month, which is acceptable, though perhaps not enough. "Everybody recognizes that Jody Holt is the anchor, the pillar, of her grandchildren's lives," Smith said. "It's what they know. They love their grandmother. Their grandmother loves them." Contact reporter David Ferrara at dferrara@reviewjournal.com or 702-380-1039. Find him on Twitter: @randompoker Source: <http://www.reviewjournal.com/news/las-vegas/dfs-worker-struggled-keep-own-grandchildren-safe-environment>

Feds punish state for failing foster care standards Feds say too many kids are re-entering the system. By Brandon Stahl Star Tribune July 10, 2015 — 11:36am Text size comment41 share tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order

Reprint More than 200 children have gone through Kate and Tyree Walton's foster home in Brooklyn Park in the past four years, but for them one child stands out. The girl was 5 in 2012, when the Waltons took her in. Over the next three years, the Waltons watched the girl treated like a yo-yo. Child protection workers sent the girl back to her drug-addicted father, only to pull her from the home and bring her back to the Waltons. Each time they've had her, the girl "is more withdrawn," Kate Walton said. "She's older, understands what's going on, and she's angry." What happened to the girl, considered foster care "re-entry," has happened to more than 8,000 Minnesota children since 2007. That's too many for the federal Children's Bureau. Last month, the agency told the state that it was withholding more than $755,000 in child protection funding because Minnesota's re-entry rates are too high. Only four counties in the state had acceptable re-entry rates, according to records obtained by the Star Tribune through Minnesota's public records law. The national standard is no more than 10 percent of children re-entering foster care within a year, yet 58 counties had rates double the standard. Clearwater, Norman and Winona counties had rates at 40 percent or more, the highest in the state. Minnesota has failed to meet the re-entry standard since at least 2007, records show. In 2014, about one in every four foster kids returned to out-of-home care, often because of repeated abuse. Cases closed That cycle, said Traci LaLiberte, a University of Minnesota child welfare professor, can have devastating effects on children. One reason for the high re-entry rate, she said, is that child protection walks away after reuniting children with troubled families. "What is clear is that when kids get returned home, the agency should stay involved," said LaLiberte, the executive director for the school's Center for Advanced Studies in Child Welfare. The Minnesota Department of Human Services (DHS) will recover costs from the federal penalty by taking the money from counties, basing their share on the number of children who were sent back to foster care. Hennepin and Ramsey counties will shoulder about $280,000 of the penalty due to their high re-entry rates and larger share of foster children. Since 2001, the Children's Bureau has fined seven states and the District of Columbia for failing federal child protection standards. The federal children's agency is also punishing Minnesota for not making required monthly visits with foster care children. The standard is 90 percent, but the state hit that target only 78 percent of the time in 2014. The penalties come at a time when the number of children in foster care has grown to more than 11,000, and fewer families are signing on as foster parents. Compounding the problem is that for several years, the state has failed to meet several other federal standards that measure whether foster children are placed in safe, permanent homes, the Star Tribune has found. Thousands of foster children have been moved between several homes before they're reunited with their families or adopted. "We're not meeting the needs of the child," Jim Koppel, the assistant DHS commissioner for children and family services, said Thursday. "When we intervene in the best interests of the child ... we have to continue to serve that child in all the places, in all the settings that child is in." Koppel and DHS Inspector General Jerry Kerber will co-chair a foster care work group formed in June that will address the problems found by the federal government and the Star Tribune. "We are going to substantially change the way we do foster care," said Koppel, who was appointed to his post in December following the Star Tribune's reporting on child protection failures. "We need to make more of an effort to have the best homes for these children." For many kids, the lack of stability will result in years of trauma. Saprina Kennedy is trying to adopt one such child, her 12-year-old niece, who before age 4 had already been in foster care after suffering abuse. After she was returned home, in 2008, the then-5-year-old girl was found walking around an ice-covered parking lot without shoes or a coat. Kennedy said the girl was starving and looking for food. She went back to foster care. The girl has been through 24 foster homes in the past 10 years, Kennedy said. She is now in a Wisconsin facility, being treated for post-traumatic stress disorder and, as Kennedy put it, "rage." "She deserves better than what she's gone through," Kennedy said. Source: <http://www.startribune.com/feds-punish-state-for-failing-foster-care-standards/313088651/>

Teens missing from Roane County treatment facility On the Fourth of July, three teens ran away from "Roane Academy," near Rockwood. Officials found one in the Nashville area. Becca Habegger, 8:30 p.m. EDT July 10, 2015 Two teenagers are still missing after running away from a Roane County youth treatment facility last week (Photo: WBIR) 16 CONNECT 3 TWEETLINKEDINCOMMENTEMAILMORE (WBIR - HARRIMAN) - Two teenagers are still missing after running away from a Roane County youth treatment facility last week. On the night of July 4, three teenagers ran away from Roane Academy, which is a relatively new residential treatment facility for juvenile males. The structure is located in a Roane County industrial park near Rockwood and Harriman. Officials found one of the teenagers, a 15-year-old, in the Nashville area on Tuesday. The other teens, 15 and 17 years old, remain missing. Roane Academy is owned and operated by Nashville-based Omni Visions, Inc. That's a regional agency for adoption, foster care and mental health, with facilities across Tennessee and several surrounding states. Omni Visions President and CEO Steve Norris said on the evening of July 4, one of the teenagers damaged a sprinkler in a restroom at the facility. That triggered the sprinkler system and fire alarm. Mark Akers is the facility's director and said, "when you pull the fire alarms, all the security doors, they open. They have to by law." As staff and residents exited the building, three teenagers ran away. The remaining 18 residents, Akers pointed out, did not run away. The incident is one of the several issues some neighboring business owners were concerned would come to fruition. In January 2014, Roane County commissioners approved a zoning change in the Roane County Industrial Park that allowed for the facility to operate. At the time, business owners Barry and Betty Kober retained an attorney and raised concerns about bringing the facility into the area. They own Precise Industrial Coatings, Inc., located less than a quarter of a mile down the road from Roane Academy. Source: <http://www.wbir.com/story/news/local/2015/07/10/teens-missing-from-roane-co-treatment-facility/29994989/>

Taken From Families, Indigenous Children Face Extreme Rates of State Violence in US Sunday, 12 July 2015 00:00 By Britney Schultz, Truthout | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 365 Email In a photo taken around 1936, Aboriginal Canadians attend a school at Fort Resolution in the Northwest Territories. Canada's Truth and Reconciliation Commission has concluded that the country's former policy of removing Aboriginal children from families for schooling could be best described as "cultural genocide." In the US, Native children were subjected to similar policies for more than a century. (Photo: Library and Archives Canada) The plight of Indigenous children recently made headlines, as Canada's Truth and Reconciliation Commission released a damning report calling the country's long-held policy of removing Native children from their families by force and placing them in state-funded residential schools "cultural genocide." According to the report, even before Canada was founded in 1867, churches were operating boarding schools for Indigenous children, and the last federally supported residential school didn't close until the late 1990s. In the US, Native children were subjected to similar policies for more than a century. Article VII of the Fort Laramie Treaty of 1868 stated, "In order to insure the civilization of the Indians entering into this treaty ... they, therefore, pledge themselves to compel their children, male and female, between the ages of six and sixteen years, to attend school." In response to the history of removing Native children from their families and cultures and forcing them into (often abusive) boarding schools, the Indian Child Welfare Act \(ICWA\) was passed in 1978. The law established requirements for public and private child welfare agencies and state courts to adhere to when working with tribal children and families. However, the current manifestation of Native child removal is the child welfare system, and the ICWA is theoretically supposed to prevent that system from becoming a vehicle of systematic removal of children. According to Assistant Attorney General for the Cherokee Nation Chrissi Nimmo, at its most basic level, "ICWA requires state courts and private agencies to always seek family reunification or family placement, involve tribes in decision-making of their children and protect parental rights - one of the most basic and fundamental rights in this country." However, due to continued violations and noncompliance with the ICWA, in February of 2015, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) published new guidelines to strengthen the law, which will be codified at the end of the year. Daniel Sheehan, chief counsel of the Lakota People's Law Office in Rapid City, South Dakota, believes there is currently no enforcement mechanism inherent in the ICWA, which makes it easier to violate. "No federal agency feels its place is to enforce the Indian Child Welfare Act, and the issue is under the radar because [the group it represents] is not a politically powerful constituency." Nimmo said that the proposed changes are to federal regulations that interpret ICWA, not changes to ICWA itself. "As the mother of Indian children and a tribal attorney, I personally and professionally fully support the proposed changes," she said. The most important aspects of the new regulations, according to Nimmo, are clarifications on notifying tribes of potential ICWA cases, a definition of "active efforts" to prevent the breakup of families and a definition of "good cause," which is a critical term in the ICWA. In spite of efforts to prevent it, the current generation of Indigenous children in the US is facing a double threat: being removed from their homes and tribes to be placed with (usually) white foster families and being forced into privately and publicly funded programs for "at-risk youth" - institutions that are often havens of neglect and abuse, and sometimes even have political conflicts of interest. These ongoing threats are the continuation of a long series of broad-scale attempts at forced assimilation. Indigenous activist, writer and prison abolitionist Kelly Hayes, who is also Truthout's Community Engagement Fellow, speaks to this firsthand. "As the child of a displaced Indigenous man [of the Menominee Nation], I see the removal of our people ... as part of the larger effort to diminish the number of Native people in the United States," Hayes said. "While anti-Blackness, as perpetrated by the American government, has often taken the form of persecuting anyone with any known Black heritage, regardless of appearance, anti-Native policies have involved a process of destruction that has, in the last hundred years, included concerted efforts at assimilation." Foster Care, "Children's Homes" and Profiting Off Native Loss In South Dakota, Indigenous children make up 15 percent of the child population, but comprise more than half the children in foster care. Nearly 90 percent of the kids in family foster care are placed in non-Native homes or group care. Daniel Sheehan works with tribal leaders in the state to end the epidemic of illegal seizures of Native children by the state of South Dakota. Sheehan said the biggest concern of the nine tribes he works with is their children being taken away and the parents being prosecuted for "neglect." This practice represents a pervasive bias against Native families - especially those living on reservations - the Lakota People's Law Office asserts in a 2013 report to Congress. The South Dakota Department of Social Services equates economic poverty with neglect and fails to understand the tribes' kinship system of extended family - something the ICWA was actually designed to protect. "Under this bias," the report goes on to say, "South Dakota's rate of identifying 'neglect' is 18% higher than the national average." Chrissi Nimmo said the issues that disproportionately affect tribes and lead to the removal of children should be considered "correctable conditions," instead of accepted as the status quo. Currently, one typical state response to poverty seems to be to immediately and permanently remove children from their families. "There is, without a doubt, lasting trauma to children who are permanently removed from their birth families," she said. "[Native] women most often are the ones thrown under the bus," Sheehan said. "Hence the disproportionate rate of incarceration." Native Americans also report widespread discrimination by the police. According to a 2009 report by the National Council on Crime and Delinquency, Native women are criminally prosecuted at six times the rate of white women. The women often get charged with assault for resisting arrest, Sheehan said. "Lakota women don't accept being manhandled by white police, and these cops are being trained like military occupying forces, with military equipment like BearCat armored vehicles patrolling the reservations." When Native parents are arrested and their children are taken away, the parents have no means of contact with their children, and no information is communicated to them, Sheehan said. This makes it harder for families to reclaim their children, and easier for the state to perpetuate the cycle of forced removal of Indigenous children. Taking children away from their Native families is also profitable: According to a February 2015 report from IBISWorld, adoption and child welfare services in the United States rake in \$14 billion a year. And there are other indications of moneyed influence in child removal. Money Motives With its high dependence on federal financial support, Sheehan said, South Dakota receives $79,000 per Native child per year under the adoption track of the state's foster care system. He said the kids are often dosed with pharmaceuticals because they are labeled as having "special needs," and goes on: "We found out that when the state of South Dakota seizes a Lakota child, they were forced to take a mental health screening test. The screening test was drafted up by the Eli Lilly Corporation, which is a major manufacturer of psychotropic drugs. When they flunked the test, they were determined to be in need of one or more of these drugs." A report by South Dakota Indian Child Welfare Act directors found that, "South Dakota appears to have prescribed antipsychotic drugs to foster children prior to 2006, even though the FDA had not approved the use of these drugs by children at that time. And after 2006, South Dakota seems to have overprescribed these agents to children." The federal Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997 includes a provision called the Adoption Incentive Bonus, through which states earn federal bonuses when they increase adoptions of children who are in need of new permanent families. A designation of "special needs" is significant to note, because Congress authorized a bonus payment of $4,000 for each foster child, with an additional $2,000 for each "special needs" adoption above the baseline payment of the Adoption Incentives program. According to the North American Council on Adoptable Children, families who finalize the adoption of a child with special needs in 2015 can claim a tax credit of $13,400. Furthermore, for the decade since data has been collected on the status of "special needs" children in the foster care and adoption system, each year (from 2003/2004 to fiscal year 2013), South Dakota has claimed 100 percent of the children in its system as "special needs". Some of these facilities, such as the Children's Home Society of South Dakota, have ties to politicians. Before he pivoted into politics full time and became the state's 32nd governor, then-Lieutenant Gov. Dennis Daugaard left his banking job in 1990 to become the development director of the Children's Home Foundation, the fundraising arm of the Children's Home Society of South Dakota. He held the position for 12 years before becoming the executive director of the organization. According to an NPR investigation, under Daugaard's leadership, the organization's finances grew sevenfold, adding two additional facilities and doubling the amount of money it received from the state. Children's Home then began to outsource its examination of potential foster homes and its training of foster care parents. Additionally, the investigation noted, this conflict of interest was evidence of Daugaard using his power to grant contracts to the Children's Home, often not even considering other social service organizations. A 2013 report endorsed by seven tribal governments concluded there is "a strong financial incentive for state officials to take high numbers of Native American foster children into custody. Anecdotal evidence and testimony confirm that this incentive motivates the state's actions." The Juvenile (In) Justice System and Native Youth According to US Census Bureau data, in 2013, there were about 5.2 million Native Americans in the United States, representing approximately 2 percent of the total population. About 32 percent of Indigenous people in the US are under the age of 18. Though they are only a small percentage of the country's demographic, Native youth "disproportionately suffer adverse effects at the stages of arrest, diversion, detention, petition, adjudication, probation and secure placement in the juvenile justice system," concludes a February 2015 report from the Lakota People's Law Project. Significant resources are funneled toward "services" that displace and confine Indigenous youth. From 2012-2013, the South Dakota Department of Social Services contracted with Youth Services International to provide services for juveniles placed through Corrections, Child Protection, and Tribal Court at the Chamberlain Academy, a youth detention and treatment facility in Chamberlain, South Dakota, at a rate of \$142.94 per child per day. Youth Services International describes its work as "serving at-risk youth ... rehabilitating juveniles through integrated programs, staff mentoring and environments to promote learning and change." However, the Florida-based company has a history of abuse allegations. Until recently, one purveyor of these "services" was the Chamberlain Academy, which closed in January 2014. In 2000, former residents of the academy brought an action against it in Brown v. Youth Services Intern. of South Dakota. The plaintiffs said they had been sexually assaulted by a counselor. Following the 1999 death of a 14-year-old girl at a boot camp program at South Dakota's Juvenile Training School in Plankinton, South Dakota, an investigation uncovered a widespread pattern of systemic abuse by facility guards, including youth being held in isolation or chained to their beds and the use of pepper spray against young prisoners. After being closed for five years, the facility reopened under a new name, Aurora Plains Academy, and new management. According to Niche rankings and statistics, Native American children constitute 53 percent of the students at Aurora Plains Academy. Daniel Sheehan told Truthout that such abuses are not anomalies. "The children at these institutions are subjected to extreme discipline and punishment," he said. "They only get about two real hours of schooling per day in joint-age classrooms, and if they act up, they get points against them, with multiple violations of rules leading to the student being transferred to a juvenile facility." Lasting Impact Sheehan believes that state violence toward and oppression of Indigenous children is under-reported. "There aren't powerful groups lobbying on behalf of Natives to give them a voice, so nobody knows about the issues affecting them." Truthout's Kelly Hayes said Native children removed from their families and tribes are attempting to learn and thrive in a society that has not only inflicted historical traumas, but also one that imposes values that exist in opposition to the affirmation of their own self-worth. "Removal and assimilation - the dilution of identity through the unlikelihood that removed children would produce offspring with their own kind, while living in white society, and the destruction of culture by way of separation and cultural isolation, as well as the forced sterilization of women living on reservations, is not simply the transition from genocide to 'cultural genocide' - It is genocide, and requires no qualifiers," she said. "It is a continued effort to annihilate us, and wipe the Indigenous off the face of the continent." There are 566 federally recognized tribes in the US, and as Truthout reported before, suicide rates for Native youth are at least triple the national average. There is undoubtedly lasting trauma to children who are permanently removed from their birth families, said Chrissi Nimmo. "Each child literally holds the future of a tribe," she said. "If children are removed, tribes are at risk of becoming extinct - both because there literally may not be children to continue the tribe and because the cultural identity of the tribe cannot be passed to the next generation." Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/31802-indigenous-children-face-extreme-rates-of-removal-and-state-violence#>

--> 'I want answers and justice for my daughter': Inquiry into closure of mental health facility after three troubled teens killed themselves within eight months of the vital service shutting down Government closed Barrett Adolescent Centre in Brisbane in January 2014 Talieha Nebauer, 17, died three months later in an independent adult unit Will Fowell, 18, and Caitlin Wilkinson Whiticker, 18, both died by August Inquiry called into the closure after documents warned of potential deaths By Leesa Smith for Daily Mail Australia Published: 11:04 EST, 12 July 2015 | Updated: 11:10 EST, 12 July 2015 17shares View comments An inquiry into the government's decision to close a vital centre for high-risk adolescents tragically comes too late for three troubled teenagers. Talieha Nebauer 17, Will Fowell and Caitlin Wilkinson Whiticker, both 18, all took their own lives within eight months of the Queensland government shutting down the Barrett Adolescent Centre in Brisbane in January 2014. A $9.5-million commission inquiry will be conducted into why the closure occurred despite government documents warning of potential deaths among some of the young patients at risk of suicide who resided at the mental health facility, 7.30 reported. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +4 Talieha Nebauer 17, took her own life three months after Barrett Adolescent Centre was closed Nichole Pryde has been fighting for the inquiry since the death of her daughter, Talieha, in April last year. The distraught mother said she wanted justice and answers for her daughter who had been struggling with mental illness since she was 14 year old. 'You go to bed of a night time and you don't want to fall asleep

because you don't know how your child is going to be, you're just always on edge waiting for the next thing to happen,' Ms Pryde said. 'I fought hard to get her to go (the Barrett Centre) because I thought that was the last chance of keeping her alive.' SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +4 Caitlin Wilkinson Whiticker was dead by early August - eight months after the mental healthy facility closure After the centre closed, the 17-year-old moved into independent accommodation into an adult unit but died nine weeks later. Ms Pryde said the clinic director had told her it was the best 'out of a list bad options' for her mentally-ill daughter. 'She expressed concerns that there were plenty of places where she could ... harm herself,' she said. 'She'd been in hospital three years in 24/7 care — to go to a little unit on her own without anybody in her unit with her. 'They did promise me six weeks of the 24-hour care but that only lasted two weeks because she was doing really well.' By early August, Will and Caitlin had also died. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +4 Will Fowell, 18, had also passed away by early August following the long term residence for adolescents at high risk of suicide shutting down Queensland Health Minister Cameron Dick said the inquiry, which will be led by a retired judge, would focus on the 'full facts surrounding the decisions' to seek out the truth about the closure of the centre by the former Newman Government. Mr Dick said Opposition Leader, Lawrence Springborg, and Health minister at the time, who will face the witness stand, assured he wouldn't abandon patients. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +4 Justine Wilkinson said the Barrett Centre gave her 18 years with daughter Caitlin Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3158231/I-want-answers-justice-daughter-inquiry-closure-mental-health-facility-three-troubled-teens-killed-eight-months-vital-service-shutting-down.html#ixzz3gHxQqmxq> Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

These Congress Members Want to Stop Conversion Therapy at 'Boot Camps' Reps. Adam Schiff and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen are demanding an end to the abusive, discredited practices seen at poorly regulated 'treatment centers' for so-called troubled teens. BY Sunnive Brydum July 14 2015 6:46 PM ET 23256 Rep. Adam Schiff speaks at the podium, while Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (in white) stands by. A bipartisan pair of Congress members introduced a bill today that would prohibit counselors at so-called boot camps from engaging in efforts to try to change a camper's sexual orientation or gender identity. ADVERTISING Rep. Adam Schiff, a California Democrat, and Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican, introduced a bill today modeled on the Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act, which had been introduced several times by former California Rep. George Miller and passed the U.S. House without making it through the Senate, notes The Hill. The legislation would require residential treatment programs to abide by uniform standards, including a sweeping prohibition on child abuse of any kind, including starvation, denial of water or medical treatment, and efforts to change a young person's sexual orientation or gender identity, commonly known as "conversion therapy." The phrase "residential treatment programs" refers to a broad range of programs, generally aimed at modifying undesirable behavior in young people deemed "unruly." Such programs are sometimes referred to as "boot camps" where "troubled teens" are "scared straight." The lawmakers pointed to a troubling trend of parents sending their children to these facilities as a "last resort," then finding that the children have been abused or even tortured while attending "camp." "While many residential treatment and youth 'boot' camp programs help young people who are at risk, I am increasingly concerned about reports of malfeasance in some camps," said a statement from Ros-Lehtinen, one of the first Congressional Republicans to support marriage equality and who happens to have a transgender son. "Some practices, such as starvation, excessive physical restraints, and neglectful medical treatment, are intolerable in any setting. Additionally, although sexual orientation and gender identity are immutable characteristics, other programs seek to behaviorally modify LGBT youth. No one should undergo this physical or emotional abuse and Adam and I are proud to help take the first step in solving this important problem." "We cannot ignore reports that young people have died and thousands have suffered abuse at the hands of those who run and work at residential treatment programs under the guise of providing critical therapy and rehabilitation services," said Schiff. "That's why we are introducing legislation to hold all residential treatment programs accountable. The measure will also increase the transparency of these programs so that parents can make informed and safer choices for their children. Families that turn to these treatment programs for help, often as a last resort, must know that their kids are safe and in the care of professionals." While the legislation builds on the stalled efforts of former Rep. Miller, Ros-Lehtinen and Schiff's bill expands the scope of those efforts, according to a press release from Schiff's office. According to that release, the legislation introduced today will: "Hold all youth residential treatment programs accountable to a set of minimum federal standards including prohibiting all residential treatment programs that purport to provide youth with mental health and behavioral treatment from any form of child abuse and depriving children of water, food, or medical care; requiring that all children have reasonable access to their families and a hotline to report instances of abuse; and requiring all staff members to be properly trained to identify instances of child abuse." "Establish civil penalties for any violation of these standards and ensures private right of action so that victims and their families can seek civil damages as well." "Increase transparency of the "troubled teen" industry by requiring all residential treatment programs to publicly disclose any past record of child abuse and state licensing status." "Prohibit all residential treatment facilities from discriminating against youth with disabilities and LGBT youth, and requires all programs to employ safe and evidence-based treatment that protects children against harmful or fraudulent practices." "Require states to work with Health and Human Services (HHS) to report and investigate instances of child abuse at residential treatment programs, and further requires them to establish standards that are at least as strict as federal standards. Also requires states to develop policies that ensure every program in their state is properly licensed and in compliance with license requirements." Source: <http://www.advocate.com/youth/2015/07/14/these-congress-members-want-stop-conversion-therapy-boot-camps>

Mesa teenager's suicide tied to group home problem, custody battle Posted: Jul 10, 2015 9:05 PM PDT Updated: Jul 11, 2015 6:39 AM PDT By Adam Longo Email Connect adam.longo@mercedith.com SUPERIOR, AZ (KPHO/KTVK) - A local mother is pointing the finger at the state of Arizona. She says the system has failed her daughter, who tragically took her own life last month. MOREAdditional LinksPoll Pinal County mom Holly Mutchie had been fighting the court system, trying to regain custody of her 16-year-old daughter, Grace. Grace had essentially been kidnapped when she was 3 years old. "She loved taking pictures of everything," said Mutchie. "She had a very contagious laugh. Her laugh would get you laughing." Mutchie wasn't there for a big chunk of Grace's life. Her ex-husband took her and left the state when Grace was still a toddler. "No fault of my own at all. Never gave up parental rights. His family pretty much kept my girl from me," said Mutchie. Fast-forward 12 years to this past December. The ex-husband was gone and Grace was living with his parents who then gave her up to be a ward of the state. Grace was moved into a group home even though her mom desperately wanted her back. "If that parent hasn't done anything wrong, why does it have to take so long? That's what I don't understand," said Mutchie. For seven agonizing months, Holly went through the court process that involved background checks, drug tests and parenting classes. On June 17, two police officers arrived at her doorstep. "That's when they laid it on me," said Mutchie. "They told me she shot herself at the school." Grace had taken her own life on the campus where she was set to begin as a junior this summer, at Sun Valley High School in Mesa. Mutchie says Grace was bullied at the group home and was picked on and beat up in school. She was anxious to get home with her mom. "We're working on this. We're getting closer each day. And she says 'I can't wait to get out of there. I can't wait to get there with you,'" said Mutchie. "Every single day, I miss her so much." Mutchie and her family will host a memorial service for Grace on Sunday, July 26 at 3 p.m. at the Family Life Christian Center in Superior. Source: <http://www.azfamily.com/story/29524541/mesa-teenagers-suicide-tied-to-group-home-problem-custody-battle>

Coroner chastises 'shameful' conduct of agency that oversaw group home GUY MITCHELL Hamilton Spectator file photo Workers at the agency that placed Guy Mitchell in the care home where he was found dead testified about their concerns at an inquest Tuesday. next play/pause pre 1/1 SIDEBAR Susan Clairmont Susan Clairmont's commentary appears regularly in The Spectator. Email: sclairmont@thespec.com Twitter: @susanclairmont See more articles by this author: "This guy died under your watch:" Interim director comes under fire at inquest Agency staff had concerns for months before Guy Mitchell died in a cistern Squalid home got passing grade days before Guy Mitchell's death Hamilton Spectator By Susan Clairmont SEE MOREArticles from this author The coroner is ticked off. So much so that he has threatened to revoke the standing of a key party at the inquest into the death of Guy Mitchell, a developmentally delayed man found dead in a cistern outside the care home where he lived. Fed up with the secrecy and disrespectful behaviour of Choices, the agency that was supposed to be overseeing Guy's care, Dr. Jack Stanborough berated the organization not just once — but twice — Friday. "I think Choices and its conduct is shameful," he said angrily in the morning to a courtroom full of lawyers while the jury was absent. "To hide material and produce it halfway through the inquest is shameful. "I don't understand the disrespect for Guy Mitchell, for his family, for society, for this process ... Am I upset? Darn right I'm upset." Guy died at the Ancaster property where he lived on April 29, 2012. The inquest Stanborough is presiding over is examining the circumstances of his death and the oversight of care given to developmentally delayed adults. The jury is invited to make recommendations at the end of the inquest to prevent similar deaths. Police who arrived to the drowning that night discovered the house Guy lived in was deplorable. There was no water or heat, toilets and tubs were full of human waste and there was no food in the fridge. Besides Guy, another disabled adult named David and an 11-year-old with autism named Jennifer lived in the home. Police believe Guy had been ordered to draw water from the cistern and he fell in. Stanborough's anger was sparked by the recent surfacing of a 196-page report by Choices into Guy's death. Although this inquest process began three years ago, and the inquest itself began Monday, Choices just now gave the report to the coroner. It was written in 2012. "I don't know what the game is ... but Choices' conduct in this situation — to have this information requested from them at a case conference three years ago and have it produced for me 24 hours ago — is shameful," Stanborough railed. He added he has conducted more than 30 inquests and this is the first time he is considering revoking a party's standing, which allows them to have an official role at the inquest and be able to ask questions. "Can you imagine what it was like to be Guy Mitchell, who has the level of understanding of a five-year-old, and be in the water alone and dying?" Stanborough asked as Jeff Manishen, lawyer for Choices, stood before him. Manishen told the coroner he was unaware of the report until recently. During the lunch break it came to light that there are at least two Choices case file binders about Guy that have not been handed over to the inquest. And "communication books" that were to be passed between the Choices day program Guy attended, and the Santor family with whom he lived, are also missing. Furthermore, a notebook about the Santors kept by a Choices manager suddenly appeared at the lunch break — but 13 pages related to the time of Guy's death have been ripped out. Clearly trying to control his rage, Stanborough said — slowly and clearly: "To say that's troublesome is perhaps a bit of an understatement." This is not the first time Stanborough has been angry during the inquest. Earlier this week he learned a lawyer representing Choices' insurance firm was sitting next to Manishen at the counsel table. Stanborough made the lawyer pack up her things and move into the body of the court, reprimanding her for not being honest about who she was representing. The insurance firm does not have standing at the inquest and, therefore, should not have been at the table or privy to some of the documents that lawyer had received. Susan Clairmont's commentary appears regularly in The Spectator. <http://www.thespec.com/news-story/5728063-coroner-chastises-shameful-conduct-of-agency-that-oversaw-group-home/> Source: <http://www.thespec.com/news-story/5728063-coroner-chastises-shameful-conduct-of-agency-that-oversaw-group-home/>

Blount County Children's Home razed - The Daily Times: News Blount County Children's Home razed Story Comments Image \(2\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next Mark A. Large Blount County Children's Home This file photo from 2012 shows the now-demolished Blount County Children's Home in Maryville. Mark A. Large | The Daily Times Blount County Children's Home The site of where Blount County Children's Home once sat is shown. Posted: Sunday, July 12, 2015 12:00 am Blount County Children's Home razed By Joel Davis joeld@thedailytimes.com TheDailyTimes.com | 0 comments Posted on Jul 12, 2015 by Joel Davis About 20 months after it ceased operation, the story of the Blount County Children's Home is over and done. The old facility at the former Blount County Children's Home property on McCammon Avenue has been demolished to make way for a new headquarters for the 5th Judicial Drug Task Force. County Commissioner Jamie Daly brought up the demolition at Tuesday's Blount County Agenda Committee meeting. In response, County Commissioner Mike Caylor, who works for the Maryville Fire Department, said the facility had been condemned because of structural deterioration. There are only two options for dealing with a condemned building, he said. "It's fixed, which in my opinion was not economically feasible, or it is removed." Former Children's Home Board of Directors Member Tom Eustis said the demolition was regretful but necessary by this point. The facility had not been properly maintained during its last years of operation. "If I was Blount County, I probably would have done the same thing," he said. "The problems came before that. It's a crying shame it went from almost completely refurbished to being torn down. I don't know what else you'd do with it." On Oct. 30, 2013, just three months and 15 days shy of its 120th anniversary, the Children's Home finally shut down after a troubled decade. A proposal to put the property back to use to serve children never came to fruition. The home had struggled financially since it stopped hosting children in 2003. After weather damage caused when a roof was being replaced, an insurance payout gave the Children's Home a much needed rehab: the roof was finished, new flooring was installed, the facility was painted and new furniture was bought. But, as the years passed, then came financial troubles. Maintenance fell by the wayside, and at least two groups that were allowed to lease space in the building damaged the interior. At some point, vagrants apparently moved in. "From there it all went downhill," Eustis said. By the time March 2014 rolled around, a county commissioner who toured the building described it as being in horrendous condition. In 2014, the Blount County Commission voted to allow the task force to use the property. The task force will pay for improvements to the site and facilities but would have to be reimbursed if it lost use of the property or it was sold. The task force has been looking for a location for a new headquarters in recent years. In February 2014, the County Commission tabled a request to spend $300,000 to purchase four acres of property off Mustang Drive in Maryville on behalf of the agency. Reservations had been expressed about the property's appraisal of $300,000 compared to its last assessment. The history of the Children's Home, in Maryville, dates back to 1885 when a group of women involved in the Women's Christian Temperance Union movement began discussing the need for a home for children and destitute mothers. The women went door-to-door across the county, asking each family to donate 10 cents to establish the home. It opened Feb. 15, 1894. In the aftermath of the Brian A. vs. Sundquist lawsuit settlement, the state moved away from the use of group homes in favor of foster care. The Children's Home last hosted children in 2003. The Children's Home had experienced financial difficulties in recent years. In 2012, it had to pay off $10,697 in property taxes it owed to the county and city of Maryville due to administrative errors. From July 1, 2009, through June 30, 2012, the Children's Home lost $164,526, according to an audit of its finances. Source: http://www.thedailytimes.com/news/blount-county-children-s-home-razed/article_333c3bcb-3fb8-5e59-b015-8cc82729a9f7.html

Spotlight on foster agency linked to missing boy found dead in lake 1 / 52 Body in lake believed to be missing autistic boy Omarion Humphrey, police said Davison Township Police Chief Rick Freeman confirms that 9-year-old Omarion "Mars" Humphrey's body was found on Friday in Lake Callis, during a press conference Saturday, July 11, 2015, at the Davison Township Office, 28 hours after the body was found. The preliminary autopsy showed no signs of foul play and that the body had been in the water the whole time, Freeman said. Danny Miller | MLive.com Danny Miller | dmlle17@mlive.com Print Email By Ron Fonger | rfonger1@mlive.com The Flint Journal on July 13, 2015 at 5:00 AM, updated July 13, 2015 at 9:50 PM Reddit Email Missing 9-year-old boy All Stories | Watch police chief talk discovery of missing boy's body Davison Twp Police Chief Rick Freeman confirmed the body found Friday is that of missing 9-year-old Omarion "Mars" Humphrey. He said preliminary autopsy results show no signs of trauma or foul play, and that the boy was likely in the water since he went missing. BURTON, MI -- The state is investigating the Burton agency that oversaw the foster home where Omarion Humphrey was placed, trying to determine if the 9-year-old autistic boy was properly cared for and supervised before his disappearance at Lake Callis Recreation Complex in Davison Township. Omarion's body was found in the lake Friday, July 10, after having been brought to the park by his foster mother, who lost track of the boy during the outing. The Michigan Department of Health and Human Services wants to know whether Burton-based Alternatives for Children & Families did its job investigating the foster home where Omarion had been placed before he vanished Saturday, July 4, from Lake Callis. Investigators are also checking whether Alternatives followed licensing rules, including the development of training plans to help Omarion's foster family deal with Omarion's special needs, DHHS spokesman Bob Wheaton said. "We are conducting an investigation right now, and we can't comment on any ongoing investigation," Wheaton said of the case. "(When there is) an incident as serious as a child being missing, we would look into the licensing agency." The Flint Journal-MLive could not reach Alternatives for Children & Families Chief Executive Officer Yvonia Richardson for comment Thursday, July 9, or Friday, July 10, but state records show her agency has been no stranger to special investigations. Since 2008, the state has carried out 10 investigations of Alternatives, records show, including a 2014 case in which the agency was found to have placed a child with relatives for more than six months without completing a home study or documenting that the home was safe and an appropriate placement for the child. The agency's license as a child welfare agency is in good standing despite the investigations and a license renewal report in January that required a corrective action plan because of multiple violations, including no documentation that Alternatives made required unscheduled visits of foster parents or caregivers in three of 14 cases that were reviewed. Foster care workers must make an unannounced home visit to licensed homes every quarter, according to MDHHS rules. Alternatives, which state records show was incorporated in 1988, has been under some scrutiny since Humphrey was reported missing on Independence Day as thousands of police, volunteers and tracking groups have searched for the boy, last seen barefoot and wearing only swim trunks. Geneva Harvey, who represented Alternatives at an emergency court hearing last week, told an Oakland County Probate Court judge Tuesday, July 7, that police told her Humphrey's foster mother had been warned by park employees to keep a closer eye on him just hours before he vanished. Harvey also said the foster family where Humphrey was placed had been the subject of another complaint of improper supervision of another child in the past. Probate Judge Lisa Langton has ordered Alternatives to submit a report detailing what type of training members of the foster home where Humphrey was placed had for supervising autistic children by July 24. Attorneys for Humphrey's biological mother and father each questioned Harvey about the foster home at the same hearing. The Flint foster home has not been named in court or by police. Harvey said in response to questions in court that the Humphrey case is not the first time the same foster family has faced an allegation of improper supervision. Richard Taylor, an attorney for Humphrey's mother, said someone has to answer for why Omarion wasn't properly supervised. "It baffles me that this family did not take more heed to watch him," Taylor said. The Journal could not reach Parnes or Taylor for additional comment. Source:

http://www.mlive.com/news/flint/index.ssf/2015/07/state_investigating_burton_age.html

Group homes not best option for kids or taxpayers Montgomery 10 p.m. CDT July 13, 2015 Children do best when raised in stable homes. But many who are removed from parental homes because of abuse or neglect end up in group-care facilities that are expensive for taxpayers and far from optimal for the child. Every Kid Needs a Family, a new report from the Annie E. Casey Foundation, offers sound recommendations on getting more children back into nurturing homes. Drawing on 2013 data, the report says of the 402,407 children nationwide removed from their own families, 84 percent were placed with relatives or in foster homes, while 14 percent went to group settings. Alabama's numbers are a bit below the national average, with 79 percent of children in family or foster care and 18 percent in group placement. That's not horrible, but the state could do better, says Tracey Feild, director of the Casey Foundation's Child Welfare Strategy Group, and we agree. In fact, Alabama is doing a bit better, lowering group facility placements from 20 percent in 2009 to the more recent 18 percent. The state Department of Human Resources has also successfully used an intrastate border agreement to place some 70 Alabama children with nearby relatives in Georgia, and is developing a border agreement pilot program between Mobile County and Pascagoula, Miss., area counties. A similar arrangement with Tennessee may be in the works, great steps for keeping more children in family homes. Making more progress makes sense fiscally, as well as for children's well-being, according to the report. Keeping a child in a group setting costs seven to 10 times that of family or foster home placement. Therefore, states that strongly support Medicaid and other agencies that provide services to children in the community save dollars in the long run. Alabama lawmakers threatening harsh cuts to Medicaid providers, including pediatricians, because of the General Fund crisis should ponder that equation long and hard. Strong funding for DHR, which oversees child abuse and foster care programs, is also critical. Recruiting and retaining suitable relatives or foster parents to take children in can't be done on the cheap. Minus careful oversight, the potential for harm is too great. The study also calls on policymakers, state agency leaders and family court judges to prioritize family setting placements. That's particularly important for the youngest of children. Alabama requires special consent to put infants and toddlers in regular group facilities, but doesn't limit use of shelter care, which Feild says is no better than other forms of group placement. A number of other states either prohibit putting infants and toddlers in any group setting or require special consent to do so. Alabama lawmakers should enact similar restrictions. Source: <http://www.montgomeryadvertiser.com/story/opinion/editorials/2015/07/13/group-homes-best-option-kids-taxpayers/3009680/>

Boarding School in Hastings starts selling wine despite students being too young to drink By Western Daily Press | Posted: July 11, 2015 Boarding School in Hastings starts selling wine despite students being too young to drink VIEW GALLERY Boarding School in Hastings starts selling wine despite students being too young... Share Tweet Share Pin It Email Copy link to paste in your message / SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message Boarding School in Hastings starts selling wine despite students being too young to drink SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message Boarding School in Hastings starts selling wine despite students being too young to drink A posh school has started selling its own wine despite most of its students not being old enough to drink. The exclusive boarding school has produced 750 bottles of dry white and sparkling wines which have been grown, harvested and fermented on campus. Buckswood School, in Hastings, East Sussex, planted their own vineyard five years ago and are just starting to see the fruits of their labour with their second harvest. Students at the school, from ages 11-18, have been involved in every step of the process - from planting to fermenting and bottling - but won't be involved in the drinking stage. The school are being supervised under the careful eye of expert locals Carr-Taylor Vineyards. Why This Boots Anti-Ageing Serum Is About To Sell Out Everywhere... Clinically proven to reduce wrinkles over time, it's time to meet the UK's hottest anti-ageing serum. Promoted by N°7 Headteacher Mark Redsell said: "The idea for the Buckswood Vineyard was born out of the combination of the excellent local grape growing conditions on our Sussex coastal estate and the desire to give all the Buckswood scholars yet another opportunity to experience the world hands-on, in science, business, art and geography. "Experience is the 'Buckswood Difference' and it is at the heart of everything we do. "Our sole aim is to produce young ladies and gentlemen that have an inner confidence and have a myriad of experiences that set them apart from their contemporaries. "There is a chance for every academic discipline at Buckswood to use the project as a resource." The bottles are being sold at school events and profits have been donated to various charities. Read more: <http://www.westerndailynews.co.uk/Boarding-School-Hastings-starts-selling-wine/story-26872032-detail/story.html#ixzz3giOv4sXG> Follow us: @WesternDaily on Twitter | WesternDaily on Facebook

Houseparent at Boarding School Arrested for Child Molestation 22,386 12 Hudson Hongo ProfileFollowUnfollow Hudson Hongo Filed to: crime pennsylvania child molestation boarding schools 7/13/15 6:45pm Edit Delete Invite manually Promote DismissUndismiss Block for gawker Hide Share to Kinja Go to permalink A Pennsylvania man who worked as a houseparent at the Milton Hershey School was arrested for a number of sexual offenses this weekend after authorities say he molested an 8-year-old student, PennLive.com reports. According to police, the girl told another houseparent on Saturday that 41-year-old Fernando Zagaceta had "touched her inappropriately." From WPMT: The girl said she was sleeping in her bed when Zagaceta began touching her arm and pulled her blanket down. She said he then pulled her pants down and began to touch her. Police say Zagaceta admitted to being in the girl's room and touching her hand to see if she was sleeping. He said he was taught by another house parent to do that. "Zagaceta initially couldn't remember if he touched her legs or removed the blanket," police wrote in an affidavit of probable cause. In a statement, the Milton Hershey School said it reported the incident to police immediately and has barred Zagaceta from returning to the campus. Advertisement "Such behavior is reprehensible and unacceptable, and we are taking this matter very seriously," said a school spokesperson. "The safety of the children in our care is our highest priority, and we are focused on providing all the care and support that this student needs right now." Zagaceta now faces charges of indecent assault, unlawful contact with a minor, corruption of a minor and endangering the welfare of a minor. Source: <http://gawker.com/houseparent-at-boarding-school-arrested-for-child-moles-1717596651>

Reducing Psychotropic Prescriptions Requires Systemic Reform By Marie K. Cohen, July 13, 2015 The over-reliance on psychotropic medication for children in foster care has been drawing a lot of attention both among policymakers and in the media. A recent study reports that in 2012, Pennsylvania's foster children were nearly three times as likely to be prescribed psychotropic drugs for behavior problems as other children on Medicaid. Proposals before Congress and various state legislatures attempt to address the excessive use of psychotropic drugs for foster children. But it is important to recognize that over-reliance on psychotropic medications is a symptom of larger problems. In my five years as a foster care social worker in the District of Columbia, I saw several young people who were given too many psychotropic medications. In every one of these cases, serious and general problems with the foster care system played a significant role. One such problem is the lack of involvement of many foster parents in the care provided to their charges. In my practice as a social worker, it was very rare for foster parents to take children to the psychiatrist. The foster parent was not there to tell the psychiatrist what the child's symptoms were, or how the child was responding to the medication already prescribed. Instead the social worker, with far less detailed information, was the liaison between the foster family and the psychiatrist. Most foster parents did not take their child to the psychiatrist because they worked full-time and expected the social worker to take their children to appointments. "Real parents" know they have to take off from work for this purpose. If more foster parents treated their foster children as their own, there would be less reliance on inappropriate psychotropic medications. Foster parents need to be part of a vigorous treatment team including the psychiatrist, therapist, social worker, Guardian ad Litem, and birth parent. Such a strong team, with the foster parent fully on board, is one way to prevent inappropriate medication. As I've argued before, in order to make sure foster parents are willing and able to do this for children with special needs, they need to be paid as professionals for whom parenting is a full-time job. A major investigative report of California's system found that of the 3,800 youths living in group homes, more than half were authorized to receive psychotropic drugs. One reason for this may be that group homes are serving the most troubled youth. But any group home relying on medication as a means of control rather than treatment clearly has serious problems. Poor mental health care for Medicaid recipients is another root cause of the overuse of psychotropic medications. Because Medicaid reimbursement rates are so low, the quality of psychiatric services delivered through it is notoriously poor. One Medicaid psychiatrist would write my client's prescriptions as we were walking into the office. She had no intention of talking to her patient before we left with the prescriptions, even though Medicaid was being billed for an office visit. Another psychiatrist insisted on prescribing medication to a patient even though she had been doing well without it. He expressed the fear that in the absence of medicine, the judge on the case would blame him for any misbehavior by the client. A reduction in the use of medication requires an increased reliance on therapy. President Obama's plan to reduce psychotropic medications supports state efforts to come up with alternative, evidence-based practices such as trauma-informed therapies. But in the absence of increased Medicaid reimbursement rates, these new therapies will be administered mainly by poorly-reimbursed providers. Because the poor quality of Medicaid therapists is widely recognized, the District of Columbia contracts with other providers to provide therapy to a small number of clients, the most troubled ones. But most foster children have to rely on mediocre Medicaid therapists. In order to address the overuse of medication, we need to recognize the broader problems that contribute to it. It makes sense to monitor medication use among foster children and target group homes or psychiatrists who are out of line in their use of medication. But adding layers of review without addressing the root causes of the problem might just reduce the amount of medication children receive. It will do nothing to ensure they receive the appropriate treatment to meet their needs. Marie K. Cohen is a former child welfare caseworker for Washington, D.C. She previously worked as a policy analyst and researcher at the U.S. Government Accountability Office, the Welfare Information Network, the Center for Law and Social Policy and the University of Maryland Welfare Reform Academy. Want to share your opinion or analysis with colleagues in the youth services field? Join our one-of-a-kind Blogger Co-Op, and share in the benefits from your work! TAGS: Blogger Co-Op, child welfare, DC, drugs, foster care, Marie Cohen, mental health, prescription, psychiatrist, psychotropic, social worker, Therapy © 2012 The Chronicle of Social Change Source: <https://thchronicleofsocialchange.org/opinion/reducing-psychotropic-prescriptions-requires-systemic-reform/10660>

Who's watching your children? Criminals working in child care Our three-month I-Team exclusive Jarrod Holbrook 12:35 PM, Jul 13, 2015 11:33 PM, Jul 13, 2015 Our I-Team has uncovered dozens of local people with violent and questionable criminal histories working in day cares or becoming foster parents. WFTS WFTS Copyright 2012 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Our I-Team has uncovered dozens of local people with violent and questionable criminal histories working in day cares or becoming foster parents. WFTS Our I-Team has uncovered dozens of local people with violent and questionable criminal histories working in day cares or becoming foster parents. The state is well aware of it. It's called an exemption for criminal disqualification. Some of the exemptions the I-Team found are raising serious concerns with parents. It gives a second chance to criminals who want to work with children. Basically, it's a waiver for those who fail a criminal background check and still want to become day care workers or foster parents. The I-Team found dozens in the greater Tampa Bay area have been granted these criminal exemptions by the state's Department of Children and Families. We sifted through DCF records and found the state granted exemptions for people with charges ranging from prostitution, aggravated assault on a law enforcement officer, federal bank robbery to several domestic assault and battery charges. This interactive map will show you the variety of charges for which people have received exemptions. In Hillsborough, Pinellas, and Pasco counties we found the state granted 35 criminal exemptions since 2012. "It does surprise me. These are not the things you would normally see," said Richard Filson, a child abuse attorney and a board member for Florida's Children First. In his 25 years of experience, he said he's seen plenty of cases where DCF placed children in dangerous homes. The I-Team was not able to get the names of the people granted exemptions or where they work. The state's DCF secretary Mike Carroll tells us that's not public record. You can view the state's exemptions for day care and foster care workers here, https://www.scribd.com/collections/14354226/DCF-exemptions Have a tip? Send it to I-Team Investigator Jarrod Holbrook and follow his reports on his Facebook page. Copyright 2015 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Print this article Back to Top Source: <http://www.abcactionnews.com/news/local-news/i-team-investigates/whos-watching-your-children-criminals-working-in-child-care>

Former teacher charged with secretly filming children at Bristol boarding school 1 / 1 Jonathan Thomson-Glover is accused of carrying out offences at Clifton College Clifton College Jonathan Thomson-Glover allegedly made images of more than 120 victims Claire Hayhurst Tuesday 14 July 2015 55 Print Note: We do not store your email address(es) but your IP address will be logged to prevent abuse of this feature. Please read our Legal Terms & Policies A A Email A former teacher has been charged with making indecent images of children through cameras at a boarding school and another property. Jonathan Thomson-Glover, 53, who taught at Clifton College in Bristol, has been charged with 36 counts of making, taking and possessing indecent images of children. It is understood today's charges relate to more than 120 victims who were allegedly filmed by cameras at Clifton College and an address in Cornwall over a 16 year period. Thomson-Glover, of Wadebridge, will appear before Taunton Magistrates' Court on July 20. Detective Inspector Andrea Kingdon, of Devon and Cornwall Police, said: "We've charged a 53-year-old man with 36 counts of making, taking and possessing indecent images. ADVERTISEMENT "Jonathan Thomson-Glover, from Wadebridge in Cornwall, has been charged following a joint investigation between Avon and Somerset Police and Devon and Cornwall Police. "He is a former teacher at Clifton College in Bristol. He has been released on bail to appear before Taunton Magistrates' Court on Monday July 20. Read more: National plan launched to stop faith-based child abuse Call for new rules after teacher avoids jail for affair with pupil Teachers among suspected paedophiles charged in major operation "Information was initially passed to Devon and Cornwall Police by the National Crime Agency relating to indecent images of children downloaded from the internet. "Following further inquiries, a team of officers from both forces investigated offences relating to the creation of indecent images committed at Clifton College and an address in Cornwall. "None of the charges relate to contact offences. We've been working closely with the College and our partner agencies throughout this investigation and we're grateful for their ongoing support." Anyone with information to help the investigation is asked to contact Avon and Somerset Police's Operation Initial team on 101. Those affected by the investigation should visit the force's website for details of independent support and advice, or call Victim Support on 0800 168 9111. Press Association Source: <http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/crime/former-teacher-charged-with-secretly-filming-children-at-bristol-boarding-school-10388152.html>

Congressional bill seeks to essentially ban 'gay conversion' programs across the U.S. Adam Schiff Alex Brandon / Associated Press Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Burbank), pictured in May, said Tuesday: "We cannot ignore reports that young people have died and thousands have suffered abuse." Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Burbank), pictured in May, said Tuesday: "We cannot ignore reports that young people have died and thousands have suffered abuse." (Alex Brandon / Associated Press) By Mary Ann Toman-Miller Mental Health Minority Groups Adam B. Schiff Ricardo Lara Ileana Ros-Lehtinen Residential treatment programs for young people that engage in controversial "gay conversion" therapy would face comprehensive federal regulation under a bill introduced Tuesday on Capitol Hill. By prohibiting the facilities from discriminating against LGBT and disabled youths and allowing residents or their families to sue in federal court, the proposed legislation could essentially ban so-called gay conversion therapy nationwide. L.A. legislator, activists say gay conversion therapy still exists Hailey Branson-Potts In an effort to halt reported abuse at programs claiming to help young people -- such as offering to "fix" gay children -- a state lawmaker and LGBT activists on Friday announced a campaign to regulate the so-called "troubled teen" industry. In an effort to halt reported abuse at programs claiming to help young people -- such as offering to "fix" gay children -- a state lawmaker and LGBT activists on Friday announced a campaign to regulate the so-called "troubled teen" industry. \(Hailey Branson-Potts \) Many such programs – intended to rehabilitate children with mental health problems, behavioral or substance abuse issues – have been accused of instead starving their charges, restraining them physically and mentally abusing them. Some cases of neglect have led to death or suicide, state statistics have shown. "We cannot ignore reports that young people have died and thousands have suffered abuse at the hands of those who run and work at residential treatment programs under the guise of providing critical therapy and rehabilitation services," Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Burbank), one of the bill's cosponsors, said at a news conference Tuesday. Related Nation Now White House backs banning gay conversion therapy for minors See all related 8 An estimated 4,600 teenagers were enrolled in such programs in 2013, said Paul Gionfriddo, president and chief executive of Mental Health America. Families tend to turn to these residential "boot camp" programs as a last resort after unsuccessful experiences with traditional inpatient mental health services, he said. In some circumstances parents send their children to treatment programs in an effort to change their sexual orientation from gay, lesbian, transgender or bisexual to straight, known as "gay conversion" therapy. California banned the practice in 2012. Supreme Court rejects challenge to law banning gay-conversion therapy Patrick McGreevy The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday turned down a request to hear a challenge to a California law prohibiting mental health counseling aimed at converting minors from being gay to straight. The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday turned down a request to hear a challenge to a California law prohibiting mental health counseling aimed at converting minors from being gay to straight. (Patrick McGreevy) Some of the treatment facilities have subjected young people to practices such as "starvation, excessive physical restraints and neglectful medical treatment," said Republican Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the bill's other cosponsor. "No one should undergo this physical or emotional abuse." Similar versions of the bill passed in the House in 2011 and 2013, but died in the Senate. Schiff was optimistic about prospects for the new bill. "No child can be scared straight, and no one should have to endure attempts to change who they are," said Lorri L. Jean, chief executive of Los Angeles LGBT Center. "It's long past time for Congress to pass sensible legislation to regulate this rogue, multimillion-dollar industry that's profiting from the abuse of young people." cComments @cynicalretiree , Thanks for sharing your superior biblical knowledge. KING JAMES - 1 at 10:59 AM July 16, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 28 Jodi Hobbs of Fullerton, president of the Survivors of Institutional Abuse organization, described her own experiences in a private California therapeutic boarding school and said she's still grappling with them. The facility, she said, would attempt to "break the wills" of its young boarders by using techniques such as locking them in a punishment room for hours at a stretch. Schiff emphasized the need for federal regulation, noting that "programs are often shut down in one state only to open in another under a different name." State Sen. Ricardo Lara (D-Bell Gardens) introduced similar legislation in California this year to increase regulations and oversight on private residential programs, mandating licensure of such facilities. Critics questioned the need for federal regulation in states that already regulate residential care facilities. Megan Stokes, director of government and public relations at the National Assn. of Therapeutic Schools and Programs, an industry organization of treatment programs, said such states should be exempt from the bill. Several law professors agreed that Congress had the constitutional power to enact such legislation. "Such a federal law, which hopefully would eliminate gay conversation therapy, as California law has done, would be clearly constitutional," according to Erwin Chemerinsky, dean of UC Irvine Law School, who pointed to Congress' power to regulate interstate commerce. Adam Winkler, professor of law at UCLA, emphasized the need for truthful disclosure in these programs. "Lawmakers here are trying to stop [caregivers] from giving patients misleading, scientifically inaccurate information," Winkler said. Gionfriddo pointed to the greater transparency the bill would impose, requiring all residential treatment programs to publicly disclose any past record of child abuse and state licensing status. "Parents would have more information about the program, better contact with their children, and greater assurance that programs were evidence-based and not dangerous for their children," he said. In April, the White House announced its stance against conversion therapy programs for minors. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/nation/la-na-gay-conversion-programs-20150714-story.html>

Experiments in multigenerational foster care aim to increase stability and normalcy 1 / 11 Multigenerational foster care - 5 Superheroes adorn the walls of a common room in Susan Midland's Southeast Portland foster home for teenage boys. Amy Wang | The Oregonian/OregonLive Print Email By Amy Wang | The Oregonian/OregonLive The Oregonian Email the author | Follow on Twitter on July 15, 2015 at 11:00 AM, updated July 15, 2015 at 11:05 AM 2 Reddit Email Now and then Amanda Midland tells one of her foster kids something and he'll reply, "What did your mom say?" That's because Midland's mother, Susan Midland, also is a certified foster parent in the same Southeast Portland home. So is Amanda Midland's fiancé, Sal Rico-Martin, who also lives there. The trio has been experimenting since last fall with multigenerational foster care, taking in teenage boys who are either in state custody or in the juvenile justice system on behalf of Boys & Girls Aid, the Southwest Portland foster care and adoption agency. Across town, a similarly intergenerational approach to foster care is at the heart of Bridge Meadows, a 4-year-old community of nine families and 30 elders in North Portland. To learn more To get involved with multigenerational foster care through Boys and Girls Aid: 503-542-2301 or boysandgirlsaid.org. To learn more about Bridge Meadows: 503-953-1100 or bridgemeadows.org. The two efforts aim to provide foster children the same benefits: broadening their access to adult mentors and role models and making it easier for them to achieve stability and normalcy. Stability matters because every move is a traumatic event that "breaks the trust cycle one more time," said Irene Clements, Texas-based executive director of the National Foster Parent Association. And "normalcy for these kids is key, regardless of their ages." While it's too soon to assess outcomes for the foster youth who have stayed at the Midland home, they have benefited from "more structure, care, support and resources" as well as fewer transitions because the trio can relieve one another, Michelle Ottaviano, director of shelter and foster care for Boys & Girls Aid, said by email. And the youth take part in family activities and outings: going to the gym, checking out yard sales, cheering at Amanda Midland's older son's baseball games, visiting food carts and exploring Saturday Market and the Oregon Zoo. Bridge Meadows bridges generations while providing foster care Executive director Derenda Schubert explains the Portland nonprofit's mission. At Bridge Meadows, each foster family commits to creating a "forever family" by adopting at least three children – the number in a typical sibling group – over a five-year period. Elders who join the community provide everyday activities and connections by teaching art, walking kids to school, listening to how a child's day went and attending baseball games and dance recitals. The wealth of statistics on foster children doesn't extend to foster parents, so it's impossible to tell how common multigenerational fostering is. According to state figures, Oregon had 4,006 certified foster homes as of Sept. 30, 2014, the majority of which were two-person households, but the state doesn't record the relationship between the foster parents. Clements said she believes the Midlands' homegrown approach is more common nationwide when it comes to multigenerational fostering. Either way, she said, it's crucial for all involved parties to discuss which kids they want to serve and why, their expectations and whether they mesh, and to have compatible motivations for being foster parents.  On a Monday morning in mid-June, the Boys & Girls Aid house looks like just another family home on summer break. Amanda Midland's elementary school-age sons wander in and out; squirt guns and other toys spill out of a basket on the front porch. Amanda, 31, a professional tattoo artist, relaxes in a short-sleeved top and shorts that reveal an abundance of ink. Rico-Martin, also 31, is between shifts as a Safeway clerk. In the kitchen, Susan Midland, 48, has a slow cooker preparing pulled pork for the evening meal. But upstairs, the bedroom doors are numbered and each bedroom is outfitted for double occupancy. Posters titled "House Rules" remind the occupants to "use your manners" and that bedtime is 10 p.m. on weeknights. Boys & Girls Aid once used the 2,585-square-foot house as a group home for girls but decided to move that program elsewhere, said Elizabeth Vrooman, the agency's recruitment coordinator. Meanwhile Susan Midland had been telling Vrooman, her supervisor, that she wished she could take in the kids whose cases she managed. "I kept hearing that and I kept agreeing because she has a lot of really great skills," Vrooman said. Now the three adults are nearly nine months in. So far, they said, their approach is working. "They're bound to have one of the three of us that they're more willing to connect with," Amanda Midland said. Her sons add a third generation to the mix, she said, giving the foster youth an incentive to talk and behave respectfully and appropriately. "A lot of times we hear them say, 'Oh man, maybe I should be a better role model for my sibling when I go home,'" Susan Midland said.  In the beginning, Bridge Meadows was about the children. Four years later, said executive director Derenda Schubert, "we've seen this flourishing and this blossoming of every generation who lives here." The community has come a long way from its first year, which Schubert described as "everybody getting used to each other and the trauma flourishing." Now, she said, residents are "living a vital life, a very vibrant life." Bridge Meadows has been featured on PBS' "Newshour" (see video); won the 2014 Eisner Prize for intergenerational excellence, a $100,000 award; and this month was one of six programs nationwide to be named a Generations United Program of Distinction, a three-year designation that makes Bridge Meadows a benchmark for intergenerational programs. "The outcomes that we've seen ... have been transformative," Schubert said. For example, she said, the foster children are now attending school regularly. "Their grades are improving. They're enjoying school. They're wanting to go to school." As for the elders, said Lani Faith, Bridge Meadows' resource development director, "it's really quite inspiring to watch them as 55- to 91-year-olds not just giving back" but healing and growing as well. The progress and the accolades have inspired plans for a second site in Beaverton. Meanwhile, at the original Portsmouth site, the multigenerational mission is clear. Near the main entrance, a handwritten notice reminds residents of the weekly "Happiness Hour," when all three generations gather for a communal meal. Upstairs in the library, books for adults share space with Eric Carle picture books and "Limu The Blue Turtle." In one apartment, two elders work together on watercolors at the kitchen table while a boy lounges on the nearby sofa. The nonprofit, which operates with a four-person staff and a $1 million annual budget drawn from rental income and fundraising, takes in children referred by the state Department of Human Services, along with their legal guardians. In most cases, the guardians are the children's biological kin – grandparents, aunts, cousins. Schubert said she and other Bridge Meadows staff didn't expect so many of the foster parents to be relatives. But the multigenerational model turned out to be "truly supportive of kin." Kin face challenges that nonrelatives don't when they become foster parents, such as family tensions, Schubert said. In addition, "when your grandma becomes your mom, you lose a grandma." The beauty of Bridge Meadows, she said, is that "here in this intentional community, you gain a lot of grandmas." -- Amy Wang Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/kiddo/index.ssf/2015/07/multigenerational_foster_care.html

8 Former Casa Isla Staffers Charged With Assaulting Troubled Teens In DYS Custody July 22, 2015 Updated July 22, 2015, 1:47 pm Casa Isla, which was run out of Boston's Long Island by Volunteers of America, Massachusetts, was shut down last year amid allegations that the workers mistreated clients. Here's the bridge to the island. (Jesse Costa/WBUR) By Lisa Creamer Updated July 22, 2015, 1:47 pm Story continues below BOSTON Eight former employees of a program serving troubled youths in state custody have been charged with assaulting male teens in their care as punishment for poor behavior, prosecutors said in court Wednesday. As WBUR reported in April, the program, Casa Isla, which was run out of Boston's Long Island by Volunteers of America, Massachusetts, was shut down last year amid allegations that the workers mistreated clients. The clients had been committed to the state's Department of Youth Services. The former staffers are accused of striking teens in the bare buttocks with an orange DYS sandal during a humiliating discipline ritual that came to be known as "orange chicken," prosecutors said at an arraignment Wednesday. Prosecutors are charging each of the ex-staffers with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. Several face additional charges, including threats to commit a crime and witness intimidation. "We are deeply troubled by this incident," a spokeswoman for the Executive Office of Health and Human Services said. The agency oversees youth services. "DYS has increased its monitoring visits and program reviews to ensure that we are providing quality services, and that youth are being treated in a safe and respectful manner." Seven of the ex-staffers were released on personal recognizance after pleading not guilty at their arraignments Wednesday. The eighth individual is scheduled to be arraigned

Thursday. “We are cooperating with authorities in every way we can, including turning over 2,300 hours of security camera footage,” a Volunteers of America, Massachusetts spokeswoman Stephanie Paaue said in a statement. The ex-staffers are Joseph Cintolo, 26, of Quincy; Ainsley Laroche, 40, of Roxbury; Hermano Joseph, 24, of Taunton; Raymond Pizarro, 24, of Hyde Park; Wilkens Jeanty, 40, of Quincy; Emmanuel Fedna, 30, of Everett; Silvio Depina, 37, of Brockton; and Jalise Andrade, 34, of Brockton. Joseph, Andrade, Depina and Laroche each face threats and witness intimidation charges, with Joseph and Depina facing additional charges of assault and battery and indecent assault and battery over 14. “It is hard for us to imagine that this could have been occurring given the rigorous oversight by experienced and dedicated caregivers at Casa Isla,” Paaue added in the Volunteers of America, Massachusetts statement. “But it is our collective duty to find out what happened and we hope that every step will be taken to ascertain the truth in this matter.” The Casa Isla program began in 1991, housing about 100 adolescent teens — ages 14 to 19 — committed to DYS by juvenile courts each year. With reporting from The Associated Press, WBUR’s Zoe Sobel and the WBUR Newsroom Source: <http://www.wbur.org/2015/07/22/casa-isla-dys-staff-arraignments>

Three Tragedies 07.23.151:00 AM ET When Teen Detainees Died in Custody in Jeb Bush’s Florida One boy with appendicitis was told nothing was ‘wrong with his ass.’ Another was viciously beaten by guards. And none of those responsible got jail time. In 2003, 17-year-old Omar Paisley spent three days in a Florida jail cell moaning in agony. Prison staff said he was faking his illness and told him to suck it up. Then he died. This year and last, the deaths of numerous African Americans at the hands or in the custody of prison officials and police—including Michael Brown, Freddie Gray, Walter Scott, Tamir Rice, and, most recently, Sandra Bland—have drawn renewed (and belated) national media attention to the state of the criminal justice system. And that, in turn, has made candidates’ stances and records on criminal justice policy a factor in the 2016 presidential race. It’s a particularly sensitive topic for Jeb Bush, who as governor faced two situations that mirror the deaths of Gray and Bland, both of whom died while in police custody. When Bush was governor of Florida, two teenagers died preventable deaths while in juvenile detention centers. And Bush’s approach to their cases casts some light on how he might look at criminal justice issues if he becomes president. Paisley’s death could have been averted, and it took a long time. The African-American teenager was put in the 226-bed Miami-Dade Regional Juvenile Detention Center “for cutting another youth with a soda can,” the AP reported, and he filled out a form on June 7—one day after going to the jail—saying he was ill. “My stomach hurts really bad,” he wrote. “I don’t know what to do. I can’t [sic] sleep.” Some of the staff at the facility, according to a Feb. 27, 2004, USA Today story, didn’t take him seriously. “Ain’t nothing wrong with his ass,” said one nurse. And supervisor Jack Harrington told Paisley to “suck it up and walk around.” But you can’t suck up appendicitis. The paper reported that a guard later found the teen lying in his cell covered in feces and urine, sweating profusely and clutching his stomach. Nurse Dianne Demeritte refused to enter the cell, saying she didn’t “want to take his [mess] home to my kid.” (The Palm Beach Post noted that two of his cellmates had to change his sheets and clean up his vomit.) Demeritte made the sick teen, who could barely walk, walk out of his filthy cell and sit on a chair in the hallway. She concluded that there was “nothing wrong with his ass.” Then, according to USA Today, she filled out paperwork to have him moved to a hospital, left him sitting on the chair, and went on a break. Guards found him passed out and didn’t perform CPR because their first aid kit didn’t contain the necessary equipment. That’s how Omar Paisley died. Bush’s communications director, Jill Bratina, sent that USA Today story to the governor and others a few hours after it was published, according to emails made searchable by the Florida Center for Investigative Reporting. Paisley’s death became national news, and, in one email, Bush promised a constituent it was just an isolated incident. Bill King of Pensacola emailed the governor to voice his outrage about Paisley’s roommates being forced to clean his vomit from their cell. “The lives of those kids are as much if not more important than any employee working there as they are not there by choice as the employees are, they are there by design and they have no say over their own lives,” King wrote. “All of these children are important and should not be placed into any dangerous or unhealthy situations,” he added. Bush concurred, and emailed King back to say so. “The interim Secretary [of Juvenile Justice] is cleaning up the mess,” the governor replied. “Thankfully, this is not a problem that is systemic statewide. I appreciate your writing.” And his assistant general counsel, Wendy Berger, emailed another concerned constituent, Lynda Morse, to promise the governor would do everything he could to ensure that no more incarcerated teens would have to suffer Paisley’s fate. “Like many throughout this State, Governor Bush was saddened and outraged over the death of this child,” Berger wrote. “Please know that those responsible will be held accountable. Governor Bush has full confidence in Interim Secretary [C. George] Denman’s ability to implement needed reforms. His hope is that the changes made in the Department will prevent anything like this from ever happening again.” Those hopes were misplaced. Some leaders at the Department of Juvenile Justice stepped down in the wake of Paisley’s death, and the department implemented a new policy allowing any staffer or volunteer to call 911 without first having to get permission. But there was scant accountability for the adults responsible for Paisley’s death. The two nurses were indicted on murder charges, according to The Palm Beach Post, but neither got jail time. Prison Legal News reported that the prosecutors dropped charges against one of them and that the other nurse—the one who forced Paisley to leave his cell and then insisted that nothing was wrong with him—just gave up her nurse’s license and spent one year on probation. Several prison employees were fired, and Paisley’s mother got a $1.45 million settlement from the Department of Juvenile Justice. In the meantime, nonviolent drug offenders in Florida faced stiff prison sentences. Source: <http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2015/07/23/when-teen-detainees-died-in-custody-in-jeb-bush-s-florida.html>

Youth workers charged in abuse 072215dysar01.jpg Photo by: Angela Rowlings Jalise Andrade 072215dysar03.jpg Photo by: Angela Rowlings Hermano Joseph. 072215dysar04.jpg Photo by: Angela Rowlings Raymond Pizarro. 072215DYS03.jpg Photo by: Herald Pool “RITUALISTIC” PUNISHMENT: Silvio Depina, above, and six others, were charged with abusing teens in their care at the now-shuttered Casa Isla. 072215dysar08.jpg Photo by: Angela Rowlings Joseph Cintolo 072215DYS07.jpg Photo by: Herald Pool Ainsley Laroche 072215DYS04.jpg Photo by: Herald Pool Wilkins Jeanty 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 Thursday, July 23, 2015 Print Email Comments By: Matt Stout, Laurel J. Sweet The now-shuttered facility where eight former youth workers are accused of the “ritualistic” abuse of troubled teens passed a state-ordered audit with flying colors just before it was shut down last year — even as the auditor noted there was the outstanding allegation of “sexually inappropriate behavior.” Seven of the eight workers from Casa Isla — a residential facility run by the nonprofit Volunteers of America under a contract with the Department of Youth Services — pleaded not guilty yesterday to charges including assault after allegations surfaced that they spanked teens with orange DYS-issued flip flops, sometimes on their bare buttocks, in a punishment dubbed “orange chicken.” Prosecutor Gloriann Moroney said the staffers engaged in “ritualistic instances of physical abuse,” beating youths for acting out, for returning to Casa Isla after they’d been discharged or before release “as a reminder not to return.” State officials said yesterday they moved “aggressively” to close the program in August 2014 after a complaint. But in a report released to the Herald, based on an Aug. 21 visit — a week before DYS closed the Long Island facility — an auditor found it met or exceeded every standard. “All (staff) presented as very knowledgeable about their jobs and highly dedicated to keeping youth safe,” stated the audit. It notes that there was “one allegation of sexually inappropriate behavior by staff during the past year,” and that the accused workers had been suspended pending the investigation. A DYS spokeswoman said that allegation is related to the charges. “We are deeply troubled by this incident,” said spokeswoman Rhonda Mann. “DYS conducts regular and unannounced visits to all of its programs to monitor the quality of the residential environment and the treatment of youth in our care.” A Volunteers of America statement said, “It is hard for us to imagine that this could have been occurring given the rigorous oversight by experienced and dedicated caregivers at Casa Isla.” Pleading not guilty yesterday were Jalise Andrade, 34 of Brockton; Joseph Cintolo, 26, of Quincy; Silvio Depina, 37, of Brockton; Wilkins Jeanty, 40, of Quincy; Hermano Joseph, 24, of Taunton; Ainsley Laroche, 40, of Roxbury; and Raymond Pizarro, 24, of Hyde Park. Emmanuel Fedna, 30, of Everett will be arraigned today on assault charges. Source: http://www.bostonherald.com/news_opinion/local_coverage/2015/07/youth_workers_charged_in_abuse

--> Scarred by boarding school: We've all read of boys horribly abused, now meet the women who say emotional cruelty left them traumatised It was supposed to be a luxury afforded only by privileged families But the adverse effects of boarding schools are now being revealed Experts say it can have severe effects on the mental health of children Judith Okely, late 60s, and Margaret Laughton, 78, share their experiences By Tanith Carey for the Daily Mail Published: 18:08 EST, 22 July 2015 | Updated: 03:16 EST, 23 July 2015 857shares 104 View comments Sitting at the end of her iron bed, nine-year-old Judith Okely sobbed uncontrollably for the father she had lost. So isolated was the little girl at her remote Isle of Wight boarding school, she'd not even known that he was seriously ill, let alone dying of polio. It was less than an hour since her mother had broken the news. But now she was gone, bedtime in the sparse dormitory was approaching, and the matron was running out of patience. 'She came up to me and snapped: 'Your Daddy has died. I know that. But you are to stop crying at once. You know that you are not to make any noise after 7pm,' recalls Judith. Scroll down for video Even at 78, Margaret Laughton (pictured here third from left, third row from front, aged 10) is still haunted by the memory of her first day at a boarding school in the Midlands, which she declines to name 'I adored my father, so his death was the greatest loss of my life. Yet I was being ordered not to cry because it was inconvenient. After that, I never cried in public again. I retreated inside myself.' Judith, a professor of anthropology, is in her late 60s now, but her voice still bristles with anger at the brutality she suffered during her nine years at the school. So far, concern about maltreatment of past generations of children at school has focused on the sex abuse which took place largely in boys' prep schools. But Judith is one of the growing number of ex-pupils who believe it's time that the long-term trauma suffered by both girls and boys who went to boarding schools - from which some never fully recover - is recognised. RELATED ARTICLES Previous | Next Want a nanny as perfect as Kate's? Steal one from your best... Boarding schools told to introduce gender-neutral uniforms... Share this article Share The irony is that many of these children inevitably come from ultra-privileged backgrounds - and the schools they attended boasted beautiful historic buildings amid manicured playing fields. But according to psychoanalyst Professor Joy Schaverien, author of new book Boarding School Syndrome, youngsters sent away to exclusive schools can suffer mentally just as much as those from deprived backgrounds who spent their childhoods in care. 'These schools were supposed to be the making of them, but they could also be the breaking of them,' says Professor Schaverien. 'It was a form of child neglect that became traditional in this country.' Until she started therapy in her 50s, Margaret says she found it difficult to trust anyone close to her. After 20 years working with and interviewing former boarders as part of her research, Professor Schaverien has identified a cluster of symptoms triggered by the trauma of being sent away. They include a tendency to depression, anger and anxiety, a failure to sustain relationships, a fear of abandonment and substance abuse. The younger the child was sent away, the more profound the damage. In the kitchen of her Oxford home, Professor Okely has a rather telling fridge magnet. It lists some of the rules of Alcatraz, the legendary high-security prison she visited in San Francisco. It says: 'Loud talking, shouting, singing or any other unnecessary noises are not permitted.' At Alcatraz, says Judith, inmates were entitled to food, clothing, shelter and medical attention - but anything else was a privilege. And that, she says, is very much how it was during the nine years she spent in the Fifties boarding at Upper Chine School for Girls. I realised what I had been deprived of - my parents, my friends, my room, my pets, my teddy bear. I stood there and cried the first tears I ever shed for myself 'Like Alcatraz, we were all captive on an island so there was no point trying to escape. Like jail, every waking moment was governed by rules, only the rules were stricter.' But unlike prison or Borstal, we were told we were there because our parents loved us.' And she adds: 'The dorms were like cells. We had metal beds and a tiny side table. You were allowed two ornaments, perhaps a picture from home, and maybe one toy. 'At dinner, when you weren't eating, your hands had to rest in your lap. If you were seen resting them on the table, you would get a quick slap. 'In the rest period after lunch, the matron forbade us from lying on our backs with our legs up because of what she saw as sexual overtones. But we didn't even know what sex was,' says Judith, whose school was later merged with a boys' school and renamed. 'Later my mother said: 'Why didn't you tell me how dreadful it was?' But as children, we didn't know any different. 'It wasn't even a good education. The only books I ever read were under the sheets with a torch. Girls back then were raised to go to finishing schools and marry the right man. When I said I wanted to go to university, I was told I couldn't.' Like most children sent to boarding school, Margaret (pictured here aged five) found the moment she was left at the school the most traumatic of all. 'I was left on the pavement crying as my mother drove off,' she recalls. For many boarding school pupils, says Professor Schaverien, the most traumatic moment was when they first realised their parents were leaving them there. Until the Eighties, when sending children away to school began to fall out of fashion, the most common age for starting prep school was only eight. Professor Schaverien says: 'Many remember being left on the doorstep and then realising that the wheels of their parents' cars were moving and they were being left behind. It's then that reality dawned on them - often with traumatic after-effects. 'Sending a child away at a young age is a huge rupture in its attachment to its parents. From then on, they have to live without love. They have to develop a false self that cannot show their emotions, in order to survive. They then carry that false self throughout life.' For former physiotherapist Margaret Laughton, the protective shell she developed to get through school led her to appear 'competent and confident' on the outside - even though she was enormously fragile underneath. Until she started therapy in her 50s, she found it difficult to trust anyone in close emotional relationships. 'I was 70 before I organised a birthday party for myself because, having been at boarding school, I didn't trust anyone to turn up,' she says. 'After all, if your own parents didn't want you, why would anyone else want to be around you?' Margaret says that going to a boarding school at the age of eight made her develop a protective shell. Margaret Laughton, 79, pictured here aged nine in 1946 during her first term at boarding school. Even at 78, Margaret is still haunted by the memory of her first day at a school in the Midlands, which she declines to name. She was nine years old. 'I was raised in India and a year after we got back, my mother took me for an entrance exam to the school and I was accepted on the spot. I was taken to the uniform shop and then delivered to a private boarding house as there was no room to sleep at the school. 'I was left on the pavement crying as my mother drove off.' It was when Margaret, from South London, had her own four children that she understood the lasting effects of the trauma. 'When my eldest daughter got to the age of nine, I went into her bedroom to kiss her goodnight. I saw her comfy bed, her hair spread across the pillow and her arms wrapped around her teddy bear. 'It hit me that this was exactly the age I had been sent away, but without toys, as I was told they might get lost. At that moment I realised what I had been deprived of - my parents, my friends, my room, my pets, my teddy bear. I stood there and cried the first tears I ever shed for myself.' The sexual abuse that many boys suffered at boarding schools is now widely recognised - but some claim it was simply part of a far wider pattern of emotional and physical cruelty. James Taylor was sent away to a school at eight because his father, an ex-boarder, assumed his son would get the best possible education. At 49, James says he still does not sleep well because, from the age of 11, he was fetched by a teacher from his bed at night to be 'disciplined' - in fact, abused. Margaret, 79, only realised how damaging her boarding school experience had been when she had children of her own. The absolute rule of silence after lights out meant when he was returned to the dormitory, he dared not breathe a word. 'We were too frightened to speak out,' says James, who does not want to name the school for legal reasons. 'And, in any case, in those days none of us thought we would be believed.' Yet casual cruelty by both teachers and boys was part of everyday life. 'I saw a boy who was sick in his rice pudding being forced to eat it,' says James. 'I saw boys who wet their beds, who were then made more miserable by other boys who attacked them for it. 'All this was seen as 'collateral damage', an unfortunate but necessary part of the process of turning boys into men who would one day rule the world. 'There are the winners in this system, like the Prime Minister David Cameron, who boarded at Eton, but one size does not fit all.' Margaret, pictured aged 10 in 1947, when she was sent home during the school holidays. Simon Partridge, 68, compares the school to which he was sent at seven with 'polite prison'. The beauty of the buildings at Boarzell Prep in Sussex belied the 'terrible emotional desert' inside. 'Going to school at that age was not presented as a choice. You were raised to be a brave little man and not to complain,' he says. 'It was an awful double tragedy. When I spoke to my mother about it in my 20s, she told me that when she got into the car to drive away, she burst into floods of tears.' For Simon, a widower, his days at boarding school came at a high personal cost. He was unable to settle on a career and had trouble forming lasting relationships. 'I never said 'I love you' in a heartfelt way.' For Simon, the turning point came in his mid 50s when his step-grandson, Josh, then three, turned to him one day in the car and told Simon he loved him. 'Tears were rolling down my cheeks. At that moment, I realised I couldn't do the stiff upper lip any more. It was time to tell Josh I loved him, too. 'It unblocked me. It struck me as terrible that children of seven could be sent away to a world where there was no physical contact, not even a hug when you felt ill.' Although the worst of this emotional brutality took place in the past, for some children boarding is still a trial to be endured. Margaret, centre, graduated from nursing school at the age of 19 in 1956. Margaret, pictured in 1954 at the age of 17, had just started nursing school in Birmingham. One in 200 children in the UK is a boarder - there are 70,000 in total - and for the first time after years of declining numbers, according to the Boarding Schools Association, the number of young children being sent away at the age of seven is rising. In a globalised economy, high-flying careers increasingly require parents to move overseas. Of course, there are children who do well out of boarding. Those who go at an older age, like 13, or who make the choice to go themselves, or find there is more stability at school than there is at home, are more likely to benefit, say Professor Schaverien. But, she insists, in most cases young children should be with their parents. 'Children need to be brought up in the company of people who love them,' she says. Simon Partridge is now training to be a youth counsellor. And he says: 'If you were devising a system to emotionally cripple people, sending children away at the age of seven would be it. 'I feel I have lost an awful lot of my life to this. The reality is that the trauma at the privileged end of society is not so different from the trauma at the more deprived end. 'The difference is that if you went to boarding school, you grew up believing you had no right to complain.' Advice about whether boarding school is right for your child. Tanith Carey is author of Taming the Tiger Parent, published by Constable at £8.99. Boarding School Syndrome by Professor Joy Schaverien is published by Routledge, at £27.99. Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-3171351/Scarred-boarding-school-ve-read-boys-horribly-abused-prep-school-meet-women-say-emotional-cruelty-left-traumatised.html#ixzz3gxDec6NC> Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

State investigation: Hutto group home had numerous violations By David Barer Published: July 23, 2015, 4:23 pm Updated: July 23, 2015, 7:23 pm 5Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) 5Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) Related Coverage State shuts down Hutto group home Concern with group home after man pounds on doors in middle of night HUTTO, Texas (KXAN) — A state investigation into a group home formerly operated by Hutto City Councilman Michael Smith shows the business was "out of compliance" on numerous items before it closed. Investigators with the Texas Department of Aging and Disabilities found 16 new items of non-compliance at A Step Beyond LLC related to service delivery, quality assurance, restraint and rights of individuals, according to the review. KXAN obtained a copy of the investigation Thursday. Smith told KXAN he was away from the business from April to November of 2014, which is when nearly all of the violations noted in the review occurred. Smith also said he believes DADS made an example of his small business. "I 100 percent disagree with the violations. I disagree with the procedure in which this was conducted. We were not given a change to appeal," Smith said. "DADS refused to look at the evidence showing that a majority of these [problems] had been rectified or were in the process of being rectified." Hutto Mayor Pro-tem Michael Smith The state ended its contract with the group home in June, after it found multiple violations, DADS Spokeswoman Cecilia Cavuto said last month. Smith said A Step Beyond and its sister business Beyond the Limits have both closed, and he is not currently operating any similar businesses. According to the investigation, the group home was "out of compliance" on 16 different items including a discrepancy in client medication and inadequate supervision of a client. The investigation also found late reporting of "critical incident data" and missed medical appointments ordered by physicians. Most of those violations occurred during the timeframe Smith said he was absent from the business. The report also notes medication may not have been administered properly to a person called "consumer #1." That same person was "arrested Aug. 4, 2014, for stabbing a group home staff member," the review states. Smith said he couldn't comment on the stabbing because he was not working at the business during that time period. Hutto voters first elected Smith to the Hutto City Council in 2009. He is currently mayor pro tem of the city. In state tax reports that Smith filed, he reported himself as CEO of A Step Beyond Inc. for report years 2012, 2013 and 2014. Smith said that while he was away from A Step Beyond in 2014, Sanh Moss was the CEO. Hutto police arrested Moss for suspicion of driving while intoxicated and possession of a controlled substance—four grams of amphetamine pills—according to a police report filed in May. Police said Moss admitted to taking two Lorazepam pills she stole from consumers at the group home. Smith said Moss at first "falsified the extent to which the DWI had occurred." Once he collaborated with law enforcement and found out the extent of Sanh's DWI, "all ties were cut with her," he said Source: <http://kxan.com/2015/07/23/state-investigation-hutto-group-home-had-numerous-violations/>

Foster care failures can't continue Source: http://www.meridianstar.com/opinion/foster-care-failures-can-t-continue/article_2286a83e-30ea-11e5-808e-8baf31351a03.html Story Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Thursday, July 23, 2015 4:00 am Foster care failures can't continue Eleven years ago, a child advocacy group filed a lawsuit against the state of Mississippi on behalf of eight children in the state's child foster care system. Among the plaintiffs was a girl identified in court documents only as Olivia Y. According to the website for the organization that filed the lawsuit, New York based Children's Rights, Olivia was removed from her home at the age of 3 and was so severely neglected that she only weighed 22 pounds. "During her first three months in custody, Olivia was moved between five placements, including one home where a convicted rapist was residing," the website states. According to the lawsuit, the state Division of Family and Children's Services failed to provide Olivia and the other children with necessary medical assessments and health care. Eleven years later, the state has yet to meet minimum requirements mandated under two court-ordered settlements that were a result of the lawsuit. The plaintiffs are now asking that the state work with consultants who will recommend changes, including the possibility of taking the state's child welfare unit out from under the wing of the Department of Human Services, the Associated Press reports. A progress report issued by a court monitor in 2014 found that foster care conditions had improved in some areas, but was still floundering in others. According to the report, the state failed to collect accurate data, showed little progress in some regions and in only 36 percent of the cases were investigations launched within 24 hours of an abuse allegation and completed with supervisory approval in 30 days. The court monitor found the system was plagued by staffing shortages and that in-home visits were not being conducted as often as required and that some children were not being put under licensed foster care.

New lawsuit addresses 'irreparable' harm in foster care system Brian Josephs | 7/23/2015, 10:19 a.m. Tish James Last Wednesday afternoon, Public Advocate Letitia James confirmed what many have been suspecting for years: Children are being abused and neglected in the New York City's foster care system. With hopes of combating the issue, James announced she's filing a class-action suit against the New York City Administration for Children's Services and the New York State Office of Children and Family Services. James made the declaration in front of a small crowd of reporters, protesters and parents desperate to retrieve their children from the foster system's grasp. "These children do not vote. These children do not have high-paid lobbyists," James said. "They do not have high-paid lawyers. They're often left voiceless, defenseless against a bureaucracy that seems to have no will or incentive to help them." Although a concrete end goal was still nebulous by the end of the speech, what wasn't was the scope of the trappings of the foster care system, especially in New York. Conclusions drawn from the firsthand accounts of a foster care hotline showed that 56 percent of respondents noted that a child was emotionally or psychologically harmed while in foster care, and 31 percent reported physical harm. New York also ranks No. 46 of 48 jurisdictions in the to rate of abuse and neglect of children in foster care, according to a report released by the public advocate's office. ACS, which represents more than 11,000 children, refuted the report, saying that it relies on only 77 interviews—a fraction of a percent of the total number of children in the system—and that the agency is investing in improving child welfare practices. "The de Blasio administration is deeply invested in improving the lives of vulnerable children and working very closely with many partners to improve our foster care placement system," said ACS Press Secretary Christopher McKniff in a response statement. "We are committed to working with our partners throughout the system—the courts, attorneys, advocates, providers, parents and children—to ensure we continue to improve outcomes for families who are involved in the child welfare system." The synecdochical nature of the suit also extends to the plaintiffs: James is listed alongside 10 children who are listed under pseudonyms to protect their identities. Among them is Ana-Maria R., a 4-year-old who watched as her sister Olivia was sexually abused. Tyrone M. was separated from his mother when he was just 12 days old, and as a result of neglect, he's a 7-year-old who's forced to sleep in his clothes every night because he was never taught to change into his pajamas. A poster board listing some of the children stood beside James as she explained the stories. As if to bring a visceral resonance, the names and details were listed in red and white ink against a black background. "Children who're in foster care, all they know is foster care," James said. "And all they know is harm and pain." The case will, in all likelihood, take months to resolve, and other parents beyond the 10 have lost their children to ACS's practices. One of them is D.C. Levers, a journalist who's been trying to get her daughter Josee back for three years. The two were originally separated when Josee was 3 because of a "messy home" complaint. New lawsuit addresses 'irreparable' harm in foster care system Source: <http://amsterdammnews.com/news/2015/jul/23/new-lawsUIT-addresses-irreparable-harm-foster-care/>

WAREHOUSING OUR CHILDREN South Carolina laws hide child abuse inside group homes By Lauren Sausser on Jul 23, 2015 Email @laurenmsausser Paul Zoeller/Staff An untold number of foster children in South Carolina custody are neglected, drugged, beaten and molested in group homes and institutions where the state warehouses them for millions of dollars a year at taxpayer expense. Read the Series Part I: Warehousing our Children: How South Carolina laws hide child abuse inside group homes Part II: Brother repeatedly rapes sister, blames DSS Part III: Group homes pull in millions every year from taxpayers Part IV: Eagle Harbor Ranch: A case study in confusion Part V: Advocates doubt plan to pull children out of institutions will work Part VI: Other states reduce dependence on group homes What's more, South Carolina keeps the abuse these children suffer secret by using state laws that shield group homes from almost any scrutiny. Court records shed light on some of the worst cases, but this state-sanctioned secrecy makes it impossible for the public to weigh the difference between well-run group homes and those that resemble a Dickensian orphanage. Even parents who reluctantly send their children to these facilities for treatment can't figure out how to keep them safe behind closed doors. When Jessica Freeman placed her daughter in Springbrook Behavioral Health last year, she had no idea the state had investigated the Greenville County home 95 times since 2000 for possible abuse and neglect — more than almost any other residential treatment facility in South Carolina. That's because the state Department of Social Services doesn't make the few records that are public readily accessible. Freeman pulled her daughter from the facility last fall after a therapist told her that several Springbrook staff members had beaten an autistic child in an incident caught on a security camera. "That's ridiculous," Freeman said. "You can report a bad hamburger easier than you can report someone abusing your child." Springbrook administrator Mike Rowley would not discuss any specific case, but said most allegations made against the facility are cleared by the Department of Social Services. "If we have anything substantiated, those employees are immediately terminated," Rowley said. "We don't want them around other children." Charleston County School teacher Jeremy Wise teaches English literature to children at Windwood Farm. The group home for boys in Awendaw offers an on-site school for children in its care. Many of the children have been shuffled around several group homes and foster homes by the Department of Social Services. —Brad Nettles/Staff Two Springbrook employees have been fired for child abuse or neglect in the last three years, he said. Despite stories such as Freeman's, South Carolina continues to send its youngest foster children into group homes and institutions at a higher rate than any other state in the country, federal data shows. This trend persists even though a growing body of evidence points out that children should grow up with their own families or in foster homes. Related documents Children's Rights Lawsuit (PDF) Legislative Audit - DSS (PDF) Citizen Review Panels Findings (PDF) Annie E. Casey Report (PDF) That's why other states have reduced their reliance on group homes by expanding foster family programs or finding relatives for these children to live with. But South Carolina has largely resisted change, dumping tens of millions of dollars every year into privately-run group homes for no other reason than that's how this state has always done it, some experts say. "I can say, having done this work for 15 years nationally, that South Carolina is possibly the worst I've ever seen on that front," said Ira Lustbader, the litigation director for Children's Rights, a New York advocacy group. More than 100 group homes and institutions are scattered across the state, ranging from rural farms to sophisticated psychiatric compounds. At any given time, they house about a quarter of South Carolina's 4,000 foster children. While group-home supporters acknowledge that some problems persist within the industry, they insist these facilities provide desperately needed services for troubled children who aren't suited for normal homes and have nowhere else to live. But even Susan Alford, named the new Department of Social Services director late last year, finds South Carolina's numbers problematic. "Our rate is too high," Alford said. "We put too many children — especially in the 0 to 12 (age) range — we put too many of them in group homes. Our aim would be to try to decrease that number." Troubling findings South Carolina isn't the only state faced with these problems. Published reports across the country detail a litany of horror stories in which children and teenagers in group homes have been overmedicated for mild behavioral issues, raped by their peers and lured into prostitution while their temporary guardians aren't watching. But many other states are moving away from this model. Meanwhile, South Carolina continues shoveling hundreds of children a year into a system rife with complaints and concerns. The Post and Courier reviewed lawsuits, visited group homes, filed open records requests and interviewed dozens of state leaders, child welfare experts, parents and former foster children for this series. Among other things, the newspaper's investigation found: - Nearly a quarter of the children under 13 years old who entered the foster care system in 2013 were placed in group homes and institutions in South Carolina — by far the highest placement rate for this age group in the United States. By comparison, only 2 percent in Tennessee and 3 percent in North Carolina were placed in similar settings. The national average is 4 percent. - Some children live for months, even years, in group homes because South Carolina fails to recruit enough foster families and the state pays them so little to participate. Some foster parents are paid less than $13 a day to raise a child. - The South Carolina Department of Social Services spent $28.1 million in 2014 placing children in group homes — more than five times the amount the agency paid foster families. Group homes earn at least $86 per child per night. Deborah McKelvey, the executive director for Windwood Farm, checks on a room where visiting families can spend time with children in the facility's care. She said group homes provide a measure of security that foster families often can't offer, especially for children who may have trouble bonding in a new home. —Brad Nettles/Staff - The Department of Social Services reviews hundreds of allegations of child abuse and neglect in group homes, institutions, foster homes and day care facilities every year, yet the agency's team of 10 investigators rarely finds enough evidence to support those claims. The state has investigated 484 allegations of abuse and neglect in group homes and institutions in the past five years, but has only been able to find evidence to prove 44 cases. - South Carolina makes it easier to know which restaurants are infested with cockroaches than to pinpoint where children have been neglected, or worse, physically and sexually abused. - Court records allege children who disclose that they've been abused in group care — by adults and each other — are often ignored because state caseworkers are so overloaded that they don't have time to weigh the allegations. 'Dangerous deficiencies' In January, Children's Rights and the South Carolina Appleseed Legal Justice Center filed a federal lawsuit against South Carolina on behalf of 11 foster children who allegedly suffered from the Social Services agency's "dangerous deficiencies." The complaint contends children were abused, overmedicated, separated from their siblings, kept in solitary confinement, fed moldy bread — and the worst of it happened in group homes. One 16-year-old girl reported that children at the Jenkins Institute for Children in North Charleston hoarded food because they were "frequently deprived." The group home denied her medicine and feminine hygiene products, and she said a maintenance worker there asked her to take naked pictures of herself on a cellphone, according to the lawsuit. × Johanna Martin-Carrington, director of the Jenkins Institute for Children, said the allegations aren't true. "Children make those claims," she said. "But we know it didn't occur." The lawsuit also alleges that a teenager at Epworth Children's Home in Richland County was prescribed a "powerful psychotropic medication for the first time in his life." The drug is used to treat bipolar disorder, even though the child had never been diagnosed and hadn't received a mental health evaluation at the group home, the complaint contends. At Helping Hands, a group home in Aiken County, the lawsuit claims that a 9-year-old boy's toothbrush was smothered with feces. Epworth Children's Home and Helping Hands did not respond to messages about the lawsuit. The original complaint also contends that several unnamed group home employees and state caseworkers did nothing when some children tried to report the abuse. One caseworker allegedly told a child, "She had a lot of children on her caseload and so was limited in what she could do to help her," the lawsuit stated. Paula Fendley is the executive director for the Palmetto Association for Children and Families, an organization that represents many group homes in South Carolina. She said similar cases filed by Children's Rights in other states have been settled before trial. "You can allege anything in a lawsuit, but you have to be able to prove it," Fendley said. "If these things are, in fact, true, then I guess all of that will come out in the court." Windwood Farm, established in 1985, is a combined "Level 3" group home and psychiatric residential treatment facility for boys in Awendaw. It is one of more than 100 group homes and institutions across the state that accepts foster children from the Department of Social Services. A smaller number of children staying in the residential treatment facility here are called "private placements." Their own parents retain custody, but have decided they need intense, out-of-home care for behavioral health issues, such as autism or bipolar disorder. —Brad Nettles/Staff Alford and Gov. Nikki Haley, both named defendants in the lawsuit, agreed to participate in early court mediation, public records show. What are group homes, institutions? According to the South Carolina Department of Social Services, "group or congregate care is designed to meet the needs of children/youth who are unable to live at home or in a foster family and require temporary care in a group setting." Some of these facilities, often called "children's homes," are vestiges of old orphanages and they provide a variety of different services. For example, "Level 3" group homes offer behavioral health treatment for children, while "Level 1" group homes generally keep children without any mental health diagnoses. Most children in group homes in South Carolina have been placed there by the Department of Social Services as part of the foster system. Institutions, such as psychiatric residential treatment facilities, are designed to offer an even higher level of care for children with more severe behavioral health needs. Some children in group homes and institutions are considered "private placements." Their parents retain legal custody, but have decided to place them in these facilities for treatment. Haley's office directed questions about the lawsuit to the Department of Social Services. Alford would not discuss the pending litigation. "Those are things that I just can't talk about," she said. Funding foster families The federal lawsuit hinges on the widely-accepted premise that social services caseworkers in South Carolina are overwhelmed with work. They don't have time to keep track of all the children that they're charged to protect. A Legislative Audit Council report published last year shows more than 30 percent of caseworkers statewide were each assigned at least 50 children to monitor, and a few were assigned more than 75. The Child Welfare League of America, a national advocacy group, recommends each caseworker manage no more than 17 families per month. The Legislative Audit Council report and a string of child deaths prompted Statehouse hearings and calls to reform the child welfare agency. Former DSS Director Lillian Koller, who tried to scale back the number of foster children in group homes, resigned under pressure last year. Still, the General Assembly has failed to pass any sort of major legislation to reform the Department of Social Services. "It's not something that legislators get excited about because there's no glory in this," said Sen. Katrina Shealy, R-Lexington, a member of the Senate DSS Oversight Committee. "I know that everybody wants to talk about roads and jobs, and we do need to talk about those things and those are important, but if we don't save our children, we don't need our roads." Appleseed Legal Justice Center Director Sue Berkowitz said the Legislature needs to broaden its probe into the state agency because child deaths aren't the only problem it faces. "There's so much more going on," she said. "What hasn't been focused on is what's happening to our kids once they go into the system." Data provided by the Department of Social Services shows about a quarter of the 4,000 foster children in South Carolina lived in a group home, an emergency shelter or an institution on April 1. Experts, including the Department of Social Services director, say that's too many. "The goal in child welfare is for you, as much as possible, to keep kids in families," Alford said. "If you can't keep them with their biological family or put them in kinship care, then you're looking at foster care as the next best alternative. That should be your first priority." Susan Alford, the new Department of Social Services director, said she's focusing on foster children's safety and well-being. She also wants to find permanent living situations for them. She admitted that DSS places too many children under 13 years old in group homes. —Paul Zoeller/Staff A national report published by the Baltimore-based Annie E. Casey Foundation this year said group homes aren't designed to offer the "individualized nurturing" that children need. "In many cases, a child ends up living in a group placement simply because an agency has not found an appropriate facility," the report's authors wrote. On May 1, 2,310 foster homes were licensed to accept children in South Carolina — too few for the nearly 4,000 children in the system. But the child welfare agency can't recruit enough families, partly because they're paid so little to participate. Foster parents only make between $12.77 and $17.27 per child per night — no more than $6,303 a year to clothe, feed and care for a child. In response to a public records request filed by The Post and Courier, the Department of Social Services said it spent $28.1 million in the 2014 fiscal year to house children in group homes and institutions, but only $5.5 million on foster families. Critics argue it makes no sense that the state spends more than five times the amount of money to house less than a quarter of all foster children in group homes because many of them shouldn't be there in the first place. "It's bad for kids, but it's also a total waste of taxpayer money," said Lustbader, of New York's Children's Rights. "That's the part that doesn't get as much attention as it deserves." Some group facilities for children earn additional income from other agencies. The state Medicaid agency, for example, spent $23 million during the 2015 fiscal year on South Carolina children in psychiatric residential treatment facilities, which offer the highest level of care. Most "Level 3" group homes — a step down from residential treatment facilities — pull in $151 per child per night, or more than $50,000 per child per year. "Level 1" and "Level 2" group homes largely accept children without any psychological problems and earn either $86 or $98 per child per night. Meanwhile, a 2012 national report shows only five states paid foster families lower rates than South Carolina. Even some group-home advocates acknowledge these foster family payments aren't sufficient. "It's less than you would pay to board your dog," said Deborah McKelvey, the executive director of Windwood Farm, a combined "Level 3" group home and psychiatric residential treatment facility for boys in Awendaw. South Carolina needs more foster families, she argued, but some group homes offer children a measure of security that a traditional family can't provide. "I know the national picture says children under 12 shouldn't live in a group setting," she said. "I say children under 12 frequently are too afraid to bond with a family. They feel safer in a group setting where they know somebody is awake 24 hours a day watching their back." Children eat family-style meals together at Windwood Farm, she said. They go to the beach. Windwood almost resembles summer camp, complete with an obstacle course, ponds for swimming and fishing, and a fitness trail, she said. Rooms inside Windwood Farm in Awendaw look like a normal home. Staff at this group home for boys organize family meals. They take children on beach trips and to community events. They also remind them to brush, floss, wash and flush with these wall decals. —Brad Nettles/Staff Jody Tamsberg, chairman of the Windwood Farm board of directors, said that even though South Carolina agencies pay Windwood significantly more than foster families to care for children in state custody, those payments don't cover its bills. The nonprofit group home still must raise at least $500,000 a year to break even, he said. "I love good foster families and there are lots of them, but even the good ones, they can't take a kid that's been abused, that's on eight medications, that's totally out of control," Tamsberg said. "There's got to be a place where they can come, stabilize, be safe and have skilled professionals — nurses and doctors — tend to them." Brendin and Faith Brendin Cecere and his mom, Faith Rice, moved out of their Summerville house right before Thanksgiving three years ago following a physical fight between Rice and her ex-husband. The ordeal was particularly traumatic for Brendin, who is diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder. "Brendin's whole world that he knew was done. Everything that was familiar — his routine, his home, his neighborhood — everything that he was familiar with, with the exception of school, was out of sorts for him," Rice said. "By January, he pretty much broke down." Brendin, now 13 years old, threatened his mom with a knife. He hurt the dogs. He threatened to hurt himself, too. "At that point, there wasn't anything more I could do but place him in a facility," Rice said. "As much as it killed me, there was nothing more I could do." Brendin spent nine months at Three Rivers Behavioral Health, a psychiatric residential treatment facility near Columbia, and more than a year at Willowglen Academy, a similar facility in Kingstree. Rice believes he was abused at both homes. At Three Rivers, Brendin's arms and chest were bruised, he told her, by a nurse who hit children with an open hand. At Willowglen Academy, Brendin said a staff member broke his arm. The Department of Social Services investigated Brendin's allegations at Willowglen Academy but determined his claims were not credible, Rice said. The group home told Rice that he fell out of a window and that children with behavioral issues or special needs like Brendin tend to embellish the truth. "I said, 'What about these other kids that can't defend themselves, who are not verbally expressive like my son?'" Rice said. She couldn't even get a copy of the official 11-page state investigation into Brendin's injury, she said. A Department of Social Services supervisor in Williamsburg County told her the document was protected by state law because the case was determined "unfounded." Three Rivers Behavioral Health and Willowglen Academy, both owned by out-of-state, for-profit corporations, did not respond to questions about Brendin. Children staying at Windwood Farm in Awendaw share rooms. The bigger rooms house up to four children at one time. Around-the-clock staff members monitor bedrooms at night to ensure that the boys are safe. —Brad Nettles/Staff The Department of Social Services opened 100 investigations into alleged abuse and neglect at multiple Willowglen Academy facilities and 97 investigations at Three Rivers since 2000, but the agency would not tell The Post and Courier how many of these allegations it could prove. Brendin left Willowglen Academy late last year to live with his grandparents in Simpsonville. Rice, who was recently diagnosed with cancer, didn't feel safe choosing another group home. She's still trying to figure out what really happened last fall. "I spoke to the SLED (State Law Enforcement Division) department. I spoke to Nikki Haley's office, who bounced me to Lindsey Graham's office," she said. "Both offices told me they are not able to handle cases like this." 'Looking for loopholes' The South Carolina Department of Social Services receives hundreds of reports alleging abuse and neglect in foster homes, institutions, group homes and day care centers every year. But 10 years of DSS data shows the department rarely finds sufficient evidence to prove that a child has been abused in one of these "out-of-home" settings. In 2010, for example, the department investigated 132 reports of abuse in group homes and institutions, but found enough evidence to prove only six cases. In theory, some cases were handed to local law enforcement agencies for investigation. But the Department of Social Services would not tell The Post and Courier how many abuse reports were handled by police or which agencies were involved. Four years ago, this prompted some child advocates in South Carolina to question if these reports were always properly investigated. They wanted to know why the number of "founded" cases was so low. The South Carolina Citizen Review Panels, three independent groups set up to evaluate child protective services, were particularly worried by a report that boys in a group home were sexually abusing each other as an initiation ritual. At the time, Social Services explained that the incident was not "indicated," or proven, by its Out-of-Home Abuse and Neglect division because child-on-child abuse is not specifically addressed in state law. "They were looking for loopholes so they don't have responsibility. That's just crazy," said Donna Xenakis, a former chairwoman of the Lowcountry Citizen Review Panel. Only 13 reports of abuse in group homes and institutions were determined "indicated" or "founded" last year. A team of 10 investigators at the Department of Social Services examined fewer than half of all reports filed in the 2014 fiscal year for out-of-home abuse and neglect. Some of the reports were "screened out," the agency explained, because they did not meet the "statutory criteria" to warrant an investigation. 'Never going to change' Jessica Freeman's adopted daughters Jaylin and Olivia were discovered bound together with a bungee-cord in their Tennessee home before they were taken into state custody more than 10 years ago. "Jaylin came to me at 5 years old. She weighed 22 pounds and had STDs," Freeman said. Charleston County School district educators teach some of the children staying at Windwood Farm in a red school house built on the Awendaw property. Other children who live at this group home attend regular, community schools. —Brad Nettles/Staff Olivia, 4 years old at the time, weighed 23 pounds and also was sexually abused. "They didn't talk," she said. "They weren't potty-trained." The girls, now teenagers, require out-of-home treatment in group facilities in North Carolina. "Both of my girls are going to need care like this for the rest of their life," Freeman said. "It's overwhelming, as a mom, because you want to protect them and you want to keep them safe and you reach a point when you can't do that anymore." Last year, Jaylin lived at Springbrook Behavioral Health in Upstate South Carolina until her therapist told Freeman that staff members beat an autistic child in front of other children in the gymnasium. "The reason why this stuff continues is because the children don't have a voice to speak up," Freeman said. "I think as long as people are quiet it's not going to get any better." Mike Rowley, the administrator for Springbrook, said the facility takes every allegation seriously and self-reports any suspected child abuse case to the South Carolina Department of Social Services. "I don't think there's anything we do that should be secretive," Rowley said. "It's a great place for kids." The Department of Social Services denied an open records request filed by The Post and Courier to review any "Out-of-Home" abuse reports, even reports that determined abuse allegations in the group homes were valid. State law exempts these documents from disclosure, the agency's lawyer said. "Confidentiality is such a big thing in child welfare," Alford said. "By statute, a lot of what we do is not considered to be public knowledge. That's one barrier. I think the department is trying to be a lot more transparent." Alford acknowledged that potential child abuse in these facilities keeps her up at night. "We have to be concerned with their safety all the time," Alford said. "We're legally responsible for that by statute. We're morally responsible for it. Of course it concerns me." Berkowitz, the Applesseed Legal Justice Center director, said the Department of Social Services needs to admit its problems before the agency can solve them. She doesn't trust the department's own data. "These are our poorest kids, our most vulnerable kids," Berkowitz said. "I have heard so many people over the years and seen so many reports. 'We're going to fix this. We're going to fix that.' And I just think unless there is some structure that will require this to happen it's never going to change." Reach Lauren Sausser at 937-5598. WAREHOUSING OUR CHILDREN South Carolina laws hide child abuse inside group homes Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20150723/PC16/150709453>

Other states reduce dependence on group homes Lauren Sausser Email @laurenmsausser Jul 23 2015 6:00 pm About twenty two percent of South Carolina's children in state custody live in a group setting — much higher than the national average of 14 percent. The bedrooms at Eagle Harbor Ranch, located in rural Berkeley County, house two clients to a room. Brad Nettles/Staff  Five years ago, some of the problems plaguing Connecticut's Department of Children and Families could have been ripped right from South Carolina's playbook. Children were dying. Caseworkers were overloaded. Foster families were in short supply. The agency perpetually resisted change, despite a class action lawsuit settlement that required sweeping reform. RELATED DOCUMENTS The Connecticut Turnaround (PDF) Tennessee Group Homes Report (PDF) The Connecticut department's most "urgent focus" was the high number of children in group homes, according to a report published earlier this year by the Annie E. Casey Foundation called "The Connecticut Turnaround." Gov. Dan Malloy, a Democrat elected to Connecticut's highest office in 2010, wanted to decrease the number of children in group settings and increase family placements — and he appointed a new commissioner to the Department of Children and Families to make it happen. "From the get go, I remember them appearing on the local NPR station, speaking specifically, in a focused way, about those twin goals," said Gary Kleeblatt, a spokesman for the Connecticut Department of Children and Families. "That was at the top of their agenda." On Jan. 1, 2011, about a third of the 4,780 children in Connecticut's custody lived in group homes. In fact, more than 350 of those children lived in out-of-state group homes because Connecticut had run out of available beds. Four years later, those numbers have been cut in half. Now, fewer than 16 percent of children in state custody in Connecticut live in a group home. In South Carolina, about 22 percent of children in state custody live in a group setting — much higher than the national average of 14 percent. Federal data shows South Carolina places about a quarter of its youngest foster children — those below 13 years old — into group homes and institutions when they enter the system. The national average for this age group is only 4 percent. South Carolina's placement rate for these children is the highest in the country. "We know kids do better with families," said Kristina Stevens, administrator of clinical services for the Connecticut Department of Children and Families. "The research is abundantly clear." Making the change in Connecticut wasn't easy, she said. "You'd like to flip a switch and do it all at one time, but you can't." First, the department focused on reconnecting the youngest children in state custody with relatives or friends. More than 30 percent of children in state custody in Connecticut now live with relatives or close kin, compared to 21 percent four years ago. This shift automatically lowered the number of children in group homes and it also reduced the total number of children in state custody. Read the Series Part I: Warehousing our children: How South Carolina laws hide child abuse inside group homes Part II: Brother repeatedly rapes sister, blames DSS Part III: Group homes pull in millions every year from taxpayers Part IV: Eagle Harbor Ranch: A case study in confusion Part V: Advocates doubt plan to pull children out of institutions will work Part VI: Other states reduce dependence on group homes "These are two trends that go hand in hand," Stevens said. "I don't think you can stress enough how interrelated those things are." Also, by reducing the amount Connecticut spent on group homes, the state was able to reinvest some money into "community-based services" that allow children to live at home or with relatives. Those services include in-home or in-school therapy sessions. Kleeblatt said Connecticut will spend an estimated $129 million on group homes during the 2015 fiscal year, about $63 million less than the state spent four years ago. Connecticut isn't the only state that recently made progress on this front. Tennessee also drastically reduced the number of children living in group homes. In 2000, 28 percent of children entering the Tennessee foster care system were placed into one of these facilities. Now, more than 90 percent live in family settings. Children's Rights, a national advocacy group, forced the Tennessee and Connecticut child welfare systems to make these changes by filing separate class action lawsuits against the states. In January, Children's Rights filed a federal lawsuit against South Carolina on behalf of 11 foster care children. The South Carolina complaint cites federal data that shows South Carolina places its youngest foster children in group homes and institutions at a higher rate than any other state in the country. Ira Lustbader, the litigation director of Children's Rights, called both Tennessee and Connecticut success stories. "That takes a strong shift in priority to recognize that (group homes are) harming kids," Lustbader said. "South Carolina has just stubbornly not taken that on for whatever reason." Reach Lauren Sausser at 937-5598. Other states reduce dependence on group homes Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20150723/PC16/150709448/1177/other-states-reduce-dependence-on-group-homes>

Abuse allegations haunt lucrative group homes Lauren Sausser Email @laurenmsausser Jul 23 2015 6:00 pm Jul 24 11:17 am Enlarge John Roe, who said he was abused at Boys Home of the South in Belton, lives in Greenville now and filed a lawsuit against the group home and the Department of Social Services last year. Roe said he often visits Falls Park on the Reedy in downtown Greenville to fish and relax. Paul Zoeller/Staff John Roe, who said he was abused at Boys Home of the South in Belton, lives in Greenville now and filed a lawsuit against the group home and the Department of Social Services last year. Roe said he often visits Falls Park on the Reedy in downtown Greenville to fish and relax. × BELTON — The bucolic countryside surrounding Boys Home of the South belies the horror some children say they endured after state Social Services officials dumped them here. Even as state agencies gave the group home as much as $1.5 million a year, the Department of Social Services investigated the facility three dozen times for abuse and neglect allegations since 2000. RELATED DOCUMENTS John Roe Lawsuit (PDF - Warning: This document contains graphic language) The state won't reveal the outcome of these investigations, but children who lived at Boys Home of the South say they were tortured and raped by employees and their peers. A high-profile child sex abuse lawsuit forced this group home to close last year — the campus has since reopened as a Christian campground. But that was too late for John Roe, who says he was repeatedly molested by a Boys Home of the South worker more than a decade ago. Roe, now 23, asked that The Post and Courier conceal his real name by using the pseudonym he chose for a lawsuit filed last year against the group home and the Department of Social Services. He said he reported the attacks to another staffer and his assigned Department of Social Services caseworker, but they did nothing about the abuse. "I felt worthless that nobody would actually listen, that it wasn't taken seriously," Roe said. "Eventually, I gave up trying." The lawsuit that finally shut down Boys Home of the South made national news, but this was far from the only residential group home in South Carolina to profit handsomely off taxpayer dollars while the child welfare agency investigated the facility for maltreatment of children in its care. New Hope Carolinas, which operates a psychiatric treatment facility in Rock Hill, has been investigated for child abuse and neglect 119 times since 2000. Six other group homes and institutions have been investigated by Social Services at least 80 times in 15 years. All of them are still open, and the investigations remain sealed from the public. Meanwhile, tax records show that nonprofit group homes in South Carolina alone make more than $70 million a year — largely from lucrative state contracts and private donations. Enlarge Boys Home of the South, a group home in Belton, closed last year and has since been renovated into a Christian campground. Between 2000 and 2014, the Department of Social Services investigated 36 allegations of abuse and neglect at the facility. Raymond McCrea Jones/The New York Times Boys Home of the South, a group home in Belton, closed last year and has since been renovated into a Christian campground. Between 2000 and 2014, the Department of Social Services investigated 36 allegations of abuse and neglect at the facility. × Some experts maintain that group homes provide a valuable community resource, offering services for many children, particularly those who have been diagnosed with severe behavioral health issues and have nowhere else to live. Others, however, contend that the state's dependence on these homes has allowed the industry to rake in revenue while dodging accountability for the harm done to children on its watch. Camden attorney Robert Butcher represents several former foster children allegedly abused in state custody, including Roe. Butcher said group home directors keep quiet about the kind of abuse Roe says he suffered because they worry the child welfare agency will stop sending them new children — their main source of revenue. "They're making a killing on these kids," Butcher said. "They don't want to rock that boat." Furthermore, he thinks some state caseworkers downplay allegations made by children because investigating potential abuse takes time that they don't have and Social Services has nowhere else to place them. "They're in the business of selling children," he said. "Basically, they don't do their damn jobs." State officials and group home supporters say these facilities aren't a perfect fit for every child, but it's unfair to paint them all with the same brush. "I think there are really good foster homes and there are really good group homes. And there's really bad of both," said Danny Gilbert, who owns Eagle Harbor Ranch, a group home for boys in Berkeley County. "There are some people who are just collecting a check." 'Incredibly powerful' industry More than 7,000 group homes and orphanages for children across the country pull in about $8.8 billion a year and employ almost 130,000 people, according to an industry report published last year by IBISWorld, a national research firm. More than 67 percent of this money comes from government contributions and grants. Enlarge × In South Carolina, the Department of Social Services spent more than $28 million in the 2014 fiscal year placing almost a quarter of all foster children in more than 90 group homes across the state. Before Boys Home of the South closed in 2014, the Department of Social Services paid the group home nearly $3 million in five years, but other group homes typically make much more. The Connie Maxwell Children's Home in Greenwood made about $11 million in 2013 from several revenue sources, according to public tax records. Epworth Children's Home in Columbia made $6.8 million. Thornwell Home for Children in Clinton made $8 million. This group home and its related organizations, affiliated with the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), compensated its president $196,000 in 2013 — $90,000 more than Gov. Nikki Haley's salary. "There's a built-in source of waste that could be used to fund more supportive foster homes for these kids," said Ira Lustbader, the litigation director for Children's Rights, a national advocacy group. "Something is just way out of whack in South Carolina on this issue." Sue Berkowitz, executive director of the South Carolina Applesseed Legal Justice Center, said group homes make so much money because their interests are well represented by lobbyists and lawmakers. "It's no different than nursing homes. It's more humane and cheaper for us to have community, long-term care and to keep elderly and severely disabled people in their homes, yet the nursing home lobby is incredibly powerful," Berkowitz said. "Some of them have been just absolutely horrendous." Group homes are entitled to make money, she said, but children have been hurt and she doesn't think the state is doing enough to protect them. "We're not doing what we need to do up front to figure out who needs to go where and how they should be placed,” she said. ‘Demonizing DSS’ Some state leaders, including former Department of Social Services Director Lillian Koller, tried to reduce the number of children sent to live in group homes with limited success. Enlarge The grounds at Boys Home of the South, a former group home in Belton, have recently changed to a Christian campground. The group home for children closed in 2014 following a high-profile, child sex abuse lawsuit. (Raymond McCrea Jones/The New York Times) The grounds at Boys Home of the South, a former group home in Belton, have recently changed to a Christian campground. The group home for children closed in 2014 following a high-profile, child sex abuse lawsuit. (Raymond McCrea Jones/The New York Times) × In 2009 and 2010, a handful of these group homes in South Carolina closed, and others were forced to scale back operations. These closures illustrated a national trend. Similar facilities in other states also shut their doors as the number of children in foster care dropped across the country and as federal funding and private donations dwindled. Best practices indicated children were better off living with families anyway. Koller supported this shift away from group homes. Deborah McKelvey, the executive director of Windwood Farm in Awendaw, remembered Koller and her deputy director addressing group home employees at an industry meeting in 2011. “They said, ‘We don’t value what you provide any more. We don’t need you.’” McKelvey estimated more than 500 group home “beds” in South Carolina were lost over a five-year period. “Probably a couple of years ago, they really started making the push that they didn’t want kids in residential placements,” she said. “They used words like ‘languish’ — like (group homes) were torture chambers. They’re not.” Koller resigned last year amid political uproar that the agency was grossly mismanaged and that children were dying on her watch. Since then, some group homes in South Carolina have bounced back. McKelvey said Windwood is running at full capacity these days. “Now, an influx of kids are coming in,” she said. “Our phone does not stop ringing all day long.” All 15 group home beds at Windwood are filled with children in state custody. Enlarge Boys Home of the South was located on several acres in rural Belton until it closed last year. The former group home for children has faced more than one child sex abuse lawsuit. John Roe, 23, says he was raped many times by a Boys Home of the South staff member more than a decade ago. He tried to report the abuse, but Roe said no one would listen. (Raymond McCrea Jones/The New York Times) Boys Home of the South was located on several acres in rural Belton until it closed last year. The former group home for children has faced more than one child sex abuse lawsuit. John Roe, 23, says he was raped many times by a Boys Home of the South staff member more than a decade ago. He tried to report the abuse, but Roe said no one would listen. (Raymond McCrea Jones/The New York Times) × “I hear and read enough horror stories to know that (group homes) are not all good,” McKelvey said. “But there’s certainly a place and a need for group homes, for residential care like we have here.” Paula Fendley, who represents many group homes in South Carolina as executive director of the Palmetto Association of Children and Families, said the whole Social Services agency needs reform. Group homes, which she estimates employ thousands of people in this state, aren’t the problem. “We need all kinds of levels of care,” Fendley said. “We need to stop demonizing DSS and stop demonizing providers and demonizing advocates and all figure out what we need to do, instead of just blaming everything on DSS.” ‘One size doesn’t fit all’ State lawmakers agreed with Fendley that the issue is nuanced. Sen. Tom Alexander, R-Walhalla, said South Carolina could use more foster families, but group homes should remain an important part of the mix. “I think what you’ve got to have is a variety of options for the Department (of Social Services),” said Alexander, a member of the state Senate committee that reviews Social Services funding every year. “One size doesn’t fit all.” The former Department of Social Services director didn’t see it that way, he said. “It was almost like we were trying to dismantle the (group) homes,” he said. “Obviously I’m a tremendous supporter of foster parents and foster homes, but in every situation that’s not what’s available.” A handful of small group homes in Alexander’s rural Upstate district make more than $5 million a year, tax records show. Some of them opened their doors decades ago and employ dozens of people in a region hit hard by the recent recession. Unemployment around Walhalla topped 14 percent a few years back. “I know (group) homes that we have in our area, they’re very loving, they’re faith-based,” he said. “Ultimately, we’ve got to do what’s best for the children ... I’m not interested in numbers and statistics driving what’s in their best interest.” Sen. Katrina Shealy, R-Lexington, a member of the Senate DSS Oversight Committee, said she wants to evaluate how the child welfare agency spends its money and where foster children should be sent, but she said overhauling Social Services may take several years. “I think what we did several years ago, we eliminated some of our good group homes,” Shealy said. She doesn’t want to watch that happen again. “This is not something we can solve in one six-month session.” ‘Really sad’ When the Department of Social Services finally moved John Roe out of Boys Home of the South in 2005, his new foster mom noticed he needed help. Read the Series Part I: Warehousing our children: How South Carolina laws hide child abuse inside group homes Part II: Brother repeatedly rapes sister, blames DSS Part III: Group homes pull in millions every year from taxpayers Part IV: Eagle Harbor Ranch: A case study in confusion Part V: Advocates doubt plan to pull children out of institutions will work Part VI: Other states reduce dependence on group homes Roe wore diapers. He couldn’t control his bowel movements. A doctor wrote down in his medical record that the scars on his urethra suggested he had been sexually abused. Abbeville attorney Heather Hite Stone, who also represents Roe, said he will likely need medical care and therapy for the rest of his life. “He doesn’t want this to ever happen to any other kids and I don’t either,” Stone said. “It’s just really sad.” But some child advocates say South Carolina isn’t trying hard enough to change the status quo. They believe reducing the amount of money this state spends on group homes would immediately free up funds to recruit more foster families, some of whom now earn less than $13 a day to raise children in state custody. Susan Alford, the new Department of Social Services director, said the agency needs to make it easier for potential foster families to sign up. She said internal data indicates for every 1,000 families who express interest in fostering children in South Carolina, only 300 of them make it through the months-long process. “One of the things we really want to do is get serious about foster care recruitment,” Alford said. “We do believe we need to have more foster homes for kids so they don’t have to go to group homes if we don’t think that’s the best treatment option for them.” Reach Lauren Sausser at 937-5598. Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20150723/PC16/150709450>

Man jailed 15 months for having sex with three girls from group home Waterloo Region Record By Gordon Paul KITCHENER — A Kitchener man was sent to jail for 15 months on Friday for having sexual intercourse with three underage girls who lived in a group home. Reinaldo Sepulveda, 22, had earlier pleaded guilty to three counts of sexual interference. Two of the girls were 13 years old; the other was 15. Sepulveda knew their ages. Although Sepulveda did not force himself on the girls, anyone younger than 16 can’t legally consent to sex. “They are group home members, they are young, they are vulnerable,” Crown prosecutor Cynthia Jennison said in asking for 18 to 21 months in jail. “Thirteen years of age is extremely young.” The offences happened at Sepulveda’s apartment — which Jennison called a “party house” — on Christmas Day in 2013, New Year’s Day in 2014 and Jan. 18, 2014. Jennison said the fact Sepulveda did not use condoms was “extremely aggravating.” Sepulveda was not “targeting” girls from the group home, defence lawyer Derek Johnson said. He said the girls sought out Sepulveda because he was a young man with an apartment. Johnson said it wasn’t a case of a “privileged” man exploiting disadvantaged girls. Sepulveda grew up in a Third World country and was raised without a father, he said. Sepulveda didn’t have to convince them to have sex, Johnson said. “They sought him out for that purpose.” The girls brought their own alcohol and marijuana, said Johnson, who asked for a 13-month sentence. “As sexual offences go ... there are not a lot of aggravating factors.” Justice John Lynch called it a difficult sentencing. He said the court must denounce the crime and deter others but noted that Sepulveda is a young man with no prior criminal record who holds down two full-time jobs to support his family. The judge noted that the girls pursued Sepulveda and he did not introduce them to sex. “These were not predatory circumstances,” Lynch said. “But the fact is they were children pursuing an adult. This was not consensual sex, nor could it be.” Lynch said Sepulveda tried to minimize his offences. “I hope he doesn’t see himself as the victim. Clearly they are and he is not.” The judge gave Sepulveda two years of probation, a 10-year weapons prohibition and banned him from working or volunteering in a position of trust with children under 16. He was also ordered to stay away from the victims and provide a sample for the national DNA database. Sepulveda’s mother broke into tears as her son was handcuffed and taken to jail. Source: <http://www.therecord.com/news-story/5750685-man-jailed-15-months-for-having-sex-with-three-girls-from-group-home/>

Foster Children Robbed of Identity July 25, 2015 Legislatively Speaking By Senator, Lena C. Taylor Lena C. Taylor Imagine turning 18 years-old; finally ready to take on your dreams as an independent young man or woman. At this age, you feel like you have reached a starting point in life’s journey and are bursting with potential. Now picture yourself as an 18 year-old aging out of foster care. Life has already dealt you a set of circumstances that have interrupted your childhood, separated you from your biological parents and in some cases, your entire natural family. You, alone, will now be responsible for your well being, housing, continued education, and economic future. But you are ready for the opportunity to create your own future. Then, once again, life throws you a curve and you are faced with a new challenge: identity fraud. WISN 12’s investigative reporter Colleen Henry reported on the story of two sisters, who were former foster children that discovered their identity had been stolen and personal credit ruined while in the state of Wisconsin’s care. The sisters would learn that while they were still minors and being cared for by foster parents, they already had a house, a car, credit cards, and a bankruptcy in listed in their name. In talking with a representative from the Wisconsin Department of Children and Families, I was told the following: “Children and youth in a court ordered out-of-home care (OHC) placement are particularly vulnerable to identity theft because their personal identifying information is frequently shared with multiple agencies and individuals, making it less protected and more readily accessible to identity thieves. Unfortunately, identity theft by parents, relatives and caregivers also occurs. The misuse of the child's identity may not be discovered until the youth exits the foster care system and applies for a cell phone, job, student loan or apartment. Long-term implications for youth include debt that was not created by them, credit score problems, difficulty obtaining credit, loans and apartment rental, as well as the potential for civil judgments against the youth for delinquent accounts." Identity theft impacts an estimated 15 million United States residents each year, with financial losses totaling upwards of $50 billion annually. Our country's most vulnerable demographic, children, have become a popular target for identity thefts. One in 40 families with children under 18 had at least one child whose personal information was compromised, according to a 2012 survey by the Identity Theft Assistance Center and the Javelin Strategy & Research group. The survey revealed that identity thieves most often steal children's Social Security numbers, since young children seldom have the credit histories acquired by adults, such as credit cards, bank accounts, licenses and financial statements. Foster children are particularly at risk. So much so, that the White House's Administration for Children and Families have created federal laws aimed at protecting kids from falling victim to identity thieves. Under current Federal law state child welfare agencies—in order to become eligible for federal grants—ensure that youth in foster care who are 16 and older receive a free copy of any credit reports annually. The law also requires that the agencies ensure that these youth get assistance in interpreting and resolving any inaccuracies in the reports. Although it appears many states have no formalized process to address this situation, Wisconsin's Department of Children and Families has begun to address the concerns raised by Colleen Henry and my office. Going beyond the federal law, Wisconsin currently has agreements with two of the three credit reporting agencies and is working on the third. We request credit reports twice a year, for all kids, not just those that are aged 16 and up. Remediation of fraudulent credit is a joint responsibility between Department of Children and Families and the county child welfare agencies. However, for anyone that has ever been the victim of identity theft, you know that it can take years to clear your credit report of fraudulent accounts. There is no obligation under the federal law to continue to work with aged out youth on credit remediation. So, there are no laws that exist to protect these individuals beyond the age of 18. That means a young man or woman, in the final days before becoming independent, could have their information stolen, their credit abused, and never get the help they need to recover. Understanding that good credit is vital for a successful transition from foster care to adulthood, I am committed to addressing additional remedies for children who have been entrusted to our care and further harmed while on our watch. I am working on legislation to protect our young men and women, who have been taken advantage of as a result of their circumstances that would allow them to receive continued assistance, in correcting their credit information, after they leave foster care and refer violators for prosecution on identity theft laws. It is unacceptable that these children would leave our care worse than when we received them. Source: <http://milwaukeejournal.com/index.php/2015/07/25/foster-children-robbed-of-identity/>

Senske: Breaking cycle of child abuse requires effort from all Posted: July 25, 2015 - 12:11am Photos By Kurt Senske The narrative around foster care in Texas usually centers on overloaded caseworkers, traumatized children and a flawed, underfunded state system. However, few of us wonder what we can do to improve the lives of Texas children in foster care. I challenge you to think and act differently, starting now. Upbring, the largest nonprofit foster placement and adoption agency in Texas, believes we all share responsibility in helping to raise healthy children prepared to embrace successful lives. Lubbock has some wonderful stories of families stepping in to fill a great need. Patricia Moreno's family has fostered more than 100 children. While many stories stand out, 4-year-old Jessie's is unforgettable. The day he was placed, Patricia's husband asked if he'd eaten anything. "Yeah, I ate some chicken bones," he replied. While Jessie was not available for adoption, the Morenos treated him like one of their own. Their son, Eric, became very attached to Jessie, too. Then there's Carolyn Gilbert. She became a licensed foster parent in 1996, shepherding more than 60 children. When Julie first moved in 1999, they grew a bond. Her time with Carolyn greatly influenced her, and today Julie serves in the community as a nurse, owns her own car, and is in the process of buying her first home. Julie still makes time to visit — roses in hand — to express her gratitude to Carolyn. As locals have long known, Lubbock is home to many generous souls; another tireless volunteer was Lee Ruth Krieg, a faithful friend and Upbring colleague, who died Monday after a valiant battle with cancer. Lee Ruth joined the LSS/Upbring Board of Directors in January 2010. She was a dedicated volunteer with all of Upbring's programs in Lubbock, including Neighborhood House, Health for Friends Clinic, and on behalf of our Foster In Texas program. Her energy, tireless spirit and dedication to children will be sorely missed. We are privileged to work with numerous families throughout Texas like those of Patricia and Carolyn. We need more families like theirs as well as greater participation from every sector of our community. We're calling on you to help us improve the odds for children in need. Our mission is to break the cycle of child abuse by empowering children, families and communities. With more than 13 percent of U.S. children subject to abuse or neglect by a caregiver each year, maltreatment of children is a pervasive problem affecting kids of every age, gender, ethnicity and socioeconomic background. We know 30 percent of people who were abused as children become abusers themselves; nearly 70,000 Texas children were confirmed victims of child abuse and neglect last year, most for the first time; nearly 18,000 Texas children were removed from their homes in 2014. As the result of a recent study, we now know over their lifetimes, this abuse and neglect costs the Texas economy an estimated $454 billion. To break the cycle of child abuse, we must be comprehensive in our strategy. Kids enter the child welfare system at different stages of their lives, and we must address the full spectrum of their needs. Upbring has established an innovative continuum of services and partnerships tracking progress in five key markers of: safety, life skills, education, health and vocation. Currently, there is surprisingly little long-term data on Texas foster children, or what strategies prove successful in serving them. In order to fill this void, Upbring is partnering with The University of Texas at Austin School of Social Work on a first-of-its-kind-in-Texas study that will track the progress and wellbeing of foster children. We recognize we can't meet needs alone. Giving vulnerable children the support and opportunities each of them deserves is more than one organization or government can do. We need businesses willing to train and employ 18-year-olds as they exit the foster care system; medical institutions eager to partner with us to improve the health of children in foster care; legislators prepared to support the needs of foster children in a complex system; and volunteers passionate about lending their time and skills to a cause bigger than themselves. And of course, we need more Texans like Patricia Moreno and Carolyn Gilbert, whose love and devotion as foster parents has raised expectations for what a childhood can be. KURT SENSKÉ is president and CEO of Upbring, a faith-based nonprofit organization devoted to breaking the cycle of child abuse. Source: <http://lubbockonline.com/editorial-columnists/2015-07-25/senske-breaking-cycle-child-abuse-requires-effort-all#.VbVjDenbK1s>

Stop child abuse in group homes Jul 26 2015 12:01 am Susan Alford, the new DSS director, takes a break in-between meetings to eat lunch at her desk Tuesday, June 16, 2015 at the South Carolina DSS in Columbia. (Paul Zoeller/Staff) Unthinkable things can happen to children in group homes. They can be beaten, molested, drugged and neglected. But in South Carolina, information about such incidents is kept secret. That means parents are in the dark — and people who want to address the problems don't have the information they need to do so. The S.C. General Assembly needs to recognize that state law intended to protect children is actually putting them at risk. Last year, the Senate investigated the Department of Social Services after hearing allegations of mismanagement, unworkable caseloads and deaths of children under the agency's authority. Lillian Koller resigned as director under pressure from lawmakers who were exasperated by her refusal to provide data about social workers' staggering caseloads. Her replacement, Susan Alford, faces an uphill climb. The more forthcoming she is about the system's shortcomings, the more likely the Legislature will work to make beneficial changes, starting with changing the law. She also should realign the DSS budget so that more children can be taken care of in homes of relatives or foster parents, and fewer in group homes. Studies show that children do better in home settings than they do in group homes. That's reason enough. But an investigation by reporter Lauren Sausser revealed that group homes across the state have been the subject of multiple complaints. And while administrators say that most of the complaints are unfounded, the public has no way to find out if that's true. DSS, which is responsible for group home oversight, will say, for example, that New Hope in York County has been investigated for 119 allegations of abuse in the past 15 years. But it will not say how many allegations were unfounded or how serious the allegations were. That would be an easy fix — were it not for state law that calls for the information to be withheld. It should be changed. Certainly the state should protect children by keeping private their names and details of alleged abuse. But there is no reason not to have a place people can go to check out group homes before making decisions about placing children there. The database could contain the number of abuse allegations, their severity and their disposition. Many children in group homes are troubled. It stands to reason that some allegations will prove untrue. The public deserves to know that. And group homes that are protecting children should have the satisfaction of the public knowing they've been cleared of charges. Ironically, the state pays five times as much money keeping children in group homes than in foster homes, and the outcome is usually inferior. Particularly young children (those up to 13 years of age) are more apt to thrive in foster homes than in group homes. Unfortunately, South Carolina puts children in group homes and institutions at a rate higher than any other state in the country. Hence the reallocation of money. DSS needs to recruit more foster parents and pay them better. Some receive as little as $12 a day to feed, clothe and care for a child. Only five states pay less for foster care. By reducing the number of children in group homes significantly, DSS would save tens of millions of dollars that could be used to beef up foster care. The children under the care of DSS are among the state's most vulnerable. Many have been abused, yet they are being put in group homes where they risk further abuse. The likelihood of that abuse is classified information. DSS has a new director. And the Legislature has demonstrated a genuine concern for addressing DSS problems. It's time for dramatic changes that will protect children and spend tax dollars more effectively. Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20150726/PC1002/150729484/1022/stop-child-abuse-in-group-homes>

How UK Anti-Terror Guidance Could Violate Children's Human Rights Tuesday, 28 July 2015 09:32 By Stephanie Petrie, The Conversation | News Analysis font size decrease font size increase font size Print 29 Email There are enormous dangers in the way child protection legislation in the UK intersects with Channel, the government's anti-radicalization program. There are only a few legal steps between the suggested interventions set out in the Channel guidance and the possibility of a child being removed from their home because their family's political views are unacceptable and don't adhere to "British values." This runs the risk of violating the overriding principles of both domestic UK child protection law and children's rights set down in the 1989 UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. It has also been argued that it breaches the European Convention on Human Rights. This has happened in the recent past in countries such as Hungary and Argentina, also motivated by a desire to "save" children from harmful influences. Adolfo Pérez Esquivel, the Nobel laureate and human rights activist, has pointed out that both the Church and military in Argentina justified removing and placing children from political opponents for adoption as a necessary step to protect them from harmful influences. Alarm Bells Channel is part of the government's overall Prevent strategy issued in 2011. While the statute does not refer to children or young people, guidance for the panels focuses almost entirely on interventions relevant to young people with only cursory references to "vulnerable" adults. Section 2 of the guidance states emphatically that preventing "radicalization" is a "protection" issue that may require action by social workers: The way in which Channel will be delivered may often overlap with the implementation of the wider safeguarding duty, especially where vulnerabilities have been identified that require intervention from social services, or where the individual is already known to social services. It is precisely this overlap that rings alarm bells. Guidance does not clarify how the overlap with potential criminal prosecution will be managed. Nor does it set out how young people are to be protected from: "arbitrary or unlawful interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence ... (and) unlawful attacks on his or her honour and reputation" - article 16 of the 1989 UN Convention of the Rights of the Child which the UK has ratified. The guidance recommends that if parental consent for the referral of a young person to a panel is not forthcoming and there are "vulnerabilities" in the home environment, it may be necessary for action by social workers under section 17 of the Children Act 1989, with the potential for intervention in their family life or for the compulsory removal of their child under section 47 of the same act. "Extremism" is defined in the guidance primarily as opposition to listed "fundamental" British values, as though the definitions of these values are undisputed and uncontested. To define unacceptable political views and expressions of dissent as child abuse is a dangerous step to take. Of course, removing children from their families to protect them from significant harm may sometimes be necessary. Enormous strides have been made in the detection and prevention of physical child abuse and recognition and understanding of child sexual abuse. There is now a substantial body of knowledge about the nature and causes of child abuse and how it may be prevented. None of this knowledge is evident in Channel guidance and it is misleading to imply that what is primarily a surveillance operation is intended to protect young people from harm. Extra Pressure on Social Workers As Channel guidance is not a statutory duty but advice which authorities must have "regard," it is hoped that social workers involved in using it will maintain the highest professional standards and integrity and ensure interventions are not instigated for political purposes. However, in the Queen's speech, the new Conservative government revealed that the Police and Criminal Justice Bill will pave the way to make a criminal offence of wilful neglect for professionals who fail to act on child protection concerns. It's possible that this could mean social workers who resisted making a statutory intervention that was deemed necessary by a panel could be charged with wilful neglect. Channel guidance conflates the abuse of children and young people with prevention of terrorism initiatives in gravely misleading ways. It also undermines the paramount principles regarding the welfare of children in both domestic legislation and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. In its framework for assessing a child's vulnerability, the Channel guidance identifies factors such as "a need for identity, meaning and belonging" and "a desire for political or moral change" as indicators of vulnerability to involvement in terrorism. Surely we want to educate our young people to strive for meaning and belonging, and surely political and moral change is a characteristic of human society. The Channel program will not protect young people from becoming drawn into terrorist violence but by failing to respect the desire for justice, it runs the risk of alienating them further. The program should be withdrawn. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/32086-how-uk-anti-terror-guidance-could-violate-children-s-human-rights>

Georgia Is Moving Children With Disabilities Into Schools Used During Jim Crow Thursday, 30 July 2015 00:00 By Marian Wang, ProPublica | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 50 Email (Photo: Empty Classroom via Shutterstock; Edited LW / TO) Georgia has been illegally and unnecessarily segregating thousands of students with behavioral issues and disabilities, isolating them in run-down facilities and providing them with subpar education, according to an investigation by the US Department of Justice. Some of the students in the program were schooled in the same inferior buildings that served black children in the days of Jim Crow. The investigation found that many of the buildings lack gyms, cafeterias, libraries, labs, playgrounds and other amenities. "It's a warehouse for kids the school system doesn't want or know how to deal with," a parent told the Justice Department of the program. The Justice Department detailed its findings in a letter earlier this month to Georgia's governor and attorney general. Federal law mandates that schools educate students with disabilities in the "least restrictive environment" in which they can learn and thrive. More broadly, public entities must serve people with disabilities in the "most integrated setting." But what the Justice Department found in Georgia is something that persists across the country: Schools continue to inappropriately segregate students with a range of behavioral needs and disabilities. Children are often placed in more restrictive settings because traditional public schools show little flexibility in working with students who may need more support. In Georgia, schools were quick to move children out of mainstream classrooms, the Justice Department noted. In some cases, students were recommended for placement after a single incident or a string of minor incidents, such as using inappropriate language with a teacher. Parents reported feeling pressured into agreeing to the placements. In fact, many students who were placed in what's called the Georgia Network for Educational and Therapeutic Support, or GNETS, didn't actually need to be there, the Justice Department said. Most could have stayed in their neighborhood schools if they'd been given more behavioral or mental-health support. "Nearly all students in the GNETS Program could receive services in more integrated settings, but do not have the opportunity to do so," the letter said. What's more, because the state has set up a system that tilts toward providing services in segregated settings, the letter said, Georgia "undermines the availability of these services in more integrated settings." A spokeswoman for Georgia Gov. Nathan Deal referred questions to the Georgia Department of Education, whose spokesman referred questions to the Attorney General's Office. Daryl Robinson, counsel to the Georgia Attorney General, told ProPublica, "We don't have any comment at this time." This isn't the first time that the GNETS has drawn scrutiny. In 2010, a state audit found that the programs "are not held accountable for student performance" and questioned their cost effectiveness. Earlier, in 2004, a 13-year-old boy in the program hanged himself while held for hours isolated in a room. Advocates have long been critical of the quality of services offered by the network. "We have seen many, many clients whose behavior gets significantly worse in GNETS," said Leslie Lipson, an attorney with the Georgia Advocacy Office. "We've seen kids who are significantly behind their peers for no other reason than lack of instruction. We've seen students who are great football players or involved in student government or band who are sent to GNETS and have no opportunities to be part of their community." The Justice Department threatened the state with a lawsuit if the problems are not corrected. It called on the state to redirect services, training and resources to move students with behavioral challenges back into general-education schools. In particular, it suggested increasing access to mental health services by locating mental health clinics "at or near schools" to provide services to students who would otherwise be at risk of being referred to more restrictive, segregated settings. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/32137-georgia-is-segregating-children-with-disabilities-in-schools-used-during-jim-crow>

Former Butte County foster parent arrested in child molestation inquiry By Staff Reports Posted: 07/17/15, 4:11 PM PDT | Updated: 1 week, 5 days ago 0 Comments Oroville >> A former foster parent in the south Butte County area has been arrested on suspicion of multiple counts of child molestation. Eugene Charles Hastings Sr., 56, was arrested on suspicion of six counts of lewd or lascivious acts on a child under 14 years old, according to a press release issued Friday by the Butte County Sheriff's Office. The Sheriff's Office received a report in June alleging that Hastings had inappropriately touched a foster child in his care in 2014, according to the release. The child was not in Hastings' care at the time of the allegation. Investigators with the Sheriff's Office Special Victims Unit, Butte County Children's Services Division and California Community Care Licensing Division subsequently investigated the allegations, including talking to former foster children who had filed similar allegations against Hastings over the years, according to the release. Hastings was arrested by sheriff's detectives following questioning, according to the release. He was booked into the Butte County Jail with bail set at $300,000. Anyone with additional information regarding the case or Hastings' alleged actions is urged to contact the Sheriff's Office Special Victims Unit at 538-7544. Source: <http://www.chicoer.com/general-news/20150717/former-butte-county-foster-parent-arrested-in-child-molestation-inquiry>

LGBT "Treatment" Programs Are Often Child Abuse | Lorri L. Jean LGBT "Treatment" Programs Are Often Child Abuse Posted: 07/17/2015 3:22 pm EDT Updated: 07/17/2015 3:59 pm EDT Share 152 Tweet 46 Email 0 Comment 19 stumble reddit On Tuesday, July 14, I spoke in front of the U.S. Capitol Building to call for federal regulation of the residential treatment programs that claim to help troubled teens. I was proud to be joined by Reps. Adam Schiff (D-CA) and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL) who introduced the "Stop Child Abuse in Residential Treatment Programs for Teens Act" that would regulate this multi-million dollar industry known for its abuse of youth. I was also joined by Jodi Hobbs, president of Survivors of Institutional Abuse and Paul Gionfriddo, president of Mental Health America. The following are my remarks: The voices of young people aren't often heard at the Capitol. And if you're a teenager sent to a boot camp, so-called "therapeutic" boarding school or behavior modification program, it's certain your voice won't be heard because you'll be cut off from all contact with your family and the outside world. So we are here today for those youth whose voices have been silenced. We're here today for the parents who have been duped into believing these programs would really help their children. And we're here to demand action on behalf of the hundreds of young people who have actually died—as well as the thousands who suffer long-term trauma—because of the abuse they endured while in unregulated institutions that masquerade as legitimate treatment programs. It isn't "treatment" to withhold food and water from a youth. It isn't treatment to beat a teenager. And nothing should ever be considered treatment that involves denial of medical care, solitary confinement, electric shocks or public humiliation. That's not therapeutic. That's child abuse. And yet that is exactly what's happening throughout the country because residential programs that claim to help troubled teens are operating without necessary and appropriate oversight. This is not just a claim by our campaign coalition, it's a fact documented by the U.S. Government Accountability Office. LGBT kids are particularly vulnerable. Even in states like California that have outlawed the dangerous and discredited practice of gay conversion therapy, there are residential programs that consider LGBT kids to be troubled—and in need of "fixing"—simply because of their sexual orientation or gender identity. In addition to enduring the same horrible abuses as other youth, LGBT kids face additional levels of abuse that don't stop until staff believe they're no longer LGBT. No child can be "scared straight" and none should suffer damaging and sometimes fatal attempts to change who they are. It's long past time for Congress to pass sensible legislation to regulate this rogue, multi-million dollar industry that's profiting from the abuse of young people. If you're on a plane that's stuck on the tarmac for more than two hours, federal regulations require the airline to give you food and water. But if you're a kid sent to a residential treatment program, there's no regulation that protects you from being deprived of food and water for weeks. Our youth can't wait any longer. We need to fix this now. That's why I applaud the leadership of Representatives Schiff and Ros-Lehtinen for crossing the aisle to promote the Stop Child Abuse in Residential Treatment Programs for Teens Act—a law that would protect kids from unsafe programs. They understand that the health and well-being of young people is not a partisan issue. It isn't a partisan issue in California, where today our state Assembly is considering similar legislation that received nearly unanimous bipartisan support from our state senate. And it certainly shouldn't be a partisan issue in our nation's capitol. I urge the rest of the House to take action to pass the Act and stop this abuse before it's too late for any other youth. Please sign the Protect Youth from Institutional Abuse campaign petition at PYIA.org. We'll contact petition signers when it's time to urge legislators to support the bills. [Webmaster Note: HR 3060 will NOT protect children from institutionalized abuse as currently written (July, 2015). Learn more by reading HEAL's recommendations to improve the legislation available at www.heal-online.org/HR3060problems.pdf.] Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/lorri-l-jean/lgbt-treatment-programs_b_7814860.html

Denver, Parker group homes violating city codes Community Recovery program under fire for way facilities opened By Carlos Illescas The Denver Post Posted: 07/19/2015 12:01:00 AM MDT Add a Comment Updated: 07/22/2015 02:21:44 PM MDT Thomas Stockman and his fiancée Diane Holden sip on drinks and relax on their deck on Thursday, July 16, 2015 at their home in Parker. Stockman and Holden are upset that the house next door has been transformed into a community drug and alcohol rehabilitation center. (Callaghan O'Hare, The Denver Post) Jul 22: Parker approves Community Recovery sober living home One house sits in a tranquil Parker neighborhood that backs up to an open space. The other is a historic row home that dates to the late-1880s on the outskirts of downtown Denver. At first glance, the homes seem to fit into their locales just fine — except both are drug and alcohol treatment facilities that never secured permits to open. They are run by Community Recovery, a company based in Southern California. Neighbors complain the homes have become nuisances. Officials in Parker and Denver say the company never sought proper permits to open in those cities. In Parker, the home rented by Community Recovery on Parliament Way in the Rowley Downs neighborhood has had several calls to police since it opened less than a year ago, some for "suspicious occurrences." At one point last winter, a giant Dumpster was placed on the front lawn, which also became a makeshift parking area for the residents of the group home. People came and went at all hours of the day, neighbors say. "Their track history at this location is terrible. They made the place just a slum the first three months they were there," said Tom Stockman, who lives next door to the Parliament Way home with his fiancée. "Diane and I found our Parker dream home a little over a year ago, and six months later it turned into a Parker nightmare." Advertisement Community Recovery officials did not return phone calls for comment. Neither did the Parker homeowner who is renting to Community Recovery. In Denver, Community Recovery purchased the home in the 2500 block of Arapahoe Street for nearly $2 million. The Fair Housing Act protects treatment programs in residential areas and requires local governments to have flexibility in zoning. Because group homes tend to be in residential areas, the permits in most cities to open a facility require more scrutiny than normal businesses, such as having no more than eight people who are not related living under the same roof. It was only after neighbors complained that Parker and Denver officials became aware of the homes. Parker issued a cease-and-desist order to Community Recovery, and the company started becoming a better neighbor, removing the large trash bin. On Monday, Community Recovery goes before the Parker Town Council to seek a permit to be there going forward. Denver is in the final stages of its investigation of the Arapahoe Street house, and the next step would be to also issue a cease-and-desist order, said Andrea Burns of Denver's Community Planning and Development department. Burns said the Denver location is housing 16 people — double the number for small group-home facilities. "We've had a case open for a while on this one," Burns said. "Our neighborhood inspectors are looking into what looks like a zoning violation. They appear to be operating this business without a zoning use permit." If Community Recovery's strategy is to open a facility secretly with more people living there than is allowed legally, it might be a good one financially — as some residents claimed in Parker this month when the planning and zoning commission approved its application. According to its website, Community Recovery charges people who are looking to participate in "sober living" treatment centers up to $19,500 for 90 days, such as the ones in Denver and Parker, and higher at some of its facilities in California. The Parker home is supposed to be for women only, while the Denver home is an all-male facility. Joel Noble, president of Curtis Park Neighbors in Denver, said the group home on Arapahoe Street hasn't seen as many issues compared with the one in Parker, but parking has become more difficult. He said the home previously was being used as a place for people who came to town and wanted to stay somewhere away from temptations such as drugs and alcohol. Then, it got along with the people who live in the area just fine. He and others fear the new facility is being used to treat those who are addicted on site. "We had a good neighbor agreement with their predecessors," Noble said. "We think Community Recovery is very different; they're actively giving treatment to folks." The worry in Parker is that if Community Recovery is approved on Monday by the Town Council, the group could go back to its old ways of doing business. "We don't like it. But if they're on their best behavior and stay there, that's what the Fair Housing Act covers," Stockman said. "But we're really afraid they're not going to do that." Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_28505718/denver-parker-group-homes-violating-city-codes

Former boarding school teacher charged with taking indecent photos of children Jonathan Thomson-Glover, who taught at Clifton College in Bristol, is charged with 36 counts of making, taking and possessing indecent images of children Clifton College in Bristol — a former teacher has been charged with making indecent images of children at the boarding school and another property. Photograph: Tim Ireland/PA Steven Morris and agency Monday 20 July 2015 08:16 EDT Last modified on Monday 20 July 2015 08:32 EDT Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share via Email Share on Pinterest Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on WhatsApp Shares 74 74 A former teacher at an independent boarding school has appeared in court charged with making indecent images of children. Jonathan Thomson-Glover, 53, who taught at Clifton College in Bristol, faced magistrates in Somerset accused of 36 counts of making, taking and possessing indecent images of children. Thomson-Glover spoke only to give his date of birth and confirm he was of no fixed address during a brief hearing at Taunton magistrates court. He is accused of 27 charges of taking an indecent photograph, seven charges of making an indecent photograph and two charges of possessing an indecent photograph. The charges relate to victims who were allegedly filmed at Clifton College and an address in Cornwall over a 16-year period. He was charged following a joint investigation between Avon and Somerset police and Devon and Cornwall police. The grey-haired defendant, who wore an open-neck white shirt, light coloured trousers and a dark blazer, did not enter pleas to the 36 charges. Howard Phillips, prosecuting, asked magistrates to commit the case to Taunton crown court. Eileen Westwood, chair of the bench, told Thomson-Glover: "You have heard your case is going to be dealt with at Taunton crown court and the matter is adjourned until 17 August at Taunton crown court. You will be on conditional bail." Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2015/jul/20/former-boarding-school-teacher-charged-taking-indecen-photos-children>

Grand jury: Close troubled Highlands juvenile facility Kendra Conlon, WTSP 12:07 a.m. EDT July 21, 2015 Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd and State Attorney Jerry Hill call the facility at Highlands Youth Academy near Avon Park a "total disgrace." (Photo: WTSP) 101 CONNECT 1 TWEETLINKEDIN COMMENTEMAILMORE A scathing grand jury report calls for the closure of a Highlands juvenile justice facility that's been plagued with problems from a riot to several recent escapes. Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd and State Attorney Jerry Hill call the facility at Highlands Youth Academy near Avon Park a "total disgrace." A teen's recent escape from the complex launched a massive investigation that raises serious concerns about the facility's security and living conditions. The grand jury faults failures at the privately-run, yet state-funded juvenile justice facility. The state attorney insists the company is profiting off taxpayer money, but not protecting the public, or the kids inside. Report calls for closing youth detention center WTSP "They've got plywood on the walls. They don't have paint. They don't have infrastructure, and you're trying to tell me we're teaching kids the right way? Come on man," says Judd. Judd says an investigation into Highlands Youth Academy revealed rundown 60-year-old buildings, some repairs still haven't been made from a riot 2 years ago. "You get $5 million a year and you're housing 50 kids or less a day, is this the best we can do?" says Hill. Hill believes there are even bigger problems with untrained staff and security. Video shows 5 workers attempting to break up a fight. One teen sees the chance to escape and flees. "The doors and windows don't have the capability of being secured. It's a miserable failure down there," says Judd. G4S is the company that runs the facility and is paid by the Department of Juvenile Justice. A 5-year, $40 million deal just for this facility. "They make a profit, while our kids who need this program suffer," says Judd. Other G4S operated facilities in the Bay area have seen riots too this year. At Highlands, the company insists it is working on renovations and follow DJJ's direction on security. "The way juvenile justice is done in the state of Florida needs to undergo radical change," Hill says. "I think they will definitely take note. I think people are trying to implement changes that takes time," says neighbor Dave Lambdin. Click here to read the 13-page response from G4S The Department of Juvenile Justice released the following statement: "The Department of Juvenile Justice works to ensure that all youth in our care, our employees and Florida communities are kept safe. Juvenile arrests in Florida are at the lowest level in 30 years with a 36 percent decline over the last five years. "In order to promote our mission of safety, the Department has taken various steps over the last two years since the Avon Park Youth Academy disturbance took place: "DJJ has installed surveillance cameras throughout the facility; We have decreased the program's size from 144 beds to 80; Increased staff to youth ratio to 1 to 3 during daytime hours; The agency has allocated almost $2 million in facility improvements including dormitory renovations and roof replacement. "DJJ continues to closely monitor this program, and all of our programs, to ensure that our high standards of accountability and transparency are met in all we do." Source: <http://www.wtsp.com/story/news/local/2015/07/20/grand-jury-shut-down-troubled-juvenile-facility/30448407/>

Over-medication of people with learning disabilities infringes human rights Medicine should not be used to make people easier to care for – we need to discuss alternatives and how to spread best practice Medicines can be transformative, but using them to calm people down amounts to chemical restraint. Photograph: Alamy Dominic Slowie National clinical director for learning disabilities, NHS England Tuesday 21 July 2015 03.20 EDT Last modified on Tuesday 21 July 2015 04.31 EDT Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share via Email Share on Pinterest Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on WhatsApp Shares 777 777 Comments 3 The chief pharmacist, Keith Ridge, and I have written to professionals and patients highlighting grave concerns about the inappropriate and prolonged prescribing of psychotropic drugs to people with learning disabilities. These concerns were based on the findings of three reports commissioned by NHS England – from Public Health England, the Care Quality Commission and NHS Improving Quality – following the Winterbourne View scandal. Combined, the three reports found that up to 35,000 people with learning disabilities are being treated with medicines intended for severe mental illness with no clear clinical justification, often for many years without adequate review or challenge, and without them or their loved ones and carers being told why, or the serious and lasting side effects. Learning disability: positive behaviour support offers an alternative to antipsychotics Jonathan Beebe Challenging behaviours can be traumatic, but sedation is not the answer. Positive behaviour support can help people express themselves in different ways Read more Over-medication, and then lack of review, is a historic problem highlighted previously by the Challenging Behaviour Foundation and other groups, and for which guidance was first published in 2006. Nonetheless, it is a problem that nobody knew the true scale of, which is why we worked with patients, carers and professionals to commission these reports, to get to the bottom of the issues once and for all and to take robust action. What we have found is unacceptable, and we understand the outrage that many people will feel; this is a serious patient safety issue and calls into question the extent to which GMC guidelines on consent to treatment are being followed. These medicines can be transformative, but only when used to treat the illnesses and diseases they were designed to treat, when risks and benefits have been fully weighed up, where the patient, carers and families are all informed and agree on the treatments, and where there is commitment for the treatment to be regularly reviewed, and stopped if the proposed benefits are not evident or if the side effects are unacceptable. This is basic good practice. These medicines should not be used to simply calm people down or to make them easier to care for. To do so amounts to chemical restraint and risks missing the real reasons behind the behavioural problems being identified. Incorrect prescribing in this manner amounts to an infringement of human rights. We are determined to take action to tackle over-medication for this group of patients, but doing so is going to be about more than central edicts, and it requires the will of more than just NHS England; it needs to be about changing attitudes, cultures and practices right across the country and across the health and social care system. We have already set out plans to increase the presence of pharmacists in GP surgeries to support them to review and challenge prescriptions that may be inappropriate. Building on that, we led a summit of key stakeholders to fully explore the problem, and to agree next steps and responsibilities as part of a call to action. A call to action isn't about issuing new policies or rules from the centre; it's an invitation to be part of shaping meaningful and lasting system change, enabling professionals across disciplines and agencies to solve common problems and achieve common goals. The results such an approach can achieve tell their own story; the Right Prescription project on decreasing the inappropriate use of antipsychotic drugs for people with dementia led to a marked increase in reviews, and a reduction in inappropriate prescribing by more than half over its 18-month timeframe. We need to replicate that kind of quick success for patients with learning disabilities. And while Ridge and I can help provide leadership and impetus, we need others to share the desire for change and the responsibility for driving it. We have been greatly encouraged by the support of the Royal College of Nursing, the Royal College of Psychiatrists and the Royal Pharmaceutical Society so far, not to mention those in the voluntary sector, such as Mencap, who have been campaigning on this issue for so long. We hope that the summit will galvanise the will and catalyse the action of many more. After Winterbourne View I'm being forced to discharge patients too soon Anonymous Simplistic targets created in the wake of scandalous abuse are not what patients with learning disabilities need or want Read more In particular, participants must agree on the need for change, and what the priorities, roles and responsibilities are for each of the organisations that attended. We also discussed the legitimate alternatives to medication, as detailed in the recently published Nice guidelines, how best practice can be spread across the country (including a patient safety alert if necessary), and how success can be measured and demonstrated. But above all, and fundamental to the success of any call to action, we need to achieve a shared vision and goal: that each and every individual with a learning disability in England should receive the best quality and most appropriate care that we can provide for them, wherever and from whomever they receive it. The summit was a big step towards that, but we're clear that the hard work has only just started. Join our network to read more pieces like this. And follow us on Twitter (@GdnHealthcare) to keep up with the latest healthcare news and views. Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/healthcare-network/2015/jul/21/over-medication-learning-disabilities-infringes-human-rights>

Group home employee had sex with juvenile inmate, deputies say Cornelia McDaniel faces multiple charges NEXT STORY Officials: One person flown from scene of crash Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text Show Transcript Hide Transcript warrants and the Greenville county sheriff's office, this GREENVILLE COUNTY, S.C. — A woman who worked at a group home is accused of having sex with a juvenile inmate, according to Greenville County deputies. Investigators said Cornelia McDaniel had oral sex and intercourse with a 15-year-old. Authorities said McDaniel was 22 when the sexual encounters started two years ago. The teen was being held by the South Carolina Department of Juvenile Justice at Avalonia Group Home where McDaniel worked. Authorities said several of the incidents happened between June and September 2014, including at the group home and at McDaniel's home. She faces multiple charges including several counts of sexual conduct with a minor and one count of sexual misconduct with a minor. McDaniel did not answer the door when our crew tried to contact her. The director of a group home under the same umbrella as the Avalonia Group Home would not comment on McDaniel's employment status or the situation and asked our crew to leave the premises. McDaniel was released on $50,000 bond. Source: <http://www.wyff4.com/news/woman-accused-of-having-sexual-relations-with-underage-inmate/34292524>

Lawmakers call for audit of Kansas' foster care system There are about 6,500 children in the foster care system, according to the Department for Children and Families' website. Jaime Green File photo i There are about 6,500 children in the foster care system, according to the Department for Children and Families' website. Jaime Green File photo By Bryan Lowry Eagle Topeka bureau LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story Editor's note: Earlier versions of this story contained a quote inaccurately stating the number of children killed in the foster care system this year. Two Democratic lawmakers from south-central Kansas are calling for an audit of the state's foster care system. "Kansans place great importance on taking care of children in need," said Rep. Ed Trimmer, D-Winfield. "This audit would help to ensure we are engaging our best effort to protect children who have been sexually, physically, and emotionally abused." About 6,500 children are in the foster care system, according to the Department for Children and Families' website. Theresa Freed, spokeswoman for DCF, which oversees the foster care system, said in an e-mail that the agency was aware of the request for an audit and that it welcomes input on how to "better protect children in our state." "Every child death is a tragedy that weighs heavy on our hearts. It is always our goal to keep families together when that is a safe option. When it is not, we seek safe and loving foster families to provide temporary placement for children who are removed from their homes," Freed said. "Our mission is to protect families. Kansas consistently surpasses national safety measure averages with regard to child safety, both in and out of foster care." The request comes as the DCF reviews its foster care licensing requirements to ensure the "greater safety and well-being of children." Trimmer said four children in the broader DCF system had died in the past two years. Freed said that DCF was aware of only one death of a child in foster care this year being caused by maltreatment, the first such incident since 2006. The audit request comes the same month that a federal judge ordered the DCF to release documents related to the death of a Hiawatha boy in 2013 while under the care of a private foster care company that contracts with the DCF. Trimmer and Ward will submit the request for an audit at Wednesday's meeting of the Legislative Post Audit Committee. Rep. John Barker, R-Abilene, who chairs the committee, said it will be the first item of business on the committee's agenda. Sen. Michael O'Donnell, R-Wichita, who serves as vice chair, said he would support an audit, provided it is not politically motivated. "I just want to make sure it's not politically driven ... because we do see that a lot," O'Donnell said. "But we can absolutely find common ground, because I've talked to families that have gone through nightmares with the DCF program in my district, so I know that there have been legitimate problems." Read more here: <http://www.kansas.com/news/politics-government/article29115088.html#storylink=cpy>

DHS cites staff at area group home for emotional abuse Kevin Allenspach, kallenspach@stcloudtimes.com 10:33 a.m. CDT July 28, 2015 Department of Human Services(Photo: DHS) 76 CONNECT 2 TWEETLINKEDIN 1 COMMENTEMAILMORE SAUK RAPIDS – Staff members at a pair of group homes for vulnerable adults in Sauk Rapids have been cited for three instances of emotional abuse to residents and the license holder for the facilities has been fined $400. The Minnesota Department of Human Services on Tuesday released documents detailing the allegations, subsequent investigation and the fine. The incidents involved adjacent facilities at 1852 and 1856 Eastern Star Loop and occurred prior to May 26, according to a DHS investigative memorandum. The allegations included that a facility administrative staff person "screamed" at a vulnerable adult and other clients and called them inappropriate names and racial slurs. The same staff member also allegedly made the same vulnerable adult sit in an office for more than an hour writing "positive statements" about the staff member. Further it was alleged the staff member "bear hugged" a different vulnerable adult, took them to the floor and another staff member pulled the vulnerable adult's pants down, uncovering the genital area and buttocks. The two staff members involved were related family members, according to DHS documents. A DHS investigator made site visits in June and interviewed more than a dozen people. The investigator substantiated the allegations. The facility trained staff on employee conduct and reporting such incidents. The two staff members no longer work at the facilities, according to documents. The license holder for the facilities, Rule 36 Limited Partnership of Duluth V, was ordered to pay $400 for failure to report the maltreatment at the two facilities. The fine is subject to appeal. Follow Kevin Allenspach on Twitter @KevinAllenspach. Call him at 255-8745. Source: <http://www.stcloudtimes.com/story/news/local/2015/07/28/dhs-cites-staff-area-group-home-emotional-abuse/30777523/>

GOP legislators block audit of Kansas foster care system, despite recent child deaths Photo by Peter Hancock, Enlarge photo. Rep. Jim Ward, D-Wichita, asks the Kansas Legislative Post Audit Committee for an audit of Kansas foster care system, Wednesday, July 29, 2015, at the Statehouse in Topeka. Email Print Facebook Tweet Comments \(4\) By Peter Hancock — Lawrence Journal-World July 29, 2015, 11:50 a.m. Updated July 29, 2015, 3:57 p.m. Advertisement Topeka — On a party-line vote, the Kansas Legislative Post Audit Committee on Wednesday declined to order an audit of the Kansas foster care system, despite the recent deaths of children who were either in state custody or in troubled homes. But the panel did agree to put the audit request on a waiting list, which means it could be authorized later this year or sometime after lawmakers reconvene in January for the 2016 session. The decision came at a time when the Department of Children and Families, which manages the foster care program, is coming under increased public scrutiny because of the near-record number of children currently in the system and because of continuing reports that the agency is preparing for major policy changes that could include barring gay and unwed couples from becoming foster parents. The request for an audit of the program came from two south-central Kansas legislators, Reps. Jim Ward of Wichita and Ed Trimmer of Winfield, both Democrats. They represent regions where two high-profile cases of children dying while in foster care have occurred. "In the last couple of years, I've been getting more and more and more concerns presented to me about supervision not being done, placements being changed fairly radically quickly, and care plans not being followed through with," Ward told the committee. "Not just by people whose children are involved in these cases, where you always have a high level of complaint," he said, "but by providers and people who have worked the system, both inside the agency and outside the agency that have a lot of interaction with the cases, with the children, with the families." One of the recent deaths occurred in July 2014: A 10-month-old girl in El Dorado died when her foster father left her in a hot car while he was smoking marijuana in the home of his drug dealer. He later pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter. And in December, a 10-year-old boy in Wellington was stabbed to death by his mother, a woman who reportedly had struggled with bipolar disorder. Trimmer said he believed that was a case in which child welfare officials should have known about potential danger to the boy's welfare. "These are the most vulnerable, the weakest, and they have (been) victims," Ward told the committee. "Remember, these children have already gone through crisis in their family. They've been physically abused, sexually abused, emotionally abused, or grossly neglected, or we wouldn't be talking about them being in foster care." Ward and Trimmer asked for an audit to look into two questions: whether DCF's removal and reunification processes are adequate to ensure children's safety and whether foster care contractors have sufficient capacity to provide necessary care. Governmental auditing in Kansas is done by the Legislative Division of Post Audit, an agency within the legislative branch of government. It works under the direction of the Post Audit Committee and has no independent authority to conduct audits unless they are approved by the committee. Republicans on the panel voted against launching an audit immediately, in part, they said, because the Department of Children and Families is already conducting its own review of the foster care system, including the qualifications it requires of foster parents. They also noted that an interim legislative committee will hold hearings this fall to review the foster care system and the qualifications it requires of foster parents. Sen. Julia Lynn, R-Olathe, said DCF should not be the target of investigation because decisions about placing children in state custody are made by judges. "I am not quite sure that we're at the point where this particular scope statement is ready to go forward because there are extraneous issues involved that are bigger than DCF," she said. Rep. Peggy Mast, R-Shawnee, said there have been numerous audits in the past of the state foster care system, and none has resulted in significant changes. "It would be a lesson in futility," she said. "I don't know what the answer is, but I don't think this is going to reveal anything that's going to be substantive enough (to justify putting it ahead of other scheduled audits)." Trimmer said after the meeting that he was disappointed the committee did not approve the audit. He said he would try again in December when the Post Audit Committee meets again to set a schedule for audits next year. "I think there was reluctance by Republicans on the committee to look at any agencies in the current administration," Trimmer said. Earlier this month, Douglas County District Judge Peggy Carr Kittel wrote to DCF, expressing concern about rumors she has heard that the agency is planning to change its policies so that only married couples can be licensed as foster parents, a move that could exclude single individuals or cohabiting couples. Others have suggested the agency is considering barring gay couples from being foster parents. DCF spokeswoman Theresa Freed said the agency is reviewing all of its foster care policies to determine if they are sufficient to ensure the safety of children. But she has not said whether the agency is considering a change to limit the program only to married couples. Source: <http://www.2jworld.com/news/2015/jul/29/gop-legislators-block-audit-kansas-foster-care-sys/>

Chelfham Mill: Two Devon pupils placed in foster care as school closes over physical abuse claims By NDJosephW | Posted: July 30, 2015 By Joseph Wilkes, digital reporter SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message Devon County Council, left, has been criticised by a councillor over the "scandal" at Chelfham Mill, right Chelfham Mill: Two Devon pupils placed in foster care as school closes over... Share Tweet Share Pin It Email Copy link to paste in your message / SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message Devon County Council, left, has been criticised by a councillor over the "scandal" at Chelfham Mill, right Police investigate physical abuse claims at North Devon... 1 Councillor raised issues about Chelfham Mill a year before... 2 UPDATE: Man whose life-savings were stolen appeals for help... 1 TWO Devon pupils have been placed with foster parents following the temporary closure of Chelfham Mill school near Barnstaple over physical abuse claims. Devon County Council (DCC) has responded to claims and questions by a councillor, published on The Journal's website yesterday, which called into question the authority's inspection regime and demanded to know how Devon children had been affected. Alistair Dewhurst, DCC councillor for Teignbridge South, said he raised issues about the welfare of children at Chelfham Mill School almost a year before it was closed yesterday, but was told it had "improved its practices". Spokesman for DCC David Hutchings said: "Two Devon children with residential placements at Chelfham Mill are currently affected by the closure and they have been placed with foster parents. Day pupils are on their summer holidays. Related content Police investigate physical abuse claims at North Devon school Councillor raised issues about Chelfham Mill a year before "Dickensian scandal" of abuse claims UPDATE: Man whose life-savings were stolen appeals for help from the public Police reveal how Barnstaple armed robber Benjamin Barton was caught Pink pigeons pictured in the South West baffle residents Man accused of Amal Abdi murder due to appear in court today "Private schools are registered and regulated by Ofsted. We have worked with Chelfham Mill in the past to help them make improvements following Ofsted inspections. "Senior officers are preparing a reply to Mr Dewhurst's questions." Mr Dewhurst called into question the robustness as well as the "transparency and efficacy" of Devon County Council's (DCC) inspection regime. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message He contacted The Journal about what he called the "Dickensian scandal" surrounding the North Devon school for boys with emotional and behavioural problems. He had asked for a report into how many Devon children are affected and that they are in a safe location. The school, four miles to the north east of Barnstaple in Chelfham, is being investigated by police while its registration to operate has been suspended by Ofsted. Mr Dewhurst said he raised issues about safeguarding on August 1, 2014, with DCC chief executive Phil Norrey. He is a member of the DCC Peoples Scrutiny Committee and is part of the Regulation 44 Inspection team at the Atkinson Secure Children's Home in Devon. Read more: <http://www.northdevonjournal.co.uk/Chelfham-Devon-pupils-placed-foster-care-school/story-27514126-detail/story.html#ixzz3hW33BZRK> Follow us: @NDJournal on Twitter | NDJournal on Facebook

Pushing Foster Care Into National Consciousness Posted: 07/31/2015 1:14 pm EDT Updated: 07/31/2015 1:59 pm EDT Share 4 Tweet 11 Email 0 Comment 1 tumblr reddit Everyday, we hear about issues -- ranging from fights over dresses to fights overseas. Yet, lacking are the tales of America's downtrodden -- those most vulnerable. At the forefront of that group are children and young adults, namely foster and former foster youth. While we hear of their stories, they have not yet entered our everyday conversation or concern. Usually, the stories of foster care at the front page of the newspaper are reactionary. The stories are reactions to the latest group home tragedy, the foster parent who abused a child, and so on. While they all add to the conversation, they do nothing to continue it. The knowledge of foster care shown by mass-media is piecemeal, giving us glimpses into the lives of these youth, while hardly ever providing a base to continue the conversation. Some issues, like gay marriage or abortion, we hear about and discuss regularly, yet these young people, who are often living in America's most tragic circumstances, remain unheard. Often, people have no understanding of what foster care is -- even those most educated. While almost everyone knows the term and have some idea of what they think it means -- likely related to orphanages -- most have no idea of who foster youth really are. Currently, foster youth face abysmal statistics across a multitude of areas, including incarceration rates, educational outcomes, income levels, homelessness rates, etc. Most people are unaware that only around 2% of foster youth obtain a college degree, that at least a quarter experience homelessness sometime after aging out of "the system" or that less than half have sustainable employment by the time they're 24. Everyday, another youth ages out to no home, no family and no support system. Yet, we don't know because the sustained conversation needed for awareness is sorely lacking. Often, people ask what needs to be done for the system to be changed. While no one has all of the answers, it's obvious that, before any real change can be made, these issues must be brought to the forefront of our everyday discussions. Without increased conversation, understanding and awareness, there will never be transformative action. Follow Matt Hartman on Twitter: www.twitter.com/mattbhartman Source: <http://www.huffingtonpost.com/matt-hartman/pushing-foster-care-into-b-7908382.html>

Houston woman who operated foster care, child placement agency accused of adoption fraud THE ASSOCIATED PRESS Published: 7/31/15 2:57 pm EDT - Updated: 7/31/15 3:02 pm EDT AAA HOUSTON — A Houston woman who operated a foster care and child placement agency has been accused of adoption fraud. Simone Swenson was arrested Friday after being indicted by a federal grand jury in Houston. Prosecutors say Swenson owned Sans Pareil Center for Children and Family Services LLC. Prosecutors say Sans Pareil defrauded couples seeking to adopt by promising the same baby to multiple families. The agency's license was revoked in 2012 after regulators discovered money intended for foster families was used for mortgage payments and for visits to a nail salon. Swenson faces mail fraud counts and remains in custody pending an initial court appearance Monday. No working publicly listed phone number for the agency could immediately be located Friday. Authorities didn't immediately provide attorney information for Swenson. Source: <http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/40ff427e203344199ae70668edc984ef/TX--Texas-Adoption-Fraud>

Ontario names panelists to probe youth group homes Panel reviewing Ontario's child and youth residential system to report by the end of the year. Share on Facebook A A Comments 9 Republish Report an Error Share via Email Print Jim Rankin / Toronto Star file photo Irwin Elman, Ontario's Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth, said he hoped the panel would "put children at the centre" of a review that is "open and transparent." By: Laurie Monsebraaten Social justice reporter, Published on Fri Jul 31 2015 A child abuse expert, the head of a university program that trains child and youth workers, and a former provincial deputy minister will review Ontario's group home and residential care system. The announcement Friday comes in the wake of a Star investigation into serious occurrences in Toronto group homes that found more than one third of children and youths were physically or chemically restrained and about 40 per cent of cases resulted in calls to police. "We have heard from people with lived experience, stakeholders and service providers that there are ways to improve the experience and outcomes for children and youth in residential services," said Tracy MacCharles, Ontario minister of children and youth services in a statement. "The panel will build on this feedback, as well as the foundational work of previous reviews and reports, to advise the ministry on how to make this system better for the young people in it." NDP children's critic Monique Taylor, who has argued that the province needs an all-party committee to address the issue, was skeptical about the announcement. "We've been clear that we need an open and transparent public review, not another government panel," she said. "New Democrats believe open public review is the only way to ensure that children are heard, that we address the problems in the child protection system, and that we can deliver real change." The panel members include Nico Trocmé, director of the McGill School of Social Work, Kiaras Gharabaghi, director of Ryerson University's School of Child and Youth Care and Deborah Newman, a former deputy minister of corrections and assistant deputy minister of youth justice. They are expected to report to the government with recommendations by the end of the year. The panel will not hold public consultations, but will "consult with stakeholders including associations, service providers and individuals with lived experience of child and youth residential services," the ministry said. The public are being encouraged to participate through emailEND. Ontario's Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth Irwin Elman said he hoped the panel would "put children at the centre" of a review that is "open and transparent." "The panel can't do its work without looking at how these children and youth entered the system in the first place and how the province can better support families and protect children," he said. "This barn door is open now," Elman warned. And there's an opportunity . . . to make this fundamental change happen." A 2013 report by the government-appointed Youth Leaving Care working group, which included young people who grew up in children's aid, recommended a review of residential services. Last winter's province-wide review of the Child and Family Services Act also recommended a probe. Ontario's Residential Service System for Children and Youth There are 3,300 children and youth in 484 group homes and children's mental health settings and another 400 in 60 youth justice open and closed custody facilities. Ontario spends $1 billion on care and treatment services in residential settings for children and youth and $152.4 million for youth justice custody and detention. Across the province, group homes, along with foster parents and children's aid societies, generate almost 20,000 serious occurrence reports every year. Source: <http://www.thestar.com/news/queenspark/2015/07/31/ontario-names-panelists-to-probe-youth-group-homes.html>

Time for state to get serious about foster care reform Jimmie E. Gates, The Clarion-Ledger 5:05 p.m. CDT July 31, 2015 It defies the odds that the state is still wrangling with reforms to protect children in state care. I have been writing about the Olivia Y case since the original federal lawsuit was filed in 2004.

Jimmie E. Gates (Photo: The Clarion-Ledger) 38 CONNECT 6 TWEETLINKEDIN 1 COMMENTEMAILMORE It's disheartening that the state is still wrangling with implementing reforms to protect children in state custody. I have been writing about the Olivia Y case since the original federal lawsuit was filed in 2004 on behalf of children in the state's foster care system. The original complaint detailed physical and psychological harm suffered by the children while known to, or in the custody of, the Department of Human Services Division of Family and Children's Services. Citing the state's own reports, the lawsuit alleged incidents of sexual abuse, unqualified employees, backlogged cases, shortages of safe foster homes and fiscal mismanagement, among other problems. In 2008, the state entered into a federal settlement agreement, saying DHS would do, among other things: Hire more social workers and increase the number of visits the workers make to each foster child; increase its offerings of educational and therapeutic services for foster parents and children; better monitor children's physical and mental health when they enter foster care; and establish a 24-hour hotline so people could report abuse, and increase reimbursement rates for foster parents. The state has never been in compliance with the settlement agreement. Last week, the state admitted it. Children in the foster care system often have been abused, neglected and victimized. Certainly, no one would want them to be further victimized by a system that is supposed to protect them. It appears with last week's admission by the state, and Gov. Phil Bryant's vow to improve the foster care system, that the state is finally getting serious about the issue. Let's hope that is the case. Bryant has agreed to hire an executive director of the Department of Family and Children's Services and waive state salary parameters for the director and for members of a senior management team. The state has also agreed to hire a national child welfare consulting group, the Public Catalyst Group, to conduct an organizational analysis of the state's foster care system and recommend whether it should be a free-standing agency, how it should be structured and what the state needs to do to remedy all of its violations of the court-ordered reform plan. The group will also recommend qualified applicants from which the governor will select the agency's director. The governor has also agreed to call a special session of the Legislature, if necessary, to support the reorganization of the child welfare system and provide additional appropriations to act on the expert group's recommendations, if the state agrees to adopt them, according to the updated agreement approved last week. Bryant was right when he said the state can do better to protect children in the foster care system. Contact Jimmie E. Gates at (601) 961-7212 or jgates@jackson.gannett.com. Follow @jgatesnews on Twitter. Source: <http://www.clarionledger.com/story/opinion/columnists/2015/07/31/time-state-get-serious-foster-care-reform/30962113/>

Shocking Dog And Child Abuse: Abandoned Kids Of Divorced Parents Found Living In Dog Cage, Raised By Grandfather In Breeding Facility Brad Ryder 8/1/2015 1:53pm EDT Share Google Tweet Pin it Comment It's being described as one of most shocking cases of abuse involving children and animals. Reportedly, two children, a brother, 6, and sister, 4, were discovered recently living with dogs in cages reserved for animal breeding. Sources with the Mirror say a divorced couple abandoned the adolescents, left them in the care of the kids' grandfather, and fled their home. Both parents have since remarried and live in separate cities. The siblings were found in cages with dogs in the city of Nanjing, capital of China's eastern Jiangsu Province. The conditions were deplorable, arguably, not even fit for caged dogs. Jun Teng, unknown relationship to the abused children, said on several attempts, neighbors tried convincing the children's grandfather, who breeds dogs for a living, to provide better care. Their advice was to turn the children over to a rescue shelter specifically for homeless children. "The stench is intolerable, the entire area is covered by rubbish, and excrement from the dogs. Flies and mosquitoes are everywhere and when they get any food they have to fight with it for the dogs. "It's not unusual to see them drinking wastewater that puddles on the ground after rainfall." Witnesses said the stubborn man refused any intervention and continued raising and housing the children in the dog cage. Although locals donated food and other provisions for the sister and brother, they could not rescue them from the horrid conditions without the law on their side. For a time, local authorities did nothing. However, after pressure from the public and efforts by the media to follow the story continued, officials caved and began the process of removing the children from the breeding cages. There is no mention if the dog breeder-caretaker will be brought up on child and animal abuse charges. Source: <http://www.starpulse.com/news/index.php/2015/08/01/shocking-dog-and-child-abuse-abandoned>

Jesse Hagopian and Pedro Noguera Take on the Testocracy in Nationally Televised Debate: "Is public education in the U.S. broken beyond repair?" By I AM AN EDUCATOR On August 6, 2015 Last Thursday I flew to New York City to take on Peter Cunningham, the former U.S. Assistant Secretary of Education (under Secretary Arne Duncan, during President Obama's first term), in a debate hosted by Al Jazeera America's program The Third Rail. We debated the question, "Is public education in the U.S. broken beyond repair?" I have to say, those 45 minutes in the green room before we went on to do the show seemed like they would never pass. First I had to settle my nerves. I knew my years of experience teaching and seeing the misery of high-stakes testing was causing in our schools was going to be hard to dispute. But this was the former Assistant Secretary of Education and surely he would have slick responses and cherry picked data to try to mask the truth? But it wasn't the coming debate that was troubling me most. Try to imagine just how awkward a situation it was. Mr. Cunningham now runs a website devoted to shutting down the "education spring" uprising against corporate education reform; I'm a teacher trying my best to help that movement bloom. I am used to challenging the rich and powerful, but here I was sharing coffee and chitchat with one of the primary spokespeople for the privatization of our schools and the reduction of education to merely a "testucation." When we finally entered the TV studio, I was relieved for the conversation to turn from the weather to the mighty storm of resistance that parents, students, and teachers are building in opposition to the "testocracy." We tussled over many major questions relating to the corporate model of education reform. Mr. Cunningham argued in favor of charter schools. I pointed out that of course he supported charters because he received \$12 million from Billionaires Eli Broad and the Walton's (the Wal-Mart family) who support the privatization of education. I went on to explain, "My problem with charter schools is that they're anti-democratic. They're not under the control of a democratically elected school board...[and the charter system] siphons off public funds to private schools...[Creating] a profit model from public education." Mr. Cunningham argued in favor of the use of high-stakes testing in education. I argued, "High-stakes testing has pushed out everything that matters in education." I cited how recess and the arts are vanishing in schools as they become test-prep centers, rather than incubators of creativity. And I noted that while they push these standards and tests on our children, "It's amazing that Secretary of Education Arne Duncan, Bill Gates, the President himself, send their kids to schools that don't use the common core." At one point Mr. Cunningham inexplicably defended Arne Duncan's comments that the opt out movement is just white suburban moms—a comment that Duncan himself had to apologize for. I explained the reality that every family has the right to protect their child from being reduced to a test score and that this opt out movement is actually growing rapidly in communities of color—including the many hundreds of Latino students who walked out of the PARCC test in New Mexico last year, the Black students in Baltimore who occupied the school board meeting in opposition to the labeling of their schools failing so as to close them down, and the Seattle NAACP chapter calling for opt out as part of the Black Lives Matter struggle. One of the overriding themes that I tired to express (in the limited format of a few minuet debate program) was the idea that the superrich have hoarded the wealth at the expense of our children. Today, over half of the students who attend public school live in poverty. Then these billionaires—such as Mr. Cunningham's sponsors—claim that the reason why youngsters don't have a better quality of life is due to unaccountable teachers. The best part of this The Third Rail debate was when they brought in the great Pedro Noguera, Professor of education at New York University, who powerfully and succinctly expressed the primary issue with education reform today: The problem I see is the we've developed an accountability system that holds those with the most power the least accountable. We all cordially shook hands at the conclusion of the debate and conversed on the finer points that we hadn't had time to cover while on stage. The lingering education disputes soon turned back to small talk, but this time I no longer felt awkward because I had a great image in my mind: The Walton's huddled around the TV scowling as they decided whether to cancel Mr. Cunningham's funding for his inability to defeat the logic and experience of lowly educators. Source: <http://iamaneducator.com/2015/08/06/jesse-hagopian-and-pedro-noguera-take-on-the-testocracy-in-nationally-televised-debate-is-public-education-in-the-u-s-broken-beyond-repair/>

State to keep outsourcing at troubled teen detention center Daly By Andy Reid Florida Department of Juvenile Justice Secretary Christina Daly (center) met with Palm Beach County officials Wednesday to address concerns about the state's privately run Palm Beach Juvenile Correctional Facility, near West Palm Beach. Florida Department of Juvenile Justice Secretary Christina Daly (center) met with Palm Beach County officials Wednesday to address concerns about the state's privately run Palm Beach Juvenile Correctional Facility, near West Palm Beach. (By Andy Reid) By Andy Reid Sun Sentinel contact the reporter Juvenile Delinquency State leaders pledge improvements, but not new operators, at a teen detention center near West Palm Beach. Palm Beach County officials have concerns about mistreatment at a local state juvenile detention center. Concerns about injured teens, stolen medicine and tattered clothes are not enough to oust the operator of a troubled detention center near West Palm Beach, according to the state's top juvenile justice official. Florida Department of Juvenile Justice Secretary Christina Daly met with local officials Wednesday to address problems at the state's privately run Palm Beach Juvenile Correctional Facility, located next to the South Florida Fairgrounds north of Southern Boulevard. Investigation targets state juvenile center in Palm Beach County Andy

Reid State officials are investigating allegations of misconduct and mismanagement by those in charge of watching over troubled teenagers at a privately-operated juvenile correctional facility near West Palm Beach. State officials are investigating allegations of misconduct and mismanagement by those in charge of watching over troubled teenagers at a privately-operated juvenile correctional facility near West Palm Beach. \(Andy Reid \) Daly said a new director of operations is already making improvements and that state investigations will continue into concerns about the facility, run by Youth Services International, Inc. "I recognize that we have had some significant challenges," Daly said. "Culture change takes time. ... They have made some progress." But that's not good enough for County Mayor Shelley Vana, who Wednesday presented Daly a letter calling for the state to remove Youth Services International, Inc. as the facility operator. Vana, who has been making surprise visits to the center to investigate complaints of mistreatment, said claims Wednesday of improvements at the facility are "fairy tales." Vana said Youth Services International can't be trusted to run the detention center. Last month, state officials released a report saying three employees at the facility used excessive force against one of the boys housed there, with one worker repeatedly punching the boy in the head. Insufficient staffing, injuries sending boys to the hospital, worn out socks and shoes, missing medicine, and reports of contraband cellphones and money smuggled into the facility are among the concerns reported by local officials. "It's not really getting any better," Vana said. "I just want the kids to be safe." cComments Vana wants to make sure that the employees are members of a public sector union. Ralph Bowman at 8:43 PM August 05, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 1 There are up to 118 boys 13 to 18 from across the state kept at the detention and treatment center for "high risk" youth offenders. Teenagers held there continue their schooling and can also receive vocational training while participating in mental health and substance abuse programs. There are now 73 teens receiving treatment for mental health issues and 45 teens in the substance abuse program, officials said Wednesday. Typically, about 10 of the teenagers housed there are from Palm Beach County. While local officials can raise concerns, state officials control who runs the facility. Manny Alvarez in January was brought in as program administrator for the facility. On Wednesday, he told the Palm Beach County Corrections Task Force, meeting in West Palm Beach, that he is taking steps to address what he called "operational shortcomings." Hiring better guards and other staff, increasing the accessibility of mental health workers and even painting rooms and ordering better furniture are among the improvements Alvarez cited. Alvarez said there has been a 50 percent decrease in "use of force" incidents involving guards and teens during the past seven months. But Vana and other local officials Wednesday said the improvements haven't gone far enough and that concerns remain. The severity of injuries suffered by those kept at the facility seems to be getting worse, County Commissioner Melissa McKinlay said. "I do have grave concerns," McKinlay said. Palm Beach County Public Defender Carey Haughwout said there has been "noticeable improvement" since Alvarez took over, but that "there is still work to be done." "There are challenges with the facility and the program," Haughwout said. If the state sticks with the same operator for the correctional facility, Vana said her next step could be taking safety concerns to judges and calling for them to stop sending boys there. "It can't be them," Vana said about Youth Services International, Inc. "We are not letting this go." Daly said she takes the local concerns "very seriously," but questions whether removing the company running the facility is the right answer. "I really do feel that we are making great strides," said Daly, who said the priority is to "ensure that we are keeping these kids safe." abreid@sunsentinel.com, 561-228-5504 or Twitter@abreidnews Source: <http://www.sun-sentinel.com/local/palm-beach/fl-teen-detention-center-problems-20150805-story.html>

4 California Cops Arrested Over Claims They Brutally Beat 13 Children at Bootcamp for At-Risk Youth OSHARE Reprint 9 Comments subscribe By Maria Coder 08/06/2015 AT 12:00 PM EDT Four California police officers have been arrested over claims that they turned a tough-love bootcamp for at-risk youth into a brutal, abusive hell. Thirteen children, age 12 to 17, were allegedly slapped, kicked, stomped and beaten bloody by the officers, who worked a drill instructors at the camp, the Associated Press reports. One teen one suffered a broken hand, according to the AP. Leadership, Empowerment and Discipline Camp is a one-week program at Camp San Luis Obispo, a California Army National Guard Military post. It is designed to foster leadership and help with discipline, with the goal of reducing family conflict at home, according to organizers. The alleged victims attended the camp May 17 to 24. The San Luis Obispo Sheriff's Office investigated the camp and the officers for more than two months after the Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services contacted authorities on May 28 with abuse claims. Initially seven children came forward to report that they were abused, according to Greg Owen, a lawyer for the children and their families. Owen claims his clients were given towels to wipe blood off themselves after beatings. He also said they were told they'd be away from their families for three months, not one week, and that their parents didn't want or love them. Huntington Park officers Marissa Larios, 36, and Patrick Nijland, 47, and South Gate officers Carlos Gomez-Marquez, 31, and Edgar Gomez, 35, were arrested on Tuesday and Wednesday, according to the San Luis Obispo Sheriff's Office. The release notes 13 victims – boys and girls – all ranging between 12 and 17 years in age; there were close to 40 children enrolled. A phone call to the sheriff's office was not immediately returned on Thursday. The four suspects posted bond and were released. It's unclear if they've obtained lawyers. "We really take no pleasure in arresting members of the law enforcement profession. But at the end of the day, we realize that no one is above the law," sheriff's spokesman Tony Cipolla, told the AP. Facebook Twitter Email The South Gate officers have been placed on administrative leave, according to a police department statement posted online on Wednesday. All charges will be filed with the San Luis Obispo County District Attorney's Office. Source: <http://www.people.com/article/4-california-cops-arrested-cruelly-abusing-children-bootcamp>

Children in boot camp abuse investigation suffer lasting damage, lawyer says Huntington Park, South Gate officers arrested for allegedly abusing children at police-sponsored boot camp Four local law enforcement officers were arrested this week in connection with an investigation into claims by several children that they were physically and verbally abused during a boot camp sponsored by Huntington Park and South Gate police departments at a location in San Luis Obispo County, authorities announced Wednesday. Four local law enforcement officers were arrested this week in connection with an investigation into claims by several children that they were physically and verbally abused during a boot camp sponsored by Huntington Park and South Gate police departments at a location in San Luis Obispo County, authorities announced Wednesday. By Matt Hamilton, Sarah Parvini and Corina Knoll contact the reporters Crime Law Enforcement Army National Guard The brochure struck a note with some parents: Are you overwhelmed with frustration or fear over your teen's defiant behavior? Have you run out of ideas or strategies to get your teen on the right track? Have you tried it all and nothing seems to work? The solution, it declared, could be a police-sponsored boot camp for southeast Los Angeles County youth held at a military base in the mountains of San Luis Obispo. There, children would be inculcated with the three pillars of the LEAD program: Leadership, Empowerment and Discipline. See the most-read stories this hour >>Read the story Instead, authorities contend that the camp became a breeding ground for vicious assaults and physical and emotional abuse. A two-month investigation that included searching the cellphones, computers, vehicles, photos and belongings of camp leaders led to the arrest of four officers from the South Gate and Huntington Park police departments earlier this week. "When it involves a law enforcement agency, it gets a little awkward," said San Luis Obispo County Sheriff Ian Parkinson, whose agency spearheaded the investigation. "The reality is that they're no different from anybody else. If they did it, they need to be held accountable." Interested in the stories shaping California? Sign up for the free Essential California newsletter >> The investigation's findings buttress earlier allegations by parents who say their children were kicked, slapped, beaten and handcuffed during the $400 boot camp held in May. A lawyer for 11 of the 15 victims identified by investigators said one boy suffered broken fingers when an officer stomped on his hand while he was doing push-ups. Another had bruises on his throat. Some of the attendees were ushered into a dark room to be beaten, then handed towels to swab off the blood, the lawyer said. "They just started hitting me," said one male camper who spoke Thursday to The Times on condition of anonymity out of fear of retaliation. He said he was beaten in a closed room by two instructors on two separate occasions. "Once I got out, it was smirks on their face," he said. Attorney Greg Owen, who first spoke of the abuse allegations in June, said the children remain scared. "This sort of thing undoubtedly will affect these children forever." The children, ages 12 to 17, at first kept quiet after attending the weeklong camp 200 miles away. But then one mother whose 13-year-old boy suffered bruises to his windpipe took him to the emergency room. The Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services was called and the boy spoke about his ordeal, Owen said. When it involves a law enforcement agency, it gets a little awkward. The reality is that they're no different from anybody else. If they did it, they need to be held accountable.- San Luis Obispo County Sheriff Ian Parkinson Officials said that led to an investigation that involved interviewing three dozen participants and identifying 15 male and female victims who attended the program at Camp San Luis Obispo, an Army National Guard military base that serves as a training ground for local, state and federal agencies. Authorities found it took time to build trust with the children, whose faith in law enforcement had been violated in part by their experiences at the camp, Parkinson said. The search warrants were sealed to protect the identities of the children. FBI investigators were also involved, but a spokeswoman for the agency declined to elaborate. Brothers Edgar Gomez and Carlos Gomez-Marquez, both of South Gate's police force, were arrested on suspicion of cruelty to a child, criminal threats, misdemeanor battery and abuse under the color of authority. cComments Kids are such wimps nowadays. Always whining. It's all about me, me, me. That said, that boot camp experience must have really damaged their sense of self esteem. No Buey Jose at 7:52 AM August 08, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 37 Marissa Larios of the Huntington Park Police Department was arrested on suspicion of cruelty to a child, criminal conspiracy, misdemeanor battery and abuse under the color of authority. Patrick Nijland, also of the Huntington Park agency, was arrested on suspicion of cruelty to a child, criminal battery and abuse under the color of authority. All four have been released on $20,000 bond and are now on paid administrative leave. The district attorney is reviewing the sheriff's investigation to determine whether to file criminal charges. According to his attorney, Gomez, a former Marine who has worked in South Gate for eight years, had "an abiding concern for trying to help kids." He, along with the three other suspects, had worked at the camp for several years. "They all have very good track records in their department," said Michael D. Schwartz, an attorney for Larios. "The accusations are highly out of character." Schwartz said parents had actually begged for their children to be accepted into the program. "These aren't kids who refuse to clean up their rooms once or twice," he said. "You got kids with behavioral issues, some being drugged, some being violent. All of them have no respect for authority, not their parents, not others in their lives, or officers in the camp." But some parents who convened Thursday at a hotel in Commerce told a different story. Bridgit Salazar, 34, of Long Beach said she suspected her divorce had put a strain on her 13-year-old son, the eldest of three. She enrolled him in the camp, hoping he would gain the same "learning experience" she received as a child at a Navy Sea Cadet boot camp. She said during one parent class held before the boot camp, a South Gate police officer whose name she couldn't recall introduced himself: "I'm going to be the one your kids will fear." Salazar said she wished she had listened to her gut then. When her son returned from the camp, she sensed a disconnect. "I knew from the moment I saw him, something was wrong." Now, she says, her son is not himself and often exhibits anger. Police officials who run the camp have temporarily suspended the program. Previously known as JAR, or Juveniles At Risk, the camp that began in 1998 was specifically for teen residents of cities in southeast Los Angeles County. Some officers volunteered their time, others were paid. In addition to the boot camp, the program included classroom lectures, community service and field trips on the weekends. Parents were also required to attend parenting classes once a week. On the application, parents checked off descriptors such as "disrespectful," "runs away," "drug use," "gang," and "bad grades" to describe their child's behavior. Photos on the Huntington Park Police Department's Facebook page showed last year's participants sitting in a classroom and lining up to do drills. One woman posted her support: "My son went to this program and he says nothing like [the alleged abuse] ever happened. It was educational and he has changed for the better." Both police departments released statements on the recent allegations. "We pride ourselves in the success of this program for the past 18 years and the many young lives it has had a positive effect on," said Huntington Park Police Chief Cosme Lozano in a statement. "We also respect and honor the due process of the justice system," the statement added. Correctional boot camps are not uncommon for frustrated parents. But there's a hard line officials shouldn't cross, says Jorja Leap, an adjunct professor with the UCLA Department of Social Welfare who has worked with juvenile probation camps. "There's no physical laying on of hands that can be reformatory," Leap said, adding that there's little oversight of such camps, some of which can effectively run for months. "Where boot camps break down is where you have the wrong kinds of personalities implementing them," she said. matt.hamilton@latimes.com, sarah.parvini@latimes.com, corina.knoll@latimes.com Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/california/la-me-boot-camp-arrests-20150807-story.html#page=2>

Tensions boil over at troubled school Save Sunday, 02 August 2015 EmailFacebookTwitterGoogle+ The New Zealand Herald Email FacebookTwitterGoogle+ Hato Petera College in Northcote, Auckland. Photo / Nick Reed By Kirsty Johnston Tensions at Auckland's troubled Maori boarding school have spilled over, with the principal suspended and three managers handing in their resignations. Principal at Northcote's Hato Petera College, John Matthews, was suspended from his role as chief executive of the school's hostel, Radio New Zealand reported. He remains principal of the 100-pupil school. Hostel trustee Rudy Taylor confirmed the suspension, and said three managers had quit their positions at the hostel as a result. One of those was the school's operations manager Shanan Halbert. The school has separate boards to run the school and the hostel, but until now management positions have been largely shared. The resignations were reportedly over a lack of progress at the hostel- some trustees want to renew the hostel's dilapidated buildings but the project is yet to go ahead. Mr Taylor said there were too many personalities involved. "There is not a day without argument," he said. Part of the issue was the involvement of the Catholic Church, who owns the land and is responsible for the upkeep of the buildings, and the fact it had only offered the school a five-year lease. The Bishop has several representatives on the boards, including Kaitia GP Dr Lance O'Sullivan, who last month attempted to oust the hostel board chair due to safety concerns. He was unsuccessful, however, and Tame Te Rangi remains chair. Contacted for comment, Mr Te Rangi said he was not interested as he thought the Herald had not reported the issues fairly. "Stuff you and stuff your paper," he said. At the time, Dr O'Sullivan said a boy had been allegedly assaulted at the hostel and it was not investigated properly. The school and the ministry said it had been dealt with, however. The result of a police complaint is yet unknown. The story so far The Herald first reported in April about issues at the school, including the roll falling below 100, dilapidated buildings, bullying, infighting and a lack of confidence from its owner, the Catholic Church. Two other incidents in the last 12 months - including one where a child had been hit with a stick - had also been referred to police. At that time, the Herald asked the school for copies of incident reports. It refused, instead calling a meeting where three lawyers were present. Hato Petera, whose former pupils include All Black Walter Little and the late artist Ralph Hotere, is the sole remaining Maori boarding school in Auckland and one of only six in the country. Two other such schools, St Stephen's and Queen Victoria, were closed in the early 2000s. There have been ongoing issues at the school between the board, the school, the ministry of education and the church in terms of who will pay for the upkeep of the hostel buildings. Many at the school believe the church wants to shut the school and sell the land at a large profit. A treaty of Waitangi claim made against the church and Crown by members of the wider school community have led to further tension. Source: http://m.nzherald.co.nz/nz/news/article.cfm?c_id=1&objectid=11490835

Riverside psychiatrist pleads not guilty in Medicare scheme - Houston Chronicle Riverside psychiatrist pleads not guilty in Medicare scheme Woman indicted separately in Riverside scheme By Cindy George Updated 8:08 pm, Sunday, August 2, 2015 print articlearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/7|comments_jumplarticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/1_email_sharearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/1_facebook_sharearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/2_twitter_sharearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/3_pinterest_sharearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/4_reddit_sharearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/5_google_sharearticle-6420311|article-share-redesign/6 A Houston psychiatrist who was indicted separately in the Riverside General Hospital $160 million Medicare billing fraud scheme pleaded not guilty on Friday and intends to stand trial in August. Dr. Sharon Iglehart is accused of one federal conspiracy count, two health care fraud charges and a pair of allegations that she made false statements to investigators. At a pretrial conference before U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, her lawyers - which include high-powered defense attorney Rusty Hardin - said she is ready to face a jury. Iglehart originally was arrested in December 2013, but the allegations have been amended twice since then - growing from nine to 12 pages in the most recent indictment secured from a federal grand jury and filed on July 21. Iglehart pleaded not guilty to the amended five counts and retained her freedom on $50,000 bail. Former Riverside CEO and president Earnest Gibson III was convicted as the ringleader in three conspiracies involving Medicare billings for Riverside's psychiatric treatment programs from 2005 to 2012 in which patients were ineligible for treatment or were warehoused but did not receive the reported care. The government alleged that $31 million in fraudulent reimbursement requests were paid. His son, former group home owner Earnest Gibson IV was also convicted at trial and sentenced to 20 years. Active medical license The elder Gibson received the heaviest punishment so far: 45 years. His second-in-command, Mohammad Khan, received a 40-year sentence. They received some of the nation's longest sentences for health care fraud - particularly, stealing from the Medicare or Medicaid programs, which is one of the top criminal prosecutorial priorities for the U.S. Justice Department. Through her Iglehart Wellness Center, the psychiatrist allegedly participated in the scheme by submitting claims that falsely indicated she provided intensive outpatient services for severe mental illness through Riverside's treatment program. Iglehart retains an active medical license in Texas. She was reprimanded by the Texas Medical Board in 2009 for "recreating medical records for psychiatric patients significantly later than the time she had provided examination, diagnosis and treatment to the patients," according to the agency's website. Her disciplinary status was cleared in 2011. Jury selection in Iglehart's case is set for Aug. 31. If convicted, the doctor faces up to 10 years in prison on each count. Regina Askew, who rose from a case worker to become an auditor, will spend 12 years in prison. Crippling scam In July, Sharonda Holmes, who was involved in paying and receiving kickbacks, was sentenced to 3½ years and Waddie McDuffie became the sixth person to receive prison time in the scam that crippled Riverside. The historic Third Ward institution began as Houston's first hospital for black patients and became one of the state's largest providers of substance abuse and mental health treatment. McDuffie pleaded guilty to delivering kickback money to group home owners in exchange for them sending patients for mental health treatment at the hospital. He received a five-year term of probation and six months of home confinement. Those who have pleaded guilty or were convicted at trial are among the dozen defendants who are jointly responsible for $46 million in restitution. All of the Riverside cases are being prosecuted by Washington-based lawyers assigned to the Justice Department's criminal fraud division. Source: <http://www.chron.com/news/houston-texas/houston/article/Riverside-psychiatrist-pleads-not-guilty-in-6420311.php>

Cromwell leaders call for state guidelines for group homes Cromwell Mayor Enzo Faienza File By Jeff Mill, The Middletown Press Posted: 08/02/15, 1:37 PM EDT | Updated: 5 days ago 2 Comments CROMWELL >> The state must take the lead in clarifying what constitutes a group home and in working with towns which are increasingly being asked to shoulder responsibility for a proliferating number of group homes, Mayor Enzo Faienza said. Cromwell already has a number of group homes. But the problem is complicated by the fact that some homes are licensed (if they have a nurse on duty at the home) while others are not. Either way, Faienza said, "It's left to each town to sort out the differences." Advertisement That, he said, is not fair to the towns, residents and clients of the group homes. "We need our legislators to really sit down and and to come up with some comprehensive fixes for the issue of licensed and unlicensed group homes," Faienza said. In Cromwell, the issue has come to a head over a group home that opened this spring in the Reiman Drive neighborhood. The debate over that home, which is operated by Gilead Community Services, took on added weight recently when a client of the home walked away. The man was later found safe in Hartford. But Faienza says he is also concerned because Gilead is now applying for an exemption from local property taxes for the house. "We have to take care of them in terms of providing police and fire service, and we understand that," Faienza said. "But, we get no reimbursement." "There needs to be more accountability to the municipalities," Acting Town Manager Anthony J. Salvatore said, "especially to the point of informing us that a residence is going in." "As it is, the usual way we learn about a facility opening in town now is when we get a call for service for either the police or the town's emergency medical services," salvatore said. "There definitely have to be controls on licensing," Faienza said. "And the proximity of group homes to schools should be taken into account in that licensing process," the mayor said. As he has in the past, Faienza said he supports the group home idea. "I believe in the right of everyone to try and better themselves," he said. But at the same time, Faienza also reaffirmed his belief that Reiman Drive "is just not the right place for this type of facility." "Our first responsibility is, and has to be, the safety of the residents of both Reiman Drive and the town of Cromwell," Faienza said. "We as a town continue to do what we can. But, frankly, we're in uncharted territory here," Faienza said. Source: <http://www.middletownpress.com/government-and-politics/20150802/cromwell-leaders-call-for-state-guidelines-for-group-homes>

Kenya: Ban All Boarding Schools - Parents By Ernest Cornel All boardings schools should be banned, Kenya National Association of Parents secretary general Musau Ndunda has said. "We can't have a school like Alliance with 100 acres, Nairobi School with 98 acres, and we are still confining 4,000 students there," he said. Ndunda spoke at Sheikh Zayed Children Welfare Centre in Mombasa during the ongoing Kepsha delegates conference. "If we want to increase access to education then the government must urgently abolish boarding schools," he said. The Knap boss said many boarding schools have been damaged by fire. Source: <http://allafrica.com/stories/201508050132.html>

G4S paid author of 'independent' youth prison report as consultant Former prisons chief Sir Martin Narey said firm's Rainsbrook unit, which inspectors condemned months earlier, treated children 'overwhelmingly well' Martin Narey has been a paid consultant for G4S for three years and in 2014 was paid more than £10,000. Photograph: Martin Argles for the Guardian Eric Allison and Simon Hattenstone Wednesday 5 August 2015 07.15 EDT Last modified on Wednesday 5 August 2015 19.00 EDT Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share via Email Share on Pinterest Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on WhatsApp Shares 924 924 A former prisons chief who wrote a glowing "independent" report about a controversial youth offender unit run by G4S had previously been paid thousands of pounds as a consultant for the private security firm, the Guardian has learned. Sir Martin Narey, former director general of the prison service, published a report in July on Rainsbrook secure training centre in which he wrote that "very challenging children" were treated "overwhelmingly well". He concluded: "My test in visiting places of custody for over 30 years is to reflect about how I'd feel if my son or daughter were incarcerated there. In Rainsbrook's case, I would consider him or she to be safe and to be generally well treated." Narey's verdict was delivered months after a joint report by Ofsted, the Care Quality Commission and the chief inspector of prisons in May into the centre condemned it for a series of failings. It pointed to the dismissal of six members of staff after a series of incidents of gross misconduct, staff who were on drugs on duty, and others who had behaved "extremely inappropriately" with young people, causing distress and humiliation. Ofsted inspectors, who visited Rainsbrook in February, also revealed that a child who suffered a fracture, possibly as a result of being restrained, did not receive treatment for 15 hours because senior staff overruled clear clinical advice that he needed treatment. The Ofsted report rated Rainsbrook "inadequate" – the lowest grading, prompting Frances Crook, the chief executive of the Howard League for Penal Reform, to call it the "the worst report on a prison I have ever seen" and the Association of Youth Offending Team Managers to demand that the Youth Justice Board (YJB) cease placing children there. Narey's subsequent report, which appeared to show significant improvement at the unit, was referred to as an "independent report" on the YJB website despite Narey's admission within the background notes that: "Since 2012, I have offered occasional advice to G4S on their care and custody of children." Advertisement In fact, he has been a paid consultant for G4S for three years and in 2014 was paid more than £10,000 by the company. Narey was also paid to advise G4S on bidding for renewal of its contract to run Rainsbrook in 2016. When approached by the Guardian, Narey confirmed he had been employed by G4S as a consultant until the end of the last financial year and that he agreed to offer an independent view of Rainsbrook as a one-off piece of work. "My past financial relationship with G4S is made explicit in my report," Narey said. "G4S will pay for that review although my report was written primarily for the YJB and the secretary of state." Asked if he had been part of the G4S bid team to run Rainsbrook for another seven years – a contract that is worth £92m – Narey said he advised the team on how their plans for Rainsbrook might be more child-friendly and how access to, and success in, education might be increased. "I realised I would be criticised for defending G4S, as people have suggested my reputation is damaged," Narey told the Guardian. "Life would have been easier if I had not agreed to do this report," he said, but, he added, he saw a centre that "was not all perfect, but very good, very caring in fact" and that if he had found Rainsbrook to be unsafe, he would have said so "very loudly". He also criticised the earlier Ofsted report into Rainsbrook, saying: "Ofsted are independent but not omniscient and their conclusions are misconceived." Narey's history with G4S has at times been discordant. In 2011 Narey firmly rejected G4S's approach to operate Cedars, an immigration detention centre for families in Sussex, though his successor, Anne Marie Carrie, overturned that decision. When he ran the prison service from 1993 to 2008, Narey re-nationalised three prisons from the private sector including one, Buckley Hall, from G4S. Advertisement But his impartiality has been called into question following his report on Rainsbrook. Labour MP Tom Watson told the Guardian: "If Narey is a paid consultant to G4S and advising that company on their bid for a new contract, the integrity of that bid must be in doubt. The justice secretary [Michael Gove] must intervene immediately to freeze the bid process until G4S has explained why it appointed a member of its bid team to carry out an 'independent' report into its own conduct at Rainsbrook." "Gove has either misled me, or been misled himself. I condemn the deplorable conduct of G4S, who seem more concerned with protecting their reputation than dealing with the record of abuse at Rainsbrook," he told the Guardian. Watson had previously expressed grave concerns about Rainsbrook as a result of Ofsted's report and wrote to Gove in June about them. In his reply to Watson, Gove said the YJB had improved its monitoring process at Rainsbrook and that he intended visit the centre with Narey who, he said, had "conducted his own independent assessment of Rainsbrook". Watson also expressed concern about the re-appointment of John Parker as director at Rainsbrook following the Ofsted report. Parker was in charge at Rainsbrook in 2004 when 15-year-old Gareth Myatt died of asphyxiation after being restrained by three custody officers. Gove did not respond to Watson's concerns about Parker. G4S declined to comment on allegations that Narey's report was not independent. A spokesperson for the YJB said it considered the views Narey expressed in the report were his own, not those of any other party and it was common practice for consultants to be paid by those who commissioned them. The Guardian asked the Ministry of Justice if the justice secretary had authorised Narey's visit to Rainsbrook. A spokesman said the MoJ was "aware and content" with his inspection of the STC. Ofsted told the Guardian: "We, the HM Inspectorate of Prisons and the Care Quality Commission fully stand by the findings and recommendations of our joint team of seven inspectors following the inspection of Rainsbrook Secure Training Centre over a 10-day period in February this year." Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/society/2015/aug/05/g4s-paid-martin-narey-independent-youth-prison-report-consultant>

MURRIETA: Treatment center criminal case revelation triggers stock plunge The criminal case involving the corporate owners and employees in a 2010 patient death has attracted investor attention BY GAIL WESSON / STAFF WRITER Published: Aug. 5, 2015 Updated: Aug. 6, 2015 3:40 p.m. MURRIETA: Treatment center criminal case revelation triggers stock plunge Print Photo Share on moreShare Pin It More Galleries ADVERTISEMENT Related article > Stock for the corporate parent of a chain of alcohol-drug rehab homes plunged this week in the wake of a criminal indictment against American Addiction Centers (ACC) Holdings and employees. The company has ties to a Murrieta rehab house that faces allegations of dependent adult abuse and murder in the death of a client in July 2010. A Wall Street Journal blog post credits a college student, posting on a blog and on his Bleecker Street Research website, with revealing details of allegations that “shook investors’ confidence.” Tennessee-based AAC’s stock plunged 39 percent in the stock value on Tuesday, Aug. 4, the biggest decline since the company disclosed the criminal case July 29, according to an online Bloomberg Business report. AAC stocks closed Wednesday at $20.75, a 4.3 percent boost over the previous day’s closing of $19.89. The Bleeker website posting claims the company has failed to report other patient deaths at facilities. Meanwhile, a private Atlanta law firm announced it was investigating whether AAC “complied with federal securities laws.” The law firm, Holzer & Holzer called on investors who suffered a loss from an investment on AAC stock to contact them. Holzer & Holzer specializes in shareholder litigation, including class action lawsuits. AAC acknowledged in a Securities & Exchange Commission filing that Jerrod Menz, founder of the company’s ABTTC Inc. unit, and other current and former employees were charged July 21 with murder and dependent adult abuse, in the death of 53-year-old patient, Gary Benefield. The company has denied wrongdoing on its own and on behalf of workers. In an earlier news release, it asserted Benefield died of natural causes the morning after he checked into one of the Murrieta facilities. The company settled a civil lawsuit filed by Benefield’s widow last year, with no admission of liability and without disclosing terms of the settlement. A Forbes online website report states that court documents in civil litigation suggest that company lawyers and Menz knew about the criminal investigation in 2013 but did not disclose the existence of the probe at that time to investors in Securities & Exchange Commission filings. Forbes reported the company said in a securities filing made Monday, Aug. 3, that the criminal case “was a risk factor to its business” and that outcomes of the case and any lawsuits could have a “material adverse effect on our business.” A Riverside County grand jury returned a sealed criminal indictment July 21 that was unsealed last week. Kristofer Michael McCausland, James Andrew Fent, Mignon Hernandez Dean and Jerrod Nathan Menz have each been charged with one count of murder and one count of dependent adult abuse, and Tami Dawn Scarcella was charged with abuse of a dependent adult, according to court records. Arraignments for all are scheduled Oct. 1 in Riverside County Superior Court. The indictment also charges ABBTTC, doing business as A Better Tomorrow Treatment Centers, Forterus Inc. and Forterus Health Care Services Inc. with dependent adult abuse and murder. Menz, had been the company’s president and member of the board of directors, but an AAC news release issued July 29 said he “voluntarily stepped down from those roles to address these charges.” Dean is operations director of the company’s residential treatment facility in San Diego. The three other individuals named in the case were employees in 2010 but no longer work there. Forterus operates 14 residential homes in Murrieta, and offers drug and alcohol programs, according to the company’s website. Benefield had battled pneumonia just prior to his death and was suffering from congestive heart failure when he was admitted to the rehab for alcohol detox, according to the now-settled civil lawsuit filed by Benefield’s widow. He was dependent on supplemental oxygen. The lawsuit alleged he was admitted to the facility without his prescription medications and necessary oxygen. Staff writer Richard K. DeAtley contributed to this report. Contact the writer: 951-368-9075 or gweeson@pe.com Source: <http://www.pe.com/articles/company-776076-dependent-criminal.html>

Child Welfare Ideas from the Experts, #5: Better Reporting Options for Maltreatment in Foster Care by John Kelly August 7, 2015 The Chronicle of Social Change is highlighting each of the policy recommendations made this summer by the participants of the Foster Youth Internship Program (FYI), a group of 12 former foster youths who completed congressional internships. The program is overseen each summer by the Congressional Coalition on Adoption Institute, with support from the Sara Start Fund. Each of the FYI participants crafted a carefully researched policy recommendation during their time in Washington. Today we highlight the recommendation of Ashley Williams, 25, a graduate of the University of California, Los Angeles. The Proposal Improve the ability of foster youths to report maltreatment in care by mandating autonomous state ombudsmen offices, requiring that foster youths be notified of any hotline available in their area, and standardizing federal data reporting on abuse and neglect. Williams also calls for mandatory, age-appropriate sex education for any youth entering foster care. The Argument Hotlines, investigators and mandated reports serve as the backbone of an elaborate American system set up to discover and intervene when children are sexually abused. The number of children reporting such victimization has plummeted in recent years but the number of child sexual abuse reports made by adults has increased. It is a sad irony that kids in foster care — who have by definition already experienced maltreatment — are at high risk of having further sexual abuse go unreported. Their likeliest abusers, foster family members or group home staff, are obviously not going to report it. And as Williams points out, “The people that are supposed to protect foster youth, such as caseworkers, foster parents or residential staff, sometimes intimidate foster youth from reporting abuse.” Williams believes that requiring lanes of reporting outside the system housing the alleged abuser, and making those options clear to foster youths, will improve the prospects of sexual abuse in care getting reported. And mandated education sessions, she argues, will give “children the tools they need to understand what abuse is and how to protect themselves.” In Her Own Words Ashley Williams “After I entered care, I believed I would be in a safe environment. This was not the case. I was sexually abused by various foster family members. When I reported the abuse to my caseworker, I was accused of wearing clothing that provoked my abusers to behave that way. During my eight years in foster care, I bounced between 36 different homes and I was molested throughout my time in care. The system designed to protect me from sexual abuse failed to provide me with ways to report the further sexual abuse in foster care.” The Chronicle’s Take Read her proposal, and you’ll see that Williams certainly makes her case that states vary widely in the way they facilitate. Some have strong hotlines, others have none at all. Some have an ombudsman’s office; few have one that is autonomous from the system that, in this instance, has perhaps produced the sexual abuse. The challenge comes in connecting new requirements to money; that is the only hope of standardizing the collection of data on this issue in the most straightforward way, because that could be done through a reauthorization of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (CAPTA). That reauthorization process might be the best place to insert a requirement about autonomous ombudsmen offices. We have no idea what the cost of that would be; if it’s pricey, CAPTA won’t work, because it’s a pretty small amount of money. We were genuinely surprised that only “a handful” of states operate a 24/7 hotline that foster youth can use to report sexual abuse. That seems like a no-brainer at this point, given how cheap communication is. The education aspect reminded us of a proposal from Kellie Henderson of last year’s FYI class. Henderson called for states to create “comfort and inform curriculum” to help prepare youths for the foster care system. Adding classes or sessions aimed at empowering youths to speak up about abuse while in care makes sense. Click here to read Williams’ entire proposal and those of her fellow FYI participants. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/analysis/child-welfare-ideas-from-the-experts-5-better-reporting-options-for-maltreatment-in-foster-care/11520>

Licensing rules stymie treatment centers By MARK HAYWARD New Hampshire Union Leader Three New Hampshire residential drug treatment centers are being forced to get health care facility licenses, an expensive endeavor that involves upgrading old buildings to meet hundreds of regulations, everything from elevator installation to bedroom size. Heads of two organizations said they face the prospect of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to meet the requirements. If they don’t or can’t, they won’t be able to tap private insurers and Medicaid to pay for treatment services. “It’s bureaucracy at its finest,” said Heidi Moran, clinical administrator of Southeastern New Hampshire Services in Dover, the only residential drug treatment center in the Seacoast. In the middle of a statewide heroin epidemic, Southeastern has already reduced the number of treatment beds in order to meet the standards. Serenity Place in Manchester would have to spend $1 million if it wanted to retrofit its Manchester Street facility to meet the licensing requirements, said Executive Director Sharon Drake. Rather, it hopes to move to a new location. The third organization is Headrest in Lebanon, which last week applied for a waiver because a 155-square foot bedroom is 5-feet short of the standard. Also on the checklist: a $3,000 fire suppression system for a $100 stove. “It’s been crazy,” said Headrest Executive Director Suzanne Thistle. “People have been stumbling over themselves trying to do what we’ve got to do.” Not a surprise All face a deadline of June 30, 2016, to have licenses in hand. Joe Harding, the director of Bureau of Drug and Alcohol Services for the state of New Hampshire, said the treatment centers have known for two years that the regulations were coming. Harding acknowledged that organizations skirted the regulations for years. Private insurers had stopped paying for residential substance abuse treatment, and organizations relied on whatever they could — state funds, private donations and other sources — to keep their programs going. Now, the Obamacare law requires Medicaid and private insurers to pay for substance abuse services. “With the increased resources come increased requirements,” Harding said. “These services need to be in the mainstream of health care.” Harding said many of the requirements are for health and safety codes. He said anyone who goes to a doctor or hospital expects the building and patient rooms will meet certain standards. And he noted that Farnum Center in Manchester and Keystone Hall in Nashua have recently moved to facilities that meet the licensing standards. In Manchester, Serenity Place would have to spend $1 million and still end up with fewer beds, Drake said. Earlier this year, the organization tried to move to vacant space that had been used as a school for troubled teenagers. But the effort was thwarted when the city rejected the move because of neighborhood opposition. Serenity Place has made an offer on a second location, Drake said. But whether it moves or decides to stay and upgrade, it has less than a year to meet licensing standards. At risk is $760,000 it receives for 30 beds of transitional living. “The loss of that state funding will close us,” Drake said. Moran said her agency will have to spend $500,000 to meet the standards. She hopes to get a loan or grant for $300,000, the other $200,000 will come out of cash flow. She’s said she’s been working on the licensing standards for two years. She finds a requirement for bedrooms aggravating. Two-person bedrooms must be 160 square feet, a standard that Moran said was developed with nursing homes in mind. Southeastern's bedrooms are 122 square feet, and the state has rejected her request for a waiver. "In a nursing home, grandma might live in her room (and need the space)," Moran said. "My clients sleep in their room, that's it. When you're recovering, it's not healthy to be alone in your own head." Without a waiver, Southeastern reduced the beds in its 28-day treatment program from 14 to 10. The beds in its transitional program went from 19 to 15. At Headrest, Thistle had to turn two two-person bedrooms into single-person bedrooms because they fell short of the standard. Meanwhile, another bedroom is 155 square feet because the space where a dresser stands can't be counted as room space. She requested a waiver last week. "We're in the middle of an opiate epidemic. The clients are positively comfortable in there, and the rules say I have to get a waiver because we have a bureau in there," Thistle said. Drake said Serenity Place would have lost half of its beds to the regulations, which is why the organization wants to move. For years, she said, the state funded Serenity Place and never made a peep about licenses. "The state never should have given us money for the last 30 years," she said. "We never needed or were told we had to have a license with DHHS because we weren't billing insurance companies," Moran said. Under the current system, the Bureau of Drug and Alcohol Services pays $100 per person per day for residential treatment, Thistle said. She said payments under the expanded Medicaid program will amount to \$128.mhayward@unionleader.com. Source: <http://www.unionleader.com/article/20150809/NEWS12/150809327>

Improving the Outcomes of Students in Foster Care – Georgetown University Law Center On May 27, NCYL co-hosted and participated in a convening, "Improving the Outcomes of Students in Foster Care: Spreading Promising Policies and Practices," at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington, D.C. The event – co-hosted by the Legal Center for Foster Care & Education, Georgetown Law Center on Poverty and Inequality, and the Children's Defense Fund – considered how federal policies can help spread promising practices that are being implemented at the state and local levels, and complemented work that NCYL has been involved in around reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA). The convening included three panels. The first, which featured FosterEd Director Jesse Hahnel as a speaker, focused on promising practices and continuing challenges in working at the state and local levels to improve the educational outcomes of students in foster care. Hahnel and his co-panelists – who represented the Allegheny County Department of Human Services, the Texas Supreme Court Children's Commission Education Committee, Los Angeles Unified School District, and the Legal Center for Foster Care and Education – emphasized the importance of interagency collaboration and strong leadership. They outlined a number of promising practices being undertaken by states, counties, and school districts across the country, and agreed that more must be done to incentivize state and local agencies to prioritize this work. These practices include, among other things: ensuring that foster youth are immediately enrolled in school; ensuring that their educational records are transferred between schools in a timely manner; ensuring that foster youth are able remain in their school of origin whenever in their best interest; providing access to transportation; hiring district-based education liaisons to support educational success; allocating resources to train teachers and school staff on trauma-informed practices; sharing data regarding foster youth amongst state and local child welfare and education agencies; and disaggregating educational outcomes, such as attendance, test scores, and GPA, based on foster youth status. The second panel featured several federal officials and focused on policy levers that can be utilized to this end. Speakers included representatives of the U.S. Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services Administration for Children and Families, the U.S. Senate Committee on Finance, the U.S. Department of Education Office of Career, Technical, and Adult Education, and the Children's Defense Fund. They acknowledged the important role that federal policy and federal officials can play in advancing this issue, and discussed several mechanisms for spreading best practices, including legislation, regulation, and discretionary grants. The final panel explored the effects of trauma on the educational outcomes of girls in foster care. It spotlighted the work of a psychotherapist and a youth development coach, both from UCAN Counseling and Youth Development Services. They highlighted the unique challenges that girls in care face related to sexual and relationship abuse, pregnancy, and parenting, and emphasized the importance of trauma-informed school systems in serving these students. Recommendations that emerged from the convening included the following: meaningfully include foster youth in the reauthorization of the ESEA; meaningfully include foster youth in the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act; use targeted discretionary federal grants to incentivize state and local agencies to collaborate to improve the educational outcomes of foster youth; convene partners from multiple states to share strategies and lessons learned; provide technical assistance to help states implement promising practices; and issue administrative guidance to clarify and reinforce the scope of collaboration and accountability among education and child welfare agencies. A video of the convening is available at <https://vimeo.com/129088273>. - See more at: <http://youthlaw.org/publication/improving-the-outcomes-of-students-in-foster-care-georgetown-university-law-center/#sthash.09K7tlh8.dpuf>

CR Spreads Message on Overuse of Psychotropics for Kids in Foster Care By CR Staff Sara Bartosz, lead counsel at national advocacy organization Children's Rights, shed light on the failure of many states to properly oversee the administration of psychotropic medications to kids in foster care during the recent American Bar Association (ABA) Annual Meeting in Chicago. Bartosz was a panelist on "I Feel Like a Zombie: Legal Ethics and Overuse of Psychotropic Drug Use among Children in State Custody." The session served to educate lawyers on how the issue affects thousands of young people in foster care across the United States and what attorneys can do to be watchdogs for kids. Children in foster care often exhibit behaviors related to the trauma they have endured. Rather than receiving therapeutic counseling to treat underlying issues, kids are too frequently given powerful psychotropic drugs to control their behavior. The drugs can have side effects like drowsiness, tremors and weight gain. And many states lack oversight mechanisms to monitor crucial details like how many drugs are being prescribed to each child and the collective impact. "Too many of these kids experience multiple moves between foster homes and changes in caseworkers, and consequently don't have one consistent person in their lives who knows their history and can watch out for their well-being," Bartosz said. "We need to work together to change this." Bartosz told attendees that they can help children by acting as watchdogs to ensure state agencies: maintain comprehensive and up-to-date medical records on each child; consistently provide mandated mental health screenings and follow-up treatments; ensure appropriate informed consent processes occur before children are prescribed medication; and establish red flags – such as multiple drugs and dosages above recommendations – that would trigger further review. Other panelists included Judge Ernest S. Gray, Orleans Parish Juvenile Court of New Orleans and Dr. Michael Naylor, a child psychiatrist with the Institute for Juvenile Research at the University of Illinois at Chicago. The discussion was moderated by Chicago Tribune reporter David Jackson, who has conducted investigations on disadvantaged youth. The panelists noted that while many children may benefit from medications, states must assure the availability of quality mental health care and therapeutic treatments for childhood trauma in order to combat the over-reliance on powerful drugs. Source: <http://www.childrensrights.org/cr-spreads-message-on-overuse-of-psychotropics-for-kids-in-foster-care/>

'Sex-crazed' teacher preyed on troubled teens: prosecutor By Lia Eustachewich View author archive Get author RSS feed Name(required) Email(required) Comment(required) August 12, 2015 | 6:04pm Modal Trigger Teacher Sean Shayak seen in costume in a 2013 yearbook photo (left) and cuffed into Brooklyn Supreme Court. Photo: Left: J.C. Rice; right: Byron Smith F The Brooklyn Tech HS teacher accused of sexually abusing students "preyed" on his seven vulnerable teenaged victims, even researching them online before making his move, prosecutors said Wednesday. Sean Shaynak texted "Is this the first you saw a d—k?" to a 15-year-old girl, whom he allegedly exposed himself to while on a beach trip, Assistant District Attorney Janet Gleeson said in Brooklyn Supreme Court. "He preyed on girls who had issues, who had problems. He jumped on that like white on rice," she said. The 45-year-old math and physics teacher was indicted last September on 36 counts, including criminal sex acts, rape and kidnapping for encounters between 2011 and 2014. Shaynak's lawyer Kimberly Summers slammed Gleeson for "grossly exaggerating" the facts and painted one of the victims, complainant No. 3, as seeking him out for sex – not the other way around. "She talks regularly of her love of older men, how she tries to sleep with older teachers," said Summers. "Her goal was to sleep with Mr. Shaynak." The girl even texted him at one point to dump him, Summers said. "I didn't plan on hanging out with you forever. It was only for school. It's not fun anymore," she allegedly wrote. The new details were gleaned from three terabytes' worth of text messages and emails between Shaynak and his alleged victims. Summers argued to reduce Shaynak's bail from $1 million to $400,000 with electronic monitoring, which was denied. Brooklyn Tech students are trying to raise money to get him sprung from jail and one has even visited him multiple times on Rikers Island, Gleeson said. Source: <http://nypost.com/2015/08/12/sex-crazed-teacher-preyed-on-vulnerable-girls-prosecutor-says/>

With Lax Supervision at State-Contracted Group Homes, Teen Prostitution and Drug Use Are Rampant A Facebook 69 Twitter 33 More shares recommend reddit email 1 By Kyle Swenson Tuesday, August 11, 2015 | 5 days ago There were raised voices and broken glass and the high-voltage emotions that pinball between a wild teen and her worried mom. In their Davie home, Bonnie had installed new locks on the windows to keep her 16-year-old daughter, Cathy, from sneaking out again. The fight ended with Cathy waving around a kitchen knife. She left in handcuffs. Hours later at the Broward County Courthouse, Cathy — a skin-and-bones blonde with the kind of sand-smooth face you see on girls in fashion magazines — was arraigned on a charge of assault with a deadly weapon. Bonnie, a 50-year-old marketing professional, sat watching her daughter, the legal jargon boxing her ears like white noise. (New Times is not publishing their real names.) The judge reviewed the teen's file, then asked Bonnie if she wanted to take her daughter home. It wasn't an easy choice. Cathy was the middle child of Bonnie's three daughters. The oldest, then 17, had set the example: sneaking out, using drugs, running with older, rougher guys. Cathy was careening along the same wayward trajectory. Her parents couldn't pinpoint why. Bonnie had walked her kids to school every day when they were young. A loving nanny had helped raise the girls for 11 years. Bonnie and her husband, Ed, a manager at a scrap-metal company, divorced in 2001 — but amicably, and both were active in raising the girls. Still, Cathy, like her older sister, was wild. Once, when she was 13 and drinking with a group of older boys, the incident ended in a sexual assault. She'd since been held back twice. Now still technically an eighth-grader at the Hallandale Adult Learning Center, she was sneaking out "four out of seven nights a week," Bonnie says. The mother was worried her youngest daughter would copy Cathy's antics. Bonnie told the judge no. "This is sad to say about your own kid," Bonnie says today, the words slipping around tears. "I thought she was safer being detained. At least we would know where she was. We would know she wasn't running. Perhaps a little harsh, but she'd be safe." Bonnie was hoping for a scared-straight scenario, hoping that the tough-love embrace of the state would even her out. Instagram showed "pictures of her mostly naked." In captions, the teen talked about being "higher than the clouds." The judge's pen went into action. Because Bonnie was a victim, the court placed a no-contact order between mother and daughter, a typical precaution in cases of domestic violence. The judge then issued a court order placing Cathy with the state. The teenager was handed over to ChildNet, a nonprofit group that contracts with the state Department of Children and Families to handle child welfare services in Broward and Palm Beach counties. Cathy was assigned a child advocate, or a point-person for managing her care and, in turn, placed in the New Lighthouse Group Home, a three-bedroom split-level house in Chula Vista, a residential neighborhood in Fort Lauderdale. The facility houses six girls between the ages of 13 and 17 who are facing juvenile criminal charges. Although barred from contacting her daughter, Bonnie felt relieved that Cathy would be in a controlled environment — until she pulled up Cathy's Instagram feed over the next couple of weeks. On it: shots from raves and parties at the Hard Rock Casino. "Pictures of her mostly naked," Bonnie says. In the captions, the teen talked about being "higher than the clouds." Bonnie was stunned. She thought her daughter was being closely supervised. Instead she was out partying — on a weeknight? "I'm just wondering, has she been reported missing? Does the group home even know?" Bonnie says. "A hundred questions pop into your head." Bonnie says the state's care of Cathy couldn't have backfired more. Cases like hers are not isolated. Lawyers at the Broward Public Defender's Office have repeatedly heard from their juvenile clients that because of lax supervision, shocking behaviors like drug-dealing and prostitution routinely take place at group homes. Police reports and court records obtained by New Times likewise describe incidents of prostitution and gang activity at several homes, and an audit conducted by the Florida Department of Children and Families (DCF) itself concedes that several agencies, including ChildNet, do not adequately supervise the facilities. Little is being done to remedy the problem, but administrators insist they are doing the best they can with the resources they have for some of the state's most troubled and tough-to-manage kids. "The biggest thing I took away was that these children all seemed like they were in a collective state of depression," says Gordon Weekes, an attorney in charge of juvenile cases at the Broward Public Defender's Office. "It seems contagious in the houses. All the children have serious levels of trauma — that was not addressed. The children seem to be recoiling into their own depression." Unfortunately for Bonnie, her daughter's situation would only get worse. Illustration by Joseph Laney Although Cathy was not allowed to contact Bonnie, Ed sometimes stopped by New Lighthouse to visit his daughter. He recalls that there was inconsistency in the check-in process. Sometimes a staff member would ask Ed for his ID and to sign in. Other times, the staff member wouldn't even get off the couch or acknowledge Ed's presence, he says. "No ID, no anything," Ed recalls. "I thought, 'Wow. I could have been her boyfriend, whoever.'" Cathy told him that, inside, "everybody wanted to fight everybody," Ed says. "None of the girls got along. She said it was a terrible situation." Cathy's older sister reported that Cathy had gotten into a brawl with a fellow resident, resulting in bite marks on her sister's shoulder. Cathy got arrested again, this time for shoplifting at a Macy's. Later, Bonnie learned her daughter had run away from the group home for three days — no one alerted Bonnie or Ed, the mother and father say. The girls were known as "group home hoes." Online, Bonnie also continued to see pictures of her daughter out partying, she says. When she logged onto the school system's parent portal to see how Cathy was faring in class, she learned her daughter wasn't showing up. Bonnie pushed for ChildNet to arrange transportation. When she emailed Cathy's ChildNet child advocate asking why she was truant, Bonnie got back a curt response. "Your daughter has a school bus," an email shows the employee replied. "Whether she gets on it or not is unknown." At Christmastime, Cathy had been in the group home nearly two months but was able to celebrate with her dad and sisters. When Bonnie saw pictures from their get-together, she noticed Cathy had expensive-looking manicured nails, hair extensions, and costly Tory Burch sandals. Cathy's sisters reported that she'd had a $100 bill in her purse. "Where did that come from?" Bonnie wondered. The mother's mind raced with worst-case scenarios. "Human trafficking? Prostitution?" When she tried to get answers, staff at the home would not return calls or would say they were not allowed to give out information, Bonnie claims. Florida's child-care system is a textbook example of outsource economics. Children facing criminal charges can be sent to either youth offender facilities run by the Department of Juvenile Justice (what insiders call "the delinquency system") or, if they have been abandoned or abused, to facilities that fall under the Department of Children and Families ("the dependency system"); the two groups usually overlap. With the dependency system, children enter a giant bureaucracy that has several layers of subcontractors. In some counties, the DCF manages foster care and group homes directly. But in 20 counties, the DCF uses contractors — called Community-Based Care Lead Agencies (or CBCs) — as middlemen, which then subcontract with and oversee independently run group homes. ChildNet is the CBC serving both Broward and Palm Beach counties. It subcontracts with 51 agencies in the two counties. The Broward branch serves 3,124 children with a staff of 404 and a $75 million budget; Palm Beach works with 2,557 kids, 109 staffers, and $48 million, according to state figures. (In Miami, a CBC called Our Kids of Miami-Dade/Monroe oversees group homes.) Regulations laid out by the DCF specify that rooms must be a certain square footage, that a bathroom is required for "every six residents," and that at least three meals a day be provided. The site must be staffed at all times. "Facility operators" — the main person in charge of the facility — are required to have "at least 90 credit hours of accredited college level coursework" or a high school degree and three years of experience working with children. Staffers need a high school diploma or equivalent and must pass a local law enforcement screening. "The facility shall take all reasonable precautions to assure that no client is exposed to, or instigates, such behaviors as might be physically or emotionally injurious to him/herself or to another person," the regulations state. In the event of a runaway, the DCF is clear: "Beyond one hour after determining that a child... is missing, staff shall immediately call local law enforcement and report the missing resident." The guidelines also require group home staff to report all "critical incidents" to the DCF within an hour of the incident. But the guidelines do not lay out specifics regarding curfews, check-in or check-out policy, or security measures. Related Stories Full Statement From ChildNet Regarding Supervision at Broward Group Homes It falls to each CBC to establish standards for subcontractors and make sure they are complying with regulations. CBCs are also supposed to create a monitoring plan for each group home. Each is supposed to be visited by a contract manager quarterly and reviewed by a monitoring team every one to three years, depending on whether it's classified as low-, medium-, or high-risk. The review involves a prearranged onsite inspection where ChildNet staffers comb through a random sample of client and personnel files and interview staff and residents. If problems are uncovered, the provider must come up with a Performance Improvement Plan within 30 days. New Lighthouse, the group home Cathy was sent to, is run by Fountain of Life Community Development Center, a faith-based nonprofit. The home's tax records show that it is also known as Project Touch Inc. It received $380,429 in public support in 2013. According to documents provided by ChildNet, New Lighthouse's latest monitoring took place in January 2013. The facility was found to be 100 percent in compliance, although the document noted, "In some instances, if the child has run away from the group home, the provider did not follow the procedures in the ChildNet policy." The agency's CEO, Dr. Sherron Parrish, did not return calls for comment for this article. On tax records, Parrish's salary is listed at $48,000, and she reports an additional $27,000 compensation from "related organizations." On her website, the "pastor, entrepreneur, speaker, financial coach, [and] community leader" states that in "1986 she became licensed as a prophetess" and has a certificate and associate's degree from International Seminary in Plymouth, Florida, and bachelor's, master's, and doctoral degrees from Friends International Christian University in Merced, California. (Neither organization holds an accreditation recognized by the U.S. Department of Education.) New Lighthouse's website states that residents would learn "Life preparation skills" and get "therapeutic training to improve behavior." The mission statement also says, "The ability to curb their instinct to run away is of paramount importance," though it's a "continuous process." Bonnie and Ed say they doubt their daughter got any "therapeutic training" while at New Lighthouse. But by the time her stay was over, she would definitely need it. Illustration by Joseph Laney Cathy's story is not isolated. Broward's public defenders see troubling cases every day. For Lauren Robinette, a young attorney tasked with defending juvenile offenders, it wasn't one story but a string of reports that made her concerned about the management — or lack of it — at group homes. Robinette's clients told her about violence and lack of supervision, even whispers about prostitution and sex trafficking. "I felt like they were just being warehoused there," Robinette says today. "When you would go there, there's no rules, no restrictions." Robinette enlisted help from her boss, Weekes, the chief assistant public defender in the juvenile division. Together, the two attorneys began making unannounced visits to clients living at group homes across Broward. "Although they had a shelter over their heads, there really was no level of parental supervision that you would expect for girls who are 15, 16, or 17 years of age," Weekes says. "They could come and go as they please. They were basically governing themselves. These teenagers were placed in the environment because they had been previously abused or neglected, so it seemed contrary to [conditions that] should be provided for these girls." No one was going to school. The attorneys say they would arrive at 10 a.m. on a weekday and find kids still in bed. No one was going to school. "They are not forced to go," Robinette points out. "If you have a parent who doesn't get a child to school, they can be charged criminally. But the State of Florida doesn't have any consequences for not getting these children to school." "This exposes the failing of privatization," Weekes says. "Privatization allows the state to alleviate itself of responsibility." Florida administrative code states that individual facilities must provide transportation for appointments and that "Each facility must provide the level of supervision necessary to ensure that residents are protected from harm and that a safe and healthy living environment is created and maintained." Beyond that, the public defenders say standards seemed nonexistent or at least poorly enforced. For instance, teens reported that although the group homes had stated curfews, they knew that police wouldn't be called until hours later, so they exploited the system and stayed out late. By last September, Weekes had seen enough to pool his concerns into a strongly worded letter to DCF Interim Secretary Mike Carroll. "It is extremely disturbing that foster care children who have often already endured significant trauma resulting from abuse, abandonment, or neglect are also being subjected to equally abusive environments while in the care, custody, and supposed protection of the State of Florida," Weekes wrote. "Foster girls that reside at the... group homes are fearful and do not feel safe or protected in these state-funded environments." Specifically, Weekes' letter focused on three Broward group homes. The ARRIS (which stands for "Accountability Respect Responsibility Integrity Self-Esteem") and AESHA ("Acts Emergency Shelter Home for Adolescents") girls' homes are a pair of properties located next to each other on a residential street north of Sunrise Boulevard near Warfield Park in Fort Lauderdale. Together, the two buildings house 19 girls between the ages of 12 and 17. The homes are owned by the Agency for Community Treatment Services Inc. (ACTS), a Tampa-based nonprofit that provides substance-abuse treatment, housing, and juvenile justice services to more than 6,000 youths across the state with a $15 million annual budget. The Crescent boys' home is an emergency shelter located ten blocks west of the ARRIS/AESHA site and houses 22 boys aged 12 to 17, all with "elevated risk factors" such as chronic runaway issues and substance abuse. The property is owned by Chrysalis Health Inc., a for-profit Broward-based health-care provider. (Chrysalis Health did not return calls for comment for this article.) One ARRIS resident had told her public defender she'd been sexually assaulted while sleeping in September 2014. Another complained of being attacked and battered by three other residents in May 2014. The attorneys heard of regular prostitution at the homes, and bad behavior seemed contagious. "At Crescent, I would have boys there, they would have zero criminal cases going in," Robinette explains. "After staying at Crescent, they would have five, six, seven cases." Because of restrictions on public access to records involving juvenile offenders, New Times could not verify the specific claims in Weekes' letter. But police records show that between January 2012 and October 2014, Fort Lauderdale Police made 71 visits to AESHA, 111 to ARRIS, and 229 to Crescent. A sampling of incident reports seems to back up the public defenders' concerns. Drug use was noted at the homes. In November 2012, a girl staying at ARRIS told Fort Lauderdale Police that "she occasionally sold marijuana and crack cocaine and that she smokes weed every day." In January 2013, patrol cars responded to reports that young men had been seen jumping over the fence at Crescent. When officers arrived, they found a still-hot marijuana pipe in the backyard. Calls regarding violence were even more common. In September 2012, police responded to Crescent when three boys locked a staff member in a dark room after she refused to let them use the phone. In March 2013, Crescent staff called police when two residents began fighting and one pulled a knife. That same month, a random search found a "Taser inside a Bible" hidden by a resident at Crescent. That April, a resident angrily flashed a three-inch knife at a staff member; later, another staff member was struck in the head. Gangland drama even spilled into the group homes. In June 2013, a youth staying at Crescent told police he'd been walking the street when a group of Crips gang members attacked, robbed, and tasered him. In July 2012, a teenage male Blood gang member who'd been arrested for homicide by the Broward Sheriff's Office had made a death threat to his girlfriend, who he believed had ratted him out for the murder. The girl, a "Ruby," or female Blood member, was staying at AESHA. Police noted in their report that the girl was rumored to "frequently facilitate meetings between girls from the [AESHA and ARRIS] houses and adults (men and women). These meetings involve the girls having sex with the adults and then being paid $15.00." Police also responded — along with child protective investigators — to reports of prostitution and sex trafficking. In May 2013, police investigated a report that a juvenile girl had run from ARRIS for Tampa, where the girl had "performed sex for money, so that she could get back to Ft. Lauderdale." Two months later, an ARRIS resident told police a man in a blue car regularly drove up and "asks the girls to come with him and exchange currency for sexual acts." She said the girls were known as "group home hoes" and admitted she "had been arrested for prostitution before and she lists herself in 'backpages'" — a reference to the escort site backpage.com. The girl told police she longed to land a real job so she could "stop selling her vagina." Two other girls at the home, however, denied the stories about prostitution. A staff member also denied prostitution was happening but conceded that "girls are always hanging out with boys in the area." A year later, an employee "stated she only heard rumors but cannot say for sure" that one resident engaged in prostitution. The girl herself admitted she used to prostitute herself but stopped. In May 2014, when police responded to a runaway call at AESHA, an employee stated "that the facility's policy is to report the children missing if they do not return before 4 a.m." — apparently in violation of DCF regulations. Illustration by Joseph Laney On a Wednesday morning this January, Bonnie was hustling to get to the courthouse for a hearing in Cathy's criminal case. While filling her gas tank, a text message from her oldest daughter flashed on her cell. "I just saw the words 'raped' and 'punched in the face,'" she remembers today. As Cathy would later explain to an investigator from the BSO, she was walking around Sawgrass Mills Mall by herself "when she was approached by a black male and black female," the detective wrote in the report. The man introduced himself as a representative from a modeling agency and said the woman was his girlfriend. He invited Cathy to dinner to discuss how she could become a model. She got into a white four-door pickup with the couple, the report says. Cathy noted that they got off the highway in Pompano Beach. They arrived at a small gray house. But then the man's girlfriend quickly left for work, leaving the 16-year-old alone inside with the strange man. Cathy told police he "punched her in the face and ripped her pants as he pulled them down, then raped her." After the assault, the attacker dropped Cathy off at her sister's boyfriend's house but warned her to keep quiet or he'd kill her or her sister, "since he now knew where she lived." Cathy's sister took her to Westside Memorial Hospital. Staff there reported the rape to police. But when investigators tried to flesh out more details of the attack, the teen clammed up, saying, "I don't want to get involved." As such, the case has led to no arrests. For Bonnie, the worst-case scenario had now come true. She left the gas station and continued on to the courthouse, where she demanded the custody of her child back, the no-contact order be damned. Mother and daughter were reunited hours later in the courthouse hallway. The girl limped over to hug her mom, tears wetting both their faces. Cathy told Bonnie she was still bleeding from the attack. Some group-home operators say they are doing the best they can. Richard E. Brown, the CEO of the nonprofit that manages ARRIS and AESHA (his salary: $164,874, according to 2013 tax records), has a tired sag in his voice when he describes the issues outlined in the Broward Public Defender's letter. From his point of view, ACTS is stuck in a tough position, providing housing and meals as required but with little authority to control residents. "If somebody wants to walk away, there is not any authority on our part to prevent that from happening." Brown says ACTS staffers will always try to dissuade a resident from leaving, but "we can't restrain them against their will. It's basically a hands-off system," Brown tells New Times. "If somebody wants to walk away, there is not any authority on our part to prevent that from happening. That's built into the system. That's not necessarily our preference." He says the residents are "supervised 24/7," but unfortunately, the children bunking at ARRIS and AESHA come with baggage, including connections to the sex work. "We're the deep end of the system," he says. "A lot of the girls come there with that experience already in their lifestyle. It's a dynamic that we are wanting to deal with. It's not that we can choose who we admit. We have to take what comes to us and have to work to provide a safe and secure environment as best we can." When contacted with questions about Cathy's case and the facility's policies, New Lighthouse provided only the following statement: "Our group home is in compliance and has policies in place to ensure adequate supervision for our clients. Our staff are also well-trained and have been following the proper protocols and procedures." ChildNet CEO Emilio Benitez (his salary: $254,300, according to 2012 tax records) responded to questions with the following statements: "Children in group homes are there to learn independent living skills and experience normalcy. All children and adolescents are monitored and carefully supervised, but residential care facilities are not juvenile detention facilities, and these children are not under lock and key." Benitez continued: "While we are prohibited by law from discussing any particular case, client, or incident, it's important to know that we are taking the time to reassess the residential model and determine the best path forward." Following Weekes' letter last September, the DCF's Carroll responded with a review of the allegations, one by one. He said that the September 2014 ARRIS sexual assault was investigated but that "the alleged victim as well as alleged witness denied anything occurred." Crimes that occurred off the property were out of ChildNet's control. In terms of human trafficking, the group homes stated they continued to work with local law enforcement. Problems at Crescent were attributed to "a recent escalation in behaviors from one particular young man that had created a challenging situation." The follow-up report noted that all the facilities mentioned in Weekes' letter were visited by ChildNet monitors in September. No concerns were noted. According to documents from ChildNet, ARRIS and AESHA were both subject to monitoring in March 2012. ARRIS scored a 97 percent on its compliance, with the only issue falling on the number of residents who had gone to the dentist. AESHA scored a 95 percent. Still, "staff should show more concern for the children's education," a child advocate noted to monitors. "Don't just allow them to sit around the house and not attend school." Another child advocate responded that the home "needs to have activities both recreational and therapeutic for the client and not allow them to come and go as they want. This is very important for the younger girls and those involved in human trafficking due to the area the program is located in." ARRIS was also reviewed in March 2014. The facility passed with a 97 percent compliance score. But the monitors noted that only "three of seven applicable girls had demonstrated improvement or maintained passing grades (GPA of 1.0 or above) while in the program." "Due to the population they serve, the Provider struggles with girls running away and missing their scheduled appointments," the report notes. "It's hard to reach some of the girls who have no direction," a staff told the monitoring team. Chrysalis Health's centers — including Crescent — were last monitored in June 2012. The review found the site 100 percent compliant with the contract. After Weekes' letter, the DCF called for a monthly meeting of ChildNet supervisors and subcontractors to discuss group home issues. Kim Gorsuch, DCF's community development administrator for Broward, who organized the meetings, says that around the same time Weekes' letter was received, "we had experienced a significant increase in the numbers of children coming into care, and that is putting stress on the entire system in terms of capacity." But the group hasn't met since June. Gorsuch explains that everyone is anticipating a "considerable conversation about group care" in the next legislative session. Between January 2014 and February 2015, the DCF performed an audit and inspected six of Florida's 17 CBCs, ChildNet's Palm Beach operation among them. Auditors found that, in some cases, ChildNet had failed to create monitoring plans — a violation of ChildNet's own policy. Confronted, the organization said that such plans were "not useful for planning purposes" but that they were "currently redeveloping" the process to incorporate the required process. The audit concluded in March 2015 found that while CBCs were failing to keep an eye on subcontractors, the DCF was also failing to watch the CBCs. Across the state, the audit concluded, "The CBCs' subcontractor monitoring efforts need improvements. The Department did not always adequately conduct, document, review, and report the results of CBC monitoring." The assault charge against Cathy is still pending. A month after she was raped, 12 adults, most armed with legal degrees — including her public defender, her guardian ad litem, her guardian ad litem's attorney, her ChildNet case manager, the manager's supervisor, a ChildNet attorney, and the prosecutor — gathered in a hearing to decide whether Cathy should stay at home or enter another program. Cathy, the lone child in the room, looked puzzled, as though she were struggling to understand the legalese. The hearing stretched for four hours with no decision made. Another hearing was slotted into the calendar weeks down the line. "Such," Bonnie said bitterly later, "an ineffective system." Cathy was discharged from New Lighthouse and returned home with Bonnie. In the following months, she began booking from the house at night. Eventually, she was gone for two months. When the girl returned, she was taken to SafePlace, a ChildNet-run emergency shelter. It became a pattern: running away on her own, turning up at SafePlace, running again. "This is going to sound odd, but I'm almost comforted that she is not in the care of ChildNet, that she is bouncing around all these other places — which is sad," Bonnie said recently, choking down a bout of tears. "I don't feel comfortable about who is looking out for her. Because nobody is." Source: <http://www.browardpalmbeach.com/news/with-lax-supervision-at-state-contracted-group-homes-teen-prostitution-and-drug-use-are-rampant-7173727>

Ten Ways to Promote Permanence for Foster Youths by Jim Kenny August 11, 2015 There are only two truly permanent outcomes for children in temporary care: reunification or adoption. For many reasons, the child suffers in limbo while we allegedly try "to get it right." By accepting delays as long as two to three years, we are certainly getting it wrong. Little, however, is likely to change by lecture or by fiat. Systems need to be modified. Here are ten recommendations that may help improve outcomes. Preserve the birth family. Improve reunification outcomes by beginning immediately upon removal with an early case plan and insisting on a commitment to specific remedies from the birth parents. Train caseworkers and foster parents together. Learn to understand the similarities and differences in roles. Change the financial incentives for agencies by rewarding them with some form of bonus for adoption so that long-term foster care can no longer be perceived as a financial loss. Encourage foster/adopt parents to apply for and accept the maximum subsidies available. The subsidy money is for the child. Improve professional staff with a focus on permanency outcomes. Reward case managers who monitor weekly and achieve successful outcomes. Encourage education about attachment and bonding in psychology and social work programs. Focus on attachment issues with caseworkers. Encourage law schools to develop courses and programs about foster and adoption policies and laws. Work primarily with and through the parents in therapy rather than the child. Healing of attachment disorders takes place in the home, not in a therapist's office. Consider cooperative adoption. Fear of losing her child may be the only factor holding back a birth mother's voluntary consent to termination. Involve the foster teen in planning his or her own future. Consider the approach of You Gotta Believe and Pat O'Brien. Include the voice of foster parents in court. Support legislation and policy strategies to provide a significant voice in conferences and courts for foster parents. They have the most day-to-day knowledge and may care the most and yet they are the only party involved that lacks legal standing. According to the Adoption and Safe Families Act (ASFA), the child's needs and rights are paramount. And every child has need for, and right to, a permanent home. Jim Kenny is a retired psychologist with over 50 years of clinical experience. The author of 13 books on family and child care, Dr. Kenny's recent books are Attachment and Bonding in the Foster and Adopted Child and What Foster Parents Need to Know. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/blogger-co-op/ten-ways-to-promote-permanence-for-foster-youths/11933>

We Can Do Better Than This: The Foster Care Bill of Rights | Danielle Gletow We Can Do Better Than This: The Foster Care Bill of Rights Posted: 08/11/2015 4:13 pm EDT Updated: 08/11/2015 4:59 pm EDT Share 128 Tweet 50 Email 0 Comment 5 tumblr reddit On Wednesday, August 5, 2015 I watched Governor Jack Markell of Delaware sign into law HB46, the state's Foster Care Bill of Rights. As Governor Markell signed the bill surrounded by current and former foster youth, I began to read through the copy given to me when I arrived. Though I was certainly thrilled to see this happening and moved by the genuine care Markell expressed for the young people around him, I was a bit stunned when I got to the details. "To be told why I am in foster care." "To live in a safe place without abuse or neglect." "To receive food, water, shelter and clothing to meet my own individual needs." As I continued to read I couldn't help thinking: "Aren't these just basic human rights? Is this not already guaranteed?" The fact that the state of Delaware, or any state for that matter, needs to have a formal law carefully outlining such basic definitions of quality care concerned me greatly. It concerned me, but unfortunately I can't say it surprised me. For the past eight years I have seen nearly everything negative that there is to see in the foster care system. I have welcomed children into my home with little more than the ill-fitting clothing on their backs and a bag of dirty belongings. I have met hundreds of children across the country that are legally free for adoption yet still moving from foster home to group home without finding a permanent place to call home. I have worked with children who have aged out of the system who have received little to no preparation for life beyond care - and I've watched them struggle and struggle significantly. After returning to New Jersey I began to do more research around the rights of children in foster care in the United States and the documentation of those rights. I found several outdated documents that address the need for a Bill of Rights as well as reference to a bill ratified in Philadelphia in 1973. I also found a project from the National Council of State Legislatures that notes that only 15 US states have a Foster Care Bill of Rights. In reading through them I noticed not all were as clearly defined and understandable as Delaware's HB46. What has truly been weighing so heavily on me since I watched that bill signing is not just that it appears that there is no standard, detailed and easy to read Foster Care Bill of Rights but that this information is not that easy to find. It makes me wonder how many youth entering and living in the foster care system are being given this information, and maybe more importantly, being given information on what to do and where to go if they feel their rights are being violated. We have a long way to go in reforming a system that is riddled with inadequacies. I appreciate that in a system with so many exceptions, it is hard to make rules but as more time passes the more we will be subjecting kids who did not ask to be in this situation to less than stellar care. This after they are removed from their homes with the promise of better care and a better environment than the one they came from. I write this piece with three goals in mind: 1. I hope that it will encourage more people to become involved in supporting our young people in the foster care system as there are so many ways to do so; many of which do not involve a huge commitment of time and resources. This list is a great place to start. 2. I hope to hear from young people in foster care and from other advocates about what information is available regarding children's rights in foster care. I'd like to use this to compile a more complete resource page to be posted on One Simple Wish's website for our social service agency partners and foster parents and children. 3. I hope to encourage every state not only to enact a Foster Care Bill of Rights but to have a clear plan to implement it, distribute it and make it publicly accessible. I must end on a positive note. I mentioned above that in eight years I have seen most of the negatives within the foster care system. But I want to be sure I mention that I have also seen most of the positives. I have worked with passionate leaders who are working tirelessly to create programs that will improve lives and outcomes for our kids. I have met with amazingly dedicated foster parents who have opened their homes to dozens of children in the course of their lives. I have had the pleasure of seeing countless smiles from children who have received granted wishes from One Simple Wish thanks to the kindness of thousands of strangers. There is hope. And with this I know there will continue to be progress. I hope that more people will join me in this mission to not just promise a better life for children in foster care, but to deliver it. As always, I'd love to hear your thoughts and feedback. Email me anytime here. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/danielle-gletow/we-can-do-better-than-thi_3_b_7967762.html

Ayotte calls on federal health officials to ease licensing requirements that N.H. drug treatment facilities must meet in order to bill insurance under expanded Medicaid By Allie Morris Concord Monitor Wednesday, August 12, 2015 (Published in print: Wednesday, August 12, 2015) Share on emailEmailPrintShare on facebookShare on twitterShare on gmailMore Sharing Services 3 U.S. Sen. Kelly Ayotte is calling on federal health officials to ease licensing requirements that New Hampshire drug treatment facilities must meet in order to bill insurance under the state's expanded Medicaid program. Officials say increasing treatment options is key in dealing with the state's substance abuse issue. While more than 100,000 people in New Hampshire meet the criteria for a substance use disorder, the publicly funded sector currently has the capacity to treat roughly 5,000 people, according to officials. As the calls for action grow, some treatment centers are struggling to meet the costly requirements of a new health care facility license they need to enroll as Medicaid providers. The license wasn't necessary when the facilities relied primarily on state funding. The license calls for facilities to have specific furniture or room sizes and also requires them to meet certain life safety codes including fire protection and electrical standards, said New Hampshire Department of Health and Human Services spokesman Jake Leon. Three treatment centers are already in compliance, and four others are going through the licensing process now. Treatment centers have until June 30 to comply with the rules necessary to get a health care facility license, according to Ayotte's letter. "At a time when access to treatment is already lacking, burdensome and costly regulations should not further hinder the ability of individuals struggling with addiction to get the help they need," the Republican wrote to U.S. HHS Secretary Sylvia Burwell on Tuesday, urging the department to work with New Hampshire on the regulations. "Surely, we can achieve a situation where residential treatment centers offer safe places where individuals can receive treatment without facilities having to cut the number of beds and therefore the number of people they are able to treat." At Serenity Place in Manchester, few of the facility's 26 beds meet the new licensing standard, which requires each client to have 80 square feet of personal space, along with a desk, a lamp, a closet and a chair, CEO Sharon Drake told the Monitor in June. Drake did not return a request for comment Tuesday. At a time when the waitlist for the center's transitional living services spans roughly 10 weeks, Drake said, administrators are deciding whether to reduce the number of beds in order to comply with the requirement. Some facilities have already begun or completed the licensing process, and see Medicaid expansion as a critical way to add beds and treatment services. But many are holding off on those investments until the future of the state's Medicaid expansion program is certain. It is set to expire in 2016, unless lawmakers vote to reauthorize it. They have yet to do so, but Republican leadership promises a debate in January. The Friendship House in Bethlehem is already licensed and the only state-funded residential treatment center in the North Country. Officials there are waiting to invest in costly projects to increase treatment capacity at the 18-bed facility until lawmakers determine the fate of the health care program. Licensing nine additional beds in the Friendship House that are already set up, but not permitted for use, would cost several hundred thousand dollars, Michael Coughlin, CEO of Tri-County Cap, which oversees the Friendship House, told the Monitor earlier this year. Leon said HHS has been working over the past two years with treatment providers to help them come into compliance with license requirements. While the state may consider a waiver when it comes to the size of a room, the department "can't agree with loosening regulations when it comes to fire protection, electrical standards and basic life safety issues," Leon said. "We feel like the department has worked very hard to help and support these efforts, recognizing the need for more providers," he said. Source: <http://www.vnews.com/news/18144537-95/ayotte-calls-on-federal-health-officials-to-ease-licensing-requirements-that-nh-drug-treatment#>

The Shortcomings Of The Foster Care System Comments \(1\) | child welfare, foster care agencies, foster care system, foster youth, government officials, L.A. County, Lucci quadruplets, Media, mental abuse, Opinion, physical abuse, poverty, Sexual Abuse, Subsidies, substance addiction, taxpayer dollars, United States Marina Peña | 1439328913 August 11, 2015 | 2:35 p.m. PDT PDT story Columnist Tweet View image | gettyimages.com Every child deserves a safe place to call home. Sadly, not every parent is capable of providing their child a stable home environment. Due to a number of reasons ranging from physical or sexual abuse to substance addiction and poverty, close to 400,000 children in the United States find themselves in the foster care system. If they are lucky and work hard to overcome the obstacles thrown their way, they end up like Bianca, Madison, Tiffany, and Paris Lucci, who have been in the system since the age of 11. The quadruplets entered the foster care system one Christmas Eve after suffering from abuse and abandonment. For the next few years, the girls were in and out of foster homes and group homes. Nonetheless, in 2011, they were reunited in Rancho Palos Verdes, where they all graduated from high school back in June. With plans to continue their education, Madison, Tiffany and Paris Lucci will be headed to Long Beach City College. Meanwhile, Bianca Lucci will be headed to Humboldt State University in hopes of earning a degree in criminal justice. Unfortunately, in many ways, the story of the Lucci quadruplets is an anomaly. In Los Angeles County alone, less than half of foster-care youth graduate from high school and even fewer graduate from college. Additionally, conservative studies of the U.S. show that one in five children in foster care will become homeless after the age of 18, when they "age out" of the system. Less than three percent will earn a college degree, only half will be employed at 24. Among young women, 71 percent will be pregnant by 21. One in four children will have suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder, at twice the rate of war veterans. It is safe to say that the foster care system is failing many of our children. Intentionally designed to serve as a temporary haven for those who are abused and neglected, foster care is instead leading them to situations fraught with further uncertainty. A 2004 study of foster homes in New Mexico, Oklahoma and Oregon revealed that the average foster-care provider's length of service was less than eight months. Moreover, a 2010 Casey Family study also found that 65 percent of all foster children have attended seven or more schools. The fact that many foster children have had to endure this level of instability is astonishing and frankly unacceptable. Children are not suitcases that we can drag around from place to place and expect them to turn out just fine. No. Not in the slightest bit. They are human beings. And just like any other person, they require a reliable and hospitable place to call home. Not only that, they also need safety in their homes, free from mental or physical abuse. However, statistics show that the number of children abused while in foster care is far too great. A 2010 study of adults in Washington and Oregon who have been emancipated from the foster-care system revealed that a third of former foster children reported being abused by an adult in their foster homes. After taking a closer look at these statistics, it's no wonder why roughly 22 percent of the child population decides to flee the system. If they're bound to face similar circumstances in foster care as they did in the homes they came from, then why not just run away? No matter what the case may be, escaping the system should not be a realistic solution for foster children. To confront the shortcomings of the foster care system, however, we must first discuss the structural issues that lead them to enter it in the first place. In the words of author and foster care expert, Cris Beam, the children in the system are "not just a meter of how child welfare is failing or succeeding, they're a meter of how we are failing or succeeding as a society." Some children are rescued by child welfare workers from their homes of origin, where they are being beaten or sexually violated. Yet the reality is that most children enter the foster care system due to poverty, not abuse. An estimated 16 million children in the U.S. were living below the poverty line in 2012. With that said, one way to improve the state of the foster care system is to make it less indispensable in our society. Providing larger subsidies to parents who are too impoverished to take care of their children would be a great start. After all, children who are placed in foster care are proven to face lifelong challenges more so than those that remain with their own families. Nonetheless, we cannot forget about the thousands of children who already find themselves in foster care. Instead of paying millions to troubled foster care agencies, elected officials with decision-making powers and discretion over taxpayer dollars should find innovative ways to provide foster children with more secure, stable and loving homes. But first, the problems concerning the nation's foster care system must enter our everyday conversations. The media does an impressive job at featuring exceptional cases like that of the Lucci quadruplets beating the odds or dreadful ones about parents abandoning their children. Yet an ongoing conversation about foster care remains absent. If change is to be expected, more people will need to become informed about the issues troubling the system. Only then can we begin to improve the lives of the most vulnerable - children. Reach Columnist Marina Peña here, or follow her on Twitter. Source: <http://www.neontommy.com/news/2015/08/shortcomings-foster-care-system>

More parents come forward with sex abuse allegations against... | www.wpxi.com More parents come forward with sex abuse allegations against home for troubled children 4 68 9 184 Related View Larger Glade Run Lutheran Services in Zelenople Zelenople facility under investigation for alleged sexual abuse among children Sponsored Links ZELIENOPLE, Pa. — Since Channel 11's Renee Kaminski's report on Monday about an investigation into a Zelenople residential facility for troubled children, more parents have contacted the news station with allegations that their children were also sexually abused

while being treated at the Glade Run Lutheran Services center. Zelienople facility under investigation for alleged sexual abuse among children "I was livid. I got so stressed out. I got sick and was in the hospital afterwards. It's too much to take in," one Somerset County mother, who did not want to be identified, said. Kaminski confirmed last week that the Pennsylvania Department of Human Services and Zelienople police are investigating the 95-bed residential treatment facility. FREE APPS | NOW | FACEBOOK | TWITTER Stories of the day... Kind stranger pays parking ticket, leaves heartwarming note for mother of sick baby Miss Pennsylvania U.S. International winner accused of lying about battling cancer Parents drive 2 hours before realizing they left toddler at rest stop Fayette Co. man accused of abducting, raping teen A spokesperson for the DHS issued the following statement about the investigation to Channel 11 News last Monday: "DHS' Bureau of Human Services Licensing received a report of sexual mistreatment from ChildLine on July 31, 2015. The reporter alleged that nine male children, ages 8-12 years old, were involved in ongoing sexual interactions at the facility from March 2015 through July 2015. "Because the children involved do not meet the definition of a perpetrator as per the Child Protective Services Law, BHSI conducted child interviews on August 6 and 7, 2015. Investigation is ongoing and in coordination with law enforcement." Among the negative comments about the facility on social media were some positive ones. "My son went to St. Stephen's part of Glade Run. I just want people to know the school had and does do positive things," one parent wrote on WPXI's Facebook page. However, for the mother Kaminski spoke with on Monday, she said she now realizes others endured what happened to her 11-year-old daughter. "As soon as I saw that, it was like this is not an isolated incident. It hit home that (she) wasn't the only one," the mother said. According to the Somerset County woman, her daughter spent 2012 in treatment at Glade Run, where she was molested by a group of girls in her cottage. "She was very open and told us because she had been previously sexually abused when she was younger, so she knew that was wrong," the mother said. The Somerset County woman said she reported the incident to officials at Glade Run and removed her daughter immediately. She said she also contacted the Department of Public Welfare. "They investigated the child safety and found evidence of a violation," she said. The DPW's website, where state licensing officials said inspection information of the alleged violation and evidence of compliance would be found, had no record of the investigation or violation. "I don't believe any changes were made," the Somerset County mother said. Glade Run officials told Kaminski last week that they're conducting an internal investigation and are considering adding additional security and cameras. Source: <http://www.wpxi.com/news/news/local/more-parents-come-forward-sex-abuse-allegations-ag/nmJM8/>

Staff mishandled violent outbursts Thursday, August 13, 2015 - 06:00 print comments Be the first one to rate this article! 1 2 3 4 5 By Mike Ford Staff Writer
ORANGE PARK – A Department of Children and Families investigation that forced BASCA Inc. to close one of its four group homes last week is detailed in a 13-page report from the Agency for Persons with Disabilities. The APD report details neglect in handling violent behavior, preventing authorities from learning of violent incidents and an attempt to interfere in the investigation on the part of BASCA's executive director, John Cone. According to the agency's emergency license suspension order, BASCA tried to control a group home resident's violent behavior by having staff lock themselves in an office and by having residents run to their bedrooms. The order also declares incident reports to have been altered or omitted altogether with staff directed to from page 1 not call 911, but to contact Cone instead. "Since the DCF investigator has been involved, Mr. Cone has been interfering with staff and having staff call to recant their stories," states the order from APD. Cone said he can't go in to detail at this time, but said Aug. 11, he denies the allegation. "That's incorrect – I can't go in to detail yet, but I was misquoted. I did not say that," he said. Cone said his legal representatives have been in communication with APD and were hoping to meet late this week. Cone expressed his desire for the public to suspend judgment on BASCA because they are waiting to meet with APD before publicly telling their side of the story. According to the order, there were two residents at the Pine Forest Group Home who displayed violent outbursts, but the order only details two incidents by one of the residents, identified as Resident I and some persons' names have been redacted. "Staff were directed to report suspected abuse to Mr. Cone in lieu of contacting the abuse hotline when they suspected that residents might be at risk due to Resident I's behaviors. Because Resident I's behaviors are so frequent and other human rights violations may occur to other residents as a result of trying to control Resident I's behaviors via means other than those described in an APD-approved behavior plan, it is unclear for how long and to what extent the possible abuse and neglect has gone on and may continue," the report reads. The first incident the order details is tied to a "non-critical incident report" filed on or about June 13. The order says Resident I went into a rage after requesting tea. The report says he grabbed his direct care staff member by the wrist and attempted to pull her wrist toward himself to bite her and moved toward her while growling and biting her hand. The order states she braced herself and was eventually able to get free. Another staff member took Resident I outside in order to protect the other residents and the staff member who had been attacked. Resident I remained outside in an agitated state for approximately an hour, according to the order. The report states law enforcement drove by and spotted Resident I. Staff informed law enforcement of the incident and the officer informed Resident I that if he attacked staff again, he would be removed from the home. The injured staff member was taken to a hospital and given a wrist brace to wear until the injury healed. Later in the document, the order reads that "human rights violations have occurred due to 'unofficial' restrictions for [Resident I] against residents in the home and were ongoing and no changes were enacted by the organization to redress the issues." It goes on to say BASCA was fined for not providing a behavior plan and that, "though it was noted in a current unapproved behavior plan that [Resident I] has injured staff and resident, it took (sic) organization over a year to locate a behavior analyst almost a year prior to current plan but organization chose not to engage leaving [Resident I] without an effective safety plan, putting residents, Resident I and staff at risk for harm and reported incidents verbally or on logs indicate that residents and staff were harmed in the interim." The agency found there to be a high safety risk and issued the emergency order to close the group home on Aug. 5. It also decided to remove BASCA from its Medicaid waiver program with a 90-day period for residents of BASCA's other group homes to find another place to live. Because BASCA funds the group homes with Medicaid money attached to each resident, those funds will be lost and the group homes effectively closed unless taken over by another organization licensed to do so. The order says on or about June 18, Resident I physically attacked his one-on-one staff while being transported back to the group home after a day at the adult day training facility. Law enforcement was contacted and he was taken to a location that was redacted from the APD report. The order says "when Resident I was released, he was very agitated and verbalized that he needed to be locked up, as he was not safe and could hurt someone." The order goes on to say on or about June 23, the DCF abuse hotline received a complaint about supervision in the group home and that Resident I had bitten himself or hit other residents. The only mention in the order of the second resident displaying violent behavior indicates the DCF abuse report was closed July 31 with respect to Resident II with a high overall safety risk "for the same reasons as mentioned for Resident I. Resident II's waiver support coordinator said she did not have all incident reports and received only those incident reports where Resident II was the aggressor." The order states there was credible evidence to support the allegation of inadequate supervision in the group home. It also declares that "collateral sources" stated that the home is a "problem" and staff appeared to be uncomfortable speaking with state officials in the home due to cameras. Staff members, the order states, said incidents have not been reported to state officials or to residents' families. Staff members stated that they "feared for family members who receive BASCA services if they speak openly" and that staff were not trained to keep Resident I or other residents safe when Resident I lashed out. Staff members also stated they have been threatened with law enforcement involvement by Cone for not writing an incident report, but had not been trained to write incident reports and that staff were directed to not call 911, but to contact Cone. The order also details an incident connected to a "non-critical incident report" filed on or about Aug. 2 involving Resident I, a 911 call and injury to Cone. The Agency for Persons with Disabilities found the situation to be pervasive, ongoing and serious in nature to the point that the agency's actions against BASCA were "appropriate and necessary under the circumstances," according to the order. It also declares that "emergency suspension of the group home's license is the least-restrictive means of addressing the immediate threat to the health and safety of the residents who are developmentally disabled." BASCA's Pine Forest Group Home was ordered to be closed last week by the Florida Agency for Persons with Disabilities. Source: http://www.claytodayonline.com/ee/claytoday/en/component/fullstory/20150813_001_art_2/staff-mishandled-violent-outbursts

Corinth man charged with sexual abuse of patient at group home Posted: Aug 13, 2015 8:51 AM PDT Updated: Aug 13, 2015 8:51 AM PDT Posted by Mary Grace Eppes Email Connect meppes@wibt.com Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on email Source: AG's office ALCORN COUNTY, MS - A Corinth man has been arrested for sexual battery of a vulnerable person. 48-year-old Danny Ray Triplett was arrested Wednesday by investigators with the Attorney General's Office Medicaid Fraud Control Unit with assistance from the Alcorn County Sheriff's Department. He is charged with one count of sexual battery of a vulnerable person. Triplett admitted to sexually penetrating the victim while at the Group Home and is charged with "willfully, unlawfully and feloniously engaging in sexual penetration with a vulnerable person." The victim is an adult man who has been diagnosed with profound mental disabilities.

Triplett was booked into Alcorn County Jail and bond was set at $10,000. He could face a maximum of 30 years in jail and $10,000 in fines. Source: <http://www.msnewsnow.com/story/29779730/corinth-man-charged-with-sexual-abuse-of-patient-at-group-home>

Federal lawsuit challenging New York's 'dangerous' foster care program is near settlement BY Jennifer Fermino NEW YORK DAILY NEWS
Wednesday, August 12, 2015, 10:19 PM A A A 61 Facebook 20 Twitter Reddit Email Comments 79 Share Print Share this URL Richard Harbus/(Richard Harbus for New York Dai Public Advocate Letitia James filed the lawsuit along with advocates on behalf of 10 kids. A federal civil rights lawsuit that claims the city and the state have for years condemned kids to "one of the most dangerous foster-care systems in the country" is close to settling, the Daily News has learned. The state, in a letter submitted to the court on Wednesday, said that an "amicable solution" is possible, and that it is "close to reaching an agreement" that would satisfy all parties. Public Advocate Letitia James — who filed the suit along with advocates on behalf of 10 kids — said she was grateful the state was moving quickly. The lawsuit was filed last month in Manhattan Federal Court. The city declined to comment. Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/lawsuit-fix-ny-foster-care-program-settlement-article-1.2323920>

Liberty County Maternity Group Home Denied By Ian Margol Published: August 13, 2015, 10:22 pm Updated: August 13, 2015, 11:08 pm 2Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) 2 Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) 23Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) 23 Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) If you drove by the blue, single-story Walthourville house, you'd likely never notice it and you certainly wouldn't be able to tell it's at the center of a heated debate. The non-profit, Emanuel Loving Arms Residential Child Care Inc., is trying to turn the three-bedroom home into a maternity group home for pregnant teenage girls with nowhere else to go. But neighbors like Cricket Moser, who lives next door to the proposed site, are worried it's going to bring a lot of issues. "Baby daddies, parents, you can't keep them from communicating with their families," said Moser. "Every house has drama and no matter if it's that or if it's a [regular] home you're going to have drama and you can't avoid that." If approved, the home would provide healthcare, housing and even educational support to several pregnant teenagers hand chosen by the government for the first eight weeks of their pregnancies. While E.L.A. has already gotten approval from Liberty County for conditional use of the house, the Walthourville City Council voted not to approve the project, citing complaints from neighbors. But the non-profit's COO Mary McCray doesn't think they fully grasp what benefits it would could provide and tells News 3 that E.L.A. is appealing the city's decision. "If somebody cared enough to give them a chance, don't you think that would change their attitude? Change their way of life?" said McCray. Because of the ongoing appeal, the Walthourville city council was unable to comment, but the city attorney said they will be holding another public meeting in September or early October and will then re-vote. Source: <http://wsav.com/2015/08/13/liberty-county-maternity-group-home-denied/>

Iowa residents sentenced in Va. to long prison terms in sex-trafficking case marked by torture Published August 14, 2015 Associated Press Facebook 24 Twitter 9 Email Print RICHMOND, Va. — Two Iowa residents were sentenced to decades in prison Friday for forcing a young woman into prostitution and torturing her, leaving her with physical and psychological scars that a judge said might never heal. U.S. District Judge Henry Hudson sentenced Aldair Hodza to almost 42 years in prison. He sentenced Laura Sorensen to 40 years. ADVERTISEMENT Defense attorneys and prosecutors had recommended prison terms of 35 years — 11 more than the top end of the federal sentencing guideline range for their guilty pleas to transporting a person across state lines for prostitution. Hudson said that after looking at photographs of the victim's wounds, he decided even that was not enough. "She may never be able to have a normal relationship because of the unusual and rare level of depravity in this case," Hudson said. According to court papers, the defendants from Clive, Iowa, lured the victim into a recreational vehicle last December by saying they would take her to see a friend. Prosecutor Angela Miller said the sign posted over the entrance to Dante's Inferno — "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here" — would have been appropriate over the door of that RV. For the next 18 days, the 20-year-old victim was sexually assaulted and forced to have sex with men who answered online ads. Hodza, 41, and Sorensen, 31, burned her with keys and scissors heated over the RV's stove and extinguished cigarettes on her body. The drove nails into her feet, poured bleach into her wounds, and dragged her by a dog leash down a gravel path. Hodza's 8-year-old daughter witnessed some of the abuse and was in the vehicle during some of the sex acts. The victim feared for her life after Hodza slit a dog's throat in the RV and threatened to kill her by slowly cutting out her organs if she did not cooperate, the prosecutor said. The torture finally ended when a trucker at a New Kent County truck stop called police after spotting through the RV window a woman who appeared frightened and malnourished. Sorensen trembled as Miller recited details of the abuse. The victim, surrounded by family and friends, listened but did not testify. Miller said she has been unable to talk about the ordeal even to her doctors. Both defendants apologized before being sentenced. "This is monstrous, horrible, senseless, inexplicable, inexcusable," Hodza said. "I offer sincere apologies. I know that doesn't mean much because I can't take back what happened." Sorensen said she is "very sorry" and added: "I made a bad choice. However, I am not a bad person." The judge said he believes Sorensen is dangerous and that Hodza has "a dangerously dark side." "Some of the things you did to this young lady are so horrifying you cannot capture it in words," Hudson told Hodza. Defense attorneys said both defendants were abused as children. They agreed to lengthy sentences to avoid charges of kidnapping, which is punishable by up to life in prison. Source: <http://www.foxnews.com/us/2015/08/14/iowa-residents-sentenced-in-va-to-long-prison-terms-in-sex-trafficking-case/>

Wheeling man accused of sexually abusing a foster child in his care Updated: Friday, August 14 2015, 05:40 PM EDT WHEELING, W.Va. — A Wheeling man has been accused of sexually abusing a foster child in his care. West Virginia State Police say the girl was from another area of the state and living in Ohio County. The alleged abuse was reported when she returned home. Lance Jackson allegedly gave a 17-year-old girl in his care drugs and then sexually abused her. Now he's in jail facing a lengthy prison stay. Jackson is from Wheeling, and according to reports, he and his wife cared for several foster children. West Virginia State Police Sgt. Matthew Adams with the Crimes Against Children Task Force says he believes Jackson also has a drug problem that he shared with at least one foster child. "The victim in the crime had disclosed that there were incidents when the defendant, when Mr. Jackson, would purchase heroin prior to and after the alleged acts took place," Adams said. The alleged victim has been taken out of the Jackson family's care. The wife has not been charged with any crime. Lance Jackson is charged with sexual abuse. He faces 10-20 years in prison and his bond is set at $125,000. He is in the Northern Regional Jail. Source: http://www.wtov9.com/shared/news/features/top-stories/stories/wtov_wheeling-man-accused-sexually-abusing-foster-child-his-care-9912.shtml

Illegal group home in Belton tied to Austin location 37 mins ago JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — AUSTIN (KXAN) — The Texas Department of Aging and Disability Services had to find emergency housing for 22 people found living in an illegal assisted living facility where residents experienced various medical issues. Around 3:15 p.m. Friday, Austin-Travis County EMS responded to the home in the 1800 block of Wildrose Drive for multiple welfare calls. Four patients were transported, 17 more were assisted on scene and one person left with family members. According to ATCEMS, the home is a 1,400 square foot building with no air conditioning. Cecilia Cavuto from DADS told KXAN they found out about the Wildrose Drive location on Friday after investigating another unlicensed assisted living facility operated by the same owner, 45-year-old Renee Segura, in Belton, Texas. On Aug. 5, DADS received a tip regarding a facility called 'God's Blessings' in Belton. When investigators went into the facility, they found 30 people living inside in poor conditions. "Some of the residents were dirty, emaciated and had a strong body odor," according to information included in court documents. Check the licensing of an assisted living facility here. According to court documents, there were also registered sex offenders in the building and staff reported that there was a male resident "having sexual relations with most of the female residents and most of these women are not capable of making the decision to consent." God's Blessing in Belton While the conditions were reported as unsafe and an "immediate threat," Cavuto said DADS had to wait for a temporary restraining order (TRO)—since the facility wasn't licensed—before they were able to shut down the facility and keep Segura from operating group homes anywhere in Texas. The TRO was issued on Aug. 13 but when DADS investigators showed up to the Belton location on Aug. 14, the facility was empty. The agency quickly worked to track down the operator and came up with a location in Austin. "We found that [Wildrose] place while investigating addresses associated with Ms. Segura after we found the Belton facility empty," explained Cavuto. Cavuto believes Segura took the people from the Belton home to the Austin home sometime earlier this week. Austin police say they arrested Segura on Friday because she was interfering with investigators at the scene. She posted bond on Saturday afternoon. DADS said operating an unlicensed group home could come with monetary penalties as well as criminal prosecution. Families recount experience with God's Blessing Rowland Andrade says his mother was in the home for over a year. This past April, he laid her to rest. "I should've checked in. That is something that I have to live with for the rest of my life. I should've done that," Andrade remembers. Andrade says he travels a lot for work and it stopped him from being able to check in on his mom on a regular basis. The last time he checked in was when he got this call from God's Blessing in March when they told him his mom was in the intensive care unit. "And she is getting ready to die. So you should probably call Renee or St. David's ICU. Just thought you should know, click," Andrade recounts the conversation. Since then Andrade has opened up his own personal investigation as to whether or not being at God's Blessings expedited his mother's death. He says she died of colon cancer. For Luther Meredith he claims his mother is still supposed to be in the Owens' care. At least that is what he thought until he saw KXAN's story Friday night. "I am very pissed off about the whole thing. I wanna know where the hell my mama is at," Luther Meredith says. Meredith says his mother checked into God's Blessings this year. Just a few weeks ago communication dropped off and now he has no clue where his mother is. "It's pretty scary not to know where your family is when they are supposed to be at said place," Meredith says. But Rowland says these are warning signs that could be deadly. So he advises family members like Meredith, to pay attention. "If she starts to sound different that is a red flag you need to go over there. If you lose direct communication with her where you have to go through them, that is another red flag," Andrade warns. Source: <http://kxan.com/2015/08/14/dads-illegal-group-home-with-no-a-c-prompts-emergency/>

Boot camps for troubled youth need oversight Transparency of programs for troubled youths is long overdue By The Tribune
 letters@thetribunenews.com August 16, 2015 2015-08-16T11:53:26Z The Tribune The Tribune Facebook Twitter Google Plus More Linkedin Reddit YouTube E-mail Print Order a reprint of this story Camp San Luis Obispo JOE JOHNSTON — jjohnston@thetribunenews.com Today's Deal \$7 for \$14 worth of sandwiches and drinks at Piemonte's Italian Delicatessen in SLO \$7.00 Buy Now! Recent Headlines Firefighters and volunteers deserve praise and relaxation after battling Cuesta Fire Cuesta Fire another reminder that these devastating blazes can be prevented Boot camps for troubled youth need oversight SLO City Council to get scoop on dredging Laguna Lake FEMA shouldn't punish Atascadero for taking its advice Related Stories: 4 police officers could be charged in alleged abuse of teens at boot camp Sheriff investigates report of child abuse at Camp San Luis Obispo At least every year or two, we hear horror stories about alleged mistreatment of children sent to "therapeutic" boot camps to correct problem behaviors, such as defiance, drug and alcohol abuse, truancy and failing grades. Serious injuries and even deaths have occurred at "troubled teen" camps. Each time, there's a public outcry, yet the reports continue. This month, allegations of beatings and other physical abuse of Los Angeles County youths attending a boot camp at Camp San Luis Obispo resulted in charges against four Southern California police officers. (No San Luis Obispo County youths or law enforcement officials were involved.) Despite the outrage over such incidents, licensing requirements and monitoring of camps remains minimal or nonexistent in many states, including California. Two bills — one state and one federal — would change that. The California bill, SB 524, would require operators of boot camps and similar residential programs to be licensed by the state Department of Social Services. It also would give camp participants basic rights, including the right "to be accorded dignity in his or her personal relationships with staff, residents, and other persons." Who can argue with that? Other rights spelled out in the proposed legislation include: • No corporal punishment. • No restraints. • Access to adequate medical care. • Adequate and healthy food. • Frequent contact with parents or guardians, "including scheduled and unscheduled telephone conversations, unrestricted written correspondence, and electronic communications." The federal legislation, HR 3060, includes similar protections for youths, and would prohibit gay "conversion therapy." (Conversion therapy is already legally prohibited in California.) Our take: We recognize there are several well-run boot camps, wilderness camps and similar programs that have helped teenagers get their lives back on track. Those programs have nothing to hide, and we see no reason why they would object to increased transparency and oversight. If anything, they should welcome it, as publicity about abusive programs reflects poorly on the industry. But it's obvious that not enough is being done to safeguard children. While it's impossible to say how often abuse occurs at boot camps and similar facilities, an often-quoted U.S. Government Accountability Office report from 2007 documented that 34 states had reported over 1,500 staff members involved in incidents of abuse in 2005 alone. The count could be even higher. Because youngsters in boot camps and wilderness programs often are prohibited from contacting their families and parents are advised not to communicate with their children, it's far too easy for abuse to go undetected and unreported. For example, allegations about the program at Camp San Luis Obispo may not have come to light had one child not been taken to the emergency room after he returned home with bruises on his windpipe. As a result, the Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services was contacted, and that prompted an investigation by the San Luis Obispo County Sheriff's Office. Keep in mind, the local case is far from decided; it will be up to the justice system to determine the guilt or innocence of the parties charged. Regardless of the outcome of this one case, though, better oversight is needed. California lawmakers recognize that; SB 524 passed the Senate on a vote of 35-1; it goes to the Assembly later this year. Without tighter control of boot camps and wilderness programs, there are too many opportunities for children to come to harm. These children may be defiant, but they also are vulnerable. They are cut off from family; taken out of the neighborhoods they know, often to places that are extremely remote; and placed in military-style settings where — customized as we are to the Hollywood version of the sadistic drill sergeant — they may accept abusive behavior as normal. While children are the primary victims in such situations, we can only imagine how painful it must be when parents realize their attempts to rescue their children actually put them in harm's way. Passage of state and federal legislation providing minimal protection for youths enrolled in therapeutic boot camps, wilderness adventures and similar programs is long overdue. The Tribune strongly urges lawmakers in Sacramento and Washington, D.C., to adopt it without delay. Read more here: http://www.sanluisobispo.com/2015/08/16/3764450_boot-camps-for-troubled-youth.html?rh=1#storylink=cpy (As currently written HR 3060 does NOT prohibit conversion therapy and it does not specifically require faith-based programs be regulated and does not overturn the faith-based initiative exempting faith-based programs from regulation that has been supported by both Bush and Obama administrations.)

Cooked to Death': Inside South Dakota's Juvenile Justice Reign of Terror Christina Rose 8/17/15 The following is the second part of a three part series taking a look at the past, present and future of the juvenile justice system within South Dakota and how it pertains to Native youth. In this part of the series we take a look at the history of the judicial system and treatment of Native youth as a whole. Natives in state-run juvenile detention homes face a cultural crisis everywhere, but from 1996 until 2001, South Dakota Governor Bill Janklow's juvenile justice system was reportedly a reign of terror, and Native youth suffered the most. Today, tribal youth on reservations have better options. Pine Ridge has its own program for youth offenders. The Rosebud Sioux Tribe's Youth Wellness and Renew Center, also known as Wanbli Wiconi Tipi, utilizes restorative justice rather than punishment and alienation from family and community. Restorative justice brings the youth back into the community and allows them to repair relationships by making amends. In Sisseton, young Native first offenders face a teen court of their peers rather than a judge in a courtroom. If they do end up in a detention center, they have the new Young Ambassadors Leadership Program to help re-integrate them into their families and communities. RELATED: 'Terrible Racial Disparities' Not Fixed With SD Juvenile Justice Reform Things have even improved in state-run facilities, but the horrors youth suffered under Governor Janklow cannot be forgotten. His military-minded boot camps and youth prisons gave South Dakota's Department of Corrections a lot to recover from. History of Juvenile Justice in South Dakota Janklow, who died January 12, 2012, was often described as having been the kind of teen who could have found himself in South Dakota's juvenile detention programs, and had he been sent to one back then, he might have found a model program, well-known for its wilderness program and job skills training. But when Janklow, then a 16-year-old high school dropout, got into trouble, a judge recommended he join the Marines. Later, as governor, Janklow brought a more discipline-oriented, military mindset to the state's detention homes. He opened his first boot camp, Custer Youth Correctional Center, for boys in 1996, and in 1998, he opened a juvenile detention facility for girls known as the State Training School in Plankinton, South Dakota. Those who ended up in Custer or Plankinton faced a first day induction routine designed to overwhelm "the students with stress and anxiety," Don Jones, a former counselor at Plankinton, said. After he viewed a videotape showing five meek teenage girls standing at attention in the Plankinton gym, staff members screaming within inches of their faces, Jones told Mother Jones. "I saw one induction, and that was enough, I thought it was barbaric." Mother Jones says the public began to pay attention to the harsh treatment of youth in the detention homes after Gina Score, an overweight 14-year-old, died within a week of her arrival at Plankinton. Forced to make a two-mile run with the other girls, she fell to the ground and the staff refused to let the other girls help or offer her shade. Score was left lying on the ground long after the group had returned to the camp, and by the time medical staff sent an ambulance, she had turned blue and was frothing at the mouth. Score died with a body temperature of 108 degrees, and authorities said she had cooked to death. When State Rep. Pat Haley, a former Democratic chairman of the state's Corrections Commission began receiving complaints about boys being molested at the Custer facility, he investigated the situation, and said, "I couldn't believe what was going on." Haley spoke with youth and staff, and even saw videotapes of youth shackled by their wrists and ankles — called four-pointing — to beds or concrete floors for as long as 24 hours a day. At Plankinton, girls who were four-pointed had their clothes cut off of them by male guards. Naked youth were pepper sprayed in their cells, and male guards were routinely present in the girls' showers. Some youth were put into isolation in cells as small as 5' x 10', with a concrete bed and no mattress for as long as two weeks, according to Mother Jones and a story in the Washington Post. Many boys and girls reacted violently to the treatment. Some responded by rioting, slashing themselves, and trying repeatedly to commit suicide. "Kids and staff were at war with each other," says Marc Schindler, an attorney with the Youth Law Center in Washington, D.C. "They pushed and pushed the kids until all they wanted to do was resist." Rep.

Haley was clear about where the fault for these failings and abuses lay. "The culture of violence in South Dakota's juvenile facilities was not created by the kids," he said, "but by Bill Janklow." In a Rapid City Journal story, Score's parents said forgiveness was hard. Viola Score told the paper, "After listening to what other parents say what their kids have gone through there, I looked at my lawyer and at David [her husband] and said, 'You know what? I'm glad she died. At least I know she didn't have to go through that mental stress afterwards.'" Plankinton was closed in 2001 by the state following the acquittal of two state employees in Score's death, but that was not the end of the juvenile justice nightmare in South Dakota. In March 2002, a bill introduced in the state legislature sought to institute performance-based standards and assessments that would moderate and hold juvenile detention facilities accountable for their treatment of the youth, but Janklow vetoed the bill. In a Rapid City Journal article, Janklow said "it would be 'illogical' to require the Corrections Department to follow Performance-Based Standards when county detention centers, private group homes and out-of-state facilities that serve South Dakota children are not required to do the same." In articles in Mother Jones and Rapid City Journal, Janklow reportedly called the youth in detention homes "scum." Medication as a chemical restraint and rape were reported to Jennifer Ring, director of the American Civil Liberties Union of the Dakotas. In Winner, South Dakota schools, railroading the children into detention homes became an unofficial policy. Correspondent Ruth Steinberger wrote in a Lakota Journal article, June 14-21, 2002, that Native children were picked up from school for minor offenses such as pushing in line. In an ACLU complaint, which was the basis for the 2006 ACLU lawsuit, Antoine v. Winner, students were told by their principal they had to sign an affidavit stating what they had done, but were not allowed to explain why. In many cases, Native youth were reacting to a white child who had hit, tormented, teased, or called him a litany of racist names. The white students were never punished, but very often the Lakota youth were either given probation or sentences in detention homes. One Lakota boy was sent to a detention home for laughing when a teacher used profanity. White students also laughed but were not punished. "Calling for the arrest of Indian children for minor misconduct is such a matter of fact part of the way white educators in Winner 'educate' Indian children that a 12 year old child was arrested at the request of the school principal for 'refusing to sit where he was told,' and for 'making noises,'" according to Steinberger in the Lakota Journal. A website entitled "South Dakota Hall of Shame" details the efforts of politicians and businesses that sought to reopen the Plankinton facility in 2003 and 2004, but those efforts were not successful. Finally, the ACLU won the lawsuit, Antoine v. Winner School. In December of 2007, the federal court decreed that the school enact policies to assure that Native children were treated equitably and that their rights were not violated. It took more than five years before Winner Schools began to cooperate with the judge's decree, but today, a new school superintendent (Bruce Carrier since the 2011-2012 school year) has brought a strong change in attitude and an improvement in race relations -- one of the first steps was eliminating police referrals. RELATED: Taking Racism Out of South Dakota Schools, Part 2 In October of 2002, performance-based standards were introduced in two girls detention programs in South Dakota, and today all of the state's facilities are assessed by The Council of Juvenile Correctional Administrators (CJCA). Things are much better now, especially for the non-Native youth. For Native youth? Not enough. While treatment of the youth in South Dakota's detention homes has improved in general, Native youth arrested off the reservations are still incarcerated at greater numbers than whites, find themselves placed in detention centers too far from home for family visits, in a punitive rather than restorative system, and in a place that does not value their spirituality and cultural lifestyles. Read more at <http://indiancountrytodaymedianetwork.com/2015/08/17/cooked-death-inside-south-dakotas-juvenile-justice-reign-terror-161370>

--> Couple who were 'house parents' at Christian ranch for troubled youth 'played sexual Truth or Dare with teenage girls in their care' Michael and Jennifer Nicole Magill who were 'house parents' at Christian Children's Ranch in In Idaho are accused of child sex abuse Jennifer allegedly encouraged a 17-year-old to perform a sex act on her husband during Truth or Dare The couple is also accused of abusing a 14-year-old girl who came forward with the abuse on August 11 The Magills have two children of their own who have been placed in the custody of the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare By Alexandra Klausner For Dailymail.com Published: 14:14 EST, 19 August 2015 | Updated: 21:48 EST, 19 August 2015 30shares 3 View comments A married couple who work at a home for troubled and homeless youth are accused of playing sexual 'Truth or Dare' games with a girl as young as 14. Michael and Jennifer Nicole Magill who were 'house parents' at Christian Children's Ranch in In Idaho have been charged with sexual battery and sexual abuse. The Magills, who appeared in court on Monday, allegedly inappropriately touched two teenage girls-17 and 14- multiple times over the summer. Charged: Jennifer Nicole Magill and her husband Michael, former house parents at Christian Children's Ranch for troubled youth, are accused of sexually abusing a 14-year-old and 17-year-old girl The couple have two children of their own who witnessed the alleged sexual encounters at least once, reports KTVB. Jennifer Nicole Magill is accused of encouraging the 17-year-old teenager to perform a sex act on her husband Michael. The 14-year-old girl told someone at the ranch that she was being abused on August 11. The inappropriate behavior was then reported to officials at the church ranch who called the Ada County Sheriff's office. RELATED ARTICLES Previous | Next 'The younger the better': Subway Jared agrees to plead...Italian real-life 'Christian Grey' millionaire property...Florida cop will not face murder charges after investigation... Make a career out of your hobby? Share this article Share 30 shares Authorities are investigating whether or not the couple has any other additional victims. The Magills have worked with youths as a youth group leader and camp counselor. The Magills lost their job at the ranch and asked Judge Terry McDaniel to appoint a lawyer since they are no longer receiving income. Deputy Prosecutor Lucy Juarez recommended the bond be set at $500,000 for each of the defendants. She said the facts of the case were 'pretty appalling.' According to the ranch's requirements for house parents the couple must be happily married, have no criminal history, and dedicated to the healthy development of the child The defense attorney called for lower charges because his clients have no criminal history. The bond was ultimately set at 500,000 due to the judge's concern for minors in the community. The couple's children have been placed in custody with the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare. According to the ranch's requirements for house parents the couple must be happily married, have no criminal history, and dedicated to the healthy development of the child. According to a Facebook post on the ranch's page, they do full FBI background checks on their employees. The ranch accepts children from a variety of incomes and parents are asked to pay only what they can. Much of the ranch's funds come from donations. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +2 Response: According to a Facebook post on the ranch's page, they do full FBI background checks on their employees Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3203867/Couple-house-parents-Christian-ranch-troubled-youth-played-sexual-Truth-Dare-teenage-girls-care.html#ixzz3jasOlxyu> Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

Investigators scour Auburn home after foster care child dies and another is hospitalized 1 / 10 Auburn Pheasant Court The 2-year-old child who died while in the care of an Auburn foster family has been identified as Avalana Conway-Coxon. She, along with a second child, was transported to the UMass Medical Center in Worcester Saturday after they were found unresponsive. Authorities say the second child is in "extremely critical condition." (Photo from mother's Facebook page) Scott J. Croteau | scroteau@masslive.com Print Email By Scott J. Croteau | scroteau@masslive.com The Republican Email the author | AUBURN – Investigators scoured a Pheasant Court home for evidence Sunday one day a foster care child living there died and a second remained hospitalized. No new details were released on what happened or if anyone was being criminally charged with the death of the young child and the hospitalization of the second foster care child. The state Department of Children and Families released the following statement about the investigation. "The Department is actively working with law enforcement and medical personnel to determine the cause of death of one child and hospitalization of another child today," state DCF spokesman Andrea Grossman said. "Both children lived in a foster home and were foster children. The Department is conducting its own investigation and collaborating with law enforcement on its investigation." A spokesman for Worcester County District Attorney Joseph Early Jr. said there was no information available as of Sunday afternoon. Auburn Police Chief Andrew Sluckis Jr. referred all questions to the district attorney's office. One neighbor, who lived next to the home, shook her head in the doorway Sunday afternoon as police continued to investigate. "I'm sad because of the babies," she said, covering the tears in her eyes. The neighbor saw the two children being brought out of the home and to the ambulance Saturday afternoon. Detectives from the district attorney's office and Auburn Police Department were seen taking boxes of items from the 2 Pheasant Court home Sunday. A sport-utility-vehicle that neighbors said is owned by the mother living at the home was towed from the scene after investigators searched it. The Worcester Telegram & Gazette reported that two children, both around 2-years-old, were taken from the home by ambulance Saturday afternoon. One woman told the newspaper that she heard the foster mother yelling that her babies were unresponsive. The Telegram & Gazette said six children lived in the home and three are biological children of the foster mother. There is one adopted child with the remaining two children being foster children. A memorial was set-up across the street with candles and stuffed animals. Neighbors said they wanted answers as to what happened in the home. The crime scene tape was removed from the home Sunday afternoon after investigators left. Source: http://www.masslive.com/news/worcester/index.ssf/2015/08/investigators_scour_auburn_hom.html

Baby's death in Anchorage foster home leads to state payout Lisa Demer August 16, 2015 Email Print Text Size-A +A BETHEL -- Two years ago, a sickly baby from Bethel was placed in an Anchorage foster home. One day, just as the foster family was preparing for his return to Bethel, the baby was laid face down on a pillow-top mattress. There, according to a wrongful death lawsuit, he suffocated. This summer, the state paid $500,000 to the family of the child, identified only as J.K. in the lawsuit. Related: Alaskans can join hands to care for our foster kids The civil lawsuit and its resolution come just as the state is putting renewed attention on the disturbing -- and preventable -- problem of infant sleep deaths. In the case of J.K., the Office of Children's Services placed a fragile baby with a foster mother who, according to the events described in the suit, failed to follow well-established public health protocols. A national "Back to Sleep" campaign began in 1994 to urge parents to put babies to sleep on their backs, to prevent sudden infant death syndrome. Public health officials have been refining that message for years. The state foster care handbook includes that message. The state wasn't named as a defendant in the suit against foster mother Patricia Abell, but has a responsibility to defend foster parents, according to Cori Mills, an assistant attorney general and spokesperson for the Department of Law. Efforts to reach Abell were unsuccessful. The attorney general's office, which represented her, passed along a message to her from a reporter. She didn't respond. A lawyer for the baby's family said the state is responsible when foster parents make mistakes. A fragile baby J.K. was born healthy in January 2013. As a newborn, he caught a cold that developed into respiratory distress, the family's attorney, Myron Angstman of Bethel, said. He was hospitalized at the Yukon-Kuskokwim Health Corp., the Native-run hospital in Bethel, then released to his parents, according to the suit filed in 2014 by Angstman. But the baby's conditioned worsened. He ended up in the Bethel emergency room, then was flown to Alaska Native Medical Center in Anchorage for more advanced care, the suit said. He was intubated and placed on a ventilator, Angstman said. For about three weeks in early 2013, the little boy was hospitalized in Anchorage. Days after he was admitted, his parents were told he was in critical condition, the lawyer said. Then he improved. On March 11 of that year, he was discharged. He needed close monitoring as an outpatient, the suit said. The Office of Children's Services took custody of him. The reasons are unexplained in the lawsuit. Angstman, one of the attorneys for the child's parents, brother and grandmother, said he wasn't at liberty to discuss any troubles in the home. The lawsuit did not concern whether it was necessary for OCS to take custody, he said. Patricia and Chad Abell were state-licensed foster parents responsible for providing emergency care for the baby, the suit said. They first became approved for foster care in September 2010, according to Travis Erickson, operations manager for the Office of Children's Services. On April 1, 2013, J.K. was supposed to return to Bethel. Early that morning, Chad fed him a bottle and Patricia burped him. Then the foster mother put J.K. on his stomach, on her bed, the suit said. "Patricia's mattress had a pillow-top, making this a very soft surface," the document said. She left the baby alone while she did other things. When she returned to the room, the suit said she found him "still face down on the mattress, but unresponsive." She put him on the floor and started CPR. At 8:08 a.m., someone called 911. Medics arrived seven minutes later and kept up efforts to save the baby while rushing him to Providence Alaska Medical Center. About 40 minutes after the 911 call, J.K. was declared dead at the Anchorage hospital. "The medical examiner determined from the scene investigation, autopsy, and a doll reenactment that the cause of death was suffocation and the manner of death was accidental," the suit said. In Bethel at the Office of Children's Services, the parents were told of their baby's death. They asked to go to Anchorage to see him, but the suit said they were told there wasn't public money for that. Later, the child's body was returned to Bethel. Duty to provide care The foster mother "owed a duty of reasonable care" to J.K.'s family, the lawsuit said. Abell either lacked skill or knowledge, or otherwise failed to exercise that care, said the complaint. In July, the state paid $500,000 on behalf of the foster mother to settle the lawsuit over J.K.'s death, Mills said in an email. Abell didn't admit any liability, nor did the state, which wasn't a defendant, she said. The suit was dismissed earlier this month. The baby's family was represented by Angstman and Anchorage attorney John Cashion. Public health experts say it is well established that babies should be put to sleep on their backs -- a message officials have been pushing in Alaska for years. Almost all sleep-related baby deaths are preventable, researchers have found. Sometimes the baby dies while sleeping with an adult. Sometimes the adult is intoxicated, or sleeping heavily because of medication. And sometimes, the sleeping space is just wrong. The Abells had a crib, which is required for foster parents who take in infants, Erickson of OCS said on Friday. Licensing workers go over the requirements when someone first becomes a foster parent, he said. The foster parent handbook includes some information, including that babies need to be in cribs or bassinets, without soft pillows. It says pediatricians now advise that babies be placed on their backs for sleeping to minimize the risk of sudden infant death syndrome. Still, the latest public education campaign on safe sleeping for babies was not yet fully in place at the time of J.K.'s death in early 2013. In addition, foster parent core training then did not specifically cover how to put an infant to sleep, Erickson said. At some point in 2013, the state Division of Public Health began distributing brochures and posters to hospitals that said babies are safest when they sleep alone, on their backs, in a crib -- the "A-B-C" message. Babies need a firm surface, the materials said. "When baby is sleeping someplace other than a safety-approved crib, remember to give them lots of room to breathe!" the brochure said. A troubling spike in Alaska on average, two babies die a month "in a sleep environment," on their belly or their side, in soft bedding, in a shared sleeping space or in an otherwise risky setting, according to state epidemiologists. Then in July 2014, seven Alaska babies died in sleep-related circumstances -- a serious spike. That triggered an in-depth investigation of infant sleep-related deaths that occurred from 2012 to 2014 and new attention to the problem. State child protection and licensing workers for the past year have been handing out brochures on safe sleeping to families and foster homes, Erickson said. Before that, handouts on sleeping were available, but not systematically distributed. "This information has been out there. We are just trying to elevate it," he said. This June, the Division of Public Health published a bulletin about the deaths that urged health providers to reinforce a safe sleep message with families. On Friday, Erickson found out the core foster parent training didn't specifically address safe sleeping and said he directed it be added. "They haven't been getting it in core, in the past. And they will, starting immediately," he said. The Abells no longer are Alaska foster parents, he said. The Bethel family didn't want to talk about the loss of the baby in a place that was supposed to keep him safe. "They have had their troubles," Angstman said. "There are family issues that are being addressed." Maybe, he said, the settlement will help them do that. Source: <https://www.adn.com/article/20150816/babys-death-anchorage-foster-home-leads-lawsuit-state-payout>

DSHS failures are rarely punished | State News | yakimaherald.com DSHS failures are rarely punished By Will Drabold, Seattle Times Updated Aug 15, 2015 Comments Mike Siegel Cheryl Schaefer, abused as a foster kid living with a family in Colville Wash., sits on a bench along a street in downtown Colville. Schaefer was abused by her foster father who served time in the county jail. prev next The state of Washington's largest department is tasked with caring for the state's most vulnerable residents — abused children, foster kids, mentally handicapped adults. But time and again, it has failed. Over the past eight years, the Washington state Department of Social and Health Services (DSHS) has been hit with scores of lawsuits, ultimately paying $166.4 million for personal-injury claims. Many of the most severely injured were children who were tortured, starved or raped. Some died. DSHS employees behind these failures rarely are punished. The Seattle Times has found. From those scores of lawsuits, the newspaper selected one dozen of the high-cost, child-welfare cases for which records were readily accessible. Many of these cases made headlines and resulted in verdicts or settlements ranging from $750,000 to $11 million, some $75 million in all. Using court records, public records and interviews, the newspaper identified 48 DSHS staffers involved in the failures in these 12 cases. None of the 48 was fired or suspended. None was demoted or lost pay. That is according to DSHS, which ran the 48 names through its human-resources databases at the newspaper's request. (The database only shows records that affect compensation.) Whether any of the 48 staffers were given lesser forms of discipline, such as reprimand letters, is unclear. DSHS in May said it would take several months to provide answers. (Recently, the agency said one staffer had been given a letter of reprimand. It hasn't completed its research.) Slightly less than half the 48 still work for DSHS; some have retired. The review of the 12 cases — as well as several dozen interviews with current and former DSHS employees, state employee-union officials, personal-injury lawyers, children's advocates and others — turned up some common failings: overlooked complaints of abuse; delayed or inept investigations; placement of children in unsafe homes. DSHS' lack of focus on personal accountability is a significant problem, said Tim Tesh, a personal-injury lawyer who has sued DSHS many times. Policymakers can suggest reforms, he said, but "often, it's that the worker didn't follow procedures that are already in place. What good does reform do you when the worker just doesn't follow them?" DSHS said paying a victim does not mean an employee made a mistake. Jennifer Strus since 2013 has been head of the Children's Administration, the division responsible for payouts of $141.4 million. She would not comment on how her predecessors handled employees who may have made mistakes years earlier. Any failures must be well-documented before the agency can take action, she noted. DSHS in recent years has improved training and how it tracks complaints of abuse and also reviews the performance of employees implicated in claims against the agency. Being a social worker is the "toughest job in state government," Strus said. A combination of large case-loads, employee turnover and budget cuts makes it "pretty hard to do great work," she said. Cheryl Schaefer, 28, isn't comforted by these words. She and three siblings suffered years of abuse in a foster home under DSHS supervision in northeastern Washington. Up until 2001, court records show, they were beaten, forced to overeat, throw up and eat their own vomit, and suffered sexual abuse. According to court records, Schaefer and her siblings said the caseworker repeatedly ignored their cries for help. A 2012 lawsuit, filed by Tesh against DSHS, was settled for $5.3 million. "I can't do my job" Complaints about how DSHS handled foster kids and reports of child abuse have tagged the agency for years. In 1998, lawyers for 13 foster kids filed a class-action lawsuit against the state, saying foster children were being harmed across the board by inadequate care. The state Supreme Court, in the landmark 2003 Braam decision (named after one of the plaintiffs), upheld a lower court and put Washington's child-welfare system under judicial oversight. The Braam case led to several improvements, including sharply cutting back on children bouncing from one foster home to another. The court oversight continues, in part because a key court-ordered mandate remains unfulfilled: foster-child caseloads of 18 or fewer for 90 percent of social workers. Besides the court, state lawmakers recently required DSHS to be more accountable for mistakes. DSHS was required to do automatic reviews of botched child-welfare cases only when someone died in state care, a "fatality review." As of July 24, under "Aiden's Law," DSHS must review worker actions if a child experiences a "near fatality" within one year of a previous incident of abuse. State Sen. Steve O'Ban, R-University Place, who sponsored the legislation, called it an improvement. That lawmakers had to force DSHS to review such cases "speaks volumes," he said. Most of the multimillion-dollar settlements come from the DSHS Children's Administration division. There more than 1,800 social workers oversee nearly 10,000 children in foster care and last year looked into 90,000 reports of child neglect or abuse. Turnover is high — about one in six staffers leaves each year. Starting pay can be as low as $32,688. Joyce Murphy, a social worker in Vancouver who's worked for a decade at the agency, said she has failed to see children once a month, as required by DSHS policy. She blames it on her caseload, which she says over the past four years has averaged about 25 children — well above the national standard of 15 and the DSHS average of 19. "I can't do my job," she said. She worries each night that one of her clients will die on her watch. No one died in the case of two young Snohomish County boys, ages 3 and 6, who were being starved and beaten by their father and his girlfriend in 2006, but it does illuminate the tragic results when workers utterly fail to do their jobs. The case is one of many that reveals the personal consequences for such failures can be slight. Between May and July 2006, a neighbor filed four complaints with DSHS, saying two young boys were being starved and beaten by their parents. She would later say that no one at DSHS ever followed up with her, court records show. The father, Danny Abegg, and his girlfriend, Marilea Mitchell, kept a padlock on the refrigerator and withheld food to punish the boys. A social worker, Aubrey Kilgore, in one visit reported that the house "had plenty of food in it." He went back a second time after a sheriff's deputy, shopping at Wal-Mart, saw bruises on the face of the 3-year-old, and alerted DSHS. This time, Kilgore required the parents to see a family therapist, documents show. The child-welfare case was transferred that fall to another social worker, Deanna Neff. Among her failures, she gave Abegg eight-days notice she would be visiting the home, giving him time to hide evidence of abuse. Nor did she speak to the more severely abused younger brother, Shayne, records show. A few months later, Ada Sharp, who had no experience or training investigating child abuse, was given the case, court records show. Other warning signs surfaced, records show, but Cherokee Screechowl, the area supervisor, ended the investigation in February 2007. A month later, someone alerted authorities that a little boy was being "starved." Paramedics rushed Shayne, now 4, to the hospital where he was found in urine-soaked clothes, emaciated, with a body temperature of 87 degrees. After being given food at the hospital, the boy told doctors not to let his parents know that he had eaten. A veteran paramedic later said he had not seen "a worse case of neglect or malnourishment." After Abegg and Mitchell were charged with first-degree criminal mistreatment, the case, with its sickening details and claims of DSHS failures, exploded in the news. Gov. Chris Gregoire asked for a special review, and DSHS said its employees failed to protect the two boys. At the time, a DSHS spokesman said two employees linked to the case had resigned. DSHS recently said one of the four did receive a letter of reprimand. Kilgore and Sharp still work at DSHS. Neff resigned from the agency. Screechowl resigned in 2007, came back in 2011 and then re-retired. Screechowl could not be located; the others did not return calls for comment. Shayne Abegg received $5 million from the state in 2009 after a judge compared him to a concentration-camp survivor. His older brother received $2.85 million two years later. "It is a war zone" If the high-profile Snohomish starvation case didn't result in someone being punished, what sort of case would? "This story has been going on for 30 years," said Dennis Braddock, DSHS secretary from 2000 to 2005. He once described DSHS' culture as "bunkerlike" and said he tried to hold staffers to account but faced an uphill battle. "Republicans don't like administration," he recently said. "Democrats all side with the union. So management gets the short end of the stick in (employee) disputes." It's a proven formula: To effectively serve children and families, social workers need a reasonable number of cases to manage, a finding backed by decades of state and national studies. The average caseload for child-protective-services (CPS) workers — Children's Administration employees who investigate reports of child neglect — is 16, well above the national standard of no more than 12. Also, it takes on average two years for a CPS investigator "to become proficient," DSHS said. Greg Devereux, executive director of the Washington Federation of State Employees, which represents unionized DSHS staff, describes social-worker caseloads, burnout and turnover in dire terms: "It is a war zone." Some former DSHS officials and child advocates point to his union when noting that individual discipline doesn't always occur. DSHS is required to have substantial documentation to punish negligent employees, they assert, and the arbitration process can be time consuming. "That's ridiculous," Devereux said. The union makes sure DSHS "fairly holds people accountable." In the past eight years, the union went to arbitration on only two cases of Children's Administration social workers who were terminated, he said. One firing was upheld; the other employee was reinstated. "I don't think anyone in the field can credibly deny that there's a scary connection between overburdened workers and risk of harm to kids," said Ira Lustbader, litigation director of Children's Rights, a national organization that advocates and files lawsuits to bring accountability to child-welfare systems. Lustbader's organization has filed lawsuits in other states arguing high caseloads are a civil-rights violation for children because it puts them in harm's way. "These kids don't vote. They're poor. They're disproportionately of color. They're not a legislative priority," he said. Not held accountable Even so, heavy caseloads cannot always explain away mistakes or why they go unpunished. According to interviews with 10 plaintiff attorneys who have brought personal-injury cases against DSHS, none of them has heard of a social worker being disciplined for failing to protect someone. David Moody is a Seattle lawyer who has brought lawsuits against DSHS that resulted in $86 million in verdicts or settlements since 2000. "There's a constellation of warnings and a corresponding constellation of failures by DSHS to heed those warnings," said Moody, lawyer for the Abegg children. "No one is held accountable." DSHS Secretary Kevin Quigley declined to be interviewed. In an email, he wrote that the agency has an improved performance-evaluation system and is more aggressive about dismissing subpar workers during their probation period. "I understand the solution for some is to blame the caseworker every time a mistake is made, but when we are some 30 percent above a reasonable caseload, that can be like sending the Seahawks to play the Super Bowl with two-thirds of a team then firing them when they lose," Quigley wrote. Some officials note that the state does have another tool to hold DSHS accountable: The Office of Family and Children's Ombuds. Director Patrick Dowd says the office plays a neutral role when it intervenes in cases in which DSHS failed to act or was unreasonable. However, he said, his office's "focus is on the actions of the agency and not the specific caseworker." Source: http://www.yakimaherald.com/news/state_news/dshs-failures-are-rarely-punished/article_cc9fc484-43e3-11e5-bc10-d38e9f193843.html

Operator of illegal group home in East Austin arrested | www.mystatesman.com Operator of illegal group home in East Austin arrested Posted: 3:38 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 15, 2015 Email Facebook 1Twitter 1ShareThis EmailFacebookTwitterShareThis By James Barragan and Samantha Matsumoto - American-Statesman Staff A seemingly routine welfare check by authorities on Friday resulted in the discovery of an illegally operated group home for older adults, the treatment of seven patients from the home in East Austin and at least one arrest, officials said. Rene Segura, who is suspected of operating the home, was arrested Friday on a charge of interference with public duty in connection to the discovery of the home. Segura, 45, remained in custody Saturday evening, according to jail records. Her bail was set at $5,000. Source: <http://www.mystatesman.com/news/news/operator-of-illegal-group-home-in-east-austin-arre/nKzq/>

Elite Boarding School Student Accused of Rape Says Seniors Had Annual Sex Competition 137,239 30 Gabrielle Bluestone Filed to: senior salute rape st. paul's 8/17/15 1:40pm Edit Delete Invite manually Promote DismissUndismiss Block for gawker Hide Share to Kinja Go to permalink 1 Are you sure this isn't just the stock photo you get when you search for "entitled yuppie rapist from 80's movie"? gilbertkittens View discussion >> 2 St. Paul's School for the Prominently Be-chinned Medieval Knievel View discussion >> The man accused of raping an underclassman at John Kerry's alma mater allegedly told detectives it was all a misunderstanding tied to a annual tradition known as the "Senior Salute," wherein seniors publicly competed to sleep with the most underclassmen throughout the school year. Owen Labrie, a 19-year-old former prefect at St. Paul's school in New Hampshire, was charged with repeatedly raping a 15-year-old girl on the roof of a campus building last summer. He's denied having intercourse with her but allegedly told detectives it was "tradition" for seniors to keep a rolling list of sexual conquests published for all students to see—initially on a laundry room wall, and later on the internet. Labrie, of Tunbridge, Vermont, talked openly about the tradition when he was interviewed by Concord police. On a campus where upperclassmen studiously avoid their younger peers in most settings, Labrie told a detective some students "take great pride" in having sex with younger students before they leave school. Labrie also told the detective of a contest where boys compete to "score" with the most girls, keeping a running tally written in indelible marker on a wall behind washing machines. The school kept painting over the scoreboard so it eventually was moved online. He acknowledged to the detective he was "trying to be

number one,” the detective wrote. Labrie—an aspiring divinity student whose acceptance to Harvard was rescinded after the rape charges—allegedly told detectives he was planning on having sex with the alleged victim, and even put on a condom, but stopped “in a moment of divine inspiration.” When asked why she might lie about the encounter, he allegedly claimed it was “a ‘great source of pride for younger students’ to have sex with seniors.” Advertisement Labrie, whose rape trial began Monday, is hardly the first St. Paul’s graduate to make headlines. According to the AP, the elite prep school has also produced senators, congressmen, ambassadors, Pulitzer Prize winners, Fortune 500 CEOs and several adult Kennedys—and that’s in addition to the current secretary of state, a former FBI director, and a Nobel laureate. Nor is it the first bad press the school’s had in recent years—there have been allegations of hazing and the mysterious 2004 death of a star swimmer who drowned in the school’s $25 million athletic center even as two lifeguards were on duty. And in 2003, two grown billionaires were observed fighting on a Park Avenue street corner over alleged financial mismanagement that eventually led to a faculty vote of no-confidence against a popular rector. The school’s current rector, Michael Hirschfeld, declined to comment on the Senior Salute, telling the AP—apparently without irony—that “St. Paul’s School has policies in place to ensure that our students are safe, secure, and treated equitably.” Source: <http://gawker.com/elite-boarding-school-student-accused-of-rape-says-seni-1724547400>

Oregon’s foster care system needs reform Oregon newspapers 9:08 p.m. PDT August 16, 2015 Sen. Ron Wyden answers questions, Friday, May 1, 2015, during a Statesman Journal Editorial Board meeting. (Photo: BRENT DRINKUT/Statesman Journal) 10 CONNECT 5 TWEETLINKEDIN COMMENTEMAILMORE It’s usually not good news when a state’s child welfare system is a topic of a committee hearing in the U.S. Senate. But that wasn’t the case Wednesday when Charles Nyby, a program analyst for the Oregon Department of Human Services, testified before the Senate Finance Committee. Nyby described how the state’s system increasingly is working to keep families united and is using foster care as a last resort. “I’ve seen significant impact on things in child welfare I truly never thought possible,” he said in a hearing on a bill sponsored by Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon, the ranking Democrat on the committee. Wyden’s bill would expand a multi-billion dollar federal entitlement program that currently funds only foster care services. The Family Stability and Kinship Care Act would give states the flexibility to use federal funding to make investments in preventive services that have been shown to be effective in stabilizing families and keeping kids out of foster care and either safe at home or placed with relatives. That’s a smart and necessary move if state child welfare systems in Oregon and other states are going to continue moving away from a foster-care model that for too long has been a source of heartbreak and tragedy. Current federal law provides states with a federal matching funds for children only after they have been placed in foster care. That restriction on the more than $4 billion that is distributed annually to states serves as a perverse incentive for the unnecessary removal of youths from homes that are troubled — but in many cases, families can be kept intact through well-planned services. An early draft of Wyden’s bill previewed earlier this year would provide reimbursements for up to a full year of family services. Those services would include counseling, family-skills training and other assistance intended to stabilize a family in crisis and prevent a child’s entry into foster care — or, in some cases, to allow youngsters to safely leave foster care for family placements. Wyden’s bill has the support of the American Academy of Pediatrics, which praises it for proposing expanded assistance to states and emphasizing “the important role of prevention, including parenting skills training and mental health services.” Nyby was on target this week in testifying that Oregon’s foster care program has improved over the past decade. Thanks to a federal waiver, Oregon has been able to spend some funds previously restricted for foster care on preventive services for parents and children who are in crisis because of poverty, substance abuse and homelessness. As a result, the state is serving fewer foster children — and keeping more families together. Oregon’s emphasis on preventive services is similar to the approach that Wyden’s bill would extend nationwide. But Oregon’s system remains a work in progress. Erinn Kelly-Siel, who in 2008 took the job of leading the state’s troubled child welfare system, recently hammered home that point in a letter announcing her departure as director of the state’s Department of Human Services. She noted that Oregon’s child-welfare system still falls short of federal and internal benchmarks. The state continues to struggle to fix problems with a new computer and data-tracking system that is essential to gauging how well foster children are being served and how they are faring in the system. The state also has been hit with several lawsuits in recent years alleging that its child welfare system failed to intervene in cases that resulted in serious injuries, sexual abuse or even death. Some of those lawsuits have resulted in judgments that have cost the state millions of dollars. If Oregon and others states are to do a better job at protecting kids and helping families remain intact, they need more federal funding and greater flexibility in using it. Wyden’s proposal would accomplish both, and deserves enthusiastic bipartisan support in Congress. — The Register-Guard, Eugene, Aug. 7 Educating Oregonians about health-care costs One hope of health care reform is that it will create smart, empowered consumers. They will have the data they need to make good choices about care. And that, in turn, creates incentives for providers and insurers to move to a better health care system. There’s nothing wrong with that idealized premise, except it has proven very difficult to make it a reality. Health care reform has created new databases of information. And more and more of that information is being made available to consumers. Oregon is going to launch a website in the fall of 2016 that will show health care costs by tracking almost all health care billing in the state, as Bulletin reporter Tara Bannow wrote in Wednesday’s paper. It could be a powerful tool for professional analysis. These so-called all-payer, all-claims databases are appearing across the country. Researchers have already been using them. An inquiry into similar data by the Dartmouth Atlas Project raised serious questions about the variations in Medicare spending across the country. More spending didn’t correlate with better health care outcomes. That can help inform decisions about how Medicare should be delivered. It’s, of course, a good thing in theory that consumers will be able to access Oregon’s data. But will it be easy to understand what it means? Will it actually be useful? Most consumers are bound by guard rails in their health care decisions — time, cost, what their health plan covers and their location — to name a few. Will it have unintended consequences that aren’t smart? Remember the recent release of the data of surgical complication rates by ProPublica? It’s a sort of like a surgeon report card, but imperfect and loaded with limitations. Making a decision about a surgeon based on that alone would not be smart. Maybe, over the long haul, the new Oregon database or ProPublica’s report card will be refined and improved and better understood by consumers. But for now they don’t create the smart, empowered consumers of health care reform dreams. — The Bulletin, Bend, Aug. 6 Source: <http://www.statesmanjournal.com/story/opinion/editorials/2015/08/17/oregons-foster-care-system-needs-reform/31804681/>

Foster parent accused of killing 11-month old pleads guilty By: Nick Rothschild - Email Updated: Mon 9:58 PM, Aug 17, 2015 By: Nick Rothschild - Email Home / Headlines List / Article GRAND JUNCTION, Colo. Sydney White pleaded guilty on Monday to child abuse resulting in death and tampering with physical evidence; however, the charge of murder in the first degree was dropped as a part of the deal. White was initially charged with first degree murder and child abuse resulting in death in the case of 11-month old Angel Place. Place was in White's care at the time of her death, and a police affidavit says White admitted to dropping the baby on her head, and later shaking her while holding her by the neck. The deal comes after months of negotiations with the DA's office, and White is now scheduled to be sentenced in November. The District Attorney's office says White could face a range of 16 to 51 years in prison depending upon her sentencing. Until then, she will be held without bond. Source: <http://www.nbc11news.com/home/headlines/Foster-parent-accused-of-killing-11-month-old-pleads-guilty-322063781.html>

Unemployed young people will be sent to work boot camp, says minister Matt Hancock says plan for jobseekers between 18 and 21 to be placed on intensive activity programme is not a form of punishment Matt Hancock, minister for the Cabinet Office, says new proposals to tackle unemployment among 18 to 21-year-olds will give young people more intensive support to help them find work Rowena Mason and Frances Perraudin Monday 17 August 2015 04.36 EDT Last modified on Monday 17 August 2015 19.01 EDT Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share via Email Share on Pinterest Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on WhatsApp Shares 9,872 9872 Comments 3,760 Save for later Article saved Cabinet Office minister Matt Hancock has denied that a government plan to send young unemployed people to boot camps to prepare them for work was a form of punishment. “We are penalising nobody because nobody who does the right thing and plays by the rules will lose their benefits,” he told BBC Radio 4’s Today programme on Monday. “In fact this is about giving more support to young people.” The senior Conservative, who heads David Cameron’s earn or learn taskforce, will set out plans for jobseekers aged between 18 and 21 to be placed on an intensive activity programme within the first three weeks of submitting a claim. They will get an initial three-week intensive course of practising job applications and interviews, which will then be regularly reviewed by a dedicated job coach. The new requirements, outlined on Monday, will be in place by April 2017 as part of a wider policy, first announced by Cameron before the election, that jobless 18- to 21-year-olds would be required to do work experience as well as looking for jobs or face losing their benefits. Children’s charity Barnardo’s criticised the plans, saying that young people needed to feel supported, not punished. In a challenge to Labour, Hancock has now written to all four leadership candidates urging them to get behind the government’s plans. Who should I vote for in the Labour leadership election? Ballots go out on Friday 14 August for the election of Labour’s new leader, and the electorate has until noon on 10 September to vote. Are you a member or registered supporter? Our guide to the candidates sets out their policies on a range of key issues Read more Labour had a slightly different policy before the election, which promised a paid starter job to every young person out of work for more than 12 months, but still threatened they would lose benefits if this was not taken up. The party's future position will be a matter for the new Labour leader, but the candidates are unlikely to endorse a government scheme involving rhetoric that suggests some young people are workshy and making excuses not to get jobs. Advertisement The subject of benefits is also particularly sensitive since a row over the decision of acting leader, Harriet Harman, to abstain on the government's welfare bill in July. Since then, the leftwing frontrunner Jeremy Corbyn has explicitly said he would oppose the government's move to take housing benefit away from 18- to 21-year-olds, while Andy Burnham has also been critical of the policy. Responding to the announcement, a spokesman for the Corbyn campaign said: "This is another punitive turn by this Conservative government that is failing young people. They have cut further education places, driven a punitive welfare regime that has failed to reduce youth unemployment, and are raising university fees and taking away grants. "As it takes away opportunities for young people to earn or learn, this government is blaming young people rather than addressing the real problems. It proposes more free labour from the young with fewer rights, and will be resisted by young people and Labour MPs." Yvette Cooper and Liz Kendall have said welfare cuts need to be approached in a fairer, more Labour way. Setting out his plans, Hancock suggested some young people were part of a "welfare culture that is embedded in some of Britain's most vulnerable communities". He said: "By working across government to make sure that every young person is in work or training, by opening up three million more apprenticeships, expanding traineeships, and making sure that a life on benefits is simply not an option, we want to end rolling welfare dependency for good, so welfare dependency is no longer passed down the generations. "We are absolutely committed to ending long-term youth unemployment and building a country for workers, where nobody is defined by birth and everyone can achieve their potential." The idea of boot camps for young people without jobs is not a new one. The Conservative party previously suggested it in 2008, when the then shadow welfare spokesman Chris Grayling announced that the party wanted to "abolish benefit payments for any able-bodied person under 21 who is out of work for more than three months". Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/society/2015/aug/17/unemployed-young-people-work-boot-camp-tory-minister>

Executives at second L.A. County youth home are accused of embezzlement 173460 foster-vicki JLC Jay L. Clendenin / Los Angeles Times Philip Browning is director of the L.A. County Department of Children and Family Services. Philip Browning is director of the L.A. County Department of Children and Family Services. (Jay L. Clendenin / Los Angeles Times) By Benjamin Oreskes and Garrett Therolf contact the reporter Prosecutors have charged two executives of a Los Angeles County group home for youth in the juvenile delinquency system and foster care with misuse of public funds, embezzlement and filing false tax returns. The charges against Gary O'Neil Batchelor and Steven Bryan Smith, the financial officer and executive director, respectively, of Moore's Cottage, mark the second time in a year that the district attorney's office has alleged criminal wrongdoing within the multimillion dollar industry that county officials entrust with the care of some of Southern California's most vulnerable youth. It's my fault that we didn't know more about it.- Philip Browning, DCFS director As in the district attorney's recent case against leaders of the Little People's World group home, the alleged wrongdoing at Moore's Cottage may have festered for years as county officials ignored signs of financial mismanagement, records show. "It's my fault that we didn't know more about it," said Philip Browning, director of the Department of Children and Family Services. The activities alleged in the lawsuit occurred before 2013, and Browning said they might have been prevented by an improved monitoring system the department put in place about a year ago. Prosecutors filed the criminal charges against Batchelor and Smith in April with no public announcement. The district attorney's office declined to comment. The two men, who pleaded not guilty and are free on bail, declined to respond to requests for comment. They are accused of embezzling more than $100,000 from the charity and damaging or destroying property in excess of $65,000. The lawsuit also accuses them of filing false personal tax returns in 2011, 2012 and 2013 — the same period in which they failed to file tax forms for Moore's Cottage. In total, Moore's Cottage owed $460,000 in delinquent federal payroll taxes as of September 2013. A court petition for a search warrant filed this year by the district attorney's office says that "Batchelor had no intention of paying payroll taxes with the money he withdrew. His sole purpose was to split the withdrawn money with Smith for personal gain." The charity's failure to file returns had cost it its tax-exempt status by 2013, and the county severed ties and removed children from its care last year. The charity had operated a six-bed facility for boys ages 13 to 17 in Pomona, as well as a six-bed home in Altadena for boys ages 11 to 17. Supervisor calls for changes at foster youth center after attack on guards Abby Sewell and Garrett Therolf A recent attack on security guards by youths staying at a transitional center for older foster children with nowhere else to go prompted a call Friday for beefed up security at the facility. A recent attack on security guards by youths staying at a transitional center for older foster children with nowhere else to go prompted a call Friday for beefed up security at the facility. \(Abby Sewell and Garrett Therolf \) County officials have designed contracts intended to ensure that charities like Moore's Cottage properly spend the public money they receive. Their books are open to regulators who scrutinize expenditures. Such reviews have repeatedly unearthed scandal. In some cases, contractors spent taxpayer money on vacations, luxury cars, fine china and salaries for employees who didn't exist. The Times has reported. More than $11 million of county funds were allegedly misappropriated by foster care nonprofits between 2000 and 2010, county audits found, and only a small fraction was ever recovered. County auditors have not made public any financial audits of Moore's Cottage since 2008, when a review of 2006 records showed the charity collecting $563,733 in taxpayer money — or $53,748 for each child per year. cComments "Meet ya after work" has a new meaning to government social workers. They're as abusive as the cops, killing people for no front license plate. They kill families and get autistic kids raped for money. Every one of you in the greedy industry of child welfare. Camel Flatmouth at 9:27 PM August 17, 2015 Add a comment See all comments 12 The audit of 2006 records also reported that Moore's Cottage had failed to pay $23,000 in payroll taxes, and officials at the Department of Children and Family Services were told to follow up and make sure the money was paid. Instead, the sum of unpaid payroll taxes grew to more than $200,000, according to the district attorney's court petition. The search warrant request notes that auditors later initiated another audit for 2011 and 2012 records, which showed "questionable accounting practices" by Smith, the executive director, who "withdrew large sums of money." "Smith stated this money was given to Moore's Cottage board member and chief financial officer Gary Batchelor," the request says. See the most-read stories this hour >>>Read the story A 2009 visit to the group homes by county auditors found the children sleeping on old, sagging mattresses, according to a group home program monitoring report. Some youth, the report noted, also received powerful psychiatric medications without the required court approval — a key safeguard meant to ensure that youth are not drugged unnecessarily to make them more docile. Reports on 2010 visits by Department of Children and Family Services officials and a review of five children's case files uncovered more problems. All of the children were being deprived of their weekly allowance, and many also were not receiving their clothing allowance. A majority of the children interviewed "reported that they did not feel they were treated with respect and dignity," the auditors wrote. "It is concerning that Moore's Cottage Group Home was out of compliance in seven of nine areas reviewed," they said. From 2012 to 2014, state regulators from the Department of Social Services responded to complaints of general neglect and physical abuse by staff at Moore's Cottage, according to licensing records. Youth in the homes told auditors that the staff members were inattentive and that many young people ran away because they didn't like the environment, state regulators reported last year. Another boy told regulators that a fellow resident openly "masturbated day and night and staff was aware of it but nothing was done about it," a Department of Social Services report said. In a 2013 report, state regulators found that a staffer pushed a boy "really hard against a desk — causing a bump in the head." Browning, the DCFS director, said "the criminal investigation of Moore's Cottage is still ongoing, but if the allegations prove true, I think it is totally inappropriate what happened here." Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/california/la-me-foster-embezzle-20150817-story.html>

SNP outrage at plans to send young jobseekers to boot camp Hannah Bardell contrasted the plan with the inflated salaries earned by executives in the City PA:Press Association Post a comment Print Share via Facebook Twitter Google+ 1 of 1 Hannah Bardell contrasted the plan with the inflated salaries earned by executives in the City PA:Press Association Lindsay McIntosh Scottish Political Editor Last updated at 12:01AM, August 18 2015 Scottish Nationalists have attacked the UK government's plans to send unemployed youngsters to three-week "boot camps". The Conservatives have announced a policy of compulsory intensive programmes which will put 18 to 21-year-olds "through their paces" to find work or training. They will have to attend the schemes when they are unemployed and will be expected to find a job, apprenticeship or study place within six months or lose their benefits. Yesterday the SNP accused the Tories of using "the language of threats and intimidation on the young". Source: <http://www.thetimes.co.uk/tto/news/uk/scotland/article4530441.ece>

S. Senate Bill Could Seriously Impact Federal Funding for Florida Group Homes A A Facebook 16 Twitter 6 More shares recommend reddit email By Kyle Swenson Tuesday, August 18, 2015 | 5 days ago Illustration by Joseph Laney As we showed you in a recent New Times cover story, Florida's group homes are in serious need of an overall. Due to the privatization of the state's channels for placing and caring for trouble kids, there's a serious lack of oversight among the ground floor service providers who are supposed to be watching these kids — leading to sex, drugs, and violence at the group homes. There are many voices rising up over the need to somehow improve the system. Among them: a bipartisan band of U.S. Senators who are proposing rerouting the federal funding options going to states. Instead of pushing that money toward foster care, the proposal would urge states to place it with front-end services that would hopefully keep kids out of group and foster care in the first place. Orrin Hatch, longtime Republican senator from Utah, vented his feelings in a Senate Finance Committee hearing last May (honestly, you could have used Hatch's comments as a blurb for our investigation — they are spot on). Related Stories With Lax Supervision at State-Contracted Group Homes, Teen Prostitution and Drug Use Are Rampant "Groups home, sometimes referred to as 'congregate care,' are literally breeding grounds for the sexual exploitation of children and youth," Hatch told the committee. "As the committee heard during a hearing on domestic sex trafficking of children and youth in foster care, traffickers know where these group homes are and target the children placed in them for exploitation." Hatch went on to propose some kind of legislation that "would refocus federal priorities on connecting vulnerable youth with caring, permanent families." This would be accomplished by eliminating the federal match to group homes for very young children and, after a defined period of time, for older youth." He finished: "I know that some might have concerns about limiting federal funds for any type of placement. Here's how I look at it: No one would support allowing states to use federal taxpayer dollars to buy cigarettes for foster youth. In my view, continuing to use these scarce taxpayer dollars to fund long terms placements in groups homes is ultimately just as destructive." The result of that May conversation is the Family Stability and Kinship Care Act, which was dropped on the committee earlier this month. The legislation is sponsored by Senator Ron Wyden, a Democrat from Oregon. Under the fine print of the bill, states would have more flexibility, and in fact be encourage, to distribute federal match funding made available under Title IV-E of the Social Security Act — money that now pretty much only goes to foster care. "The current child welfare funding system provides two choices: put kids in foster care or do nothing," Wyden said in a statement following the release of the bill. "There must be a better option for families who need just a little bit of extra help and this bill will give the system flexibility to respond to real-life situations of families in need." According to a summary for the bill, instead of foster care, state's would be encouraged to make "modest front-end investments in family services and kinship placement in order to reduce costly and traumatic stays in foster care." This means anything from family skills training or counseling to goods and services — basically, whatever is necessary to pre-empt a situation where kids would end up in foster care or group homes. We'll keep following this as it goes through Congress. But the implications of such a shake-up in federal funding streams feeding Florida's foster care system could have serious implications — and piss off a serious number of people involved. Remember, with Broward's system privatized, you have a lot of independent actors involved, pulling funding and salaries from that funding stream. Source: <http://www.browardpalmbeach.com/news/us-senate-bill-could-seriously-impact-federal-funding-for-florida-group-homes-7189969>

Reports against shuttered group homes included sexual abuse Posted: 6:01 p.m. Monday, Aug. 17, 2015 Email 2Facebook 19Twitter 2ShareThis 26 EmailFacebookTwitterShareThis By Philip Jankowski - American-Statesman Staff Court documents that shut down the operations of group homes operating illegally in Austin and Belton revealed reports of sexual abuse, filthy conditions and malnourished residents. The court documents came to light after first responders on Friday found 22 people kept in a 1,400-square-foot home in East Austin who were emaciated and kept in rooms with no air conditioning. Seven people were hospitalized. The others have been relocated to other facilities. Source: <http://www.mystatesman.com/news/news/crime-law/reports-against-shuttered-group-homes-included-sex/nl.sj/>

Five Questions Every Presidential Candidate Needs to Answer About Education Sunday, 23 August 2015 00:00 By Paul Thomas, AlterNet | Op-Ed font size decrease font size increase font size Print 19 Email Standards-based teaching, high-stakes testing and value-added methods of teacher evaluation haven't worked. What do the presidential candidates plan to do about it? (Image: Student test via Shutterstock) Want to challenge injustice and make real change happen? That's Truthout's goal - support our work with a donation today! Since the early 1980s, education platforms have been essential to political campaigns for governorships and the presidency, with education policy increasingly defining elected officials' political legacies. With the passing of No Child Left Behind in 2001, education legislation shifted even further to national prominence, as NCLB came to represent the "power" of bi-partisan commitments to education reform. In the 2016 presidential election, education may once again emerge as a major point of debate, in part because of Jeb Bush's legacy in Florida and in part because of the lingering political controversies around Common Core. Yet in addressing education issues candidates are likely to remain trapped inside the failed accountability mindset for reforming schools - one that privileges "standards" and "tests" as the central means of closing the infamous achievement gap. But there are better ways to approach what plagues us. Instead of focusing merely on "accountability," presidential candidates should be challenged first to confront and then address the tremendous social and educational inequities that plague our public schools. Here, then, are five questions about education reform every candidate should have to answer, and a few words about why these questions matter. Question #1: Since public schools often reflect the racial and class inequities of the communities they serve, how will you work to ensure that the U.S. puts an end to the two-tiered educational system currently available to children - one preferred educational experience for privileged children and another worse educational experience for disadvantaged children? Although some presidential candidates have raised concerns about two Americas, we have yet to confront our two education systems. Notably, as we have passed the 60th anniversary of Brown v. Board, both U.S. public schools and charter schools represent a return to segregated education. Although NCLB linked accountability to closing the achievement gap, black, brown, and high-poverty students along with English language learners and special needs students are often segregated, and as a result receive reduced educations targeting significantly and even exclusively test-prep. Question #2: While state and national leaders in education have repeatedly noted the importance of teacher quality - while also misrepresenting that importance - increasing standards-based teaching, high-stakes testing and value-added methods of teacher evaluation, along with the dismantling unions, have de-professionalized teaching and discouraged young people from entering the field. How will you work to return professionalism and autonomy to teachers? The teacher quality debate is the latest phase of accountability linked to test scores that started with school and student accountability in the 1980s and '90s. While everyone can agree that teacher quality is important, the real issues are how we measure that impact and how we separate teacher and even school quality effects from the much larger and more powerful impact of out-of-school factors - that account for about 60% to 86% of measurable student learning. The misguided focus on teacher quality - linking evaluations significantly to test scores - has begun to have a negative impact on teacher quality, precisely because such measures de-professionalize educators. Teachers typically want autonomy, administrative and parental support, and conditions (such as appropriate materials and smaller class sizes) that increase their professionalism and effectiveness - not raises. Question #3: Discipline policies are also inequitable for some students, particularly black and Latino kids. How will you ensure fair and humane disciplinary policies in schools for all children? Under the Obama administration, the Office of Civil Rights has exposed significant inequities of discipline outcomes for black and brown students. In many ways, schools are beginning the school-to-prison pipeline through expulsions and suspensions, beginning as early as pre-kindergarten. For example, according to the report from the Office of Civil Rights, black students are 18% of the school population, but "35% of students suspended once, 46% of those suspended more than once, and 39% of students expelled." Over 70% of students arrested or moved into the legal system are Hispanic or black. Question #4: Since the era of high-stakes accountability initiated in the early 1980s has not, in fact, closed the achievement gap, can you commit to ending accountability-based education reform, including a significant reduction in high-stakes testing, and then detail reform based on equity of opportunities for all students? Andre Perry, former founding dean of urban education at Davenport University, has noted that accountability has failed educational equity because "having the ability to compare performances among groups hasn't brought educational justice to black and brown students." More useful models do exist. The National Education Policy Center has called for identifying and recognizing school reform that addresses equity for all students through their Schools of Opportunity project. This model shifts the focus on reform away from narrow measures, test data and punitive policies and toward creating the opportunities that affluent students tend to have but poor and racial minorities are denied, including access to experienced and certified teachers, rich and diverse courses, small class sizes, and well-funded safe schools. Question #5: While the discourse of education reform has claimed that ZIP code is not destiny, the coincidence of any child's birth is actually a powerful indicator or her future. How will you address the many social inequities due to race, class and gender that inhibit children from succeeding in school and in life? The evidence is overwhelming that educational attainment is not the game-changer political leaders claim. While greater educational attainment helps gain advantages for people within their race, great inequities still exist among races. For example, blacks with some college have about the same employment opportunities as white high school dropouts, and women of color have the lowest wages at all education levels. Without addressing social inequities, our educational reform attempts are doomed to fail, and the promise of education as the great equalizer will continue to be a great lie. The five questions above pose two important challenges for candidates. First, they require the candidates either to acknowledge the evidence or face the real danger of simply ignoring the truth. Second, they challenge candidates to step outside the comfort of the old but failed ways of reforming education, in order to rethink how and what schools should be, and what we can do to bring those kinds of educational environments into existence. Currently, the U.S. has a growing gap between the impoverished and the wealthy - especially along racial

lines - and most fail to recognize that over 80% of people living in poverty are from vulnerable populations: children, the elderly, the disabled, students, and the working poor. When then-candidate Barack Obama offered his message of hope and change, advocates for social justice and public education, I believe, had those vulnerable populations in their minds and hearts. Yet President Obama's education agenda has turned out to be indistinguishable from George W. Bush's in both its commitments and its negative consequences. As the 2016 election approaches, the larger question may be: Is there a political leader with the courage to face reality and stand up for our vulnerable populations, in defense of our public institutions? Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/opinion/item/32472-five-questions-every-presidential-candidate-needs-to-answer-about-education>

Sparkling Curiosity for Truth in the Classroom: An Appreciation of "Between the World and Me" Sunday, 23 August 2015 00:00 By William Ayers, Truthout | Book Review font size decrease font size increase font size Print 14 Email Ta-Nehisi Coates, the Atlantic correspondent and author of Between the World and Me. Last year my students - Chicago teachers and teachers-to-be, educators from a range of backgrounds and experiences and orientations - all read The Beautiful Struggle by Ta-Nehisi Coates. I'd put this memoir on the list of required readings because I thought it was a fitting and important educational book, a useful text for city teachers to explore and interrogate. Some students agreed; several did not. "What's this got to do with teaching?" I chose it because it moved me, frankly, and I thought it might move some of them as well. I chose it because in the details of this one life - the challenges and the obstacles, but especially the elements he assembled to build an architecture of survival - I saw human themes of love and beauty and the universal struggle to grow more fully into the light. I chose it because it took readers inside the life of one Black kid, this singular unruly spark of meaning-making energy negotiating and then mapping the territory between his home and the streets and the schools: necessary reading for city teachers, I thought. There was a lot to dig into, much to wrangle about, and a lot to send us off to other readings and further research. Soon students were diving into Crystal Laura's Being Bad: My Baby Brother and the School to Prison Pipeline, Jesmyn Ward's The Men We Reap, Claudia Rankine's Citizen, and Rachel DeWoskin's Big Girl Small. The book was doing work, as I'd hoped it would. My students have all chosen to become teachers against a backdrop of corporate-driven school reform accompanied by unprecedented disrespect and hostility toward teachers and teaching. They know that teaching is devalued; they know they won't earn either a lot of money or a fair share of respect; they've been told by family and friends that they could do much, much better. And still they come to teaching, most saying they want to make a difference in children's lives. Some are motivated by memories of a wonderful teacher who'd reached and changed them, others by bitter experiences they hope to correct. They are mostly idealistic, and I admire them for that. They bring to class a vague hope that they will do great things in spite of a system that they know to be corrupt and dysfunctional. But this knowledge is not yet deep enough, for they also accept - some with greater skepticism and some with hardly any doubts at all - the predatory system's self-serving propaganda: test scores, achievement gaps, accountability, personal responsibility. Into this contradiction steps Ta-Nehisi Coates with an assertion that shaped and marked the course: No matter what the professional talkers tell you, Coates wrote, I never met a black boy who wanted to fail. That simple observation - or was it an argument, a polemic, or an indictment? - led to hot debate on the evening we first opened the book, and those 18 words were still roiling the seminar as the term came to an end. Coates never lets up, and he returns again and again: Fuck what you have heard or what you have seen in your son. He may lie about homework and laugh when the teacher calls home. He may curse his teacher, propose arson for the whole public system. But inside is the same sense that was in me. None of us ever want to fail. None of us want to be unworthy, to not measure up. Some claimed to have evidence to the contrary, while others answered that those contentions skated glibly on the surface of things and failed to go deep enough in search of root causes, accepting as fact the propaganda that locates failure everywhere but in the intentional design of the system itself. Some rejected the idea that they were agents of the state, bit players in a white colonial space, while others argued that teaching could never be even partially useful - let alone reach toward transcendence - until teachers fully faced the friction and gaping contradictions inherent in their teacher-roles. Truth and reconciliation, they argued, system-disruption and radical reconstruction; remediating the students is a ridiculous misdirection. Ta-Nehisi Coates' new book, Between the World and Me, takes us deeper into life in schools, and especially what the experience means to its captives. I was a curious boy, Coates writes, but the schools were not concerned with curiosity. They were concerned with compliance. That nails it: The obsessions that characterize American classrooms today - especially urban classrooms and schools attended by the poor, recent immigrants from impoverished countries, First Nations peoples, and the descendants of formerly enslaved people - are simple: The goal is obedience and conformity, the watchword, control. These schools are characterized by passivity and fatalism and infused with anti-intellectualism, dishonesty and irrelevance. They turn on the little technologies of constraint, the elaborate schemes for managing the fearsome, potentially unruly mob, the knotted system of rules, the exhaustive machinery of schedules and clocks and surveillance, the laborious programs of regulating, indoctrinating, inspecting and punishing, disciplining, censoring, correcting, counting, appraising, assessing and judging, testing and grading. The corporate reformers offer no relief and simply create charter or alternative schools that enact this whole agenda on steroids. They are not concerned with curiosity or imagination, initiative or courage because their purpose is elsewhere: Everyone more or less submissively accepting their proper place in the hierarchy of winners and losers. It doesn't take perceptive young people anytime at all to sniff out the duplicity and the dirty-dealing in the nothing-but-the-facts agenda and to conclude that all schools lie. One night I opened the seminar by telling the class that less than two miles from where we were meeting, almost 10,000 Jewish women were housed in cages. It was an electrifying and terrifying image, and the class rose up, some convinced I was joking (though I wasn't smiling), others that I was lying, all insisting that it couldn't be true. I eventually relented - you're right, I said, it's not true. The truth is that 10,000 poor, mostly very young Black and Latino men are living in those cages. Everything calmed down; the normal world returned. And we returned to Coates: the streets and the schools [were] arms of the same beast. One enjoyed the official power of the state [but] fear and violence were the weaponry of both. We had worked earlier to name the system, a system built on theft and lies and plundering Black bodies, Coates said. It was surely a predatory system, a racist system, and we looked hard at that word: racism. In one common context it meant ignorance and prejudice, the off-hand comments of Cliven Bundy or Donald Sterling, but there was more: There was the system itself, the plunder, the laws and structures, the schools. Donald Sterling's filthy mind and mouth is one thing; that he became rich as a swindling slumlord something else. "I'm no Donald Sterling," people say, meaning I don't utter the hateful words. But Coates won't let anyone off the hook: the people who believe themselves to be white are obsessed with the politics of personal exoneration. Their privileges are earned - they are good and true folks all - or come from thin air; their comfortable lives as normal as noon coming around every 24 hours. Decades ago, James Baldwin accused his country and his countrymen of a monstrous crime against humanity and added a further dimension to the indictment: It is not permissible that the authors of devastation should also be innocent. It is the innocence which constitutes the crime. Coates names the schools as central to the system: If the streets shackled my left leg, the schools shackled my right. The shackles were fear and violence, and also lies and denial. Everywhere you look and in spite of it all, youth are making their wobbly ways toward enlightenment and liberation, the twin pillars of an education of purpose. In 2006, Florida passed a law stipulating that "American history shall be viewed as factual, not as constructed, shall be viewed as knowable, teachable, and testable." The law called for an emphasis on the "teaching of facts." Facts and only facts, without frivolous and messy interpretation, would be permitted by the legislators to guide instruction, for example, about the "period of discovery." I read that and did a neck-wrenching double take: Huh? Whose facts, exactly, I wondered? The facts of a Genoan adventurer in the pay of Spanish royalty; the facts of the First Nations residents overwhelmed, murdered, and enslaved; or possibly a range of other facts and angles-of-regard altogether? I'll guess that the Florida lawmakers went with the first choice, legislating in effect a pep rally for Christopher Columbus - yes, their own particular constructed explanation and analysis of events and circumstances passing as Fact. In 2008, a group in the Arizona legislature passed a law stating that schools whose curriculum and teaching "encourage dissent" from "American values" risked losing their state funding. American history is bursting with stories of dissent from the first revolutionaries onward: Abolitionists, Suffragettes, anarchists and labor pioneers, civil rights and Black Power warriors, peace and environmental activists, feminists, heroes and sheroes and queeroes, Wounded Knee, Occupy, Black Lives Matter! Wherever you look and whatever period you examine, dissent is as American as cherry pie, an apple-core American value and the very engine of hope or possibility - except to the lawmakers of Arizona. A history teacher in a Southside Chicago school was teaching a standard lesson on the legendary 1954 Supreme Court case, Brown v. Board of Education. Brown reversed Plessy v. Ferguson and ended racial segregation in US schools, and the lesson was pointedly directed toward illustrating our great upward path as a nation. A student who had appeared to be paying no attention at all spoke up suddenly, challenging the teacher: "So you're saying this class here is against the law? We're breaking the law here? Can I call the cops?" Everyone cracked up, but the disruptive student was highlighting the obvious: Here was a segregated classroom in a segregated school in a country that had outlawed school segregation decades ago. It doesn't take perceptive young people anytime at all to sniff out the duplicity and the dirty-dealing in the nothing-but-the-facts agenda, and to conclude that all schools lie. Teachers lie. Parents lie. In fact the whole edifice of adult society is a complete phony, a tangled and fiddly fraud sailing smoothly along on an enforced sea of silence. Some students submit to the empire of deception, concluding that the price of the ticket includes winking at the massive hoax and promising to keep quiet and go along - they'll hopefully get rewarded by-and-by. Many other students go in the opposite direction: Their insights lead them to insurgent actions and gestures and styles, all matter-of-fact performances of self-affirmation as well as hard-nosed refusals of complicity and rejections of a world that is determinedly disinterested in their aspirations and perceptions and insights. There's a genre of jokes that all end with the same punch line: In one version, a man comes unannounced and unexpectedly upon his partner in the intimate embrace of another and explodes in accusation. The accused looks up indignantly and says: "Who are you going to believe? Me, or your own lying eyes?" Kids get it viscerally: Schools are asking them to ignore their immediate experiences and their direct interpretations - their own lying eyes. Who you going to believe? In The Golden Notebook, Doris Lessing offers a compelling statement about modern education as a dominion of deception: It may be that there is no other way of educating people. Possibly, but I don't believe it. In the meantime it would be a help at least to describe things properly, to call things by their right names. Ideally, what should be said to every child, repeatedly, throughout his or her school life is something like this: "You are in the process of being indoctrinated ... What you are being taught here is an amalgam of current prejudice and the choices of this particular culture ... You are being taught by people who have been able to accommodate themselves to a regime of thought laid down by their predecessors. It is a self-perpetuating system ... you ... [must] find ways of educating yourself - educating your own judgment..." Schools chug along on the rails of indoctrination and propaganda: Everywhere you look and in every direction lies the hype of the curriculum and the disingenuous spin about young people. Students are routinely subjected to an alphabet soup of sticky, inaccurate labels, mistrusted and controlled, and defined as lacking the essential qualities that make one fully human. On a daily basis and as part of the normal routine, schools engage in the toxic habit of labeling students by their presumed deficits, and officially endorse failure - especially for children of the least powerful - in the name of responsibility and objectivity and consequences. And everywhere you look and in spite of it all, youth are making their wobbly ways toward enlightenment and liberation, the twin pillars of an education of purpose. From Youth Speaks in Oakland to the Baltimore Algebra Project and the Chicago Freedom School, they are having their say and forging their unique pathways. And right next to them are wondrous teachers in countless spaces and places organizing small insurgencies and underground railroads, bursts of purpose and power growing through the cracks in the concrete. These are teachers whose faith in the young calls them to dive into the contradictions, to find ways through the mechanisms of control, to tell the truth when it must be told, and to take the side of the child. Between the World and Me will be required reading for those teachers, and it will be on my syllabus in the fall. Get ready. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/progressivepicks/item/32443-sparking-curiosity-for-truth-in-the-classroom-an-appreciation-of-ta-nehisi-coates-between-the-world-and-me>

Rosie O'Donnell Bad Parent: "Rosie O'Donnell stole my baby, but I don't want her money. I just want my daughter back." Deanna claimed in the interview that she and Chelsea have been in contact through Facebook and text. It was during these exchanges that Chelsea allegedly revealed she is having problems with her adoptive mother. 'Chelsea has told me she had issues with Rosie,' said Deanna. 'I believe Rosie has abandoned her. Since about the age of 12, Rosie basically shipped off Chelsea to different boarding schools.'" Source: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3202514/Rosie-O-Donnell-s-daughter-Chelsea-17-reported-MISSING-need-medical-attention-seen-one-week-ago-not-taking-medication.html>

Mass. governor says police logs deserve consideration in foster care process Comment 2 By Andy Metzger State House News Service telegram.com By Andy Metzger State House News Service Posted Aug. 18, 2015 at 7:19 PM By Andy Metzger State House News Service Posted Aug. 18, 2015 at 7:19 PM » RELATED CONTENT • Investigators return to Auburn foster home of 2-year-old who died... By Andy Metzger State House News Service Posted Aug. 18, 2015 at 7:19 PM BOSTON - The death of a foster child in Auburn has raised the question of whether the number of police calls to an address should be part of the foster program's background check process, Gov. Charlie Baker said Tuesday. The Baker administration has learned that the Auburn foster mother was visited by police on several occasions before she was licensed as a foster parent. The licensing process involves significant background checks, Baker said. "One of the questions that's been raised coming on the heels of what happened here was: Do we believe that as part of the process going forward associated with applying to be a foster parent we should check the 911 data?" Baker said. He said, "I think that's a really good question." Baker also said that many of the 911 calls were made by the mother about vandalism or other problems in the neighborhood. "I kind of think we shouldn't be punishing people for doing that," Baker said. While state officials wrestle with what happened at the home in Auburn, what happened in a child-neglect case in Hardwick, and how to protect children in state custody, the office charged with overseeing the state's care of children is soon to be vacant. The Boston Herald reported Tuesday that Child Advocate Gail Garinger plans to step down on Sept. 11. Garinger told the News Service she alerted the incoming administration shortly before they took office in January that she wanted to step down by June. "I really want to cut back a bit and not work full time," said Garinger, who hoped she would be able to accomplish some remaining tasks and keep the office moving forward through the first half of the year. The departure date has been moved up to Sept. 11. "I had hoped that we would have a permanent successor by the time of my departure," Garinger said. A Baker administration official said the Office of the Child Advocate informed Baker's chief of staff, Steve Kadish, of plans to step down in late March. On Tuesday, Baker said he was not exactly sure why Garinger is resigning. "I don't know what the reason is," Baker told reporters. Baker said the nominating committee has "about six or seven candidates they're talking to. We'll see where it goes." The child advocate serves at the pleasure of the governor and without any oversight from the Department of Children and Families where she provides an oversight role. Garinger also provides oversight to the juvenile justice system and other areas of state government that provide service to children. The office was first established by former Gov. Deval Patrick under an executive order and was later granted subpoena power by the Legislature. A former juvenile court judge who served as general counsel to Children's Hospital in the 1970s, Garinger was Patrick's pick to be the first child advocate in 2008. State law lays out a process in which the nominating committee gives the governor three candidates for the post. Baker contrasted the July case of a 7-year-old Hardwick boy under DCF supervision who slipped into a coma and last weekend's death of a 2-year-old foster child in Auburn with the Fitchburg case that galvanized calls for reform of the child welfare agency in 2013 and 2014. In 2013, Jeremiah Oliver had been missing for months without any officials knowing about it even though he was purportedly under the watch of state social workers. The boy's body was found along a highway in Sterling in 2014. "We have exactly the opposite issue here, which is in both these cases there was a lot of oversight, a lot of visits, a lot of eyes on kids, which is one of the things we talked to the commissioner and the secretary about right out of the gate and yet here we are," Baker said. "Clearly we have to do better." After the Oliver case, the former commissioner of the Department of Children and Families resigned and state government provided the agency with a funding boost and technology upgrades. Source: <http://www.telegram.com/article/20150818/NEWS/150819204>

Jackson group home still closed after student's death By - Associated Press - Wednesday, August 19, 2015 JACKSON HOLE, Wyo. (AP) - Operations at a Jackson group home are still suspended nearly two months after a student died at the facility. The Jackson Hole News and Guide reports (<http://bit.ly/1foVYg1>) representatives of the Wyoming Department of Family Services confirmed this week that an ongoing investigation has stalled most services at Van Vleck House. The department began reviewing operations at Van Vleck House, a long-term residential placement for at-risk youth, following the student's death June 25. Initial police reports indicated the death was the result of either self-harm or an accident. Students have been pulled from the Van Vleck House and relocated to other crisis shelters in the state. A Teton Youth and Family Services spokeswoman says they have been cooperating with officials during the state's investigation and are hoping to resume services soon. Source: <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2015/aug/19/jackson-group-home-closed-after-students-death/>

The government's 'boot camp' idea is built on myths Fiona Twycross 19 August, 2015 (4 days ago) 320 78 14 Good Society Most young people want to work, there just aren't enough jobs for them. If the government wishes to create a 'no excuses' culture to youth unemployment then its first step has to be creating the jobs and apprenticeships young people are crying out for. It ought to go without saying that we should do everything we possibly can to arm young people with all the skills, knowledge and confidence they will need to be as employable as possible. On that basis Monday's announcement that young people will be placed on 'activity programmes' should be welcome. What is less welcome is the misleading rhetoric the policies are wrapped up in. Listen to the government and you'd be forgiven for believing all young people sit on the dole in need of army style 'bootcamps' and the threat of benefit removal to motivate them. In reality most young people want to work and get on, and are some of our most entrepreneurial and creative citizens. Some of their best skills can often fall outside of the traditional career routes - think apps developed in bedrooms by creative teenagers. Whilst not everyone will turn out to be the next Bill Gates it is government's job to educate and prepare young people for the working world and then, through fair and balanced stewardship of the economy, do everything possible to ensure the jobs are there for them when that education comes to an end. The truth is that too often our young people are ready, willing and eager to work but the jobs are just not there. Many have been badly let down by the decisions made by the current government and by the recent coalition. Some groups of young people find it harder to find work - for example since 2010 there has been a 49 per cent rise in the number of young BME people unemployed for a year or more. The decision to provide jobless young people with employability training to develop soft skills and CV writing is positive. But you have to wonder if we'd need this announcement if the last government hadn't scrapped the Connexions service which provided exactly this type of training in schools, and instead implemented a disastrous reform of careers guidance. The result was to leave in its place a gaping hole in the preparedness of pupils for the world of work. Giving responsibility to schools to provide careers guidance was a move which Ofsted found led to unequal and poor access to impartial careers advice, which includes skills such as CV writing and interview techniques. Young people should not leave school at the age of 18 without the ability to write a CV and apply for jobs, or the social skills to navigate an interview, but it seems that this is often the case. By adding a punitive element to the deal, withdrawing job seekers allowance for those who refuse to take the course, the government seems to imply it is young 'job seekers' themselves that are the problem – obviously not wanting to improve their own chances of getting a job. In a very small minority of cases this may carry some truth, but it's more down to a lack appropriate jobs to apply for, not an untidy CV. That can only be solved by government and its time they took responsibility for that. The other obvious question is why this kind of scheme should only apply to young people; surely everyone who wants it should be offered the skills to make them more employable. As is often the case at the start of a parliament, there are things to be welcomed in this announcement – but we will have to wait to see if they are borne out by results. For example, the promise of three million new apprenticeships would make a significant difference – if they are truly high quality and targeted at young people. Apprenticeship performance in recent years teaches us to be cautious. In 2012 for example, Boris Johnson pledged 250,000 new apprenticeships by 2016. With less than a year to go we're not even half way. Add to that the fact that almost half \(44 per cent\) (p.21) of the 96,500 apprenticeships started in London between 2012 and 2014 went to people aged over 25 with many of them more akin to subsidised in-work training than entry level roles. The popularity of apprenticeships actually illustrates my wider point. The latest figures show that in London there are 17 people chasing each apprenticeship. Far from the work-shy myth perpetuated by some, young people are clearly eager to get into work, willing even to tolerate the pitiful minimum wage of £2.73 per hour which uniquely applies to apprentices. Giving unemployed young people a work-skills 'bootcamp' might be useful in some cases (and sounds tough) but it doesn't magic up the jobs they want and need. Nor does it solve the underlying skills problem and explain why government is cutting investment in soft skills and careers guidance at school. What this new scheme looks like in practice will tell a lot about the government's intentions. Are we talking high quality training or simply a tough-sounding tick box? One breeds results, the other a throwaway headline. By implying it is young people's fault rather than a failure of government when they can't get the job, the Conservatives are building up excuses in advance for their failure to deliver for the young unemployed. This is neither helpful or acceptable. Source: <http://leftfootforward.org/2015/08/the-governments-boot-camp-idea-is-built-on-myths/>

Family questions arrest of woman who's spoken out about Native Americans in foster care By DIRK LAMMERS Associated Press August 19, 2015 — 4:30pm Text size comment0 share0 tweet0 email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — Family members of a Crow Creek Sioux Tribe woman who has spoken out against South Dakota's handling of Native American children in foster care are questioning whether her arrest on a 13-year-old charge was politically motivated. But Sara Rabern, spokeswoman for the South Dakota Attorney General's Office, said Wednesday that the arrest of 54-year-old Janice Howe, of Harrold, is simply a case of authorities finally catching up with someone who has been able to evade an old warrant. "There's nothing politically motivated here," she said. Howe pleaded guilty Tuesday to one felony count of perjury related to petition signatures she gathered in 1999 for a proposed constitutional amendment. In exchange for prosecutors dropping several similar charges, Howe acknowledged improperly vouching in a notarized document that she witnessed signatures on the petition. She was released from the Hughes County jail Wednesday afternoon pending an Oct. 6 sentencing. Howe's husband, Louis Adrian, told the Pierre Capital Journal that the couple was returning from Fort Thompson to their home on the Crow Creek reservation on July 13 when they drove into a checkpoint arrest involving tribal police, U.S. marshals and Hughes County deputies. Adrian said he believes South Dakota Attorney General Marty Jackley pursued the arrest because of Howe's outspokenness against the state. Rabern said Jackley wasn't South Dakota's attorney general when the case was initiated and the prosecutor on the case has since moved on to private practice. Howe, a former public health nurse, was featured in a 2011 National Public Radio investigation that reported that state officials removed hundreds of Native American children each year, sometimes in questionable circumstances, while failing to place the children with their relatives or tribes. State officials at the time said that they were doing everything they could to keep families together. Howe took on the issue while fighting to have two granddaughters returned to the family. The Indian Child Welfare Act gives preference to American Indian families in adoptions of Indian children. Congress passed the act in 1978 after finding a high number of Indian children were removed from their homes and placed with non-Indian caretakers. Howe's attorney, Bradley Schreiber, did not immediately return a call Wednesday seeking comment on her arrest. Adrian said he learned that tribal officials gave permission to law enforcement agencies to make the arrest. Roxanne Sazue, chairwoman of the Crow Creek Tribe, said she didn't have any information on the case. The ballot initiative in question was sponsored by a libertarian group called Justice Unlimited. It would have allowed people accused of crimes to argue that certain laws have no merit and should be ignored by juries. The group pulled Howe's petitions from its filing amid doubts about their legitimacy. The measure failed. During Tuesday's court hearing in Pierre, Howe also pleaded guilty to one count of forgery related to a 2001 check-cashing case, according to the Hughes County State's Attorney's Office. Source: <http://www.startribune.com/critic-of-south-dakota-foster-care-arrested-on-old-charge/322329971/>

State pulls teen inmates from fire line after shooting By KARA KOSTANICH, KOMO 4 NEWS Published 9:32 pm, Monday, August 24, 2015 SEATTLE -- A team of juvenile inmates helping the firefight in eastern Washington was pulled from the fire line Monday after one of the troubled teens escaped and tried to take his own life. A team of 20 juvenile inmates from the Nesalle Youth Camp had been part of a program working alongside the Department of Natural Resources, helping bring Washington's relentless fires under control. "One of the things Naselle does effectively is help give them good skills to help them be successful once they get back to the community," said David Griffith with Washington's Juvenile Justice Rehab Administration, which oversees Naselle. But on Thursday, a 16-year-old inmate helping in the fire fight allegedly assaulted a female guard and then escaped. When deputies found him Saturday, he pulled out a hand gun they say he stole from a car and tried to take his own life. "This young man had some issues and was troubled, and hopefully we'll help him sort that out and we'll get him back on the right track," Griffith said. Griffith said 20 juvenile inmates volunteered and went through 40 hours of training to be part of a team that prepared food and helped mop up the fire. The program doesn't require parental approval, but parents are part of the treatment plan and are aware of what the teens are doing, Griffith said. "This is a rare incident," Griffith said. "You can't take this one incident and generalize it to all the work we've been doing." The Juvenile Justice Rehab Administration says the program has been highly successful for more than 50 years with only a few serious incidents. Until last week there had never been a situation where an inmate stole a gun or tried to harm himself. The state is reviewing exactly how last week's incident happened and will make improvements based on the outcome. In the meantime the teen, who is in stable condition at Harborview Medical Center, is facing serious charges. Source: <http://www.seattlepi.com/local/komo/article/State-pulls-teen-inmates-from-fire-line-after-6463389.php> (HEAL Note: Stop enslaving kids and maybe they won't be suicidal.)

People Don't Like Current Education Policies, So Why Do Policy Leaders? The big annual poll on how Americans view public schools and education policy is out, and people who are eager to don the mantle of "education reform" might want to rethink their wardrobe. As education journalist Valerie Strauss reports the news from her blog at The Washington Post, "The 47th annual PDK-Gallup poll, the longest continuously running survey of American attitudes toward public education ... finds that a majority of Americans, as well as a majority of American public school parents, object to some of the key tenets of modern school reform." What is particularly jarring about the findings of this year's PDK-Gallup poll is how much those results contrast to the pronouncements of current policy leaders from the Democratic Party and Republicans who are vying for their party's presidential nomination. Recent policy pronouncements in the halls of Congress, from the White House, and from political speeches betray a staunch adherence to education policies that are completely not in favor, or are becoming less favorable, among the populace. Look at what the survey tells us. Test And Punish Falls From Favor One of the "tenets" Strauss refers to is what's become known as the "test and punish" approach to education reform. This approach uses standardized tests to determine whether public schools and educators are being "accountable" with taxpayer money targeted to educating the nation's students. Policy leaders view scores on these assessments as the most authentic measures of student achievement, school performance, and teacher quality view. When test scores inch up, people at the top of the pay scale say this is proof that education reform is "working." When students don't "hit the mark" on these exams, there's hell to pay down the line – usually, for rank and file teachers – not because there's something wrong with the policies, but because those on the frontlines have failed at "implementation." As Strauss points out, of those who answered the PDK-Gallup survey "64 percent say there is too much emphasis on standardized testing" in public schools, and only 7 percent say there isn't enough. A deeper look into the polling data finds the distaste for testing is overwhelmingly true for blacks, whites, and Hispanics, and among

Republicans, Democrats, and Independents. Also, according to the PDK-Gallup poll, people aren't so keen on using test results to evaluate teachers, as 55 percent of the public, and 63 percent of public school parents, oppose this idea. Here again, the survey responses align across the board, regardless of political party. Common Core Takes A Dive; Are Charters Next? Another tenet of modern school reform, Common Core Standards that have been adopted by 43 states and the District of Columbia, has also fallen out of favor with most of the public. Now that the standards are being rolled out, and people are finally seeing the consequences, a majority, 54 percent, now oppose the standards, with Republicans and Independents mostly opposed and Democrats roughly split. This is a remarkable outcome given that two years ago, PDK-Gallup found that two-thirds of Americans had never heard of the standards. However, in this year's polling, only 12 percent said they had either heard nothing about the Common Core or "didn't know." What do they say about familiarity? Only one tenet of modern school reform remains: school choice. When asked, "Do you favor or oppose allowing students and their parents to choose which public schools in the community the students attend regardless of where they live?" 64 percent of Americans and 67 percent of public school parents give a favorable response. Also, charter schools get about the same levels of support. However, the standing of school choice in the public's eye may be more precarious than these results indicate. First, allowing parents to use school vouchers to choose a private school to attend at public expense is favored by only 31 percent of Americans. Second, a glance back at last year's PDK-Gallup survey finds that most do not understand what charter schools are. Currently, only about 6 percent of American public school students have opted to attend a charter, and there are vast sections of the country that have very few to none of these schools. So it's not wild speculation to suggest that charter schools could easily be the next Common Core and become more unpopular as people become more informed about them. What Policy Leaders Don't Get Despite clear signals coming from the public that current "test and punish" policies are off base, policy leaders in the nation's capital continue to press for an extension of that approach. As Education Week recently reported, in current deliberations focused on rewriting the federal No Child Left Behind act that has set the direction of federal education policy for 13 years, Secretary of Education Arne Duncan and US Senators from the Democratic Party recently came down squarely on the side of the status quo in supporting an amendment "that would have required states to establish measurable state-designed goals for all students and separately for each subgroup of students, and to intervene if they didn't meet those goals. It also would have required states to intervene in their lowest-performing 5 percent of schools and those that graduated less than 67 percent of their students." The amendment did not pass, "Fortunately," according to education historian Diane Ravitch, who said, "It would have revived or worsened the punishments of NCLB." Republicans have taken their turns at reinforcing the "test and punish" approach to education policy too, most prominently at a recent summit for Republican presidential candidates hosted by American Federation for Children and The 74, a news venture recently launched by former CNN anchor-turned-education activist Campbell Brown. According to Salon's Elias Isquith, Ohio Governor John Kasich set the tone for the event by remarking, "If I were not president, but if I were King of America, I would abolish all teacher's lounges, where they sit together and worry about 'woe is us.'" Other candidates eagerly matched the negative tone Kasich set, according to Isquith, voicing their disapprovals of teachers and their unions. For instance, New Jersey Governor Chris Christie stated a desire to "punch the teachers' union in the face," repeating a comment he had made previous to the event. Bloggers at Education Week noticed the Republican candidates generally reinforced arguments for standards and accountability although they differed in their support for Common Core and the role the federal government has in enforcing tests and standards. Motoko Rich, reporting for The New York Times, reported, "The candidates performed a balancing act as they tried to embrace high standards for schoolchildren while shying away from the Common Core." But none of the candidates was bold enough to suggest that the whole drive for standards, testing, and accountability might be flawed. "School choice," continued to be a unifying theme among Republicans, with former Florida Governor Jeb Bush declaring his intention to "allow total voucherization," according to CBS News. Classroom teacher and popular blogger Peter Greene summarized the Republicans' education positions as "wanting to have it both ways." Teachers deserve some praise, "Except for the many, many, many, many terrible ones." Choice is good except for communities that don't want to take that approach. "Red tape" is a burden, but schools need to be held more accountable. And standards are important as long as they are not Common Core. What Do People Want Instead? Results from the PDK-Gallup poll clearly rubbed those in the education policy establishment the wrong way, prompting some of them to point to a different survey published just prior. That poll, conducted by a conservative think tank, found "the public backs testing," according to the think tanks' news release, and "only 35 percent of the public expressing opposition" to Common Core standards. Certainly, much of this discrepancy between the two surveys is the result in differences between the ways questions were worded. And no doubt, any evidence of how the general population feels about education policy should be interpreted with nuance. But while the survey from conservatives takes the status quo of tests, standards, and accountability as more or less a given, the PDK-Gallup effort goes further to ask more open-ended questions about what people would prefer instead. And in the responses to these questions do we see even starker contrasts between the public's views and what policy leaders and politicians are saying. First, based on the survey results, Americans overwhelmingly like and support their local schools, with 51 percent giving schools in their own community a grade of either A or B and only 4 percent giving those schools a failing grade. Although there is a great disparity in how Americans view their local schools than they do schools nationwide – with survey respondents grading the nation's schools much more harshly – much of that difference can be attributed to current policy leaders and political candidates who openly bash public schools. Also, when queried about alternatives to tests for measuring the effectiveness of public schools, "A strong majority (about eight in 10) of Americans believe how engaged students are with their classwork and their level of hope for the future are very important for. Fewer rated the percentage of graduates attending college and getting a job right after high school as very important. Testing came in last as a measure of effectiveness with just 14 percent." Further, when PDK-Gallup asked Americans what were the biggest problems facing their local schools, survey respondents overwhelmingly replied "lack of financial support." Democrats and Independents were about equally assured that money for schools was lacking, while Republicans were split between the need for funding versus the need for standards and "quality." So the schools American families participate in are generally doing their jobs, but we need better, more qualitative ways of assessing their work, and what schools mostly need is more funding and support. Why don't we ever hear policy makers and political leaders talk about that? The reason we don't is that in our current political climate, the "test and punish" reform policy is the easier path to travel. Stern rhetoric and "tough-minded" policy-making are rewarded as being "very serious" approaches to governing. Taking a position to support a valued institution like public schools, to assess their outcomes in a richer, student-centered way, and to ensure adequate, equitable funding, would take something altogether different – something more like, you know, real leadership. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/people-dont-like-current-education-policies-so-why-do-policy-leaders/>

In Texas, group homes operate in a gray area of regulation By Kevin Schwaller Published: August 21, 2015, 6:51 pm Updated: August 22, 2015, 5:47 pm AUSTIN (KXAN) — Not all group homes and boarding houses have to be regulated by the state. When they fall short of needing a state license, it's up to local rules to decide on how much oversight the homes need. The Texas Department of Aging and Disability Services is looking into Zoe's Place at 8007 Burnet Road after complaints about air conditioning and an insect infestation. Austin Police records show emergency crews were called out to the Burnet Road address nearly 70 times since the beginning of the year. Although, it's unclear when the boarding home moved in to the location. By comparison authorities were called to the address three times last year. The state regulator also recently investigated another Austin group home. Austin City Council Member Ora Houston heads up the Health and Human Services Committee and is pushing for changes. "There has been an issue with unregulated homes in this city for the last seven years," said Austin City Council Member Ora Houston. Houston says in 2009, the state passed standards for municipalities to regulate certain group homes, but Austin has not implemented those standards. "We are still trying to figure that out," said Houston. "We have been working very closely with the code department. We've been working with the fire department EMS and police because they serve these homes directly." Houston says city leaders plan to meet with the code department in September. Even though some homes may fall outside of the state and city oversight, Austin technically requires licenses for boarding facilities. The code department says there are currently 34 active boarding home licenses. Source: <http://kxan.com/2015/08/21/in-texas-group-homes-operate-in-a-gray-area-of-regulation/>

Call for Improvement to Protect the Rights of Children in Care 21 August 2015 A new research report released today by the Human Rights Commission examines the Rights of Children in Care in Northern Ireland. It highlights there are currently more 'looked after children' in Northern Ireland than at any time since the Children Order came into effect and that the numbers of child protection and children in need referrals are on an upward curve. Chief Commissioner Les Allamby stated: "In 2015 we are even more aware how very vulnerable children in care are, children who for whatever reason cannot live with their families, must be offered the highest level of human rights protection. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child requires the best interests of the child to be a primary consideration in all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies. At the time compiling this report there were over 2,800 looked after children in Northern Ireland, almost one fifth of these children had been in the system for 5-10 years. Our research identifies on-going difficulties with the current system and indicates that reforms are required in a number of areas. Our aim is for improvements be made without delay as it is essential that our laws and practices protect children's human rights at every step of their journey through the care system." The report identifies a number of areas for improvement, including: Practice of Moving Children: The report highlights that some children are facing placement moves due to financial pressure within Trusts', for example, moving from private foster placements, to Trust's foster placements. Of the looked after children who had placement moves in the year 2012- 2013, over 20% had between one to three placement moves. While these figures indicate that the majority of Looked After Children are in relatively stable placements, those who continue to experience placement moves are exposed to "a level of intense disruption" and "a risk to their sense of security and stability". Delay in N.I Adoption Process: The report shines the spotlight again on the N.I Adoption process. Despite the Department for Health and Social Services and Public Safety's recognition are far back as 2006 that the current law is out of date. The Adoption order NI Order 1987 has not been reformed. The Commission recommends that Department should expeditiously bring forward new legislation which addresses concerns surrounding adoption in NI, including delay. The right of the child to be heard and taken seriously: The report captures the voice of looked after young people who expressed that they feel a strong sense of powerlessness and lack of decision making in their care. It indicates that inadequate information is available regarding the protection of the right of affected children to be heard and taken seriously, as well as the participation of parents, at crucial stages of the child welfare system including: • in the care planning process; • in determinations regarding secure accommodation. Concerns over criminalisation of young people in residential care: Interviewee's in the report highlighted that young people in residential care were being penalised for offences in a way that they would not if they resided with their parents. They also stated that the practice of calling police out should only occur as a measure of last resort and that focus should be on finding alternative means of dealing with incidents. Concern was also expressed by some of those interviewed for the purposes of this report at the lack of consistency across residential care settings in how they responded to incidents, and suggested that there was a need for more staff training and learning from good practice. Further information: For further information please contact Claire Martin on: claire.martin@nihrc.org (028) 9024 3987). Notes to editors 1. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission is an independent statutory body first proposed in the Belfast (Good Friday) Agreement (1998) and established in 1999 by the Northern Ireland Act (1998). It is answerable to Parliament at Westminster. 2. Children should not be separated from their parents unless it is in the child's best interests and States are required to provide assistance to parents in fulfilling their parental responsibilities in order to prevent the need for alternative care. However, international standards also require the child's safety to be secured and in certain circumstances the child will need to be placed in alternative care in order to fulfil these rights. 3. At 31 March, 2014 there were 2,858 looked after children in Northern Ireland. • 249 (9%) been looked after for more than 10 years • 547 (19%) children had been looked after for between 5 and 10 years. 4. At 31 March, 2013 there were 2, 807 looked after children in Northern Ireland. • 247 children (9%) were Looked After for more than 10 years. • 529 children (19%) were Looked After for between 5 and 10 years. • 447 children (16%) were Looked After for between 3 and 5 years. • 862 children (31%) were Looked After for between 1 and 3 years. • 722 children (26%) were Looked After for less than a year. 5. The UNCRC requires the best interests of the child to be a primary consideration "in all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies." This requirement is also reflected in international human rights standards regarding the rights of children such as the UN Guidelines for the Alternative Care of Children. Similarly the Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally states that: "In all matters relating to the placement of a child outside the care of the child's own parents, the best interests of the child, particularly his or her need for affection and right to security and continuing care, should be the paramount consideration." 6. Access the Report: Alternative Care and Children's Rights in Northern Ireland Source: <http://www.nihrc.org/news/call-for-improvement-to-protect-the-rights-of-children-in-care>

Mauritanian new anti-slavery law: Effective enforcement is the key – UN rights expert GENEVA (21 August 2015) – United Nations Special Rapporteur Urmila Bhoola applauded the adoption of a new anti-slavery law in Mauritania that doubles the maximum prison sentence for the crime of slavery from 10 to 20 years and creates special tribunals for prosecution of slavery and slavery-like practices. However, she cautioned, "this welcome development needs to be followed by its full implementation." "Slavery and slavery-like practices can be eradicated only if the existing laws, policies and programmes are implemented fully and effectively," said the independent expert designated by the UN Human Rights Council to monitor and report on contemporary forms of slavery, including its causes and consequences. The Special Rapporteur commended the Government for taking this important step towards replacing the 2007 anti-slavery law, which had proven to be ineffective in terms of prosecution. Commenting on the new anti-slavery legislation adopted by the Mauritanian National Assembly last week, Ms. Bhoola hailed the fact that it gives the right to civil society organisations to lodge complaints in courts on behalf of the victims as civil party but noted that the requirements set in the law might impede some of them to do so. The Law also foresees free legal assistance for victims and refers to their right to reparation, however without elaborating on its modalities. She noted that the new legislation, despite some shortcomings, was an indication of the Government's commitment to implement the road map on the eradication of contemporary forms of slavery, adopted by the Council of Ministers in March 2014. "It is necessary that the implementing legislation regarding special tribunals adopts a rights-based approach, including by ensuring the right to an effective access to justice for all victims," the Special Rapporteur emphasised. Ms. Bhoola highlighted the need for "a holistic approach to eradicating slavery, combining the criminal law approach with measures aimed at addressing root causes of contemporary forms of slavery and programmes for victim protection, assistance and socio-economic integration with a view of providing them with alternative livelihoods." In this regard, the expert called on Mauritania to step up its efforts to implement the road map drawing on the recommendations made by the previous Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery following her official country visit to Mauritania in 2009, and the national action plan stemming from the road map. The Special Rapporteur offered to provide Mauritania with technical assistance and called for resources to be made available for tackling slavery and slavery-like practices, including by the international community. Ms. Urmila Bhoola (South Africa) assumed her mandate as Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, including its causes and consequences on 2 June 2014. Ms. Bhoola is an international human rights lawyer specialised in gender equality and labour law. She has 20 years of experience as a labour and human rights lawyer in South Africa and served as a Judge of the South African Labour Court for five years. She is a former Executive Director of International Women's Rights Action Watch for the Asia Pacific (IWRAP AP). Learn more, log on to: <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Slavery/SRSlavery/Pages/SRSlaveryIndex.aspx> The Special Rapporteurs are part of what is known as the Special Procedures of the Human Rights Council. Special Procedures, the largest body of independent experts in the UN Human Rights system, is the general name of the Council's independent fact-finding and monitoring mechanisms that address either specific country situations or thematic issues in all parts of the world. Special Procedures' experts work on a voluntary basis; they are not UN staff and do not receive a salary for their work. They are independent from any government or organization and serve in their individual capacity. UN Human Rights, Country Page – Mauritania: <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Countries/MENARegion/Pages/MRIndex.aspx> For more information and media requests please contact Ms. Janja Sinković (+41 22 928 9356 /jsinkovic@ohchr.org) or write to srslavery@ohchr.org Source: <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/NewsEvents/Pages/DisplayNews.aspx?NewsID=16338&LangID=E>

Texans can help end child abuse - San Antonio Express-News Texans can help end child abuse Kurt Senske, For the Express-News Published 12:00 am, Sunday, August 23, 2015 The narrative around foster care in Texas usually centers on overloaded caseworkers, traumatized children and a flawed, underfunded state system. However, few of us look in the mirror and wonder what we ourselves can do to improve the lives of Texas children in foster care. Upbring, the largest nonprofit foster placement and adoption agency in Texas, believes that as members of a caring community, we all share responsibility for helping to raise healthy children prepared to embrace successful lives. In San Antonio, there are some wonderful stories of families stepping in to fill a great need. For instance, there are the contributions of David and Teresa Ebert. Licensed foster parents since 2000, Teresa is a registered nurse who has a big heart for foster children with primary medical needs — vulnerable children who require extra care and attention due to terminal illnesses. The Eberts have fostered more than 30 children over the past 15 years. One of their many special stories is about a little girl named Angelina, who they adopted. Not expected to live, she was referred for hospice care services. Yet, miraculously, Angelina was released from hospice care four years ago and has been receiving 24-hour nursing care since. We are privileged to work with many families throughout Texas like the Eberts. If we intend to fundamentally improve the foster care system, we need more families like theirs, as well as greater participation from every sector of our community. Our mission is to break the cycle of child abuse by empowering children, families and communities. With more than 13 percent of U.S. children subject to abuse or neglect by a caregiver each year, maltreatment of children is a pervasive problem affecting kids of every age, gender, ethnicity and socioeconomic background. Upbring recognizes the importance of improving the well-being of and long-term prospects for children, youth and families across our state. We know that 30 percent of people who were abused as children become abusers; 66,572 Texas children were confirmed victims of child abuse and neglect last year, most for the first time. Also in the Lone Star State in 2014, more than 17,000 children were removed from their homes; additionally, as the result of a recent study, we now know that over their lifetimes, this abuse and neglect costs the Texas economy an estimated $454 billion. If we intend to break the cycle of child abuse, we must be comprehensive in our strategy. Kids enter the child welfare system at different stages of their lives and we must address the full spectrum of their needs. To do so, Upbring has established an innovative continuum of services and partnerships tracking progress across five key markers: safety, life skills, education, health and vocation. Currently, there is surprisingly little long-term data on Texas foster children or what strategies prove successful in serving them. To fill this void, Upbring is partnering with the University of Texas at Austin School of Social Work on a first-of-its-kind-in-Texas study that will track the progress and well-being of foster children. With comprehensive data, we will be better positioned to more consistently care for and meet foster children's varied needs — and we'll be better prepared to help these children as they age out of foster care. Kurt Senske is president & CEO of Upbring, the new Lutheran Social Services of the South, a faith-based nonprofit organization devoted to breaking the cycle of child abuse. Source: <http://www.mysanantonio.com/opinion/commentary/article/Texans-can-help-end-child-abuse-6458428.php>

Former employee at group home charged with sexual assault Posted: Aug 23, 2015 11:04 AM PDT Updated: Aug 23, 2015 11:04 AM PDT NASHUA, N.H. (AP) - Police say a Massachusetts man charged with aggravated felonious sexual assault was a former employee of the Nashua Children's Home, where the 16-year-old victim was a resident when the assault occurred. The Telegraph of Nashua reports (<http://bit.ly/1Jpvf1b>) 30-year-old Jordan Dorsey of Lawrence, Massachusetts, turned himself into police earlier this month and is free on bail. The home's executive director, David Villiotti, says Dorsey was fired after the incident and hasn't worked there since June 16. Dorsey is due back in court for a Sept. 16 arraignment. He faces up to 15 years in behind bars if he's convicted. A phone listing for Dorsey could not be found Sunday. It's unclear if he has an attorney who could comment on the charges. Information from: The Telegraph, <http://www.nashuatelegraph.com> Source: <http://www.abc6.com/story/29860333/former-employee-at-group-home-charged-with-sexual-assault>

AAC encounters more scrutiny August 24, 2015 by Julie Miller, Editor in Chief Share on facebook Share on linkedin Share on twitter Share on google More Sharing Services | Reprints On August 20, AAC Holdings, Inc. presented an update to stockholders and the public in response to a number of online reports regarding the recent murder indictment against American Addiction Centers (AAC) and five of its employees. As the only public company solely in the addiction space, AAC faces greater scrutiny than a typical treatment center operation. "Short-sellers have been working overtime to spin out misinformation," said CEO Michael Cartwright, during the call. Cartwright highlighted among other things AAC's commitment to quality care, pointed to statistics demonstrating that AAC experiences fewer patient deaths per discharge than the industry average, and reiterated that AAC is not at fault for the patient death cited in the Riverside County, Calif. indictment. Additionally, he clarified the current role of company executive Jerrod Menz, who was among those charged in the case. Menz had been AAC's president and a member of the board of directors until the indictment was announced in late July. According to an AAC press release at that time, Menz "voluntarily stepped down from those roles to address these charges." Observers believed Menz had cut ties to AAC entirely, but Cartwright said that is not the case. "Jerrod Menz has not resigned from the company," he said. "Although he resigned from his policy making functions, including his role as president and director of the company, he remains very much active in developing business to expand our operations. We anticipate Jerrod will resume his former role once this case is resolved." A new website launched last week as well: aacthetruth.com. The site offers industry data from SAMHSA on deaths per discharge and instructions for obtaining the original coroner's report on the patient death from Riverside County by mail for $23. Blog: The Least You Need To Know About the AAC Charges Public company Being a public company, AAC must be far more transparent than other treatment centers, according to Dexter Braff, MBA, president of the Braff Group. The risk is not so much in revealing day-to-day operations to the competition but rather in the company's obligation to disclose unique situations such as pending litigation. "The general notion is that transparency is an issue because everyone knows what you're doing," Braff tells Behavioral Healthcare. "Folks think twice about going public because of exactly that." AAC's stock experienced a sharp drop in early August as a result of the indictment surfacing, but it slowly began to regain some ground in the weeks since. After the August 20 update call, the stockholders did not react unfavorably, he says. "Especially for companies like AAC that see its stock rise dramatically over a short period of time, it is likely when there are stumbles to see it decline fast," Braff says. Stock prices could recover over time. As prices rose in the early days of AAC trading, there was novel exuberance in the marketplace, Braff says, and he's not surprised the news of the indictment took the air out of the high-flying stock. The fact that it's moving in an upward trend now tells a story, he says. Treatment center operations It will be months if not years before the industry knows the ultimate fate of AAC and its employees named in the case. Other treatment providers can potentially learn something from the situation, however. Fernando Gutierrez, a registered professional guardian and bioethicist in Florida, says that residential treatment centers must consider not just the patients' health status but also the patients' ability to make their own treatment decisions before intake. Specifically, Gutierrez wonders, based on the reports he's read, whether the patient identified in the AAC case was healthy enough for air travel to the AAC treatment center in California and whether an advocate or primary care provider would have recommended against it. "The family or the airline might have culpability," he says. "That's an issue that has not been addressed." Engaging the patient's regular care provider—or an independent advocate if the patient has no caregivers—might be part of due diligence before accepting anyone with medical comorbidities. "It helps treatment centers reduce liability," Gutierrez says. Source: <http://www.behavioral.net/article/public-company-aac-encounters-more-scrutiny>

--> Amended case filed against Rhode Island child welfare system Posted 10:07 p.m. Monday Updated 10:08 p.m. Monday 17 1 16 PROVIDENCE, R.I. — The Rhode Island Department of Children, Youth and Families has egregiously failed children in its care and continues to put them "in harm's way," an advocacy group alleged in filing an amended federal lawsuit Monday. New-York based Children's Rights filed the complaint as a class-action lawsuit on behalf of some 1,800 children in Rhode Island's foster care system. A federal judge last year dismissed the original lawsuit, but a federal appeals court vacated the judge's decision and sent the case back to the lower court. The amended complaint said DCYF has not improved its services since the original lawsuit was filed in 2007, and it cited the cases of children it says were abused. One 9-year-old boy has been in foster care for five years and separated from his siblings, the group says. He was hospitalized after a foster parent was unable to care for him and was sexually abused while in group care. Another child, 11, was placed in a home with a registered sex offender and was sexually abused by a child in another foster home. The lawsuit said DCYF doesn't limit the number of children who can be assigned to a caseworker; children are placed in unlicensed homes; they aren't able to visit their families; and foster care maintenance payments are "grossly inadequate." The complaint asked the court to order the state to keep casework to a manageable load, recruit more foster homes and improve payments for foster parents. It also said the state needs consistent licensing and abuse investigation practices. An audit of DCYF last month revealed lapses in management and financial controls within the agency, which has been plagued for years by budget deficits. Gov. Gina Raimondo, who took office in January and called for the audit, announced afterward the agency will be overhauled. Plans to restructure the department may be completed this fall. "Sadly, children in Rhode Island foster care today continue to suffer the same harms that led to the initial filing of this case," Sara Bartosz, lead counsel for Children's Rights, said in a news release. "We now intend to secure an enforceable court order assuring that the glaring systemic defects placing children at risk are finally addressed." The attorney general's office, which represents the department, declined to comment. Read more at http://www.wral.com/advocacy-group-files-amended-complaint-against-dcyf/14852023/#6B2KeUGHjoVMWs9V_99

3Qs: Fixing Massachusetts' troubled foster care system August 26, 2015 by Matthew McDonald Last week, the death of a 2-year-old foster child in Auburn, Massachusetts, drew widespread attention to the state's troubled child welfare system. As criticism of its Department of Children and Families continues to mount, we spoke with Northeastern professors Elise Dallimore and Christie Rizzo. Dallimore, an associate professor of communication studies and a foster parent herself, studies the role of communication in the process of organizational learning, including methods for enhancing organizational development activities. Rizzo, an associate professor of applied psychology who served as the assistant director of the Juvenile Mental Health Clinic at the Rhode Island Family Court, studies the prevention of high-risk behaviors among adolescents in the juvenile justice and child welfare systems. Northeastern professors Elise Dallimore and Christie Rizzo discuss Massachusetts' troubled child welfare system and the changes that should be made to improve it. Photo from iStock Do you believe the recent criticism leveled at the Massachusetts Department of Children and Families is warranted? Dallimore: As an educator who requires students to be skilled in utilizing data to improve organizational decision-making, I am deeply troubled by the lack of assessment done in this country, and particularly in the state of Massachusetts, to document and then share best practices for enhancing the quality of foster care. The public hears stories in the press of foster children who suffer abuse, neglect, and even death while in foster care in Massachusetts. What they do not hear are the frustrations of many committed social workers, lawyers, and child advocates who are constrained by policies, procedures, and state-mandated requirements that, based on their professional training and experience, they know to be counter productive if not downright dangerous. My experience would suggest that many social workers are chronically overworked and under-resourced only to find their efforts scrutinized by an otherwise disinterested and fault-finding public, including stakeholders with competing and mutually-exclusive self interests. Rizzo: The situation is incredibly complex. When a child is harmed under DCF's watch, it is natural to assume that failures in the system are solely to blame for what has taken place. However, that assumption is based on the notion that it is possible to accurately predict the safety of a home environment every time. I would argue that, even when the conditions of the system are perfect, when foster homes are continually reevaluated and data are leveraged to make the placement decision, it is still not possible to be right every time. This is the first hurdle and it is a big one. A second hurdle relates to pragmatics. We are plagued by a dearth of available foster families with whom to place children. A third hurdle relates to the flow of children into the child welfare system—such as the rapid increase caused by the opioid epidemic in Massachusetts and nationwide. When the flow of children into the system increases, the system must care for them despite having the same resources, staffing, training, and foster placements that it had when fewer children were in care. In light of recent events, what changes should be made to improve the foster care system? Dallimore: I see a broken DCF system without a data-based plan or infrastructure for more effectively achieving its fundamental mandate. There is a need for our state to more effectively track and measure current foster practices and to direct attention to benchmarking data, which will help identify best practices elsewhere in the country. There are a number of states that have recently made significant gains in the quality of foster care, such as Virginia, Colorado, Utah, and even Florida, which has historically performed poorly alongside Massachusetts. We need political leaders and a general population who are not only genuinely committed to better understanding the challenges faced by our foster system, but equally committed to addressing those challenges. Rizzo: It is vitally important that DCF has adequate resources to hire the proper number of staff needed to manage the number of children entering and exiting the system at any one time. Staff should be properly credentialed and receive appropriate training for the work that they are being asked to do. They should not be asked to carry more cases than is feasible given the expectations of their job. Staff also need to have timely access to all relevant data regarding foster parents and the children they care for. All of this requires a streamlined system of communication and oversight. Lastly, the quality, adequacy, and availability of resources and training for foster parents should be regularly improved and evaluated. What is the role and the importance of a foster parent? Dallimore: The most fundamental role of a foster parent is as a social advocate. As a foster parent myself, I believe my responsibility is to be a committed advocate for any child placed in my home and entrusted to my care. In attempting to successfully fulfill this role, I have found myself defending a child's interest against opposition posed by medical and educational professionals, other well-meaning but often uninformed community stakeholders, and even an occasional DCF social worker who has not acted in a child's best interest. My personal goal as a foster parent is to both empower and enable one of the most disregarded and disenfranchised segments of our population. Rizzo: Foster parents are invaluable. They volunteer to care for children in their own home until those children are reunited with their biological family, are adopted, or can live independently. Frequently, the amount of time that a child will remain in foster care is unknown, so foster parents are expected to tolerate that uncertainty. What's more, many children and adolescents in foster care present with multiple psychosocial and mental health problems. They have a higher and more complicated burden of disease than other youth including physical, mental, developmental, behavioral, and social-emotional concerns. For this reason, it is the hope that foster parents can provide a home environment that is predictable, caring, and stable so that youth who have experienced trauma, loss, and stress have a chance to feel safe and cared for. Source: <http://www.northeastern.edu/news/2015/08/fixing-massachusetts-troubled-foster-care-system/>

State found foster issues in western region – last year 072315ambert01.jpg Photo by: Ted Fitzgerald Jack Loiselle 1 Wednesday, August 26, 2015 Print Email 2 Comments By: Erin Smith Investigators warned last year that children funneled to an unlicensed foster home were part of a widespread problem in the western region of the state — an area that has come under scrutiny after one foster child died and another remains in critical condition, according to a report obtained by the Herald. The investigation by the Department of Early Education and Care — dated July 30, 2014 — found an unlicensed Franklin County foster home had operated without home inspections, training for the foster parents or necessary paperwork completed. A social worker for the Department of Children and Families also failed to check on the children during their first month living in the home, which also served as a day care, the report shows. “The investigation found reasonable cause to believe that there were other foster homes being quickly opened ... that might not meet correct criteria,” stated the EEC report. “This appears to be directly related to a significant shortage of foster homes in that area.” The DCF offices in the western region have come under fire after 2-year-old Avalena Conway-Coxon died and a 22-month-old girl remains in critical condition after being rushed to the hospital from their Auburn foster home, which had been licensed. DCF has also been criticized for failing to remove Jack Loiselle, a 7-year-old Hardwick boy under the agency's watch, before police say he was found starved and beaten by his father last month. After last year's EEC probe, a DCF spokeswoman said the agency initiated a “corrective action plan” and highlighted moves to hire more social workers, update technology and better train staff. The spokeswoman did not respond to questions about whether Lian Hogan, the former director for the western region, was aware of the unlicensed foster homes or if she did anything to fix the problem. The Herald reported last week that Hogan, a top administrator for the DCF's western region, was promoted to acting deputy director of field operations on July 26 — just weeks after Jack was found unconscious. EEC officials wouldn't say how many children where housed at the unlicensed Franklin County foster home last year — declaring the information confidential. A Herald review also found EEC has done very little to hold state child welfare officials accountable. Last year's probe was one of only two DCF foster care reports produced over the past decade by EEC — the supposed state watchdog charged with licensing foster care and adoption. EEC records show licensing inspectors hadn't visited some DCF offices in years. In 2011, EEC officials visited a single office — in Springfield — and used that inspection to renew DCF's foster care license for all nine offices in the western region. In addition, the licensing agency has opened only five investigations into DCF foster care operations and two probes into adoption programs within the past 10 years. The majority of the inquiries were opened before 2010. The most recent EEC foster care investigation was opened in DCF's western region Friday — about a week after Avalena died and the Herald began inquiring about EEC probes. In contrast, there were more than 70 reports of abuse or neglect of foster kids in 2013 alone, according to the Office of the Child Advocate. An EEC spokeswoman said inspectors are reviewing all DCF licenses but did not respond to questions about why there have been so few investigations. Matt Stout contributed to this report. Source: http://www.bostonherald.com/news_opinion/local_coverage/2015/08/state_found_foster_issues_in_western_region_last_year

Abuse and neglect cases rising in Kentucky's 'fractured' foster care system Posted: Aug 27, 2015 8:31 AM PDT Updated: Aug 27, 2015 10:26 AM PDT By Jason Riley BioEmail Connect Biography jriley@wdrb.com LOUISVILLE, Ky., (WDRB) – As longtime foster parents, Louisville residents Debbie and Roger Lance know better than most the intricacies of navigating Kentucky's foster care program. And they can quickly rattle off the problems they believe the state needs to work on: * The caseload is crushing for the number of social workers in Kentucky, overwhelming the system * The courts are so backed up and the process so cumbersome that it takes several months, if not years, to get a child out of a bad situation * Parents are given too many chances, allowed to keep their children even after allegations of abuse or neglect have been sustained, sometimes repeatedly “Parents are given chance after chance and it's just not fair for the children,” said Debbie Lance, claiming two of her foster kids were abused, yet continued to live with their parents until yet another allegation of neglect was substantiated. “It infuriates me. ... I feel like as foster parents, we have no voice, none.” Child protection experts don't disagree with the Lances. “If the system's not broken, it's at least fractured or sprained,” said Terry Brooks, executive director of Kentucky Youth Advocates, a private organization that promotes child well-being. “We know that more kids face crisis in 2015 than we could ever imagine.” Statistics provided by the Department of Community Based Services, the agency that oversees child protection in Kentucky, appear to support those claims. There were 129,000 calls to a state abuse hotline in fiscal year 2015, up from 108,000 calls in 2011. Of those calls, 60,000 met the criteria for an investigation and in 26,500 cases, the abuse was substantiated. As a comparison, in 2013, 18,000 abuse claims were supported. In addition, the number of Kentucky children removed from homes because of abuse or neglect has been closing in on nearly 8,000 in the last few months, compared to a little more than 7,000 cases in 2010. “Our caseloads are too high right now,” Teresa James, the department's commissioner, said in a recent interview with WDRB. “I don't believe that we have adequate staffing at this department right now to deal with the additional calls, the additional number of children in care and the additional responsibilities for investigations right now.” James said the average caseload is about 20 cases per worker, much higher than it should be, especially given the complexity of the cases. While James couldn't say what she would like the caseload number to be, she said the department was currently figuring out how many more staffers needed to be hired. “It is a significant number and quite frankly it will be a significant cost to the commonwealth," she said. Experts say caseloads are rising, at least in part, because of increasing drug abuse, especially the heroin epidemic across the state. In her first decade on the bench, Chief Jefferson Family Court Judge Paula Sherlock said she remembers only one case in which a parent was using heroin. "The last two years, on my neglect docket, it's virtually every other case," Sherlock said. Just last week alone, she had 10 hearings to temporarily remove children from their homes -- and six involved parents using heroin. "My observations are that these parents are in very poor physical shape, are either homeless or on their way to being homeless and not easily going to treatment," she said. And in many cases, Sherlock said, parents are choosing heroin instead of their children, refusing to go to treatment and often not even showing up to court. "Even losing their kids is not enough motivation to overcome the pull of addiction," she said. There are currently 971 kids in foster care in Jefferson County, the highest number in the last five years. "My firm belief is we have lost more parents in the last two years to heroin than to a number of years before to prescription pill overdoses." It can take several months, if not more than a year, to remove a child from a home in which allegations of abuse or neglect have been substantiated. James acknowledges the adoption process in Kentucky takes too long. However, under federal guidelines, parents are given up to 18 months to come up with a plan and permanent residency, with some treatment programs lasting as long as a year, she said. "We have to have exhausted all reasonable efforts, is what the law requires of us," James said, adding that foster care is a "last resort," as the goal is to keep families together if possible. "Stats really show us that if kids can be reunified safely, that is the best outcome." Still, James said the department is working to add or expand programs that should improve the system, including a system meant to reduce caller wait times and provide better quality. And the state hopes to work with Kentucky Youth Advocates and expand a "Kinship care" program, in which children go live with family members instead of being put in foster care. Currently, according to Kentucky Youth Advocates, six percent of Kentucky children are in the program, which the organization says is the highest rate in the nation. Brooks said the number of Kentucky kids in Kinship care has doubled in the last ten years. "If our goal is to reunite kids with their parents, family reunification is enhanced through Kinship care," Brooks said. The state has recently created a Kinship hotline to provide resource coordination and support to assist relative caregivers. Both Brooks and James said that Kentucky is making strides to improve the system -- and noted that similar issues are plaguing foster care across the country. "I think there is more awareness about the growing number of kids in crisis and a growing commitment toward those kids," Brooks said. For Debbie and Roger Lance, while they have been frustrated by the system and are hoping for major reform, the end result is worth the struggle. "It's very rewarding, to see the children come into your home, and most of them are broken ... and then to watch them blossom and grow and feel safe and secure - there is nothing that can describe that feeling," Debbie Lance said. Source: <http://www.wdrb.com/story/29893106/abuse-and-neglect-cases-rising-in-kentuckys-fractured-foster-care-system>

Lawmaker wants to study issue of unlicensed group homes Posted: Aug 25, 2015 8:55 PM PDT Updated: Aug 25, 2015 8:55 PM PDT By Samuel King Email_Connect_sking@cbs19_tv Residents of an unlicensed group home treated for heat-related illnesses TYLER (KYTX/KVUE) - State Sen. Kirk Watson has asked Lt. Governor Dan Patrick to allow the Senate Health and Human Services Committee to study the issue of unlicensed assisted living facilities. The request comes after two such facilities were discovered in Central Texas this month. Some of the conditions discovered included a lack of air conditioning, bed bugs, even sometimes no running water. "Are we giving the state government, DADS (Department of Aging and Disability Services) and others, sufficient tools and take care of bad situations and be able to do it in a timely fashion," said Sen. Watson in an interview with KVUE in Austin. Some East Texas facility directors told us they are often frustrated by those who don't follow the law. "I want to stay right with how we are regulated," said Pastor Greg Fleck, Executive Director of the New Creation Foundation in Troup. "We do comply with the building codes and things as we are required, our facility is monitored for fire." Since New Creation is a religious-based organization, it is not required to be licensed by the state, but it is required to register. Nevertheless, Fleck told CBS19 he wants to be in compliance. In 2009, lawmakers passed legislation allowing cities and counties to opt in to regulating boarding homes but only five have enacted such local legislation. The deadline to submit recommendations to the Lt. Governor's office is Sept. 4. Source: <http://www.cbs19.tv/story/29880226/lawmaker-wants-to-study-issue-of-unlicensed-group-homes>

Judge slams foster parents who forced abused child to stand in scalding water By Priva Joshi August 27, 2015 20:19 BST 6 Abuse or neglect in early life activates some genes that can have implications on the child's long-term development. (posed by model) A foster mother forced a girl to kneel in scalding water and subjected her to racist abuse, a court has heard. Neighbours reported shocking accounts of cruelty by the foster mother who referred to the young Zimbabwean girl as a 'dirty little b*' and used the 'N' word. The youngster, who cannot be named, had been born in Luton, Bedfordshire. She had lived with the couple who were British and white for about a decade under an 'informal fostering arrangement'. Neighbours, who first contacted the police about the mistreatment suffered by the child, recounted an incident they witnessed in the garden of the family's Lancashire home in the summer of 2010. Judge Singleton explained how the neighbours said they noticed the girl, now 12, "standing unnaturally still in full sunshine". She had "plainly wet herself" and was subjected to a tirade of abuse by the foster mother who ordered her to remove her clothes. The foster mother then forced the girl to clean herself by kneeling in scalding water after she soiled herself. The judge added: "She called her, so far as (that neighbour) could hear, a "dirty little b*" and said that (the girl) would have to wear that dress "tomorrow". The girl was then left outside naked until her foster mother shouted at her to come in. The judge described how the child was treated with "cold contempt" by her foster mother and the woman's partner. "On another occasion, (that neighbour) had observed (the girl) picking up faeces in the garden which she, perhaps not unreasonably, thought were dog faeces. She also observed (the girl) surrounded by the Rottweilers and had the impression that she flinched. Overall, she was disturbed by how cold (the foster mother) was to the child." Judge Singleton said both foster parents "indignantly" denied the allegations, had "failed to be truthful" and had "told deliberate lies from time to time". She said the foster mother had given "frankly incredible" accounts of the girl "pouring or splashing boiling water over herself". "On balance ... and it is very hard to contemplate, I do consider that those scalding injuries were deliberately inflicted. They were probably linked with somebody's disgust and vituperation over the soiling accidents and were likely to be linked with an abusive method of cleaning her up or forcing her to clean herself up." Judge Singleton told Blackpool Family Court the girl had been left physically scarred by her foster parents, who kept animals including three Rottweilers, at least one cat and a 'large' pig. She said the foster mother had demonstrated more warmth for the animals than the girl when giving evidence at the court hearing. Judge Singleton also concluded the girl had been bitten by the couple's three Rottweiler dogs. "I do not think it likely that the three Rottweilers were deliberately set upon her to attack her, but I do think it likely that she was frightened of the dogs, that in their presence she was treated, by (the foster mother) particularly, to being shouted at and to contemptuous treatment that might well cause a dog from time to time to nip her and bite her because that is what the dogs would perceive (the foster mother) or (the foster father) to be doing to her." The judge said the girl had lived with the couple for about a decade, but had been in the care of Lancashire council for the past two years after making complaints about her foster mother's 'cruelty and abuse' during sessions with a counsellor organised through a school after teachers also expressed their concerns for her well-being. According to Sky News the foster parents were not named, and the ruling gave no indication as to whether they had been charged with criminal offences. The child is now in the care of Lancashire council. REPORT ABUSE: Contact the NSPCC helpline and speak to a trained counsellor if you are worried about a child Source: <http://www.itimes.co.uk/judge-slams-foster-parents-who-forced-abused-child-stand-scalding-water-1517377>

County zoning board considers overturning Pine Grove decision By Stephen J. Pytak Published: August 28, 2015 Article Tools Font size: [\[A\]](#) [\[A\]](#) [\[A\]](#) Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on google Share on linkedin Share on email Share on print More Sharing Services 3 Our Social Networks Facebook Sign Up newsletter The Schuylkill County Zoning Hearing Board is trying to determine whether a collection of four facilities in Pine Grove it approved "group home" variance permits for this year are actually "treatment centers," Daniel Daub, zoning board chairman, said Thursday night. "We also have to determine if the county's zoning officer acted accordingly when issuing these permits," Daub said at a hearing called by the Borough of Pine Grove to appeal two of those permit approvals. The question isn't an easy one for a county zoning officer to tackle, according to one of the expert witnesses, Charles S. Schmehl, vice president of Urban Research & Development Corporation, Bethlehem. Schmehl authored the most recent version of the Schuylkill County Zoning Ordinance, which was adopted by the county commissioners Dec. 22, 2010. "Part of the problem is we do have limitations under the HIPAA (the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996) Privacy laws that limit the ability to find out about medical and health care information without the written permission of the person involved," Schmehl said. At the county courthouse Thursday night, the board heard nearly two and a half hours of testimony on the matter, from people including the county zoning officer, the mayor of the Pine Grove and a borough police officer who said there have been physical assaults at the facilities in question. With more testimony plus public comment on the agenda, the board decided to recess until 7 p.m. Sept. 3. Supportive Concepts For Families Inc., Reading, Berks County, runs four group homes in the borough, according to Ryan D. Smith, president and CEO. He said the addresses and the number of people residing in them are as follows: 202 Walters St., three residents; 13 Ridge Vista Drive, two residents; 8 Ridge Vista Drive, two residents; and

1 Hillside Vista Drive, one resident. In early 2015, the county zoning board approved permits to allow Supportive Concepts to open the group homes at 202 Walters St. and 13 Ridge Vista Drive in areas zoned R-2, medium density residential district. On May 5, the county zoning hearing board approved permits allowing Supportive Concepts to open similar homes at 8 Ridge Vista Drive, Pine Grove, owned by Ronald S. Landis, and 1 Hillside Vista Drive, Pine Grove, owned by Forino Co. L.P. On June 3, the Borough of Pine Grove submitted an application for a hearing before the zoning hearing board to appeal the decision. In reference to both properties, the borough made these statements in the application: • "The neighborhood is single family residential homes and not appropriate for group homes. Specifically, Pine Vista Estates is approved only for single family residential use, not group homes." • "The property is not suitable for group homes and fails to meet the zoning ordinance requirements for a group home. There is insufficient information with the applicant's application to permit the zoning officer to determine whether the permittee meets the requirements under the zoning ordinance for use of the subject property as a group home. The zoning officer has improperly acted under the requirements and procedures of the zoning ordinance." The definition of "Group Home," according to the county ordinance, includes: "A dwelling unit operated by a responsible entity with a program to provide a supportive living arrangement for individuals where special care is needed by the persons served due to age, emotional, mental developmental or physical disability." The definition of "Treatment Center," according to the ordinance, includes: "A use (other than a prison or a hospital) providing housing for three or more unrelated persons who need specialized housing, treatment and/or counseling because of: A. Criminal rehabilitation, such as a criminal halfway house; B. Current addiction to a controlled substance that was used in an illegal manner or alcohol; and/or C. A type of mental illness or other behavior that causes a person to be a threat to the physical safety of others. D. Homeless shelter." When presenting his case Thursday night, Paul J. Datte, an attorney from Pottsville, who represented Pine Grove borough at the hearing, was concerned with C. When they took the stand Thursday, Pine Grove Mayor Will Shiffer and Pine Grove police Sgt. Christopher Taylor emphasized there were a total of 13 incidents which occurred at the Supportive Concepts properties in the borough between April 27 and Aug. 12. "These included incidents where residents assaulted caretakers or assaulted residents in the home," Datte said. Other members of the zoning board present were: Scott Thomas, the vice chairman, and members David Ambrose and Mary Jo Moss. Source: <http://republicanherald.com/news/county-zoning-board-considers-overturning-pine-grove-decision-1.1933649#>

Web of Secrecy Surrounds Federal Half-a-Billion Handout to Charter Schools Friday, 04 September 2015 10:22 By Jonas Persson, PR Watch | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 40 Email (Photo: Classroom via Shutterstock; Edited: LW / TO) The US Department of Education is poised to spend half a billion dollars to help create new charter schools, while the public is being kept in the dark about which states have applied for the lucrative grants, and what their actual track records are when it comes to preventing fraud and misuse. Already the federal government has spent \$3.3 billion in American tax dollars under the Charter Schools Program (CSP), as tallied by the Center for Media and Democracy (CMD). But the government has done so without requiring any accountability from the states and schools that receive the money, as CMD revealed earlier this year. Throwing good money after bad, Education Secretary Arne Duncan called for a 48 percent increase in federal charter funding earlier this year, and the House and Senate budget proposals also call for an increase - albeit a more modest one - while at the same time slashing education programs for immigrants and language learners. The clamor for charter expansion comes despite the fact that there are federal probes underway into suspected waste and mismanagement within the program, not to mention ongoing and recently completed state audits of fraud perpetrated by charter school operators. Earlier this year, the Center for Popular Democracy documented more than \$200 million in fraud, waste, and mismanagement in the charter school industry in 15 states alone, a number that is likely to be just the tip of the iceberg. Is now really the right time to plow more tax money into charters? Insiders Deliberate Far From the Public Eye The Department of Education is currently deciding what states to award $116 million this year, and more than half a billion during the five-year grant cycle. So who is in the running and what are their track records? Which states have applied for a grant designed to eviscerate the public school system in the name of "flexibility?" (CMD's review of state applications and reviewers' comments from the previous grant cycle exposed "flexibility" as a term of art used by the industry for state laws that allow charter schools to: operate independently from locally elected school boards, employ people to teach without adequate training or certification, and avoid collective bargaining that helps ensure that teacher-student ratios are good so that each kid gets the attention he or she deserves.) There is no way of knowing. The US Department of Education has repeatedly refused to honor a CMD request under the Freedom of Information Act for the grant applications, even though public information about which states have applied would not chill deliberation and might even help better assess which applicants should receive federal money. The agency has even declined to provide a list with states that have applied: "We cannot release a list of states that have applied while it is in the midst of competition." The upshot of this reticence is that states will land grants - possibly to the tune of a hundred million dollars or more in some cases - all at the discretion of charter school interests contracted to evaluate the applications, but without any input from ordinary citizens and advocates concerned about public schools and troubled by charter school secrecy and fraud. But, if people in a state know that a state is applying they can weigh in so that the agency is not just hearing from an applicant who wants the money, regardless of the history of fraud and waste in that state. Charter Millions by Hook or by Crook: The Case of Ohio Despite ED's unwillingness to put all the cards on the table, state reports tell us that Ohio has once again applied for a grant under the program. The state, whose lax-to-non-existing charter school laws are an embarrassment even to the industry, has previously been awarded at least $49 million in CSP money - money that went to schools overseen by a rightwing think-tank, and, more worryingly, to schools overseen by an authorizer that had its performance rating boosted this year by top education officials who removed the failing virtual schools from the statistics so as not to stop the flow of state and federal funds. As The Plain Dealer put it in an exposé: "It turns out that Ohio's grand plan to stop the national ridicule of its charter school system is giving overseers of many of the lowest-performing schools a pass from taking heat for some of their worst problems." Another component of this plan, it turns out, was to apply for more federal millions to the failing schools that - by a miraculous sleight of hand - are no longer failing. The director of Ohio's Office of Quality School Choice, David Hansen, fell on the sword and announced his resignation in June. But Democratic lawmakers suspect that this goes higher up in the chain of command, and have called on State Superintendent Richard Ross to resign. Did the scrubbed statistics touting the success of Ohio's charters find its way into the state application for federal millions, signed by Superintendent Ross? What about other states, such as Indiana, with a similar history of doctoring data to turn failing charter schools into resounding success stories? After Abysmal Results, States Re-apply for More Money While the known unknowns are troubling, the known knowns - to paraphrase Donald Rumsfeld - also equally disturbing. For example, Colorado applied for grant renewal this year. But, the last time around, in 2010, the state landed a $46 million CSP grant thanks in no small part to the lax "hiring and firing" rules and the lack of certification requirements for charter school teachers - a reviewer contracted by the US Department of Education to score the application noted. Look at California. Through meeting minutes from the California State Board of Education we also know that the Golden State submitted an application this year. In 2010, California was awarded \$254 million over five years in CSP money, but as the Inspector General discovered in a 2012 audit, the state department of education did not adequately monitor any of the schools that received sub-grants. Some schools even received federal money "without ever opening to students." A review by CMD revealed that a staggering 9 out of the 41 schools that shuttered in the 2014-'15 school year were created by federal money under CSP. How about Wisconsin? Wisconsin received $69.6 million between 2010 and 2015, but out of the charter schools awarded sub-grants during the first two years of the cycle, one-fifth (16 out of 85) have closed since, as CMD discovered. Then there's Indiana. Indiana was awarded $31.3 million over the same period, partly because of the fact that charter schools in the state are exempt from democratic oversight by elected school boards. "[C]harter schools are accountable solely to authorizers under Indiana law," one reviewer enthused, awarding the application 30/30 under the rubric "flexibility offered by state law." This "flexibility" has been a recipe for disaster in the Hoosier state with countless examples of schools pocketing the grant money and then converting to private schools, as CMD discovered by taking a closer look at grantees under the previous cycle: The Indiana Cyber Charter School opened in 2012 with $420,000 in seed money from the federal program. Dogged by financial scandals and plummeting student results the charter was revoked in 2015 and the school last month leaving 1,100 students in the lurch. Padua Academy lost its charter in 2014 and converted to a private religious school, but not before receiving $702,000 in federal seed money. Have They Learned Anything? Secretary Duncan has previously called for "absolute transparency" when it comes to school performance, but that's just a talking point unless he releases the applications, or even a list of the states that are in the running, before they are given the final stamp of approval. As it stands, there is no way of knowing if the state departments of education seeking millions in tax dollars: Have supplied actual performance data that reflect the reality for students enrolled in charter schools rather than "scrubbed" or doctored numbers; Try to outbid each other in "flexibility" by explaining, say, how charter schools in X can hire teachers without a license and fire them without cause. In its 2010 application, the Colorado Department of Education, for example, boasted of how charter school teachers are "employed at will by the school"; Have corrective action plans so as to avoid repeating the costly waste and mistakes from the previous grant cycle (such as schools created by federal seed money closing within a few years or never even opening). Because the federal charter schools program is designed to foster charter school growth, which in turn means that money will be diverted from traditional public schools to an industry that resists government enforcement of basic standards for financial controls, accountability, and democratic oversight, the public has a big stake in this and a right to know more, before their money disappears down black holes. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/32655-web-of-secrecy-surrounds-federal-half-a-billion-handout-to-charter-schools>

September 4, 2015 More Kansas parents upset over authorities taking their children away By: KAKE News Updated: Fri 7:59 PM, Aug 28, 2015 By: KAKE News WICHITA, Kan. — One man says that the foster care system is broken and some of the foster parents are only in the program for the money. Gaberial McDonald says he was put in the system in the early 2000s and was abused. McDonald says he was raped 17 times, beaten and starved. He claims that one of the men that raped him is now in jail on aggravated indecent liberties charges. McDonald says he and his three siblings were taken out of their home after their mother could no longer afford utilities and the home had no electricity or water. He thinks that many other children are placed in homes that are worse than the home they were taken out of. "They are just throwing us out there, taking us out of bad situations and putting us in worse," he said. Executive Director of the Sedgwick County Court Appointed Special Advocate Program Ashley Thorne says that there are situations where the foster home is not a healthy environment. "Sometimes the system itself will abuse the child and it may not be physical abuse where they actually have hands on the child, but simple things like not getting their medical needs met in a timely manner," Thorne said. She says that there are around 1,200 children in foster care inside Sedgwick County and the CASA organization only has the staff to serve 150 children. Thorne wants people to volunteer their time because their organization gets results. "If the CASA says this home environment is not healthy or they are being abused, the judge will remove that child on the spot in the courtroom," she said. The Kansas Department of Health and Environment confirms that it used to take care of the training for foster parents, but as of July 1, 2015, that responsibility was handed over to the Department of Children and Families. KAKE News made multiple requests to speak with the Department of Children and Families. It has not responded. To read the story on the legal action some parents are taking click here. Source: <http://www.kake.com/home/headlines/More-Kansas-people-upset-over-authorities-taking-their-children-323257481.html>

When Louisiana lost its foster children BY Laura Santhanam August 29, 2015 at 9:09 AM EDT ? 163 +1 EMAIL 101 Boarded-up Memories — The Boys Town Louisiana group house where Herman and Yvonne Clayton lived with Dederah Johnson remains boarded up 10 years after Hurricane Katrina made landfall over New Orleans. Floodwaters spared the house, but wind and rain damage made the home uninhabitable. Photo by Josh Brasted Two days before Hurricane Katrina made landfall on the Gulf Coast, Herman Clayton packed his two kids and four foster children into a van and fled New Orleans, heading north to Shreveport. Seventeen hours later, Sonia Cooper, a child welfare worker, filled two vans with 15 children, nine of them foster kids, and drove west toward Houston. State workers had lost track of an estimated 25 percent of the foster children living in those storm-damaged areas. The following morning at daybreak, Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans. Winds exceeding 125-miles-an-hour destroyed trees, roofs and structures. Levees failed, and floodwater rose to rooftops. The storm devastated the Gulf region, killing 1,833 people and forcing more than 1.5 million to evacuate — displacing 400,000 from New Orleans alone. It also shook the Louisiana's foster care system to its core, revealing fundamental weaknesses in its disaster plan. In Louisiana, about 2,000 foster children lived in the path of the hurricane. And two weeks after the storm, state workers had lost track of an estimated 25 percent of these children. A month after Katrina, 158 remained unaccounted for, state officials said, according to this NPR report. This was in part due to the fact that shelters were overwhelmed, and many of the staff who handled foster care cases were displaced, said Susan Sonnier, secretary for the state's Department of Children and Family Services. But it also stemmed from problems in communication and monitoring. At the time of the storm, Sonnier directed Louisiana's Children's Cabinet and the Juvenile Justice Commission. "It is the core mission of the department to ensure that children are safe," Sonnier said. "What we learned in Katrina is it's very hard to do that if you don't know where they are." Aftermath of Hurricane Katrina — A traffic light hangs over floodwaters from Hurricane Katrina September 7, 2005 in New Orleans, Louisiana. Photo by Chris Hondros/Getty Images Leaving home Meanwhile, the families of foster children who evacuated faced a number of additional challenges: among them, paying for food and shelter, accessing critical medication and getting their children back to school. At the time of the hurricane, Sonia Cooper was program administrator of Raintree Children and Family Services, a small, non-profit foster care agency. As such, she was responsible for 57 children in residential and in-home foster care. But in the days immediately following the storm, a handful of those children remained unaccounted for. Every day on the road, starting at 6 a.m., she and her staff began making calls. When they weren't caring for the children who were with them, they were trying to find the others. They dialed every phone number on their list of foster parents and biological families. But the storm had knocked out cell towers in New Orleans. Most calls were met with busy signals. When they were able to connect, calls often dropped. "We didn't know where everybody was. We didn't know if everybody was safe," Cooper said. At the same time, they were trying to care for the girls in their custody. These girls had already experienced trauma through abuse or neglect or families who couldn't meet their needs. The storm was another layer of trauma. Cooper vividly remembers the children's terror during the 24-hour drive to Houston — a drive that normally takes a third of that time to complete. They'd packed enough water, sandwiches and snacks for eight hours. And when they checked into a Houston hotel, they saw on television familiar places underwater. They wondered aloud if their family members were alive. "We wanted to be in touch with what was going on, but we were traumatizing ourselves," Cooper recalled, adding that she still has nightmares about those early days. Home again — Herman Clayton, right, stands on the steps of what was once his front porch when he worked as a family teacher for Boys Town Louisiana. Dederah Johnson, right, hugs Clayton outside the home they shared when she was in the foster care system. Hurricane Katrina damaged the roof and dumped rain into the home, making it uninhabitable. It remains boarded up today. Photo by Josh Brasted No plans in place Within days, they ran out of necessary antidepressant and antipsychotic medications for the girls. They spent an entire day inside a Houston hospital's emergency room to refill that medication, but were unsuccessful. It would take more than a month before they could access the drugs. Because medical care for foster children is paid for by in-state Medicaid, accessing prescription drugs was complicated, since Cooper and the girls had evacuated out of state, to Texas. This was a problem for anyone who received Medicaid coverage in Louisiana and then crossed state lines. On Sept. 16, 2005, the federal government issued a waiver that allowed states to temporarily cover Medicaid recipients that Katrina displaced. They ran out of clothes for the girls and relied on donations from local churches. And when it became obvious that the evacuation would last far longer than three days, they were met with a new problem: how to enroll the girls in school. School records had been left in the group home. "We just don't know if we're really better off today than we were ..." — Tanya Weinberg, Save the Children "You had no plans in place. Nobody took the time to say, 'If something happens, this is where you need to go, what you need to do to take care of yourself,'" Cooper said. Two hundred miles away in San Antonio, Texas, Clayton faced his own set of obstacles. For nearly two decades, Clayton and his wife, Yvonne, had worked as family teachers with Boys Town Louisiana, a nonprofit child welfare agency. They cooked meals and gave hugs like parents but conducted group therapy and problem-solving sessions like counselors. Together, they served as mother and father figures for as many as 300 children. Now they were on the road with 39 of those kids. Within two weeks, they had stayed at a hotel in Shreveport, Louisiana, a campground in Marshall, Texas, another hotel in Dallas, Texas, and a converted convent in San Antonio. Even with the support of Boys Town, he and other staff struggled to find housing for everyone. The kids were scared. Many didn't know if their families were safe. Among them, fights broke out. Some tried to run away. "You couldn't say, 'No, I'm going back home' because there wasn't nothing to go to," Clayton said. Meanwhile, Boys Town Louisiana staff in Baton Rouge checked off names on a whiteboard as they found children's biological family members and coworkers alive, said Dennis Dillon, who had been executive director of Boys Town Louisiana for about one year when Katrina hit. They also monitored direct deposits of paychecks to see if people survived. "There were some people who never claimed those checks," Dillon said. "We don't know. We didn't get 100 percent." Helper needed help — Before Hurricane Katrina made landfall, Sonia Cooper evacuated New Orleans with nine girls she cared for in a foster care group home at Raintree House. She and her staff struggled to care for the displaced foster children and themselves. Photo by Josh Brasted 'They showed me what family really was' Dederah Johnson was 12 when she entered foster care with the Claytons and 17 when the storm hit. Her childhood home was unstable. Johnson's parents were both crack addicts; her grandmother raised her until she died in 1999. Relatives told her she'd be pregnant by the ninth grade and never finish high school. She got into fights, ran away and eventually found herself in front of a juvenile court judge. In 2001, she was placed in the Claytons' white, two-story group house on the corner of Louisiana Avenue and Dryades Street. It sat under oak trees about a dozen blocks from the banks of the Mississippi River. Faded purple and green beads dangled from nearby tree limbs and powerlines, reminders that the house was on a Mardi Gras parade route. With the Claytons, Johnson and the girls learned table manners and job etiquette, attended Celebration Church in Metairie and ate special meals at Ryan's steakhouse restaurant. Yvonne coaxed the children to eat their broccoli by telling them it would make their eyes prettier. And Johnson no longer worried about coming home to an eviction notice or going to bed hungry. "They showed me more love than I got anywhere ever. They showed me what family really was... At the end of the day, that's what really matters," Johnson said. Johnson was on a home visit with her siblings when she heard about the hurricane brewing in the Gulf. Her mother was in jail. And during her visit, the phone rang. It was Clayton. Did Johnson want to evacuate with him or stay with her family, he wanted to know. "I didn't want them to leave me," Johnson said. "I wanted to be with Mr. Herman and Mrs. Yvonne because I knew they would comfort me." Within the hour, Herman picked her up in an agency van. There were eight more vans just like theirs, filled with more than three dozen teenagers, connected by walkie talkies and all on their way to Shreveport. They prayed in a circle before driving away. During the trip, she recalls hand games and bingo in the car, but also trying desperately to reach her biological family back home. She tried to call her sister, but no one picked up. "They're gone," Johnson told Clayton, as she held the phone, tears streaming down her face. Raintree House route in red and Boys Town route in blue. Before Hurricane Katrina reached the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, 2005, more than 1 million people evacuated the region. Herman Clayton, Sonia Cooper and the foster children in their care were among those evacuees fleeing the storm. Clayton and Cooper went in different directions, but they both struggled to find a safe and stable place for the children who didn't have anyone else to protect them. These are the routes they took before eventually returning home to New Orleans. Are we better off today? That summer, people from the Gulf learned to send text messages. That's because phone systems were overwhelmed, and messages took up less bandwidth. Power outages and flooding wiped out communication for more than 3 million phone lines, along with dozens of 911 emergency call centers, the Federal Communications Commission reported. One-fifth of cell phone towers in the hardest-hit areas remained damaged a week after the storm. "In the beginning, that was truly the crisis," said Sonnier with the Department for Children and Family Services. People were desperate to hear from missing family members. Even Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco had trouble putting a phone call through to New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, she said. But foster parents had their own set of challenges. They didn't know how to report the status of their child's safety or location to the state. Who would even answer the phone? Many of the state's workers had evacuated. Those who stayed behind were helping the people who were stranded on rooftops and running shelters and aid, Sonnier said. They were overwhelmed. On the day Katrina made landfall on the Gulf Coast, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children helped Louisiana set up a hotline for foster care parents and providers. But few, especially in the early days, knew about the service. "There really weren't" formal evacuation plans in place for children in foster care, Sonnier said. "That's why it was such a huge lesson learned." Rebuilding — Since the storm, Raintree Children & Family Services, the small, non-profit foster care agency in New Orleans, has nearly twice as many children in foster care since 2005, and donations since then have doubled to $400,000, said current executive director Lashawna Schofield. Photo by Josh Brasted In the decade since, new policies have been implemented to improve the foster system's emergency plan. All child care workers and foster parents must submit an evacuation plan, with emergency contact information, to the state. If the storm disrupts their evacuation location, foster parents are required to inform the state of new plans. Disaster response and emergency preparedness is now a part of foster parent training, and child welfare workers train each year to maintain awareness and address staff turnover, a common problem nationwide among child welfare workers because of the job's potential for intense stress. In 2006, it became federal law that all states maintain written disaster plans for children in the foster care system. Today, that's more than 400,000 children nationwide. But the degree to which these plans are effectively enforced is unclear. Save the Children, a children's advocacy group, recently reported that "there does not appear to be an updated evaluation to show impact." "We just don't know if we're really better off today than we were, and that's really concerning," said Tanya Weinberg, a Save the Children spokesperson. "These are almost like forgotten children, and they don't have a powerful political voice in this country. Let's not wait until a Katrina hits your state to take action." The foster children lost to the state in the days after the storm were among more than 5,000 children reported missing after Hurricane Katrina. "We weren't prepared for the disaster to deal with displaced children," said Robert Lowery with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "Today, we believe we are much better prepared." An act of Congress resulted in a national emergency family registry database to collect information about children and families to reunite them if needed after a disaster. However, inclusion is voluntary. If you don't submit your information to the database, you can't benefit from it. Another major problem at the time: the helpers needed help. Often, their own homes were flooded; their own family members missing, said Gerald Mallon, executive director at the National Center for Child Welfare Excellence at Hunter College. Denise Goodman spent nearly four years rebuilding Louisiana's foster care system after the storm. For 30 years, Goodman has fixed broken child welfare agencies nationwide as a consultant for the Annie E. Casey Foundation. Normally, states called upon her when they faced a lawsuit, a child's death or a budget crisis, Goodman said. This was different. "This was the first time I had worked in a jurisdiction where a natural disaster caused the problem," she said. "This wasn't a manmade thing. It got people around the country to think about what would be their disaster plan for their children's welfare system. What would happen if we had an earthquake in California? How would we make sure we find all our kids and families and respond to it?" Searching after the evacuation — At one point after Hurricane Katrina, Dennis Dillon was the only employee of Boys Town Louisiana in the entire state. He and his staff checked off names of foster children and their own coworkers as they found out they were safe. They also monitored paychecks through direct deposit to see if their colleagues survived the disaster. Some of those paychecks were never claimed, he said. Photo by Josh Brasted Accepting change In Houston, Cooper's resources were running low, and there was pressure to return to Louisiana. In late September, they drove more than 200 miles to the small Louisiana town of Natchitoches where they lived until December. But the evacuation and instability had already taken its toll. The girls were often agitated, Cooper said. One suffered a mental breakdown. When the foster girls finally returned to New Orleans, Cooper herself wasn't ready to return. She stayed behind with her own children. "I cried for days. At that point, we were all family." As for Johnson, nearly one month after the storm, she finally made contact with her oldest sister. She had evacuated to Baltimore, Maryland with her fiancé. Her other sister was in Atlanta; her brother, in Texas. They were safe. Despite her homesickness and separation from her siblings, Johnson excelled in school in Nebraska. There, she graduated high school a year early. But during her final year in high school, the Claytons returned to New Orleans for work and encouraged her to stay in Nebraska to finish school. She lived in group housing with two other New Orleanians who had also evacuated. In May 2006, Boys Town flew the Claytons and her sister to watch her accept her diploma in Omaha. She was the first in her family to complete high school. "That was one of the biggest accomplishments I ever had," she said. Nearly a decade later, Johnson is back in New Orleans where she raises three children, works full-time as a security guard and is pursuing her bachelor's degree. She's engaged to be married, and plans to start her own business as a wedding and event planner. But the 27-year-old regrets her decision to return to New Orleans. She thinks that if she had gone elsewhere or even joined the military, she would have had more opportunities. Instead, she was 18-years-old, enrolling in college and not ready for bills and boyfriends. "I still don't accept changes," she says. "I like stability, and if I have to change, I really don't do it well." Emergency Shelter — People who weren't able to evacuate from Hurricane Katrina's path entered emergency shelters that were quickly overwhelmed, including the now-infamous Superdome in New Orleans. Aside from having adequate sanitation, food and water, officials realized that children were especially vulnerable in these highly stressful shelters. After Hurricane Katrina, Louisiana put into place disaster plans that included separate areas for children. Photo by Getty Images A lesson learned? It's been 10 years since Hurricane Katrina scattered thousands of foster care children across the country, and questions remain about how effectively states prepare their child welfare systems for disaster. These plans involve complex bureaucratic agencies at the federal, state and local levels, all intended to protect society's most vulnerable members — children who have already endured abuse, neglect and trauma and who live without their biological families. How much accountability is built into this system? And how closely has the federal government monitored these disaster plans for foster children? Hurricane Katrina forced Louisiana to address its fractured system of emergency preparedness and disaster response for children in foster care. What's unclear is if the rest of the country has done the same. Source: <http://www.pbs.org/newshour/updates/katrina-foster-kids/#>

State Bungled Earlier Complaints About Group Home by Terri Langford Aug. 28, 2015 8Comments Comment Republish Email Tweet Recommend Enlarge Photo by Hamid Najafi As the Texas Attorney General moved on Friday to shut down an illegal assisted living operation in Austin, The Texas Tribune has learned that the state failed to investigate previous complaints about the facility, and an employee of the attorney general's office may have been unlawfully assisting one of the facility's associates. On Friday, Attorney General Ken Paxton's office obtained a temporary restraining order against Zoe's Safe Place, one week after the state Department of Aging and Disabilities Services sent investigators to interview residents there. After determining that Zoe's was operating as an illegal assisted living center, the department relocated five people and referred the case to Paxton's office. State law requires any facility to have an assisted living license if it offers personal care services such as administering medications or helping residents dress or bathe themselves. According to affidavits filed by department investigators, residents at Zoe's Place were found to be living in bed bug-infested conditions in the group home where the thermostat registered 87 degrees and roaches roamed freely. Some residents went without bed linens, and others without beds altogether. "I observed two people sleeping in the hallway and in the common area," wrote Barbara Hanshew-Swenson, a DADS investigator. "I observed live roaches crawling throughout the building." One resident told a DADS investigator he recently had been raped. In a press release issued Friday, Paxton praised investigators' work. "The diligent work of DADS protects and supports the elderly and disabled of Texas, and I commend the investigators who dedicate themselves to safeguarding some of our most vulnerable," Paxton said. "Thanks to their hard work in this case, we were able to take appropriate legal action and seek justice against those who continue to threaten the health and safety of our loved ones." But the Tribune learned that two previous complaints — in October 2014 and last February — about Zoe's Safe Place received by DADS were never investigated. "We didn't investigate the complaints," said Cecilia Cavuto, DADS spokeswoman. "It fell through the cracks." Also, DADS investigators discovered through interviews that 15 of the approximately 60 residents living at Zoe's Place had recently been moved from a Belton group home called God's Blessings, which was temporarily shut down on Aug. 20 because it too was operating as an unlicensed assisted living facility. Cavuto confirmed on Friday that officials from the Social Security Administration and the U.S. Health and Human Services Office of Inspector General have contacted DADS about the God's Blessings group home, which is owned by Renee Segura-Livingston. Also on Friday, the Attorney General's office confirmed it was investigating allegations that one of its employees assisted with or approved paperwork granting Segura-Livingston power of attorney for several residents who were paying to stay at God's Blessings. Group home owners who do not accept Medicaid or Medicare sometimes have residents sign over their Social Security checks to pay rent. "We received an allegation of this nature concerning one of our employees and we're investigating those allegations," said Allison Castle, a spokeswoman for Paxton's office. Pressed for more detail, Castle responded: "All I can give you is what I just said." Attempts to reach Segura-Livingston and Tommie Yvette McKinney, owner of Zoe's Safe Place, were not successful. Source: <https://www.texastribune.org/2015/08/28/ag-shuts-down-facility-after-dads-failed-investiga/>

Does public health law apply to assisted living facilities? Aug 30, 2015, 6:00am EDT Updated Sep 1, 2015, 9:46am EDT Industries & Tags Legal Services, Health Care Share Order Reprints Save Article Print Email Twitter LinkedIn Facebook Google+ Order Reprints Save Article Amy Archer Flaherty Guest Columnist Amy Archer Flaherty Guest Columnist Home of the Day Sponsor Listing Woodcrest Estate Home on 6+ Private Acres! See All Homes of the Day Enlarge stokkete Nursing home Public Health Law § 2801-d was enacted in 1975. The statute gives a private right of action to residents of nursing homes, also known as residential health care facilities, permitting them to sue nursing home operators for the deprivation of a right or benefit created for their well-being. The statute permits the recovery of both compensatory and punitive damages. It was enacted to remediate accounts of abuse by some nursing home operators which was documented in the nursing homes industry in the 1960s and early 1970s. The investigation and findings were set forth in a report by the Moreland Act Commission on Nursing Homes and Residential Facilities. The response of the New York State Legislature was to enact Public Health Law § 2801-d, as well as to take other remediating measures. Enlarge stokkete Nursing home The statute has been used extensively as grounds for lawsuits by nursing home residents against nursing home operators. Allegations that an operator violated Public Health Law § 2801-d can be and are asserted along with claims of general negligence or nursing home malpractice. Upcoming Events Mix Business With Pleasure - in Ellicottville! September 25, 2015 Medicaid Reform - Power Breakfast September 10, 2015 Women of Influence Awards and Luncheon September 17, 2015 See More Events The result has been an increase in lawsuits against nursing home operators and, as the statute intended, increased vigilance by nursing home operators intent on protecting the rights and benefits of residents of their facilities. The statute clearly provides that it applies to residents of residential health care facilities. But does it also apply to residents of other types of state-licensed facilities? The Fourth Department addressed this question in the recent decision of Burkhart v. People Inc., 129 AD3d 1475 (4th Dept. 2015). The plaintiff in Burkhart claimed that Public Health Law § 2801-d gave a private right of action to the resident of a group home. Unlike nursing home facilities, group homes are not licensed or regulated by the Department of Health. Instead, they are licensed and operated by either the Office of Mental Health or the Office of People with Developmental Disabilities. The requirements for licensure for group homes are different from those of nursing homes. Source: <http://www.bizjournals.com/buffalo/blog/buffalo-law-journal/2015/08/does-public-health-law-apply-to-assisted-living.html>

State of emergency: Shortage of foster homes leads to separated siblings, moving far from home Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next Greg Price Floyd County Juvenile Court Judge Posted: Sunday, August 30, 2015 2:00 pm State of emergency: Shortage of foster homes leads to separated siblings, moving far from home Posted on Aug 30, 2015 by Kristina Wilder Georgia is in a "state of emergency" when it comes to foster care, and Floyd County was ranked the fifth highest county per capita for children removed from their homes, according to DFCS officials and a report from Georgia Child Welfare Measures. Some 244 children from Floyd County were sent into foster care from April 2014 through March 2015, according to the statistics. That state rate over that time period was 31.2 children per 10,000. Floyd County's rate was 104.5 per 10,000. Why is the rate so high? There are several reasons, according to local officials. "It comes down to the fact that we are looking more," said Floyd County Juvenile Court Judge Greg Price. "We have two hospitals and many medical professionals who are required to report suspicious things. We have a high number of teachers and law enforcement as well." These individuals are trained to notice signs of trouble, he added. "When you're a mechanic trained to fix problems on VWs, when you drive down the road, you're going to see the VWs first," explained Price. Another issue is cyclical abuse and neglect, according to Price and Lindsey Howerton, director of the Floyd County Division of Family and Children Services. "We have many families who repeat the cycle of abuse and neglect," she said. "They stay here. Their children have children, and it keeps going and no one breaks the pattern." The reasons for the removal of children from their homes covers a wide range, with 120 removed for neglect, 80 removed because their parents were abusing drugs or alcohol, 52 removed because parents were unable to cope, 88 removed for inadequate housing, 30 were abandoned and 32 were victims of physical abuse. Other reasons include sexual abuse, domestic violence or because parents are incarcerated. Howerton said the specific reasons stated can be misleading. "Many times, when we investigate further, we may find signs of physical or sexual abuse when the child was originally removed for neglect or drug abuse," she said. "This is especially true for a younger child who is not in school. If that child is only going to the doctor once a year, it is much harder to catch." A major crisis situation arises after these children are removed, because Floyd County only has 16 DFCS foster homes. "This often results in our children being placed out of county, which causes all kinds of problems," she said. "The children have a harder time coming back for court dates and for visits with their families. Also, you have the added trauma for the child, which is just increased by them having to completely relocate and have nothing familiar around them." DFCS always tries to help the families, she added, and this is made more difficult when the child is miles away. "Our main goal when a child is removed from a home is to work with the parents to help them change behaviors if possible and bring their child home," Howerton said. "Having to place that child in a home in Macon just makes it that much harder on everyone." So, the first thing DFCS does is try to find a qualified family member or family friend who can take the child. This is the best option, but sometimes is impossible because they might not live in the area or may be unsuitable. Issues also often arise because of siblings, she said. "We have a lot of multiple-child families, and the ideal would be to have those siblings together or at least close to each other," she said. "This becomes hard because many foster families can't handle that many children at once." Floyd does have 23 homes that work with child placing agencies, such as Faith Bridge, Howerton added. However, these homes can have children who are not from Floyd County placed in them. Winshape Homes is its own entity and does work with DFCS as much as possible, she said. "We have two large sibling groups placed with Winshape currently," she said. The Open Door Home is a group home and children are only placed there if they are 13 or older. "We are always hoping that if people know there is a need, they will be willing to serve as foster families," she said. Potential foster families attend classes, she said. Families are taught about the process from start to finish about policies and how a child might behave. "For instance, a child who has suffered neglect may hoard food," she said. "I've had children who don't understand or know about the bath routine and a child who had never seen a toothbrush." Those who want to foster are also given a home study session in which a DFCS agent comes into the home and observes the environment and the family's interaction. "Most understand the reasons behind this," Howerton said. "It is all about the safety and well-being of the child. The home studies are usually completed within two or three sessions." Foster parents also have to undergo fingerprinting, background checks and financial checks. "We have to make sure they can handle the extra expense," Howerton said. "We do not so much pay as reimburse. A foster family has to be stable enough to handle extra costs like clothing, diapers and glasses, and then be reimbursed." Once approved, foster parents are often immediately needed. "I've had families receive a child the day they were approved," Howerton said. About 75 percent of the 422 Floyd County children in foster care are placed outside of Floyd County, Howerton said. Of the 25 percent here, the majority are placed with family members. These numbers frustrate Howerton, she said. "I would love to put myself out of a job," she said. "We are trying to build strong families in a strong community. When it comes to foster care in this county and this state, we are in a state of emergency." Source: http://www.northwestgeorgianews.com/rome/news/local/state-of-emergency-shortage-of-foster-homes-leads-to-separated/article_485e34c2-4edc-11e5-bf52-6f023a9a80c6.html

Escape casts spotlight on Washington use of juvenile inmates to fight wildfires Inmate, 16, shoots self in head after escaping Chelan Complex fire work camp Teen survives and state suspends decades-old firefighting program Juvenile inmates fight fires in Washington state, in a handout photograph taken in

July. Photograph: DSHS Cathy Enders in New York @catyenders_email Monday 31 August 2015 07.00 EDT Last modified on Monday 31 August 2015 07.55 EDT Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Share via Email Share on Pinterest Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on WhatsApp Shares 1,803 1803 Comments 95 Save for later Article saved

As record-setting Washington wildfires burned last week, a 16-year-old inmate who was helping to fight the Chelan Complex fire escaped from a work camp, after punching a security guard. 'It's unrelenting': inside the Washington town surrounded by raging wildfires Omak is at the epicenter of several blazes that have created a fire line 1,000 miles long – a fire so overwhelming that officials have stopped talking about beating it: 'We're in total defensive mode. We have to be smart' Read more The next day, 22 August, police found the inmate on a nearby road and attempted to apprehend him. He pulled out a .22 caliber revolver and, after a brief interaction, fired one shot to his head. The teen survived, but the program that deploys young inmates to help fight wildfires was placed on hold. Washington has been employing inmates in juvenile detention to fight wildfires for decades. But the teen's escape has shed new light on the program. David Ball, a criminal justice lawyer and corrections expert at California's Santa Clara University, said he was surprised to learn of fire camps for inmates under the age of 18. "The word about scared-straight boot camps for juveniles is that they don't do any good," said Ball. "For most juvenile programs, there are lots of other things for these kids to do, like get their GED and go to counseling. This is really something that I have not heard of." The Washington state government said it was reassessing the juvenile work camps, in light of the events. Two deployed crews had been recalled to their main facilities. But Jennifer Redman, a probation officer with Washington's juvenile services, said she was hopeful the state will "get this program back up and running so we can deploy again". Advertisement Naselle Youth Camp, which houses 76 boys, deploys two fire crews throughout the year. Since the 1960s, camps like this one have supplied the Department of Natural Resources (DNR) with inexpensive labor for trail work, fire prevention and fire suppression. Redman said such crews were "not in the midst of heavy flames". She said they began their 16-hour days at around 4am or 5am, received a lunch break, and then continued work until the early evening. Receiving orders from a DNR fire crew, they assisted with digging trenches, hauling pails of water to put out hot spots and supporting frontline firefighters. "[They are] providing low-level fire suppression, so maybe just a smaller hose going to smaller areas," said Redman. "Or doing clear-cutting." During a 14-day rotation, she said, inmates on fire prevention work received between $0.70 and $1.60 per day. Stints could be extended to 21 days, with a day off, and overtime pay or bonus fire pay was possible. "Definitely the skills are transferrable," said Redman. "Just waking up early in the morning and going to work, which is not a skill our kids come to us with." The young inmates at Naselle have committed crimes ranging from theft or drug offenses to burglary and violent crime. The youth who escaped from the camp allegedly obtained the gun from a parks vehicle, about eight hours after he assaulted a guard and ran. According to a police report, he was in stable condition in hospital. "The length we've been involved in the program speaks for itself," said Redman, who said it was "extremely successful, both for the kids as well as the communities that they're providing support for". Advertisement The average age of children in Washington's juvenile work camps is between 16 and 17, according to juvenile services. For years, state budget cuts have threatened to shutter the low-security Naselle Youth Camp. In a town hall meeting in 2009, Naselle graduates turned up to fight for the camp, which offers an alternative to typical incarceration. One former resident talked about working with the DNR for four years and being deployed at 12 fires. He called the work programs, which made him more than $7,000, "irreplaceable" and said they helped him become a "successful and productive young man" upon release. California has two Division of Juvenile Justice fire camps. But in that state, juveniles must be at least 18 to work in a camp. In California, which also operates 42 adult fire camps, 18- to 23-year-olds are expected to operate closer to the fire. In the 72 years the program has existed, inmates have died working the fire line. According to Bill Sessa, an information officer with the California department of corrections, "all of the juvenile offenders [used to fight fires] have committed serious or violent felonies". Sessa said spots in the program were coveted, available to both young men and women, and only granted to inmates that were exceptional. "They have to have the aptitude to be in the camp," said Sessa. "They have to be willing to work as a team. They have to take the responsibility to be part of a crew. And they have to be physically able to do the work. "You can't minimize the fact that it's dangerous work. But by the same token, the safety record of these crews is very good." The point of such camps, as laid out by the state of California, is to "provide the cooperative agencies with an able-bodied, trained work force for fire suppression and other emergencies such as floods and earthquakes". Redman said that while such work in Washington state was good for discipline, inmates were not necessarily receiving vocational training that would set them up for a job with the DNR upon release. "I wouldn't say it's very common," she said, "because there's competing demand for those jobs." Facebook Twitter Pinterest The Chelan Complex Fire is reflected on Lake Chelan, earlier this month. Photograph: Jason Redmond/Reuters In many states, including California, inmate firefighters will be disqualified from fire crews once they get out of prison, due to their felony convictions. The Washington DNR conducts what a human resources representative called "extensive" criminal background checks. Certain types of felon are automatically barred. For adult inmates, David Ball said, the work may be dangerous but the camps are often a welcome alternative. "Prison is terrible," said Ball. "And this is the less terrible version of prison for most people." Ball said it was important for each state to assess whether such programs were rehabilitating inmates, not least when the inmates were minors. "It might be a great idea for these kids going out on these fire crews," said Ball. "But I'd like to know, what evidence do you have that that's true? We don't typically let children do this type of work." Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2015/aug/31/washington-state-juvenile-inmates-fight-wildfires-escape>

Congress moves toward an overhaul of US foster-care system Help For Our Community, a Fitchburg-based organization, dropped off 100 bags with supplies for children placed in emergency foster care at the Leominster DCF office on April 18, 2015. Christine Hochkeppel/Worcester Telegram & Gazette via AP By Max Ehrenfreund, The Washington Post Posted: 08/31/15, 1:01 PM EDT | Updated: 4 days ago # Comments WASHINGTON >> Congress is moving toward an overhaul of the country's foster-care system, one that reflects a shift in how policymakers and child-welfare experts view the problem of keeping kids safe. It isn't yet clear what form legislation might ultimately take, and any agreement could be derailed by a dispute over the debt ceiling later this year. All the same, several lawmakers in both parties appear to be in agreement on the basic principles of a reform. Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, hopes to move legislation this fall, according to a spokeswoman. The federal government has long chipped in for foster care for children whose parents are abusing or neglecting them. But some advocates for children say the money would be better spent helping children's biological parents take care of them properly. Depending on the family, the state could pay for psychotherapy or treatment for a parent's alcoholism or addiction to drugs. Some new mothers need a nurse to talk to them about how to discipline their children without beating them, while others might just need a washer and dryer for the apartment so the kids can go to school in clean clothes. Advertisement Keeping a child in her biological parents' home if possible is not only better for the child, but will save the government money, too, lawmakers say. They are talking about helping states pay for some of these other services, beyond foster care itself. "When you ask a child who has been in foster care how we can best improve the current foster-care system, often the answer will be: You could have helped my mom so that I did not have to go into foster care in the first place," Hatch said at a hearing this month. Hatch's office has been working with Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., who has sponsored a bill. Sens. Michael Bennet, D-Colo., and Michael Crapo, R-Idaho, have also introduced legislation. Shadi Houshyar, who handles foster care for the family-advocacy organization First Focus in Washington, said the discussion on Capitol Hill was "a game-changer for child welfare." Little data on children who grow up in foster care is available, but current research suggests that focusing on keeping children with their parents will help many of them over the long term. Joseph J. Doyle Jr., an economist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, studied children whose homes were examined by Illinois's investigators 20 years ago to determine how foster care affected their lives as adults. He found that if a foster-care child had been visited by a stricter investigator -- those more likely to recommend a child be removed from a home -- then the child was more likely to be arrested, convicted of a crime and imprisoned as an adult. In other words, while many children must be removed for their safety, investigators often do better by kids when they give parents the benefit of the doubt. "There's this traumatic event of being taken away from your parents, and being told that your parents are not doing the right thing for you," Doyle said. "That has to be weighed against the trauma of continued child abuse and neglect in the home." Experts also say that while you can take a child out of an abusive household, that doesn't mean you've taken the abuse out of the child. Foster care is sometimes necessary for the child's safety, said David Sanders, who is in charge of public policy at Casey Family Programs in Seattle. Beyond a safe place to live, though, children need counseling, and ultimately, a permanent family that will care for them as they grow up. Without that, Sanders said, many will repeat their parents' mistakes when they have kids of their own, perpetuating addiction, neglect and abuse to the next generation. "It's so easy to think removing children from their families is the solution," Sanders said. "That's not sufficient." Dozens of states already have waivers from the federal government allowing them to use money earmarked for foster care for other things. State officials say these experiments have been promising, and research suggests that in many cases, the benefits far outweigh the costs. A study found that one therapy program in the state of Washington, for example avoided tens of thousands of dollars in costs to the criminal justice system and victims of crimes that foster-care children would likely have committed if they hadn't participated. Source: <http://www.registercitizen.com/general-news/20150831/congress-moves-toward-an-overhaul-of-us-foster-care-system>

Boarding schools: A black hole of Native American history Zigmund Hollow Horn (NCR photo/Vinnie Rotondaro) Vinnie Rotondaro | Sep. 1, 2015 The Trail of History Share on facebook Share on twitter More Sharing Services 67 PrintemailPDF Eagle Butte, S.D. Zigmund Hollow Horn sat inside the deanery of a small Episcopal church just off Eagle Butte's main street. A thick fog had settled over town. The engine of his pickup, parked outside, pinged and crackled. Sitting on a couch, his eyes trained outward and down, he began to talk about his life. "I'm a 65-year-old male, Native American, recovering alcoholic of 25 years," he said. "I've been in pain ever since I can remember," emotional pain, physical pain. "Day in and day out, I go to bed with it," he said. "Anyways, that's all due to my upbringing." Like many in Cheyenne River, and throughout Indian Country, Hollow Horn attended an American Indian boarding school. Boarding schools were government and church-run educational facilities that openly sought to Westernize and Christianize Native American children — an experience that facilitated a direct continuation of the logic brought by the Doctrine of Discovery. Get NCR's newest book: The Chronicles of Francis, the Cartoon Strip, featuring cartoons from the popular series Francis. Buy it now! Hollow Horn's mother died in childbirth. He spent the first five years of his life in quarantine with tuberculosis. Following his release from quarantine, his father sent him to "a Catholic Indian mission school, St. Joe's Indian mission" in Chamberlain, S.D. "When they take you down to Chamberlain, or any kind of Indian mission school," he said, "they take you down on Aug. 16 and you don't come back till May 21. You're just there. I did that for eight years." Hollow Horn and his classmates were given uniforms and chores. They "went to church three times a day, constantly, day in, day out." Standing in the pews, away from their family, their culture banished and condemned, some children would faint. "And when they faint, there's no mercy," Hollow Horn said. "They just drag you out, take you to the back of the pews somewhere, and they slap you up, wake you up, give you water or whatever. ... Then they take you back again, put you in your pew." Classmates were regularly hit or whipped with a belt. "The older classmates would hold you down," he said. "They had to hold you down. That's an order." Marcella Le Beau also witnessed abuse in a government-run boarding school. "I saw the whipping lines," she said, "when they would punish the boys. They would make them take off their leather belts ... and whip them as they ran through." Like Hollow Horn, she said that children internalized their anxiety and trauma. "We never talked about it," she said, even at night, sleeping bed to bed, "we never talked, and that's strange now that I think back on it. We couldn't be children. We couldn't talk and play. And we never talked about it afterwards either. It was just strange." Despite the trauma she suffered at boarding school, Le Beau later moved off the reservation, going to Pontiac, Mich., and California. She served as an Army nurse during D-Day, and eventually moved back to Cheyenne River, where she advocates for her people. Hollow Horn wasn't so fortunate. He said his boarding school experience broke him. Moving into adulthood, he fell into alcoholism and out of touch with his own children, spending the last quarter century in psychological, emotional and spiritual recovery. Others were even less fortunate. "A lot of these guys on this reservation, they kept quiet through their years, and when they got older, they went to alcoholism, and they died that way," Hollow Horn said. "They got us when we were young," he said. "I used to speak my native tongue when I went down there, and I can't even talk now. They beat it out of me. If you spoke your language, they held you down, put a bar of soap in your mouth." A fundamental violence Many contend that the boarding schools represented a focused effort — a collusion between church and state — to stamp out Native American identity, affecting generations of children. Tsianina Lomawaima, a leading authority on Native American education, agreed with that characterization to a point, but cautioned against generalizing. "People want to know the story, and there is no one story," she said. "Thousands of people went through this experience," she said, "all different tribal backgrounds, all different ages, all different personalities, and so there were many, many, many different boarding school experiences," from good, to very bad. The schools emerged in the late 1800s, part of a U.S. government-led effort to "civilize Indians," she said. "And that, of course, meant Christianizing — those two things were not seen as separate at all." According to Lomawaima, a professor of American Indian studies at the University of Arizona and also a Creek Indian, "about 25 off-reservation boarding schools operated in America" at their height. Plenty of on-reservation boarding and day schools also existed. Whether Catholic or the more numerous "federal" (run by the government and promoting Protestant Christianity), the schools functioned in essentially the same manner. However, student reaction "varied dramatically between someone who went into the school as an English speaker from a family that had been Christian for three or four generations, and really wanted an education," said Lomawaima, "and someone like my dad, who went in under duress, [on] order of the courts, separated from his family at the age of 8 or 9, didn't see his mom again until he was a teenager." "He was one of those that had a very negative experience and feelings about it, but still as an adult could say about some aspects of the school, like the trades training he got, 'There are things I learned there I would have never learned otherwise.' " Nevertheless, the schools exercised a fundamental kind of "violence," Lomawaima said, "taking kids away from their families, educating them in a system of knowledge, language, economy, law, diet, clothing, everything, different from who they are. ... And the physical violence on top of all that." Some children were forcibly brought to the schools by the police while others were sent "voluntarily" by parents. "But you have to think carefully about the word voluntary," Lomawaima said. "If this is the only school that will accept you, if it's the only chance for you or your child's education, is that voluntary?" During the Great Depression, "people couldn't feed their kids," she said. U.S. public schools were often closed to Native Americans, and "some parents really wanted their kids to have an education." Catholic boarding schools were numerous in the Northern Plains, Lomawaima said. They were also present nationally. But outside of Canada, very little is known about them. "I regret to say that I don't know of anybody who's looked at Catholic schools in the U.S.," she said. "Welcome to the black holes of Native American history." [Vinnie Rotondaro is NCR national correspondent. His email address is vrotondaro@ncronline.org.] Editor's note: It may seem like papal statements from 500 years ago are ancient history. But Native American activists and scholars insist that Catholicism's past continues to affect the present. Papal bulls from the 1400s condoned the conquest of the Americas and other lands inhabited by indigenous people. The papal documents led to an international norm called the Doctrine of Discovery, which dehumanized non-Christians and legitimized their suppression by nations around the world, including by the United States. Now Native Americans say the church helped commit genocide and refuses to come to terms with it. This is Part Two of a six-part series on the legacy of the Doctrine of Discovery. Source: <http://ncronline.org/news/peace-justice/boarding-schools-black-hole-native-american-history#>

Gilead shuttering Cromwell group home after pressure from officials, residents Gilead Community Services of Middletown has decided to close its residence for the mentally ill in a quiet dead-end street. File PHOTO By Jeff Mill. The Middletown Press Posted: 09/01/15, 9:26 AM EDT | Updated: 3 days ago 1 Comment CROMWELL >> Officials of Gilead Community Services have abandoned their plans to open a group home on Reiman Drive. The decision was announced Monday afternoon, following a meeting between Gilead officials, Mayor Enzo Faienza and Town Manager Anthony J. Salvatore. Gilead, which provides treatment for the mentally ill in the greater Middletown area, stirred up a hornet's nest of opposition when the agency announced last spring it was opening a group home on a residential street in town. The announcement — and a lack of specifics about the likely residents of the group home — generated a wave of questions and concerns from residents. Advertisement Reiman Drive is a quiet dead-end street lined with single-family homes. It is located roughly equidistant between the high school and Edna C. Stevens Elementary School. The town, which is home to at least nine other group homes, had consistently supported the residents. Town officials said they understood and, in some cases, shared some of the neighbors' concerns. Gilead officials said they intended to house six men in the home. But other than to say none of the six "has been convicted of a violent felony," Gilead officials were not forthcoming about the type of individuals who would be housed there. Faienza repeatedly said he felt there were better locations in town for the group home. But Gilead officials stuck fast to their plan — until recently. During a joint announcement Monday afternoon, Faienza and Salvatore said Gilead officials had changed their mind "after much discussion and many meetings with town officials and residents of the town." Faienza said even though the town and Gilead were often at loggerheads over the issue, "We were able to maintain a dialogue." During those discussions, residents raised their concerns about the presence of the group home "because of the makeup of the neighborhood and the proximity to our schools," the mayor said. The issue came to a head on July 19 after a client walked away from the facility. The man, who reportedly has dementia, was found safe in Hartford some four hours later in the company of an attorney who serves as the man's conservator. Faienza and Salvatore "applauded" Gilead's decision and thanked them for "listening to the concerns of the town officials and the residents of Reiman Drive." "This is a positive," Faienza said as he and Salvatore discussed the issue in the manager's office in Town Hall. "We are glad Gilead reconsidered and came to the conclusion this was not the right location for both the residents and clients Gilead serves." In a prepared statement, state Sen. Paul Doyle agreed. "It took some time for them to realize it, but I concur with Gilead's decision that this neighborhood was never the proper location for a facility of this nature," Doyle's statement said. "Obviously there is a need for mental health services across Connecticut and the country, but the style and delivery of those services needs to work in harmony with a community and its municipal leaders in order to be successful for everyone involved." Not only has Gilead dropped the idea of opening a group home on Reiman Drive, but, "We have been informed Gilead will sell the residence," Salvatore said. While the mayor and the manager were at pains to paint the outcome in the best possible light for all concerned, Gilead Executive Director Dan Osborne appeared to be a little more grudging in his comments. "It is with great sadness that Gilead has decided to discontinue services at our newest location on Reiman Drive," Osborne said in an emailed comment Monday. "Over the past couple of months, it has become evident that this specific location will not provide a supportive and healthy environment for the individuals we serve to be received and thrive in the community.” “While this has been a very difficult decision and a difficult time for Gilead and its board of directors, we would like to take the opportunity to say thank you to the many Cromwell residents who have reached out to offer support for the program, to (the state Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services) and to our many dedicated community supporters whose essential assistance make a difference in so many lives,” Osborne said. As he has since the very beginning of the controversy over the location of the facility, Faienza said again Monday he remains committed to providing the opportunity for anyone to re-enter society and succeed. However, he opposed the location of this particular group home and argued against locating it on Reiman Drive. And, Faienza said, “The resistance of the neighbors was not going away.” Faienza wished Gilead “the best of luck,” and said he would be willing to work with the agency again in the future. Calling the outcome “a team effort,” Faienza credited the assistance of the town’s two state legislators, Doyle and state Rep. Christie Carpino, for their assistance, as well as that of state officials “over the past few months to bring this matter to an amicable resolution.” Source: <http://www.middletownpress.com/20150901/gilead-shuttering-cromwell-group-home-after-pressure-from-officials-residents>

Foster mom accused of sexual contact with teen in her care By Andrea Flores. CREATED Aug 31, 2015 OMAHA, Neb. (KMTV)- A foster mother, accused of taking advantage of a teen in her care, is set to appear in a Sarpy County Court Tuesday. Child advocates and non-profit agencies across the Omaha area say they are in shock after learning one of their own is accused of taking advantage of a foster child. Around 11:30 Thursday night, Bellevue Police approached a car parked behind the Gorman's off 15th and Cornhusker. Inside, they found 46-year-old Kim Carrera, and a 17-year-old boy, her foster son. "Officers approached the vehicle, it appeared to them there may be some inappropriate sexual contact occurring," said Laurie Synowiecki with Bellevue Police. Police learned the 17-year-old is a ward of the State of Nebraska, placed as a foster child with Carrera by the Nebraska Families Collaborative, less than two months ago. Friday, police took Carrera into custody at her home. They booked her, accusing her of sexual assault of a protected person. In a statement to KMTV, Ann Pedersen, a spokeswoman for Nebraska Families Collaborative, had this to say: "While it is the policy of this agency not to comment on an incident involving minor children or an ongoing investigation, what we can say is the safety and well-being of the children we serve is our number one priority. We believe that kids need to be safe regardless of whether they are in a foster home, kinship home or with their families. It is never acceptable to put any child, who is in the care of an adult, at risk." The Department of Health and Human Services tells us Carrera was licensed to become a foster parent back in 2006, and also has two adopted children. DHHS confirmed she worked at Child Saving Institute starting in December of 2014, until she resigned this in mid-August. President and CEO Peg Harriott says her position did not include individual work with children: "Kim Carrera worked at Child Saving Institute from December 2014 until she resigned in mid-August 2015. Her position did not include individual work with children. Criminal and abuse background screenings are completed on all employees prior to employment. Child Saving Institute's thoughts and concern are with the teen involved in the incident and the impact to any other children in the home," said Harriot. Source: <http://www.scrippsmedia.com/kmtv/news/Foster-mom-accused-of--323543341.html>

Child Safety Department revoking group homes' license Child Safety Department revoking group homes' license 4 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email Respond: Write a letter to the editor | Write a guest opinion 2015-08-31T15:53:38Z 2015-08-31T19:02:39Z Child Safety Department revoking group homes' licenseThe Associated Press The Associated Press August 31, 2015 3:53 pm 0 PHOENIX (AP) — The state Department of Child Safety on Monday said it was moving to revoke the license of a Mesa company that runs four group homes for troubled youth in the Phoenix area. The action announced Monday against Golden State Human Development comes after repeated problems at the homes, including more than 170 law enforcement calls to two of the homes between January and July. Other alleged problems that prompted the unusual step included children being left unattended for hours, failing to provide medical treatment and not intervening in altercations between the children who lived in the homes. Golden State also didn't have proof that it did background checks on some of its workers and inadequately secured medication, cleaning supplies and medications. The foster children living at the homes were moved out in recent days, department spokesman Doug Nick said. The homes were licensed to care for 35 children and handled girls ages 10 to 17. "This is one of those situations that became egregious, so we made a move," Nick said. The company can appeal the loss of its license. Call seeking comment from Golden State CEO Greg Johnson at the number listed on the nonprofit's tax returns weren't immediately returned. Pause Current Time 0:00 / Duration Time 0:00 Remaining Time -0:00 Stream TypeLIVE Loaded: 0% Progress: 0% 0:00 Fullscreen 00:00 Unmute Playback Rate 1 Subtitles subtitles off Captions captions off Chapters Chapters Child Safety Department Director Greg McKay ordered more frequent licensing monitoring visits for group homes after taking over the department in February. He also implemented a policy of sharing responsibility for the care and safety of children in the foster care system between the state and group home operators. The state had more than 17,500 children in out-of-home care as of March 31, including more than 1,700 living in group homes. That number has steadily increased in recent years. Source: http://tucson.com/news/state-and-regional/child-safety-department-revoking-group-homes-license/article_dec033ba-2a5e-5e67-a23a-cb36e009efaa.html

September 4, 2015 DCF responds to allegations of abuse happening in foster homes By: KAKE News Updated: Tue 6:24 PM, Sep 01, 2015 By: KAKE News Home / Headlines List / Article Stay up-to-date with KAKE News: iOS app Android app Follow us on Twitter Like us on Facebook WICHITA, Kan. -- After a number of people came to KAKE News claiming they or their children were abused in the Kansas foster care system, the Department of Children & Families responds to the allegations. One man tells KAKE News he was beaten, abused and raped in the system. Another family tells us their children were bitten by bed bugs while in foster care. More families have contacted the KAKE Newsroom with similar stories of abuse while their children or they were in foster care. KAKE News spoke with administrator Amy Neuman of the Department of Children and Families about the allegations. "It is very, very rare," Neuman said, "within the Wichita region during the last two fiscal years, there has been almost 100 percent of safety in our family foster homes." The statement "almost 100 percent" means there were some cases of abuse. When asked how the DCF investigates allegations of abuse, Neuman provided this answer: "We investigate all reports the same. When a concerned person contacts the Kansas Protection Report Center, we look at the allegations of abuse or neglect, whether that is a parent, a caregiver, a third party, a family foster home, a facility, the same type of interviews and assessment investigation occur. We meet with children, we talk with them, we observe them and we find out what is occurring. From there, we talk to alleged perpetrators, we talk to family members and we talk to collateral witnesses such as schools, daycares, anyone who may have heard or seen from that child who would have information and we need that information from the children so that we can provide a thorough assessment and investigation." As of July 1, 2015, the DCF took over the responsibility of screening foster homes and training from the Kansas Department of Health & Environment. Neuman says this will better streamline the foster care system by having it in one organization, which ultimately will help the children in foster care. To read the story on how the DCF responded to allegations they are abusing their state granted power Click here. Source: <http://www.kake.com/home/headlines/DCF-responds-to-allegations-of-abuse-happening-in-foster-homes-323769681.html>

Special Report: Renowned U.S. drug-rehab program spun out of control SHANNON STAPLETON By Kristina Cooke and Robin Respaut, Reuters September 2, 2015 MOST POPULAR Photo of the Day NEW YORK (Reuters) - Martin Szczipak had already been in and out of rehab when, for a misdemeanor possession charge, a judge sent the 21-year-old heroin addict to a century-old estate in the wooded hills of upstate New York for another chance to clean up. Belle Terre, the former home of a 19th-century copper baron, housed the 168-bed Phoenix House Delaware County Center, a private, nonprofit residential drug treatment facility. When Szczipak arrived in June 2012, all was not well behind Belle Terre's stately walls. In the two years prior to Szczipak's arrival, New York's Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services (OASAS) had twice closed Belle Terre to new admissions after inspectors discovered illegal drug use, insufficient treatment and bad record-keeping, among many other regulatory violations. In each case, Belle Terre resumed admissions after Phoenix House submitted a "corrective action plan" to regulators. Even so, residents and a counselor at Belle Terre when Szczipak was there said little had changed. Residents trafficked in drugs, cigarettes and other contraband. Nor were residents receiving the 40 hours a week of therapeutic services OASAS required. "This place is basically a super minimum security prison camp," Szczipak wrote in an Aug. 29, 2012, letter to a friend. "We do nothing all day." Still, Szczipak was hopeful. "I'm gonna be out ... before I even know it," he wrote. By December 2012, he had given up on the treatment program. He felt he would be stuck going from "dead end job and rehab and jail until I eventually drop dead," he wrote in a letter to his fiancée. "You deserve better than that." He didn't want to use drugs anymore, he wrote, "but realistically the odds are against me." Szczipak never sent the letter. Three weeks later, he walked out of Belle Terre without permission. One day after that, police visited Szczipak's mother, Inez, at her Staten Island home to tell her that her son had been found dead from a drug overdose. POLITICAL TRACTION Sending addicts to treatment rather than jail or prison for nonviolent offenses has become increasingly popular across the U.S. political spectrum. In the 2016 presidential campaign, candidates from Democrat Hillary Clinton to Republican Chris

Christie have hailed drug treatment as a smart way to tackle the problems of prison overcrowding and excessive sentencing. Facilities like Belle Terre are part of that solution. Underwritten by taxpayers, they work with the courts and probation departments to rehabilitate offenders. In 2012, the U.S. criminal justice system sent 580,000 people to drug treatment. There's little doubt that quality care in a controlled setting can help. Multiple studies have shown that people who complete drug treatment court, a special court for drug addicted offenders, are less likely to reoffend in the first year or two after their release. At Belle Terre, criminal-justice referrals account for the majority of residents. The facility is run by Phoenix Houses of New York, whose parent foundation is one of the nation's largest drug treatment nonprofits, operating in 10 states and the District of Columbia. In the year ended June 30, 2014, the Phoenix House Foundation and its affiliates reported operating revenue of $141 million. Phoenix Houses of New York is 95 percent publicly funded and enjoys star-studded endorsements. Beyonce donated a cosmetology center at a Brooklyn facility. Financier Pete Peterson chaired a summer fundraiser in 2013 in the posh Hamptons on New York's Long Island. But as the case of Martin Szczupak suggests, the system as practiced doesn't always deliver on the promise in principle. A review of Szczupak's journal and letters and of state regulators' reports, as well as interviews with dozens of current and former Phoenix House employees and residents, reveal a respected institution that in recent years has consistently failed to provide the quality of care necessary to help addicts kick the habit. "PERSISTENT REGULATORY VIOLATIONS" The closures that preceded Szczupak's arrival weren't the last. And nor is Belle Terre an anomaly. In November last year, OASAS suspended admissions to Belle Terre and four other Phoenix Houses of New York facilities. In a letter to Phoenix House's then-chief executive in November 2014, OASAS said Phoenix House had "persistent regulatory violations and resident/patient care concerns dating back several years." An OASAS site report on the five facilities went into graphic detail. The regulator's findings at some or all of the facilities included use of marijuana, cocaine, heroin and other illegal drugs; sexual activity among residents; reports of violence and sexual assault; insufficient, inadequately trained or abusive staff; dirty premises; and lax security, with residents coming and going as they wished. In each case, OASAS allowed admissions to resume "based upon sustained systemic improvements," the agency said in a written response to questions from Reuters. On Aug. 19, Phoenix House said it would be closing Belle Terre and its 185th Street facility in New York City. In an open letter to staff, Phoenix Houses of New York's president and regional director, Peter Scaminaci, cited a changing environment, "particularly as a result of health care and criminal justice reform," as a reason for the closures. "These facilities do not lend themselves to our vision for a transformed Phoenix House," he wrote. In a statement to Reuters, Scaminaci said his organization was "engaged in a strategic effort to re-allocate our resources to locations where we can achieve the greatest impact." Phoenix House, he said, is "collaborating closely with OASAS on designing better treatment programs, improving our standard of care and offering increased options for those suffering from substance abuse." "RAMPANT DRUG USE" Belle Terre's recent run-ins with regulators date back to at least May 2010. That's when Albany City Court Judge Thomas Keefe, who had sent three addicts there, became concerned by stories of "rampant" drug use and high staff turnover at the facility. Keefe, long a proponent of drug treatment as a way to stop addicts from cycling in and out of jail, called the facility's director, Jerome Pryor. He was surprised by what he described as Pryor's cavalier attitude and "virtual non-action to address the problem." Keefe told state regulators in a subsequent 2010 complaint to OASAS. Believing his "addicts were in danger," the judge had them reassigned to other facilities. Later that year, Jessica Deagan, now 26, started a court-ordered 9-month stay at Belle Terre to treat her heroin addiction. "It was like the street inside of a building," she said. "There was a great amount of access to drugs. I used heroin, angel dust, Xanax, whatever was in there for the week." Former residents said dealers would throw drugs over the stone wall around the property or hide them along nearby hiking trails for residents to retrieve. On Aug. 11, 2010, three months after the judge's initial complaint, a team of OASAS inspectors descended on Belle Terre unannounced. As the inspectors introduced themselves to a staff member, who was leading a house meeting, residents began shouting, "Shut this place down," and "Get us out of here," according to the regulator's report, a copy of which Reuters obtained New York's Freedom of Information Law. "THERE WAS NO STAFF" OASAS recommended halting new admissions, citing widely available illegal drugs, unsupervised outings, sexual activity among residents, diversion of medications, unavailability of staff members, and lack of group counseling. Belle Terre Director Pryor, according to the OASAS report, attributed most of the problems to the recent loss of five staff members. Four new employees, he told the regulators, lacked experience in treating chemical dependency. Pryor declined to comment. A month after admissions were stopped, OASAS conducted a follow-up visit and determined that the facility had stabilized. Admissions resumed. Two weeks after that, Jordan Nedlik, a resident on kitchen duty, was stabbed in the back by another resident unhappy with the size of his meatball supper. "There was no staff," Nedlik said. Nedlik returned to Belle Terre after a brief hospital stay. He was sent back to Belle Terre in 2012, after failing a urine test, and later spent time in prison for his initial grand larceny charge. He said that as of August 2015, he has been clean for 14 months. In September 2011, inadequate staffing prompted counselor Mary Moynahan to quit. In her resignation letter, a copy of which she sent to OASAS, she complained that nonviolent, often very young offenders were mixed with residents who were "not addicts, but rather, hardened criminals avoiding jail time." She added: "The bottom line is the understaffing." "SUSPICIOUS RECORDS" Some former counselors told Reuters they lacked the training required to provide the individualized, holistic drug and alcohol addiction treatment Phoenix House promised on its website. Group sessions were haphazard, often pieced together from information gathered through Google searches the night before, they said. Treatment records were suspect. "There were times when I would say, 'I didn't write this. That's not my handwriting,'" said Glenn Williamson, a former counselor and military veteran. Another counselor, who asked not to be identified for fear of losing her license, recalled chasing a young man high on the synthetic opioid fentanyl around the grounds to keep him out of sight during an OASAS inspection. In November 2011, OASAS again halted admissions. The agency cited insufficient clinical and mental health services, strip searches conducted without consent, and failure to file incident reports. Residents drove program vans and stayed up all night as "night watchman," which kept them from participating in group therapy. OASAS also found that Belle Terre's new director, Henry Bennett, obstructed their request for records in an attempt to modify them before handing them over. Phoenix House fired Bennett. Bennett, who went on to work for various treatment providers before retiring in Georgia, said he had not been aware that the records were being altered. Bennett said Phoenix House "took their eye off the prize" by emphasizing business considerations over "things they need such as clinical functions and a good medical records system." "TOOL OF ABUSE" About 75 percent of Belle Terre residents at the time were on psychotropic medications, state records show, but the only psychiatric care for residents was a four-hour drive away in New York City. A van took seven residents there twice a week. Myke Champlin, a 2011 resident with borderline personality disorder, said he stayed clean for his first four months at Belle Terre, but by the time he graduated, "I was smoking more K2 [synthetic marijuana] and everything than you could imagine." Courts rely on treatment providers for updates on offenders' performance. If offenders don't comply with a treatment provider's rules, the court can use sanctions such as short jail stints or can extend their time in treatment. In some cases, offenders end up spending more time incarcerated than if they had eschewed drug treatment. At Belle Terre, the threat of reporting infractions could become a tool of abuse. As is common practice in many rehab programs, residents were assigned jobs in a hierarchy, from the lowest cleaning crew to managing other residents' schedules. This system, which counselors and residents called "the Structure," was meant to help residents break bad habits and prepare for working life. Former residents said the system became a means of settling personal scores. Higher-ranking residents could punish others for minor infractions, such as talking in the medication line. Infractions could result in cancellation of family visits, or could be reported to the courts. "PARTNERS IN ADDICTION" This was the milieu Martin Szczupak entered in the summer of 2012. Szczupak grew up in the New York City boroughs of Brooklyn and Staten Island. In middle school, he met Priscilla Pardo, with whom he shared a love of punk rock. "Punk rock is angry and abrasive, and for several years, so was I," Szczupak wrote in his journal. Szczupak was addicted to heroin by age 15, Pardo said. She was hooked at 18. Still, they managed to start college. He studied biology. She studied mortuary science. They missed a lot of classes, mostly to get high, Pardo said. They didn't know it, but they were part of a resurgence of heroin abuse in the U.S. In 2013, 517,000 Americans abused or were dependent on heroin, more than twice as many as in 2007, according to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health. Staten Island had the highest rate of heroin-related deaths among all New York City boroughs in 2012. Local officials have called it an "epidemic." Pardo nearly died from an overdose in 2011. That "scared the crap out of Martin," Pardo said. He persuaded his girlfriend to admit to their parents that they had a problem. Szczupak finished a stint in rehab in March 2011. On his way home, according to the account he gave to his mother and Pardo, the rehab facility van he was riding in made a stop. Szczupak, woozy and disoriented from prescribed medications, stepped out of the van. When he returned, he told Pardo and his mother, he mistook another vehicle for the rehab facility van. According to the police report on the incident, Szczupak was pulling on the vehicle's door handle and shouting, "open the door." Inside the Ford Explorer sat a woman and her 3-year-old son. She called the police. Szczupak was charged with attempted grand larceny and resisting arrest. Records show Szczupak told the police that he "wanted to take the car home." "DOWN THE DRAIN" Szczupak later told police he had no recollection of the incident. He pleaded guilty and agreed to go to treatment. A year later, he relapsed. He was arrested for possession on Staten Island, a probation violation. In court, the judge agreed to give him another chance at treatment. When Szczupak arrived at Belle Terre in June 2012, the facility was still short-staffed. Residents at the time described the lack of counseling and widespread use of illegal drugs that OASAS staff had cited over the prior two years. Brian Moody, 33, a former Bank of America contractor who had been remanded to Belle Terre after violating probation on a drug-sales charge, said the place was in chaos. "There were people who were high," he said. "It was a circus show." Moody said he befriended Szczupak, whom he described as smart and determined. "He wanted to change," but felt he was getting no help, said Moody, now working as a debt-collection agent. Szczupak at first rose within the Structure. He was assigned to computer work, where he spent days listening to music, according to a letter to a friend. "I hoped this one would work, mentally he wanted it to work, he was pretty optimistic," said his mother, Inez. "And then all of a sudden everything went down the drain, and every phone call that I got was, 'I can't stand this place, this is bullshit, they don't treat me fair.' But I never understood what happened." In December 2012, Szczupak was demoted within the Structure for disrespecting a staff member, his treatment records show. The details are unclear. Szczupak told friends that the time already spent in treatment was worthless and that he would end up going to jail anyway. According to treatment records, Szczupak was given the option of starting over again in drug court, but he refused, saying he had heard "nightmare stories" from others. "HE SEEMED LIKE A SHELL" "This whole episode here has pushed back my completion of this shit," he wrote in an undated entry that ends his journal. "This whole drug court thing has got me frustrated." When Pardo spoke with Szczupak on Thursday, Jan. 3, 2013, six months after his arrival at Belle Terre, he seemed "really mad at the world, very dark, not making any jokes," she said. "He seemed like a shell." The next day, Moody said, Szczupak told him he would rather be in jail, with a clear end-date. He packed his belongings and walked out without approval. That Saturday, police were called to a Brooklyn house where they found Szczupak, dead from a heroin overdose. In November 2014, regulators again suspended admissions at Belle Terre, as well as four other Phoenix House facilities. State regulators noted high staff turnover and need for improved clinical practices at Belle Terre. They also warned the facility to let clients speak to their attorneys without staff present. OASAS let Belle Terre reopen in January 2015. Three of the other centers were reopened with limited admissions in late 2014 and early 2015. The Shrub Oak teen residential treatment facility was closed permanently in June 2015. In March, OASAS inspected Belle Terre again, prompted by unspecified complaints against director Alan Hargrove, OASAS reported. Phoenix House then fired Hargrove, based on OASAS's feedback. Hargrove declined to comment. Phoenix House announced on Aug. 19 it would be closing Belle Terre and the 185th Street facility. Pardo, now 24, lives with her parents on Staten Island and works the night shift at a convention center. She has been sober for three years after receiving treatment at Mount Sinai Beth Israel Medical Center in New York City. (This story corrects the seventh paragraph to fix the location of Inez Szczupak's home: It is located in Staten Island, not Brooklyn.) (Reporting by Kristina Cooke and Robin Respaut; Edited by John Blanton) Source: <http://www.thefiscaltimes.com/latestnews/2015/09/02/Special-Report-Renowned-US-drug-rehab-program-spun-out-control>

Report: Increase in Reported Abuse of Mass. Foster Kids | NECN Report: Increase in Reported Abuse of Mass. Foster Kids The release of the 2014 data comes amid renewed scrutiny of the state's child welfare system and calls to increase staffing and funding for the Department of Children and Families View Comments \(0\) | necn Documented reports of abuse or neglect of children in foster care and other out-of-home settings increased in Massachusetts last year, as did deaths among children receiving services from state agencies, according to a report filed Tuesday by the state's Child Advocate. The release of the 2014 data comes amid renewed scrutiny of the state's child welfare system and calls to increase staffing and funding for the Department of Children and Families. Report: DCF Investigating Central Mass. Offices The advocate's office counted 633 substantiated allegations of mistreatment in its review of 290 reports of abuse or neglect last year, an increase from 538 allegations of mistreatment in a review of 241 reports in 2013. A single report often includes multiple allegations of abuse or multiple victims. It counted 40 deaths in 2014, an increase from 29 in the previous year and the highest total since 2011. DCF: 3 Workers in 2-Year-Old's Death Case Unlicensed Child Advocate Gail Garinger said 184 of the reports involved children in DCF custody, including 117 who were in foster care. "Even the best organized and managed child-serving agency will fail if its staff is overwhelmed," Garinger wrote in a letter accompanying her annual report. "It is the responsibility of the governor and the legislature to ensure that sufficient resources are available." The report documented 136 "critical incident reports" involving deaths or serious injuries among children who were receiving services of some type from DCF or other state agencies, including the Department of Youth Services and the Department of Mental Health. The death of one 9-year-old boy from a gunshot wound was ruled a homicide, three deaths were ruled suicides and two resulted from traffic accidents. Sixteen deaths, including those of two children in DCF custody, were determined to be from natural causes or existing medical conditions; there were eight cases of "sudden and unexpected infant and toddler death," which includes Sudden Infant Death Syndrome and accidental suffocation in bed. The Massachusetts medical examiner has yet to officially rule on 10 other 2014 deaths, the report said. Last month, a 2-year-old girl in foster care died after being found unresponsive at an apartment complex in Auburn and another toddler from the same home was hospitalized in critical condition. Authorities have yet to release further details on the circumstances and no charges have been filed. Gov. Charlie Baker said at the time that the state would launch its own internal investigation. In July, DCF took custody of a 7-year-old Hardwick boy who had allegedly been beaten, starved and dehydrated by his father. The agency had been working with the family prior to the arrest of Randall Lints, who pleaded not guilty to assault and endangerment charges. In 2013, social workers lost track of Jeremiah Oliver, a 5-year-old Fitchburg boy who went missing from his home and whose remains were later found alongside a state highway. The case prompted a wide-ranging review of DCF procedures and an eventual shake-up in the agency's top management. Source: <http://www.necn.com/news/new-england/Report-Increase-in-Reported-Abuse-of-Mass-Foster-Kids-323823151.html>

Too Many Children In Foster Care Are Getting Antipsychotic Meds : Shots - Health News : NPR California Moves To Stop Misuse Of Psychiatric Meds In Foster Care September 02, 2015 12:02 PM ET Elaine Korry i Andy Baker/Ikon Images/Getty Images Andy Baker/Ikon Images/Getty Images By the time DeAngelo Cortijo was 14, he had been in more than a dozen foster homes. He had run away and lived on the streets for months, and he had been diagnosed with bipolar and anxiety disorders, attachment disorder, intermittent explosive disorder or posttraumatic stress disorder. He had been in and out of mental hospitals and heavily medicated. Cortijo, who was born in San Francisco, was taken from his mother after she attempted suicide when he was 3. After his later diagnoses, he was prescribed a combination of antipsychotics, antidepressants and stimulants, and was told that taking them was his only hope of being normal. Instead, he said, medication made him feel "doped up and completely lost." It was not until he spent several months developing a relationship with a horse — "and it was huge," said Cortijo with a smile — that he began to really acknowledge his own feelings. "Animals sense you, your fears, anxieties and insecurities," he said. i DeAngelo Cortijo, 22, says he benefited more from therapy than from psychotropic medications during his years in foster care. Elaine Korry hide caption itoggle caption Elaine Korry DeAngelo Cortijo, 22, says he benefited more from therapy than from psychotropic medications during his years in foster care. Elaine Korry Finding help through equine-assisted therapy — riding a horse, feeding, grooming and communicating with it — helped Cortijo to gain a better perspective on himself. "It allowed me to understand what a bond was, to realize I am an individual who is capable of caring, capable of being normal," said Cortijo. He's now 22, off all medication, and is helping troubled youth as a juvenile justice intern at the National Center for Youth Law. Children in foster care are prescribed antipsychotic drugs at double to quadruple the rate of that not in foster care, according to a Government Accountability Office report. Hundreds of children were found to be taking five or more psychotropic medications at a time, although there is no medical evidence to support such a drug regimen. Thousands of children were prescribed doses that exceeded FDA-approved guidelines. The report found monitoring programs for psychotropic drugs provided to foster children fell short of guidelines established by the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry. In March, a report by the inspector general at Health and Human Services found quality of care concerns in more than two-thirds of claims for psychotropic drugs paid for by Medicaid, the health insurer for most children in foster care. That included too many drugs (37 percent); wrong dose (23 percent); poor monitoring (53 percent); or wrong treatment (41 percent). The OIG recommended that the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS) work with the states to enhance oversight, medical reviews and utilization reviews of psychotropics prescribed to children. In California, a sweeping package of laws to regulate the prescribing of powerful psychiatric medications to children and teens in the child-welfare system has passed the Senate and is heading to the state assembly, where it faces no formal opposition. The reforms also are being eyed as a template for federal legislation. Anna Johnson, a social analyst at the Oakland, Calif., -based National Center for Youth Law, which helped write the legislation, said an enforcement mechanism is needed to change prescribing practices. "The legislation describes in detail the oversight function — what everyone's role is, from the juvenile court judge and the social workers, to the care providers, the lawyers, the doctors," said Johnson. "And it names specifically the prescribing practices we want to see reduced: the use of multiple drugs on children, dosages that exceed maximums and the use of antipsychotics where not medically necessary because of physical health risk factors." The push for tougher laws follows last year's publication of a series of investigative articles in the San Jose Mercury News, which alleged widespread use of antipsychotics and other psychiatric drugs without proper evaluation and monitoring among the estimated 63,000 California children in foster care. "It is well beyond time for us to be having this discussion and intervening," said Ken Berrick, president and CEO of the Seneca Family of Agencies, which provides mental health and other services for children in California. According to Berrick, overuse of medication has been a problem for decades, often because better alternatives simply weren't available. "Medication is available right now on demand, and other services are not," he said. "When you don't have a choice, you rely on what you have." Under the reforms, there would be better monitoring of children on medication and closer scrutiny of physicians to identify doctors who rely most heavily on medication. The bill also calls for stricter oversight of group homes to determine if psychotropic medications are used to control children's behavior. "Drugging and sedating children should never be considered the primary option in lieu of counseling, therapy and appropriate treatment," said the bill's author, Sen. Jim Beall, D-San Jose. In addition, social workers and caregivers in California would receive training in the risks, benefits and side effects of psychiatric medications. A mix of state and federal dollars would establish a structure to provide second medical opinions. Beyond reining in prescribing outliers, the legislation also places a new emphasis on defining what comprises appropriate care for vulnerable youth. "It's no longer a drugs-only approach," explained Johnson, who said the legislation would require that children who are being given powerful medications also receive other services. i Andy Baker/Ikon Images/Getty Images Andy Baker/Ikon Images/Getty Images "We're saying, you have to do something else — either first or at the same time — to really help a troubled child," said Johnson. "Swallowing a pill doesn't help with grief or trauma. It may contain symptoms, but it doesn't help you move forward and be functional in life." In legislative hearings, former foster youth testified about negative side effects from taking psychotropic medications, sometimes unwillingly. And they described how alternatives to drug therapy often led to better outcomes. For Tisha Ortiz, 22, help finally came in the form of a therapeutic behavioral services worker who took a genuine interest in her. "I felt loved by her, that she actually cared," said Ortiz. Ortiz had a chaotic childhood filled with emotional and sexual abuse. While she lived in various group homes, she often lashed out at adults and resorted to self-harm when her emotions got the better of her. For years she lived with flashbacks to traumatic events, which her caregivers and social workers misinterpreted. "They considered the flashbacks as hearing voices, so I got put on psychotropic meds for that, when I wasn't hearing voices at all." On medication, Ortiz gained weight and found it hard to stay awake, yet she continued to feel abandoned and depressed. "I just felt sedated, and I wasn't really dealing with the problems," she said. According to Ortiz, she did not begin to get better until she was connected with a behavioral services worker who encouraged her to talk about her past. "She helped me understand that what I was feeling was because of the situations I went through and not because there's all these things wrong with me." Since then, Ortiz has had other therapists who she felt really listened to her, whom she still occasionally calls if she's had a bad day. But the self-harm has stopped, and she's tapering off the one medication that she still takes. Ortiz says it was human interaction, not drugs, that helped her. "Having that love was one of the first steps that put me on the road to getting better." There are a lot of good evidence-based treatments that work, said Shadi Houshyar, vice president for child welfare policy at First Focus, a national children's advocacy organization. "States are just struggling with finding the providers, the resources and the dollars to pay for these interventions," she said. Some states resort to Medicaid waivers or use their child welfare general funds to match Medicaid dollars, but that's not enough, Houshyar said. That's why First Focus and other advocacy groups have been big proponents of a White House program aimed at curbing the misuse of psychiatric medication in foster care. The Obama administration has called on states to advance alternative treatments in their child welfare systems. In his 2015 and 2016 budget proposals, President Obama unveiled a two-pronged plan allocating $750 million in grant dollars and incentive payments to address the overprescribing of psychotropics. The demonstration project would bring child welfare and Medicaid agencies together to provide more coordinated services, including behavioral therapies, to foster kids with a history of trauma or mental health problems. "If we really want to solve this problem, we have to make the alternative interventions available at the same level at which medication is available," said Berrick. "It's really a question of access. When that happens, people will make the right decision." Elaine Korry writes about healthcare and social policy from the San Francisco Bay area. This story was produced by Youth Today, the national news source for youth-service professionals, including child welfare and juvenile justice, youth development and out-of-school-time programming. Source: <http://www.npr.org/sections/health-shots/2015/09/02/436350334/california-moves-to-stop-misuse-of-psychiatric-meds-in-foster-care>

Last teacher in Atlanta cheating scandal gets year in prison By The Associated Press updated Tuesday, September 1, 2015 - 8:02pm 0 comments
ATLANTA | The final teacher awaiting sentencing in the Atlanta schools test cheating case was ordered by the trial judge Tuesday to serve a year in prison and four months on probation. Former elementary school teacher Shani Robinson was among 11 educators convicted in April by a Fulton County Superior Court jury in a conspiracy to inflate student scores on standardized tests in the Atlanta public school system. Robinson was found guilty of racketeering and other charges for changing students' answers on standardized tests given in 2009. Her sentencing had been delayed because she gave birth just days after she was convicted. Judge Jerry Baxter had offered Robinson the same deal as her 10 co-defendants — she could have avoided a prison sentence by admitting her guilt in court. Robinson's defense attorney, Annette Green, told the judge the ex-teacher was willing to accept the jury's verdict and her punishment but she still insists she did nothing wrong. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported (<http://on-ajc.com/1JA764L>) Robinson's mother pleaded with the judge to show mercy anyway, noting Robinson has a 4-month-old son. "She rejected her avenue out of this mess," Baxter said. In addition to sentencing Robinson to a year in prison and four years on probation, the judge ordered her to pay a $1,000 fine and serve 1,000 hours of community service. The judge did allow Robinson to remain free while she appeals her conviction. He estimated it will likely be three years before she has to report to prison. Only two of the 11 convicted educators accepted the judge's offer to avoid prison by admitting their guilt during sentencing. They all received probation. Like Robinson, the other eight defendants refused the offer and were sentenced to one to three years in prison. Source: <http://onlineathens.com/local-news/2015-09-01/last-teacher-atlanta-cheating-scandal-gets-year-prison>

Former Tulsa Foster Care Provider Accused Of Sharing Child Porn Videos Posted: Sep 03, 2015 4:12 AM PDT Updated: Sep 03, 2015 2:36 PM PDT
Russell Hulstine, NewsOn6.com Email Connect richard.clark@newson6.net Share this story on Facebook Tweet this story Plus one this story on Google Plus Email this story
TULSA, Oklahoma - Authorities arrested a 44-year-old Tulsa man Wednesday following a month long child pornography investigation. According to the Oklahoma State Bureau of Investigation, the man is a former respite care provider for foster children. OSBI began the undercover investigation into the sharing of child porn videos on August 6. They said their investigation led them to a computer belonging to Timothy Cheatwood. A report said the OSBI tracked the computer's IP address to a residence in the 6400 block of East 95th Place just off the Creek Turnpike. On September 2, authorities searched Cheatwood's home and computer. When questioned, investigators said Cheatwood admitted to using a peer-to-peer network to share child porn videos. Cheatwood was arrested and booked into the Tulsa County jail on a complaint of being in possession of child pornography. He is being held on a $100,000 bond with a court appearance set for September 9. Investigators want foster parents who had contact with Cheatwood to call the OSBI hotline at 1-800-522-8017. Source: <http://www.newson6.com/story/29949919/tulsa-man-accused-of-sharing-child-porn-videos>

Ind. pastor accused of battering kids in boarding school Matthew Glowicki, The (Louisville, Ky.) Courier-Journal 7:14 a.m. EDT September 4, 2015 A 47-year-old pastor and a 21-year-old man are facing felony battery and neglect charges for beating young children. The children attended a boarding school run by the church. VPC Gerald Harris(Photo: Clark County Detention Center) 104 CONNECT 54 TWEET 1 LINKEDIN 16 COMMENTEMAILMORE LOUISVILLE — A Sellersburg, Ind., pastor and fellow church workers are accused of beating multiple children in their care with a wooden paddle. Clark County Prosecuting Attorney Jeremy Mull said the abuse occurred at Crossroads Baptist Church, led by Pastor Gerald Harris. It operates a boarding academy complete with dormitories and classrooms for mostly out of state students, he said. While parents, teachers and caretakers are allowed to discipline children "in a legal way," Mull said, the bruising allegedly seen on the children constituted criminal abuse. "That's the point where, in my opinion as a prosecutor, it crosses the line from appropriate discipline to a criminal battery," he said. USA TODAY Father requests police presence when spanking child Harris, 47, and Christopher Williams, 21, were both arrested earlier this week and face preliminary charges of battery and neglect of a dependent, said Clarksville Chief of Police Mark Palmer in a news release. Clark County Jail records indicate both live at the church. Clarksville police and Child Protective Services did a welfare check at the church, 6109 Appleleaf Lane, Tuesday and interviewed children ranging in age from 8 to 19. They told investigators of "various forms of punishment," Palmer said. Christopher Williams (Photo: Clark County Detention Center) Five children told police they were "whipped with a wooden paddle," according to a probable cause affidavit released Thursday. An 8-year-old boy said Williams tied a rope around his waist and jerked him around "for not behaving." An 11-year-old boy with "very serious bruising" on his buttocks and legs told investigators he was also hit with the paddle by both Williams and Harris when he wet his bed. The pastor allegedly made one 16-year-old stand before the other boys to be whipped with the paddle after Harris told him to keep reading his Bible and believed the teen gave him a smirk, the boy told police. Pastor Gerald Harris leads Crossroads Baptist Church in Sellersburg, Ind. He is accused of whipping children in his care with a wooden paddle. (Photo: Matthew Glowicki) Students at the academy were also told they could not use the bathroom once the lights were turned off at night, according to the affidavit. Kentucky law enforcement tipped off Clarksville Police after they learned of children from the boarding academy who were selling candy bars in Owensboro, Ky., Mull said. One of the children allegedly told a customer he feared he would be whipped if he didn't sell enough candy. Pastor Gerald Harris leads Crossroads Baptist Church in Sellersburg, Ind. He is accused of whipping children in his care with a wooden paddle. (Photo: Matthew Glowicki) All children have since been removed from the church and returned to their parents or Child Protective Custody, Mull said. Williams appeared Thursday afternoon in Clark County Circuit Court in Jeffersonville, Ind., where he was advised of his rights by Judge Andrew Adams. Supporters of Williams who appeared in court declined comment. He is next due to appear in court Tuesday afternoon. Harris bonded out of jail, Mull said, but will likely appear early next week in court when formal charges are filed against both. A probable cause affidavit represents only one side of the case. Further charges could be filed as the investigation continues, Mull said, though he said he does not believe more adults harmed the children. Mull said he knows little about the school, such as when it began operations, how out-of-state parents found out about the school or how many total students attended. "We're looking at exactly what the arrangements were for keeping the kids, what the philosophy was, what the reasonings were for kids being here," Mull said. Clarksville Building Commissioner Ilpo Majuri also visited the property Tuesday and ordered the owners to cease 24/7, residential operations, he said. Owners of the church had come before the city at a board meeting a few years ago stating they were thinking of opening a school on the premises, but no rezoning ever occurred, Majuri said. An order from the Clarksville, Ind., building commissioner instructed the property operators to stop using the facility as a 24/7, dormitory-style residence, because the property is not properly zoned for such use. (Photo: By Matthew Glowicki, The Courier-Journal) "I think they are trying to comply," he noted. Mike Staggs, who operates a mobile home community next to the church, said he sometimes sees the boys out mowing grass or doing other chores on the church property. A few boys came by his office last month selling candy, he said. "But we never saw anything out of the ordinary," he said. Katherine Taul said two boys from the school stopped by her Versailles, Ind., office in January selling candies and giving out cards with the church's name and number. "I wish I had asked the boys more questions," she wrote to The Courier-Journal. "I remember trying to research the place, but wasn't able to find much, which I also thought strange." According to the school's Facebook page, the Well of Grace Boarding Academy "is a boys home under the authority of Crossroads Baptist Church." Its stated goals include "reaching school age boys heading down the paths of destruction" and "watching the transformation of unwanted, and seemingly ruined lives into Godly young men." Source: <http://www.usatoday.com/story/news/nation/2015/09/03/ind-pastor-accused-battering-kids-boarding-school/71678274/>

2 NYC Jail Guards Charged in Beating of 18-Year-Old Inmate NEW YORK — Sep 4, 2015, 7:13 PM ET By JAKE PEARSON Associated Press Share 0 Share on email 0 Comments A New York City jail captain and a correction officer have been charged with assault and other crimes in the beating of a mentally challenged 18-year-old inmate in a Rikers Island supply closet last year. Capt. Medzid Kolenovic and Officer Jean Destine pleaded not guilty to misdemeanor assault and official misconduct charges, as well as to felony charges that they altered use-of-force documents and falsely claimed workers' compensation after Ambirorix Celedonio's Dec. 9 assault. A Department of Correction spokeswoman said Kolenovic, 40, and Destine, 42, have been placed on modified duty, pending further disciplinary proceedings. Their lawyers didn't immediately return messages seeking comment. Celedonio's beating, first reported by The Associated Press, occurred the week before Mayor Bill de Blasio visited Rikers to pledge reforms, especially concerning the treatment of teenage inmates. Last August, a federal investigation found Rikers was a dangerous place for 16- 17- and 18-year-old inmates, who were routinely beaten by jail guards, each other and regularly placed in solitary confinement. Since then, officials have done away with solitary for teenage inmates and overhauled the way 16- and 17-year-olds are jailed. Celedonio was being held on a gang assault charge, but is no longer in custody and his case has been sealed. His attorney, Jenay Nurse, said her client has an IQ of 65 and was goaded into a verbal argument by Kolenovic in a cafeteria at Rikers. City investigators found that Kolenovic, whose confrontation was partially caught on security cameras, then invited Celedonio into the supply closet to settle the dispute, officials said. Celedonio emerged from the closet, which had no cameras, with a bloodied and bruised face; he was then rushed to a health clinic, officials said. "This egregious act should never have happened," said Nurse. "These were two grown men severely assaulting not just a kid but also a kid who is mildly mentally retarded." In a statement, jails Commissioner Joseph Ponte said officials are trying to better recruit and train correction officers. ——— This story has been corrected to show the correction officers have been placed on modified duty, not suspended. Source: <http://abcnews.go.com/US/wireStory/nyc-jail-guards-charged-beating-18-year-inmate-33544885>

The lost boys of the Barrier Save Saturday, 05 September 2015 EmailFacebookTwitterGoogle+ The New Zealand Herald Email FacebookTwitterGoogle+ John da Silva, who ran Whakapakari on his family's land. Phot / Bauer Media It was supposed to be an island boot camp to scare youngsters straight. But it spun out of control, scarring many participants for life and prompting comparisons with the classic dystopian novel Lord of the Flies. By Matt Nippert The second time Simon visited Great Barrier Island he says was made to dig his own grave. The man with the shotgun who supervised his spadework said: "You think this is a fing joke?" Simon (a court suppression order means the Weekend Herald cannot use his real name) was 15 years old. It was May 8, 1998, and the boy was one of four who'd escaped from the nearby Government-funded Whakapakari Youth Trust camp. The rustic tent facility was used to hold those too young for prison and as a dumping ground for difficult-to-manage wards of Child, Youth and Family. The four boys hadn't got far before being recaptured: no one escaped from Whakapakari. The nearest road was a 4km boat trip, or a hike across a thick scrubbed ridge, away. The Coromandel peninsula, the tantalising mainland looming on the horizon, was dozens of kilometres of choppy waves away. This isolation was a boon for containing young people who had a habit of escaping, but some of the boys sent there claim it took on a sinister life of its own. "The culture of the place ended up a bit Lord of the Flies, to be honest," says University of Auckland social work researcher Dr Ian Hyslop, who has reviewed the facility's files as part of an upcoming job as expert witness for nearly 40 former residents who are suing the Government. The camp had its own prison island, an isolated rocky outcrop in the middle of Mangati Bay, formally named Whangara, or Cliff Island, but known as Alcatraz. Despite repeated directives from CYFS head office in Wellington (dating from at least 1988 and continuing until the camp shut down suddenly in 2004) to cease its use, a whole generation of kids claim Alcatraz was used as a dump for camp troublemakers. Many say they were left there, or even dumped into the sea 100m from shore, without supervision or bedding and with only minimal supplies, for weeks at a time. During their brief, heady, afternoon on the lam the four escapers had broken into a Department of Conservation hut, ransacked a boat, taken a Casio watch, and stolen some marijuana and smoked it. The dope and watch belonged to the man with the gun. He'd demanded from Whakapakari staff, and apparently been granted, an afternoon alone with the petty thieves. The watch held sentimental value and was said to be a gift from a long-dead mother. The man with the gun, a hard man with tattoos, understood to be a senior gang member, didn't believe the boys when they claimed they'd lost it. Simon says it was after being interrogated about the watch - which first involved kneeling with gunshots being fired over their heads and later being forced at gunpoint inside a kennel containing a snapping dobermann - that the man brought up grave digging. "The others were digging their holes as well. They were crying. I had just turned 15 - the other boys were younger, 13 or 14. The look on their faces, I'll never forget it. The fear on their faces. We all thought we were going to die," he says. A still from the documentary Breaking The Barriers (1992). The boys didn't die that day. Simon told the Weekend Herald they ran for it when the man put down the gun and started waving around a garden slasher. Interviews with nearly a dozen former Whakapakari residents detail claims of regularised violence, which, though not as lurid as Simon's brush with the alleged gang member, was consistent enough to form part of the everyday background. They say larger and longer-serving boys were recruited formally as "Young Leaders" and informally as the "Flying Squad", deputised and encouraged by adult supervisors to maintain order through physical discipline. THE CAMP was finally closed in 2004, after a steady stream of complaints about abuse turned into a torrent. Initial investigations by CYF revealed a third of the boys said they'd been seriously assaulted by staff members. One alleged he had been raped by a supervisor but was too scared to press charges. Interview notes said many of the boys were traumatised, with one of them telling his social worker: "Before I went to the island I was different, always laughing. People say I'm different now." The camp had long had a mixed reputation among social workers. It was known as rough and ready, but also one of the few places available to send the most troubled of teens. Many of its former residents would go on to become some of New Zealand's most notorious hardened criminals, including RSA triple killer William Bell. Former resident Andrew (whose real name is also suppressed by the court) settled his claim with CYF earlier this year. He is blunt when describing Whakapakari as the worst of many state facilities he spent time in during his youth. "It was a fing hellhole," he says. Two years after the last boy had been evacuated, CYF undertook a formal study of how effective the facility had been at reducing reoffending. Of the 69 boys who attended the camp in 2004, only one in five had not offended, and 61 per cent had racked up multiple convictions. Simon, considered a nuisance and the instigator of the 1998 escape attempt, got his wish and was soon sent home to Dunedin. He says he's never talked with anyone from Whakapakari since, but can recall his last conversation with the three other failed escapees. "As I left they told me 'Get us some help'. I did the best I could - I told mum, told the courts - but it got swept under the carpet and covered up." It wasn't just Simon who tried raising the alarm. The quartet had shared their tale with the Whakapakari supervisor tasked with picking them up after the incident, who was concerned enough to blow the whistle. The supervisor's complaint included the observation that two of the four boys had, literally, pissed themselves. Documents obtained under the Official Information Act as part of a wide-ranging civil suit against the Ministry of Social Development by Wellington law firm Cooper Legal on behalf of former Whakapakari residents, appears to show CYF's investigation into this incident was botched and the opportunity for justice - given the statute of limitations - has been lost. A still from the documentary Breaking The Barriers. The investigation report, dated September 7, 1998 shows the investigator didn't interview any of the boys, or the whistleblowing staff member, or the police, and instead preferred the explanation provided by Whakapakari director John da Silva. A former professional wrestler and star of 70s television staple On the Mat, da Silva had run Whakapakari on his family's land since the early 1980s. He claimed: • Gunshots would have been audible to locals but weren't heard; • The mock executions never happened; • The gang member was actually just a "heavily tattooed local fisherman," and; • The youths' work detail had been arranged by local police. The investigator concluded that the complaints "need to be viewed in the context of police involvement of arranging the work with the aggrieved neighbour" and that the camp director was well-intentioned. "At worst on Mr da Silva's part there was a concern to right the wrongs in order that the programme's credibility on the island could be maintained and the victim's loss [be in] some way atoned," the report said. But the whistleblower was not satisfied and made another complaint, this time to the Commissioner for Children. Another investigation was opened in 1999, but despite finding serious problems with da Silva's version of events, the Commissioner was unable to reach a finding of facts as he too was unable to locate and interview the boys involved. Crucially, the Commissioner's report shows that police formally denied any involvement in arranging the claimed work detail with the neighbour - a key plank of da Silva's version of events. The report also shows the final decision by police not to prosecute - delayed until July 2000 by the demands of an unrelated homicide investigation - was an almost shrugging of institutional shoulders. The allegations "may well have some truth to them", the investigating officer told the Commissioner. "Nevertheless I would not be prepared to pursue a prosecution with evidence of this standard - specifically the unco-operative and unreliable nature of the complainants." A review of the complaint files by the Weekend Herald shows Simon's version of events, unheard by police or CYF officials, broadly corroborates an evidential interview given by one of the boys and the initial complaint by the supervisor made in 1998. Garth Young, chief analyst for historic claims at the Ministry of Social Development said he was unable to comment on what happened at Whakapakari - or the handling of the alleged mock executions - as the matter was before the courts. He said the claims were being defended, but declined to elaborate on how CYF defended its conduct. Putting aside questions of fact and liability, Young agreed that Simon's description of children digging graves and being menaced by dogs sounded horrifying. "I don't think any reasonable person would have any other reaction to something like that. Absolutely I wouldn't for a minute want you to get the impression that I or anyone would be defending that." THE CAMP'S director, da Silva, now 81, still lives on Great Barrier Island and his Whakapakari camp has long been swallowed by the bush. He told the Weekend Herald that the neighbour at the centre of Simon's complaint was now deceased, and was simply a local fisherman. "There seems to be a lot of accusations about ill-treatment floated around, and it's very difficult now - it's so many years ago - to find the people involved," he said. He said his recollection was that the four boys involved seemed unharmed, despite the allegations of mistreatment. "They all came back in one piece, there didn't seem to be anything wrong with them." The former wrestler, who competed at the Olympics and in town halls up and down the country during a curious period in New Zealand history where professional wrestling was a legitimate local industry, defended Whakapakari by noting that no one had died. "We certainly never lost a life, but we did have some pretty harrowing moments," he said. His clients were the most difficult young people in the country, Da Silva noted. "Nobody has ever come up with a final solution to that kind of upbringing to magically make them good again." A still from the documentary Breaking The Barriers. Simon has a good word for the man who ran the controversial camp. "John Da Silva never condoned violence. I don't blame him for any of this " but he could have done with a second opinion." According to internal CYF documents, for two years following Whakapakari's closure debate raged over whether the camp should reopen. In 2004 Jessie Henderson, head of the Grey Lynn CYF office was unusually frank in voicing vehement opposition. She said Whakapakari had relied on the charismatic leadership of Da Silva, but as he aged and suffered health problems he moved away from living on-site and his influence waned. Something about the place seemed septic, Henderson said, noting that a highly-regarded and qualified former CYF social worker with an unblemished record also been accused of assaulting children after starting work on the island. "The very nature of the programme - the remoteness, the primitive living conditions, the lack of managerial oversight and accountability creates an environment where otherwise sane people start behaving in an inappropriate manner." Simon says he knows what the senior social worker means about the strange madness that occurred off the mainland. "The law on Great Barrier Island is a lot different from the mainland." Nearly 20 years on, he says the memory of that day with the spade, thinking his body would fall into the hole he had dug, has never left him. "Did it last two hours, did it last four hours? However many hours it was life-changing. It changed me." He says he came from a violent home and had been accustomed to a certain amount of background violence, but this episode escalated matters. "I have witnessed a lot of violent assaults, but not before this. It was all after this. After Great Barrier and Whakapakari I rebelled against the justice system and spend around 10 years in prison as a result," he says. "A young man's life can be complicated, no doubt, but I found myself in more trouble than not after that." He says after his initial complaint didn't appear to have been followed up, he thought no one would believe him and he still had flashbacks of the man with the shotgun who had made a point of writing down the four boys' names in a book before starting his interrogation. "I kind of think no one cared: People thought we were trouble. No one ever followed anything up. It was only a whole year later the police knocked on the door asking questions," he says. "At the time I was very fearful about what had happened. But I'm not afraid to talk about it now. "At the end of the day I'm now grown up, with kids of my own - and you just can't do that to children." Some former residents talk of Whakapakari helping to turn their lives around, but the recollections often come with hints of the problems that would later consign the facility to the dustbin of history. Former resident Zascha Paraku recounted on Oldfriends his 1989 placement, saying though some might call the camp a "doomed place", he had a different experience. "For me I thoroughly enjoyed every minute I spent here," Paraku said. The recollection ends with a shout-out to friends met at Whakapakari, including Calvin who, "got the meanest hiding and was shipped to hospital". THE SIGNS were even broadcast to the rest of the country in 1992, during an hour-long documentary on TV One. Half-way through Breaking The Barrier - a broadly positive take on Whakapakari, emphasising the facility as a last chance saloon before troubled youth entered the justice system - the programme's narrator takes a short but extremely dark detour. "The camp has woken up to the shocking news that one of the boys, desperate to get sent back to the city, has mutilated himself with a butcher's knife. 'Rat' has taken the extraordinary step of circumcising himself." "Rat", no older than 15, with his face blurred out and a bloodied towel around his waist says "this place is a shithole, man". Da Silva is observed fingering the instrument of mutilation, saying "the knife is not very sharp". He and other camp supervisors appear to have no idea what triggered such an extreme reaction. Aboard the rowing boat taking the teen to whatever he calls home, the boy who crudely circumcised himself raises his arms in triumph. "See you in Auckland!" he shouts. Source: http://m.nzherald.co.nz/nz/news/article.cfm?c_id=1&objectid=11508241

'Forced to dig their own graves' Save Saturday, 05 September 2015 EmailFacebookTwitterGoogle+ The New Zealand Herald Email FacebookTwitterGoogle+ Whangara or Cliff Island, known as Alcatraz off Whangaparapara Harbour on Great Barrier Island, where a youth justice bootcamp programme was held. Photo / David White By Matt Nippert Young people sent to a state-run boot camp on Great Barrier Island were made to dig what they were told would be their own graves and concerned staff blowing the whistle were ignored, according to a Weekend Herald investigation. Residents of the camp were allegedly subjected to a culture described as akin to Lord of the Flies that resulted in one boy circumcising himself with a blunt knife in order to leave the island. The incidents have come to light following long-delayed High Court claims by nearly 40 residents of Whakapakari Youth Trust alleging horrific mistreatment between 1988 and 2004 at the Child, Youth and Family-contracted facility. The claims, brought by Wellington law firm Cooper Legal, have languished for nearly ten years in the legal system and are still without a court date, sparking claims the Government is trying to cover up the serious mistreatment of children. Sonja Cooper, the principal of Cooper Legal, said the first tranche of her clients' claims were filed in 2006. She blamed government lawyers for a series of delays that saw an April hearing date vacated and day in court unlikely until 2017. "The Ministry is actively trying to bury information about what happened in the past," Ms Cooper said. "It has become a grim, hang-in process for our clients." Judge Carolyn Henwood, speaking in her capacity as the chairwoman of the recently concluded Confidential Listening Service, said the situation was concerning and raised the prospect of vulnerable people being denied access to justice. "As far as I can tell, throughout the entire seven years the service was operating, some of that litigation has not made any further traction. It's concerning that nothing has been resolved," Judge Henwood said. She said a recent report exposing ongoing failures in the state care of children showed lessons from the past needed to be learned. Minister for Social Development Anne Tolley agreed the legal log-jam was unacceptable. "There is no doubt that some cases are taking far too long to settle through the court system and I acknowledge that this process can be emotional and difficult for claimants," she said. Mrs Tolley said she had recently introduced a fast-track process, leading to 940 settled claims and $14 million paid out in compensation. Source: http://m.nzherald.co.nz/nz/news/article.cfm?c_id=1&objectid=11508193

Foster mother awaits abuse charges Email Newsletters Click here to sign up for one of our email newsletters. For more information The statewide toll-free line is available 24 hours/7 days a week to receive reports of suspected child abuse. The number is 800-932-0313. For more information about child abuse in general, turn to: www.keepkidssafe.pa.gov/index.htm. To inquire about becoming foster parents, call the state Department of HS Director's Action Line at 800-862-6783 or EveryChildInc.org. Sources: Allegheny County Department of Human Services; Pennsylvania Department of Human Services; Every Child Daily Photo Galleries Sunday - Sept. 6, 2015 AlleKiski Valley Photo Galleries Tone of Labor United Celebration different with steelworkers picketing ATI plants By Chuck Biedka Saturday, Sept. 5, 2015, 1:31 a.m. A former foster mother from West Tarentum awaits child abuse charges involving three children in incidents that allegedly occurred last year and again in May. Authorities say that Terri L. Thornhill, 35, of West Ninth Avenue, Tarentum was investigated last year after accusations of beating a girl, then 6, with a belt. Charges were not filed at that time. But Thornhill faces charges of child abuse after day care workers at the Allegheny Valley YMCA in Harrison reported in May a significant amount of bruising on the buttocks of a 4-year-old girl and the girl's 3-year-old brother. Those children also were foster children under Thornhill's care. As a result, Thornhill faces charges of aggravated assault and child endangerment regarding both alleged incidents, last year and in May. Thornhill pleaded not guilty. However, the charges against her were held for court at a preliminary hearing Wednesday before District Judge Carolyn Bengel. All three children had been placed in Thornhill's home by Allegheny County, which uses Every Child Inc. to provide some foster parents for the county. Laura Maines, Every Child's chief executive, said on Friday that Thornhill was previously overseen through the program. "She is not a foster parent at this time," Maines said. Witnesses testify At Wednesday's hearing, YMCA day care worker Jessica Swarek testified that in May she saw a significant amount of bruising on the buttocks of a 4-year-old girl and the girl's 3-year-old brother. "The girl had an accident and said it happened because her butt was too sore," Swarek testified. Authorities took photos of the girl's injuries. The state Department of Human Services and Allegheny County detectives investigated. The DHS certifies and licenses foster parents. County Detective Timothy Stetzer testified that investigators observed an interview between child abuse specialists and the younger children at Children's Hospital of Pittsburgh. Rebecca Lewandowski, a specialist with the state Human Services Department who investigates foster care abuse, testified that she sat with the boy, intending to watch him play with toys for a bit before questioning him. But the boy started talking to her right away. "He said 'Miss Terri' beat him with a belt," Lewandowski testified. "He said he didn't want to go back to the house." The boy also said Thornhill would often use one hand to "squeeze his face hard" when she was unhappy with him, Lewandowski said, demonstrating the one-handed squeeze on her own face. The 2014 case Last year, the 6-year-old girl told police Thornhill hit her with a belt, sometimes because the girl wouldn't want to go to bed, or when she spoke when ordered not to. The girl also claimed that her foster mother "sometimes wouldn't feed me" and that she would go hungry. Detectives filed charges in July based on the 2014 and 2015 allegations. In an interview Thursday, county Detective Lt. Tom Ianachione said changes in the state's child abuse law are enabling more prosecutions. The law that once required proof of "severe" injury to a child before charges could be filed has been changed to "substantial" injury, he said. District Judge Bengel set a non-monetary bond for Thornhill but ordered her to not have contact with the children. Chuck Biedka is a staff writer for Trib Total Media. He can be reached at 724-226-4711 or cbiedka@tribweb.com. Read more: <http://triblive.com/neighborhoods/yourallekiskivalley/yourallekiskivalleymore/9034287-74/child-foster-girl#ixzz315zyfJjR> Follow us: @triblive on Twitter | triblive on Facebook

Stop sending babies to boarding schools By Mum-in-chief Updated Monday, September 7th 2015 at 12:18 GMT +3 inShare | Photo: Courtesy This week as schools were opening I saw something that depressed me. As I was escorting my Class Eight niece to board a bus to school (she's a boarder) I spotted children my daughter's age (seven years) who are also boarders at the same school. These kids looked so innocent, confused and vulnerable; I wondered why their parents were sending them to boarding at such a tender age. What had they done to deserve such mistreatment and punishment? I wondered. I am no expert on early childhood development but what I do know for sure is that a Class One pupil is too young to be in a boarding school. At that age, the child is still in a crucial stage where they need tender loving care from the parents and close monitoring because they are still young children. I think as parents as much as we are too busy building our careers, sending our kids to boarding at such tender ages is doing the minors a disservice. The logic maybe that it is better to leave them in a structured place than with house helps. But then again, it is a case of misplaced priorities when we send our small kids to boarding schools so that we can give undivided attention to our careers. Parents may argue that the boarding schools are first class and that kids are well taken care off, but at that age kids need their parents in a big way for nurturing. Parents who choose to send their children to boarding at that age are abdicating their responsibility and with time they will pay the price when the kids turn out delinquent later in life. My daughter Tasha is in Class One and from what I see she is still too young to be left in the hands of a third party. She still needs close monitoring and direction. I have to monitor her school progress every day, by checking her homework and being in regular touch with her teacher to ensure she is progressing well. I need to see her everyday so that I can instill positive values in her like respect, hard work, compassion and godliness which will go a long way in molding her into a law abiding citizen. I need to be in close touch with her so that I can answer all her baffling questions about things she may have encountered at school. I need to see her everyday so that I know how she is getting along with other students at school. But clearly if I dump her in a boarding school at that tender age when she needs me, how will I know all these fundamental things? How will I know that she is struggling with Mathematics and she needs extra help? How I establish that she is poor in sciences when I have no opportunity to sign her diary and monitor her progress? How will I establish she is picking a vice from a fellow classmate when I only see her after a full term? Parents we need to stop abdicating our responsibilities by shipping babies to boarding. Source: <http://www.standardmedia.co.ke/evewoman/article/2000175444/stop-sending-babies-to-boarding-schools>

How Jeb Bush's Florida Plan for School "Choice" Created an Industry of Corruption and Chaos Thursday, 10 September 2015 00:00 By Jeff Bryant, AlterNet | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 53 Email Presidential candidate Jeb Bush speaks at a public gathering in Sioux City, Iowa, July 13, 2015. (Photo: Rich Koele / Shutterstock.com) "We're making decisions just based on the money." That's Rosemarie Jensen talking, a tone of exasperation creeping into her voice as she describes the influence of money on education policy in South Florida. "Some things should be run like a business," she tells me in a coffee shop near Fort Lauderdale, Florida. "Education isn't one of those things." Jensen lives in Broward County, just to the north of Miami-Dade. Broward is home to a diverse population of students, drawn from the state's most exclusive gated communities as well as neighborhoods wracked by generational poverty. A former K-1 school teacher and current public school parent, Jensen is part of a growing movement of parents who believe they are being shut out of important decisions about public school governance, while those making the decisions too often have something monetary to gain. As a leader of United Opt Out, an organization that advocates boycotting standardized tests in public schools, Jensen has opted her own son, a special education student in high school, out of the Florida state exam now known as the Florida Standards Assessments. But standardized testing isn't the only thing that's got her steamed. Jensen recounts stories of her father, a first-generation immigrant and high school dropout, who cleaned out tankers so he could raise his daughter in a neighborhood with good public schools and eventually send her to college. Today, she sees that idealistic view of the American dream being undone in her community by an invasion of moneyed interests promoting charter schools. In her view, charter schools - the privately managed, publicly funded entities that operate outside the oversight of democratically governed school systems - are not now what they originally claimed to be: centers of innovation created by teachers and parents. Jensen has taken note of the amount of money these schools spend on advertising and marketing. She complains that the middle school her children attended can't get money to construct a safer point of entry, while the state steers funds to charters for new construction. She believes that making public schools compete with charter schools for money dilutes funding that should be paying for better education for all kids. While she used to be open-minded about these schools, she now considers herself to be "anti-charter." She's not alone. Charter schools may continue to enjoy generally favorable ratings in national surveys of Americans, but many parents and public officials across South Florida, where these schools are now more prevalent than in other parts of the country, openly complain about an education "innovation" that seems more and more like an unsavory business venture. Undermining Public Education The obsession over money that is driving charter school growth in Florida is increasingly evident to those who bother to look. "Outrageous," is the word former state Senator Nan Rich uses to describe recent decisions Florida lawmakers made to steer more money toward these schools. Until she termed out, Rich represented the 34th District that overlaps part of Broward County. Although she has never opposed charter schools, she now believes financial demands coming from the sector have become unreasonable. As a recent article in Florida's Herald-Tribune notes, for the past two years, only charter schools have received capital outlay funds from the state for new construction. Now charter school lobbyists say their schools deserve a share of local property taxes too.

"When they were started, charters were never supposed to tap capital funds," Rich explains, "but gradually lawmakers with ties to the charter industry tipped the scales to favor them financially." "I'm not one who opposes charter schools that are set up the way they were intended," Rich adds. But she now believes, "The whole movement ... is undermining public education and moves public money to private interests." What Rich and Jensen describe is an increasing fear among parents and public officials across South Florida - and Broward County in particular - that any educational value charter schools were supposed to bring to the state is now overshadowed by corruption and chaos linked to money-making. A new consensus is percolating from the ground up that those responsible for starting and operating charter schools, and making decisions to support the growth of these schools, "don't understand children," as Jensen puts it. They're mostly, "motivated by money." So how did this happen to Florida, and to Broward, specifically? Jeb Bush and the Charter School Business Model Most people trace the manic scramble for more charter schools in Florida to one source: former governor and current Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush. In 1996, two years before he became governor, Bush helped steer passage of the state's first law permitting charter schools. That same year, he led the effort to open the state's first charter, Liberty City Charter School in Miami. During Bush's first administration, charter school growth averaged a whopping 56 percent annually in the Sunshine State, according to a Florida-focused NPR outlet. Annual growth rates during his second and final four-year term dropped to 17 percent, but by the time Bush left office in 2007, charter schools across the state had grown from a modest 30 in total to well over 300. The number of Florida charter schools has since doubled to over 600. In his initial campaign to promote these schools, Bush maintained that charter schools would rescue students from supposedly failed public schools, especially in low-income communities of color. But by 2009 - two years after he left office - Bush's rationale for charter schools had significantly changed. According to a Palm Beach Post news article published that year, Bush debuted his revamped message at a summit put on by his non-profit organization, the Foundation for Excellence in Education, in Washington D.C. In his speech to that group, he declared, "I wish our schools could be more like milk. ... Go down the aisle of nearly any major supermarket these days and you will find an incredible selection of milk. ... They even make milk for people who can't drink milk." Bush would repeat his observation from the dairy aisle three years later at the Republican National Convention of 2012, and what was once thought of as a civil rights cause became firmly established as a campaign for a new business-oriented model that would offer increased consumer "choice." "It started as a movement and now it's an industry," Vickie Marble, a well-known Florida charter school advocate, gleefully declared to NPR reporters chronicling the evolving messaging campaign. Jeb Bush was not the only one touting charter schools. The same year he made his pitch to the RNC, an investment consultant enthused on CNBC that charter schools were "a great opportunity... a half billion dollar opportunity." In short order, news outlets from Forbes to the Huffington Post reported the growing interest among investors in charter schools and the lucrative opportunities resulting from this new model. And the cultivation of that interest continues: in March of this year, Business Insider reported that the "Walton Family Foundation - the philanthropic group run by the Walmart family - sponsored a symposium at the Harvard Club for investors interested in the charter school sector." Aided by influencers like the Waltons and others, Jeb Bush put South Florida squarely at the forefront of the charter school bonanza. And the rise of the charters as big business in Florida brought with it new and special forms of financial corruption. Innovative Education or Corrupt Business Model? When Bush announced his presidential campaign earlier this year, a reporter from BuzzFeed noticed that many of his campaign videos feature the candidate in classrooms filled with happy schoolchildren - but not just any old classrooms. "Almost all of the classrooms have something in common," reporter Molly Hensley-Clancy wrote. "They are at schools operated by Academics, [Florida's] largest for-profit charter school management company." With nearly 100 schools in Florida "and well over $150 million in annual revenue," Academics has been a key player in charter school expansions in the state since 1999. And Bush has shown an affinity for the schools for years. "As governor," Hensley-Clancy reports, "Bush visited Academics schools several times, his emails show." But Academics has a long history of financial wheeling and dealing, so much so the organization is now the target of "an ongoing federal probe into its real estate dealings," as the Miami Herald reported in 2014. While the 1996 law allowing charters to operate in Florida restricted applicants to nonprofit groups only, profit-minded charter businesses like Academics have skirted that restriction. A report written by Patricia W. Hall for the Florida League of Women Voters explains how the scheme works: "Although charter schools must, by Florida law, be overseen by a non-profit board of directors, there are many ways in which for-profit organizations have begun to hijack the charter school movement. For-profit management companies frequently provide everything from back office operations including payroll, contracting with vendors for food services, textbook, etc., to hiring principals and teachers and curriculum control." Hall goes on to explain how real estate deals have become another form of profit-making in the Florida charter school business model. According to Hall, for-profit management companies such as Academics that manage charter schools receive "a variety of grants, loans and tax credits for building a charter school." Then they can charge the school district exorbitant rents and leases for the use of the building. This results in an "ever escalating" revenue stream of taxpayer dollars flowing to the charter school management company. Should the charter management company decide to eventually sell the building to another entity, it "reaps the profits," Hall writes. These sorts of charter school-related real estate schemes led to a firestorm of land deals in Florida during the Bush years, according to an investigation by Alec MacGillis in the New Yorker. "Developers of new subdivisions teamed up with companies that were opening up charter schools less as a means to innovate than as a way to benefit from Florida's boom," MacGillis writes. By 2011, charter school chains like Academics were getting so fabulously wealthy they drew the attention of an investigative report from the Miami Herald. Reporters Kathleen McGrory and Scott Hiaasen found 15 years of steady growth had turned Academics into "Florida's largest and richest for-profit charter school management company, and one of the largest in the country." The reporters found the charter school chain practiced a "business strategy repeated across Miami-Dade and Broward Counties." Through these complex real estate arrangements, Academics founders Fernando and Ignacio Zulueta - brothers who were former real estate developers - had built, by 2010, a portfolio of 20 land companies generating millions of dollars. Shady Land Deals Another large, Florida-based, for-profit charter school chain, Charter Schools USA, practices a similar business scheme. As a Florida television outlet reported in 2014, "Charter Schools USA makes millions by managing schools, but tens of millions building and renting their buildings." The reporters note that when a non-profit board opens a new charter school and contracts with Charter Schools USA to manage it, Charter Schools USA's for-profit "development arm, Red Apple Development, acquires land and constructs a school. Then, CUSA charges the school high rent." One charter school paid "a $2 million rent payment to CUSA/Red Apple Development. The payment will equate to approximately 23 percent of its budget." Academics and Charter Schools USA are hardly the only large charter chains operating under these kinds of business practices in Florida and generating significant growth as a result. According to Hall's research, "The top four charter operators in Florida for 2011-2012 were Academics (72), Charter Schools USA (37), Charter School Associates (20), and Imagine Schools (23)." More recent research by Rutgers University professor Bruce Baker finds that large charter school chains - the ones mentioned by Hall, as well as others like White Hat Management, Rader Group, the Richard Milburn Academy and KIPP - dominate the state. As governor, then later as the head of his influential foundation, Jeb Bush did everything he could to facilitate these sorts of charter school business dealings. As MacGillis explains in his piece for the New Yorker, "Bush signed a law allowing charter operators who were denied approval by local school boards to appeal to the state." The "state," in this case means the Florida State Board of Education, which was appointed by, you guessed it, Gov. Bush. According to MacGillis, Bush also "signed a law to eliminate the state's cap on the number of charters" and joined in the fight "to increase the amount of taxpayer money available for charter construction, and to let developers build schools using the subdivision homeowner fees that they used for pools and other amenities." There's no doubt Bush's ties to the charter industry will stay strong during his presidential run. When he formally announced his 2016 presidential bid in June, John Hage - founder of Charter Schools USA and a former Bush policy analyst - was by his side, according to the Miami Herald. "Before the speech," the reporter notes, "Bush gathered about 200 'alumni' - longtime supporters, former aides and friends - to thank them and 'get his crying out of the way.'" Hage was one of the chosen few; it was he who was quoted by the Herald. The Charter Invasion of Broward County From the outset, Broward was a central target in the charter industrialists' plans to take over Florida's schools. Armed with messages about consumer choice, charter operators quickly capitalized on the county where some of the state's highest real estate valuations and rental prices could be found. "Broward County has nearly two million people who live in relatively small cities," writes Sue Legg in a report for the Florida League of Women Voters. Ft. Lauderdale, Broward's largest city, is home to fewer than 200,000 people. But Broward County has lots of charters, Legg notes. Of the approximately 310 schools in the district, more than one-third are charters, and charter school openings continue at a fast clip, with 19 new charters likely to open in the year ahead, says Legg. "What's particularly odd is that all of these charters are opening in Broward at the same time that so many existing ones have recently closed, or are in danger of closing. As Legg explains and a report from a local news outlet confirms, 25 percent of the district's charter schools, a total 23 schools, finished the 2013-2014 school year with a deficit, "ranging from a low of $4,591 to a high of $318,567." Indeed, as the number of charter schools in Broward has expanded, so has the number of charter school failings due to financial insolvency and poor academic performance. As the Sun Sentinel reports, of the recent 36 charter school closings in South Florida, 21 occurred in Broward. One charter high school in Broward "shuttered hours before students were to report for class on the first day of school," the article notes.

Two other Broward charters shut down after two weeks because their shared building wasn't fully constructed. And here's the other significant problem with the charter schools in Broward: it's never been clear that the citizens who live there actually asked for them. Who Wants Charter Schools? "Charter schools open up at will whether there's a need for them or not," explains Laurie Rich Levinson in an interview over the phone. Levinson is a Broward school board representative and the daughter of former state senator Nan Rich. "We don't get to decide who can open charter schools and where exactly they can open," she explains. "Charters were supposed to be created to fill a gap... do things differently for a specific community of students. But at this point there's no collaboration." Levinson complains about an onerous process from the state that requires local school districts to approve new charter school openings on very short notice. "We must approve them even when we don't know where exactly they'll be located," she says. Michael Ryan, mayor of the city of Sunrise, a Broward municipality, is another local official who is grappling with the impact of charters without seeing any strongly expressed need for the schools coming from his constituents. In his view, the original idea of charters was to open in neighborhoods where citizens felt the schools are not working. But "we're not that type of community," he tells me during a conversation in his office. "We love our schools." One of the clearest signs of the low demand for charter schools in Broward County can be found in the main reason these schools so often close: low enrollment. A 2014 report from South Florida-based Naples Daily News found that charter schools across the state frequently overestimate the potential demand for their services. Reporter Jacob Carpenter found that the 48 charter schools that opened in Florida in that year ended up enrolling just 54 percent of what they estimated they would enroll on their charter applications. A "conservative" estimate by the paper found that these schools missed their revenue projections by a total of "at least $35 million." Carpenter highlights one school in particular, New Life Academy in Broward County, which opened up in a strip mall and attracted just 50 students - "less than one-tenth" of its projected enrollment. In the county's official enrollment counts, taken in October of last year, the number of students served by New Life Academy in 2014-'15 was down to 37. Another Broward charter school, Avant Garde Academy, "ended up with 85 students ... after planning for 750 children." Carpenter also pointed to five recently closed Broward charter schools that enrolled as few as 18 students. Only one of the closed schools had over 100 students. And with a new school year just starting in Broward, there are already reports of charter schools being closed due to low enrollment. Location, Location, Location Despite this unproven demand, the drive for profit has kept the charter business booming, a fact many of the local officials in Broward, who have to deal with the human consequences of the expanding sector, find unsettling. "They seem to go wherever they want," Mayor Ryan says about charter schools, "even in areas zoned light industrial." The siting of charter schools recently prompted Ryan and the Sunrise commissioners to pass a one-year moratorium on the creation of new charter schools. Although the commissioners eventually approved the charter trying to locate in an industrial zone, Ryan and his colleagues continue to consider other ways to influence where and how these schools operate. What often drives charter school locations, Ryan believes, is the need to be centrally located and accessible by car ("like a big box store," he observes), because charter schools generally don't have to provide their students with transportation. Also, because there is little demand for charter seats from local parents - who generally prefer to have their children attend traditional public schools - charter operators are especially prone to site their schools in places where they will draw attendance from outside the community. (Even when students who live in Sunrise do want to attend one of the new charters, state law prohibits them from getting preference over students coming from outside the community.) All these factors governing charter school location seem to amount to a deliberate design to place schools on properties that have high real estate values to justify expensive construction and lease arrangements - and to ensure the properties will hold their real estate values over time. "The business model these schools seem to follow," Ryan observes, is clearly "site-driven as opposed to needs-driven," which is the cause of more than just headaches for city administrators. It also potentially threatens the welfare and safety of the county's children. Are the Children Safe? Unlike traditional public schools, charter schools can open their doors without having to adhere to traffic restrictions, building codes and other kinds of regulations that are required of most other businesses and institutions. "If you want to open a business in this community, you have to meet certain requirements," Levinson observes. "But charter schools don't have to do that." This absence of meaningful regulations on charter school building and operational guidelines has more than one Broward County official concerned. Children's safety is what motivated Lauderhill mayor Richard Kaplan to take action to provide more regulation of charter schools. Kaplan sees charter school proliferation as a potential endangerment to the health, safety and welfare of Broward County's citizens. "We have no problem with charter schools," Kaplan explains in an interview in his office. "They're supposed to be less regulated from other forms of schools so they can do what they deem necessary for their students." Nevertheless, Kaplan led Lauderhill in placing a moratorium on new charter school development even before Sunrise did, and then imposed restrictions on new charter schools that did open. Why? "We have an obligation to ensure the school is a safe environment and the school has the capacity to provide certain requirements," Kaplan says, and then ticks off a list of obligations any parent would agree they want schools to adhere to, including crossing guards, adequate entrances and exits, insurance, fire escape routes, background checks of employees, and the financial wherewithal to operate for a full year. Kaplan shares harrowing accounts of charter school disregard for the safety of students, including picking locations at busy intersections with no crossing guards to protect students going to and from the school, and no traffic lanes for parents to wait in when picking up their children. According to Kaplan, at one charter school, a fire alarm went off and no one knew what to do because the school had no procedure for fires and had never conducted a fire drill. "No one has been injured that I know of," Kaplan explains, "but there could be a time when a kid is injured, and that's what I worry about." Kaplan also worries that people who oppose charter regulations of any kind will "run to their state legislator to have him step in." He imagines that a pro-charter lawmaker might eventually propose a bill to prevent local authorities from regulating charter schools. "But," Kaplan says, "I find it hard to believe they'd convince others that we don't have the authority to require things like crossing guards and fire escapes." The Real Cost: Undermining Public Schools The damage inflicted by the spread of charters in Broward and elsewhere does not stop at the corrupt land deals and the mounting chaos in communities. The most dangerous element of their impact is that they seriously damage the financial viability of local public schools. As early as 2011, it became apparent that the spread of charter schools in Broward and Miami-Dade was causing financial mayhem for local public schools. As an independent media source reported at the time, charter schools located in those districts were already "siphoning off $40-$50 million in state money." "The loss of the funds comes at a time when both districts are facing financial difficulties due to state funding reductions caused by the continuing economic downturn," another article from the same news source reports. But it's not surprising that public schools struggle financially when competing charters open near them, given the prevailing financial model used to fund charters. As in most states where charter schools exist, Florida funnels state funding for charter schools through local school boards that ensure the charter school receives a proportion of operating funds based on the number of full-time students enrolled. Local public schools receive funds much in the same way. In this practice, where "the money follows the child," as each child transfers to a charter, state funding is added to the charter and subtracted from the public school's state funding. When a neighborhood school loses a percentage of students in a particular grade level or across grade levels to charters, the school can't simply proportionally cut its permanent costs for things like transportation and physical plant. It also can't cut the costs of grade-level teaching staff proportionally. That would increase class sizes enormously and leave the remaining students underserved. So instead, the school cuts a support service - a reading specialist, a special education teacher, a librarian, an art or music teacher - to offset the loss of funding. This damages the effectiveness of the neighborhood school long-term and causes it to slide further into the ranks of "low performing." The opening of charters isn't the only thing harming communities; their negative financial impact can actually worsen when they close. As a report from a South Florida news outlet found, local officials in Palm Beach County, just north of Broward, are "pursuing legal action against two [charter] schools that closed to try to get about $400,000 back. The schools either moved the funds or [they] had been frozen by lien holders." In Broward, according to a recent Sun Sentinel report, "County schools may have to repay $1.8 million owed by two closed charter schools." Because a recent state audit found the charters didn't keep accurate counts of the number of students enrolled in the schools, money the closed schools already collected will be withheld from future payments to the district. As state funding for local schools declines, counties like Broward have the option to raise property taxes and/or offer bond referendums (often called mill levies) to pay for increased operational and construction costs. But charter school advocates in Florida are lobbying to get a share of those funds as well. Thus, the race to the bottom continues, confined to issues of money and finance, rather than debates about how to actually educate children. A Movement Whose Mission Has Soured It is worth noting that many of the individuals who led the creation of the charter school movement - including Ray Budde who introduced the idea and Albert Shanker who made the idea famous - ended up opposing it. These schools, which were originally conceived as laboratories that would experiment with education innovations, today seem to provide very little that is innovative. As a scroll through the current directory of Broward charter schools maintained by the state shows, charters in Broward County tend to practice a uniform method of teaching called direct instruction, a strict form of teacher-directed pedagogy that is far from new or groundbreaking. Proponents of charter schools argue it's time to "move on; charter schools are here to stay." Instead of questioning the actual need for charter schools, they want to see the discussion shift to issues of "choice" and "scalability," topics that are more germane to business and industry than to teaching and learning. Critics of the charter school industry, like Rosemarie Jensen, have other questions they'd like answered. "When can we get our libraries and librarians back?" Jensen asks. "When can we get instruction in the arts and music back in schools?" How would Jeb Bush answer that? Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/32728-how-jeb-bush-s-florida-plan-for-school-choice-created-an-industry-of-corruption>

Mass. Auditor Suzanne Bump: 2014 report warned of state foster care problems | masslive.com Mass. Auditor Suzanne Bump: 2014 report warned of state foster care problems Jack Loiselle, age 7 of Hardwick, is in a coma the result of abuse he allegedly suffered while the family was under the supervision of state caseworkers. (Photo Provided) Print Email By Jim Kinney | jkinney@repub.com The Republican Follow on Twitter on September 07, 2015 at 1:48 PM R BOSTON - State Auditor Suzanne Bump says issues of a lack of collaboration between agencies, weak policies and procedures, and unreliable or outdated data cited in last week's state report how 7-year-old Jack Loiselle of Hardwick ended up in a coma while his family was under state supervision are no surprise. Bump said she and her staff raised the same issues of systemic ineffectiveness in a 2014 audit of the state foster care system. (That 2014 report is available at the end of this post.) "The systemic issues my office identified in a 2014 audit of DCF's foster care system are the same ones raised yesterday," Bump said in a Saturday release. "(Friday's) report from the Department of Children and Families' investigation into the tragic circumstances that landed a child in a coma while under state supervision is a woeful necessity and long overdue," Bump said. On Friday, the state released a report on the Loiselle case, a report done on the orders of Gov. Charlie Baker. Baker called for the report after 26-year-old Ryan Lints, Loiselle's father, was charged in July with beating and starving his boy. Young Jack, was taken to the hospital in mid-July with 38 pounds and with bleach burns on his feet. The report says that about 16 caseworkers had interaction with the family for about five months with a total of 110 visits. Lints has been charged with abuse and Loiselle remains in a coma. Bump's news release also made an apparent reference to the case of Avalena Conway-Coxon, a 2-year-old girl who died in a foster care home in Auburn last month. A second foster child from the Auburn home was also hospitalized. Bump wrote: "Of the findings in our audit, one of the most troubling was that we had no way of evaluating the agency's background check waiver process for foster parents because DCF did not maintain this information. Without this vital information, children can be placed in unsafe and unhealthy living situations. Our findings also identified a lack of collaboration between DCF and other agencies crucial to maintaining the safety of the children in its care – specifically the state's Sex Offender Registry Board and MassHealth." Bump went on to say: "We in state government should not wait for a tragedy to spur us to action, but consistently look for ways to bring more effectiveness and accountability to our services and programs." Source: http://www.masslive.com/business-news/index.ssf/2015/09/mass_auditor_suzanne_bump_2014_report_wa.html

Foster care and institutional abuse study: Former state ward Priscilla Taylor urges others to share stories at Adelaide forums 891 ABC Adelaide Updated Sun at 8:38pm Sun 6 Sep 2015, 8:38pm Photo: Chance to tell stories of abuse: A national study is looking at long-term impact of foster care and childhoods lived in institutions. \(ABC News\) Related Story: Many abuse victims reject SA Government payments Related Story: State funeral for champion of reconciliation Related Story: Child abuse remains rife in remote lands Map: Adelaide 5000 A woman who became a ward of the state when she was two and had 60 placements by the age of 18 says it is important people get to tell their stories now. A national study is tracking the long-term outcomes for generations who are now being referred to as the "forgotten Australians" - people who were in foster care, orphanages or other institutions between 1930 and 1989. Priscilla Taylor told 891 ABC Adelaide she was taken from her single mother in 1954 and she and her sister were abused over many years. "The longest I was left [of 60 placements] was in the first foster home where my sister and I were abused for many years," she said. "An inspector was sent out but his comments on my files are 'The girls are fine, the house is clean and tidy' and we were left there for years. 'My files have certainly filled in gaps.' Ms Taylor said she had told no-one of the abuse until South Australia's Mullighan royal commission was held. "I just kept on trying to get through life. I didn't tell of the abuse, didn't have the opportunity until the age of 54, during the Mullighan inquiry," she said. "Until you speak about it, I honestly believe that you cannot move forward and try to begin to heal, I really strongly believe that. "I have been able to move on to a certain degree. I do have a good relationship with my sons now and my two grandsons." She said legal avenues had been explored since the Mullighan inquiry but police were unable to pursue her case because her abuser was long dead. Broken marriage and struggles since childhood foster care The Adelaide woman said she had struggled through adult life and a broken marriage. "I'm not sure I really know what trust is," she said. "I have struggled and I have trudged through life as best I can. "I'm the mother of three boys. I was still a ward of the state when my first son was born so he was forcibly removed and adopted." These individuals were subjected to very harsh physical punishment, sexual abuse, psychological abuse, neglect of their schooling. Elizabeth Fernandez She said the younger generations of her family suffered because of her own trauma. "Unfortunately my marriage broke up after 14 years of trying. Because of this my sons have suffered too," she said. Confidential forums, to hear from people such as Ms Taylor, are being held in Adelaide from Tuesday to Thursday of this week, as university researchers compile their report. Elizabeth Fernandez is a professor of social work at the University of New South Wales and is chief investigator of the forgotten Australians study. "It is an independent research project to increase our understanding of the lived experience in care and after care of people who are referred to as the forgotten Australians, [including] the child migrants and members of the Stolen Generations," she said. "These experiences were not limited to their childhoods, there also have been significant impacts across their lives. "These individuals were subjected to very harsh physical punishment, sexual abuse, psychological abuse, neglect of their schooling. "When they left care to live in the community, they brought with them ... this history of trauma and maltreatment, also alienation from their birth families, physical and mental health difficulties and very serious intergenerational effects." The study's aim is to help improve public policy and models of care for current generations, Professor Fernandez said. Adelaide people who want to tell the researchers their stories are still able to contact them on 02 9385 1516. Source: <http://www.abc.net.au/news/2015-09-07/foster-care-abuse-national-study-priscilla-taylor/6755112>

4 years on, still no trial for Anchorage adoptive mother accused of abuse, kidnapping Michelle Theriault Boots September 6, 2015 Share on email Email Print Text Size -A +A Zemira James, photographed on Friday, August 28, 2015, was 15 years old when she was rescued from the home of the woman who had adopted her from Alaska's foster care system. The woman, Anya James, remains free on bail more than four years after she was arrested on charges of assault and kidnapping. The case has not gone to trial. Loren Holmes / ADN Zemira James was a bone-thin 15-year-old when she was rescued from the home of the woman who had adopted her from Alaska's foster care system. That was back in October 2010. Related: Anchorage woman charged with abuse of adopted kids When Anya James was arrested seven months later, in May 2011, the case made headlines. Prosecutors alleged the Anchorage woman forced a bleak, isolated existence on her six adoptive children in a sprawling Hillside home, locking them in bare basement partitions with concrete floors, forcing them to use kitty litter buckets as toilets, feeding them "power meals" of oatmeal gruel, ground-up spaghetti and raw eggs, or withholding food until some of the teenagers and young adults showed signs of starvation. Anya James was charged with 16 felony counts in which she is accused of assaulting and kidnapping the six children, all while collecting hundreds of thousands of dollars in state adoption subsidies. More than four years after she was arrested, the criminal case against Anya James still hasn't gone to trial. The 55-year-old James is out on bail and on her fourth defense attorney. Her trial date has been rescheduled 22 times. Today, Zemira James is a striking, healthy-looking 20-year-old who lives with her boyfriend and has dreams that include working with animals or writing a book about her life. She wears mostly black, a tangle of rubber bracelets and a spiked cuff on her wrist. She says the black is symbolic of grief. Without a trial, Zemira says, she is tethered to the past. She can't go into a Fred Meyer or drive past a McDonald's or dental office in Anchorage without a flood of memories. She wonders if she'll run into her former adoptive mother at the grocery store. Even her name, changed at the time of her adoption, is a daily reminder of the eight years she spent with Anya James. After the trial is over, "I'd look at the city probably in a very different way," she said. "I'd rejoice. I'd walk out of the courtroom crying and smiling at the same time." Until then, she said, "I feel like I'm drowning." Two civil cases against the Office of Children's Services -- which placed the children in the home and which attorneys say failed to investigate claims of abuse -- are stalled until the criminal case is resolved, attorneys say. The civil cases represent the best chance the victims will receive money or other restitution from the state. "(Zemira) was 15 years old when she was rescued basically from a cage in a garage of a half-million dollar mansion on the Hillside," said Mike Kramer, Zemira's attorney in a civil case against the Office of Children's Services that names Anya James as a third-party defendant. "She lives every day with nightmares that she's going to run into Anya James, who has been out on bail for four-and-a-half years." Meanwhile, James is "living in a mansion and getting a series of free lawyers," Kramer said. Lawyers and the judge involved in the case say they are frustrated by the way the case has festered in the system. Still, there's no clear end in sight. Zemira says the delays don't surprise her: The system has been failing her for a long time. "All my life," she said. "I just haven't seen any good. I know they could do a lot better than what they are doing." 'What's keeping me back is fear' When she was placed in James' home at age 8, Zemira had already been in foster care for much of her life. Her first placement was with a woman in her 50s named Fran, when she was about 4 years old. That was a happy experience. "She would always dress me up, buy me dresses. I had nice long hair, and she'd put me in these white nice gowns. She was a really nice lady," Zemira said. "I love her a lot." But the woman moved out of state, and Zemira was placed in an emergency foster home. By then, her biological brother was already with James, she said. In a phone conversation, Zemira remembers him telling her about the big house he was living in. There were lots of cats and dogs. Prosecutors later said the children at James' home lived with more than 60 animals, part of a pet boarding business. "He said, 'it's a big mansion. It looks like a castle,'" Zemira said. "He was 6 years old. He still had his baby teeth. I decided to stay there because of him. I had already created such a strong bond with him." James legally adopted them and changed their names. She also withdrew Zemira from Kasuun Elementary -- where Zemira says she had thrived -- and started homeschooling the girl instead. Life in the home started out OK, but escalated to physical abuse and the isolation and deprivation documented in hundreds of pages of court filings, Zemira said. One of the biggest lingering effects of her eight years in the home is a sense of isolation and difficulty connecting to people, especially peers her age. "What's keeping me back is fear. Fear of being around people, fear of talking to people I don't know." "This has gone on too long" On a Monday afternoon in August, James took her seat behind the defendant's table in a third-floor courtroom in downtown Anchorage. She wore a pink sweatshirt and blue pants, her hair in a ponytail. Anchorage Superior Court Judge Michael Spaan asked her current attorney, a court-appointed lawyer contracted by the Office of Public Advocacy named Jason Gazewood, how realistic the latest scheduled trial date in October would be. Given the volume of evidence, that didn't seem realistic, Gazewood said. In Alaska, crime victims have a constitutional right to a "timely disposition" of the case "following the arrest of the accused." But that doesn't always happen. Serious, complex cases often take years to get to trial, said Taylor Winston, the head of the state Office of Victims Rights. As a prosecutor, she worked on a few homicide cases that stretched into the five-year range before ever going to trial or seeing resolution. Time is necessary to allow attorneys on both sides to sift through evidence and prepare a strong case for trial, she said. "(These cases) deserve not to be shoved through a system quickly," she said. But there are costs to victims and the system when trials are delayed for years. Beyond the time of judges and attorneys, victims often put education, trips and other plans on hold in order to be available to testify for a constantly shifting court date, Winston said. "It keeps them chained to the criminal justice system and to the case," she said. "They really can't be free until its over." So why is Anya James' case taking so long to reach trial? Part of the issue is a revolving door of attorneys paired with a mountain of evidence. Because each of the six children were placed in the home by the Office of Children's Services and received an array of services -- all documented -- there are tens of thousands of pages of documents to sift through. The criminal and civil cases against Anya James her span multivolume files that are inches thick. An index that simply lists OCS files referenced in the civil lawsuits is more than 40 pages alone. Those documents could be crucial to James' defense. Her lawyers have argued that James took in severely emotionally disturbed and disabled children and tried her best to care for them, despite violent behaviors. James was represented for more than three years by Rex Butler, a private attorney in Anchorage known for defending high-profile clients. Court filings by Butler said James' elderly parents were initially financing her legal defense and paid $75,000 in bail money to get her out of jail. They were also paying the mortgage on her home and living expenses. In February 2014, Butler pulled out of the case, saying James had run out of money and could no longer pay him. Her trial date at the time was three months away. In a contentious hearing, Spaan chastised Butler for spending three years on the case and then leaving it months before trial. "You took her $100,000 and you withdraw," Spaan said, according to a courtroom transcript from the hearing. "I shouldn't do any trial in your courtroom because of your view of me," Butler responded. Spaan said he respected Butler's skill as an attorney but was "distressed" by his actions in the case. After that, James was appointed an attorney from the Public Defender Agency. Court-appointed attorneys are supposed to go to indigent defendants who have no means to hire a lawyer on their own. Usually, judges simply ask defendants about whether they can afford a lawyer. If they say no, they are assigned a public defender. At the time of the alleged abuse, James and the children lived in a 4,000-square-foot Hillside home valued at more than $600,000. Public records still list her as the owner of the home. Anya James' case was soon transferred to an attorney from the state Office of Public Advocacy, which also represents indigent clients. Gazewood, a different contract attorney with OPA, recently took on the case, making him James' fourth defense lawyer. At the August status hearing, Gazewood said he'd worked his way through about 8,000 of 50,000 pages of evidence; all parties agreed to another status hearing in September. "This has just gone on too long," Spaan said. Anya James and a friend walked out of the courtroom together. She declined to comment, saying she couldn't tell her side of the story right then. Zemira says she and the other children have spent the years since they were removed from the home trying to forge new lives. But she is certain she will testify at the trial, when it comes. "I am mad at Anya. I am very hurt," she said. "But she must be feeling scared right now, just the way I was." Correction: The headline of this article originally identified Anya James as a "foster" mother. She is actually the adoptive mother of the children. Source: <https://www.adn.com/article/20150906/4-years-still-no-trial-anchorage-foster-mother-accused-abuse-kidnapping>

State looking to revoke foster agency's license after investigation Posted: Sep 08, 2015 2:10 PM PDT Updated: Sep 09, 2015 8:52 AM PDT Posted By Brianna Owczarzak, Managing Web Editor Email Connect brianna.owczarzak@wnem.com By Andrew Keller, Multimedia Journalist BioEmail Connect Biography andrew.keller@wnem.com Omariion Humphrey State looking to revoke foster agency's license after investigation More > BURTON, MI (WNEM) - The state is looking to revoke the license of a foster agency. MORE Additional Links Poll Fundraiser begins for Omarion Humphrey memorial Fundraiser begins for Omarion Humphrey memorial Updated: Monday, July 27 2015 12:49 PM EDT 2015-07-27 16:49:05 GMT Jul 27, 2015 9:49 AM PDT Jul 27, 2015 9:49 AM PDT A fundraiser begins Monday in honor of 9-year-old Omarion Humphrey. Humphrey, who was autistic, was found dead in a Davison Township Lake after wandering away while in foster care. More > A fundraiser begins Monday in honor of 9-year-old Omarion Humphrey. Humphrey, who was autistic, was found dead in a Davison Township Lake after wandering away while in foster care. More > The investigation into its past violations was sparked after one of its foster children died. Omarion Humphrey died in July at the Lake Callis Recreation Complex in Genesee County. It was his death that put the Alternatives for Children and Families agency under a microscope. The state released its report on the investigation on Sept. 8. The report is 44 pages long. In it, violation after violation detailed against the Burton based foster agency that was in charge of taking care of 9-year-old Omarion. The state said the report and the severity of the violations are the reason the agency should lose its license. The Michigan Department of Health and Human Services claims the agency did not properly train its foster parents. Especially when it came to dealing with children with autism. Humphrey was severely autistic. The report said the foster parent should have been trained for Omarion's needs and how to handle issues due to his communication skills, physical safety and self-care. The report also said Humphrey was placed in a foster home with a laundry list of previous violations, many for lack of supervision. Those violations included a 2012 case where a 17-year-old foster child was arrested for having sexual contact with another youth in the home. In 2013 a 2-year-old died choking on a peanut butter sandwich. The agency received citations. Earlier this year a foster mother investigated was found to have lied about a previous criminal charge of retail fraud. There were also several violations in the report detailing the lack of supervision. The state department notified Yvwan Richardson, the administrator of Alternatives for Children and Families, in August noting the disciplinary action against her license is recommended. Six foster homes were reviewed in the process. The report even claimed some foster parents training included watching Hollywood movies. Alternatives For Children and Families has released the following statement in regards to the report: While we are exercising our appeal rights and attempting to work cooperatively with the Division of Child Welfare Licensing, we feel that it is not appropriate or useful to air our differences in the public forum that can be created by the press/social media. The State of Michigan procedure does not allow us a full and fair hearing before release of a DHS investigation report. Hopefully, a full and fair hearing at which we are allowed to dispute allegations with actual evidence will provide the truth. Therefore, we will not be commenting publicly on specifics contained in the Investigation Report. Yvwan H. Richardson CEO Alternatives For Children and Families Read more: <http://www.wnem.com/story/29983748/state-looking-to-revoke-foster-agencys-license-after-investigation#ixzz3IYeSDi2j>

Assembly passes three bills to curb psych drugs in California foster care By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 09/08/2015 02:36:14 PM PDT 1 Comment Updated: 09/09/2015 09:59:35 AM PDT The state Assembly on Tuesday unanimously approved legislation to better protect California foster children from too many psychiatric drugs through greater oversight by nurses, social workers, caregivers and court professionals. The three-bill package authored by state senators Jim Beall, D-San Jose, and Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles, aims to correct the often dangerous overprescribing revealed in this newspaper's investigative series "Drugging Our Kids." A fourth bill in the package -- introduced by state Sen. Bill Monning, D-Carmel -- would have strengthened court oversight of doctors who prescribe to foster children. That bill, however, was unexpectedly pulled from the legislative package last week, after heavy lobbying from physician groups and ongoing concerns from state health officials about costs. Monning has vowed to reactivate his bill in January for consideration next year. Assembly member David Chiu, D-San Francisco, is a co-author on the bills and called for Tuesday's floor vote. "Today's actions by the Assembly to pass these bills that would provide much-needed oversight over the use of psychotropic drugs in the foster care system is a start in making sure our foster youth aren't being unnecessarily drugged," Chiu said in a statement. "I'm encouraged by today's votes, and look forward to continuing the work on these issues in the days and months ahead." The three currently pending bills now head back to the Senate for a final concurrence vote and then are expected to be delivered to Gov. Jerry Brown. The governor has until Oct. 11 to approve or veto the bills. Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source: http://www.contracostatimes.com/breaking-news/ci_28777674/assembly-passes-three-bills-curb-psych-drugs-california

Area substance-abuse treatment center to close 0 Share this with your friends! From To Compose your message Area substance-abuse treatment center to close http://www.thedailystar.com/news/local_news/area-substance-abuse-treatment-center-to-close/article_79ac89ee-6ef0-57f8-9d47-7f89fa200aa3.html Story Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Tuesday, September 8, 2015 8:39 pm | Updated: 7:34 am, Thu Sep 10, 2015. Area substance-abuse treatment center to close By Jessica Reynolds Staff Writer The Daily Star While rehabilitation centers across the country are busy holding events and raising awareness for National Recovery Month, one area substance-abuse treatment center is preparing for its impending closure, officials said Tuesday. Phoenix House Delaware County Center, a male-only residential rehabilitation facility in South Kortright, will be closed as of Nov. 15, according to Amy Singer, Phoenix House's senior vice president for business development and public/private partnerships. The closure of the facility — which is frequently referred to as "Belle Terre" — has been in the works for several months, Singer said Tuesday, and can be attributed to a variety of factors, including changing health care policies, fiscal challenges, a remote location and fewer clients. "We've been talking about whether or not this makes sense for a while," Singer said. "We tried to see if we could bring the census up, and thought about it off and on. Eventually, it just became clear for a variety of clinical and financial reasons that it was time. ...It's an absolutely gorgeous facility and we've loved working in the community." New leadership also contributed to the decision, Singer said. On July 1, Phoenix House — the nonprofit that runs Belle Terre and more than 70 similar facilities in 10 states — hired a new president and chief executive officer, Ann Bray, who reviewed the organization's properties and decided to make the cut. "The facility didn't really work well with the new vision," Singer said, "which is a shift toward smaller, community-based outpatient programs. Belle Terre made more sense 30 years ago, but it just doesn't make sense now." Belle Terre's large building, which has "a long and rich history," will eventually be sold, according to Singer. Many of Belle Terre's 25 employees will be relocated to work at other Phoenix House programs. John Chimento, a part-time employee at Belle Terre, said he is concerned for the facility's clients because "many of them say it's the best drug facility rehab they've ever attended and, if you're in treatment and they pull the carpet out from underneath you, that's not going to help." According to Singer, the majority of the center's 66 male clients will have completed their treatment programs by November, but anyone who hasn't will either be transferred to another program or discharged. Source: http://www.thedailystar.com/news/local_news/area-substance-abuse-treatment-center-to-close/article_79ac89ee-6ef0-57f8-9d47-7f89fa200aa3.html

Too Often in Foster Care, Kids' Privacy Rights Used to Protect Agencies by Marie K. Cohen September 9, 2015 The privacy rights of children and their families caught up in the child welfare system should be protected. But all too often, they are used to shield agencies from questions about their actions. In my last column, I wrote about Ashley Rhodes-Courter and her efforts to find out the truth about the death of a foster child who was briefly in her care. The story of a child welfare system trying to suppress information about the death of a child is unfortunately all too common. But a recent story from upstate New York illustrates an agency hiding behind privacy rights at the expense of a living child. A 13-year-old in Warren County, New York, is being kept in foster care so that the child welfare agency can keep secret the circumstances under which she was allowed to stay with a heroin addict and convicted felon who was unrelated to her. The child in this case had been in the system most of her life. She was living with her maternal grandmother, but they were not getting along. A crisis was reached on July 4, when the grandmother called police and the girl threatened to run away. The next day, the girl was picked up by a family friend, Shannon Dickinson. The sheriff's office told the Glens Falls Post-Star that Dickinson was a known heroin addict who overdosed last December after injecting heroin while driving. He is also a twice-convicted felon and a paraplegic as a result of a failed suicide attempt decades ago. According to the Post-Star, the Warren County Department of Social Services (DSS) approved the placement with Dickinson. Because he was a family friend and the maternal grandmother approved the placement, she could be placed in his home as a "kinship placement" and a background check did not have to be done before she was placed. The child remained with him until July 30, when she reported that he had sexually abused her the night before. DSS then placed the girl in foster care. They later stated that they were not aware that the paternal grandmother had custodial rights. On August 26, the paternal grandmother came to court to request custody of her granddaughter and get her out of foster care. Judge Jeffrey Wait told her attorney to file a motion. But he could not schedule a hearing on that motion because of a DSS appeal of his ruling about closing the court. DSS wants the courtroom to be closed for further hearings. The judge has refused this request twice. But DSS announced its intention to appeal his decision, so the judge stated that he would schedule no more court dates at this time. In the meantime, the 13-year-old remains in foster care with strangers. The agency claims that it wants the courtroom closed to protect the girl's privacy. But the judge noted that the press has not reported her name nor the names of any family members. And according to a reporter who was there, the child's court-appointed guardian urged the court to allow the case to go ahead. On September 2, the Glens Falls Post-Star ran a hard-hitting editorial stating that DSS has "made the girl's welfare secondary to their own interest in keeping details of this case secret." All of my information comes from the Post-Star, and the press can sometimes be an accomplice in blaming individuals when systemic problems are at fault. That is one reason why agencies are so preoccupied with protecting themselves. I know how hard it is to be a social worker in the child welfare system, especially working with children old enough to run away. I once allowed an 18-year-old client under agency supervision to stay with a family member after her father kicked her out. There were some concerns about the family member's home but I knew my client would run away if I placed her in foster care with a stranger. Another family member, who was mentally ill, came over and got in a fight with my client, seriously injuring her. If God forbid my client had been killed, this could have been portrayed as my negligence, rather than choosing the option that appeared the least unsafe. The press can be unfair and uninformed. But the answer for agencies is not in sacrificing their client's interests to protect themselves. This is simply unethical. We will not be able to improve policy or practice unless we know why things go wrong. Since the agency does not seem to be open to explaining and fixing its own problems, the public needs to be informed, so that those who truly care about children can step in to prevent similar problems in the future. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/blogger-co-op/agency-chooses-protect-self-rather-child/12868>

Foster Care Provider Accused Of Child Porn; BA Foster Mom Feels 'Betrayed' Posted: Sep 09, 2015 8:30 PM PDT Updated: Sep 09, 2015 8:30 PM PDT Allison Harris, News On 6 BioEmail Connect Biography richard.clark@newson6.net Share this story on Facebook Tweet this story Plus one this story on Google Plus Email this story Previous ImageEnlargeNext Image 1 / 2 Timothy Cheatwood was a respite foster parent - like a babysitter for foster kids - and one Broken Arrow foster mom said Cheatwood babysat her two foster children. BROKEN ARROW, Oklahoma - Foster families are coming forward after police arrested a foster care worker on distributing child porn allegations. Timothy Cheatwood was a respite foster parent - like a babysitter for foster kids - and one Broken Arrow foster mom said Cheatwood babysat her two foster children, who have special needs, and now she's concerned. Cheatwood went through the same extensive background check she did. It's done by the FBI and requires references from a pastor, boss, friends and neighbors, it also requires 48 hours of training, including sexual abuse training. 9/3/2015 Related Story: Former Tulsa Foster Care Worker Arrested For Child Porn The woman said, "We were floored. Sickening, and, I guess it just...the longer I thought about it, it makes sense that somebody wanting to do evil will go to great lengths." Cheatwood has not been charged, only arrested for distributing child porn. But the Broken Arrow foster parent said she feels betrayed. "Just thinking that he groomed these kids, that he prayed not over these kids but on these kids," she said. He was trained by the Bair Foundation in Tulsa, the same nonprofit the woman went through to become a foster parent. It's a foundation for Christian special needs children in DHS custody. She said Cheatwood babysat her two foster children with special needs eight times over eight months at his Tulsa home. She even asked him why he became a respite foster parent. "He said that he'd been divorced and had two little boys and he missed being around the kids. Okay, I get that. (nervous laugh)" If Cheatwood is found guilty she knows DHS and the Bair Foundation were not to blame. Cheatwood has no criminal history; she said there's nothing DHS and the Bair Foundation could have done. "Just being vigilant, just keeping your eyes open, paying more attention. That's all we can do to protect these kids," she said. She said, looking back, she believes Cheatwood was grooming them - taking them to fun places, buying them ice cream, those sorts of things. Cheatwood has not been charged and has bonded out of jail. The Bair Foundation declined comment, saying they don't want to interfere with the investigation. Source: <http://www.newson6.com/story/29996388/foster-care-provider-accused-of-child-porn-ba-foster-mom-feels-betrayed>

State says agency placed 9-year-old boy in home with 'several' infractions 1 / 7 Omarion Humphrey's siblings remain under court's care, judge rules Jamell Humphrey, right, Omarion's father, reacts during the hearing concerning the status of his 10 minor children that remain in foster care Friday, July 24, 2015, at Oakland County Probate Court in Pontiac, Michigan. The hearing concluded that all of their 10 minor children will remain with family or in foster care. Danny Miller | MLive.com Danny Miller | dmille17@mlive.com Print Email By Jiquanda Johnson | jjohns16@mlive.com The Flint Journal Follow on Twitter on September 09, 2015 at 6:11 PM, updated September 09, 2015 at 9:51 PM Reddit Email Missing 9-year-old boy Read full state report on foster agency of autistic boy, 9, who drowned State says agency placed 9-year-old boy in home with 'several' infractions Agency that placed 9-year-old boy who drowned may appeal state report Agency that placed autistic boy who drowned should lose license, state says Lake Callis memorial to 9-year-old who drowned is fundraising goal All Stories BURTON, MI - A state investigation says that the Burton agency responsible for 9-year-old Omarion Humphrey, who drowned after wandering away at Lake Callis park July 4, placed him in a home that had several infractions including lack of supervision. In August, the state reviewed six of 59 foster homes registered with Alternatives for Children and Families. That investigation included Lulu Richardson's home, the home where Alternatives for Children and Families placed 9-year-old Omarion, who was severely autistic. Body found at Lake Callis believed to be missing 9-year-old boy Omarion Humphrey Davison Township police investigate discovery of child's body Friday, July 10, 2015 at Lake Callis Recreation Complex. The investigation report recommends revocation of the agency's license. Richardson is not named in the investigation, but she is presumably Foster Parent A in the report because of details regarding Omarion's case outlined in the 44-page document, including lack of training specifically for autistic children. When interviewed by the Flint Journal in July, Richardson said she was not under investigation and she was in compliance. Richardson could not be reached for comment on the report. Foster Parent A has had six special evaluations conducted by Alternatives for various claims, including a 2012 allegation in which a 17-year-old boy was arrested for allegedly having sexual contact with another child living in the home, according to the state report. In 2013, there was another allegation that Foster Parent A hit a child in the face and in 2014 foster children reported to case workers that other children were involved in sexual misconduct, the report said. Other infractions included not properly administering medication to children, not properly securing medications and not having training for children with autism. "Since 2012, the agency completed six special evaluations of Foster Parent A," read the report. "Foster Parent A was found to be in non-compliance of licensing rules and provided with a corrective plan for four of the special evaluations." There are an average of 13,000 children in the Michigan foster care system on any given day. Department of Health and Human Services spokesman Bob Wheaton said it is rare that children die while in foster care. "Deaths of children in foster care are thankfully rare and an accident while the child is in care that leads to death is even more uncommon," Wheaton said. "Also, many children come into care sick, or injured from severe abuse that resulted in them ending up in foster care." Wheaton said "many" recover but some die due to things that happened to them prior to being placed in care. He also said they occasionally have a teenager who commits suicide or a child who dies of asphyxiation while sleeping. In 2014, the state had 10 children die while in foster care. That number was 16 in 2013 and 17 in 2012. Wheaton said in Alternative's case, the agency recognized the infractions but failed to follow through with corrective measures. "One of the findings of our investigation is that Alternatives had a pattern of investigating violations and then failing to make recommendations for corrective action that were consistent with their findings," Wheaton said. "So it's not that they didn't notice the infractions - it's that they didn't respond with appropriate recommendations." Other homes had not reported pets, proper income and needed training and background checks. In addition, it was reported that a 2-year-old child died after choking on a peanut butter sandwich in one of the homes. Wheaton said the state conducts audits annually with at least 5 percent of the agencies it uses to place foster children. Omarion was removed in February from his Pontiac home, where state officials said he and eight other siblings were living in squalor. He wandered away from his foster family at the Davison Township park on July 4. Hundreds of people searched for Omarion. His body was found six days later in the park's lake. Since his death, Alternatives has agreed to not take on new foster care cases. It is still licensed and the issue may go to circuit court. The agency issued a statement saying it is not commenting on specific details of the investigation but plans to appeal the state's recommendation to revoke its license. "The State of Michigan procedure does not allow us a full and fair hearing before release of a DHS investigation report," said the agency's attorney Gregg Gibbs in an emailed media release signed by Alternative's chief executive officer Yvwanita Richardson. "Hopefully, a full and fair hearing at which we are allowed to dispute allegations with actual evidence will provide the truth. Therefore, we will not be commenting publicly on specifics contained in the Investigation Report." Alternatives was incorporated in 1998, Wheaton said. Since 2008, the state has carried out 10 investigations of Alternatives, records show, including a 2014 case where the agency was found to have placed a child with relatives for more than six months without completing a home study or documenting that the home was a safe and an appropriate placement for the child. The state investigation revealed Alternatives violations dating back to 2012. Wheaton said the issue could drag out for months. "At this point we have made our recommendation to revoke the license of Alternatives as a remedy for the problems that our investigation found, so we're letting the due process system for revocation play itself out rather than considering other action," he said. Source: http://www.mlive.com/news/flint/index.ssf/2015/09/agency_placed_9-year-old_boy_i.html

Severe Abuse Alleged at Illinois Home for Girls By LORRAINE BAILEY ShareThis CHICAGO (CN) - Illinois regularly sent foster children with a history of sexual abuse and emotional problems to a facility where they were raped and assaulted by staff members and other residents, former wards claim in court. The lawsuit filed Wednesday in Cook County Court is latest misfortune to befall Rock River Academy & Residential Center, a residential treatment center for adolescent girls with severe emotional disabilities run by Universal Health Services. Rock River closed earlier this year after an investigation by the Chicago Tribune found the residents suffered severe abuse during their stays. The five plaintiffs behind Wednesday's lawsuit say they were minors while the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services (DCFS) was contracting with the facility to provide female wards of the state with services. They say Rock River failed to deliver on its promise of providing each resident with "exceptional personalized care" in a safe environment. The Tribune's investigation newspaper found that the Rockford Police Department fielded more than 700 reports "concerning victimization of girls under DCFS's care including rape, aggravated battery and sodomy at the Rock River Academy," during a four-year period, according to the complaint. Each of the plaintiffs claim they were serially, sexually abused and raped by Rock River staff members, who "intentionally administered psychotropic drugs which they used to keep her in a semi-conscious state so that she could be more easily manipulated and sexually abused." In its investigation, the Chicago Tribune reported that violence was constant at the 59-bed home, with 10 to 20 fights breaking out between residents every day. The girls received little to no effective therapy or schooling, the Tribune reported. It found that the rate of physical restraints at Rock River was nearly eight times the median for all Illinois facilities. Coupled with Rock River's very high rate of dispensing psychoactive drugs, wards of the facility had the second-highest rate both of self-inflicted wounds and psychiatric hospital visits, the Tribune reported. Universal Health Services, a market-leader in behavioral health that runs more than 190 facilities nationwide, denied the accounts that former patients gave the Tribune about their experiences at Rock River. Universal did not immediately respond to a request for comment about the new lawsuit. The women are represented by Peter Polansky with Polansky & Cichon. Source: <http://www.courthousenews.com/2015/09/10/severe-abuse-alleged-at-illinois-home-for-girls.htm>

Pennsylvania Foster Kids Prescribed Too Many Psychotropic Drugs In The News September 10, 2015 Facebook Twitter LinkedIn Email Print 7 Comments 233 Views Amid growing criticism about the over-prescription of psychotropic medication in foster care, Pennsylvania commissioned PolicyLab to conduct an analysis of the use of psychiatric drugs among all of the state's Medicaid-enrolled children. The report, released in June, found that the rates of psychotropic prescriptions among youth in Medicaid and foster care are higher than previous estimates. In an interview with Medscape, the study's authors discussed their results. "We are concerned that doctors are turning to psychotropic medications because they are more readily available and easier to access than nonpharmacologic interventions," Kathleen Noonan, codirector of PolicyLab, wrote. "These medications with less evidence behind them are more plentiful than proven therapies." To determine the trends of psychotropic medication use in Pennsylvania's Medicaid program, the researchers analyzed patient data on youth age 3-18 from 2007 to 2012. They examined the records for foster care status, the use of any psychotropic medication, the use of antipsychotics, and the diagnoses of children receiving polypharmacy. They found that youth in foster care were prescribed psychotropic drugs at nearly three times the rate (43%) of other youth on Medicaid (16%). Those in foster care were also four times more likely to be prescribed an antipsychotic (22% vs. 5%) and four times more likely to receive polypharmacy, the prescription of multiple classes of medications simultaneously (12% vs. 3%). The researchers point out that the majority of youth prescribed antipsychotics only had a diagnosis of ADHD. A diagnosis for which antipsychotics are neither clinically recommended nor FDA approved. This is also concerning because "antipsychotic medications are associated with serious side effects in youth" and those with an ADHD diagnosis "receive significantly fewer behavioral health visits than youth with more severe behavioral health impairments, and thus, may not be receiving adequate medication monitoring." In an interview for Medscape, the authors make varying suggestions about how to bring down these prescription rates. Noonan, a lawyer, suggests policy reform. While she notes that most states have yet to make such changes, she suggests laws "related to the use of psychotropic medications in children; the use of multiple medications; the use of medications in very young children; or the identification of prescribing red flags, such as the use of antipsychotics for a nonindicated condition." David Rubin, a pediatric specialist, disagrees. "We can focus on restricting authorization for antipsychotics," he writes, "but at the end of the day, we are not going to get ourselves out of this crisis without a serious discussion about trying to provide other therapies for children who have been traumatized." Public health researcher Meredith Matone proposes a switch to specific therapies that can be offered instead of prescription drugs. "Evidence-based and trauma-informed nonpharmacologic therapies, such as parent/child interaction therapy, may be a well-suited alternative to medication." For the full Medscape interview with the PolicyLab study authors click here → * Matone, M., Sarah Zlotnik, M. S. P. H., Dorothy Miller, J. D., & Kreider, A. (2015). Psychotropic Medication Use by Pennsylvania Children in Foster Care and Enrolled in Medicaid. (Full Text) --Justin Karter, News Editor Source: <https://www.madinamerica.com/2015/09/pennsylvania-foster-kids-prescribed-too-many-psychotropic-drugs/>

Nearly 4,000 foster kids in California live in group homes SHARES: 29 VIEW COMMENTS @inquirerdotnet INQUIRER.net U.S. Bureau 12:48 AM September 12th, 2015 R September 12th, 2015 12:48 AM PALO ALTO, California – The number of foster children in California who live in family-like placements, instead of shelters or group homes, has declined since 1998, according to the Lucille Packard Foundation for Children's Health. Children fare best in families. To preserve the wellbeing of children who enter the foster care system, out-of-home placements must be in the setting that most closely resembles family life. The same holds true for children in the child welfare system. ADVERTISEMENT The Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 was meant to ensure that children in the child welfare system grow up in families-cared for in their own homes or the homes of relatives whenever possible, or in new permanent homes if not. (See First Entries into Foster Care in California, by Type of Placement.) While the vast majority (more than 80 percent) of foster children in California are living in family-like placements (i.e., in Foster Homes or Foster Family Agency Homes, with Guardians or Kin-Relatives, or in Pre-Adoptive families), between 1998-2014, the proportion of children living in these types of placements did not grow; rather, it saw a slight decline. That means that each year, there remains a substantial number of foster children living in non-family placements, such as shelters, group homes, and other congregate or temporary placements. In 2014, there were nearly 4,000 foster children living in group homes, one of the least optimal placement options. The U.S. foster care system aims to provide temporary living arrangements for children while attempting to safely reunite children with parents, or to find other permanent homes. In reality, many foster children spend years in the system, and move between multiple homes. Children age 6-20, as well as those with disabilities or illnesses, and those of African American and American Indian descent, comprise a disproportionate number of youth in the foster care system (see links below). Children in the system face higher risks of physical and mental health problems as well as academic barriers. Advocates of providing all children with safe, permanent homes, urge policymakers to ensure that prevention services, mental health resources and educational support are available to foster children, their biological parents, and their foster parents. Efforts, they say, should also be made to recruit and support foster families who are kin to the children in their care, as well as non-kin families who are well-suited to provide homes to these children in need. Read more: <http://globalnation.inquirer.net/128305/nearly-4000-foster-kids-in-california-live-in-group-homes#ixzz3laQGxo5U> Follow us: @inquirerdotnet on Twitter | inquirerdotnet on Facebook

Children start program to comfort others in foster care | State News | columbiainquirer.com Children start program to comfort others in foster care By ANDRA BRYAN STEFANONI/Joplin Globe Sep 11, 2015 0 Roger Nomer/The Joplin Globe Mason Hymer, 12, and Mackenzie Hymer, 14, assemble a Bundle of Hope on Tuesday. The two, who were once in the foster care system themselves, started a not-for-profit organization to put together bundles of pajamas, stuffed animals, personal hygiene items and a handwritten note to give to children headed to foster families. prev next JOPLIN, Missouri — When Mason Hymer was 3 years old, he was taken by a social worker to the doorstep of a couple he'd never met before and told that would be his new home. "It felt lonely," said Mason, now 12. "I didn't know what to expect, or what would happen." He also arrived at that rural Jasper County home between Carl Junction and Asbury with virtually nothing but the clothes on his back, The Joplin Globe reported. advertisement As a 9 year old, that experience was the inspiration for a project that Mason and an adoptive sister, Mackenzie Hymer, now 14, decided to start for other children in the foster care system. To date, they've served an estimated 1,000 children in eight counties in Southwest Missouri, Southeast Kansas and Northeast Oklahoma. In the United States, nearly 400,000 children live without permanent families in the foster care system, according to the Congressional Coalition on Adoption Institute. More than 100,000 are eligible for adoption, but nearly 32 percent of those children will wait more than three years in foster care before being adopted. Often times, children are removed from their biological families abruptly, noted Emily Hymer. She and her husband, Aaron, have adopted Mason and Mackenzie, as well as five other children. A conversation in the car with them one day in 2012 about how they could serve others and God prompted Mason to begin brainstorming ways to help comfort children in foster care. Additional input from Mackenzie led to the creation of Bundles of Hope. They would work to gather pairs of youth pajamas, stuffed animals and toothbrushes to tie up with a ribbon and a note that someone in the world cared, and ensure those bundles got into the hands of children headed to foster families. Mason and MacKenzie, who with the other Hymer children are homeschooled, began with a booth at the Carl Junction schools Christmas bazaar. Their handcrafted poster announced the project and requested donations of items and funds. That day, they collected $200. They also gained two more team members: Their booth caught the eye of twin sisters Mati and Abbey Goebel, 13, who are students at Carl Junction Junior High, friends with the Hymers and are passionate about community service. They also have an adopted little brother, Cooper, now 6. They put their heads together with the Hymers and got busy. "We started a bank account and called Jasper County Children's Division to ask what they needed," Mackenzie said. Eventually, they added more items to the bundles. They did OK, handing out a few hundred, but they stalled out at one point, they admitted. A challenge this summer by the Hymer's dad, Aaron, to serve all surrounding counties by September rekindled their passion. "We spent the month of July talking to supervisors, setting up appointments and delivering the bundles," Abbey Goebel said. "And we met the challenge with a month to spare." Today, the team has a logo they wear on T-shirts. They have the phone numbers of circuit managers in the eight counties on speed dial in their cellphones. They routinely speak to groups of as many as 40 about their project. They also have a website and Facebook, Twitter and Instagram accounts. They are licensed as a 501(c)(3) not-for-profit organization and have a post office box in Carl Junction. And they now have one side of a large, sunny craft room above the Hymer's garage dedicated to Bundles of Hope. Upstairs, above the garage, Mason climbs onto a step stool to reach one of several gray, Rubbermaid totes on a wall of shelves. It's carefully labeled "10 and bigger boy's winter pajama packets." MacKenzie reaches for one labeled "stuffed animals." The Goebel twins stretch to reach a couple of colorful backpacks on an upper shelf and a few personal hygiene items. Within seconds, they've brought it all to their work table, assembled the backpacks and tied a hand-made tag on each with a verse from the book of Proverbs and a checkmark to indicate whether the recipient should be a boy or girl, and in which season. "The verse is Proverbs 23:18. 'There is surely a future hope for you, and your hope will not be cut off,'" Abbey says as she turns to show the back of her shirt, which, like the tag, is printed with the verse. "This is all about giving kids hope." They also demonstrate how a "Car Bundle" is assembled — a new idea they conceived to help ease what could be a scary car ride for a child leaving his or her home for foster care. "Car Bundles" stay in a social worker's back seat and are filled with games, snacks, bottled drinks and inexpensive toys. They are replenished when needed. "We do nothing but drive them," said Mason and Mackenzie's mom, Emily Hymer, who popped in to the interview only briefly. She said she prefers to allow them to be the spokespeople since the project is "all theirs." "Their initiative, determination, their ambition, is inspiring to us as their parents," their mother said. "We've seen through their actions what we could all do if we got up and did it." The four youths say they get as much out of the project as they give. "We like to have responsibility," Mackenzie said. "It shows us what we'd have to do as adults." They also enjoy the camaraderie and the feeling of being in charge of something, they said. Back downstairs, the team wants to show a video made by Christ in Youth, which chose the four as Kingdom Workers of the Year. The Hymer's adopted siblings take a break from school work to watch. The video reveals something Mason, Mackenzie, Mati and Abbey had forgotten to share: That one day two years ago, two young siblings, Adam and Eve, were brought to the Hymer home by a social worker. When Mason came to the door to greet them, he saw they were carrying Bundles of Hope. "He ran to his room crying," his mother said, "because he realized then the impact that what he had started truly had. It hit home." They plan to continue, "as long as God will allow us," Mackenzie said. But they don't want the glory, they added. They credit their church, Christ's Church of Oronogo, along with hundreds of other donors, with financial support and donations of items. They also credit a local "extreme couponer," who each month clips coupons for toothpaste, body soap and other consumables and goes shopping for Bundles of Hope. "We've all grown a huge passion for it," Mati Goebel said. "God has given us a passion for it." Currently serving Jasper, Newton, McDonald, Lawrence, Barry and Stone counties in Missouri, Ottawa County in Oklahoma and Bourbon County in Kansas, they have discussed partnering with other individuals and groups across the nation to expand their reach. "We have a motto now," Mason said, crediting Mati Goebel with thinking of it. "Today our country, tomorrow the world." "And it all started in a car ride." Source: http://www.columbiainquirer.com/news/state_news/children-start-program-to-comfort-others-in-foster-care/article_aled7f25-c47e-5c3a-bfd1b-2c872daf2a29.html

The Miseducation of Foster Youth by Sade A. Daniels September 11, 2015 I'm currently in the midst of my first semester of graduate school at the University of California, Berkeley, and I want to drop out. I've called an aid advisor to see how much of a financial strain I'll inherit if I drop my courses. As an educated woman, I understand the importance of school to society. But as someone who has hated school since the beginnings of time, with an even more horrid experience once I entered foster care, school will never be a true priority to me, especially when my livelihood is jeopardized or I feel like I'll fail at it regardless. I'm still battling embedded inadequacies around education, and I emancipated from the system eight years ago! For most kids in America, school is a major facet in discovering one's skills and talents while honing in on possible career paths. Our children not only learn about the Pythagorean theorem and verb conjugation, but how to aspire and dream. But for many foster youth, the school experience often fuels low self-esteem as it is another system in which their plight is ignored and aspersions are reinforced through disciplinary action. Photo credit: PBS.org Here are a few ways that school becomes a low priority to foster youth: When foster care placements offer little support in transportation to and from school When school administrators use foster care backgrounds as supportive evidence for punitive responses to behavioral issues When teachers fail to engage foster care placements in learning plans and needs of foster youth When foster care placements fail to engage with teachers about learning plans and educational supports needed for foster youth When physiological needs aren't being met (seriously, no one is paying attention in class when hungry, seven-day notice'd, lacking proper clothing, and/or fearful of their placement environment) When emotional support isn't being offered at home and at school When academic institutions aren't trained on the specific needs and culture of system-dependent children or of available resources to facilitate supports When foster care placements are made and/or changed with little regard to current school proximity When alternative schools are presented as the only option for transition-age youth When foster care placements have limited knowledge of academic support programs and resources to supplement learning gaps or problem subjects When academic excellence isn't the expectation for foster youth When academic mediocrity is the accepted norm for foster youth When teachers and other school personnel are silent to the perils foster youth face while in out-of-home care. Those same noted sentiments, actions and inactions showcase a low regard for foster youth by school professionals as well as foster caretakers. In layman's terms: If professionals in youth and education services don't care enough to ensure smooth transitions and efficient support to foster youth in school, then how can we expect foster youth to be overly invested in their academic careers? If we look thoroughly at high school dropout rates, college readiness, entrance and graduation rates, suspensions and expulsions, we'll see glimpses of a subculture in foster care where academia is regarded with low reverence. That lack of connection is a byproduct of substandard treatment and supports while in school. There is hope that some of the issues I have pointed out will be addressed through national reform efforts, but there is so much more to do. As providers and caretakers, we have to ask ourselves how important should school be to our youth. Because if it's supposed to be a top priority, we have to ensure that all environments cultivate that belief. We cannot expect our young people to excel in school if we're not doing our best to support them in their academic endeavors. Because of systematic failures, we're now combating a culture of accepted and expected miseducation of foster youth. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/blogger-co-op/miseducation-foster-youth/12880>

Paxil isn't safe for teens Updated: Sep 17, 2015 6:49 AM PDT Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on email © Comstock / Thinkstock Health More cavities seen in kids of chronically stressed mothers More cavities seen in kids of chronically stressed mothers Dental cavities are more common among kids whose mothers suffer from chronic stress, according to a new study. Dental cavities are more common among kids whose mothers suffer from chronic stress, according to a new study. Teens copy parents' smoking Teens copy parents' smoking Although many teens don't often copy their parents' behavior, there's one habit they may pick up from mom or dad -- smoking. Although many teens don't often copy their parents' behavior, there's one habit they may pick up from mom or dad -- smoking. Vraylar approved for schizophrenia, bipolar disorder Vraylar approved for schizophrenia, bipolar disorder Vraylar (cariprazine) has been approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to treat two forms of mental illness among adults, schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. Childhood vaccines debate rekindled at GOP presidential debate Childhood vaccines debate rekindled at GOP presidential debate Some parents' long-simmering concerns over the safety of childhood vaccines received unexpected -- and, in some quarters, unwelcome -- notice during the second Republican presidential candidates' debate. Some parents' long-simmering concerns over the safety of childhood vaccines received unexpected -- and, in some quarters, unwelcome -- notice during the second Republican presidential candidates' debate. Antibacterial soaps fail to beat plain soap Antibacterial soaps fail to beat plain soap When it comes to ridding your hands of bacteria, plain old soap is just as good as many "antibacterial" soaps, new research contends. When it comes to ridding your hands of bacteria, plain old soap is just as good as many "antibacterial" soaps, new research contends. See More Articles Children's Health More cavities seen in kids of chronically stressed mothers More cavities seen in kids of chronically stressed mothers Dental cavities are more common among kids whose mothers suffer from chronic stress, according to a new study. Dental cavities are more common among kids whose mothers suffer from chronic stress, according to a new study. Teens copy parents' smoking Teens copy parents' smoking Although many teens don't often copy their parents' behavior, there's one habit they may pick up from mom or dad -- smoking. Although many teens don't often copy their parents' behavior, there's one habit they may pick up from mom or dad -- smoking. Childhood vaccines debate rekindled at GOP presidential debate Childhood vaccines debate rekindled at GOP presidential debate Some parents' long-simmering concerns over the safety of childhood vaccines received unexpected -- and, in some quarters, unwelcome -- notice during the second Republican presidential candidates' debate. Some parents' long-simmering concerns over the safety of childhood vaccines received unexpected -- and, in some quarters, unwelcome -- notice during the second Republican presidential candidates' debate. This year's flu vaccine should be better match This year's flu vaccine should be better match This year's flu vaccine should be a better match than last year's for circulating flu strains, U.S. health officials said Thursday. This year's flu vaccine should be a better match than last year's for circulating flu strains, U.S. health officials said Thursday. Paxil isn't safe for teens A controversial clinical trial of the antidepressant Paxil came to the wrong conclusion when it declared the drug safe and effective for treating troubled teenagers, according to a reanalysis of the original data... A controversial clinical trial of the antidepressant Paxil came to the wrong conclusion when it declared the drug safe and effective for treating troubled teenagers, according to a reanalysis of the original data more than... See More Articles By Dennis Thompson HealthDay Reporter (HealthDay News) -- A controversial clinical trial of the antidepressant Paxil came to the wrong conclusion when it declared the drug safe and effective for treating troubled teenagers, according to a reanalysis of the original data more than a decade later. This new look finds Paxil (paroxetine) can make some teenagers suicidal and likely to harm themselves, claims a report published Sept. 17 in the BMJ. "The original study says paroxetine is safe and effective for the treatment of depressed adolescents," said co-author Dr. John Nardo, a psychiatrist with the Emory University Psychoanalytic Institute in Atlanta. "Ours says paroxetine is neither safe nor effective in the treatment of adolescents," Nardo added. "And I don't know of any example where two studies in the literature with the same data ever reached opposite conclusions." This reassessment was prompted by the RIAT (restoring invisible and abandoned trials) initiative, launched by an international group of researchers, Nardo said. RIAT calls for the public release of data behind unpublished or questionable clinical trials so that outside experts can check the findings, he explained. The original trial, known as Study 329, has been controversial ever since its 2001 publication, Nardo said. That trial was funded by the drug's marketer, SmithKline Beecham, which is now GlaxoSmithKline (GSK). The medication is currently marketed in the United States by the drug company Apotex, GSK officials said. A year after Study 329's release, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration declared it should be considered "a failed trial," according to an editorial by BMJ Associate Editor Peter Doshi that accompanies the new analysis. Despite this, more than 2 million prescriptions were written for U.S. children and teenagers in 2002, spurred by a marketing campaign that said Study 329 had demonstrated Paxil's "remarkable efficacy and safety," Doshi wrote. In 2003, the FDA mandated a "black box" warning -- the most serious type of warning in prescription drug labeling -- for Paxil and other selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor (SSRI) antidepressants. The warning signaled a possible risk of suicidal thoughts among children and teens. GlaxoSmithKline agreed to make the data behind Study 329 publicly available as part of a 2004 court settlement in New York, Nardo said. The drug manufacturer has since come out in favor of transparency in clinical trials, and provided electronic access to the data for the new analysis, the company said in a statement. The original trial involved 275 kids, between 12 and 18 years old, diagnosed with major depression. They were split into three groups and received either Paxil, the antidepressant drug imipramine (Tofranil), or an inactive placebo. The new reanalysis revealed that neither Paxil nor high-dose imipramine was more effective than a placebo in the treatment of major depression in adolescents. The researchers also considered the increase in harms with both drugs to be clinically significant. The original results appear to have been skewed by several decisions researchers made during data analysis, Nardo said. For example, the way the researchers classified teenagers' behavior caused them to undercount the number of suicidal ideas or self-injurious actions, such as cutting or jumping from heights. Some were categorized as "emotional lability" -- the tendency to laugh or cry unexpectedly -- and this masked differences in suicidal behavior between Paxil and placebo, the reanalysis found. The new paper also pointed out that the trial researchers ignored unfavorable data about potential harms on the grounds that the differences between Paxil and placebo were not statistically significant. Based on the reanalysis, people can conclude that the original report "was misleading," said Dr. David Henry, a professor at the University of Toronto Dalla Lana School of Public Health and co-author of a second editorial accompanying the BMJ paper. "It's not clear whether it was deliberate or accidental, but it wrongly gave the impression that an antidepressant drug was effective and safe in children and adolescents," Henry said. "Where trials are going to determine treatment for very large numbers of people, we need to know they are effective and safe, and sometimes the results are wrong." Henry said that people concerned about the credibility of future studies should stick with established medical journals. "The high-quality, high-impact peer-reviewed journals didn't get there by chance," he said. "They have really done their work, and they're realizing now that these problems occur so they're taking more care." GlaxoSmithKline said the new results reaffirm concerns that have become widely known since Study 329's initial release. "Importantly, the findings from this team's analysis appear to be in line with the longstanding view that there is an increased risk of suicidality in pediatric and adolescent patients given antidepressants like paroxetine," the company said in its statement. "This is widely known and clear warnings have been in place on the product label for more than a decade. As such we don't believe this reanalysis affects patient safety." This particular trial, conducted in the 1990s, "was included in detailed reviews carried out many years ago by regulators and by GSK, which identified the increased risk. It's something the medical community and regulators are aware of," the statement concludes. Source: <http://www.kait8.com/story/30053332/paxil-isnt-safe-for-teens-new-analysis-says>

Sheriff's office search for runaway teens by Jessica Lindley Cherokee Tribune September 17, 2015 12:06 AM | 1632 views | 0 | 6 | | Adriania Berndt slideshow Sarah Graham slideshow Several juveniles have been reported as runaways in Cherokee County this week, and the search continues for two of the missing teens. Investigators with the Cherokee Sheriff's Office are looking for 16-year-old Adriania Natasha Berndt and 15-year-old Sarah Grace Graham. A third teen, Deshaun Tiller, also had been reported as a runaway Monday, but he has since been located, sheriff's office spokesman Lt. Jay Baker said. Authorities said Berndt was last seen at her home in Canton on Monday night. She is described as a white female with brown hair and blue eyes, according to a report released by the sheriff's office Tuesday afternoon. Berndt is about 5 feet 4 inches tall and weighs about 115 pounds. She was last seen wearing a black zip-up sweatshirt and blue jeans shorts, according to the sheriff's office. Graham, according to authorities, was last seen by a family member at about 8:15 p.m. Tuesday in the vicinity of Bells Ferry Road near Kellogg Creek. "She told another family member she would be at school (Wednesday)," Baker said, adding that the girl did not show up at school. According to a sheriff's office release, Graham is described as being 5 feet 3 inches tall and weighing about 112 pounds. She has brown hair and blue eyes, and was last seen wearing multi-colored pants and a white sports bra, according to investigators. Although the two teenage runaway girls left on their own accord, Baker said the potential for dangers exist. "Maybe not the same type of dangers you think of when you are talking about a missing 10-year-old, but there are real hazards juveniles often don't consider when they run away from their home. Without a parent or guardian, young teen runaways can often be exploited or manipulated. Also, with no parental supervision it is very common for runaway teens to make poor choices related to sex, drugs and alcohol use," Baker said there was no evidence, however, to suggest that the teens were being lured into any type of sex trafficking ring. The Cherokee Sheriff's Office also continues its search for two teenage girls who ran away from North Georgia Angel House in Cherokee County on Aug. 13. Baker said Angelique Beacham and Jayde Hayes, whose families do not live in Cherokee, had left the facility for troubled youth in an unknown vehicle and their current location remains unknown. Beacham, 16, was described by investigators as being 5 feet 4 inches tall and weighing 119 pounds. She has black hair and brown eyes. Hayes, also 16, is 5 feet 4 inches tall and weighs 145 pounds, police said. She was also described by investigators as having black hair and brown eyes. Anyone with information regarding the whereabouts of any of the missing teens is asked to call detectives at (770) 928-0239 or 911. Source: http://cherokeetribune.com/view/full_story/26862009/article-Sheriff-s-office-search-for-runaway-teens?instance=home_top_bullets

Adoptive parents of abused child rap DCF Comment By Paula J. Owen Telegram & Gazette Staff telegram.com By Paula J. Owen Telegram & Gazette Staff Posted Sep. 12, 2015 at 9:01 PM Updated Sep 13, 2015 at 5:36 AM An undated family handout photograph released in 2005 of Haleigh Poutre, shown at approximately 10 years of age. She is now 21. Submitted Photo By Paula J. Owen Telegram & Gazette Staff Posted Sep. 12, 2015 at 9:01 PM Updated Sep 13, 2015 at 5:36 AM Zoom An undated family handout photograph released in 2005 of Haleigh Poutre, shown at approximately 10 years of age. She is now 21. Submitted Photo By Paula J. Owen Telegram & Gazette Staff Posted Sep. 12, 2015 at 9:01 PM Updated Sep 13, 2015 at 5:36 AM More than 10 years after Haleigh Poutre was beaten into a coma, the Department of Children and Families is still making the same mistakes that led to her near death, including not following a law created in light of the case to have a clinical review team review cases after multiple allegations of abuse. When Haleigh was brought to a Westfield hospital in September 2005, her teeth were broken, her face was swollen and old and new burns were on her chest. But the most severe injury was to her brain stem, which doctors said was partially sheared, leaving her "brain dead" and in a vegetative state. DCF, at the time called the Department of Social Services, was harshly criticized over its handling of the case, which included the subsequent arrest of her aunt and stepfather, Holli and Jason Strickland, on assault charges. In 2006, a legislative oversight committee determined that DSS was at fault for failing to protect Haleigh. DSS received at least 12 reports of abuse or neglect of Haleigh between 2001 and 2005, and had been involved with the Strickland family since 1998. DSS officials later acknowledged that they missed signs of abuse before Haleigh was brought to the hospital. DCF sought an order to remove Haleigh's life support eight days after she was admitted, and it was ultimately upheld by the state Supreme Judicial Court. But on Jan. 18, 2006 - the day doctors were scheduled to remove her life support - Haleigh regained consciousness and began breathing on her own and responding to commands. Many people remember the Haleigh Poutre case as it relates to end-of-life decisions for children in the state's custody. But the child abuse she endured inspired many changes in the way the state handles abuse reporting, including a special review requirement of cases where three or more reports of abuse and neglect are made, increased penalties for failing to report child abuse and the creation of a registry for keeping track of foster parents. Also, then-Gov. Deval L. Patrick created a child advocate position that reports directly to the governor regarding severe child abuse or neglect in the state. The adoptive parents of Haleigh Poutre - now Haleigh Arnett, a 21-year-old woman who loves music and Disney, but cannot walk or use the bathroom on her own - say the same state system that failed Haleigh is continuing to fail other children. Her adoptive father, Keith A. Arnett, 45, and adoptive mother, Rebekah E. Arnett, 42, said the state is still making the same mistakes with other people's children that it made with Haleigh. The state, they said, is not learning from its mistakes. "Policies and procedures fall by the wayside and kids are not being taken care of," Mr. Arnett said in a phone interview. "It is maddening. If society can't take care of its children, what does that say? Haleigh is paying the price like no other for a system failure. It is sad that this was allowed to happen, and it probably could have been prevented. It is pretty intense for me. We've gone through a lot to adopt Haleigh - so many studies, checking backgrounds. We're squeaky clean, but it was invasive and totally over the top. Then, with a kid like Jeremiah Oliver, they missed eight visits and didn't review the case and the kid ends up dead, and the Hardwick boy is in a coma. That is inexcusable." Mr. Arnett is referring to Jeremiah Oliver, the 5-year old boy from Fitchburg whose body was found in a suitcase in Sterling a year after he disappeared; and Jack Loisel of Hardwick, who remains unresponsive in a long-term rehabilitation center after allegedly being starved and beaten by his father, Randall Lints of Hardwick. Haleigh's, Jeremiah's, and Jack's cases are similar in that multiple reports of abuse and neglect were made, but not investigated by DCF. Moreover, in Haleigh's and Jack's cases, social workers believed their caretakers' explanations of how Haleigh and Jack sustained multiple injuries - through self-harming, they told them. In Haleigh's case, Mr. Arnett said when social workers would ask her how she got hurt, her adoptive aunt was always an intimidating figure in the room. Haleigh, Mr. Arnett said, is a blessing to his family, and adopting her was a dream come true. He quit his job as a special education teacher and started a small trucking business to help with Haleigh's round-the-clock care when he and his wife adopted her into their Western Massachusetts home. Ms. Arnett home-schools their three biological sons and also cares for two foster children. The Arnetts have been taking in foster children for almost 10 years and knows how the child welfare system operates, Mr. Arnett said. Haleigh's social workers have been amazing, he said, but he also points to a lack of support for social workers who are often overwhelmed as part of the problem and disconnect between management and what is happening on the frontlines in children's homes. "Haleigh is in a good place and we love her to death," he said. "I'm encouraged by her and strengthened by her. It is a great joy taking care of Haleigh. She is just awesome. She is perfect. But, I don't wish any other adoptive or foster parent to go through this or worse - the kid is dead." Another issue, Mr. Arnett said, is that DCF continues to keep the same social workers and managers on the very cases they made mistakes in as they did in Haleigh's case. "No one wants to take responsibility for kids dead or dying, and that is the way it has been," he said. "The fact continues that reviews are not done and now a kid is in a coma. They knew certain things about the dad in Hardwick and they didn't do anything. That is insane when you think about it. DCF is a machine. As foster parents it is so hard to get any answers out of anybody. The system is so big it doesn't look at kids as individuals - just policies and procedures - and that is where the system really got it wrong. They are so far removed from what the realities are." When Mr. Patrick overhauled the state's child welfare system in 2008, cases like those were supposed to undergo a special review by a state board, if the department receives three or more reports of suspected child abuse. The results of that review were intended to be evaluated by prosecutors and police. At the time, Mr. Patrick said the new law was "a giant step forward," and that "nobody wants tragedies to repeat themselves." Yet, DCF's failure to follow that law since, has in some cases, led to child deaths or severe injuries more than 10 years after the Poutre case that initially inspired the change. In a statement, DCF officials said, "Despite the best of intentions, the Department does not have an up-to-date intake policy and is working diligently to develop a new one that will be executed statewide. The children of the Commonwealth deserve nothing less." DCF officials said that Worcester-area offices recently implemented regular meetings where managers and supervisors provide oversight on the 51A process, screening process and decisions regarding ongoing cases, and have implemented a protocol where a clinical review team will review complex and difficult cases. DCF is considering "rolling this out statewide," they said. "The Department does not have readily available data that would capture compliance with the 2008 legislation," DCF officials said in a statement. During a recent press conference on the Loisel case, Gov. Charles D. Baker Jr. said the special review requirement was an "unclear policy" within DCF. Elizabeth Guyton, a spokeswoman for Mr. Baker, said, "Keeping the children of the Commonwealth safe is our highest priority. Our social workers are dedicated but they need clear and updated policies and strong management behind them to do this important job. The reforms that we began putting in place with the CWLA report and continue to enhance as new information becomes available will make a great impact." However, retired Judge Martha Grace, who oversaw child abuse cases for more than 20 years, said she believes part of the problem is that DCF does not follow through with policies already put in place to protect children. "They need follow-through," she said. "But, if you want a second set of eyes, where does it come from? If you can't answer that question, there is no hope new directives will be implemented today, tomorrow or in the future. The lack of follow-through always bothered me. It is not a question of putting more directives in place when the old ones are not being implemented everywhere. We need to take what we have for laws and not accept the easy answer of 'not enough manpower' for why they are not implemented; but, ask how you can implement them with what you have." Source: <http://www.telegram.com/article/20150912/NEWS/150919659>

SLED investigates S.C. MENTOR group home death Christina Elmore Email @celmorepc Sep 12 2015 10:25 pm Sep 12 11:10 pm x State Law Enforcement Division agents are investigating the death of a 23-year-old man who had been left in the care of a Charleston area group home. Charles William Noland, of Charleston, suffered a medical emergency Sept. 5 while residing at South Carolina MENTOR. The facility cares for intellectually and developmentally disabled adults, in addition to other services. Paramedics transported Noland to Bon Secours St. Francis Hospital where he later died, Charleston County Deputy Coroner Dottie Lindsey said. An autopsy was completed the following day, according to Lindsey. A cause of death, however, remains under investigation. Further details surrounding the death were not immediately available Saturday. Lindsey declined to comment on the nature of the medical emergency or what may have brought it on, citing the ongoing investigation. SLED began looking into the death immediately after it occurred, spokesman Thom Berry said. "The facility is required by law to notify us," Berry said. "We then began our investigation." South Carolina MENTOR was the subject of a similar investigation after an autistic man died while in its care in 2013. Forrest Carlton, 22, of Charleston wandered from the facility and was fatally struck by a vehicle in a hit-and-run around 3 a.m. Dec. 8 of that year. A wrongful death suit filed by Carlton's father alleged negligence on the part of the group home. Carlton tried to wander from the facility at least four times since moving into the facility in November 2012, alleged Nathan Hughey, an attorney for Carlton's family. The home's staff failed to heighten its supervision accordingly, he said. The facility reached a confidential settlement last year with Carlton's family. In a statement released Saturday, Stan Butkus, South Carolina MENTOR's state director, said he was "devastated" by the latest "unexpected" death of an individual in its program. "As an organization we are committed to continuous quality improvement and place great emphasis on safe environments and providing services that are responsive to the needs of the individuals we are privileged to serve," Butkus said. "Our staff provides care according to each person's individual service plan which describes the type of assistance, supervision and structure that each person requires." The facility's staff receive CPR and first aid training to ensure the safety of those in its care, Butkus said. "As a matter of course, we are required to report the death of any individual receiving services to SLED and we are working cooperatively with them in their review of this matter," Butkus said. Reach Christina Elmore at 937-5908. Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20150912/PC16/150919709/sled-investigates-sc-mentor-group-home-death>

Rock River Academy & Residential Center sued over allegations of abuse Mark Trammell Sep. 14, 2015, 11:04am 1 2 0 13 Several former residents of a Cook County residential center are suing for alleged sexual and physical abuse by the staff. Ashley Lombardo, Mary Bohanon, Alicia Mondloch, Nikki Harris and Alicia Weathers filed suit on Sept. 9 in Cook County Circuit Court against Universal Health Services Inc., doing business as Rock River Academy & Residential Center. According to the complaint, Rock River is a residential treatment center for adolescent females with moderate to severe emotional disabilities and was advertised to be a safe and secure environment, promising the highest level of care and individualized treatment for each of their patients. According to an investigation by the Chicago Tribune cited by the complaint, over a four-year period of time there were more than 700 reports made to the Rockford Police Department concerning alleged victimization of girls under its care, including rape, battery and sodomy. Each of the plaintiffs were minors under the care of Rock River during various periods from 2010 to 2013, and each of them have alleged counts of systematic abuse and neglect, including but not limited to various incidents of alleged sexual abuse, battery, inappropriate touching, fondling, sexual assault, and administration of psychotropic drugs to keep them in a semi-conscious state so that they could be easily manipulated and abused by various members of the defendant's staff, the lawsuit states. The plaintiffs allege neglect on the behalf of Rock River, failure to properly screen their staff for potential sex offenders, failure to provide proper counseling when such alleged incidents were brought to light, failure to protect their residents from such abuse or to remove them to an area in which they would be safe from it, failure to investigate said incidents properly, failure to report said incidents to the authorities, and general carelessness and neglect. The plaintiffs seek restitution of more than $50,000 each for their mental, physical and emotional injuries, and subsequent medical and psychiatric costs in the past and future, as well as attorney fees and court costs in an amount to be determined by the court. The plaintiffs are being represented by I. Peter Polansky of Polansky & Cichon CHTD, of Chicago. Source: <http://cookcountyrecord.com/stories/510638014-rock-river-academy-residential-center-sued-over-allegations-of-abuse>

Legislature Approves Foster Care Overhaul Katie Orr Monday, September 14, 2015 | Sacramento, CA | Permalink playpause 00:00 / 00:43 Update Required To play the media you will need to either update your browser to a recent version or update your Flash plugin. The California foster care system would be overhauled under a bill passed by the state Legislature. The measure changes the focus of the foster care system in the state.. Democratic Assemblyman Mark Stone authored the bill. "What this bill does is move the care away from congregate care, group homes, and into more individualized care," he says. Stone says children may still be placed in group facilities for short periods of time. But he says they would receive intensive treatment while there. A greater effort will also be made to return children to their families or find them new permanent homes. Foster parents will also receive more training and support. The bill includes recommendations from a 2015 Department of Social Services report on reforming the foster care system. It is awaiting action from the governor. Source: <http://www.capradio.org/articles/2015/09/14/legislature-approves-foster-care-overhaul/>

Husband and Wife, Operators of Foster Care Homes, Pleaded Guilty to Misappropriation of Public Funds and Embezzlement September 15, 2015 9:44 am by: Staff Report Category: Crime + Courts, News Leave a comment A+ / A- Latest crime and court news. A husband and wife who contracted with Los Angeles County to operate four foster homes providing care to 28 children pleaded guilty today to misappropriation of public funds and embezzlement. CSJ Kidogo, the former executive director of Little People's World, pleaded to one felony count of misappropriation of public money. His wife, Hitaji Kidogo, LPW's former assistant executive director, pleaded to one misdemeanor count of embezzlement. The pair were originally charged with 11 counts each of misappropriation of public funds and embezzlement by an officer. LPW group homes were closed as a result of the arrests. "Money intended to care for children in foster homes instead lined the pockets of the executives who ran the programs," District Attorney Jackie Lacey said when the pair were arrested at their Banning home Sept. 18, 2014. The county's auditor-controller discovered that CSJ Kidogo borrowed money earmarked for foster care to buy real estate and pay mortgages on properties not used in the foster care program. CSJ Kidogo is expected to be sentenced to six months in jail and five years probation when the couple returns to court Jan. 15. His wife is expected to be placed on five years probation. Deputy District Attorney Susan Choi said the couple had already paid large amounts of restitution and must pay an additional $109,093 to the county when they return for sentencing. Source: <http://westsidetoday.com/2015/09/15/husband-and-wife-operators-of-foster-care-homes-pleaded-guilty-to-misappropriation-of-public-funds-and-embezzlement/>

Walt Investigates: Austin Foster Kids Crisis Updated: Wed, Sep 16 2015, 10:31 PM Thirteen Texas children died in foster care in just the past two years. The state legislature raised requirements for foster parents to help weed out the people unfit to care for children. But now there is another problem. The state says there are not enough willing and eligible parents to the overwhelming number of children in the system. "I know what it feels like to be that kid that is followed around by a file and tagged as bad because of their circumstance when they're just really longing for acceptance," Carmen Todd says. Todd knows because she was a foster child who craved normalcy but suffered in silence. "Embarrassment about being in care," Todd says. "My family and my background. That was something I carried around for a long time." She says was lucky. She wasn't abused as a child but she was invisible, lost in the system. "I remember being in a home and it was as if we were just there," Todd says. Now Todd says she has a calling to help. With the assistance of a foster placement group called Upbring, she's now fostering four teenagers. "Something inside just led me to say you have to take these children because if you don't do it nobody else will," Todd says. "There is nobody else. You are it." Ron Brown is the director of Texas Foster Care. "I think there's always been a shortage, and it's getting worse," Brown says. He says the state says desperately needs more Carmen Todd's. "We get calls day and night for a home to place children because they don't have any homes," He says. There are roughly 1,700 children in Austin who need foster homes. But there are only 750 foster families in this region who are actively fostering. That means nearly 1000 children have nowhere to go. They're living in shelters or transferred miles away from home to another family. "There's about 20 percent that go out of region, and there's about 70 percent that go out of county, so that's a problem," Brown says. The farther they're placed away from home the less likely they are to be adopted. Then they age out of the system alone. Brown knows there are willing and qualified foster parents out there who are just paralyzed by fear. "I can only guess that all the foster parents that might want to do it are afraid of giving up their privacy maybe, their time maybe, and it requires a lot of resources," Brown says. Carmen says the most important resources you need are an unending supply of love and grace. "I knew going in that these kids are not what they're tagged," Todd says. She says she also knows the rest will work itself out. "These kids will be part of our family," Todd said. By Walt Maciborski Source: <http://www.keyetv.com/news/features/top-stories/stories/Walt-Investigates-Austin-Foster-Kids-Crisis-206089.shtml>

Ombudsman criticises Dudley Council's handling of foster care complaint in "shocking" report Ombudsman criticises Dudley Council's handling of foster care complaint in "shocking" report Exclusive by Bev Holder // Regional Share 1 comment DUDLEY Council has been ordered to pay compensation to a mum and her two adopted children after being criticised for failing to investigate fully a complaint about their treatment in foster care. The Local Government Ombudsman has told the council it must "review its policies and procedures to ensure it takes complaints from children with the seriousness they deserve" following its investigation into the matter which concerned two young girls, aged four and five at the time, who told their new adopted mother that their previous foster carer had smacked them, made one wear a nappy meant for a disabled child and given them cold baths. A report by the Ombudsman says the council failed to arrange a meeting with the relevant officers to discuss the complaint despite the adoptive mother raising concerns and the authority's designated officer deciding the issue should be dealt with as a serious concern. Instead, the foster carer was told about the allegations before social workers had chance to speak to the mother and children. The incident was recorded as 'unsubstantiated' and the council decided no further action should be taken. Months later the adoptive mother made the council aware of further allegations and the council held a 'position of trust' meeting chaired by an independent reviewing officer to look at whether the authority had investigated properly. Promoted stories But at that meeting it was decided any investigation might be traumatic for the children and cast doubt over whether enough evidence would be available given the time that had passed. The report says the adoptive mother tried to take her complaint through the statutory three-stage complaints process, but the council refused to take it through to the second stage - going against government guidance which states authorities must ensure any complaint proceeds through the stages if the complainant wishes it. The mother had also complained the foster carer had not forwarded to her the children's savings and memory boxes, which should have included important photographs and toys; and that some items were eventually sent to the youngsters but many, including birthday and Christmas photographs, were missing. Local Government Ombudsman, Dr Jane Martin, said: "While I recognise councils often have difficult judgement calls to make, the statutory children's complaints procedure is not optional and is there to make sure vulnerable young people's voices are being heard. "The children themselves must be central to the complaint to ensure that their needs are met." Dr Martin has now ordered the council to review how it investigates allegations and remind staff to ensure complaints are progressed through the statutory process. The authority has also been asked to apologise to the adoptive mother and agree a plan on how it will interview the children as a matter of urgency. It also must pay the adoptive mother £200 in recognition of the frustration and distress caused, and a further £200 to each child in recognition of the distress caused to them by not ensuring their carer passed on their belongings. Dudley's Conservative leader Councillor Patrick Harley and the borough's UKIP group leader Councillor Paul Brothwood have spoken of their shock at the Ombudsman's findings after only last month highlighting concerns about Dudley's children's services department which has, to date, failed to address fundamental flaws flagged up by Ofsted three-and-a-half years ago. Both, however, said they were "not surprised". Cllr Brothwood said: "It's very sad but confirms all my fears about the failure of the council's leadership team and children services. "I have been raising my concerns about children's services in Dudley for a long time now and finally the truth is coming out." Dudley's cabinet member for children's services, Councillor Ian Cooper, said: "As a local authority one of our absolute priorities is our parental role to children in care, but in this case it is clear that our own very high standards have not been met. Share article "We are currently going through a fundamental and comprehensive restructure in our children's services directorate to make sure it can meet the challenges facing local government, while at the same time, ensuring looked after children have the best care and support for their start in life. "In this case we have acknowledged the report from the Ombudsman and we will be following up the recommendations made." Source: http://www.eveshamjournal.co.uk/news/regional/13766625.Ombudsman_criticises_Dudley_Council_s_handling_of_foster_care_complaint_in_shocking_report/

White Plains group home mishandled abuse complaint Ernie Garcia, elgarcia@lohud.com 1:55 p.m. EDT September 18, 2015 Many group homes in Westchester, Rockland and Putnam counties serve developmentally disabled people and those with mental health issues. Agencies also supervise many apartments. The entrance sign for Bryant Estates, a cluster of 10 group homes in White Plains, on Sept. 11, 2015(Photo: Ernie Garcia) 35 CONNECT 13 TWEETLINKEDIN COMMENTEMAILMORE WHITE PLAINS — A group home serving developmentally disabled adults was cited by the state for bungling an abuse investigation and mismanaging at least two residents' medical conditions last year. In one case, staff at Padwe House didn't monitor a resident's severe constipation, ignored a hospital's discharge instructions and failed to document whether the resident received any medicine after an emergency-room visit, leading to a second trip to the hospital, according to state documents. In another case, a resident with an open sore on a toe received no documented medical treatment for at least a year. Padwe House, a state-run adult group home at 264A Bryant Ave. with 12 residents and 20 employees, including nurses, is one of many group residences in Westchester, Rockland and Putnam counties that serve developmentally disabled people and those with mental health issues. In addition to group homes, social service agencies also supervise many apartments for two to three residents. The Journal News obtained copies of inspection records from 2014 and early 2015 through Freedom of Information Law requests for adult group residences in the three-county area that are regulated by the state Office of Mental Health and the state Office for People With Developmental Disabilities. The two agencies released 17 reports for residences in the Lower Hudson Valley — one from OPWDD and 16 from OMH. Many of the OMH inspections cited such issues as household disrepair, messiness and inadequate record keeping. OPWDD oversees Padwe House, which has been operating since 1980. It is in a little neighborhood called Bryant Estates, a cluster of 10 group homes run by the state and by private social service agencies. When inspectors cite a group residence for serious violations, state law requires a corrective action plan that outlines how issues will be resolved to bring it into compliance with state regulations. State officials redacted portions of a corrective action plan for Padwe House dated Nov. 18, so the nature of the abuse or mistreatment complaint is unknown. The plan stated staffers received additional training to address the failures, the complaint case was reopened and greater documentation was required of attending physicians and nurses if hospital discharge orders are not followed. During a recent visit to the home, staffers declined to discuss the conditions there, saying they were not authorized to do so. Jennifer O'Sullivan, a spokeswoman for the OPWDD, would not say whether any staff members at Padwe House were disciplined, citing confidentiality issues. "OPWDD continuously monitors services and supports to ensure that high quality services are being provided and that any improvements that are needed are immediately addressed," O'Sullivan wrote in an email about the corrective action plan. "Due to strict confidentiality laws we must adhere to, we cannot comment on the individuals we provide supports to or on investigations." Barbara Masur, president of the White Plains-based GROW, a parent and family advocacy group for the developmentally disabled, said OPWDD's confidentiality rules are barriers to ensuring that group-home residents receive proper care. "This is not a single incident and it's not limited to the state-run houses or a single agency," said Masur, who was not familiar with Padwe House's corrective action plan or its lapses. "We're trying to get a family-guardian bill of rights so, when someone is sent to the hospital or emergency room, immediately the parent or guardian is notified. Across the board this does not happen." State Assemblyman Thomas Abinanti, D-Greenburgh, is the sponsor of the family bill of rights legislation, which passed in the Assembly in June, but did not advance in the state Senate. Abinanti, who was unfamiliar with Padwe House, said he plans to reintroduce the legislation. The law would give families or guardians of adults in homes for people with developmental disabilities the right to have "meaningful input" into a resident's care plan, be notified "within a reasonable time" of any event affecting a resident's health or safety, and make unannounced visits, among other privileges. "We want to empower family members to step forward and assert the rights that people with disabilities would assert for themselves if they could," he said. "There are downsides to it. It could lead to interference in the operations of the facility. I've made the decision that the scrutiny is better than the possible interference." The 16 inspection reports released by the OMH in the Lower Hudson Valley had minor issues. St. Dominic's Home in Blauvelt was cited for issues including improper paperwork, tripping hazards and cigarette butt litter on a deck. Chris Winward, St. Dominic's vice president of strategic partnerships, government affairs and communications, said the home's issues were resolved as quickly as possible, with weather permitting on outdoor issues. "We take any potential issues very seriously and immediately began to correct these concerns, putting policies in place to reduce the opportunity for error in the future," Winward wrote in an email. Rehabilitation Support Services was cited for its Pleasant Manor Community Residence in Katonah. The 12-bed facility's violations included inadequate records, one of which misstated a resident — who was actually in jail — attended house meetings. Jerry Lesczynski, managing director at Rehabilitation Support Services, wasn't sure what happened with the misstated meeting attendee, but said the attendance list could have been a printout of an outdated residents list. "They were not happy with how accurately things were summarized," Lesczynski said of the inspectors' record-keeping citations. "We used that as a training issue for staff." Source: <http://www.lohud.com/story/news/2015/09/17/group-homes-violations/71967396/>

Man arrested for allegedly hitting elderly woman at Great Neck group home Posted 9:02 PM, September 16, 2015, by Alyssa Zauderer Facebook188 Twitter4 Reddit Pinterest Email Google Randolph Bien-Aime, 26, allegedly punched a female resident, 71, in the face at the ACLD group home in Great Neck. GREAT NECK, N.Y. — A Queens man was arrested after police say he assaulted an elderly woman in a Long Island group home. According to Nassau County police, Randolph Bien-Aime, 26, allegedly punched a female resident, 71, in the face at the ACLD group home in Great Neck. The incident happened in June, officials say. Bien-Aime, who is no longer employed by ALCD, was arrested at his home on Wednesday. He was charged with endangering an incompetent person and endangering the welfare of an elderly person. He will be arraigned Thursday at First District Court in Hempstead. According to ACLD's website, the organization is a "leading not-for-profit agency that serves the needs of individuals with developmental disabilities and their families." Source: <http://pix11.com/2015/09/16/man-arrested-for-allegedly-hitting-elderly-patient-at-great-neck-group-home/>

Former group home employee charged with sexual exploitation 7 hours ago BILLINGS, Mont. (AP) — A former disability services worker has been charged with exploitation after allegedly trying to begin a sexual relationship with a 17-year-old group home resident. The Billings Gazette reports (<http://bit.ly/1iV67DJ>) 47-year-old Jason Oland was charged Thursday with felony exploitation of a person with a developmental disability. His bond has been set at $25,000. Oland had worked for the disability services organization, COR Enterprises, when he met the teenage girl. Court documents say the girl told police Oland had sent her nude photos and that they had held hands and kissed at her group home. She said she told Oland she couldn't have sex with him. Oland initially denied the allegations, but later said the teen was his girlfriend. Oland's attorney noted that Oland also has mental deficiencies. Source: http://missoulian.com/news/state-and-regional/montana/former-group-home-employee-charged-with-sexual-exploitation/article_6a5a47fa-d0a0-584e-9596-6728fdbadbd0.html

Medical Biller Sentenced to 45 Months in Prison for Role in $4 Million Health Care Fraud Scheme U.S. Department of Justice September 18, 2015 WASHINGTON—The medical biller of a Chicago-area visiting physician practice was sentenced today to 45 months in prison for her role in a $4 million health care fraud scheme. Assistant Attorney General Leslie R. Caldwell of the Justice Department's Criminal Division, U.S. Attorney Zachary T. Fardon of the Northern District of Illinois, Special Agent in Charge Lamont Pugh III of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services-Office of Inspector General (HHS-OIG) in Chicago and Acting Special Agent in Charge John A. Brown of the FBI's Chicago Division made the announcement. Mary Talaga, 54, of Elmwood Park, Illinois, was convicted in May 2015 following a jury trial of one count of conspiracy to commit health care fraud, six counts of health care fraud and three counts of false statements relating to a health care matter. In addition to imposing the prison term, U.S. District Judge Gary Feinerman of the Northern District of Illinois ordered Talaga to pay approximately $1 million in restitution. From 2007 to 2011, Talaga was the primary medical biller at Medicaill Physicians Group Ltd., a physician practice that visited patients in their homes and prescribed home health care. The evidence at trial showed that Talaga and her co-conspirators routinely billed Medicare for overseeing patient care plans (a service known as "care plan oversight" or CPO) when, in fact, the doctors at Medicaill rarely provided the service. The evidence at trial also showed that Talaga and her co-conspirators billed Medicare for other services that were never provided, including services rendered to patients who were deceased, services purportedly provided by medical professionals no longer employed by Medicaill, and services purportedly provided by medical professionals who, based on billing records, worked over 24 hours per day. According to the evidence presented at trial, during the five-year conspiracy, Medicaill submitted bills to Medicare for more than $4 million in services that were never provided. Medicare paid more than $1 million on those claims. Rick Brown, 58, of Rockford, Illinois, and Roger A. Lucero, 64, of Elmhurst, Illinois, were also convicted of offenses based on their roles in the scheme. Brown was convicted along with Talaga at trial and was previously sentenced to serve more than seven years in prison. Lucero, Medicaill's Medical Director, pleaded guilty and will be sentenced at a later date. The case was investigated jointly by HHS-OIG and the FBI, and was brought as part of the Medicare Fraud Strike Force, under the supervision of the Criminal Division's Fraud Section and the U.S. Attorney's Office of the Northern District of Illinois. This case was prosecuted by Trial Attorney Brooke Harper and Senior Trial Attorney Jon Juenger of the Criminal Division's Fraud Section. Since its inception in March 2007, the Medicare Fraud Strike Force, now operating in nine cities across the country, has charged over 2,300 defendants who collectively have billed the Medicare program for over $7 billion. In addition, the HHS Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, working in conjunction with the HHS-OIG, are taking steps to increase accountability and decrease the presence of fraudulent providers. To learn more about the Health Care Fraud Prevention and Enforcement Action Team (HEAT), go to: www.stopmedicarefraud.gov. This content has been reproduced from its original source. Source: <https://www.fbi.gov/chicago/press-releases/2015/medical-biller-sentenced-to-45-months-in-prison-for-role-in-4-million-health-care-fraud-scheme>

Operator of toddler boot camp sent to jail A woman who offered intensive potty-training classes abused a child By Gary T. Kubota POSTED: 01:30 a.m. HST, Sep 19, 2015 A Maui woman who operated a potty-training "boot camp" has been sentenced to three months in jail. After a trial, Wailuku District Judge Kelsey Kawano found Rebecca Stapp, 39, of Waiehu guilty of third-degree assault of a toddler. A Maui woman who operated a potty-training "boot camp" has been sentenced to three months in jail. After a trial, Wailuku District Judge Kelsey Kawano found Rebecca Stapp, 39, of Waiehu guilty of third-degree assault of a toddler. Source: <http://www.staradvertiser.com/s?action=login&f=v&id=328362191&id=328362191>

A third of foster children in South West move homes several times a year By Plymouth Herald | Posted: September 19, 2015 SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message A third of foster children in South West move homes several times a year Share Tweet Share Pin It Email Copy link to paste in your message / SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message Rugby World Cup: shock as Japan beat South Africa 1 Plymouth memorial service will commemorate 75th anniversary... 1 Reports of crash on Wolsley Road in Plymouth this evening 1 Comments \(0\) A THIRD of foster children in the South West move homes several times a year, new statistics reveal. A Freedom of Information request by charity Action for Children has revealed that nearly a third of foster children in the South West — more than 1,400 — move home two or more times a year. Children and young people who regularly move between foster care homes are more likely to have poor social skills, reduced education outcomes and limited future employment prospects — impacting on their mental health and exacerbating any existing behavioural and emotional issues, the charity says. Action for Children is warning that too many children in foster care are still being disrupted by repeated moves to new homes, and has launched an appeal to find thousands of new foster carers to help provide the best homes for vulnerable children at the earliest possible opportunity. Brigitte Garter, director of children's services in the South West, said: "For children in care, moving home is not just about leaving a house. It means leaving a family, friends, school and everything that's familiar to start all over again. "It is impossible to imagine the damage to a child or young person, who has already had the toughest start in life, to have to move several times a year until they find the right foster carer who will stick with them through thick and thin. "We know of children as young as four who have had to move three times in less than a year before finding a stable family home. “Sadly we know that it can be necessary to move children from their current foster homes as relationships between a carer and child can break down, especially for children who have faced the most traumatic experiences and find it hard to trust someone new. “However, too many children in care are still facing instability in their lives. “That’s why we urgently need more dedicated foster carers to help children and young people overcome trauma by helping them to love and trust again, feel safe, rebuild their sense of worth and belonging.” Anita May and Chris Gaydon from Plymouth have been fostering with Action for Children for five years. Chris said: “We became foster carers as we believe every child deserves to be loved and feel safe. “We make sure that the children who stay with us have everything they need to have secure, happy and healthy lives. It is the most satisfying thing we’ve ever done. “There are challenges, of course, as with raising any child, but I’d recommend fostering to anyone who can offer a child a warm and loving home, with Action for Children’s support it’s a fantastic thing to do,” Action for Children is looking for people across the South West who can provide a secure and loving home to children who have experienced trauma and loss. Lots of people can foster; it doesn’t matter if you’re older, whether you own or rent your home, are single, co-habiting or married, male or female or in a heterosexual or same sex relationship, but you must have a spare room and the ability to stand alongside children and young people to help them recover. If you would like to find out more about being a foster carer visit actionforchildren.org.uk or call 0845 200 5162. Read more: <http://www.plymouthherald.co.uk/foster-children-South-West-homes-times-year/story-27829953-detail/story.html#ixzz3mEfbRpO5> Follow us: @heraldnewsline on Twitter | theplymouthherald on Facebook

3 Police Officers Charged With Child Cruelty At A Boot Camp For Troubled Youths September 19, 2015 1:17 PM Share on email 3 View Comments
Photo of boot camp from Huntington Park Police Dept.’s Facebook page. (CBS) Related Tags: Boot Camp, Child Cruelty, Drill instructors, Gomez, Gomez-Marquez Larios, Lead, San Luis Obispo SAN LUIS OBISPO (CBS/AP) — Three police officers have been charged with abusing 10 children at a boot camp for troubled youths in the mountains of San Luis Obispo. Friday, San Luis Obispo County prosecutors filed misdemeanor charges against South Gate Officers Edgar Gomez and Carlos Gomez-Marquez. They also charged Huntington Beach Officer Marissa Larios. Prosecutors contend the three roughed up 12-to 16-year-olds while serving as drill instructors at a weeklong boot camp held in May. According to the Los Angeles Times, the $400 police-sponsored boot camp for Los Angeles County youth was at a military base. Parents sent their kids there to learn “the three pillars of the LEAD program: Leadership, Empowerment and Discipline.” Parents said their children reported being slapped, kicked, stomped and beaten bloody at times. One boy returned home with a fractured hand. The arrests were the result of a 2-month investigation “that included searching the cellphones, computers, vehicles, photos and belongings of camp leaders.” The three officers are on leave and are free while awaiting arraignment. Messages seeking comment from William Hadden, an attorney for Gomez and Gomez-Marquez, wasn’t immediately returned. It wasn’t immediately clear whether Larios had a lawyer. Huntington Police Chief Jorge Cisneros this is the first time he’s ever heard any accusations of this kind about the LEAD program. “I’ve been here for five years, and these are the first allegations that I’m aware of,” he said. Police have temporarily suspended the program. Source: <http://sanfrancisco.cbslocal.com/2015/09/19/3-police-officers-charged-with-child-cruelty-at-a-boot-camp-for-troubled-youths/>

Advocates address harsh reality for LGBTQ youth in state care By CR Staff At a panel discussion Wednesday night, members of Children’s Rights and advocacy group Lambda Legal addressed a grim reality: Two out of five LGBTQ youth are homeless, 14 percent are in the juvenile justice system and almost 20 percent are in foster care. LGBTQ kids who are rejected by their biological families are eight times more likely to attempt suicide. From left to right: Artist and Philanthropist Molly Gochman, Senior Attorney with Lambda Legal and Director of the Youth in Out-of-Home Care Project Currey Cook, Children’s Rights Senior Staff Attorney Christina Wilson Remlin. Photo credit: Jackie Snow. These were some of the many alarming statistics brought to light when a small crowd gathered in Manhattan to discuss the wide-ranging vulnerabilities of LGBTQ youth in state custody systems. The event was hosted and moderated by artist and philanthropist Molly Gochman, who founded the Red Sand Project — an activist artwork dedicated to raising awareness of human trafficking. While there have been significant strides made for the LGBTQ community over the past year in the United States, panelists emphasized that no federal protections currently exist for those in juvenile justice systems or foster care. “As shocking as it may be, nowhere does it say you cannot discriminate against a young person in out-of-home care because of their sexual orientation,” said Currey Cook, senior attorney with Lambda Legal and director of the Youth in Out-of-Home Care Project. Many LGBTQ youth enter foster care after being rejected, neglected or abused by their biological families because of their identities. But instead of finding a safe haven, these young adults often continue to experience the same type of treatment in state care. In New York for example, researchers found that 78 percent of LGBTQ youth were removed or ran away from their foster care placements because of hostility toward their gender identity or sexual orientation, and 56 percent chose to live on the street rather than in foster care because they felt safer. “When you’re talking about children in foster care, you’re already talking about an incredibly vulnerable group,” said Christina Wilson Remlin, senior staff attorney at Children’s Rights, noting that a disproportionate number of children of color are in foster care, and that kids in care are more likely to be from low income backgrounds. She described a heartbreaking example of a young LGBTQ man who said he felt safer on the streets than in foster care. From left to right: Children’s Rights Board Chair Alan C. Myers, Executive Director Sandy Santana, Board Member Alice Rosenwald. “He had been through nearly 20 placements, and in every single place he was exposed to homophobia, physical and emotional abuse,” she told the audience. “He found himself homeless after hurricane Katrina, squatting in houses. The roofs were caving in and the floors were falling through. He had to light fires at night to keep the rats away. He said that this was the first place he felt safe.” What can be done to protect the LGBTQ community? For starters, Remlin and Cook say there is a critical need for federal protections in juvenile justice and foster care systems. They also emphasized the need for better training and policies. “These systems don’t require that the people who are working with these vulnerable kids espouse affirming supportive attitudes about this population,” said Remlin. “The system itself is silent and in being silent it condones discrimination, abuse and neglect of these young people.” “You would think that these foster care systems are taking these children in, protecting them, and helping them heal ... but instead kids are being tortured in the very systems meant to protect them,” said Sandy Santana, executive director of Children’s Rights. “This is a critical human rights issue. We are looking to shine a very bright light on systems that have discriminatory and non-affirming policies for LGBTQ youth.” Source: <http://www.childrensrights.org/advocates-address-harsh-reality-for-lgbtq-youth-in-state-care/>

‘Enough is enough’: Troubled Long Beach group home’s lease terminated The Bayfront Youth and Family Services building on Fountain Street in Long Beach, CA on Wednesday, September 23, 2015. After three years of problems with Bayfront Youth and Family Services in Long Beach, ChildNet, the landlord, will terminate its lease with the children’s home at the end of the year. (Photo by Scott Varley, Press-Telegram) By Karen Robes Meeks, Long Beach Press Telegram Posted: 09/23/15, 6:25 PM PDT | Updated: 1 day ago # Comments A sign in front of the Bayfront Youth and Family Services building on Fountain Street in Long Beach, CA on Wednesday, September 23, 2015. After three years of problems with Bayfront Youth and Family Services in Long Beach, ChildNet, the landlord, will terminate its lease with the children’s home at the end of the year. (Photo by Scott Varley, Press-Telegram) After a three-year battle with residents, a group home housing 40 of the state’s most troubled youth will no longer wreak havoc on a Long Beach neighborhood. The director of ChildNet Youth and Family Services on Wednesday said that ChildNet will terminate its lease with Bayfront Youth and Family Services at 4151 E. Fountain St. at the end of the year, though Bayfront announced later in the day that its board of directors voted to cease operations at the Long Beach facility effective Oct. 31. Despite the changes Bayfront made to address the many issues — which included escaping teens, staff handling the youths roughly, trash strewn onto neighboring properties — nearby residents raised, it was “too little, too late,” said Kathy Hughes, the director of Long Beach-based ChildNet. “It was a very difficult decision to make, but I had no choice,” Hughes said. “I felt like ChildNet needed to end this.” The announcement comes after the Department of Social Services Community Care Licensing released an inspection report that determined that “deficiencies were observed and cited” during an unannounced visit at Bayfront Sept. 16. The report cited a “lack of oversight and program accountability by management.” Bayfront, which has been operating in Long Beach since 1999, moved from 14th Street on the city’s West side into larger digs on Fountain Street in 2012. Bayfront is considered a Level 14 facility, which houses the state’s severely mental and behaviorally challenged youths, said Michael Weston, deputy director of Public Affairs and Outreach Programs for the California Department of Social Services. It’s among more than 50 facilities statewide that carry Level 14 status. Since relocating to the Traffic Circle area, Bayfront has been the subject of numerous neighborhood complaints and community meetings. Some said they were scared to leave their homes, according to ProPublica, which last month detailed many of the troubles at the Long Beach group home. In one instance, a woman in her email to the California Department of Social Services wrote that she and her neighbors on May 11 witnessed a girl run out of the home screaming for help. “She was then tackled to the ground by one of the Bayfront staff, a male staff member put her in a chokehold,” according to the email published by ProPublica. “The male staff member held her with such force that at times this little girl was literally lifted off the ground.” Hughes said she had not heard one complaint about the property until six to eight months ago. “I figured Bayfront was being a great neighbor," she said. Community meetings involved residents, Bayfront, ChildNet, 4th District City Councilman Daryl Supernaw's office and the Long Beach Police Department. As a result, Los Angeles County suspended the admission of more youths to Bayfront, according to ProPublica. Bayfront officials said they made several changes to deal with the neighborhood's concerns, including the installation of cameras around the home and hiring a private security firm. Advertisement But Hughes said the decision to end Bayfront's lease early was a necessary one. "Enough is enough," she said. Evan Lamont, a spokesman for Bayfront, said it was too early to say where Bayfront would relocate, adding that the organization is hoping to find a somewhere close to schools and everyday services. "But an ideal location will be hard to find," Lamont said. Meanwhile, Lisa Campbell-Motton, Los Angeles County Probation director, said Wednesday that her office has been working closely with Bayfront to ensure a seamless transition of the handful of teenagers belonging to the county to other living situations. Supernaw said he was happy that he was able to bring everyone to the table to address the issue. "I'm so pleased that we got a resolution here," he said. Contact Karen Robes Meeks at 562-714-2088. Source: <http://www.pressestelegram.com/social-affairs/20150923/enough-is-enough-troubled-long-beach-group-home-bayfronts-lease-terminated>

September 22, 2015 New York Military Academy Closing After 126 Years, Boarding School Counts Donald Trump, John Gotti Jr. Among Alumni
Joanna Jaguar After 126 years, the New York Military Academy is closing its doors for good. The prestigious boarding school — which once counted the likes of Donald Trump, mob boss John Gotti Jr., famed movie director Francis Ford Coppola, and celebrated musical composer Stephen Sondheim among its ranks — has been facing financial troubles in recent year, as enrollment numbers have dropped from over 500 in the 1960s to less than 100 last year. In March, the military academy filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, but despite this, Anthony Desa, president of the board of trustees of the New York Military Academy, posted a letter on the academy's website on August 28, stating that school will indeed begin in September as usual. "On behalf of NYMA Board of Trustees, faculty, and staff, I am pleased to announce that NYMA's fall term will commence on September 14, 2015. After the great uncertainty of the last several months, this term will not only be special from the standpoint of developing future Cadets, it will be special for allowing NYMA's legacy as an exceptional preparatory academy to continue forward in great stride." The surprise for many, however, came when the academy failed to open their doors last Monday, which left parents and students struggling to find alternative schools — a difficult feat for students who would have been seniors this year, Jane Opie — whose 18-year-old son was one of those students — told the New York Times. "It was an emotional rollercoaster. When we were supposed to be visiting colleges in the spring, we were visiting high schools. My son is angry. He's still angry." Business Insider reports that there are some who are still holding out hope that New York Military Academy alumnus Donald Trump will be the school's guardian angel by offering up the $13 million the academy needs in order to pay creditors and remain open — though it's doubtful. According to the New York Times, in 2011, Trump was asked for $7 million to aid the failing academy, but the presidential candidate deemed his former school a "failing enterprise." With the New York Military Academy closing, the school and the 113 acres it sits on are scheduled to hit the auction block at the end of September. The minimum bid is $9.5 million, and the winning bidder has no obligation to maintain a school on the property. The original plan to sell the academy to a group of California-based investors fell through earlier this month when they failed come through with the promised $1.3 million down payment. Do you think Trump has any obligation, moral or otherwise, to save the New York Military Academy — the school he once credited as being the source of his maturation as a teenager? Sound off below. Image Credit: [New York Military Academy] Source: <http://www.inquisitr.com/2439018/new-york-military-academy-closing-after-126-years-boarding-school-counts-donald-trump-john-gotti-jr-among-alumni/>

Foster Families Speak Out on Child Welfare System Public News Service - MI | September 2015 | Foster parents will be at the Michigan State Capitol today to share their experiences, and offer suggestions for improving the child welfare system with lawmakers. Credit: Rodney Campbell/Morguefile.
 September 22, 2015 LANSING, Mich. — It's welcome news for some of the state's most vulnerable residents, as advocates for foster children believe the political climate is favorable for making improvements to the child welfare system. Michele Corey, vice president with the independent policy organization Michigan's Children, says some members of the Legislature have been foster parents, or adopted children from the child welfare system. The organization has arranged for a day of testimony at the Capitol today about what the state is doing to support foster families. "We're talking about foster parents, adoptive parents, guardians in some circumstances and even the birth parents," says Corey. "A large number of kids that enter into the foster care system actually end up being reunified with their birth parents." At any given time, the state has roughly 13,000 children in the foster care system. Corey says one of the most common frustrations expressed by foster youth and parents is a lack of stability, as many children are uprooted and moved several times. She says targeted investments from the state could help. "That clearly has a lot to do with how foster parents are recruited, and how guardians are supported, she says. "How we're really doing as a state, in terms of finding more permanent situations for these kids." Since many foster children are vulnerable — having already suffered trauma, abuse or neglect — Corey says the policies and choices the state makes can speak volumes. "They are more at the whim of how we're investing, how we're making decisions, than other children," she says. "We need to learn from their experiences, and learn from the experiences of their caregivers." Testimony is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. in the Speaker's Library at the Capitol. Mona Shand, Public News Service - MI - See more at: <http://www.publicnewsservice.org/2015-09-22/childrens-issues/foster-families-speak-out-on-child-welfare-system/a48231-1#sthash.oA28VczJ.dpuf>

Report: More monitoring needed of children in foster care taking psychotropic drugs Florida Department of Children and Families (DCF) Latest news and weather from Action News By Catherine Varnum A new report says children in foster care are taking psychotropic drugs, but caregivers are not following proper procedures. Those procedures were set in place after the suicide of a 7-year-old boy. Gabriel Myers was found hanging from a shower fixture in his foster home in south Florida in 2009. Gabriel's death changed the policy for the Florida Department of Children and Families when it comes to giving kids psychotropic drugs. Gabriel committed suicide in 2009 after taking two different medications intended for adults. A new report from the Florida Institute on Child Welfare at Florida State University said the state still needs better policies. Latest News Headlines from Action News According to the report, as of July, 11 percent of kids in foster care were taking at least one psychotropic drug. When 140 of those files were reviewed by the organization, in only 20 percent of the cases were proper procedures followed. The report also indicates an increase in children taking the drugs as mood stabilizers and anti-psychotics. Action News Jax has been looking into the number of kids in northeast Florida taking one or more of the drugs that include Prozac and Adderall. In Clay County, there are 24 kids, ages 8 to 17, taking the drugs. In Duval and Nassau counties, there are 119 kids, with 58 of them taking more than one drug. In St. Johns County, there were 20 kids, and there were four kids in Baker County. While the report said DCF has good policies in place, they say more monitoring needs to take place. Action News Jax has reached out to DCF for a comment on this report but has not yet heard back. - See more at: <http://www.actionnewsjax.com/news/news/local/report-more-monitoring-needed-children-foster-care/nnk8J/#sthash.hj4uGL4c.dpuf>

Police charge group home employee with rape of teenage resident Brittany Horn, The News Journal 6:27 p.m. EDT September 22, 2015 Joniequa Macklin (Photo: DELAWARE STATE POLICE) 247 CONNECT 4 TWEETLINKEDIN 4 COMMENTEMAILMORE An employee of a Middletown-area group home was charged Saturday with repeatedly raping a 17-year-old resident of the home, state police said Tuesday. Police began investigating Joniequa Macklin, 32, of Lincoln, on Sept. 4 after receiving reports of a young man who voluntarily left the group home at about 9:40 p.m. and did not return, Master Cpl. Jeffrey R. Hale said. Through interviews, police learned that the boy may be involved in an inappropriate relationship with Macklin, believed to have started in July, Hale said. About two weeks later, police received another tip that the two may be in a home in the 100 block of Bright Way in Milford together and went to the home, he said. Macklin attempted to escape from the home in a vehicle but was taken into custody, Hale said. The 17-year-old also attempted to run away but came back shortly after, he added. Macklin was charged with 10 counts of rape, interference with custody, endangering the welfare of a child, reckless endangering, knowingly abusing a resident, sexual abuse of a child by a person of trust, continuous sexual abuse of a child and driving while suspended. Lacking $86,600 secured bail, she was committed to Baylor Women's Correctional Institution near New Castle. The teenager was turned over to authorities from the Prince George's County Maryland Division of Social Services. Due to the nature of the incident, police said specific details will not be released to protect the teenager. Contact Brittany Horn at (302) 324-2771 or bhorn@delawareonline.com. Follow her on Twitter at @brittnayhorn. Source: <http://www.delawareonline.com/story/news/crime/2015/09/22/police-charge-group-home-employee-rape-teenage-resident/72646078/>

Experts: Kinship Care Better Alternative To Foster Care Posted: Sep 21, 2015 3:10 PM PDT By Jenifer Abreu, Weekend Anchor/Reporter Email Connect jabreu@wlio.com Caught up in everyday life, it may be easy to take family for granted. One organization is spreading the importance of kinship. September is Kinship Appreciation Month and on Monday, the Allen County Children Services spoke at the Exchange Club's meeting. Kinship care is a better alternative to foster care, according to experts. It's when children are placed with a relative or someone they already have a relationship with, like a family friend or a coach. In 2014, Allen County Children Services helped 71 families and one 118 children. "The children that are in kinship care experience a lot less difficulties, they are usually able to stay with family members who they know. It's a lot less traumatic for them. They are usually able to stay in the same school system," said Shelly Conrad, Family Stability Supervisor. If you'd like donate, or get involved with the kinship program, contact the Allen County Children Services. Source: <http://www.hometownstations.com/story/30082164/experts-kinship-care-better-alternative-to-foster-care>

Frustrated father pulls mentally disabled daughter from group home | Appnews | waaytv.com Frustrated father pulls mentally disabled daughter from group home Christine Flores Christine Flores Updated Sep 24, 2015 @ 9:00 Ross Pruett and his daughter, Nikki, playing in the yard. prev next Officials are threatening to decertify a dozen Restore Care Inc. group homes in Toney. The reason why, a father says he decided to take matters into his own hands. Family members who have loved ones in the facilities say they received a call from the state about relocation and very vague answers. Organizers say closing these homes would mean 35 residents could be relocated and 200 people could be without jobs. The claims stem from a review done by the Alabama Department of Mental Health that says the organization was in violation of state codes, citing safety concerns. Ross Pruett pulled his 19-year-old daughter, Nikki, from Restore Care Wednesday. Pruett says he's not upset with the facility. Instead, he's afraid of the unknown. Tuesday night Pruett says he received a call advising him the violations mean Nikki would be moving to a different home, in a different location, on an unknown day. But a phone call Wednesday only added to Pruett's stress. "I was contacted by a facility in Athens. They told me they were going to pick her up this afternoon. That is unacceptable," says Pruett. "I haven't toured the place. I haven't researched them." The state says they've filed an injunction against Restore Care, but they will not remove anyone from the group homes until a court date is set between the two parties. The Alabama Department of Mental Health says legal guardians can remove their loved ones from the facilities on their own free will. But, they would not give any further details on the violations. Source: http://www.waaytv.com/appnews/frustrated-father-pulls-mentally-disabled-daughter-from-group-home/article_edddd4c6-6263-11e5-9d1f-87b00bd79e80.html

Former employee: Clay group home for disabled adults a 'house of horrors' | jacksonville.com Former employee: Clay group home for disabled adults a 'house of horrors' By Beth Reese Cravey Wed, Sep 23, 2015 @ 6:04 pm | updated Wed, Sep 23, 2015 @ 8:56 pm Photos Provided by BASCA website/bascainc.org The state Agency for Disabled Persons has ordered the emergency closure of the Pine Forest group home in the Orange Park area because of "health and safety" issues. The group home, which houses six profoundly developmentally disabled men, is run by BASCA, an Orange Park-based nonprofit. The Fleming Island group home where reports of violence led to a state investigation and the home's emergency closure in August was a "house of horrors" for its profoundly disabled adult male residents, according to a former employee. Although the home on Pine Forest Drive was designated as "behavior-focused," staff members were not trained and licensed in how to handle the residents' sometimes aggressive behavior, said Claudette Barger, who worked there 18 months. Her early August departure stemmed in part from the group home closure — "I was told not to come back," she said — and from her own frustrations at management failing to address her concerns about conditions there. The lack of staff training, she said, led to violence on the part of at least one resident, who Barger worked with as a one-on-one day-care trainer. "That's why he was doing these things," she said Wednesday. "He was abused. ... They were getting hurt left and right. They had no behavior plan. They didn't know what to do with him." The Pine Forest location was one of four group homes run by BASCA, an Orange Park-based nonprofit that serves intellectually and developmentally disabled adults. The closure was rescinded Monday under a settlement with the state Agency for Persons with Disabilities. BASCA attorney Ashton Scott, who has acted as spokesman for the nonprofit during the investigation, said staff at the group home had standard training and were scheduled to receive additional behavior training when the closure occurred. He denied that any resident became aggressive or was hurt because of lack of staff training. He said Pine Forest would be reopened shortly, with the additional training and monitoring mandated in the settlement. Barger said the 31-year-old resident who became violent was autistic, but intelligent. "He knew what he needed," she said. "If he had cancer and was denied services ... people would be outraged." Also, there was no indoor access to — or air conditioning in — the bathroom at the nearby church space where the Pine Forest residents received life-skills training. Scott said there was a covered walkway to the bathroom. Teri Herzog, whose grandson lived at Pine Forest until it closed, echoed Barger's complaints about the lack of staff training. Her 26-year-old grandson, who is autistic, never attacked anyone else at the group home, she said, but hurt himself and did property damage. "Nobody listened, until now," she said. When she raised concerns with John Cone, BASCA's founder and executive director, she got nowhere. "Anytime you didn't agree with him, he would say, 'Leave,'" she said. BASCA also received state money for her grandson to receive a one-on-one day-care trainer, but that help was never provided, she said. "They didn't do what they were supposed to do," she said. "I am never going back to that place. ... It was a nightmare." Her grandson is now living in a group home run by another agency. The staff are properly trained and he is happy, she said. Scott said BASCA met or exceeded staff requirements, including one-on-one assistance, and "appropriately" used all state funding. Barger and Herzog said they decided to go public with their stories — and the residents' — after learning the details of the settlement agreement. The agreement requires more training and monitoring for BASCA personnel, among other things, but allows Cone to remain on staff. He will be barred from direct management responsibility, access to the group homes or have direct contact with the people who live there — other than his own disabled son. Instead, Cone will focus on program development and fundraising. The group home access restrictions also apply to one of Cone's top staffers, Jonnie Scott. But Barger, who discussed her concerns with state staff Tuesday, said leaving Cone on staff was a mistake, given his history. The state order that initially closed Pine Forest on Aug. 7 stemmed from complaints about how BASCA and Cone handled repeated violence by the particular resident toward other residents and staff members. Staff were told not to report the incidents to the state or call 911, but to call Cone, who was injured himself when he attempted to restrain the violent resident, according to the order. Reports that were prepared about those and other incidents were altered or not filed at all, according to the order. Not so, said Scott. "Allegations of incident report violations have already been raised by, investigated by and settled with the APD [Agency for Persons with Disabilities]. There has been no finding that such occurred, no admission that such occurred, and BASCA denies any violation occurred in regard to incident reports," he said. BASCA did not object to the organizational restructuring, which was already "occurring in practice," according to a statement from the nonprofit. BASCA objected to the group-home access restrictions on Cone but acquiesced to "facilitate" a settlement, according to the statement. "It is a sacrifice that Mr. Cone encouraged BASCA to accept, despite BASCA's knowledge that the alleged violations ... were unsubstantiated," it said. BASCA did not object to training and monitoring mandated in the settlement. "Additional training is always beneficial and monitoring, while unnecessary, does not hamper BASCA's mission," according to the statement. The settlement not only lifted the Pine Forest closure order, but also the planned termination of BASCA's Medicaid waiver, which allows providers to be reimbursed by Medicaid for their services. A separate investigation by the Clay County Sheriff's Office remains under way. BASCA was founded in 1994 as Baptist Association for Special Children and Adults and now goes by the acronym. Beth Reese Cravey: (904) 359-4109 Source: <http://jacksonville.com/news/metro/2015-09-23/story/former-employee-clay-group-home-disabled-adults-house-horrors-residents>

California prison advocates say suicide checks are inhumane treatment Since August, inmates at Pelican Bay state prison say they have been awoken every half hour by guards in a practice that amounts to sleep deprivation. Former prisoners carry a sign during a rally in Oakland, California, earlier this month. Photograph: Robert Galbraith/Reuters Halima Kazem in San Francisco Friday 25 September 2015 11:52 EDT Last modified on Friday 25 September 2015 12:05 EDT Less than a month after inmates at a California maximum security prison reached a landmark settlement to curb decades-long solitary confinement, inmates and their advocates are protesting against another new policy that they say is subjecting them to inhumane treatment. Since August, inmates at Pelican Bay state prison say they have been awoken every half-hour by prison guards in a practice that amounts to sleep deprivation. The policy, known as security and welfare checks, requires prison guards to check on inmates in segregated housing, including solitary confinement cells, every 30 minutes to make sure they are not injuring themselves or trying to kill themselves. A CDCR spokesperson said the checks are based on a 1995 court order in a class action lawsuit (Coleman v Brown) between a group of prisoners with severe mental disorders and the state of California, which determined that CDCR wasn't providing adequate care to prisoners with mental illness. Prison officials say the suicide checks started in other prisons in 2006 but were implemented less than two months ago on 3 August at the Pelican Bay prison in northern California. The timing has raised the ire of inmates and their families, occurring a month before advocates reached the settlement to curb solitary confinement measures that sparked numerous hunger strikes and national campaigns to end a practice many consider inhumane. "Being in the SHU [secure housing unit] is hard as it is ... being by yourself and isolated, but it's torture when you can't sleep because of the nonstop banging of the metal doors, stomping by the guards, buzzers, and the guards shining a flashlight in your eyes two times an hour," said Akili Mims, a Los Angeles resident who was released from Pelican Bay's SHU on 5 September, more than a month after the checks were implemented. Inmates in the SHU, otherwise known as solitary confinement, spend 22-23 hours in a windowless 8ft by 10ft concrete room, and are denied all physical contact with visitors, phone calls, and educational and recreational programs. There about 2,700 inmates currently in Pelican Bay, about 1,200 in the SHU and another 350 in other segregated and psychiatric units. Facebook Twitter Pinterest A cell in the secure housing unit of Pelican Bay state prison in Crescent City, California. Photograph: Reuters

Terry Thornton, a spokeswoman for the CDCR said the agency received complaints from Pelican Bay prisoners as soon as the checks started and that the department has provided ear plugs for the inmates and softer shoes for the guards so they make less noise going up and down prison stairs. "I visited my son in the Pelican Bay SHU on 12 September and he is going crazy from not being able to sleep. I've never seen him like this. He couldn't think and he fell asleep while I was talking with him from across the glass partition," said Dolores Canales, whose 38-year-old son John Martinez has been in the Pelican Bay SHU since 2011 for allegedly being affiliated with a gang. Canales and a group of about 20 other protesters gathered in front of the Pelican Bay prison on Wednesday with banners reading: "Sleep deprivation is Torture." Through his attorneys, Martinez has written to CDCR leadership saying that the checks are in violation of his rights, under the US constitution's eighth amendment, which bans cruel and unusual punishment. "Our client is being treated like a prisoner of war, in a torture interrogation facility, when he is not allowed to sleep for more than 30 minutes at one time," says a letter from Martinez's attorney representative, Deborah Cain, to the CDCR chief ombudsman, Sara Malone, on 28 August. Canales says that Martinez is serving time for second-degree murder, which he was convicted of more than 20 years ago. He has also served 10 years in the SHU in the California state prison in Corcoran, central California. Steven Fama a staff attorney at the Prison Law Office, said the court ruling, Coleman v Brown, doesn't specifically order CDCR to do the checks and that it is up to CDCR what kind of suicide monitoring system they develop. Fama said he and other attorneys in his office are concerned about the health of the Pelican Bay prisoners affected by the checks. In a 31 August email to CDCR leadership, attorneys at the Prison Law Office said that they "received multiple credible reports from multiple prisoners that custody officers in the SHU are intentionally awakening each and every prisoner in the SHU every 30 minutes through not only aggressive use of the Guard One wand system and excessive stomping/key jingling noise throughout the rounding, but also by repeatedly slamming the door to the Pod, and shining their flashlights into every prisoner's eyes". "Once they [the guards] finish one round they have to start another. They hate it and so they take it out on the prisoners," said Mims. Canales and other prison rights advocates say the implementation of the checks is not a coincidence. "The case that this policy is based on is from 2006 but I think it is the prison system retaliating against prisoners in solitary confinement who supported the Ashkar case," said Canales, the mother of prisoner John Martinez. Canales is referring to the legal settlement on 1 September that ended the state's ability to indefinitely lock up prisoners in solitary because of their "status" – having been labelled as gang members or associates of gangs. The new system will only allow prisoners to be placed in solitary for set terms if they have committed a serious crime in prison or are proven to be physical threats to other prisoners. Thornton says the new checks are not connected to the Ashkar settlement but didn't answer questions about why the checks started at the Pelican Bay SHU almost nine years after the court order was issued. Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/us-news/2015/sep/25/california-prison-suicide-checks-inhumane-treatment> (HEAL NOTE: This practice is equally inhumane when done in "treatment" settings, including youth "treatment" settings.)

Buffalo may consider boarding schools By Mike Desmond • Sep 28, 2015 Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email The Buffalo School Board is fighting over boarding schools for the most fragile children and this time the superintendent is interested. Listen Listening... 0:00 / 0:55 Mike Desmond reports Kriner Cash supported the idea when Memphis superintendent. School Board Member Carl Paladino has long pushed for boarding schools, citing the SEED schools in Washington and some other public examples. The idea hasn't gone far in the past but he's bringing it up again. City Schools Superintendent Kriner Cash cites the potential value to homeless students and the availability of vacant schoolhouses for space. Buffalo Schools Superintendent Dr. Kriner Cash. Credit WBFO News file photo Paladino said boarding offers an option to many students who have few options for a better life. "Many of the students in the BPS are from highly at-risk homes or are characterized as homeless and statistics bear out that without appropriate guidance, nutrition, development of study habits and exercise from a young age, at-risk students are not given a fair opportunity for education and become doomed to failed lives," Paladino said. Cash has agreed to study how much need there is here for a boarding school. The proposal is strongly opposed by some members of the school board and has been strongly opposed in the past. Source: <http://news.wbfo.org/post/buffalo-may-consider-boarding-schools#stream/0> [HEAL NOTE: This is a huge problem. Instead of supporting families and keeping families together, the public schools are considering ripping children from their families entirely. This is unacceptable.]

For private foster agencies, a new layer of scrutiny Brett Kelman, The Desert Sun 9 a.m. PDT September 28, 2015 Adina, a 23-month-old Imperial County girl, poses for this undated photo. Adina died in privatized foster care in December 2014. (Photo: Submitted photo) 339 CONNECT 16 TWEETLINKEDIN 4 COMMENTEMAILMORE Adina, a 23-month-old girl, lay on the floor in the darkened bedroom of a Calexico home, alone. It was Dec. 9, and she was slipping away as blood pooled inside her skull, the result of a powerful blow to her forehead. Two days later, Adina was declared dead at a hospital in San Diego. A coroner's report said she may have bashed her head on the floor while jumping between two beds in the bedroom, but officials couldn't be certain. There were no witnesses and no proof. One fact was clear, however. Adina's death was a dramatic failure of the foster system that has grown to depend heavily on privatized care. A rambunctious toddler, who had a habit of jumping on furniture, was left unsupervised in a room with two beds. After Adina was injured, her foster parents called 911, then hung up, then didn't call back for nine minutes. And finally, although foster parents are required to know CPR, law enforcement documents say these parents didn't know the basics. "They were supposed to keep my granddaughter safe, and they failed," said Scott Faris, 46, Adina's grandfather. "The county is ultimately responsible for the child, who is in their care, whether they hand it off or do it themselves." Adina died in the hands of Alba Care Services, a nonprofit corporation that runs about two dozen foster homes spread throughout Riverside and Imperial counties. Over the last 30 years, corporations like Alba — called Foster Family Agencies, or FFAs — have grown to eclipse California's public-run foster care, creating a $300 million industry. For some, that unbridled growth has sparked concerns about foster home standards and the perils of profiteering in foster care. California lawmakers responded this month with unanimous support for increased standards in the private foster system. A new bill, which is likely to become a new law, will require all foster family agencies to seek accreditation by 2017. DESERT SUN They stumbled upon a child porn ring, then did nothing This mandate will bring a wave of change to Riverside County, where only 6 of 30 existing FFAs are accredited. Over the next 15 months, these agencies will need to either open their doors to accreditors — who will scrutinize their recruiting, training and oversight procedures — or close their doors for good. Ideally, the process will weed out any substandard or unscrupulous agencies, according to proponents of the bill. "I suspect there will be some agencies that just roll over and say – 'I'm not going to do this anymore,'" said Carroll Schroeder, executive director of the California Alliance of Child and Family Services, a statewide trade association that accepts FFAs as members, but only if they are accredited. "Accreditation is a little bit like getting an audit. You can try to cheat on it, but you can't cheat on it for very long," Schroeder added. The new legislation is AB 403, a far-reaching bill that seeks to reform California foster care on several fronts. Gov. Jerry Brown hasn't taken a public stance on the bill, but even if he were to veto it, lawmakers already have more than enough votes to override the veto. Under the proposed law, FFAs must receive accreditation from one of several accrediting companies, chosen by the state. FFAs that can't meet the 2017 deadline can seek a two-year extension. But, even with that leeway, accreditation will be a difficult hurdle for FFAs, said Sandra Austin, the founder of a local foster agency. Buy Photo Sandra Austin is the CEO of Family Health and Support Network, a foster family agency in Palm Desert. She believes that foster reform is necessarily, but worries that mandated accreditation will be too expensive for some agencies. (Photo: Jay Calderon/The Desert Sun) Austin is the CEO of Family Health and Support Network in Palm Desert that began in 2004 and runs 39 foster homes in Riverside, San Bernardino and Orange counties. Austin believes wholeheartedly that reform is needed to improve overall quality of foster care, but worries the accreditation process will be too pricey and too cumbersome for some smaller agencies. The law designed to squeeze out substandard caregivers might inadvertently shut down some first-rate ones too, Austin said. "I believe in setting standards," Austin said. "But it would be really cool if the state or the county would offer some assistance with the accreditation process and the cost." Accreditation costs vary based on the size of each individual FFA. However, even for smaller agencies, the fees amount to thousands of dollars per year. Although AB 403 has been widely supported, not everyone is convinced the accreditation mandate will make a huge difference. Audrey Karen Brandon, 19, a former Riverside County foster kid, worried that accreditation would become just another bureaucratic box to check. Eleven years ago, Brandon spent a year in private foster care in Colorado, a state that uses FFAs just like California. Sometimes her foster mother would punish her by making her pull cacti with her bare hands. Sometimes she was made to sleep outdoors. Would accreditors have caught that? Maybe, but Brandon has her doubts. "I feel like there is pretty much a way out of anything," she said. "If somebody goes to get a smog check, they can get it written off if they know the right person. I really don't think this would be any different." "It's worth a shot, but I don't think it's a guarantee it's going to improve anything." Buy Photo The entrance to a Riverside County Department of Public Social Services building in Rubidoux. (Photo: Brett Kelman, The Desert Sun) 'Money-makers' California's foster family agencies first boomed during the crack epidemic of the late '80s, which overwhelmed the existing public foster system. Privatized foster care has continued to grow since then, and today the state has about 250 of these agencies — plus another 170 “sub-agencies” — licensed by the state. Together, these agencies house a majority of California foster children who are not placed with a relative or guardian. In Riverside County, there are more than 1,500 children in FFA homes, and they outnumber the kids in traditional foster homes five to one. In return for housing all those children, the FFAs receive more than $30 million per year from the county. Those numbers are no surprise to Silvia Signoret, a longtime Palm Springs foster parent who leads For the Children, a local foster parent support group. Signoret said the public and private foster systems are both capable of producing good and bad homes, but the FFAs are much better at recruiting than their public counterparts. The Coachella Valley faces a constant shortage of foster parents, so it is no wonder that many kids — and so much money — go to FFAs. “The FFAs are money-makers,” Signoret said. “But they have to exist because the county does such a poor job of recruiting and keeping foster parents.” The Riverside County Department of Public Social Services said in a written statement that it has an ongoing need for foster parents, and recently tapped state funding to prepare a countywide recruiting plan. SOURCE: UC Berkeley data, as of April 1 CHART: Robert Hopwood, The Desert Sun Foster care, by the numbers There are more than 4,500 children in Riverside County foster care. About 1,500 of those kids have been placed with relatives, who were licensed as foster parents. Of the rest, half are in privatized care. SOURCE: UC Berkeley data, as of April 1 CHART: Robert Hopwood, The Desert Sun Foster care, by the numbers There are more than 4,500 children in Riverside County foster care. About 1,500 of those kids have been placed with relatives, who were licensed as foster parents. Of the rest, half are in privatized care. The plan involves new public service announcements, social media and prominent local officials, the agency said. “We are constantly recruiting foster and adoptive homes, because we can never have too many and we sometimes lose foster families who end up adopting a child in their care,” the statement said. “In those instances, it is still a positive outcome, because a child has a permanent family.” In a traditional foster care system, a parent who wants to help foster kids is first trained, vetted and licensed by either the California Department of Social Services, or in some cases, a county subsidiary agency. Once a foster parent is licensed, a county social worker will place children in the home as necessary. Parents receive a monthly stipend of $688 to $859, depending on the age of the child. In the privatized system, parents are not licensed by the state but are instead recruited and “certified” by their individual FFAs. The agencies also employ their own social workers, who place children and oversee care. In return, the county gives the FFA a larger stipend, between $1,789 and $2,060 per child, each month. Half of that money is passed on to foster parents, but the rest stays with the FFA, paying for social workers and administrators. Of the FFAs that operate in Riverside County, at least one third pay their CEOs a salary of $150,000 or more, according to tax filings reviewed by The Desert Sun. In the eyes of critics, this system is ripe for abuse. Because FFA revenue is based entirely on foster stipends, these organizations have a business incentive to take as many children as possible. Potentially, an unprincipled FFA could lower its recruiting standards so it could hire more foster parents, take more foster children and collect more revenue. DESERT SUN They stumbled upon a child porn ring, then did nothing “To me, it just seems like asking for trouble, because they have, by definition, a need to stay in business,” said Gerald Singleton, a civil rights attorney who specializes in cases of maltreatment in foster care. Singleton is representing Adina’s family in a lawsuit against Alba Care Services and Imperial County. Alba CEO Antonio Romero declined to comment on the death or the lawsuit. In court, Alba has denied all wrongdoing and cited a dozen legal defenses. Singleton argues that Adina’s death is just one example of the dangers of injecting profitability into foster care. But others say the issue isn’t that simple, and that lawsuits like the one against Alba show exactly why. Jill Duerr Berrick, a foster care expert at UC Berkeley, said that FFAs are liable for the parents they recruit, so they have a business incentive to raise standards, not lower them. Any agency that cuts corners to recruit more parents risks losing far more in the courts than it stands to gain in county stipends, Berrick said. “Applying the standard economic model to this field doesn’t always work,” Berrick said. “Because every time you expand the number of service providers, even if it expanded your revenue, it also expanded your liability.” Reporter Barrett Newkirk contributed to this story. Reporter Brett Kelman can be reached by phone at (760) 778-4642, by email at brett.kelman@desertsun.com, or on Twitter @TDSbrettkelman. Source: <http://www.desertsun.com/story/news/2015/09/27/private-foster-agencies-new-layer-scrutiny/72945626/>

Federal judge orders ex-charter school director in SC to prison – now | The State Federal judge orders ex-charter school director in SC to prison – now Bishopville educator to go to minimum security prison known as “Camp Cupcake” Former educator wanted to stay out of prison while case is appealed but must report on Tuesday Jury found she embezzled $1.5 million in years-long scheme that robbed poor children Benita Dinkins-Robinson File photo/The State i Benita Dinkins-Robinson File photo/The State By John Monk jmonk@thestate.com LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story COLUMBIA Federal Judge Terry Wooten has ordered former Lee County charter school director Benita Dinkins-Robinson to report to prison Tuesday to start a three-and-a-half year sentence. Wooten’s order likely will end a weeks-long effort by Dinkins-Robinson, 40, a mother of two school-age children, to stay out of prison. Instead, the former Bishopville public charter school director is to report to Alderson Federal Prison Camp in Alderson, W. Va. That prison was chosen by the federal Bureau of Prisons as the best facility for her. The prison is a minimum security facility housing some 1,200 female inmates, most of whom are serving time for non-violent offenses. Financial fraudster Martha Stewart served time there in the early 2000s. It has no barbed wire fences, and some have nicknamed it, “Camp Cupcake.” After a trial in March in Columbia, a federal jury found Dinkins-Robinson guilty of two counts of embezzling government funds. In August, after hearing FBI and government prosecutors present evidence that the total she took was some $1.5 million, Wooten sentenced her to 42 months in prison. In orders last week with the U.S. Clerk of Court, Wooten rejected Dinkins-Robinson’s allegation of jury misconduct during the trial and rejected her bid to stay out of prison while her case is appealed to the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. “The defendant is directed to report to Federal Prison Camp Alderson on (Tuesday),” Wooten ruled. During Dinkins-Robinson’s nine-hour sentencing hearing in August, Wooten indicated he had little patience with her arguments for a light sentence. “She was supposed to help children who were needy, children who had a lot to gain from a good education,” Wooten said before pronouncing her sentence. Stressing the children were low-income, Wooten said, “This is a very serious matter.” Wooten has a record of giving prison time to public officials who betray the public trust. Earlier this year, he rejected a proposed plea deal that would have spared former Lexington County Sheriff James Metts a prison sentence and ordered Metts to spend time behind bars. Metts had been convicted of bribery in a scheme to let illegal Mexican immigrants out of the Lexington County jail. During Dinkins-Robinson’s March trial and August sentencing hearing, FBI case agent Julie Bitzell testified about how the former educator siphoned some $1.5 million in federal funds from the public school account and transferred it to corporations she set up and then to her own retirement accounts. She also spent the money on transactions at places like Harrah’s Hotel and Casino, Victoria’s Secret and Carnival Cruise Lines, the FBI investigation showed. Dinkins-Robinson had refused repeated FBI requests to produce invoices to show how she spent money, telling the FBI that her companies were private businesses and she didn’t have to tell federal investigators what she did with the money, Bitzell testified at the trial and hearing. The FBI’s investigation covered five years of spending at the school, from about 2007-12, during which time it received more than $5 million in state and federal funds. Dinkins-Robinson’s case focused attention on the lack of financial scrutiny and oversight at the state’s charter schools, which were established as a way to give parents more choice. Dinkins-Robinson was able to move millions in public money around with little accountability. Her school in Bishopville, the Mary Dinkins Academy, which later moved to Sumter County, was set up to help disadvantaged children. The federal money that Dinkins-Robinson stole came from the U.S. Department of Agriculture children’s nutrition programs and U.S. Department of Education funds, evidence showed. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Winston Holliday, who told the judge that Dinkins-Robinson was a “money launderer,” and Benjamin Gardner prosecuted the case. Lawyers for Dinkins-Robinson were Eleazer Carter and Johnny Watson, both of Columbia. Read more here: <http://www.thestate.com/news/local/crime/article36777144.html#storylink=cpy>

It will take more than smartphones to stop boarding school children being damaged A new claim that modern technology means boarding pupils no longer feel cut off from their parents ignores the deep and lasting effects of institutionalised abandonment Sending young children off to boarding school is a peculiarly British habit that can cause long-term damage among ‘survivors’. Photograph: Hero Images/Corbis Nick Duffell Tuesday 29 September 2015 12.03 EDT Last modified on Tuesday 29 September 2015 19.03 EDT Two things are infinite, suggested Einstein: the universe and mankind’s stupidity. Should we survive as a species, we will surely look back with horror on how we sanctioned the abandonment of children in boarding schools. We may wish we had outlawed publicity stunts such as an article in the Telegraph this week celebrating the fact that: “Today’s boarders are no longer cut off from their overprotective parents.” This is apparently due to the smartphone, which has “killed the ‘traditional’ boarding schools’ experience”, according to an “expert” who happens to be Hilary Moriarty, former director and marketing guru of the Boarding Schools Association. Moriarty seems unaware of the evidence: not one child development theory supports the British habit of sending children away from their homes. Leading neuroscientists and attachment theorists now conclude that the trauma of early boarding has severe repercussions in adult family life; the publisher Routledge has commissioned two new books on psychotherapy with ex-boarders in the past two years, as demand for informed therapeutic treatment outstrips supply. This is to say nothing of what damage boarding does within families, or that the rise of Nicola Sturgeon and Jeremy Corbyn is not unconnected to many people's despair at the politics of the public-school clique led by David Cameron and Boris Johnson. If you have to disown your vulnerability to survive as a boarder, you will be very unlikely to understand vulnerability in others. Moriarty declares: "Boarding schools have counsellors, house staff and the latest technologies." Ever since I wrote an article, 25 years ago, explaining why I began clinical work with what I called Boarding School Survivors, I still receive daily letters, mostly from ex-boarders relieved to know they were not alone in suffering, but too ashamed of their social privilege to complain. Parents also write to me. Last year, a distressed mother of a smartphone-equipped 13-year-old wrote: "Everyone is saying, 'He'll get over it, he needs to detach,' but it's been six weeks and he's getting worse, not better. I'm receiving emails and texts of great distress and he says I've just left him, abandoned him, while the staff are telling me to ignore his calls and only speak to him once a day for five minutes, then hang up on him." I also hear from despairing school counsellors. "As with a number of other children I have seen, I question [the value of] helping 'A' to cope and develop defences," wrote one. It is this adaptation to institutionalised abandonment that amputates feeling and empathy, which keeps the whole British habit going. Perhaps one day we'll look back and feel sad. The writer is a psychotherapist and psychohistorian. He founded Boarding School Survivors in 1990 and is the author of Wounded Leaders: British Elitism and the Entitlement Illusion – a Psychohistory (Lone Arrow Press, 2014). Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/science/shortcuts/2015/sep/29/take-more-than-smartphones-stop-boarding-school-children-being-damaged>

Haley, DSS chief agree to increase protections for children in foster care By Glenn Smith and Jennifer Berry Hawes Sep 29 2015 1:41 pm Sep 29 8:17 pm DSS Director Susan Alford x Gov. Nikki Haley and the state Department of Social Services' director have agreed to examine South Carolina's approach to housing foster children and adopt workload limits for caseworkers in response to a class-action lawsuit that alleges "dangerous deficiencies" in the system. U.S. District Judge Richard Gergel on Monday signed an interim consent agreement that will launch changes aimed at better protecting foster children in DSS care. It does not end the lawsuit. PDF MICHELLE H. vs HALEY PDF Final Signed Interim Relief Full settlement talks continue to address an array of critical shortcomings outlined in the federal lawsuit, said Christina Remlin, senior staff attorney for Children's Rights, one of the advocacy groups that filed the civil rights lawsuit in Charleston nine months ago. "This is a fundamental first step in reforming the system to make it more safe for vulnerable children in South Carolina," Remlin said. "This should have a really big impact." The lawsuit was filed on behalf of 11 children the advocacy groups say were abused, overmedicated with powerful prescriptions, separated from their siblings, kept in solitary confinement and fed moldy or expired food, according to court documents. The lawsuit also contends the Department of Social Services has failed to maintain an adequate number of foster homes for children in the system, that DSS caseworkers have been assigned too many cases to manage and that children enrolled in foster care have not been receiving the basic health care that they need. Haley, DSS Chief Susan Alford and attorneys for the children agreed to the following changes: DSS will conduct a study to determine how many children agency caseworkers can handle and adopt workload limits for those workers. The agency agreed to consider national standards in adopting those limits, which will apply to all workers and supervisors. The agreement doesn't address how the agency would pay for additional caseworkers. Within 60 days, DSS will come up with a plan to phase out placing children ages 6 and under in non-family group homes and treatment centers. DSS also will phase out the use of hotels, motels and DSS offices for housing foster children overnight. DSS will no longer recommend that children remain in juvenile detention simply because workers can't find foster care placement for them. A DSS spokeswoman said that Alford has been working to strengthen the child welfare system since she came into her post. The director has hired 177 more case workers and 67 caseworker assistants, aggressively recruited for those positions, increased caseworkers' salaries, restructured the child welfare division, streamlined the foster home licensing process and improved the support structure for existing foster homes, DSS spokeswoman Marilyn Matheus said. "DSS anticipates that the agreed-upon provisions of the interim relief agreement will continue this forward momentum, and DSS is hopeful that it can continue to work towards a full resolution of the lawsuit," Matheus said in a statement. Earlier this year, The Post and Courier documented a number of problems with the state's foster care system in its series "Warehousing our Children." The series cited federal data that shows South Carolina sends its youngest foster children into group homes and institutions at a much higher rate than any other state in the country. Firsthand accounts from former foster children and group home employees indicate some young people are neglected, beaten and molested in these facilities even as the outcomes of investigations into such allegations are kept secret. Meanwhile, state taxpayers spend millions of dollars a year on these facilities but have no way to evaluate which ones keep children safe because state laws shield the homes from public scrutiny. The federal lawsuit contains a number of disturbing stories alleging ill treatment of foster children. Among them: A girl named "Michelle H." was repeatedly beaten with a belt by her foster mother in Beaufort. "Ava," who was placed in the Jenkins Facility in Charleston, was deprived of food and feminine hygiene products. Also, "a maintenance worker asked Ava to take nude pictures of herself and provide them to him. Ava reported this to Jenkins staff but no action was taken." A 13-year-old named "Sammy V." was inappropriately touched by another resident after he was placed at New Beginnings of Charleston, two hours away from his biological family. "Andrew R." received no mental health evaluation at Epworth Children's Home in Richland County, but was placed on "a powerful psychotropic medication for the first time in his life. The medication is commonly prescribed to treat bipolar disorder; yet Andrew had never been (and has never been) diagnosed with bipolar disorder." According to federal data cited in the lawsuit, more than 3,000 children are enrolled in the state's foster care system. "We are talking about some of the most vulnerable children in the entire state," Remlin said. "This (interim agreement) gets the ball rolling on some real fundamental needs." The lawsuit was filed by Children's Rights, the South Carolina Appleseed Legal Justice Center and attorney Matthew T. Richardson. Although critical issues remain unaddressed in Monday's agreement, including an alleged lack of medical assessments and treatment for foster children, Remlin applauded DSS for taking a meaningful first step. "I'm tremendously optimistic we will be able to reach agreement on this," Remlin said. Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20150929/PC16/150929268>

Arrest Warrant Issued for Woman Working at Group Home By: Vicky Nguyen - Email Posted: Tue 2:29 PM, Sep 29, 2015 By: Vicky Nguyen - Email Home / Headlines List / Article An arrest warrant was issued for a Bismarck woman accused of raping a 15-year-old boy who lives in a group home where she works. Twenty-four-year-old Ethmonia Barclay was charged with felony corruption of a minor in South Central District Court. The victim told Bismarck police he was raped by Barclay several times. A detective contacted her about the case, but she declined to comment. A judge signed a warrant for her arrest on Monday, but she still hasn't turned herself in. Barclay could receive up to five years in prison and be required to register as a sex offender. Source: <http://www.kfyrvtv.com/home/headlines/Arrest-Warrant-Issued-for-Woman-Working-at-Group-Home-329977651.html>

Man charged with sexually assaulting girls in foster care YELLOWSTONE COUNTY Text Size: Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print BILLINGS, Mont. - A 68-year-old Billings man is charged with sexually assaulting two girls who are in foster care. Gary Eugene Smith was charged Monday with sexual intercourse without consent and two counts of sexual assault against the girls, ages 15 and 14. He did not enter a plea. Justice of the Peace Pro Tempore Lance Lundvall set Smith's bail at $75,000. Smith remained jailed on Tuesday. Charging documents say the girls were staying with Smith and his wife on Friday while their primary foster parents had a free weekend. Smith's wife was getting ready for bed when she heard one of the girls calling for her. They said Smith touched them inappropriately. Court records say Smith's wife told officers that he said he'd done something he wasn't supposed to do. Source: <http://www.nbcmontana.com/news/Man-charged-with-sexually-assaulting-girls-in-foster-care/35562882>

Oregon lawmakers ask scathing questions about foster kids 1 / 6 Oregon foster care dashboard A key slide on foster care safety in the Department of Human Services' May 2015 performance "dashboard" was last updated with data from June 2011. Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive Print Email By Denis C. Theriault | The Oregonian/OregonLive The Oregonian Email the author | Follow on Twitter on September 30, 2015 at 5:06 AM, updated September 30, 2015 at 5:08 AM 2015 Oregon Legislature SALEM — Oregon lawmakers have begun casting a critical eye on the state's foster care system, pressing officials to defend their ability to protect thousands of vulnerable children. The issue flared this week when the Senate's human services committee confronted the Department of Human Services over accusations that a publicly funded foster care agency abused or neglected children with little apparent oversight from state officials. Those accusations — that the agency denied food and clean bedding, used improper force, rewrote reports, tolerated mold and rodents — have prompted an internal review as well as scathing questions from lawmakers who worry children served by other providers might be experiencing similar treatment. More hearings are planned before February's legislative session. The committee's chair, Sen. Sara Gelser, D-Corvallis, said her concerns have been building for months. In June, The Oregonian/OregonLive found the department had struggled to report a basic means of keeping children safe: monthly visits from caseworkers charged with checking for signs of abuse. "Every child has the same right to safety, security and dignity," Gelser said in an interview, making clear her fears stretch beyond one provider's alleged misconduct. "How do we make sure that whatever safeguards failed in one place aren't failing someplace else?" For now, scrutiny is being heaped on Northeast Portland's Give Us This Day, which continued to take in foster children despite deep financial problems, reports of abuse and a state Department of Justice investigation over its nonprofit status. Willamette Week detailed the agency's struggles this month. State officials stopped referring children to Give Us This Day this month, citing the justice department's investigation. On Monday, Gelser invited a woman identified as a former employee, Rachel Rosas, to testify. Rosas offered fresh accusations that left lawmakers and Department of Human Services employees stunned. Rosas accused Give Us This Day staffers of doctoring time sheets and rewriting incident reports to cover up potentially abusive conduct. She said children and workers at one group home dealt with rats, flies and mold. Groceries and grooming products sometimes were lacking. Mats, without clean sheets, filled in for beds. She said the agency added cameras to bedrooms to monitor employees' use of force. But some rooms, she said, had the cameras taped over. Rosas said state workers typically dropped children off without venturing past the home's nicely renovated intake area. And if employees complained, Rosas said, managers threatened to fire them. "You've painted a pretty dismal condition for this building," said Sen. Alan Olsen, R-Canby. "Why wasn't DHS able to see through this smokescreen?" Rosas replied: "The problem is people aren't coming around to ask questions. This program had been in question before, but somehow they still keep getting clients." Give Us This Day's director, Mary Holden, said she wasn't invited to the hearing and didn't remember Rosas working for her. "Every child has the same right to safety, security and dignity. How do we make sure that whatever safeguards failed in one place aren't failing someplace else?" — Sen. Sara Gelser, D-Corvallis She defended her nearly 40-year-old agency, pointing out that the black-owned nonprofit accepts difficult foster children — kids with gang ties or sexual-abuse victims — whom other agencies often refuse to take. Holden accused the state of contributing to Give Us This Day's struggles by not promptly paying reimbursements. She said the accusations of abuse and neglect are fabrications from disgruntled workers, and she equated the hearing with "public lynchings." Lois Day, the state's child welfare director, met with Rosas after the hearing. Day faced questions from lawmakers alongside the Department of Human Services' lead licensing and abuse investigation managers. Olsen and Gelser said the department's license inspections, which happen every two years, need to be more rigorous. "We get greater scrutiny when we want a car loan," Olsen said. "Putting children in a facility that can't afford to feed them, can't afford to pay staff — to me that would be paramount when licensing a facility." Day repeatedly told them the department was looking into its rules around licensing and abuse complaints to make sure they're stringent enough. Overall, the state is responsible for more than 8,000 foster children on any given day. Beyond checking for obvious harm, caseworkers use regular visits to ensure children are receiving proper health care and adjusting to new schools. After the hearing, Gelser said the Give Us This Day case shows "a consequence of not doing" regular check-ins. The state made sure 83 percent of Oregon foster children received a monthly visit from a caseworker in May. That's up from a little more than half after 2011 but still below the state's target. Gelser said she's waiting to see what the Department of Human Services' review turns up. She worries other providers might be awash in similar accusations. "What kind of message," she said, "does that send to these kids?" — Denis C. Theriault Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/politics/index.ssf/2015/09/latest_abuse_accusations_feed.html

PBSO: Lake Worth woman slapped and choked 5-year-old with Autism | www.palmbeachpost.com PBSO: Foster care parent slapped, choked 5-year-old with autism 5:16 p.m. Tuesday, Sept. 29, 2015 | Filed in: News Comments 0 Story Highlights Family refutes suicide ruling Access to MyPalmBeachPost.com included for Post subscribers Explore NEED TO KNOW MORE? Sign up for FREE Post e-newsletters. Travel, News, Golf and more. Choose your favorites and we'll deliver. LAKE WORTH — Deputies arrested a West Palm Beach foster care parent on child abuse charges after finding a 5-year-old Autistic boy bleeding from his ear and covered in dirt and feces. Witnesses saw Janice Elaine Haye pulled over roadside on 10th Avenue near D Street in Lake Worth beating the 5-year-old Friday, according to the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office. Haye, 47, had three children and one teen all with special needs in her white Volkswagen hatchback at the time, although her relationship to the children is not clear. Janice Elaine Haye Haye is a caregiver in the foster care system, Department of Children and Families spokeswoman Paige Patterson-Hughes said. The children in her care have since been removed and placed elsewhere, she said. A witness contacted police after she saw Haye "slapping, punching and shaking [the 5-year-old's] face like a sack of potatoes," the report states. Haye told police the boy has level one Autism, separation anxiety, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and intermittent explosive disorder, characterized by angry outbursts, according to deputies. The boy had a temper tantrum in the car, which sent the other passengers — two 12-year-olds and a 14-year-old — into tantrums, Haye told police, denying that she ever disciplined them with force. She pulled over the hatchback so the 5-year-old could stand outside and cool off, she told deputies. Haye said everything happened so fast and she may have accidentally hit the 5-year-old, the report states. A second witness also contacted police to report the roadside abuse, but declined to be interviewed, the report said. When Palm Beach County Fire Rescue examined the boy, he was bleeding from his left ear, had red marks and a cut on the left side of his face and bruises on his arm and shoulder, the report states. He also was wearing dirty clothing and had feces on his pants and legs. Deputies interviewed the child, who told them that he was "being bad at school" so Haye slapped him with her shoe and choked him while in the back of the car, then gave him a popsicle to calm him down. A DCF investigation into Haye is pending, Patterson-Hughes said. Haye has no prior criminal history in the county. She was arrested and taken to Palm Beach County Jail, then released Saturday under court supervision. Source: <http://www.palmbeachpost.com/news/news/pbso-lake-worth-woman-slapped-choked-5-year-old-au/nngxC/>

Roane Academy leaders leave embattled center WBIR Staff, WBIR 4:58 p.m. EDT September 30, 2015 Two Roane Academy officials have left the embattled center. (Photo: WBIR) 2 CONNECT 5 TWEETLINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE (WBIR) Two leaders have left a Roane County residential treatment facility from which several teenage residents have run away. Omni Visions owns and operates the Roane Academy, which treats juvenile males. Over the last several months, several boys have left on their own from the center, and four employees and a teen resident suffered injuries during a disturbance at the center. Some neighbors also have expressed concern about living near the center, although authorities have said the teens at the academy pose no threat. Omni Visions said last week it would move to improve security. More: Roane Academy concerns persist despite promise of fence According to Omni Visions, facility director Mark Akers and clinical director Andrea McCarter stepped down Friday. Omni Visions did not give a reason for the resignations. It said supporting staff through the leadership transition is its top priority. A search is underway for the directors' replacements. Among the changes the operator said it would make is building a new fence around the property. Neighbors said the fence was promised before the facility received approval in 2014 to locate in the Roane County Industrial Park, but the fence was never built. The building has a small fenced-in area in the back. Source: <http://www.wbir.com/story/news/2015/09/30/roane-county-academy-leaders-leave-embattled-center/73109276/>

Judge dismisses state's case against Madison County group home accused of abuse, neglect Print Email By Crystal Bonvillian | cbonvillian@al.com The Huntsville Times Email the author | Follow on Twitter on September 30, 2015 at 8:30 AM, updated September 30, 2015 at 8:32 AM Reddit Email (File image) A Madison County Circuit Court judge has dismissed the case against a Madison County group home that state officials accused of abuse and neglect. Restore Care, a Toney-based facility that serves about 35 mentally disabled residents, will be able to continue operations as usual. In an order issued Tuesday afternoon, Judge Donna Pate said that the Alabama Department of Mental Health failed to meet the burden of proof needed to allow officials to remove residents from their homes. Pate said that the state also failed to show that the hardship caused by relocating the residents would not outweigh the benefit of removing them. "To the contrary, the Court is satisfied that granting the preliminary injunction would impose a serious hardship on the very individuals sought to be protected by the Department," Pate wrote in her ruling. The state and representatives of Restore Care, which operates more than a dozen homes in Madison County for its clients, went before Pate on Monday as the state sought a preliminary injunction that would allow it to remove the residents. Courtney Tarver, associate commissioner for ADMH's developmental disabilities division, testified that such a move is unusual, but that the volume and nature of the complaints - which included allegations of bruised residents, medication errors, delayed medical treatment and a staff member hitting a resident - warranted the state's intervention. The home had 140 complaints of abuse or neglect logged against it over the past year. Dr. Celia Lloyd-Turney, director of Restore Care, denied the allegations, saying the state had inaccurate or incomplete information and that the accusation of a staff member striking a client was not true. Family members of some of Lloyd-Turney's clients also testified that any issues pertaining to their loved one's care had been addressed and that they wanted them to remain with Restore Care. Source: http://www.al.com/news/huntsville/index.ssf/2015/09/judge_dismisses_department_of.html

Judge: Child foster care lawsuit can move forward - SFGate Judge: Child foster care lawsuit can move forward Updated 7:25 pm, Wednesday, September 30, 2015 0 PHOENIX (AP) — A federal judge has rejected a bid to dismiss a lawsuit alleging the state of Arizona violated the civil rights of nearly 17,000 foster children. Children's advocacy groups filed the lawsuit in February in U.S. District Court. It claims the state fails to provide needed mental and other health care, and enough foster homes for children removed from their families. The lawsuit names as defendants the head of Arizona's child welfare and health services agencies. The defendants had asked a judge to dismiss the lawsuit, saying it interferes with state-level proceedings. Judge Roslyn Silver denied the request this week. She says if the plaintiffs prevail, the court could fashion a remedy that doesn't impinge on decisions made by juvenile courts in specific cases. Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/crime/article/Judge-Child-foster-care-lawsuit-can-move-forward-6541842.php>

DHS flunks the common-sense test in ignoring foster-care home's red flags: Editorial Sen. Sara Gelser, pictured in this 2014 photo, chaired a hearing this week in which she and other legislators grilled DHS for its oversight of Give Us This Day, a foster-care organization. (Oregonian/OregonLive file photo) Print Email By The Oregonian Editorial Board The Oregonian Email the author | Follow on Twitter on October 01, 2015 at 3:00 PM, updated October 01, 2015 at 4:24 PM Reddit Email Get The Stump content in your inbox every Sunday. Sign up for email updates here. Sponsored Link There were red flags all around Give Us This Day, a Portland foster-care agency that housed abused kids for the Oregon Department of Human Services: Workers who were routinely not getting paid. IRS tax liens piling up. A lack of documents to show it was providing the services it claimed to. You would think DHS' child welfare employees or investigators would be all over the nonprofit corporation. But it was the Oregon Department of Justice that did the legwork to shut down the venture. DOJ's charitable activities section began investigating Give Us This Day in 2013 after it lost its tax-exempt status due to three years of failing to file IRS returns. The investigation, about which DHS had been alerted, ultimately turned up evidence that director Mary Holden used money meant for care of foster kids to instead pay for meals at steakhouses in Las Vegas, trips to Jamaica and thousands of dollars worth of designer clothes. The investigation also found some \$441,000 worth of "cash or other unexplained withdrawals" had been taken from Give Us This Day accounts. Meanwhile, the foster children often went hungry, relying on food-bank donations, according to a former employee who testified this week to a state Senate committee. The kids, some of whom were severely mentally ill and had significant behavioral problems, slept on dirty mats, lived in filthy conditions and weren't taken to counseling services, said Rachel Rosas, who worked at the home from 2011 until 2013. The attitude by Give Us This Day management, she said, was that these were "the kids that nobody wants" and that "nobody would come asking questions." Oregonian editorials Editorials reflect the collective opinion of The Oregonian/OregonLive editorial board, which operates independently of the newsroom. Members of the editorial board are Mark Hester, Helen Jung, Erik Lukens, Steve Moss and Len Reed. To respond to this editorial: Post your comment below, submit a commentary piece, or write a letter to the editor. If you have questions about the opinion section, contact Erik Lukens, editorial and commentary editor, at elukens@oregonian.com or 503-221-8142. Unfortunately, with regards to DHS, Give Us This Day's cynical assumptions were right. The agency didn't ask questions, even though the child-welfare division was well aware of the nonprofit's difficulties making payroll and paying taxes. Child Welfare Director Lois Day said her department is trying to match up Rosas' testimony with complaints the agency received and to find out what investigative action was taken. But she acknowledged to The Oregonian/OregonLive editorial board that her division did not take any steps beyond its normal monitoring and checking of children to ensure that the financial problems weren't affecting child safety. She noted that caseworkers, lawyers, court-appointed advocates and others come in contact with the children, and they expected they would have heard of substandard conditions through those channels. "We did not receive information that child safety was at risk," she said. It makes you wonder what kind of information would actually sound an alarm. A story by Willamette Week earlier this month documented a long list of safety concerns identified by Portland Fire & Rescue, several former employees and even a Multnomah County tax assessor employee. DHS' own licensing inspections uncovered problems with the foster-care agency's practices, according to the story. Even if the financial issues were the only problems the agency knew about, DHS flunked the common-sense test. How could a foster-care organization that receives $1.6 million a year from the state, according to Willamette Week, get so far behind on its taxes that the IRS would file liens? How could the agency overlook that it was the lone provider that had its state funding garnished for payment of a judgment over unpaid wages? Why would it not alert its caseworkers or its investigators to take an extra close look at the facility and make sure the kids were well cared for? Thankfully, the DOJ's Charitable Activities section took action that DHS should have pursued. Assistant Attorneys General Michelle Smith and Heather Weigler led a team of investigators that persevered in demanding documentation, interviews and answers despite months of delay, accusations of racist behavior and other roadblocks from Holden. DOJ negotiated a Sept. 18 settlement that calls for Give Us This Day to shut down, its insurance provider to pay the state $500,000 and for Holden, also known as Mary Ayala, to not serve in a fiduciary position for any charitable organization in Oregon for seven years. Credit too the legislators who are not letting this go. Sen. Sara Gelser, D-Corvallis, who chairs the Senate Committee on Human Services and Early Childhood, and vice-chair Sen. Alan Olsen, R-Canby, made clear their frustration that the many red flags set off nobody's alarm bells at DHS, as The Oregonian/OregonLive's Denis Theriault reported. The agency is now reviewing its licensing and investigative procedures as well as going through its record of complaints at the foster home, Day said. Her agency is also looking at whether it needs to bring more financial expertise in evaluating licensees. While that's worth considering, it also misses the point – it should not take a sophisticated business background for DHS to exercise some common sense. Consider for example one of the earliest exchanges between DOJ's Smith and Holden's attorney. While Holden addressed one failure right away, Smith didn't stop there, noting that "such issues can be symptomatic of larger management issues within an organization." DHS should take that sentiment to heart, both in monitoring other foster-care providers and in evaluating its own handling of this case. - The Oregonian/OregonLive editorial board Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/opinion/index.ssf/2015/10/dhs_flunks_the_common-sense_test.html

Head of foster care agency accused of misusing millions of dollars Posted: Sep 30, 2015 9:15 PM PDT Updated: Sep 30, 2015 9:15 PM PDT By FOX 12 Staff Email Connect fox12news@kptv.com Building where Give Us This Day was located. PORTLAND, OR (KPTV) - Officials said the head of a local foster care agency misused millions of dollars while needy children went without. Now, the organization has been shut down. MOREAdditional LinksPoll The agency called Give Us This Day has been caring for foster kids in group homes and placing them with foster families in the Portland area for years. Organizers relied on state funding, but investigators said the money was mishandled and one former employee told FOX 12 she can back that up. "We had to go on our own to food banks and churches and places that donated food to pick that up on our own time. When we weren't getting paid. Just to make sure the kids had food to eat, or we'd bring our own lunches and they'd beg us for our own lunches. So it was difficult," said Rachel Rosas. Rosas used to work for Give Us This Day, caring for foster kids in group homes. She said not only were the living conditions sub-par, with very little money for groceries, linens and clothes, but she said her paychecks were late on a regular basis. When she asked managers about it, they told her the state wasn't giving them their funding. Mary Holden ran the agency and had several foster parents working for her. Several of them have also complained to FOX 12 that they didn't get paid on time and are still owed money. Court documents show thousands of dollars were spent on travel, dining out, Las Vegas Casinos and clothing at Victoria's Secret and Louis Vuitton. Rosas testified before a senate committee about the agency and how money was appropriated. Just this week, the State Department of Justice signed a settlement agreement with Mary Holden, saying she will dissolve the agency, her insurance company will give $500,000 back to the state and she is not allowed to work for a non-profit for 7 years. Rosas feels that a lot of neglected children are finally getting a voice. "The foster kids will contact me. They've aged out of the program or they're homeless or they've been in jail and they just feel like, what did they do wrong? Or why didn't they get a chance? And it's just showing them that it wasn't their fault. Somewhere the system failed them," said Rosas. FOX 12 was not able to locate Mary Holden to get her side of the story. FOX 12 asked state officials if she could face criminal charges and they said they can't comment on that at this time. Read more: <http://www.kptv.com/story/30158358/head-of-foster-care-agency-accused-of-misusing-millions-of-dollars#ixzz3nSogBxq2>

Employees say former DA is now the one breaking the law Employees at a Clayton County daycare say they want to be paid a fair wage and on time. WXIA Rebecca Lindstrom, WDA 7:03 p.m. EDT October 2, 2015 Former employee wants to know if her boss is taking out taxes. (Photo: Nick Moron) JONESBORO, Ga. -- Workers at two Clayton County businesses say there's something about their paychecks that isn't right. They claim they're not getting paid on time, if they get paid at all. When they do, they say there's no indication taxes are being taken out. The owners should know the law – after all one of them, Jewel Scott, is a former Clayton County District Attorney. The other manager listed on state registration forms is Dr. Headley Scott, her husband. For the past six months Denise Lewis says she has worked full time, serving as the director of the Champion House, a group home for older teens transitioning out of the foster care system. Former employee expresses his frustration over not getting paid for more than 200 hours of work. (Photo: Mike Zakel) In that time she says she has only been paid $1,100. She has received roughly $150 a week as Administrator of another business, a daycare operated by the same people. But do the math and that's $3.75 an hour for a 40 hour week. It's well below the legally mandated minimum wage of $7.25. "I cannot afford to pay for an apartment. $400, $500. Nothing because they're not paying me," said Lewis. "He says, we're volunteers. That's what he says. It's volunteer services." Another employee showed me copies of her paychecks. In the notes field it often says "volunteer expenses." "It's a little disheartening, it's very upsetting. I'm kind of confused," said another former employee who asked not to be identified. He says he quit after the group home failed to pay him for 234 hours of work. 11Alive spoke with five former employees. All said the Scott's would tell them they didn't have the money, that parents or the state had yet to reimburse them for their services. But according to our open records request, the state says it paid the daycare more than $162,000 in the past two years and the group home more than $5,000 –

payment in full for services rendered. Now employees say it's their turn. Georgia Champion Project, just one of two facilities owned by the Scott's, where employees say they're not getting paid on time. (Photo: Mike Zake) "Not so much because I need it, but more so the fact that I earned it," said one employee. Employees also want to know why none of their paychecks show any sign of state or federal taxes withheld. No contributions to Social Security or Medicare. We asked the Scott's to provide proof taxes were being taken out and reported, but they declined. State inspection reports at the daycare the past two years show a struggle to keep enough staff and make sure that they are properly background checked and trained. One child was found sleeping in a room unsupervised. Another report says a class of three year olds was left alone for several minutes. Yet another visit revealed two year old's lumped with kids as old as eight, with only one teacher on staff. The group home officially opened in August of 2015. According to DFCS there have been no complaints about the quality of care at that location. Jewel Scott offered to meet with investigative reporter Rebecca Lindstrom, but made it clear she would not allow the conversation to be recorded either by video or audio. She was also given a chance to answer a series of questions in writing, but again refused to go on the record with any answers. She did release a brief statement however. It said: Ms. Lindstrom my response is and please feel free to quote me "you have been played." Legal counsel & CPA advise against any further response at this time. However, the truth will emerge." Source: <http://www.11alive.com/story/news/local/holding-powerful-accountable/2015/10/02/georgia-champion-project-house-jewel-scott/73230118/>

SeVon Jobs charged with texting naked pictures to teenage boy Michelle Quesada 6:38 PM, Oct 7, 2015 5:37 AM, Oct 8, 2015 Caregiver in charge of looking after troubled teens is behind bars In Loxahatchee WPTV A caregiver in charge of looking after troubled teens in the foster care system is accused of sending inappropriate text messages to a teen WPTV SeVon Jobs Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office In Loxahatchee WPTV WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. - Palm Beach County sheriff's deputies say a caregiver who looked after troubled teens was arrested for sending naked pictures to a teen he used to care for when working at the local facility. SeVon Jobs, 46, is charged with soliciting a child. A Palm Beach County sheriff's report says the 16-year-old victim looked up to Jobs as a father figure. The teen was transferred out of the facility but kept in touch with Jobs until the conversations started making him feel uncomfortable. The company Jobs worked for, Vision Quest, says Jobs was fired two weeks ago for unrelated reasons. Vision Quest was made aware of the allegations by the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office after Jobs had already been let go. "He seemed like, he was a good guy always on - work, he worked real well, worked with the kids real good," said Marcus Harwood, a current caregiver at the Loxahatchee facility. Harwood worked in the same home as Jobs, caring for a handful of teenage boys. According to Vision Quest Spokesperson Beth Rosica, teenagers under DCF supervision are placed in the Vision Quest facilities by Child Net, a company contracted by DCF. "We try to get them on the right track, sometimes they have troubled homes, and things like that, we send them to school, we give them a place to stay," added Harwood. Harwood was shocked to learn Jobs is being accused of sending inappropriate pictures and texts to a teenager who used to live at the home. "If he did do that, I have no idea that he did it cause he was always behind the desk working, doing paperwork," said Harwood. The report says Jobs started asking the teen questions about his private parts and was asking for him to send a picture. The teen became uncomfortable with the conversation and went for help. Vision Quest says it is working with the sheriff's office during the investigation. Source: <http://www.wptv.com/news/region-c-palm-beach-county/former-caregiver-in-charge-of-dcf-supervised-teens-arrested-for-texting-naked-pictures-to-minor>

$12.5 million awarded to Logan family after child sex abuse case Saturday , October 03, 2015 - 7:01 PM Image by: Comstock By ANDREAS RIVERA Standard-Examiner staff Shares: 9 LOGAN -- The family of a Logan 4-year-old won a $12.5 million lawsuit against a Utah company that helps people with intellectual and developmental disabilities after the child was sexually abused by an employee in 2008. The five-day trial against Northeastern Services wrapped up Friday, with the jury attributing at least 12 percent of the fault to the company, 85 percent to the former employee and convicted abuser, Matthew Cooper, and three percent to the victim's father. The case stemmed from an incident in which the child was invited into a group home for mentally and behaviorally disabled adults run by Northeastern Services. The child lived nearby the facility and, according to a press release from the victim's attorney, kids from the neighborhood were routinely invited to play there as part of the group home's therapy program. The news release did not state what the name of the group home was, only that it was run by Northeastern Services. The victim was reportedly molested by Cooper in a bathroom. He was arrested and later convicted of aggravated sexual abuse of a child. He is currently serving a 15 years to life in prison sentence at the Utah State Prison, according to court records. Photo Galleries The victim's family claimed Northeastern Services was accountable for the incident because it invited children into the home without parental consent and did not carefully screen Cooper before hiring him, according to the release. Cooper was reportedly fired from a similar job for abusing a disabled adult in his care. After the victim's family filed the lawsuit against Northeastern Services, the case was postponed for several years due to appeals by the company, but was eventually ordered to go to trial by the Utah Supreme Court. "On behalf of our daughter we want to thank the jury for holding (Northeastern Services) accountable for its negligence in hiring, and failing to train and supervise its employees," the victim's family wrote in a statement. "We hope this verdict will not only help our daughter meet her challenges, but that it will also send a message to all such organizations that they must act reasonably to protect our neighborhoods and our children." The Orem-based company provides day services, supported living and consultations for behaviorally and mentally disabled adults, across eight different locations in Utah. Contact reporter Andreas Rivera at 801-625-4227 or arivera@standard.net. Follow him on Twitter at @SE_Andreas. Source: <http://www.standard.net/News/2015/10/03/12-5-million-awarded-to-Logan-family-after-child-sex-abuse-case>

Group home counselor arrested for assaulting resident October 5, 2015 By BENJAMIN BRANCHAUD bbranchaud@ricentral.com WEST KINGSTON -- A resident counselor at Child and Family Services, a group home in West Kingston, was arrested Tuesday on a charge of simple assault and battery after he allegedly picked up a 17-year-old resident of the group home by his throat, pushed him against a wall and struck him twice in the face. According to police reports, Francis Zwolinski, 33, of North Kingston, a resident counselor, was eating dinner in the staff office at the group home while the 17-year-old victim sat in a separate chair in the same office. After repeatedly asking the boy to leave the office, Zwolinski became agitated and began to pull the boy out of his chair. When the boy struggled, Zwolinski reportedly struck him twice in the face and picked up the chair for use as a weapon. The victim of the assault, a South Kingstown resident, was also arrested and charged with one count of disorderly conduct and one felony charge of assault with a dangerous weapon after he allegedly fled the confrontation and armed himself with a kitchen knife. He was transported to the Rhode Island Training School early Wednesday morning. Ken Lombardi, an employee who witnessed the assault, said Zwolinski was the aggressor in the incident and described his punches as "hay-makers", the use of which violates the group home's restraint policy. Zwolinski declined the opportunity to provide the police with a statement or any information about the incident. He is due in Fourth District Court Oct. 8. A 16-year old resident of the group home was also arrested during the incident on one charge of disorderly conduct and one charge of obstructing an officer in the line of duty as he was allegedly disruptive throughout the investigation and yelled obscenities to the police throughout their visit to the group home. According to South Kingstown Police records department staff, there have been 17 arrests made on-site at the group home at 46 Liberty Lane since January of 2014. Those who list 46 Liberty Lane as their address have been arrested 26 times in the same time span. Source: <http://www.ricentral.com/content/group-home-counselor-arrested-assaulting-resident>

California foster care: New laws signed to restrict psychiatric drugs By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 10/07/2015 05:59:47 AM PDT 12 Comments Updated: 10/07/2015 06:01:39 AM PDT Drugging Our Kids Read the Bay Area News Group investigation about psychiatric drugs in the California foster care system. SACRAMENTO -- Creating sweeping new protections for tens of thousands of California's most traumatized children, Gov. Jerry Brown on Tuesday signed the nation's most comprehensive set of laws to curb the overprescribing of psychiatric drugs in foster care. For the first time, the state will train caregivers and court officials on the hazards of psychotropic drugs, scour medicated children's health records for alarming prescriptions and step up scrutiny of residential facilities that rely too heavily on the medications to control kids' behavior. Child welfare advocates cheered the long-awaited reforms inspired by this newspaper's ongoing investigation "Drugging Our Kids," which found almost 1 in 4 California foster teens receive psych medications. "When we take kids away from their parents, we become their parents, and we assume the highest obligation to ensure that those kids have the best chance to thrive in life," said Frank Mecca, executive director of the County Welfare Directors Association of California. "And these bills give us the tools to make sure that kids don't just get pills but that they get high quality mental health treatment and that their well-being is closely monitored." Gov. Brown did not comment Tuesday upon signing Senate Bills 484, 319 and 238, which were authored by state Sens. Jim Beall, D-San Jose, and Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles. Advertisement "The 'Drugging Our Kids' documentary put the state on notice," Mitchell said, "and Gov. Brown has now put the tools in our hands to ensure that foster kids in our care are not over-drugged for profit or convenience by those we pay to nurture and protect them." Will Lightbourne, director of the California Department of Social Services, said in an email Tuesday that the state has already been working on reforms. "The approval of these bills helps the state and counties continue the practice changes underway to emphasize making psychosocial and trauma-based interventions available to children and youth, and avoid unnecessary use of chemical treatment." The newspaper's investigation found the vast majority of medicated foster youth were prescribed antipsychotics, which often lead to debilitating side effects from lethargy to morbid obesity. The series showed how the state foster care system often relied on the drugs to address behavioral problems associated with trauma -- not the severe mental illnesses they were designed to treat. Under the new laws, more information will be provided to the juvenile courts where the medications are approved. And public health nurses who work with foster youth will have greater access to children's medical files, and play a larger role in monitoring medicated children's care. Beginning next year, regular reports will be produced on the number of prescriptions children have received, and whether they also received counseling services. And residential group homes that allow excessive prescribing could face corrective-action plans. "I hope that the child welfare agencies across the nation -- not just in the state of California -- will take heed and will start to implement the same laws and regulations," said Joymara Coleman, 25, an East Bay college student and former foster youth featured in the newspaper's series. Sen. Beall agreed that the legislation will likely have national sweep. "There's already a lot of discussion going on nationally on this subject and I think people are realizing that overmedication is a huge problem in group homes and the foster care system and these reforms are definitely needed on a national level," Beall said. But Michael Nash -- a recently retired presiding judge of the Los Angeles juvenile court who championed better oversight of psych meds -- urged caution. "These bills are a step in the right direction for foster children in California who are being administered psych meds," he wrote in an email. "However, they are not a panacea and do not relieve anyone who is involved with foster children from giving them any less attention than they would give their own children." Despite the progress, the legislation's more far-reaching goals were weakened following multiple amendments and intensive lobbying by associations representing physicians and group homes. Senate Bill 253, which would have called upon doctors to provide better justification for prescriptions before judges approved them, was removed from the bill package late in the legislative season. That bill, considered the most significant proposed reform, will be reactivated in January, according to its author, state Sen. Bill Monning, D-Carmel. Although physician groups pushed back against Monning's bill and many of the other bills' provisions, on Tuesday, the president of the California Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry offered only praise. "We're happy to hear that these three bills have been signed into law," Robert Holloway said. "We hope that they work the way they're intended and that they improve care." Holloway went on to say that his organization -- which fired a last-minute salvo against Monning's bill that delayed its progress -- intends to remain involved in efforts still to come. "We hope to continue working with the legislature in the next few years to keep improving the way we care for kids in the foster care system." Tuesday was a celebratory day at the Oakland-based National Center for Youth Law, which led the reform efforts. "We can cut side effects earlier, we can notice if a kid is gaining weight or losing weight, we can notice if it's having the effect it's supposed to have, and we can change their treatment if kids have an opportunity to weigh in," said Anna Johnson, the center's health policy analyst. "People will now be paying attention." Tuesday's news was emotional for former foster youths Rochelle Trochtenberg and Tisha Ortiz -- who both testified repeatedly in the state Capitol as the legislation was being considered. Ortiz, a 23-year-old college student from Hayward, said she was simply "ecstatic." And for Trochtenberg, 33, there is now a new way forward. "It's personally a piece in my healing to feel like I overcame systemic abuse and was fortunate enough to be able to have a voice in preventing other foster youth from experiencing the debilitating effects of being overmedicated," she said. "It's better healing than any drug to be part of this." Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source: http://www.mercurynews.com/california/ci_28930214/california-foster-care-new-laws-signed-restrict-psychiatric

October 8, 2015 The drugged children of foster care By Gerald K. McOscar A February, 2014 Wall Street Journal article, "Drugged as Children, Foster Care Alumni Speak Out," examines the upsurge in strong antipsychotic drugs prescribed for children in Medicaid and foster care in the past decade and a half. It should be required reading for every parent, teacher, counselor, caseworker, and judge who has or may have contact with the child welfare system. I have been a court-appointed attorney for indigent parents in the Chester County, Pennsylvania Juvenile Dependency Court for about a decade. "Dependency" is a legal term of art and encompasses truancy; aggression; ungovernability; parental neglect; and physical, sexual, or emotional abuse. For me, the most disturbing thing about these most disturbing of cases is the widespread use of antipsychotic medication to treat behavioral problems in children. Children, both in home and in foster care or other institutional settings, some as young as three and four, are routinely prescribed antipsychotic medication for a variety of disruptive behaviors, from hyperactivity and rebelliousness to mood swings and poor grades. From my observations, the majority of these kids are exhibiting normal childhood behaviors, albeit writ large, not because of mental illness, but because of the vacuum, and resultant absence of structure and discipline, caused by broken homes. In the Journal piece, David Crystal, a professor of health services research at Rutgers University, based on 2009 data from Medicaid and private insurers, estimates that 12% to 13% of kids in foster care take these medicines. That compares with about 2% for children on Medicaid but not in foster care and about 1% for those with private insurance. The largest diagnostic groups receiving the drugs in foster care in 2009 were those with disruptive-behavioral disorders and attention-deficit/hyperactive disorders. "These diagnoses involve difficulty focusing attention or controlling behavior -- but that is different from not being in touch with reality," a key element of psychosis, he says. I agree. Chris Nobles, who became a ward of Pennsylvania at age 15, is the centerpiece of the article. In three years of care, doctors treated his depression and bouts of uncontrollable anger with a steady diet of psychiatric drugs. Now in his mid-twenties, Mr. Nobles lives on his own, works full-time, and refuses any medication, "not even Nyquil." Another foster-home alum, testifying in spring of 2013 before a Senate Finance Committee roundtable discussion on psychiatric drugs, cited a list of medications she was prescribed over the years: antipsychotics Abilify and Seroquel, three antidepressants, a drug for attention deficit disorder, and an anticonvulsant. She was variously diagnosed with depression, attention deficit disorder, and bipolar disorder. "How do you develop as a person and find out who you are when you have been given all these diagnoses?" she asks. Their stories mirror that of a local 17-year-old on Concerta and Seroquel and a 13-year-old on Lithium, Risperdal, Cogentin, Zoloft, and Clonidine. Each had diagnoses consistent with Dr. Crystal's findings. There are others. Kids are not magically adults at age 18. Chris Nobles altered his destiny. Many do not. A University of Chicago study on foster alumni in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa found that by age 26, fewer than half, 47%, were employed; most of those who worked earned less than $12 an hour. Many had been sporadically homeless. They are also the parents of the next generation of dependent children. The Journal report highlights the groundswell of foster-care alumni sounding the alarm about how freely psychiatric drugs are doled out to kids. It's long past time. A February, 2014 Wall Street Journal article, "Drugged as Children, Foster Care Alumni Speak Out," examines the upsurge in strong antipsychotic drugs prescribed for children in Medicaid and foster care in the past decade and a half. It should be required reading for every parent, teacher, counselor, caseworker, and judge who has or may have contact with the child welfare system. I have been a court-appointed attorney for indigent parents in the Chester County, Pennsylvania Juvenile Dependency Court for about a decade. "Dependency" is a legal term of art and encompasses truancy; aggression; ungovernability; parental neglect; and physical, sexual, or emotional abuse. For me, the most disturbing thing about these most disturbing of cases is the widespread use of antipsychotic medication to treat behavioral problems in children. Children, both in home and in foster care or other institutional settings, some as young as three and four, are routinely prescribed antipsychotic medication for a variety of disruptive behaviors, from hyperactivity and rebelliousness to mood swings and poor grades. From my observations, the majority of these kids are exhibiting normal childhood behaviors, albeit writ large, not because of mental illness, but because of the vacuum, and resultant absence of structure and discipline, caused by broken homes. In the Journal piece, David Crystal, a professor of health services research at Rutgers University, based on 2009 data from Medicaid and private insurers, estimates that 12% to 13% of kids in foster care take these medicines. That compares with about 2% for children on Medicaid but not in foster care and about 1% for those with private insurance. The largest diagnostic groups receiving the drugs in foster care in 2009 were those with disruptive-behavioral disorders and attention-deficit/hyperactive disorders. "These diagnoses involve difficulty focusing attention or controlling behavior -- but that is different from not being in touch with reality," a key element of psychosis, he says. I agree. Chris Nobles, who became a ward of Pennsylvania at age 15, is the centerpiece of the article. In three years of care, doctors treated his depression and bouts of uncontrollable anger with a steady diet of psychiatric drugs. Now in his mid-twenties, Mr. Nobles lives on his own, works full-time, and refuses any medication, "not even Nyquil." Another foster-home alum, testifying in spring of 2013 before a Senate Finance Committee roundtable discussion on psychiatric drugs, cited a list of medications she was prescribed over the years: antipsychotics Abilify and Seroquel, three antidepressants, a drug for attention deficit disorder, and an anticonvulsant. She was variously diagnosed with depression, attention deficit disorder, and bipolar disorder. "How do you develop as a person and find out who you are when you have been given all these diagnoses?" she asks. Their stories mirror that of a local 17-year-old on Concerta and Seroquel and a 13-year-old on Lithium, Risperdal, Cogentin, Zoloft, and Clonidine. Each had diagnoses consistent with Dr. Crystal's findings. There are others. Kids are not magically adults at age 18. Chris Nobles altered his destiny. Many do not. A University of Chicago study on foster alumni in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa found that by age 26, fewer than half, 47%, were employed; most of those who worked earned less than $12 an hour. Many had been sporadically homeless. They are also the parents of the next generation of dependent children. The Journal report highlights the groundswell of foster-care alumni sounding the alarm about how freely psychiatric drugs are doled out to kids. It's long past time. Source: http://www.americanthinker.com/blog/2015/10/the_drugged_children_of_foster_care.html

Kids in care want foster family stability and contact with their siblings Duncan Barry Saturday, 10 October 2015, 11:00 Last update: about 2 days ago Children who live in institutions want more stable placements with foster families and to remain in contact with their siblings. The findings came out of consultation meetings chaired by Marie-Louise Coleiro Preca when she was family minister, at a time when the Child Out-of-Home-Care Protection Bill was first drafted. Speaking to The Malta Independent, Paul Gatt, who is the president of the Foster Care Association, questioned whether the Family Ministry and the Justice Ministry will consult with the association on the new amendments which are being done to the long-awaited bill. "If there's anyone who does understand children in foster care, it is us," Mr Gatt said, hoping that the government will introduce permanent fostering as part of the bill. He said that the ministry only consulted with the association briefly and after "umpteenth calls to meet up with the family ministry recently regarding new amendments to the bill have so far fallen on deaf ears". Mr Gatt said that when he sent an e-mail to the ministry recently to see what had become of the bill, he was told that it is to be discussed by Cabinet. The government is currently reviewing amendments to the long-awaited Child Out-of-Home-Care Protection Bill. However, before the summer it was still contemplating whether or not to include permanent fostering in the bill. The bill has not yet been discussed in parliament, despite the fact it was presented in March 2014 by then minister Coleiro Preca. Dr Farrugia had assured this newsroom in an interview that by the end of summer the amendments should have been reviewed together with the Ministry of Justice, since it is being proposed that care orders will be issued by the courts. Summer is over and The Malta Independent sent questions to Dr Farrugia on whether the bill will be presented in parliament sometime soon and if he will be roping in the foster care association, among others, on any new amendments. In reply to our questions, the ministry said that the child protection bill is being concluded together with the Ministry of Justice. Amendments will be passed to the Opposition prior to discussion at second stage "as we did with the counselling bill". The ministry also said that amendments to the fostering law will be discussed with all concerned. Mr Gatt also claimed that he spoke to the Prime Minister in person to set up a meeting, but that hasn't yet materialised so far either. Benefits of permanent fostering Mr Gatt explained that placement stability for children in out-of-home care is a priority. "Children cannot move forward and begin to heal the psychological wounds caused by the traumatic experiences they would have been through, unless they are offered peace of mind through stability and permanence in their placements. "Permanent fostering will do the job since children will no longer feel a lack of belonging," he explained. He said research shows that multiple placement changes can have important ramifications on children's development. Therefore, placement stability is important for children to develop healthy secure relationships and reduces any potential stressors that may arise from multiple placement changes. Youths who experience minimised placement changes are more likely to experience fewer school changes as well as less trauma and distress, research conducted by foreign experts shows. Mr Gatt said it is important that child welfare agencies find safe permanent homes for children who are in out-of-home care as quickly as possible. He pointed out that international research shows that state residential care is not ideal for most children. Explaining further, he said that those caring for children at residential homes run by the state work on a shift basis. "Does it make any sense for children to be woken up by a different person each day. How will this instil a sense of stability in children," he asked. Some children prone to abuse by natural parents He said that the natural parents of children may be experiencing issues such as substance abuse, mental illness, or domestic violence which can potentially lead to mistreatment and neglect of the child. He said it is of paramount importance to see that the process of children being reviewed by social workers is as swift as possible and a stable environment sought. It is also vital that a multidisciplinary team to review such cases is roped in, he added. On the fact that Minister Farrugia said that added financial help will be given to foster parents who accept to care for siblings, Mr Gatt pointed out that while agreeing that where possible, siblings are kept together in principle, each child should be assessed on an individual basis as it is not always good for children to continue living together. Dr Farrugia had pointed out that siblings are not kept together in all cases. "It is only if the board entrusted to review such cases advises that it is best that in certain cases siblings live together under one roof that we will go for this option. "One thing that bothers me is when siblings are separated. We have opened and concluded discussions with the Church regarding the Hamrun Fra Diegu home which has started catering for siblings. "This home has dormitories which allows young siblings to live together but when they reach a certain age, they are moved to another dormitory for boys and girls separately, but remain living in the same building. "The fact that they are living under one roof can help them interact with each other, giving them the opportunity to continue to integrate," Dr Farrugia had said. This is where the Foster Care Association is not in agreement with the Minister. Paul Gatt explained that in situations where children require long-term care for a long time, possibly throughout their childhood, it does not make sense to place them in a residential home set-up if there is the possibility for them to be placed with foster carers on an individual basis. While each family situation is to be assessed individually, the benefits of being brought up in a family environment, with the opportunities this usually offers children, should not be underestimated. Mr Gatt went on to say that the longer the bill will take to be drafted and presented, the more children will suffer. "Time is flying and the children involved are growing up," Mr Gatt said. "They have waited long enough," he continued. What does permanent fostering mean exactly? Permanent fostering is when children will stay with their foster family until they reach the age of 18 and, for many, will continue to be part of that family well beyond then. The importance of permanency in fostering: Permanency enables the child to develop a sense of [emotional] security while in care. Stability is important because it allows children to 'put down roots' and develop a network of relationships and because, as Jackson and Thomas (1999) outlined, it is likely to be a pre-condition for continuity in schooling, friendships, health care, and familiarity with the neighbourhood and local community. Source: <http://www.independent.com.mt/articles/2015-10-10/local-news/Kids-in-care-want-foster-family-stability-and-contact-with-their-siblings-6736143173>

Far-Reaching Bill Promises Overhaul of Calif. Group Homes by Jeremy Loudenback October 12, 2015 California Gov. Jerry Brown signed legislation yesterday that aims to drastically reduce the number of children placed in group homes as well as the length of time they spend in such placements, part of a package of reforms that will reshape the state's foster care system. Introduced by Assemblymember Mark Stone (D-Monterey Bay), AB 403 will phase out the way treatment and services are currently provided at group homes by January 1, 2017, in favor of measures geared toward providing greater support to foster families. The California Department of Social Services (CDSS) will be charged with establishing and administering new accreditation standards and payment rates for group homes and foster family agencies. Carroll Schroeder, executive director of the California Alliance of Child and Family Services (CACFS), calls the bill "a once in a generation opportunity to get foster care right." According to National Center for Youth Law Executive Director Jennifer Rodriguez, the passage of AB 403 caps more than 15 years of work to create reform for congregate care. "This is the first significant effort that aligns our state's policy with what developmental science is telling us, that congregate care is really detrimental to the development and well-being of youth in foster care," said Rodriguez, who spent time as a group-home resident during her youth. The primary driver of reform in the bill is the establishment of short-term residential treatment centers (STRTCs), a model that would take the place of existing group homes in the state. STRTCs would be licensed by the CDSS to provide only short-term, specialized and intensive treatment to those children with demonstrated need, and all such placements would require a case plan and timeline for moving the child to a less restrictive placement. Stays of more than six months can only be provided with the approval of senior county welfare directors, and most facilities would be incentivized to provide health services that resemble hospital stays rather than semi-permanent living arrangements. These centers will be subject to a monitoring system based on yet-to-be-created standards and inspection plans. The bill instructs the CDSS to develop the infrastructure for those quality control efforts, along with stepped-up monitoring of foster homes provided through contracts with foster family agencies. SB 403 would also require counties to pay attention to the needs of foster youth involved with the probation system (so-called crossover youth). The bill calls for the creation of STRTCs aimed at crossover youth, as well as the implementation of strategies aimed at recruiting and retaining specialized foster homes for these youth and increased supports that would allow them to live with relative caregivers when possible. Under the current system, many of the state's children with the highest level of mental health needs reside in group homes. Under AB 403, greater resources would be directed toward providing intensive treatment and therapeutic programs in foster homes, including wraparound services. As part of the efforts to provide family-based care, AB 403 would boost the amount of money provided to counties to recruit, retain and support foster parents and relative caregivers. Families will be able to receive financial support for child care, family-finding activities and other supports. The reforms included in AB 403 follow recommendations submitted by a DSS work group in January 2015. The product of three years of work examining the outcomes of foster youth living in congregate care, the Continuum of Care Reform report serves as a foundation for many of the ideas included in AB 403. Concerns about upsetting the state's child-welfare system have torpedoed previous attempts at reform. "We've been dealing with this like a child welfare worker who's always in crisis," Rodriguez said. "You never get to the overall reform because people are worried, and saying 'But what will we do with these kids?' That's what we've seen in congregate care." Implementing the sweeping overhaul of the state's group-home policies will prove challenging. Now counties will need to quickly forge greater coordination with mental health agencies and find ways to create improved opportunities for family-based care, Rodriguez says. "For better or for worse, our experience in California has never been that bills can instantly self-implement," she said. "They always phase in over a very long period of time. [AB 403] sets a course for us. Now that we have to do it and we can't postpone these changes any longer, we're going to be forced to deal with the other issues, like resources for family-based support." The biggest test for implementation may come in the way that the reforms coordinate mental health care and other supports for families and relative caregivers. "You have to find more resource parents, more people in the community who can take care of these kids," Schroeder said. "Finding those people and supporting them with services to provide permanency for the kid is going to be a huge piece. Without that part, the whole thing could fall apart." Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/featured/far-reaching-bill-promises-overhaul-calif-group-homes/13720>

Fort Lauderdale Moves to Close Crescent House Group Home After Years of Complaints A Facebook 154 Twitter 6 More shares recommend reddit email 0 By Kyle Swenson Monday, October 12, 2015 | 4 days ago "If he rushes, kick that ass! Kick that ass!" The jacked-up voices of teenaged boys jumped the back wall into Donna's yard. Then came the sound of scraping feet and the unmistakable dull smacks of fists finding skin. "Swing, Carrot Top! Swing! Swing! Swing!" one boy screamed, using a nickname Donna recognized. "If he rush you, kick his ass." Then a voice yelled, "All right, y'all reset. Round 2. Fight!" That was in July. Donna — a normally easygoing blond woman — had become accustomed to hearing havoc next door. For nine years, she has lived next to Crescent House, a Fort Lauderdale group home among the facilities described in an August New Times investigation. At the property at 1135 NW Seventh Ave. and others in Broward, New Times found lax oversight and hundreds of police visits. Drugs, weapons, and gang activity were all reported in homes where kids were supposed to find safe havens. Living near Crescent was a nerve-snapping burden for the neighbors. "It was awful," Donna says, recalling the overheard brawl. "'Menacing' is the right word for it. Most of the neighbors are also scared." Though residents of South Middle River say they have complained about Crescent House for years to no avail, the city is now apparently rolling up its sleeves, readying to shove the facility out of operation. Fort Lauderdale's code enforcement office and the city attorney's office have in the past six weeks jumped into action with fines and code violations. "What you have there is absolute chaos," says Dean Trantalis, city commissioner for the neighborhood. "We've just finally said enough is enough — we want the facility closed down." Crescent House comprises three modest single-story buildings clustered on the property. It is one of six Broward and Palm Beach residential group-care facilities operated by Chrysalis Health, a private for-profit health-care company based in Fort Lauderdale. The property has been owned by the state since 1984 and operated by Chrysalis since 2002. Currently, it operates as a shelter for 12-to-17-year-olds, up to 15 to 30 at a time. According to the program's director of residential services, Kristen Stablein, the ratio of "awake and alert" staffers at the facility is one trained personnel for every four residents — which is above the state-required ratio of one staff member for every six residents. "These are children who are abandoned and neglected," Stablein says. "The success of a group home is to make them as home-like as possible, so it has to be in a residential area. We have to normalize their lives for the greatest success." Related Stories With Lax Supervision at State-Contracted Group Homes, Teen Prostitution and Drug Use Are Rampant But according to homeowners, Crescent has ruined the neighborhood. As Exhibit A, they point to photos they've snapped of boys hopping the wall at night to wander the streets. They also have pictures showing residents hoisting a girl over the wall and into the facility, which is technically all male. And they have discovered hundreds of tiny plastic baggies — the kind used for crack cocaine — littering the area. "When you're driving up the street, the kids jump in front of your vehicle," says Sal Gatanio, a nearby homeowner. "They stop right there and just stare you down. And you can't go anywhere because they'll keep moving in front of your car, so you're barricaded in." Whenever Gatanio tries to say something to the kids or snap a photo of the threatening behavior, he says they pelt his car with rocks. "I'm from New York. I've seen the South Bronx — I've seen the ghetto, the slums. And I've never felt as threatened," he says. "Everybody on this street lives in fear for their person and their property. Every. Single. Day." Tim Emerson, who owns three properties nearby with his husband, says Crescent House kids taunt him almost daily when he passes. "They'll yell, 'Fag!' or 'What you looking at? You want to suck my dick?' when I drive by," Emerson says. Next door to Crescent, Donna — who asked that her last name not be used — says she is under siege. She hears basketball games and hollering well past midnight. "We are truly concerned about the safety of everyone living around and near the center," she says. Emails show that residents have been complaining since at least 2009. Fort Lauderdale has also been trying to jump into the situation. In 2012, City Manager Lee Feldman wrote to the state Department of Children and Families, pointing out that in just a year, "there had been 58 arrests of juvenile offenders that reside at the Crescent House." Two months later, the city, state, and Crescent staff sat down to hash out an action plan pledging curfew checks and better communication. Surprisingly, that same year, Crescent House earned glowing marks from the agency tasked with monitoring the facility. ChildNet, the $158 million nonprofit parent company that handles all group homes and foster care for the state in Broward and Palm Beach counties, subcontracts with Chrysalis. In May 2012, a ChildNet team gave the facility a perfect score on an evaluation, making no note of the issues in the neighborhood. A report said it was "clean and free of safety hazards" and that none of the children discharged from the shelter left "due to undesirable, inappropriate, or disruptive behavior." (ChildNet has its own problems. Two lawsuits working through Broward Circuit Court contend the organization allowed sexual abuse at facilities run by subcontractors. In one suit, an unidentified mentally disabled teen alleges he was repeatedly assaulted by another boy over four months. In a lawsuit filed in May 2015, a boy under the age of 12 was allegedly molested for nine months after the a subcontractor working with ChildNet placed him in a foster home. ChildNet did not respond to written questions for this article by press time.) At Crescent House, things have worsened in recent years. City records indicate that from January 2014 to June 2015, kids from Crescent were arrested 138 times — for 74 felonies and 64 misdemeanors. Between December 2014 and this past June 2015, there were 384 calls for police service to the property. So now the city appears to be taking action. In August, New Times published its investigation into the lack of accountability and oversight in the group home system. Neighbors doubled their efforts, and Commissioner Trantalis agreed enough was enough. "A couple months ago, they started throwing rocks at a fellow who was renting a home next door," Trantalis explains. "When he complained, they tried to rough him up. There is absolutely no supervision. 'I took a tour of the facility a couple years ago, and it seemed clean and a pleasant environment. But the reality is that the facility is not intended for juvenile delinquents.'" The commissioner says the Department of Juvenile Justice has continued to place children with antisocial behavior and criminal issues in the center rather than find them suitable placement in facilities designed specifically to handle such kids. "They've just been packing them into Crescent House. The state has basically abdicated their responsibility to the children." But Trantalis is synched with his constituents. "This is an emerging neighborhood. We've had a lot of issues in the past, and we've overcome a lot of them. Now they have the right to the quiet enjoyment of their homes." In September, city code enforcement inspectors found 20 violations at Crescent. Emergency exit lights didn't work. Windows and doors were improperly blocked. Doors couldn't be opened from the inside. Illegal double-keyed deadbolts were used. Work had been done on the building without the proper permits. Circuits failed to meet manufacturers' criteria. In total, if the facility doesn't correct the violations by October 27, it faces up to $3,000 a day in fines. Ed Lacasa, the chief operations officer and general counsel for Crescent operator Chrysalis, says the company is more than happy to fix the violations. But he says the code enforcement is obviously part of the large full-court press. "We're starting to get heavy code enforcement. It's out of the ordinary and unusual for them to be this intense," he says. "We know that this is the product of the neighbors complaining about this facility being in the neighborhood." Lacasa says Crescent has made every effort to work with the neighbors — the neighbors have simply refused to play along. Indeed, the city is pulling out all the stops. In August, the city served Crescent with a notice of violations well beyond building specs. An August 31 memo penned by Fort Lauderdale city attorneys claims Crescent's location isn't zoned for a residential group home. "The city views this case as a violation of the permitted uses," says Chaz Adams, a city spokesperson. "The property... constitutes a nuisance." On October 15, a special magistrate will hear the city's arguments at a 9 a.m. meeting at City Hall. Crescent's Lacasa remains confident he can defend the home. "This facility has been there for 30 years," he says. "We continue to do our best... The kids need the neighbors." Source: <http://www.browardpalmbeach.com/news/fort-lauderdale-moves-to-close-crescent-house-group-home-after-years-of-complaints-7322395> punishment. "When you lose your language, you lose your culture," she continued. "It left our people scarred." Inez says the healing will take generations, but she's glad the council took the step it did Monday. "Hopefully this is part of that healing," she said. Monday's resolution also encouraged Seattle Public Schools to teach about what happened at the American Indian boarding schools. Source: <http://www.king5.com/story/news/local/seattle/2015/10/12/seattle-acknowledges-american-indian-boarding-schools/73845716/>

Seattle acknowledges American Indian Boarding Schools KING 5's Ryan Takeo reports Ryan Takeo, KING 5 News 7:38 p.m. PDT October 12, 2015 Monday the Seattle City Council unanimously approved a resolution that acknowledged the "historical trauma" of American Indian Boarding Schools. (Photo: Hibulb Cultural Center) 4471 CONNECT 140 TWEET 5 LINKEDIN 9 COMMENT EMAIL MORE SEATTLE — Monday the Seattle City Council unanimously approved a resolution that acknowledged the "historical trauma" of American Indian Boarding Schools. The crowd erupted after the afternoon vote. They started chanting and banging drums in celebration. The council's resolution is one of the first of its kind across the country. "I would characterize it as being ignored," said Inez Bill, a member of the Tulalip Tribes who was sent to the Tulalip Boarding School. "They were not allowed to speak their language there," she said of her tribe's native language, Lushootseed. Bill's grandmother told her if the children tried to speak anything but English, they would face

Gov. Brown signs Assemblyman Stone's bill to phase out use of foster group homes Assemblyman Mark Stone By Samantha Clark, Santa Cruz Sentinel Posted: 10/12/15, 9:16 PM PDT | Updated: 3 days ago 2 Comments SANTA CRUZ >> Gov. Jerry Brown signed a new law Sunday that will phase out the use of group homes for foster children. AB 403, authored by Assemblyman Mark Stone, D-Scotts Valley, advances California's long-standing goal to move away from the use of long-term group home care. "When you look at kids in group homes, a lot of them languish there, and a lot of the negative outcomes for them is attributed to that system of care," Stone said. The comprehensive reform measure aims to increase the number of children placed with foster families in part by improving the assessment process to help make sure that the first out-of-home placement is the right one. Counties also are to receive more funding and support to better recruit and train foster families. For children who aren't ready to go to families yet, the new law will transform the current group care system and replace it with short-term residential treatment centers that will provide specialized support only temporarily. In 2014, about 3,000 of the 60,000 foster youth in California lived in group homes, according to the state. More than two-thirds of them have remained there longer than two years. About one-third of them have lived in such placements for more than five years. Building upon years of policy reform aimed at improving outcomes for foster youth, AB 403 creates a time line to phase in the changes. It also implements a number of recommendations from a California Department of Social Services report released in January, which were developed with feedback from foster youth, foster families and other stakeholders. "The goal for all children in care is to live in a stable home where they, their parents and their caregivers have a voice in defining their needs and placement, and when necessary, specialized trauma-based services are provided to support successful development and relationships," said Will Lightbourne, director of the state Department of Social Services, which sponsored the bill. The governor's budget appropriates $9.6 million to further the goals of AB 403, which Stone suspects won't be enough. "Over the next three years, the Department of Social Services is meeting with each county to see what their needs are," Stone said. "As we learn more about that and assist families with implementation, the cost will be better clarified." Source: <http://www.santacruzsentinel.com/government-and-politics/20151012/gov-brown-signs-assemblyman-stones-bill-to-phase-out-use-of-foster-group-homes>

Former head teacher at Perth boarding school guilty of molesting former pupils By Kirsty McIntosh, 15 October 2015 3.50pm. 6 Share 6 Twitter Email Perth Sheriff Court.DC Thomson The former headmaster at a Perth boarding school has been found guilty of molesting two pupils more than 40 years ago. David Cowling denied the abuse, which took place when he was in charge of Balnacraig School. At Perth Sheriff Court the jury of nine men and six women unanimously found him guilty of embracing one girl before kissing her in an inappropriate manner and touching her inappropriately. They also found the 76-year-old guilty by majority verdict of entering the bedroom of a second girl lying on her bed, placing a hand on her hip and then carrying out a solo sex act. Both offences took place in the 1970s when the victims were in their teens. The court had earlier accepted a plea of no case to answer in relation to an assault charge. Sheriff Lindsay Foulis deferred sentence on Cowling, of May Place, Perth, until next month for reports to be obtained. Source: <http://www.thecourier.co.uk/news/local/perth-kinross/former-head-teacher-at-perth-boarding-school-guilty-of-molesting-former-pupils-1.905284>

Man accused of raping teen ran Milwaukee group home for boys Posted: Thu 4:57 AM, Oct 15, 2015 Home / Headlines List / Article MGN Online Posted: Thursday, October 15, 2015 --- 4:57 a.m. MILWAUKEE (AP) -- A man who ran a state-sanctioned group home for boys in Milwaukee is accused of raping a 15-year-old boy at gunpoint. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (<http://bit.ly/1PuwHd0>) reports that 37-year-old Jermarro Dantzler is charged with first-degree sexual assault of a child using the threat of force or of violence. He's accused of raping the teen July 19 and then handing him two $20 bills. Police say Dantzler contacted the boy on Facebook about a month later, and that they were able to match him to DNA evidence collected after the assault. Dantzler ran the Rights of Passage Living Center group home for boys ages 14 to 16. Police records show officers frequently are called to the house and at least six residents have been arrested in the past year. Court records don't indicate an attorney for Dantzler. Source: <http://www.nbc15.com/home/headlines/Man-accused-of-raping-teen-ran-Milwaukee-group-home-for-boys-333006841.html>

Federal Report Calls for an End to Conversion Therapy Wednesday, 21 October 2015 00:00 By Lindsay Patton, Care2 | Report font size decrease font size increase font size Print 11 Email Washington DC and four states have already banned "conversion therapy," with 18 states having introduced bans on it. A new federal report from Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) is pushing for a national ban on the controversial practice. "Conversion therapy" is used on LGBTQ individuals to, essentially, turn them straight and cis-gender. The practice dates back to the 1900s, when homosexuality was listed as a mental illness. (Homosexuality was taken off the American Psychiatric Association's list of mental disorders in 1974.) There have been multiple reports - in addition to SAMHSA's - that not only prove that conversion therapy does not work, but that it is extremely harmful to individuals. In April, President Barack Obama voiced his support for Leelah's Law, a petition named after Leelah Alcorn, a 17-year-old transgender teen who committed suicide after her parents forced her to enter conversion therapy. There were three key findings in the SAMHSA report: Same-gender sexual orientation (including identity, behavior, and attraction) and variations in gender identity and gender expression are a part of the normal spectrum of human diversity and do not constitute a mental disorder. There is limited research on conversion therapy efforts among children and adolescents; however, none of the existing research supports the premise that mental or behavioral health interventions can alter gender identity or sexual orientation. Interventions aimed at a fixed outcome, such as gender conformity or heterosexual orientation, including those aimed at changing gender identity, gender expression, and sexual orientation are coercive, can be harmful, and should not be part of behavioral health treatment. Many "therapists" who conduct conversion therapy are not licensed and have religious - not medical - backgrounds, adding to the harm this practice causes. LGBTQ children and adolescents are the primary audience that conversion therapy practices target and are already at risk for increased bullying, suicidal thoughts and attempts, substance abuse and homelessness. Conversion therapy can exacerbate those risks by making the individual feel self-hatred for being who they are. The SAMHSA report focuses on how families, loved ones and educators can support and provide information to youth about gender identity and sexual orientation. Chad Griffin, president of the Human Rights Campaign, released a statement that praised the report and referred to conversion therapy as "child abuse." "This is dangerous junk science that uses fear and shame to tell young people the only way to find love and acceptance is by changing the very nature of who they are," he said. "Today's new health report shows the extensive damage that so-called conversion therapy can cause and why it's so urgent that we end it in all 50 states." SAMHSA is an agency within the US Department of Health and Human Services that makes information on substance abuse and mental illness more accessible to those who need it. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/33320-federal-report-calls-for-an-end-to-conversion-therapy> (HEAL Note: A federal ban will not regulate faith-based programs. Faith-based programs are where "conversion therapy" is practiced. There is no easy solution at the federal level. This must be changed at the state level to be effective.)

New Report: Federal Funds For Charter Schools Go Into A 'Black Hole' America's experiment with charter schools has thus far generated academic results that are mixed, at best. Another promise, that these schools would be more educationally "innovative," is also generally unfulfilled so far. Adding to those uncertainties posed by charter schools is another: Very little is known about how these schools have spent over $3.7 billion the federal government has used to fuel expansion of the charter industry since 1995. That's the principal finding of a new report published by the Center for Media and Democracy, which looked for information about how much tax money coming from the federal government's Charter School Program (CSP) goes to charters and how that money is spent and found that information is often "severely lacking." According to the report, the federal government, state governments, and charter authorizers have generally not provided the public with ready information about how federal funds for charters has been spent. Attempts to trace federal grant money to recipients are apt to encounter "substantial obstruction" from states reluctant to reveal how charter money is spent and how state government handles charter oversight. The report contends, "Unlike truly public schools, which have to account for prospective and past spending in public budgets provided to democratically elected school boards, charter spending is largely a black hole." "A Classic Example Of Industry Capture" What the report does reveal, though, for the first time, is a list of actual schools that received grants from the CSP for start-up and "planning" expenses. In examining charter recipients of federal grants in just 12 states, mostly from 2010-2015, CMD investigators found millions in federal grant money going to charter schools that were closed after brief periods of service and to "ghost" charter schools that never opened. The report authors blame the lack of oversight of charters on federal and state lawmakers who have favored “flexibility” for these schools rather than accountability to the public. “That flexibility has allowed an epidemic of fraud, waste, and mismanagement that would not be tolerated in public schools,” CMD argues. Where there are agencies and commissions charged with oversight of charters, CMD contends, more often than not, those regulatory bodies are staffed “mainly by charter proponents.” The report calls this “a classic example of ‘industry capture’ of the agencies charged with oversight by the industry they are tasked with overseeing. With such capture comes agency devotion to protecting funding, insulated by a lack of transparency about funding oversight and distorted through agency relationships with charter industry cheerleaders.” What’s needed, the report concludes, is for the U.S. Department of Education, which oversees the Charter School Program, to provide a list of charters receiving federal grants and to institute much more stringent regulatory requirements from states applying for the grant money. Where Does The Charter Money Go? Despite the obstruction to its information gathering, CMD’s report reveals startling examples of how individual charters that have received federal grant money under CSP have produced very little education benefit for students while channeling taxpayer money to unknown pockets. In Los Angeles, California, CMD found a charter that had been granted $375,000 in CSP funds but later had its charter revoked after the school committed various legal and financial transgressions. “There is no public accounting available online of how that money was spent,” the report notes. Another California charter uncovered by the report “voluntarily surrendered its charter” after the local fire marshal shut the school down for being “dangerous and unsafe.” CMD notes, the school “had received a CSP grant of $575,000, but there is no public accounting of how that was spent.” In Indiana, the CMD investigation found an Indianapolis charter that received $700,000 in planning and implementation grants but was forced to close in 2015 “because of poor student performance.” Another Indianapolis charter “lost its charter in 2014 and converted to a private religious school, but not before receiving $702,000 in federal seed money.” Another Indiana charter “was awarded a $193,000 planning grant, but never opened. In Ohio, a state notorious for charter school malfeasance, CMD reports that out of the 88 schools created with CSP grants between 2008 and 2013, “at least 15 closed within a few years; a further seven schools never even opened. These charters received more than $4 million in federal taxpayer money.” Michigan ‘Ghost Schools’ Revelations in the CMD report on Michigan, which obtained $34,997,658 in federal CSP funding for charters between 2010-’15, are particularly startling. In Michigan, where four out of five charters are run by for-profit management companies, “charter operators in the state have been accused, and convicted, of crimes.” These crimes include felony fraud and tax evasion, including an operator who received $200,000 in federal grants and “funneled $934,000 to his private account.” The charter operator eventually pleaded guilty of two felony counts for tax evasion and “conspiracy to defraud the United States.” CMD found 25 charter schools in Michigan that received nearly $1.7 million in CSP funds for “pre-planning” and “planning” but never even opened. The report calls these “ghost” schools. Some ghost schools in Michigan still have the appearance of maintaining viability, such as the Taylor Academy for Aviation and Aerospace. This school received $109,550 in federal funding and continues to maintain a presence on the Internet. But a phone call by this author to the number listed on the website revealed the school has no current enrollments and isn’t taking in new students. Another Michigan charter, Oakland-Macomb Montessori Academy, which received $179,677 in federal funds, never opened at its original location in Roseville. Oakland-Macomb Montessori, along with three other Michigan ghost schools, appears to be related to an entity called Project Team, which no longer seems to exist. One Project Team charter, Explorers’ School of Science and Technology, which received $100,000, has disappeared. Another Project Team charter, Cultivating Growth Academy, which received $96,748, no longer exists on Internet searches or state records of either existing or closed charter schools. So where does money for charter schools go if it doesn’t pay for real classrooms and education services for students? In Michigan two other ghost schools, the Bertha B. Williams Academy, and the Magna Charter (seriously, who makes up these names) received $110,029 and $99,950, respectively, in federal funding. Neither opened, but they appear to have marketed their schools through Manta, a small business promotional company in Detroit. The marketing effort didn’t make the schools viable but likely helped the marketing company. More Reasons To Doubt Arne Duncan’s Decision The CMD report arrives in the wake of a controversial decision by U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan, made just three days prior to announcing his resignation, to send \$249 million in new federal funding to the charter school industry. Under Duncan’s watch, the charter school industry has boomed. One of the conditions states had to meet to win a Race to the Top grant, his signature program, was to raise any caps they may have had on the number of charter schools allowed to operate in the state. His department warned states receiving waivers to the onerous provisions of No Child Left Behind not to do enact any new policies that would undermine charter schools’ “autonomy.” According to a recent analysis from a charter industry organization, charter schools in the past five years have become “the fastest-growing school choice option in the U.S.” Student enrollments in charters have grown by 70 percent. In 12 generally big-city school districts, more than 30 percent of students attend charter schools. “Eleven school districts saw increases in charter school enrollment ranging from nearly 20 to almost 40 percent in a single year.” Nearly three million students currently attend charter schools. One recipient of Duncan’s generosity is the state of Illinois. According to a Chicago news outlet, much of the $8.4 million Duncan is sending to the state is to be targeted for expansion of the Noble charter school chain in Chicago, Duncan’s hometown and where he is planning to relocate after leaving office. The grant, the news report notes, will enable the Noble Network to open eight more high schools in Chicago in the next five years, “despite the current financial crisis in Chicago Public Schools and increasingly organized opposition to the prospect of more charter schools.” CMD’s revelation that federal funds to charter schools generally go into a “black hole” further calls into question Secretary Duncan’s decision to award even more money to these schools. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/new-report-federal-funds-for-charter-schools-go-into-a-black-hole/>

Baby girl’s death in foster care leaves family with unanswered questions By NAOMI MARTIN Follow @NaomiMartin nmartin@dallasnews.com Staff Writer Published: 16 October 2015 11:02 PM Updated: 17 October 2015 02:12 PM Related Serenity, 5 months old, died this week while in foster care. Norman Nickelberry doesn’t know how his baby granddaughter died. Nickelberry said he was the emergency contact for 5-month-old Serenity. But Texas Child Protective Services, the state agency responsible for her care, didn’t call him. Since Serenity’s death Thursday, Nickelberry said he’s been calling CPS with urgent questions: What happened to his granddaughter? Where is her body? And where are his other four grandchildren? But he said that CPS refused to talk to him because he’s not one of their parents. Both his daughter and Serenity’s father were in jail when the baby died. “We want answers,” Nickelberry said Friday. “We’ve been getting information on the status of the kids up until this day. But now they’re saying only the parents, only the parents.” Marleigh Meisner, a CPS spokeswoman, said Serenity’s death is under investigation by both her agency and law enforcement. She didn’t provide other answers to questions specific about Serenity’s case, but responded more generally about procedures. Department policy, she said, requires staff to notify the child’s parents within 24 hours of a death. If the parents can’t be located, the caseworker should notify “relatives who have been involved with the child,” she said. Meisner said in an email that the agency shares information with the biological parents of children. “It is up to them to decide what, if any, further information is provided” to other relatives, she said. Serenity’s mother, Whitney Nickelberry, 25, was in Collin County Jail on charges of theft and assault by threat when the child died. Whitney was notified by a guard but was unable to contact her father or other family members, said the baby’s aunt, Renee Richardson, 30. Richardson said Serenity’s father, who is in Dallas County Jail on a murder charge, also was notified. The Nickelberry family found out about Serenity’s death from one of his relatives, Richardson said. Whitney’s five children were placed in foster care when she was arrested about a month ago. Norman Nickelberry said he has been trying to get custody of them ever since. Besides Serenity, Whitney also has four other children in foster care: three boys, ages 6, 7 and 9, and a girl, 4. Richardson said the surviving children have been moved to another foster home. Nickelberry said he believed he was going to get custody of the children. He said CPS visited his Dallas home two weeks ago and performed a background check. Meisner, the CPS spokeswoman, did not respond directly when she was asked why the children weren’t placed with a relative such as Nickelberry. “It is always our goal that children who are in court-ordered CPS custody have the best and most appropriate placement,” she wrote in an email. “We first look to appropriate and available relatives. And if none are available, then a judge will order the children to be placed in temporary foster care.” Nickelberry said CPS let him visit the children on Wednesday. The kids and the baby seemed fine, he said. A CPS staffer called the baby’s godmother about 6 p.m. Thursday and asked how to contact Serenity’s doctor but refused to say whether anything was wrong, Richardson said. The godmother sometimes helped Serenity’s mother take her to the doctor. About two hours later, a relative of the baby’s father called Nickelberry and said the baby was dead. Richardson said she tried to contact CPS Thursday night but was unable to get in touch with anyone for a long time. Eventually, someone told her she would have to call back at 8 a.m., she said. “I couldn’t believe that,” Richardson said. “If this was your daughter, you’d wait until 8 a.m. to find out what happened? We have to make sure the other kids are OK.” Nickelberry said a social worker told him that the baby “stopped breathing” while she was in the care of a “qualified baby sitter.” He said he was told the foster parent was out of town. “This is unacceptable,” he said. Source: <http://www.dallasnews.com/news/metro/20151016-baby-girls-death-in-foster-care-leaves-family-with-unanswered-questions-ecce>

State report details Glade Run violations Source: Eagle Staff Writer Written by: By Amerigo Allegretto Published: October 17, 2015 ZELIENOPLE — A state report that highlights an alleged string of sexual encounters among children at Glade Run Lutheran Services also points to other instances where the organization faltered. The 55-page report by the state Department of Human Services details violations and instances that occurred at Glade Run between March and September. The DHS recently revoked Glade Run's license for one of its residential treatment facilities after a two-month investigation regarding child-on-child sexual abuse. Glade Run has four facilities on its campus, each with its own DHS license and houses about 100 youths from ages 8 to 21. The organization appealed the decision immediately after being told of the license revocation by DHS. Glade Run is allowed to continue operating the facility during the appeal, but must follow guidelines and operating rules of the department. Although it was the sexual activity among a group of young people that brought investigators to Glade Run, the probe soon discovered other instances in which the facility fell short of operating standards of the department. Staff neglect was cited in the report. On July 30, at Sandcastle Water Park, two children ages 12 and 15 ran away while two staff members were in a wave pool, too far away from the children to recognize that they had bolted. Glade Run reported the incident to police that day. However, it failed to report it to the DHS within 24 hours, instead waiting until Aug. 4 to officially notify the department. The children went missing for four days. They had been taken to an abandoned house in Penn Hills, Allegheny County, where they were forced to perform sexual acts by multiple persons. The 12-year-old who balked at the activity was shot multiple times with a BB gun. Both children walked door-to-door to contact authorities and were taken to Children's Hospital of Pittsburgh for treatment. They were returned to Glade Run on Aug. 4. The staff members received "progressive discipline" as per agency policy. On May 23, a resident used a broken piece of glass found on the facility's exterior grounds to cut his legs and left arm. The facility did not ensure the facility's exterior was free of hazards, the report said. Glade Run's corrective action was to perform daily inspections to the construction site between the school and cafeteria. Also on May 23 after dinner, a staff member pushed a resident onto a bed and used CPR motion on the resident's chest, resulting in three bruises to the resident. The staff member was "immediately suspended" and escorted off Glade Run's campus. All unit team members received refresher training related to boundary awareness and interactions. Other lesser violations included improper fire drill procedures, incomplete health assessments and inconsistent medication logs. Glade Run follows procedures and guidelines set in place by the DHS and itself, giving its employees frequent training. The report contains graphic details concerning the sexual abuse that led to Glade Run's license being revoked. The activity occurred in McCoid Cottage, one of four cottages in the residential treatment facility. The report says that staff members failed to check on the children every 15 minutes during sleeping hours and were "routinely" watching television within the living area, not within visual or audible distance of the children. A staff member was even seen sleeping overnight in the McCoid Cottage living area by a nurse. The staff member was suspended from his duties and ultimately fired. The department reiterated that staff must follow a protocol aimed at having periodic and frequent checks on the residential rooms. Eight children engaged in sexual acts with one another in the back of the cottage from March through July. The children were ages 8 to 13. After forensic interviews were conducted by the Butler County Alliance for Children, it was determined that no child will be criminally charged and that there "is no identified perpetrator." Investigators said some of the boys may have been more intimidating, but did not believe any actions were forced. "Interviewing children with emotional and behavioral support needs is difficult," said Kait Gillis, DHS spokesman. "In this case, the forensic interviews were conducted by an interviewer from a child advocacy center with specific training in interviewing children with these needs." Gillis said law enforcement were present at the interviews so children wouldn't have to be interviewed multiple times. Zelenople Police Chief Jim Miller said police have met with District Attorney Rich Goldinger to present their findings. The police department conducted its own investigation into the incident and officers were present for forensic interviews at the same time as the child advocacy center. The DHS provided the police department additional evidence and an investigation summary. - See more at: <http://www.thecranberryeagle.com/article/20151017/CRAN0101/710169841/-1/CRAN#sthash.KRiXkIbp.dpuf>

Family accuses Vermillion group home of negligence in death Family accuses Vermillion group home of negligence in death Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2015-10-19T10:34:00Z Family accuses Vermillion group home of negligence in deathThe Associated Press The Associated Press October 19, 2015 10:34 am • Associated Press \(1\) Comments VERMILLION | The family of a man who died in a Vermillion group home is seeking money damages for wrongful death. The Argus Leader reports (<http://argusne.ws/100jPnL>) trial is being held this week in the case of Darelle "Bill" Red Bear, who died in January 2009 when he choked on his own vomit. Red Bear's brothers and sisters contend the Southeast South Dakota Activity Center ignored his worsening health condition for four days without taking him to a hospital. They also say the facility and Red Bear's state-appointed legal guardian decided to donate his organs and cremate his body without family consent. Center attorneys say many of the family members hadn't been in contact with Red Bear for years, and that attempts to reach family members failed because their contact information wasn't accurate. Source: http://rapidcityjournal.com/news/local/family-accuses-vermillion-group-home-of-negligence-in-death/article_0bd781e0-6cac-59e8-a42a-4b28601fba5a.html

Attorneys Want State Monitored Another Year After Latest Foster Care Progress Report By Matt Trotter • Oct 19, 2015 Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email Credit The Children's Society Attorneys involved in a civil rights case against Oklahoma's foster care system say the state should be monitored at least another year. Marcia Lowry represented children in the 2008 case and acknowledged the work is not easy. "When you're dealing with children's lives, it shouldn't be easy. It should be hard," Lowry said. "It should be hard work, and the state should be working hard to do it. Oklahoma, in many instances, is not." Sheree Powell with the Department of Human Services said the attorneys' call to extend the settlement is premature. "The decision about whether or not the state will be subject to further monitoring is up to the neutral monitors who are monitoring our progress, and they haven't made a determination yet," Powell said. The monitors, referred to as "co-neutrals," said DHS has failed to make good-faith efforts in four areas — decreasing the rate foster children are abused or neglected, developing therapeutic foster homes, housing fewer older children in shelters and permanently placing kids — but it has made progress in lightening social workers' case loads and getting more foster homes. The co-neutrals' latest report on Oklahoma's progress in a five-year settlement to fix the state's foster care system says kids in state custody are still being abused and neglected. The three court-appointed child welfare experts said 230 kids experienced maltreatment in the last year, 177 more than the state's goal under the so-called Pinnacle Plan. "What is the state doing? What are the citizens of Oklahoma doing with their tax money if they're not even taking care of the children that they've taken away from their family homes so that they will be safe?" Lowry said. Powell said abuse and neglect is more likely in group settings, so adding foster homes and closing state-run shelters will help. Source: <http://publicradiotulsa.org/post/attorneys-want-state-monitored-another-year-after-latest-foster-care-progress-report/stream/0>

Lawsuit alleges foster abuse Second complaint mirrors earlier one; county says its been proactive in investigations Comment 0 By Shea Johnson Staff Writer VVdailypress.com By Shea Johnson Staff Writer Posted Oct. 20, 2015 at 8:52 PM By Shea Johnson Staff Writer Posted Oct. 20, 2015 at 8:52 PM » Social News By Shea Johnson Staff Writer Posted Oct. 20, 2015 at 8:52 PM VICTORVILLE — A recently filed lawsuit accuses two Victorville foster parents of abuse over a period of two-and-a-half years and when combined with a similar complaint filed early last year, four of five children in the foster family are now alleged to have been mistreated. In the most recent suit filed last Wednesday, Costa Mesa-based attorney Jack H. Anthony claims two minors with certified foster parents operating under the license of Children's Way Foster Family Agency were subjected to "acts of physical, emotional and sexual abuse and neglect and mistreatment and denials of their personal rights ..." The complaint alleges the two children, identified only by initials because they are minors, were sexually abused by one parent between July 17, 2010 and about Jan. 30, 2013. Anthony said Tuesday the children are between 13 and 17 years old right now, making them between 8 and 12 years old when the alleged abuse began. No criminal charges have been filed against the parents named in the lawsuit, court records show. A telephone message left for Children's Way Foster Family Agency was not immediately returned on Tuesday. According to the complaint, the children were allegedly given just five minutes to shower, dress, brush their teeth and hair; not allowed to choose which clothes they wore; barred from practicing their religion of Christianity or celebrating Christmas; provided dinner at 3 p.m.; put to bed between 5 and 7 p.m.; prevented from calling family; and retaliated against through chore work when reporting negative information to social workers. The complaint mirrors a suit filed May 2, 2014, on behalf of two other foster children in the family, who were about 6 and 7 years old when the alleged abuse began. Anthony said the foster parents have since been decertified. Both suits also name San Bernardino County as defendants, citing the Department of Children and Family Services' breach of mandatory duties for failing to discover and/or properly respond to evidence the children were in an unsafe environment, among other things. The most recent suit had not yet been served to the defendants, according to Anthony, while the suit filed last year remains in the discovery phase. The latest filing, meanwhile, comes about three months after former county social workers, speaking on the condition of anonymity, told FOX 11 News that the Department of Children and Family Services was ignoring evidence of abuse leading to foster children's deaths. Anthony said Tuesday he was in the process of trying to confirm the accounts of FOX 11's confidential sources. "If they were accurate," he said, "there's no question then it's a systemic problem affecting not only my clients, but other children." In an Aug. 31 response to FOX 11's stories, the county said it "had already conducted their own investigations into (the cases noted in the news station's report)," according to a copy of its statement provided by the county Tuesday. "In August of 2014, CFS moved into action to ensure that it was doing the very best it could to ensure the safety of our children," officials said. "In September of 2014, several changes were implemented to ensure a comprehensive and effective systematic approach to the protection of our children." According to the county, efforts have included adding a safety protocol for removing children from potentially abusive homes, where social workers can obtain court orders to remove children 24/7. In extreme cases, children in imminent danger are removed on the spot with assistance from authorities. The county also has partnered with the Public Child Welfare Training Academy to create a simulation training lab that became operational last month, officials said. Additionally, the county plans to hire 65 senior social services practitioners, launch an after-hours investigations operation and equip social workers with smartphones and laptops. Targeting more manageable caseloads, 125 new social workers were hired within the last year after county Supervisors authorized an ongoing, year-round recruitment process. As it stands, officials said the county receives nearly 30,000 calls yearly to investigate child abuse and neglect, and 7,000 children are under the county's care. In the last five years, 160,000 requests for investigation have come to the county, which has moved nearly 14,000 children out of their homes during the period. Nine of the children referred to the county, but not removed from their homes, died. It's a number county officials acknowledge is "unacceptable." "The County is committed to continuing to improve how it protects its children — their safety is our priority and purpose in life," the statement read. "Child Abuse and neglect occurs in every county — I ask that wherever you are, you join us in our mission to keep children safe and report suspected child abuse." Attorney L. Wallace Pate, an expert in foster care liability within private and government agencies, said Tuesday the lawsuits by Anthony were "not surprising," saying abuse in the foster care system was "the rule, not the exception." Pate has filed her own lawsuit against Rancho Cucamonga-based Interim Care Foster Family Agency on behalf of eight former foster children dubbed "the San Bernardino County 8." Filed in November 2014, the suit claims the agency failed to properly supervise two allegedly abusive foster parents who were evicted from four residences over a seven-period and even homeless for a time — all while children were placed under their care. The foster parents, Lisa Oates and Nawab Wilson, lived in Helendale and Victorville twice during the period in question. Oates and Wilson have not been charged with any crime, according to court records, but the civil case continues. Pate chalked up cracks in the U.S. foster care system to the over-filing of cases, saying only 17 percent of kids in the system are moved there because of physical or sexual abuse. The other 83 percent, she said, are children considered "at-risk," which indicates the children are likely to be severely injured if they stay at home. Yet Pate said too many children are being removed from their homes without evidence of being injured or immediately threatened to be harmed, adding children were 10 times more likely to be abused and neglected by non-relatives. She pointed to money as a lucrative incentive for agencies to over-file, reiterating her point that the system is marred by a "cash-for-kids" operation. "They're not doing social work now," she said. "They're warehousing children. This is not a local phenomenon." Meanwhile, Anthony said the foster parents targeted in his lawsuits likely had 40 foster children since at least 2000. FOX 11 News reported Anthony saying they had been previously decertified, but were allowed their last foster family due to a "clerical error." "I'm aware of previous referrals of abuse and neglect that were not on record," Anthony told the Daily Press. "I'm not fully aware of the specifics, why they were not on the record the way it should be." Source: <http://www.vvdailypress.com/article/20151020/NEWS/151029961>

Lawsuit challenges Mississippi 'debtor's prison' 10/21/15 10:58 AM—Updated 10/21/15 12:27 PM facebook twitter 3 save share group 103 By Amanda Sakuma A coastal Mississippi city is accused in a new federal lawsuit of throwing poor people into jail if they're unable to afford court fees and fines. The suit, filed Wednesday by the American Civil Liberties Union, charges that Biloxi, Mississippi threatened jail time if fines weren't paid up front and in full, and often followed through on those threats. It's the latest step in a broader push by advocates for civil liberties and the poor to challenge what they call the "scourge" of debtor's prisons across the U.S. "It's a debtor's prison out of the dark ages," Nusrat Jahan Choudhury, a lawyer with the ACLU's Racial Justice Program, told msnbc, referring to Biloxi's system. "Bottom line: people are jailed because they don't have money." RELATED: How falling behind on child support can end in jail It's been more than three decades since the Supreme Court banned the practice of locking people up because they can't afford to pay court fines or fees, but allegations of modern-day debtor's prisons have continued to crop up throughout the country. And while heightened scrutiny and public awareness have led to significant reforms across several states in recent years, Biloxi is not alone. Similar lawsuits filed by the ACLU and Southern Poverty Law Center are also pending in Louisiana, Alabama and Washington state. Joseph Anderson, 52, sits and waits for his girlfriend Qumotria Kennedy to get off work in the parking lot of the apartment complex where he lives in Biloxi. Photo by William Widmer/ACLU The suit filed Wednesday—which names as defendants Biloxi Police Chief John Miller, Judge James Steele, and the for-profit Judicial Correction Services, Inc., in addition to the city—paints a picture of a city government that padded its coffers on the backs of the poor by establishing a probation program to collect significant fines for minor misconduct like traffic violations and misdemeanors. and it charges that the city adopted a policy to aggressively chase down court fines and fees. Indigent people who couldn't pay were slapped with arrest warrants and subject to serve jail time. "The city routinely arrests and jails impoverished people in a scheme to generate municipal revenue through the collection of unpaid fines, fees and court costs imposed in traffic and other misdemeanor cases," the suit alleges. Vincent Creel, public affairs manager for Biloxi, said the city had not yet received the lawsuit. "However, based on media inquiries, we believe the ACLU is mistaken about the process in Biloxi, and we look forward to explaining it to the ACLU. The City of Biloxi treats all defendants fairly under the law. In fact, the court has used community service in cases where defendants are unable to pay their fines," Creel said in a statement. RELATED: Ferguson sued over alleged modern-day debtors' prison According to the lawsuit, seven months of public records released by the Harrison County Adult Detention Center show that at least 415 people were jailed between September 2014 and March 2015 on charges for failing to pay off their debts owed to Biloxi. The suit goes on to allege that city officials routinely prolonged jail time for indigent people in order to coerce them into paying off their fines. The alleged victims include Joseph Anderson, a 52-year-old man with disabilities who according to the lawsuit was unable to pay his $200 traffic fine in full — he made what payments he could using his disability checks. Anderson said he was not aware that police had issued a warrant for his arrest until they stormed into his home and took him away in handcuffs. He spent seven nights in jail before being brought before a judge, and says he was never informed that he had the right to a court-appointed attorney. Along with Anderson is Qumotria Kennedy, 36, who says she was jailed for five days after she was unable to pay the $1,000 in fines she owed for minor traffic violations. The single mother of two says she lost her part-time job at a cleaning service because she was behind bars. "I was scared," Kennedy told msnbc. "I can't make money just grow out of my pockets." Source: <http://www.msnbc.com/msnbc/lawsuit-challenges-mississippi-debtors-prison>

Utah man sentenced for stealing from residents at care facility By JESSICA MILLER | The Salt Lake Tribune First Published Oct 21 2015 06:45PM • Last Updated Oct 21 2015 10:21 pm Courts » Jordan J. Jack gets 90 days in jail followed by 90 days under house arrest. Share This Article Ogden • A Clearfield man convicted of stealing money from intellectually disabled residents of the group home he supervised was sentenced to jail Wednesday. Before handing down the 180-day sentence, 2nd District Judge Ernie Jones told 29-year-old Jordan Jeffrey Jack that the fact that he violated the trust of vulnerable people was key in the case. "They put you in a position of trust and you took advantage of them," Jones said Wednesday at Jack's sentencing hearing. "... It's not just about the amount of money. It is significant because of who you preyed upon in this case. They were elderly people, they were disabled people. People that relied on you." The After a two-day bench trial in August, Jack was found guilty of seven counts of exploitation of a vulnerable adult, a third-degree felony. Jones also found Jack guilty of communications fraud, a second-degree felony, and misdemeanor theft by deception. The felony convictions carried a possible prison sentence, but Jones suspended the prison time and instead ordered Jack to serve in the Weber County jail. He will spend 90 days behind bars and the other 90 in home confinement. He was also ordered to pay more than $11,000 in restitution to 14 victims. Jack's attorney, Kelly Booth, had asked Jones to sentence her client to only home confinement and ankle monitoring, saying that he now worked as a stay-at-home dad to his three children since he was fired last year from his position as assistant director at Chrysalis, a Weber County-based group home. Booth told the judge that Jack — who has no other criminal history — took the money from the residents as a way to "keep up with the Joneses." She said he, like many young people living in Utah, felt pressure to marry young, start a family and buy a home. She said many of the items Jack purchased with the stolen money, such as coloring books, stickers and jewelry, were for his wife and children. But assistant attorney general Kaye Lynn Wootton argued that the items Jack bought "were not necessities," and she pointed to evidence that the defendant spent several days in Las Vegas staying in a hotel that cost more than $400 per night. While working at Chrysalis, prosecutors say Jack used "false receipts and altered financial statements to deceive his employer and steal money from over 14 residents of the group homes he supervised." Wootton said this went on from 2012 until Jack was fired in 2014. On Wednesday, Jack was apologetic and said he was sorry to the victims, to his co-workers and to his family. "I really cared about them," he said of the residents. "I know my actions indicate otherwise. ... I was supposed to be an example and a leader, and I was more of a hypocrite." None of the victims spoke in court Wednesday, but Troy Friden, a Chrysalis area director, told the judge of how difficult it was to notify their clients and their families of the crimes. He said one mother had asked him not to tell her disabled son about it because he thought so highly of Jack. "These people trusted our employees would take care of their family members," he said. "... It was really their trust that he violated." Source:

<http://www.slttrib.com/news/3087242-155/utah-man-sentenced-for-stealing-from>

R.I. child advocate raises concerns over some group homes Comment 3 Related images Regina M. Costa By Jennifer Bogdan Journal State House Bureau Posted Oct. 22, 2015 @ 11:15 pm PROVIDENCE, R.I. — With months remaining in her tenure as the state's child advocate, Regina M. Costa has chronicled numerous shortcomings in the state Department of Children, Youth and Families and called attention to Liberty Lane, a South Kingstown group home that was shuttered this month after a staff member allegedly assaulted a youth. In her final annual report, Costa, whose five-year term as the watchdog over the state's child welfare system will end March 31, also revealed a nearly year-long investigation into Meadowridge Academy, a Massachusetts group home where some of Rhode Island's most troubled youth are sent. Despite seven complaints about the program — three by Rhode Island Family Court — the state continues to use the facility that housed 15 children at a cost of $2.4 million in the last fiscal year. Costa said she has recommended that the Family Court individually monitor each of the children in the program intended for adolescents with complex trauma histories, educational and mental health challenges and behavioral problems. She said in a September report she cited concerns including lack of staff experience, the need for significant police intervention and repeated hospitalizations of youth in the program. Related content Counselor, teen face criminal charges in confrontation that caused closing of South Kin... One of the complaints that led to the investigation stated that a 16-year-old girl placed in the program because she hadn't been going to school didn't attend class for a year while she was there. There were also reports of inappropriate restraint measures, and drug use among the children in the program, Costa said. While Costa declined to name Meadowridge and Liberty Lane, DCYF identified the programs. Michael Raia, a spokesman for the state Office of Health and Human Services, said Liberty Lane, which is operated by Child and Family Services, was shut down Oct. 1 and six youth were removed and placed in alternative housing. The home remains closed while Child Protective Services investigates. Costa said she found the program understaffed and the youth "out of control." Governor Raimondo, who has called for an overhaul of DCYF and spoken about its myriad financial problems, announced earlier this month that she will not reappoint Costa and has launched a search committee to find her replacement. The litany of problems detailed in the annual report references challenges Costa said she encountered throughout her five-year term as she dealt with deteriorating services that she blames on the state's move to purchase services through two large network contracts. "As these changes in the delivery of services to children and families occurred, the staff at the OCA [Office of the Child Advocate] responded by what could only be described as crisis mode on a near daily basis. During the same time, staff at the OCA experienced a great deal of resistance in previously cooperative relationships with the ... senior staff members at DCYF. Strained relations often resulted in stalling or curtailing efforts to collaborate on making improvements in the provision of services to children and families," Costa wrote. "The child advocate's efforts to raise awareness about the deterioration of services for children and families ... were often met with skepticism given the perceived animosity between the department and the OCA. Community providers of services to children and families who attempted to raise awareness about the declining health of children and families in state care under these contracts met similar fates with (DCYF) often imposing consequences and retribution in response to outspokenness." Asked about those statements, Jamia McDonald, who has been selected by Raimondo as the de facto head of DCYF, said since she has taken over the department she has had a cooperative relationship with Costa. "She has sent memos and raised issues for us to address. We have included her and her staff in various meetings and workgroups," McDonald said. But Costa's report also makes mention of at least one group that has not included her. Costa said she has been excluded from internal reviews of DCYF's Child Fatality and Near Fatality Response Team. The group reviews deaths and "near fatalities" of children in state care. Costa said she hasn't been part of any review process since February 2014. Three children have died in state care in 2015. Raia, the spokesman for the Office of Health and Human Services, said all "passed away due to medical issues." Raia said the DCYF response team reviews all deaths of children in state care, including those in 2015. Raia said the membership of the team varies in each case, and there is no set list of team members. Source:

<http://www.providencejournal.com/article/20151022/NEWS/151029705>

Former worker at Bellevue group home charged with sexual assault Posted: Saturday, October 24, 2015 1:00 am Former worker at Bellevue group home charged with sexual assault By Emily Nohr / World-Herald staff writer The Omaha World-Herald Authorities are accusing a former employee of a Bellevue group home of sexually assaulting one of the home's residents. The Sarpy County Attorney's Office on Friday charged Adrian D. Galbreath, 38, with first-degree sexual assault and abuse of a vulnerable adult. Both are felonies. According to a search warrant filed by a detective with the Bellevue Police Department: Galbreath, who worked at Hands of the Heartland, invited the victim to his Bellevue apartment after the victim got off work on Sept. 23. Hands of the Heartland provides services to people with developmental disabilities. The warrant describes the victim as "mentally diminished." Authorities allege that after the victim became intoxicated, Galbreath pushed him down and began to assault him, according to the warrant. Trina Leech, human resource director at Hands of the Heartland, said Galbreath was terminated from his direct support professional position after the allegation arose. "We do take the safety of our clients very seriously," she said. "That's why if there are allegations we try to take immediate action." Source: http://www.omaha.com/news/metro/former-worker-at-bellevue-group-home-charged-with-sexual-assault/article_426beb9e-0f0b-565a-9bc6-c335ed51106f.html

Counselor, teen charged in RI group home confrontation A counselor at the Liberty Lane group home in South Kingstown, where adolescent boys in state care are sent, allegedly picked up a 17-year-old by the throat and punched him in the face because the boy would not leave his office. Comment 0 By Jennifer Bogdan Journal State House Bureau providencejournal.com By Jennifer Bogdan Journal State House Bureau Posted Oct. 23, 2015 at 11:15 PM By Jennifer Bogdan Journal State House Bureau Posted Oct. 23, 2015 at 11:15 PM SOUTH KINGSTOWN, R.I. — A counselor at the Liberty Lane group home where adolescent boys in state care are sent allegedly picked up a 17-year-old by the throat and punched him in the face because the boy would not leave his office. It was that incident described in a Sept. 29 South Kingstown Police Department report that resulted in the state Department of Children, Youth and Families' shutdown of the program the following day. Earlier this week the state confirmed that the group home has been closed while Child Protective Services investigates. According to the police report, the incident unfolded around 7 p.m. when Francis Zwolinski, a 33-year-old resident counselor in the program was seated in a staff office. He asked the juvenile, who is not named in the police report, to leave. When the boy refused, Zwolinski lifted the teen by the throat and "forced him against the wall." The teen reportedly threw up his hands to resist, "which caused Zwolinski to strike him twice in the face with closed fists." Zwolinski then picked up a chair and the teen ran to the kitchen and picked up a knife, and then the two entered a standoff. The teen involved in the incident was charged with felony assault with a dangerous weapon and disorderly conduct. Zwolinski was charged with simple assault, a misdemeanor. He has pleaded not guilty and denied the allegations through his lawyer, Jesse W. Duarte. "We are shocked and dismayed by these outrageous allegations made against my client, an experienced youth services worker, who, as the arrest report indicates, was actually the victim of an assault with a knife that night by the ... complaining witness, while his facility was understaffed and his coworkers stood by idly rather than calling the police," Duarte said. "Mr. Zwolinski firmly maintains that his actions were completely within facility protocol and affirms his innocence." Ken Lombardi, another staff member at the home, told the police that Zwolinski appeared to be the aggressor. He described the way Zwolinski punched the teen as "haymakers," a boxing term for a powerful hit. Duarte said police records state that the 17-year-old is 6 feet, 1 inch tall and 315 pounds. By comparison, Duarte said his client is roughly 5 feet, 10 inches tall and 165 pounds. Police accounts of the incident describe the scene at the home at 46 Liberty Lane as contentious. A 16-year-old boy in the program reportedly interfered with the police during the investigation by shouting obscenities, jumping onto a van and instigating other residents. The boy, who is not identified, was taken into police custody and charged with disorderly conduct and obstructing an officer. The program at Liberty Lane, which was state licensed as a home for eight boys between the ages of 13 and 17, is one of five group homes run by Child and Family Services. Source: <http://www.providencejournal.com/article/20151023/NEWS/151029590>

Ham: DCF problem is foster care system Comment 0 MetroWest Daily News, Framingham, MA Writer Posted Oct. 25, 2015 at 12:38 AM Posted Oct. 25, 2015 at 12:38 AM Posted Oct. 25, 2015 at 12:38 AM I'm screaming. Let's all scream for the plight of the children who have no voice when committed to the care and custody of the Department of Children and Families. The abused and neglected children are being further confused and harmed by placement in foster homes that have little or no ability to help them. It's an empty bed somewhere. With the current scrutiny of DCF even an empty bed will hard to find. The state has to accept the responsibility for the DCF children in need of professional care, mentally, physically, psychologically, perhaps scholastically. Before healing can begin it is necessary to undo the harm that caused them to be ordered to DCF in the first place. To then transfer the frightened children to a strange and possibly negative home environment could add to their trauma. They must be terrified, numb or angry. It is cruel. The tragedies of foster care include the deaths of children and the couple of young children now in a vegetative state. And that is just in the last few months when the DCF management of children in crisis was exposed. It is reported that the budget for DCF was $907.6 million last year plus $2 million is pending for more social workers with 47,000 children under DCF jurisdiction. All the figures need an explanation. To continue to support DCF with more money and staff is to expect a different outcome while denying the real problem which is the current foster care system. The DCF children need professional guidance, treatment and understanding to overcome the present issues and to achieve a healthy future. Perhaps in a campus setting or the use of existing agencies that specialize in the welfare of children. The current DCF system has proven to be a dangerous failure. PRISICLLA J. HAM Shrewsbury Source: <http://www.metrowestdailynews.com/article/20151025/OPINION/151027084>

Our Voice: Privacy law can hinder foster care safety The Desert Sun Editorial Board 5:02 p.m. PDT October 24, 2015 Buy Photo The entrance to a Riverside County Department of Public Social Services building in Rubidoux. (Photo: Brett Kelman/The Desert Sun) Buy Photo 33 CONNECT 4 TWEET 1 LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A recent two-day series by Desert Sun reporter Brett Kelman shed light on a troubling situation involving some of the state's most vulnerable residents. Kelman found that in Riverside County and across California, the overwhelming majority of Child Protective Services investigations end after allegations of abuse are unsubstantiated. In Riverside County, social workers investigate tens of thousands of parents each year, but more than three-fourths of those investigations end up with either "inconclusive" or "unfounded" findings. In foster homes, where the county's responsibility to wards of the state is even more pronounced, only four percent of complaints are substantiated. Ideally, one might look at these numbers and think that clearly the bulk of these claims are bogus and thankfully, children in the foster care system mostly remain safe. But experts say that in the 80 percent or so of cases that were unsubstantiated over a five-year period in Riverside County are cases of real abuse that just got away. Kelman found one such apparent case. A Coachella Valley man accused in what prosecutors deem one of the most notorious Southern California child porn rings in memory was the subject of a Riverside County child abuse complaint investigation. That probe of a report of a Desert Hot Springs man allegedly molesting two boys was closed as "inconclusive" even though the two investigating social workers found, as they had been told by the hotline caller, that the foster parent's computer contained photos of other children in their underwear. The social workers were concerned, but apparently not enough. The man kept his adopted boys, as well as his foster care license. Months later, John David Yoder is behind bars awaiting trial in an alleged Desert Hot Springs child porn ring that authorities believe victimized as many as 15 youths. Another man, Noland Harper of Virginia, was sentenced recently to 24 years in prison after pleading to participating in a child exploitation enterprise. Two others accused in the case -- Erick Monsivais of Los Angeles and William Thompson of Nevada, the alleged ringleader -- also await trial. Part of the problem appears rooted in California's strict privacy laws regarding Child Protective Services cases. In almost all cases, the substance of investigations is kept confidential, making it difficult to know if social workers are overlooking alarming evidence of abuse. In California, all CPS reports are automatically confidential, with disclosure exceptions for law enforcement and hospital officials but few others. There are at least 17 states where CPS officials would be free to answer questions about their investigations in circumstances similar to the Yoder case, according to a state-by-state analysis of confidentiality laws. In some of these states, details from the Yoder investigation would be unsealed because he was arrested. In other states, Social Services could answer questions about the case because The Desert Sun already knew Yoder had been investigated. But in Riverside County, neither of those exemptions exist. Despite public interest in knowing what went wrong in the Yoder investigation, these answers are forbidden by law. Some child welfare experts argue that absolute confidentiality in such cases is vital because children and families deserve privacy, even if they are being investigated. That's a noble ideal, but it must not be used as a shield to protect those who should be held accountable in circumstances like the Yoder case. Someone should have referred that case higher. Hiding behind the shield of child privacy lets this person or persons off the hook. Gov. Jerry Brown this month signed AB 403, which aims to reform California's foster care system in various ways, such as boosting training for foster families, setting new standards for homes and requiring group homes and Foster Family Agencies -- corporations that run multiple group homes -- to be accredited. Lawmakers have shown they can act to reform this social program to make it stronger. Lifting the veil of secrecy and allowing watchdog agencies and child advocates to help police those who are supposed to be guarding these vulnerable children should be the next order of business for lawmakers in Sacramento. Source: <http://www.desertsun.com/story/opinion/editorials/2015/10/24/our-voice-privacy-law-foster-care/74402810/>

FOX10 News Investigates PART 1: Saving Youth Foundation Posted: Oct 29, 2015 7:18 PM PDT Updated: Oct 29, 2015 7:19 PM PDT By Renee Dials, FOX10 News Anchor BioEmail.Connect.Biography.renee.dials@fox10tv.com The sleeping quarters of children in the Saving Youth Foundation. Three people affiliated with the facility have been charged with aggravated abuse. Also on the Web Exclusive details on Mobile abuse investigation MOBILE, AL (WALA) - Three people charged with aggravated abuse at a residential youth facility in Mobile will go on trial in a few months. MOREAdditional LinksPoll According to the Mobile County District Attorney's office it's the first time the owners of such a facility have been charged with felony child abuse in Mobile County. Supporters of Saving Youth Foundation say the church-based operation is responsible for positive changes in the lives of children in its care, but, the facility was shut down by DHR, and a police investigation led to criminal indictments that allege dozens of kids were subjected to physical and emotional abuse for profit. More than 30 children, most of whom were brought to Mobile from out-of state were removed from Saving Youth Foundation in March when the Alabama Department of Human Resources shut down the facility amid allegations of abuse. Owners John Young Junior, William Knott, and Aleshia Moffett were indicted by a Mobile County Grand Jury on 24 charges of aggravated abuse. The indictments allege children were kept in isolation for unreasonable periods of time, placed in unreasonable restraints, forced to do excessive exercise, and even denied prescription medication. The felony charges are new, but the allegations involving the church-based operation and the three defendants are not. "I was terrified at this point and then I said no I won't, and then he hit me in the head, the first time, and then he hit me in the head again after I stopped and surrendered." That's what teenager Madison Litsky told Miami reporter Bob Norman in 2013. Litsky said Pastor Young hit her so hard in the face she almost passed out. Another teen, William Vargas, said he was attacked by William Knott when he couldn't keep up with the exercise. "So after he started choking me he threw me on the floor, and when I was on the floor he punched me on the side of the head," William Vargas said. Those are just some of the allegations reported while the facility was located in Prichard, and called Restoration Youth Academy. "Punching them in the face, punching them in the stomach repeatedly. They would put them in isolation in their underwear and leave them for several days," Michelle Simmons said. FOX10 News Reporter Renee Dials talked to Simmons at her home outside Atlanta recently. Simmons said she didn't find out about the alleged abuse until after she removed her 15-year-old son from the facility. "I just think he was afraid of what the consequences would be," Simmons said. Simmons said her child's arm was broken by another teen at the boot camp. Simmons found out about the injury three weeks later when her son came home for a visit. The hospital report indicates the teenager said he didn't tell anyone until a few days earlier. But, Simmons believes the staff at the boot camp knew about the injury. "What they would do is if he acted up or did something they would come and pull his arm or poke him in the arm for punishment," she said. "As I stated we intend to plead not guilty to all charges, and they have hired me for the representation of their defense, thank you. Bye," Defense attorney Marcus Foxx said. Foxx did not have much to say about the current charges against the three defendants, following a court hearing in September. Young has repeatedly denied the allegations of abuse. This is what he told FOX10 News shortly after police raided SYF in March. "I don't really blame the kids. They want their freedom. They want to go smoke their pot and go out on the streets and go on Facebook and everything and a facility like this is a controlled environment," Young said. Even though the facility is now shut down church members say they still support their pastor and the former boot camp facility. "Because I know that the facility was run to help children hands down. Children would come here one way, they would leave differently," Lakeshia Peters said. "I know he's putting forth every effort that he has, every resource that he has available. He's an awesome man of God," Marquis Jacobs said. "These letters that you see right here were letters that were sneaked to me by the boys," Charles Kennedy said. Former Prichard Police Captain Charles Kennedy has been trying for years to bring attention to what he called a serious threat to children he discovered long before the boot camp changed its name and moved to Mobile. "It is one of the most frustrating things that I have had. I was a police officer for many, many years, and this is probably one of the most frustrating things that I have ever dealt with in law enforcement," Kennedy said. Kennedy is glad the recent investigation has resulted in criminal indictments. "There's been this three year lack of action that finally, finally something was done," he said. The three defendants are scheduled to go on trial in February. Saving Youth Foundation is the new name for the same group that started out in Prichard under another name, Restoration Youth Academy. It appears one of the defendants got his start with teen boot camps in another state. Learn more about that in Part 2 of our special FOX10 News investigation. All content © 2015, WALA, Mobile, AL. (A Meredith Corporation Station). All Rights Reserved. Read more: <http://www.fox10tv.com/story/30386115/fox10-news-investigates#ixzz3q704ezca>

FOX10 News Investigates: Part 2: Saving Youth Foundation Posted: Oct 29, 2015 7:20 PM PDT Updated: Oct 29, 2015 7:20 PM PDT By Renee Dials, FOX10 News Anchor BioEmail.Connect.Biography.renee.dials@fox10tv.com. The sleeping quarters of children in the Saving Youth Foundation. Three people affiliated with the facility have been charged with aggravated abuse. MOBILE, AL (WALA) - Three people accused of abusing children at a residential facility in Mobile are headed to trial. The new allegations stem from a long history of controversy surrounding the operation and its owners. MORE Additional LinksPoll An application that was filed in 2013 to establish the Saving Youth Foundation as a non-profit corporation in Mobile. The application is on file with Probate Court in Mobile, and the Secretary of State in Montgomery. It's the only document FOX10 News was able to locate for the residential facility for troubled teens. One of the SYF leaders recently indicted for alleged abuse was personally named in a federal lawsuit involving another boot camp facility in Mississippi. That was just before he came to the Alabama gulf coast to open up a similar business with the other two defendants. "He started choking me. He picked me up from the floor and started choking me. He started stomping me on my back. I still have nightmares about it every night," William Vargas said. Vargas told Miami television reporter Bob Norman he was beaten by drill instructor William Knott. The alleged abuse happened at the Christian based facility that was then called Restoration Youth Academy. Knott has been the focus of complaints from other teens. It apparently started at another facility in Lucedale, where Knott worked. The Bethel Boys Academy and the dormitories that once stood on land on Mill Street Extension in Lucedale, Mississippi are now gone, but the people in the surrounding community still remember the controversial facility and, its chief drill instructor, William Knott. "Bathrooms, shower houses, they had rec rooms, everything was built right here. We just tore all these slabs up back in the winter," Lee Gibson explained. Gibson said the Bethel Academy closed about 10 years ago. He doesn't know if the allegations of abuse were true, but he does remember the tough drill instructor. "They was kind of rough on them," Gibson said. Another neighbor Donnie Barry said kids often ran away from the home. Sometimes they ran to nearby homes including his. "They wanted somebody to help them, the guy was mean to them you know. But, you couldn't get involved with it, personally you couldn't get involved," Barry said. The allegations in Mississippi resulted in a federal lawsuit against the academy and William Knott. In 2006 a judge issued a 900 thousand dollar judgment for the boy, who according to the civil complaint was the victim of torture. A few years later Knott along with John Young opened RYA in Prichard. The operation moved to Mobile in 2013. Mobile County Health Department officials say the owners never received the required clearance from the health department to serve food. There is no city license on file for SYF. City spokesperson, George Talbot told FOX10 News the facility might not need a license if it was under DHR for example. But, DHR said SYF was not affiliated with the state agency. And in fact, it was DHR that shut it down and removed the children in March. While the workers at state run facilities are licensed and accredited, Young told a Miami station that didn't apply to his business. "Because we're a Christian based program, we're not required to have a state license with our program," Young said. But a state official told me even church run facilities are required to file for exemption, which according to the State Department of Revenue, SYF has not done. I also checked with the IRS which said it had no record of any exemption for the business. "I thought I was doing the right thing for him, you know," Michelle Simmons said. Simmons said she paid more than a thousand dollars a month to keep her son in the facilities care. She says she didn't find out about the alleged abuse until she took him out last year. "I had no inclination anything was amiss there," she said. But Lakesha Peters said the allegations have not shaken her faith in Saving Youth Foundation, or its pastor who is now charged with abuse, along with two others. According to Peters one of the teens removed from SYF has been back since the facility was shut down. "He came back to tell Bishop Young what an impact he made on his life. It was like a Tuesday night bible study, not just on Sunday. It was a Tuesday and he came back on Sunday, and we've seen him ever since then," Peters said. John Young, William Knott, and Alesha Moffett are all scheduled to go on trial in February. The teen residential facility that was shut down in Mobile is not the only one to come under criticism in the country. We'll take a look at what's being done in other areas to protect children from potential institutional abuse in part three of our FOX10 News investigation. Read more: <http://www.fox10tv.com/story/30386154/fox10-news-investigates-part-2#ixzz3q715aor2>

Youth group leader sentenced on child porn charges NEXT STORY Baltimore Ravens' safety Matt Elam suspended Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text File photo Photos A 63-year-old Cockeysville man who is a youth group leader at a local church is charged with possession and distribution of hundreds of thousands of pornographic images of extremely young children. BALTIMORE —A Baltimore County youth group leader who pleaded guilty to child porn charges in July was sentenced Monday. Cockeysville man enters plea in child porn case A 63-year-old Cockeysville man who was a youth group leader at a local church pleaded guilty Tuesday to distribution of child pornography. More Baltimore Co. man charged on child porn charges A 63-year-old Cockeysville man who is a youth group leader at a local church is charged with possession and distribution of hundreds of thousands of pornographic images of extremely young children. More A federal judge sentenced Gregory Wayne Gibson, 63, of Cockeysville, to five years in prison followed by 20 years of supervised release. Gibson must also register as a sex offender. For the past several years, Gibson was a volunteer youth group leader at a church in Baltimore County, working with children ages 9 through 18. Gibson also assisted with childcare at his wife's unlicensed home day care, which included infants. Authorities said Gibson put videos on a file-sharing program that depicted girls engaging in sexually explicit conduct. Authorities said they searched Gibson's computers and other equipment and found more than 260,000 images and videos of minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. Prosecutors said that officials found child erotica and images and videos depicting infants and toddlers engaging in sex acts with adults, including images and videos depicting bondage and other acts. Source: <http://www.wbal.com/news/youth-group-leader-sentenced-on-child-porn-charges/36057654>

How N.Y.'s Biggest For-Profit Nursing Home Group Flourishes Despite a Record of Patient Harm The state's "character-and-competence" reviews are supposed to weed out operators with histories of violations and fines—but regulators don't always act on the full story. by Allegra Abramo and Jennifer Lehman, special to ProPublica, Oct. 27, 2015, 8 a.m. Charlie Stewart lost most of his leg to a wound that turned gangrenous during a 2013 nursing home stay. (Allegra Abramo for ProPublica) Charlie Stewart was looking forward to getting out of the nursing home in time for his 60th birthday. On his planned release day, in late 2012, the Long Island facility instead called Stewart's wife to say he was being sent to the hospital with a fever. When his wife, Jeanne, met him there, the stench of rotting flesh made it difficult to sit near her husband. The small wounds on his right foot that had been healing when Stewart entered the nursing home now blackened his entire shin. "When I saw it at the hospital ... I almost threw up," Jeanne Stewart said. "It was disgusting. I said, 'It looks like somebody took a match to it.'" Doctors told Stewart the infection in his leg was poisoning his body. To save his life, they would have to amputate above the knee. Stewart had spent about six weeks recovering from a diabetic emergency at Avalon Gardens Rehabilitation & Health Care Center on Long Island. The nursing home is one of several in a group of for-profit homes affiliated with SentosaCare, LLC, that have a record of repeat fines, violations and complaints for deficient care in recent years. Despite that record, SentosaCare founder Benjamin Landa, partner Bent Philipson and family members have been able to expand their nursing home ownerships in New York, easily clearing regulatory reviews meant to be a check on repeat offenders. SentosaCare is now the state's largest nursing home network, with at least 25 facilities and nearly 5,400 beds. That unhindered expansion highlights the continued weakness of nursing home oversight in New York, an investigation by ProPublica found, and exposes gaps in the state's system for vetting parties who apply to buy shares in homes. State law requires a "character-and-competence" review of buyers before a change in ownership can go through. To pass muster, other health care facilities associated with the buyers must have a record of high-quality care. The decision maker in these deals is the state's Public Health and Health Planning Council, a body of appointed officials, many from inside the health care industry. The council has substantial leverage to press nursing home applicants to improve quality, but an examination of dozens of transactions in recent years show that power is seldom used. Moreover, records show that the council hasn't always had complete information about all the violations and fines at nursing homes owned by or affiliated with applicants it reviewed. That's because the Department of Health, which prepares character-and-competence recommendations for the council, doesn't report them all. The department's assessments of Landa and other owners of SentosaCare homes have routinely found that the facilities provided a "substantially consistent high level of care"—the standard owners must meet to receive council approval. Yet the agency's assessments in 15 separate ownership applications since 2013 did not mention at least 20 federal fines paid by the group's homes, records show. In more than a dozen cases, the department reported "no repeat violations," even when a SentosaCare home had been cited multiple times for the same serious deficiency. Many of the nursing home deals ProPublica reviewed received a go-ahead despite rules saying they "shall not be" approved when facilities have repeat violations that put residents at risk. Under a narrow interpretation of the rules, however, the department still recommends approval if violations aren't strictly identical or were promptly addressed. SentosaCare's owners or associates weren't the only applicants to get incomplete vetting, but the council has had repeated opportunities to scrutinize their records. Landa, Philipson or relatives bought shares in a dozen homes in 2013 and 2014, records show. Advocates for nursing home patients say that instead of a backstop, New York's approval process has become a rubber stamp. "The law establishes mechanisms for at least a moderate review of an applicant's character and competence," said Richard Molloy, director of the Long Term

Care Community Coalition in New York. “The failure to provide complete information on a provider’s past performance fundamentally undermines the review process.” Mollot’s group published a recent report saying the Health Department has one of the nation’s lowest rates of citing nursing home operators for deficiencies in care. New York is also among a minority of states that don’t mandate minimum staffing ratios, even though research shows a strong link between nursing staff and residents’ well-being. Charlie Stewart with his wife, Jeanne, and their cat, Maris. (Allegra Abramo for ProPublica) Thirteen of SentosaCare’s homes (though not Avalon Gardens) have Medicare’s bottom score for nurse staffing. Inspection reports also show that at least seven residents have wandered away from the SentosaCare affiliated facilities in recent years — including one who froze to death in 2011. Inspectors and prosecutors have found that staff falsified records in some cases. Dozens of patients at SentosaCare homes have experienced long delays before receiving necessary care; some ended up in hospitals. The Stewarts said the staff at Avalon Gardens showed “no sense of urgency” when they complained about missed meals, soiled sheets and unanswered call bells. Even though nurses dressed the wound on Charlie’s leg daily, and a doctor checked it each week, no one warned them about its worsening condition, the Stewarts said. Dr. Kris Alman, a retired endocrinologist who reviewed Stewart’s medical records and photographs at ProPublica’s request, said that the two quarter-sized lesions on his foot when he was admitted to Avalon Gardens could not have “become what it did overnight.” That the condition “progressed as far as it did, with him coming in septic and needing an above-the-knee amputation, was inexcusable,” Alman said. Landa’s attorney and business partner, Howard Fensterman, declined to comment on Stewart’s case for reasons of patient privacy. Fensterman defended Avalon Gardens and other SentosaCare facilities, however, saying that when inspectors have found problems, the homes quickly addressed them and secured state approval of correction plans. Fensterman also said that SentosaCare does not have “ownership or control” over the facilities in its network and only contracts with them to provide administrative and rehabilitation consulting, regulatory advice and purchasing services. Records show, however, that Landa and Philipson, or family members, have ownership stakes or directorships in nearly all of SentosaCare’s facilities. Fensterman also co-owns 14 nursing homes with Landa in several states, including one SentosaCare home. Fensterman is a former member of the state health council, as is Landa, who entered the nursing home business in the late 1980s and emerged as one of the sector’s biggest players over the next decade. Landa, Philipson or family members now hold stakes in at least 33 nursing homes in New York and an equal number in nine other states. In 2013, the latest year for which state data is available, homes under the SentosaCare umbrella paid the company more than $11.5 million for financial, staffing and other services, and spent nearly $630,000 with Fensterman’s law firm. The nation’s \$137 billion nursing home industry has made major improvements since the landmark 1987 federal Nursing Home Reform Act imposed mandates to combat abuse and neglect. But the industry, which draws heavily on taxpayer funding via Medicare and Medicaid, still struggles to provide safe care for many. One-third of Medicare patients suffered preventable harm within a month of being admitted to nursing homes for short-term rehabilitation, according to a 2014 study by the Department of Health and Human Services’ inspector general. The harm cost Medicare $2.8 billion for hospitalizations alone in 2011, the study estimated. New York spends about \$13 billion each year on the state’s 627 nursing homes, which collectively care for more than 100,000 residents. The Department of Health is charged with day-to-day oversight of safety, but patient advocates say the agency lacks the staff and expertise to do the job adequately. SentosaCare homes, which took in nearly $538 million from Medicare and Medicaid in 2013, aren’t the only facilities in the state with repeat violations and low staffing, and several of the company’s homes have above-average ratings on Medicare’s Nursing Home Compare web site, which rates them with one to five stars. (State-by-state inspection reports can be searched on ProPublica’s Nursing Home Inspector, which also lists deficiencies by severity level.) But federal data through August shows that 11 of SentosaCare’s homes exceeded the state average of 24 violations over the past three years, and three had double that number. SentosaCare’s New York Nursing Homes Medicare rates nursing homes on a scale of 1 (bottom performers) to 5 stars (best). Here are ratings for the homes currently listed as part of SentosaCare’s network in New York. See what’s in the ratings. Home City Beds Overall Score Health Inspection Nurse Staffing Quality Avalon Gardens Rehabilitation & Health Care Center Smithtown 353 2 1 4 2 Bay Park Center for Nursing and Rehabilitation Bronx 480 2 2 1 5 Brookhaven Nursing and Rehabilitation Center Far Rockaway 298 3 2 2 5 Eastchester Rehabilitation and Health Care Center Bronx 200 4 4 3 3 Forest Hills Care Center Forest Hills 100 4 4 1 5 Garden Care Center Franklin Square 150 2 2 1 5 Golden Gate Rehabilitation and Health Care Center Staten Island 238 4 4 2 2 Grace Plaza Nursing and Rehabilitation Center Great Neck 214 4 4 2 4 Little Neck Care Center Little Neck 120 5 5 1 5 Nassau Extended Care Facility Hempstead 280 2 3 1 4 New Surfside Nursing Home Far Rockaway 183 2 2 1 5 Park Avenue Extended Care Facility Long Beach 240 5 5 1 5 Parkview Care and Rehab Center Massapequa 169 1 1 1 4 Pathways Nursing & Rehabilitation Center Niskayuna 112 4 3 4 4 Rockville Skilled Nursing & Rehabilitation Center Rockville Centre 66 3 2 4 4 Seagate Rehabilitation and Nursing Center Brooklyn 360 3 4 1 4 South Point Plaza Nursing & Rehabilitation Center Island Park 185 1 1 1 2 South Shore Rehabilitation and Nursing Center Freeport 100 4 3 2 5 Spring Creek Rehabilitation and Nursing Care Center Brooklyn 188 1 2 1 2 The Grove at Valhalla Rehabilitation and Nursing Center Valhalla 160 4 4 3 4 The Hamptons Center for Rehabilitation and Nursing South Hampton 280 3 3 2 2 Throgs Neck Extended Care Facility Bronx 205 4 5 1 4 Townhouse Center For Rehabilitation & Nursing Uniondale 280 1 3 1 1 White Plains Center for Nursing Care White Plains 88 3 2 4 4 Woodmere Rehabilitation and Health Care Center Woodmere 336 1 1 3 4 Sources: Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services data as of Oct. 1, 2015; Nursing Home Inspector The most critical nursing home deficiencies are known as “immediate jeopardy” violations — incidents or conditions that have caused or are likely to cause the “serious injury, harm, impairment, or death” of patients. Less than 6 percent of all New York homes were cited for four or more immediate-jeopardy violations in recent years. By comparison, Avalon Gardens was cited for 10 immediate-jeopardy violations in the three years ending in August, the third-highest number in the state for that period. Two other SentosaCare homes — Woodmere Rehabilitation & Health Care Center and South Point Plaza Nursing and Rehabilitation Center — each have been cited for four. Elopements — where residents leave the premises without the knowledge of a home’s operators — have been a repeat problem for Avalon and Woodmere, where SentosaCare co-owner Philipson has been listed as longtime managing partner. Two days before Thanksgiving in 2011, a group of Woodmere residents walked to a nearby school for a holiday lunch. When aides took a head count, one of the 19 residents, a 55-year-old with dementia named Dennis Buckham, was missing. Buckham wasn’t found until four days later, face down on a Brooklyn sidewalk, frozen and without a pulse. He died of cardiac arrest and hypothermia, according to the chief medical examiner’s report cited in the Department of Health investigation. Fensterman said Woodmere overhauled its policies and procedures, and that the state signed off on an official plan of correction. Two years later, however, a 64-year-old Woodmere resident with schizophrenia left a secure unit 10 times over three months. Staffers found her in the basement and at the front door, but according to the state’s report, the home did not investigate, change her care plan or conduct a doctor-ordered psychiatric evaluation. About a month later, the woman walked past a security guard and was found in the road. Fensterman said no harm resulted, the home fired the security guard who let the resident slip out, and the state again approved a correction plan. Residents also wandered from Avalon Gardens in 2011 and 2013, state inspection reports show. In all, at least seven residents wandered away from SentosaCare facilities between 2011 and 2014, according to state inspection reports. The reports also document dozens of cases of delayed treatment at SentosaCare homes. At Woodmere in 2012, staffers failed to promptly send four patients to the hospital, two of whom died. Two years later, a resident at Parkview Care and Rehabilitation Center in Nassau County suffered from a collapsed lung for four days while staff failed to check results from a chest X-ray or assess his breathing or vital signs. Fensterman said that each SentosaCare home is distinct. “There is no pattern of delayed treatment among facilities,” he said, “as each facility cited had separate issues, which in no way relate to each other.” He said the Health Department found the incidents to be isolated and that all were corrected. On multiple occasions, state inspectors discovered that staff at SentosaCare facilities tried to cover up lapses in care — allegedly lying about elopements or the failure to spot bedsores, for example. After a 2012 investigation by New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman, the administrator of The Hamptons Center for Rehabilitation and Nursing, a SentosaCare home in Suffolk County, pled guilty to falsifying records after a resident wandered away and was found walking on the highway five hours later. The administrator was sentenced to a $2,500 fine and probation. In June, after another investigation by Schneiderman’s office, four Woodmere nurses were arrested for falsely signing off on forms saying they had checked on a resident who fell three times in a week and ended up hospitalized. Three pleaded guilty to misdemeanors; the fourth case is pending. Researchers and patient advocates say that insufficient staffing is one of the biggest contributors to poor outcomes for nursing home residents. The issue is important enough that the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) tracks staffing and has determined that less than 4.1 hours of total daily nursing care per long-term resident increases the risk of bed sores, weight loss and other types of harm to patients. “Direct bedside nursing home staff is probably the most important factor in nursing home care — end of story,” said Dr. Michele Bellantoni, clinical director of geriatrics at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine. Only three SentosaCare homes meet the 4.1-hour threshold, however. Six provide less than three hours of daily nursing care per resident, according to data the facilities self-report to CMS. Fensterman said CMS’ overall staff ratings are not a good measure for comparing homes because they don’t reflect the different nursing needs of homes’ patients or high scores on other quality measures. As an example, he cited Park Avenue Extended Care, another SentosaCare facility, which CMS rated with one star on staffing but five stars for health quality, which tracks data such as how often patients get bedsores or infections. On the other end of the scale is Avalon, with nearly 45 percent more complaints and double the number of complaint-related citations per 100 beds than the averages found in New York homes. In its most recent inspection, this past June, Avalon was cited for 21 deficiencies. Among them: Eight residents received medications up to three hours late because the facility did not have sufficient nursing staff. Tom Bennett, 60, spent about a month in short-term rehabilitation at Avalon Gardens in 2013. Obesity and a back injury made it impossible for the Long Island man to get out of bed. In an interview, he said he didn't receive regular sponge baths and sometimes sat in his own feces for hours because no one was available to help. "They were all over-worked. They were telling me, you know, we just don't have enough help to take care of everybody," Bennett said. "And you can hear the buzzers going off constantly — meep, meep, meep, meep. And the aides are just like running from room to room to room." Fensterman declined to comment about Bennett's situation. State records list SentosaCare partners Landa and Philipson as co-owners of Avalon Gardens, each with an interest of more than 30 percent. In 2013, the home reported paying $1 million to SentosaCare for services and $90,000 to Fensterman's firm. Although New York doesn't mandate minimum staffing ratios, federal law says homes must have "sufficient staff" to "attain or maintain the highest practicable physical, mental, and psychosocial well-being of each resident." Patient advocates say that vague standard is one reason that the state rarely cites homes for insufficient staffing. Health Department officials, in response to an email asking about the agency's citation rate, also noted the lack of specific minimum staffing rules. Avalon Gardens and a second SentosaCare home, South Point Plaza Nursing and Rehabilitation Center on Long Island, were among only 29 cited specifically for insufficient staffing in the past three years. Patient advocates say lack of staff is one of the most common complaints from residents and that state inspectors should be following federal guidance, which instructs them to look for staffing issues "whenever quality of care problems have been discovered." Advocacy groups and the state's biggest nurses' union have pushed for mandatory staffing ratios, and "safe-staffing" bills have been introduced in the New York Legislature for at least a decade, according to the office of Assemblyman Richard Gottfried, D-Manhattan, the health committee chairman. Hospitals and nursing homes have objected, saying the mandates would be too costly. Mollot said that while legislating a staffing floor would help, the key is whether the Health Department does more to police the problem. If a new staffing law "just becomes another requirement that's not enforced," he said, "what good is it?" When nursing home ownership changes hands in New York, character-and-competence reviews are supposed to provide an important checkpoint. State law gives the Public Health and Health Planning Council the power to bar new owners or directors based on the compliance record of any facility they are "affiliated" with. "If some bad actor wanted to buy a new nursing home," said Susan Regan, a lawyer who spent 18 years on council, "we could say no." Except the council seldom says "no." ProPublica's review of Health Department and council records did not turn up any nursing home ownership applications within the last five years that were rejected because of lapses in patient care. In most cases, the council — 24 volunteers appointed by the governor — follows the department's recommendations. Although the department's reviews summarize past violations and fines at an applicant's related facilities, they typically conclude there is a "substantially consistent high quality of care." Regulations say applicants "shall not" receive such a finding if a facility's violations were "recurrent or were not promptly corrected." But the council doesn't always get a look at the complete record. Thanks to home purchases and shuffling of ownership shares, Landa, Philipson, their family members and other owners of SentosaCare facilities have come up for council reviews a dozen times since 2013. In addition to omitting mention of at least 20 federal fines paid by SentosaCare homes, the department's reviews reported "no repeat violations" a dozen times when there had been multiple citations for the same problems. Since 2011, Woodmere has been cited and fined several times for the same class of violations that put residents in immediate jeopardy, including giving unnecessary medications and failing to protect residents from falls. The home paid more than $80,000 in federal fines, which are shared with the state. In 2013, the federal government also temporarily halted payments for new admissions at Woodmere, a stiff penalty for homes with ongoing problems. None of those actions was noted in character-and-competence summaries provided to council members on at least three occasions in 2013 and 2014, when Landa, Philipson and others associated with Woodmere applied to buy shares of other nursing homes. Instead, the department wrote that Woodmere had "no enforcements" or made no mention of the home. In each case, the department recommended approval, and the council voted in favor without any objections. Records list Landa as a director and Philipson as the managing partner of Woodmere. Fensterman, who served on the council from 2010 until 2014, recused himself from votes involving business partners and clients. When SentosaCare's South Point Plaza was part of reviews in 2013 and 2014, the department also said it had "no repeat enforcements," even though the home had been cited and fined more than once for residents having pressure sores. Although three state fines were noted, an additional $90,000 in federal fines and one Medicare payment denial were not included in the reviews. Asked about the omissions, the department initially said its character-and-competence process includes federal investigations and fines. In a later statement, it said federal fines are not currently included, but that its policy is being reviewed. The agency began listing them in council papers in February, it said in an email, but only "for informational purposes." A review of dozens of health council applications shows that the department doesn't always flag serious violations if there was no state fine, or if the amount isn't finalized. The state did not settle $18,000 in fines for elopements at Woodmere and Avalon until last month, more than two years after the incidents. Recent character-and-competence reviews did not mention pending fines or report that the elopements had occurred. About a year ago, the department began appending copies of its website pages on citations and quality ratings to council review documents. A list of deficiencies and their severity isn't always included. Concerning what it counts as a repeat enforcement, the agency said that while some violations may fall in the same category, they are not necessarily the same. That is consistent with its reviews, which sometimes note that violations were not "identical." Mollot said it was "extremely alarming" that violations and fines might be omitted. In interviews, three former or current council members expressed uncertainty about what standards apply in character-and-competence reviews. With dozens of projects and ownership changes to vote on at each monthly meeting, council members must rely on the department's information to do their jobs. For many of her years on the council, Regan chaired the establishment committee, which reviews applications to buy or build facilities. Members would often ask for more details about applicants' histories, she said, "but what you do about it is difficult." Operators argue that they have paid their fines and corrected deficiencies, she said, or that repeat violations were not connected. "I would argue, you know what, if you're in business to find every opportunity to game the standards, and do the minimum, and give the shoddiest care you can possibly give while still getting out from under the deficiency, it should raise a question of whether you should hold a license," Regan said. Arthur Levin, a current establishment committee member, said that he and others are increasingly asking the Health Department for information about quality of care, not just violations, especially for dialysis centers. Levin is director of the Center for Medical Consumers and the council's lone representative from a patient group. "At the very least, let it be the basis of a question to an applicant: 'What are you going to do to do better?'" Levin said. Three years ago, the council recommended changes to character-and-competence reviews as part of a regulatory overhaul requested by Gov. Andrew Cuomo. Among the proposals was one to give the department and council more discretion to disqualify applicants for patterns of violations across multiple facilities affiliated with an applicant. "When a proposed owner or trustee presents affiliations with a health care facility or agency that has a pattern of, or multiple, enforcements, or a sub-standard quality record, there should be a presumption of disqualification which may be rebutted in limited circumstances," says the recommendation, which is still on the shelf. Recent versions of the safe-staffing bill would expand character-and-competence reviews to consider not only staffing but worker safety violations like those that resulted in 13 citations and $24,600 in fines to Avalon Gardens in 2013. In his short stay at Avalon Gardens, Charlie Stewart remembers waiting for hours for help getting from his bed to the toilet. One time, when no one answered the call bell, he started yelling, he said. Still no one came. Eventually he decided to crawl across the floor to the bathroom rather than soil the bed. "When you need help and it's not coming, you know, your reality changes immediately," said Stewart. "It's not nice feeling helpless. And several times in that place, I gotta say, I felt like I was helpless." On multiple occasions, Stewart said, no one brought him dinner, even though he needed to eat regularly because of his diabetes. His wife, Jeanne, said she thought pain medications were making him forgetful. But he kept calling. "I might have been drugged, but I know I wasn't fed, 'cause I'm starving," he recalls telling his wife. "I felt more could have been done sooner," Jeanne said of her husband's care. "And it just shouldn't have gotten as far as it did." (Allegra Abramo for ProPublica) Fensterman said privacy laws prohibited SentosaCare from responding to specific questions about Stewart's care. Jeanne said she called the Health Department while Charlie was still at Avalon to complain about the missed meals and lack of help getting to the bathroom. When a representative finally called back to follow up on her complaint, she told the caller she was sitting next to her husband in the hospital as he recovered from an amputation. A few weeks later, she said, a letter arrived saying the state hadn't substantiated the initial complaint. Furious, Jeanne threw it away. Today, Stewart is learning how to walk up stairs on his prosthetic leg. Jeanne limits the hours in her job at a grocery store so she can care for her husband. She still finds the episode difficult to talk about. "I felt more could have been done sooner," she said of her husband's care. "And it just shouldn't have gotten as far as it did." Charlie Stewart agreed. "That's what I sincerely wish — that this doesn't happen to anybody else." Allegra Abramo is a freelance writer and photographer living in Seattle. Jennifer

Lehman is a writer living in New York City. Source: <http://www.propublica.org/article/new-york-for-profit-nursing-home-group-flourishes-despite-patient-harm>

Senate Bill Would Overhaul Florida's Foster-Care Placements to Child-Centered Approach FlaglerLive | October 27, 2015 Where next? (Rianne van de Kerkhof) A bill aimed at reducing instability for foster children has started to move forward in the Florida Senate and would require the child-welfare system to match kids with their best placement options — rather than, as critics charge, the first beds that are handy. Sponsored by the Children, Families and Elder Affairs Committee, the bill (SPB 7018) would require the use of a process to determine which settings — from relatives or friends to foster families or group homes — offer abused children the best chance to recover and thrive. Under the bill, the Florida Department of Children and Families would work with privatized community-based care lead agencies to create what's called a continuum of care for foster kids, with options ranging from adoption by close relatives to being placed in therapeutic group homes. In part, the bill would ensure that an array of services — such as intervention, domestic-violence counseling and mental-health and substance-abuse treatment — would be available to keep maltreated kids from having to leave their family homes in the first place. "Right now, group care is the luck of the draw," said Carole Shaffer, who is with the San Francisco-based Youth Law Center and leads Florida's Quality Parenting Initiative. "If you come in at a certain time of the day or night and they can't reach a foster parent, then you go into a group home. And you do not come out of that group home ever, unless you're unified (with biological parents) or the group home ejects you." Of teens who leave foster care without families, according to the Children's Home Society of Florida, 33 percent will be homeless within three years and 60 percent will have babies within four years. Half will be unemployed, while 66 percent will be high-school dropouts. The committee bill would require that foster homes, group homes and other placements demonstrate that children are recovering from trauma while in their care. That provision was already in the works before news reports alleging that several South Florida group homes allowed drugs, prostitution, gangs and truancy — on the taxpayers' dime. "Whether you're a group home or a regular home, there are going to be certain expectations," said Sen. Nancy Detert, a Venice Republican and a member of the committee, told The News Service of Florida. "We're not looking to put them out of business. We just want to make sure the good ones do well and the bad ones go out of business." Click On: Senate Bill Would Overhaul Florida's Foster-Care Placements to Child-Centered Approach Gail Wadsworth: Florida's Court Clerks Spotlight Domestic Violence Awareness Month Florida's Foster Children Are Still Being Medicated Without Proper Oversight Florida's Foster Care System Loosening Up Restrictions While Extending Eligibility to 21 5 Years After 7-year-old Gabriel Myers's Suicide, Psychotropic Drugs Still Overprescribed in Foster Care Sunburned Child at Flagler Camp Exposes a Florida Paradox: Paddling Is OK, Applying Sunscreen Is Not Lawmakers Again Refuse to Extend KidCare Coverage to Children of Legal Immigrants The bill represents a different approach from a group-home measure that Detert proposed for the 2015 session. That measure was aimed at eliminating the use of shift workers at group homes in favor of the use of a more family-style model with house parents. It followed a report by the Legislature's Office of Program Policy Analysis and Government Accountability, which found that roughly 11 percent of Florida children who are removed from their families are placed in group homes rather than with relatives, friends or foster families. Group homes cost the state nearly $81.7 million for approximately 2,200 children in 2013-2014 — more than $37,000 per child. In comparison, the state rate for foster families who care for children aged 13 to 17 is $527 per month, or $6,324 per year. The report also found that 57 percent of Florida group homes use shift workers, who some children's advocates said are less likely to develop positive relationships with the youngsters in their care. Detert's bill died during the spring session, but it led to a work group by the Department of Children and Families and the Florida Coalition for Children, which lobbies for group homes as well as community-based care lead agencies. The new bill has received cautious indications of approval from those players, including Shelley Katz, chief operating officer of the Children's Home Society of Florida, which represents a number of group facilities. "While there are still many elements of the bill that we think warrant further discussion, the focus on the need for a continuum of services beginning with services to support families and maintain children safely in their homes through a variety of out-of-home placements is aligned with the reality that our children come with a wide range of challenges and there is no 'one size fits all' solution to meeting the needs of at-risk, abused and neglected children," Katz wrote in an email. The measure unanimously passed the Senate committee last week, but as yet has no House companion. "We do see it going in the direction that the department's going, that our secretary is an advocate for," said Janice Thomas, the Department of Children and Families' assistant secretary for child welfare. "And that is that children be placed, initially, in the best placement. ... What's best for the child and what their needs are — that's what's included in this bill." —Margie Menzel, News Service of Florida Source: <http://flaglerlive.com/86842/foster-care-overhaul/>

NY agency to protect the disabled rarely brings charges In this Tuesday, Oct. 27, 2015, photo, the Northeast Parent and Child Society is seen in Schenectady, N.Y. The group home was recently investigated by New York's Justice Center regarding the alleged physical and psychological abuse of a 12-year-old boy by caretakers at the home. Mike Groll AP Photo By MICHAEL VIRTANENAssociated Press Linked In Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story SCHENECTADY, N.Y. In a video he made with his PlayStation, a 12-year-old developmentally disabled boy in a group home points to his swollen right eye and says, "Mom, this is what it looks like. ... He slammed me." His camera keeps rolling as his adult caretakers enter his room, where they can be heard but not seen on the video. One calls the boy "stupid ass," and another warns: "I'm gonna kill a kid and you might be the one I kill. ... You want me to f--- hurt you, boy?" The recording ends with the boy looking again into the camera, on the verge of tears, whispering, "Mom ... I'm scared." That was last year, and to date, no one has been prosecuted. New York's Justice Center, the state agency created to hold caretakers accountable, investigated and said it substantiated allegations the boy had been physically and psychologically abused. But a judge refused to sign off on charges. In fact, an Associated Press examination of misconduct complaints against caretakers in New York found that only a small percentage — a disturbingly small one, according to some activists — are prosecuted. Since the start of 2014, the Justice Center — established to protect the 1 million disabled, addicted, mentally ill and young people getting state care — has received more than 25,000 allegations of abuse and neglect by caretakers and substantiated about 7,000 of them. But just 169 cases, or less than 2.5 percent, have resulted in criminal charges. Of the 132 allegations that involved deaths, the center has substantiated 34 cases so far but has prosecuted only one. The figures, obtained by the AP from the Justice Center and through Freedom of Information requests, have some critics questioning whether the agency is fulfilling its mandate to obtain justice for those who often can't speak up for themselves. "That's not a very good record of success," said Harvey Weisenberg, a former state assemblyman who co-sponsored the legislation creating the Justice Center but has been disappointed by the way it has turned out. The Justice Center's executive director, Jeff Wise, defended the agency's record. "The Justice Center directly investigates or reviews the investigations of all allegations of abuse and neglect and when supported by the evidence holds staff accountable for their actions," he said in a statement. But he said many instances of misconduct "fall short of a criminal offense." For example, inadequately supervising a patient, improperly restraining someone, failing to make sure a person is properly cleaned, or not giving medication on time can constitute abuse or neglect but is not necessarily a crime. The Justice Center said about 13 percent of the substantiated allegations were for physical abuse, or about 900 altogether; 1 percent for sexual abuse; and 61 percent for neglect, mostly for improper supervision. Justice Center officials also said that the administrative standard of proof they use to substantiate misconduct allegations — a preponderance of the evidence — is lower than the standard that must be met to convict someone in court: beyond a reasonable doubt. And they said they have meted out punishment short of prosecution, such as putting 163 people on a hiring blacklist because of serious or repeated acts of mistreatment and requiring more than 20,000 corrective actions by state and nonprofit providers. National experts say New York is not the only state with relatively low prosecutions in such cases. "These cases, unfortunately, are rarely prosecuted," said Kathleen Quinn, executive director of the National Adult Protective Services Association. "These are people that are invisible in the larger world." Experts note that mistreatment allegations can be hard to prove because caretakers are reluctant to testify against each other and because cases often rely on victims with intellectual or physical disabilities that don't make for good witnesses. "They're not all winnable," said Nancy Alterio, executive director of a similar oversight agency in Massachusetts, the Disabled Persons Protection Commission. "That's one of the challenges — when they report, they're not believed." Nevertheless, the Massachusetts agency reported 155 prosecutions in fiscal 2014, more than New York's 95 for a similar period, in a state with less than one-third the population. Alterio said her agency was able to achieve that through agreements with the state's 11 district attorneys. And she said that prosecuting difficult-to-prove cases can at least put suspected homes and caretakers on notice that they are being watched and let victims know they're believed. Mary Lee Fay, executive director of the National Association of State Directors of Developmental Disabilities Services, said New York's real issue is: "What are they doing to increase those numbers? How are they working with district attorneys and others where they really can deliver prosecutions?" The Justice Center for the Protection of People With Special Needs was created in mid-2013, pushed by Gov. Andrew Cuomo following a New York Times series on horrific abuse cases that had been handled internally without charges. "We will not allow people in the care of New York to be abused. Period," the governor said at the time. Among the tools at the center's disposal: a statewide hotline and a staff of 429, including investigators and seven prosecutors empowered to bring criminal cases against caretakers, even when local prosecutors decline. While Justice Center officials refused for privacy reasons to discuss the 12-year-old boy or any other cases that have gone unprosecuted, they have announced charges they did file. They include a Westchester County mental health counselor charged with raping a client, and four workers from a Long Island group home accused of encouraging two mentally disabled men to fight for their amusement. In the lone prosecuted case that involved a death, a nurse admitted sleeping on the job at a group home in suburban Syracuse, leading to the death of a 25-year-old disabled man who received inadequate oxygen overnight. Tanya Lemon pleaded guilty last year to endangering the welfare of a disabled person, lost her nursing license and was sentenced to 90 days in jail. Michael Carey, an advocate for the disabled even before his autistic son was smothered to death by a caretaker in 2007, accused the Justice Center of minimizing cases to protect the state from lawsuits. He criticized the finding that just one person was charged in connection with a death. "Isn't it suspicious?" Carey asked. "Where are the other negligent deaths if this Justice Center was actually just?" Among those who say they are still waiting for justice is the mother of the boy who made the video on his PlayStation at the Northeast Parent and Child Society group home in Schenectady. The video is now part of a federal lawsuit brought by the mother that contends he was assaulted repeatedly over five days by the staff. In one instance, he was choked with the power cord to the very game he used to make the video, according to the lawsuit. In letters to the boy's mother a year later, the Justice Center said it substantiated the allegation that a staff member restrained the boy with excessive force, "which included elbowing and/or striking him on his face, which resulted in a swollen and/or bruised eye." The center didn't conclude the boy was throttled with the electrical cord, but did find that a staff member improperly restrained him, including putting him "in a one-person prone restraint while he had a cord around his neck." Schenectady County District Attorney Robert Carney said city police twice drafted a misdemeanor warrant in the case, alleging endangerment of an incompetent person. City Court Judge Robert Hoffman declined to sign either one, the second accompanied by the video, finding the case was "inconclusive," the prosecutor said. "That pretty much ended it," Carney said. Calls to the judge were not returned. The mother, who is not identified by name in the lawsuit and spoke on condition of anonymity to protect the identity of her underage son, is seeking unspecified damages on behalf of the boy, who she said has been diagnosed with schizophrenia and autism. Her attorney, Robert Santoriella, said the beatings continued days after the boy quietly slipped his mother the PlayStation with the video, even after she called the Justice Center and the Schenectady police and a local TV station had aired the footage. The mother said the boy, identified in court papers only as R.W., has been moved to another facility and hasn't been the same since the beatings. Once active and playful, he now just stares out the window for hours at a time, she said. A telephone listing for the man listed in court papers as the boy's chief abuser could not be found. Staff members at the home said he doesn't work there anymore. Eugene White, spokesman for Northern Rivers Family Service, which runs the home, said the allegations are "undoubtedly disturbing," don't reflect the nonprofit organization's culture, and were "thoroughly investigated" by the Justice Center. He would not give specifics. Read more here: <http://www.bellinghamherald.com/news/article41676039.html#storylink=cpy>

Teen program dismantled Phoenix House moves some services to Rhode Island Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » Gov. Maggie Hassan toured the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday. Purchase photo reprints at Photo Finder » By Benji Rosen Monadnock Ledger-Transcript Wednesday, October 28, 2015 (Published in print: Thursday, October 29, 2015) Share on email Email Print 2 Comments Share on twitter Share on facebook Share on gmail More Sharing Services 8 The Phoenix House Academy in Dublin, the sole state residential treatment center for adolescent substance abuse, is closing its Dublin program. The company will move the 12 beds to its Rhode Island facility by Nov. 16, according to New England Regional Clinical Director Jayson Pratt. The Academy, a three- to six-month residential treatment program for teens aged 13 to 18, is on the campus of the Phoenix House in Dublin, which serves residents aged 18 to 25 in a separate 32-bed facility. After Nov. 9, the 12 adolescent beds will be made available to the 20 people currently on a wait list for treatment, according to Pratt. The Phoenix House New England operates treatment facilities in New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Massachusetts. In New Hampshire, the organization oversees the Academy in Dublin, an adult residential program on the same campus in Dublin, an outpatient treatment center in Keene and a sober living home in Northfield. While the substance abuse community in the Monadnock region considers whether it is a move in the right direction, the state says other services it provides or plans to expand on will address adolescent need in the Granite State. There are 24 state-certified psychiatric residential treatment centers for youth that offer substance abuse programs, said Eileen Mullen, an administrator at the Division of Children, Youth and Families. The Phoenix House Academy, however, is the last center in state designated solely for substance abuse. The decision to relocate the program to a Phoenix House facility on Wallum Lake in Rhode Island was based, in part, on a dwindling number of referrals from the state. While DCYF can use up to 6 of the 12 beds at the Phoenix House for adolescents it refers, DCYF is filling only one of those beds now, choosing instead to refer teenagers to psychiatric residential treatment centers that treat comorbid disorders, said Mullen. Another reason for the relocation is financial — the Phoenix House loses money on Medicaid patients. "We are still invested in delivering services. We just have to find the right combination of services to meet [adolescent] needs and also have responsible business models," said Pratt. The Academy had three residents as of Wednesday afternoon. All three are expected to complete the program by Nov. 9, said Pratt. Senior Director for Substance Misuse and Behavioral Health for the Governor's Office John Wozmak, otherwise known as the state's Drug Czar, said Wednesday that this is the "right move." "We don't have adolescents on waiting lists. We do have adults on waiting lists for treatment beds," he said. Wozmak said the state is working with the Phoenix House to open at least three intensive outpatient service programs for adolescents in regions most affected by substance abuse. Wozmak said the most current research suggests structured, intensive outpatient programs are more beneficial than a 30-day residential program. Polly Morris, formerly of Monadnock Voices for Prevention, but now with CADY Inc. of Plymouth, was disappointed the Phoenix House will relocate these beds, but she agreed with Wozmak, that it's better to serve wait listed adults than leave beds unfilled. Mary Drew of Monadnock Drug Abuse and Alcohol Prevention wasn't sure. "We're already in a very dark light," said Drew, about New Hampshire and its substance abuse problem. "It's a sad move." When Gov. Maggie Hassan visited the Phoenix House in Dublin Tuesday, she advocated reauthorizing Medicaid reimbursements to support programs interested in expanding. "There is a need here," she told Pratt and other Phoenix House staff. "Not a lot of parents want to send their kids to Rhode Island." Source: <http://www.ledgertranscript.com/news/19204559-95/teen-program-dismantled#>

Man claims family member locked out of Alief group home in rain Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print Man claims family member locked out of Alief group home in rain SALIEF, Texas - The state is investigating an Alief group home after a man claimed their sister was locked out and put out in the rain over the weekend. "I got a call Sunday from a police officer saying he found my sister overnight in the rain in her hospital gown," Michael Little said. Michael Little's sister, 51-year-old Quenta Little, is schizophrenic and had been living at Angel Personal Care group home for about a month. But Sunday she ended up 23 miles away in Northwest Harris County. Michael Little said he was stunned by what the owner told him happened. "She admitted that she had been put out the home, locked out in the rain," Michael Little said. The house manager told Channel 2 that's not what happened. "She gets in that state of mind you can't hold her, she'll break out of doors, windows and she fights, and we're not allowed to restrain anyone," Anthony Arthur said. "She could have come in at any given moment but she went on, she's a drifter and when she goes into those rages, she's gonna go." Michael Little said his sister has never wandered away before. He's just grateful to the officer who found her. "I really think you saved her life, I appreciate that," Michael Little said. He has moved his sister to another facility. Adult Protective Services is now investigating. He has moved his sister to another facility. Adult Protective Services is now investigating. Source: <http://www.click2houston.com/news/man-claims-family-member-locked-out-of-alief-group-home-in-rain/36109518>

Document: Youth jail guard sexually abused teen inmate 12 News, Phoenix 8:57 a.m. MST October 29, 2015 Patrice Dawson's initial appearance at Maricopa County court. Court documents obtained Thursday say Patrice Dawson, then a corrections officer at the Adobe Mountain School youth corrections facility in Phoenix, engaged in sexual acts with a juvenile inmate. As we reported Wednesday, Dawson was fired after allegations of "sexual misconduct." An arrest report says the victim is a male inmate over the age of 15. Dawson was booked on suspicion of sexual abuse, sexual conduct with a minor, and unlawful sexual conduct by custodian. She's eligible for conditional release on a $2,500 bond, court documents say. Source: <http://www.12news.com/story/news/local/valley/2015/10/29/document-youth-jail-guard-sexually-abused-teen-inmate/74798170/>

New victims come forward after operator of boys home arrested Man arrested on multiple child molestation charges Posted: Oct 30 2015 02:20AM PDT Updated: Oct 30 2015 05:42PM PDT RICHMOND, Calif. (KTVU) - One day after KTVU reported a convicted sex offender was operating a group home for teenage boys, more alleged victims have come forward. Barry Dugar, 50, was arrested in Richmond Wednesday on multiple charges of child molestation. According to authorities, he molested at least three victims on several different occasions. On Friday, police told KTVU at least two more alleged victims had come forward. Sponsored Links Grand Canyon University The Benefits of STEM Education and Earning a STEM Degree Grand Canyon University Undo Fortune.com The results of the 2015 Fortune 500 CEO survey are in... Fortune.com Undo Dugar is a known sex offender who is registered on the Mega's Law website. On Friday, Richmond police were still trying to determine how he was able to operate a group home for teenage boys without authorities knowing. New victims come forward after operator of boys home arrested News Known sex offender who ran boys home arrested in Richmond One day after KTVU reported a convicted sex offender was operating a group home for teenage boys, more alleged victims have come forward. Dugar also worked with students at John Kennedy High School. "Two victims from Kennedy High School reported that their guardian at their transitional home had sexually assaulted them," said Richmond Police Sgt. Matt Stonebreaker. According to an official with the West Contra Costa School District, Dugar was allowed to be on campus to oversee students that he was listed as a guardian. Dugar was on campus for athletic games, practices and study hall. The district said Dugar was not affiliated with the district in an official capacity and has since been banned from school sites. Dugar's previous offenses include annoying or molesting a person believed to be under 18 years of age and committing lewd or lascivious acts with a child under 14 years of age. Richmond Police say Dugar was convicted in 2009 and served time at San Quentin. Police have not released the name of the group home, but said Dugar also operated a transitional home for the homeless or people who were recently released from jail. The transitional facility is called TRUPP, or The Remember Us Peoples Project for. On Friday, the non-profit group, Prisoner Reentry Network, listed TRUPP has one of its projects on its website, but the link had been taken down by Friday afternoon. KTVU called Prisoner Reentry Network, but they had no comment. "He doesn't have a license with the state of California, Contra Costa County or the city of Richmond. So we're taking that very seriously right now, because we don't know how he's able to operate," said Stonebreaker. Related Stories Reported Lyft kidnapping a 'misunderstanding' Halloween at Lucile Packard Children's Hospital Native Americans sue over hwy 101 Caltrans project Pedestrian killed in Milpitas identified as SJ man Police said Dugar did not disclose his occupation when he registered as a sex offender. KTVU tried to contact Dugar at the address listed on the Megan's Law Registry. The person inside the home shut the door. The area where Dugar lives is less than a 30 second walk to an elementary school. Some wonder how a registered sex offender can live in the area. According to police, as long as you're not on supervised parole or probation, you can live anywhere you want as long as police know where you are. "If you're a registered sex offender you do have to register once a year on your birthday within five days of your birthday. That's all you have to do at this point," said Stonebreaker. Police say the victims in this case have been removed and are now in a safe home. Dugar is out on bail and has a restraining order to stay away from the boys group home. Richmond police say if there are more victims out there, they want to hear from them. Source: <http://www.ktvu.com/news/41093783-story>

FOX10 News Investigates: Part 3: Saving Youth Foundation Posted: Oct 30, 2015 2:26 PM PDT Updated: Oct 30, 2015 2:29 PM PDT By Renee Dials, FOX10 News Anchor BioEmail Connect Biography renee.dials@fox10tv.com By Photojournalist: Franz Barraza The sleeping quarters of children in the Saving Youth Foundation. Three people affiliated with the facility have been charged with aggravated abuse. MOBILE, AL (WALA) - FOX10 News continues our investigation into a teen residential facility and its owners now accused of abuse. The allegations that led to the indictments and arrest of three people in Mobile this year are similar to allegations that have been brought against other institutions over the years. Some of those closest to the issue are trying to get lawmakers to take notice. MOREAdditional LinksPoll The recent indictments and arrests of three people in Mobile charged with abuse at a church run residential facility for troubled teens is being followed by a group on the other side of the country. Jodi Hobbs started the organization, Survivors of Institutional Abuse. She says it's something she knows about personally. "I myself was sent to a reform school that was raided and shut down by the FBI in 1991," Hobbs said. Hobbs calls institutional abuse a nationwide problem. "They're not qualified nor trained, don't have a degree, nor license to use this behavior modification method, and a lot of times it's misused and it turns into to severe trauma and psychological abuse," she said. Saving Youth Foundation which was formerly Restoration Youth Academy was shut down in March amid allegations of abuse. Not everyone believes the charges. "All of this will soon blow over, and I believe that God already has it worked out," Marquis Jacobs said. But, some teens were making allegations against the facility long before its owners were arrested. This is what two teenagers told Miami television reporter Bob Norman in 2013. "I was terrified at this point, and I said no I won't, and then he hit me in the head," William Vargas said "I witnessed a boy being beaten by William," another teen said. Former Prichard Police Captain Charles Kennedy said he's been trying to expose the facility for years. "To me this is more important to me than my pension. Because this had to do with the lives and safety of children," Kennedy said. Kennedy said he's not against all residential youth facilities. "I have no ax to grind against boot camps, church run operations, or church run residential schools if they are run under supervision. If we know who is there, who is operating it?" Legislation was introduced in congress this summer to address the issue. Hobbs wants citizens to contact their representatives to voice their support. "It would require them to have licensure. It would require them to have skilled staff, an educated staff, it would require them to have a therapist, a licensed therapist present," Hobbs said. But, Alabama Congressman Bradley Byrne doesn't believe it's an issue for Congress. "I think that we already have laws on the books at the state level to make sure that if somebody abuses a young person that they are prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law, so I would expect us to enforce existing state law, I don't know that this is an area where the federal government should get involved," Byrne said. Byrne said similar legislation has failed in the past. When SYF was shut down earlier this year owner John Young denied allegations of abuse, and defended his co-owners including William Knott. "He used to be a marine drill sergeant and he has a way of trying to get boys minds back in line...People can make allegations but if it's true and charges were brought against him, he would go to jail," Young said. Young, Knott and Aleshia Moffett are all now charged with aggravated abuse, and they've all pleaded not guilty. The three defendants are scheduled to go on trial in February 2016. Source: <http://www.fox10tv.com/story/30386175/fox10-news-investigates-part-3>

Foster father is accused of molesting children in his care Local - Home Foster father is accused of molesting children in his care [Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print Tweet Harry Clark SPRINGFIELD, Mo. - A foster father from Springfield is accused of repeatedly molesting children who were placed in his care. Greene County prosecutors on Friday charged Harry Clark, 56, with first-degree statutory rape, two counts of first-degree statutory sodomy, and first-degree child molestation; the first charges involve a child under age 12 and the fourth one involves a child under age 14. More from KSPR.com Arkansas AG launches focus on domestic violence initiatives Missouri school administrators: too much emphasis on... Springfield mom fighting back after son was bullied Man faces 5 to 15 years in prison for fatal drunken crash Waynesville woman wins \$250K on new Missouri Lottery game In asking a judge for a $75,000 bond, prosecutors wrote this: "Multiple children have disclosed instances of abuse at the hands of the defendant while in his care as a foster parent from 2012 - 2013. The primary victim in this case describes being abused on a daily basis while in his care. Once the children were removed from the defendant's care in 2013, the defendant is reported to have driven by their new residence on multiple occasions. Based on this behavior, it is a concern that the defendant poses a continued danger to the victims in this case now that charges have been filed." A Springfield police detective wrote in the probable cause statement that the investigation started in August two years ago when allegations surfaced that Clark had abused children who were, at the time, approximately ages 14, 12, 9, 5, and 7. The children lived with Clark and his wife from April 2012 to Aug. 1, 2013. The children were interviewed at the Child Advocacy Center in August 2013, the detective said, and "no disclosures were made at the time by the children, and an interview was conducted later with Harry Clark with no admissions made." On Aug. 27 of this year, Greene County sheriff's deputies went to the home where the children now live, after being adopted. The deputies heard "allegations regarding physical and sexual abuse against Harry Clark." The children's adopted mother told deputies that Clark "drove by their house for several weeks following their removal from the Clark household," according to the probable cause statement. The children were interviewed again at the Child Advocacy Center on Sept. 16 of this year. One girl, now 7, "discussed Harry locking her in the garage area and placing duct tape over her hands and mouth. She mentioned a 'dream' but upon further questioning for clarification by the interviewer, (she) stated, 'It was something that really happened. I tried to pinch myself to make it a dream, but it wasn't happening.' (She) said Harry also used rope to tie around her legs and body while she was seated in a wooden chair. She then said Harry would kiss her and she would try to move away from him in the chair. (She) thought she was 4-years-old at the time," the probable cause statement says. A girl who is now age 14 told interviewers that "she had been shopping for underwear and Harry called her into his room to check and make sure her bra fit properly. (She) stated Harry grabbed the collar of her shirt and placed a hand down the shirt, touching her breast on the top of the bra. (She) stated Harry made a comment sexual in nature to her, and she then left the room. (She) thought she was 12-years-old at the time." A girl who is now 11 years old "described sexual abuse perpetrated upon her by Harry in a closet there. After entering the home, Harry would abuse (her) throughout the course of her time inside the Clark residence. (She) disclosed Harry taking her into his bedroom or her bedroom and locking the door before removing her clothes and placing her on the bed. When she asked him to stop, Harry told her, "No," and further explained he needed someone to do it since his wife "could not keep up with him or whatever." (She) described other times when it would occur in the kitchen or living room area if no one was home," the probable cause statement says. The third girl described being sexually abused "every day and more than once in a day" and said Clark showed her pornographic videos, took some videos of her and then would show the videos to her. The 11-year-old girl said her abuse occurred to her between the ages of 7 and 9. On Thursday, a detective talked to Clark after police executed a search warrant at his home. "During the interview, Harry made no admissions regarding the abuse against any of the children," the detective wrote in the probable cause statement. If Clark is convicted, he could receive prison sentences between 10 years and life (30 years) for statutory sodomy and statutory rape, and between five and 15 years for child molestation. He was in the Greene County jail on Friday afternoon. Online court records do not list a defense attorney for him. Source: http://www.kspr.com/news/local/foster-father-is-accused-of-molesting-children-in-his-care/21051620_36159740

Foster parents sue for subsidies Associated Press INDIANAPOLIS – The American Civil Liberties Union of Indiana has filed a lawsuit on behalf of two foster parents against the director of the Indiana Department of Child Services' Central Eligibility Unit over adoption subsidies. The lawsuit was filed Thursday on behalf of Lyons residents David and Julie Arthur, who act as foster parents for three grandsons, the Indianapolis Star reported. The couple claim the state agency violated federal law by calculating the adoption subsidy without considering "circumstances of the adopting parents and the needs of the child being adopted," according to court records. The Arthurs say they want to adopt their grandsons, who are 6, 3 and 2 years old. The couple say the boys have "profound disabilities," but that they can't pay for services needed. Medicaid covers the boys' medical needs. Their grandparents receive $145.72 per day as licensed foster parents to help offset the boys' extensive needs. If the Arthurs adopt the boys, they would get $52 per day under the Department of Child Services' "final offer" for adoption assistance payments. The couple say it would be "impossible" to "adequately and appropriately care for the children" at that amount, according to the lawsuit. The lawsuit seeks to have a judge force the department to negotiate. "We're not trying to get rich," David Arthur said. Source: <http://www.journalgazette.net/news/local/indiana/Foster-parents-sue-for-subsidies-9638227>

Mother of Severely Abused Toddler Speaks Out, Says She Warned Foster Agency | NBC Bay Area Mother of Severely Abused Toddler Speaks Out, Says She Warned Foster Agency A mother is speaking out, saying she tried to warn Santa Clara County social workers her daughter was being severely abused while in foster care. She says she took over 100 photos documenting the girl's wounds during supervised visits. By Vicky Nguyen, Michael Bott and Mark Villareal View Comments \(1\) | Email | Print Mother of Severely Abused Toddler Speaks... Link Embed Email Copy Close Link to this video Copy Close Embed this video Replay More videos (1 of 9) «» A mother is speaking out, saying she tried to warn Santa Clara County social workers that her daughter was being severely abused while in foster care. She says she took over 100 photos documenting the girl's wounds during supervised visits, but says she was ignored when she tried to show them to social workers. Investigative Reporter Vicky Nguyen reports in a story that first aired October 30, 2015. (Published Saturday, Oct. 31, 2015) A mother is speaking out and sharing photos with the NBC Bay Area Investigative Unit documenting unthinkable abuse suffered by her 4-year-old daughter while she was in foster care. The woman, whom we are identifying as "Ana" to protect her daughter's identity, has filed a lawsuit accusing the Santa Clara Department of Social Services of ignoring multiple reports of abuse for months, until her daughter nearly died. It is one of two lawsuits now filed on behalf of the little girl. The accusations reflect what may be a much larger series of problems within the DSS regarding how the agency responds to abuse reports, which were highlighted in a county audit from 2013 and a 2015 civil grand jury report. Ana says she took more than 100 photos depicting the abuse of her daughter during court-ordered supervised visits, but social workers refused to look at them. But Ana wasn't the only one who tried to report the ongoing abuse of her daughter. Court records show others tried to sound the alarm, including the child's preschool teacher. "I wish somebody [did] something and social services pays for what happened to my daughter," Ana said. This photo provided by the alleged victim's mother shows an injury she says was inflicted by the child's foster guardians. Photo credit: NBC Bay Area According to a 2013 audit issued by the Santa Clara County Board of Supervisors, there were likely many other cries for help that went unanswered during that same period. The audit found the County wasn't answering 41 percent of the calls to the emergency child abuse hotline, about 7,000 calls each year. Although a 2015 civil grand jury report found the number of child abuse calls going unanswered is down to 11 percent, high turnover at the department and rising caseloads for social workers continue to be an issue. That means slower response times and less one-on-one time between social workers and foster children. Experts say that creates trust barriers and decreases the likelihood a child will report abuse or neglect. While DSS reported the number of answered hotline calls goes to 93 percent when they factor in returned voicemails, Santa Clara County Supervisor Dave Cortese says he's not satisfied. Cortese was the chair of the county committee that ordered the 2013 audit of DSS. "I don't think any member of the board will be satisfied with anything less than 100 percent responsiveness to those calls and immediate responsiveness to the actual needs of the children and families," Cortese said. How to Help Foster Children CASA associate and legal director Phil Ladew explains how you can volunteer to be a "Court Appointed Special Advocate" and make a difference for foster children. (Published Thursday, Oct. 29, 2015) Phil Ladew has seen both sides of foster care system. He's the legal and associate director of California CASA, a non-profit that works to expand and support the network of court appointed special advocate programs in the state. But Ladew also grew up in the foster system, a personal history that drove him to devote his career to improving outcomes for the state's most vulnerable children. He's seen a lot, and knows spotting abuse can be tricky for social workers. "It can be very difficult, actually," Ladew said. "You're dealing with judgment and you're dealing with people who can hide the abuse." But, when children don't see the same social worker on a consistent basis, Ladew says spotting patterns of abuse becomes even harder. "If you have a high caseload it can be very challenging to spot the things you should be spotting," Ladew said. While social services has hired more call center workers to staff the hotline, director Robert Menicocci said at an October hearing there are currently 50 vacancies for social workers and caseloads are high. Investigative Near Death of Foster Child Sheds Light on Flawed System "The caseload has been in the low-to-mid-20s, but through this transition right now, this peak that we're having of the turnover and such, it has gotten into the higher 20s, and that's obviously of great concern to us," Menicocci said. "We think a number that is certainly lower than that is much more effective." Menicocci said recent studies have shown that a caseload in the 15-to-20 range is ideal. Menicocci and other social workers named in the lawsuit declined interviews with NBC Bay Area, and the agency refused to answer even basic procedural questions not related to Ana's case. Lori Medina, director of the Department of Family and Children, also did not respond to any emails for information. In addition to the issues with the child abuse hotline, the civil grand jury report found that surrounding counties had more robust systems in place to respond to voicemails left on the hotline. "If a social worker cannot reach the caller, for confidentiality reasons, the social worker does not leave their number," the report states. "The Grand Jury was told the social workers do not make a second attempt to return the call. In comparison, the Grand Jury was told by both Alameda and San Mateo County three or four attempts are made to return voicemails." Ana says social services should have done more for her daughter. Despite multiple reports, despite social workers seeing visible injuries on the child and despite photos of injuries Ana says she tried to show them, social workers left her in the home of her abusers until it was almost too late. "The first time I talked to the social worker and tried to explain to her and tried to show her the picture, she [didn't] want to see it, she [didn't] want to look at it," Ana said. Ana's daughter ended up in the hospital in critical condition last year, with bites, burns and bruises covering her body. The child's guardian, half-sister Krystal Paredes, is now facing torture charges that could potentially send her to prison for life. Others in the home are charged with felony child abuse for allegedly being complicit. Near Death of Foster Child Sheds Light on Flawed System Despite multiple reports of abuse, a 4-year-old child suffered for months, nearly dying from blood loss and trauma while in foster care. Records obtained by NBC Bay Area reveal the Santa Clara Department of Social Services recorded numerous complaints about the injuries from caregivers, relatives and teachers before taking action. Investigative Reporter Vicky Nguyen reports in a story that first aired October 29, 2015. (Published Thursday, Oct. 29, 2015) Ladew says we may never change the abusive behavior of some individuals, but we have room to grow as a society when it comes to the care of our most vulnerable. "We know there's evil in the world," Ladew said. "People are going to abuse children. But once we know about it as a society, once we discover it, once we receive a phone call, what do we do?" Ana says in the case of her child, social services didn't do enough. "I feel like my hands are tied," she said. "My hands are tied. I feel like nobody can help me." San Jose attorney Robert Mezzetti is representing Ana in the civil case against the county. He says agencies like the Department of Social Services are supposed to provide a safety net for the vulnerable. In this case, he says the safety net failed. "You want to have faith in those people because those people have been trained," Mezzetti said. "Those people have been supervised, hopefully in the correct way, and you feel that it's a safety net. And when that safety net fails, it's devastating to everybody. It's devastating to society in general." We Investigate: More from NBC Bay Area's Investigative Unit As for Ana's daughter, she's recovering from the trauma she suffered in the foster system, and Ana hopes they will be reunited soon. Mezzetti said their lawsuit will expose the flaws in the system and hopefully lead to significant changes. "Without exposing this type of behavior, without exposing this type of failure, the law doesn't change and neither does the procedure," Mezzetti said. Cortese said DSS leaders are expected to detail progress and change since the 2013 audit at the next Finance and Government Operations Committee meeting November 12th at 2 pm at 70 West Hedding Street in San Jose. Source: <http://www.nbcbayarea.com/news/local/Mother-of-Severely-Abused-Toddler-Speaks-Out-Says-She-Warned-Foster-Agency-338989182.html>

A.G. Schneiderman Announces Convictions Of Two Former Group Home Workers For Endangering The Welfare Of Developmentally Disabled Residents Of A State-Run Group Home

Former Direct Service Assistant At Melville Estates Group Home Found Guilty After Trial; Other Pleads Guilty
Schneiderman: I Am Committed To Protecting Our Most Vulnerable Citizens, Including The Developmentally Disabled, From Abusive Caregivers
 HAUPPAUGE – Attorney General Eric T. Schneiderman announced today that James P. Brown, Jr., a former Direct Service Assistant at the state run group home Melville Estates in Melville, was found guilty of violently punching a 53 year-old, severely impaired, intellectually disabled resident of the home in the face in February 2014. Melville Estates is a group home for developmentally disabled adults in Melville, NY. In a separate prosecution arising out of Melville Estates, Alley Chambers admitted that in February 2014 while he was employed as a Direct Service Assistant at Melville Estates, he punched a 56 year-old, profoundly intellectually disabled adult in the face while the resident did nothing other than sit in a chair. Both Defendants were removed from the state payroll and are awaiting sentence. "These acts of abuse by health care workers on the disabled and other vulnerable members of our society will not be tolerated," said Attorney General Schneiderman. "My office will continue to aggressively pursue and prosecute those individuals who prey upon our defenseless and infirm citizens." Attorney General Schneiderman thanked the Office for People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD) and the New York State Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs for their assistance in conducting the investigations. Brown, 33, of Farmingdale, was convicted of Endangering the Welfare of an Incompetent or Physically Disabled Person in the First Degree, a class E felony, after a bench trial before Supreme Court Justice William Condon in Suffolk County Court in Riverhead. Chambers, 21, of Brentwood, pled guilty to Endangering the Welfare of an Incompetent or Physically Disabled Person in the Second Degree, a class A misdemeanor. The case was investigated by Special Investigator Stephen Clarke and Special Investigator Greg S. Muroff with assistance from Deputy Chief Investigator Kenneth Morgan. The cases are being prosecuted by Special Assistant Attorney General Lara Merchant of the Medicaid Fraud Control Unit (MFCU) Hauppauge Regional Office. Jane Zwirn-Turkin is the Regional Director of the Hauppauge Regional Office. MFCU is led by Acting Director Amy Held and Assistant Deputy Attorney General Paul J. Mahoney. The Criminal Justice Division is led by Executive Deputy Attorney General Kelly Donovan. Source: <http://www.ag.ny.gov/press-release/ag-schneiderman-announces-convictions-two-former-group-home-workers-endangering>

Racialized and Gendered Violence Permeates School Discipline Monday, 02 November 2015 00:00 By Connie Wun, The Feminist Wire | News Analysis
