

HEAL TEEN LIBERTY NEWS

(IF YOU ARE AN AUTHOR OR PUBLISHER CONCERNED ABOUT COPYRIGHT, PLEASE SEE OUR FAIR USE DISCLAIMER (BOTTOM OF HOME PAGE))

2016-2017 Updates, Progress, and Headlines

The following includes updates, progress, and headlines related to teen liberty and institutional abuse. News reports regarding individual programs are now shared primarily on the background information/staff list pages of our website unless the program referenced was closed prior to creation of a staff/background information page or is located outside of the USA. To search our news page using a PC (not a Mac), hit "CTRL+F" and enter the name of the program then hit "enter key" or "return key". If using a Mac (not a PC), hit "Command+F" and enter the name of the program then hit "enter". The Command key on a Mac is also known as the Apple Key or Clover Key.

Commentary: Wordsworth case shows it's time to rethink 'treatment' for juveniles Updated: November 3, 2016 — 3:01 AM EDT Wordsworth Academy, a residential treatment center in West Philadelphia where a 17-year-old boy died on Oct. 13. by Mical Raz and Deborah Doroshow Mical Raz and Deborah Doroshow A 17-year-old is dead. Assaulted in his room by the very adults responsible for his safety, he uttered his last words: "Get off me, I can't breathe." He died at Wordsworth Academy, a Philadelphia institution euphemistically described as a "treatment center" for children with behavioral problems. Currently housing 82 children and youth, the majority of whom were placed there by juvenile courts, Wordsworth Academy is responsible for providing rehabilitative treatment for this challenging population. Instead, according to state reports, children at Wordsworth are housed in unsanitary crowded conditions, abused physically and sexually, and now, a child is dead. In this case, therapy has proven worse than punishment. Unfortunately, this is the case with all too many treatment centers, to which children and adolescents are referred by courts and social services agencies. This child's death is not the first to happen in such a center, and sadly, it is unlikely to be the last. This wasn't always the case. Juvenile courts were created at the turn of the 20th century in order to rehabilitate, rather than simply punish, children whose illegal behavior was thought to stem from difficult home lives, poverty, or psychological troubles. By the 1940s and 1950s, a group of child-welfare experts founded small, progressive institutions called residential treatment centers to treat so-called delinquent and troubled children. They reclassified these children as "emotionally disturbed," tracing their problems back to difficult home lives and offering them intensive inpatient therapy, and ultimately, a chance at a better life. Fifty years before Wordsworth Academy, Walton Village in Philadelphia took such an approach to juvenile delinquency. There, boys received group and individual therapy, and were encouraged to set up a peer self-governance system. When they acted out, they were offered more treatment, rather than punishment. Unfortunately, such centers were small and often inaccessible, especially to racial and ethnic minorities. Instead, many poor African American children were sent to "training schools," punitive institutions where they often experienced verbal and physical abuse. By the 1970s, child mental-health and welfare experts were faced with an exploding population of emotionally disturbed children, many of whom were African American. Youthful offenders were increasingly viewed as dangerous, rather than emotionally disturbed. This coincided with a shift in racial demographics of arrests and imprisonment. More black boys were now involved with the juvenile justice system, and they received harsher treatment than their white counterparts. Fueled by racism and an unfounded concern over an increase in violent crime, the 1990s heralded the inflammatory rhetoric of "super-predators" and harsher sentencing. Still, rehabilitation remains the stated goal of the juvenile justice system. The therapeutic model gives the court a great deal of discretion, which is an opportunity for personal bias to come into play. Punishment does not need to fit the crime. Children can be sent for indeterminate periods of time to treatment institutions of questionable benefit until they are "fixed," a term with no clear definition. They can be moved from one institution to the other for "failure to adjust," which in Pennsylvania enables the system to place a child in a secure detention center until a new placement is found. There is little accountability as to what treatment entails, and when it is complete. Treatment centers, some of which are private for-profit companies, define measures of success, and have clear incentives to fill beds. But if centers like Wordsworth aren't the answer, what is? The success of the "Missouri model," a novel approach to juvenile justice, suggests that the residential treatment movement of the past can inform how we treat juvenile offenders today. In Missouri, youth offenders are sent by juvenile courts to small residential institutions, where they sleep in comfortable dorm rooms. When they feel upset or act out, the response is not strict punishment but rather a conversation with peers. This model seems to be working. Recidivism rates are lower than in states using a more traditional approach, violence has significantly decreased, suicides of youth in custody have stopped completely, and costs are down. Unfortunately, many "treatment centers" remain prisons by another name. Until juvenile justice is reformed, children will continue to suffer abuse and even death in the very facilities designed to treat them. Mical Raz (micalraz@mail.med.upenn.edu), M.D., and Deborah Doroshow (deborah.doroshow@yale.edu), M.D., are physicians and historians of medicine. Source: http://www.philly.com/philly/opinion/20161103_Commentary_Wordsworth_case_shows_it_s_time_to_rethink_treatment_for_juveniles.html

Texas urged to end foster care group homes, limit caseworker... | www.mystatesman.com Texas urged to end foster care group homes, limit caseworker workloads State & Regional Govt & Politics By Julie Chang - American-Statesman Staff 0 Posted: 6:48 p.m. Friday, Nov. 4, 2016 Highlights The reports comes after a federal judge ruled that the Texas foster care system is unconstitutional. Court-appointed special masters issue dozens of recommendations. The special masters' recommendations include better reporting, care and caseworker retention. Court-appointed special masters Friday released dozens of recommendations on how Texas should overhaul its troubled foster care system, including eliminating the use of foster care group homes, limiting the workload of caseworkers and proposing a plan to curb caseworker turnover rates. "This is a hugely important day for Texas children because this is the next step in crucial reform of the foster care system," said Paul Yetter, a Houston attorney who is representing foster children suing the state. In December, U.S. District Judge Janis G. Jack of Corpus Christi found the Texas foster care system unconstitutional following a years-long case and suggested that foster children were better off before they entered the system. Jack ordered the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services — which oversees the foster care system — to make some immediate changes and appoint special masters to recommend further ones. Those special masters, former New Jersey Commissioner of Children and Families Kevin Ryan and Francis McGovern, a Duke University law professor, made five dozen recommendations, which Jack will review and could force the agency to implement. READ: The entirety of the special masters' report released Friday + Jay Janner Texas Department of Family and Protective Services chief Hank Whitman testifies at a Texas House Human Services Committee hearing in July. Jay Janner Texas Department of Family and Protective Services chief Hank Whitman testifies at a Texas House Human Services Committee hearing in July. Patrick Crimmins, spokesman for the state's child welfare agency, said the agency has been working to fix the foster care system, including finding more foster homes and ways to improve the health care of children, and ensuring caseworkers are spending more time with families and children. "The state of Texas has made improving foster care a priority and will continue to do so," he said. Overhauling foster care + Jay Janner Mary Sweeney, left, is shown with her daughter Alexandria Hill, who was 2 years old when she was killed by her ... read more Jay Janner Mary Sweeney, left, is shown with her daughter Alexandria Hill, who was 2 years old when she was killed by her foster mother, Sherill Small, at a Rockdale home in 2013. (Photo courtesy of Mary Sweeney) The New York-based advocacy group Children's Rights sued the state on behalf of foster children in 2011, accusing the state's child welfare agency of maintaining insufficient numbers of caseworkers, moving children too frequently and putting them at risk of abuse and neglect. Attorneys representing the state argued that Texas' caseworker turnover rate and rate of foster placements with relatives and adoptions were comparable to other states. The state is appealing Jack's ruling. Eight foster children died from abuse or neglect in foster homes in fiscal 2013, up from two the year before. In 2014, three died in foster care. Kate Murphy with the advocacy group Texans Care for Children said that the special masters' plan wouldn't fix all the problems with the foster care system. She said the federal lawsuit and the special masters' report only address children who are in foster care for at least a year and are permanently in the state's custody — 10,795 of the state's 30,000 foster care children as of Sept. 30, according to the state agency. "State leaders will have to do more to make sure that kids in foster care heal from the trauma they've already experienced and grow up healthy," Murphy said. The state agency has reported that it has spent about $500,000 for the report. "The preparation of the report and the further billable hours it recommends come at considerable expense to Texas taxpayers. Though the litigation has brought attention to a broken system, it will not fix foster care,” said Brandon Logan with conservative Austin-based Texas Public Policy Foundation think tank. Recommendations The masters’ recommendations call for halting the use of foster group homes within 18 months of Jack’s potential court order. Ryan and McGovern said that until then the state should limit the number of children in group homes to eight, particularly for sibling groups. Foster group homes are supposed to have up to 12 children, but Jack in her ruling said that the limit isn’t enforced. She also cited several deficiencies in group homes, including the lack of round-the-clock supervision. She required all foster group homes to have 24-hour supervision, which the special masters echoed in their recommendations Friday. McGovern and Ryan also noted that they found that “children were not timely (or ever) examined by doctors to determine if they had been assaulted. Injuries went untreated. Necessary medical follow up did not occur. Incomplete and missing health care information was a common feature in the records.” They said foster care children needed better health care management, including regular doctors’ visits and establishment of health records. McGovern and Ryan also recommended that foster care caseworkers have a standard — not a fixed — caseload of 14 to 17 cases. They want the state agency to develop a plan to reduce the turnover rate of foster care caseworkers. The Child Protective Services caseworker turnover rate, which includes foster care caseworkers, was 25.4 percent in fiscal year 2016. Retaining caseworkers Last month, the commissioner of the state’s child welfare agency, Hank Whitman, asked for more state funding to hire 550 caseworkers and investigators — 105 of them for foster care children. He also recommended a $12,000 pay raise for them. Whitman said he was most concerned about the high numbers of children who had been reported potentially abused or neglected and weren’t seen by caseworkers in a timely manner. State Senate Finance Committee Chairwoman Jane Nelson, R-Flower Mound, has created a work group of five fellow committee members to consider Whitman’s plan and how to pay for it. “It is my strong belief that we cannot wait until the session to act,” Nelson said, referring to the legislative session that begins in January. State Sen. Kirk Watson, D-Austin, a member of the work group, said that if Jack orders the state to implement the special masters’ recommendations, lawmakers will have to find more money than what Whitman is requesting. “We have an unconstitutional system because these kids are not free of an unreasonable risk of harm. The way I hope we look at this is not with the first question being, ‘how much will it cost?’ Instead, ‘how do we protect these children?’” Watson said. Additional recommendations in the special masters’ report: Quality monthly face-to-face visits between foster care children and caseworkers. Centralized location for the child’s case records, including updated photos of the child. Better accessibility for foster children to report abuse. Better support services for children before they exit the foster care system. More transparency in investigations of foster homes. Ensuring that sexually abused or sexually aggressive foster children are separated from other children unless there is no documented safety risk. Reducing the risk of child-on-child abuse through better reporting, investigating and mental health assessments of children who have been sexually abused. Prohibiting placing unrelated children more than three years apart in age in the same room in a residential facility unless there’s a documented assessment that such a move is safe. Better tracking of the availability of foster homes that don’t have a child present. Decreasing the number of foster children who are placed outside of their home community. Submitting a plan to expand the number of foster homes. Stop placing foster children in agency offices or other unregulated facilities. Source: <http://www.mystatesman.com/news/news/state-regional-govt-politics/texas-urged-to-end-foster-care-group-homes-limit-c/ns4K5/>

Peterborough foster parent charged with sexual assault Peterborough Police Lance Anderson next play/pause pre 1/1 Peterborough This Week By Lance Anderson PETERBOROUGH — A foster parent in Peterborough is facing several sexual assault charges following an investigation involving three victims. In October 2016 the Peterborough Police Service received information regarding several sexual offences that occurred between February 2016 and October 2016. The allegations involved three victims — two females under 16 years of age and one female under 17 years of age. During all three incidents the suspect was providing foster care in the Peterborough area to the victims. On Friday, Nov. 4, officers went to the suspect’s residence where he was placed under arrest. As a result of the investigation the accused was charged with the following: · Luring person under 16 years of age by means of telecommunication for the purpose of sexual invitation · Sexual assault on a person under 16 years of age · Sexual interference with a person under 16 years of age · Sexual exploitation The accused appeared in court on Nov. 4 and was remanded in custody and was scheduled to appear again in court on Monday (Nov. 7). The suspect’s name is not being released by police in order to protect the identity of the victims involved. Source: <http://www.mykawartha.com/news-story/6951916-peterborough-foster-parent-charged-with-sexual-assault/>

Teen beaten unconscious at Dayton youth home is being relocated ODJFS: Teen beaten unconscious at Dayton youth home is being relocated Updated: Saturday, October 15, 2016 @ 11:28 AM By: Breaking News Staff 0 Share this on your timeline! From To Compose your message Thanks for sharing with your followers! ODJFS: Teen beaten unconscious at Dayton youth home is being relocated <http://www.whio.com/news/local/odjfs-teen-beaten-unconscious-dayton-youth-home-being-relocated/UXsqBguFai3QR7dJuOiZF/> UPDATE @ 6:15 p.m. (Oct. 14): Cody Davidson is being relocated to a youth home facility in Columbus, an official with the Ohio Department of Job and Family Services said in a statement released this afternoon. The official also confirms that ODJFS is investigating the incident that occurred this week at Pilot House, on Salem Avenue. Davidson’s mother, Chasity Ranson, said she is continuing her campaign to get her son sent home to be with his family. FIRST REPORT (Oct. 13) A 16-year-old resident at Pilot House, a Dayton home for troubled youth, was beaten unconscious by another male resident and his mother wants to know why an employee watched the episode that left her son with a fractured skull and missing at least five teeth. Cody Davidson had been at Pilot House, on Salem Avenue, for five days when Chasity Ranson said he told her that on Monday night, people there gave him boxing gloves to spar with another young man at the facility. According to Montgomery County Children Services, the facility is a home that helps rehabilitate troubled youth. Davidson has aggression issues, according to his mother. According to Ranson, who has filed a complaint with police, the other boy took off his gloves and proceeded to beat her son as an employee looked on. Davidson was unconscious and bloody when police arrived, according to an incident report. “A shattered palette,” she told News Center 7’s Caroline Reinwald on Thursday night. “He’s missing five teeth. He’s going to have ... reconstructive surgery to replace the teeth. He needed 36 stitches to replace his outer area of his mouth,” she said. Davidson — and the boy who administered the beating — are still residents at the facility. This news organization has asked children services for comment. Ranson said she is working to get her son out of the facility. Source: <http://www.whio.com/news/local/odjfs-teen-beaten-unconscious-dayton-youth-home-being-relocated/UXsqBguFai3QR7dJuOiZF/>

Special-ed student confined 617 times in 6 months despite state laws Originally published November 12, 2016 at 6:04 pm Updated November 13, 2016 at 1:04 pm 1 of 5 Renay Ferguson, whose 10-year old son has ADHD, gave The Seattle Times school records that show her son was placed in isolation 148 times in the span of two years at two different elementary schools.... (Sophia Nahli Allison / The Seattle Times) More The effectiveness of a law limiting how often school officials physically restrain or isolate students is impossible to judge because nearly half the state’s school districts missed the reporting deadline. Share story By Ellie Silverman Seattle Times staff reporter During the first six months of 2016, staff members at Bellingham’s Sehome High School confined a student with a developmental disability alone in a room on 617 separate occasions — an average of about six times each school day. The extensive use of the approved but controversial technique occurred despite a 2015 state law that sought to limit how often school officials physically restrain or isolate students — tactics typically used to control outbursts from students with behavioral or emotional disabilities. The same law requires schools to report such incidents to state education officials, who “may use this data to investigate the training, practices, and other efforts used by schools and districts to reduce the use of restraint and isolation.” But a Seattle Times review of the fledgling attempt to collect this information found inconsistent compliance that makes it impossible to judge the effectiveness of the new legislation. Nearly half of the state’s 295 school districts missed a July 1 deadline to report incident numbers to Washington’s Office of Superintendent of Public Instruction. After questions from The Times about the poor compliance, state education officials extended the deadline and this month released a report based on data provided by 217 school districts. But even the numbers that state officials successfully compiled — showing 20,115 incidents over a six-month period — give no real insight into whether the restraint or isolation techniques were only used in an emergency where someone was likely to get seriously hurt, as the law requires. Therapeutic hold: Technique that pins a student’s arms across the chest or... State Rep. Gerry Pollet, D-Seattle, who sponsored the legislation, called the response rate by districts “dismal.” He said school districts resisted the new legislation from the beginning and as a result, he is still hearing “horror stories” from parents who consider the restraint and isolation techniques barbaric. “I have to say, we’ve got a long way to go to implement this properly,” Pollet said. “I don’t expect us to change the world by having the governor sign the legislation, but I think this has been tougher sledding than I had hoped for.” Linda Mullen, the communications director for the Washington Education Association, the state’s largest teachers union, said implementing the new requirements has been difficult because state lawmakers included no funding for training. “When I talk to teachers and paraprofessionals, they want their kids to be safe and they want to be safe,” Mullen said. “They want support from the district and the state to make sure they have the tools needed to do their jobs, which is to teach our kids.” Pollet said that if districts feel they need more resources to meet the requirements of the law, OSPI should assess the cost of adequate training and present a funding proposal to the legislature. However, education funding is already a contentious issue given the Washington state Supreme Court's 2012 ruling in McCleary vs. State of Washington that the state has neglected its financial obligations to schools. Several of the Puget Sound region's largest school districts — including Seattle, Bellevue, Lake Washington and Edmonds — complied with the reporting requirements. Issaquah and Pasco were two of the largest school districts in the state to miss the initial reporting deadline, but both have since reported their data to the state.

ADVERTISING inRead invented by Teads Shelton is among the 78 districts that failed to report its incident numbers. Pam Farr, the executive director of teaching and learning at the Shelton School District, blamed unfamiliarity with the new requirement and noted that her district has undergone some staff turnover in the last few months. "It unfortunately was an oversight," Farr said. The district is working to finish data collection now to either submit it late or prepare for next year, she said. Doug Gill, OSPI assistant superintendent for special education, said in August he did not know specific consequences for districts that did not report the data. But he expects districts to comply with the law limiting restraint and isolation techniques to emergency situations. "It is OSPI's responsibility to help provide resources for districts to adjust practices, but it's the responsibility of the district" to follow the law, Gil said. "I don't think you can expect OSPI to monitor every classroom in the state." The Sehome High School student with 617 isolation incidents stood out as the most extreme example in the OSPI data. The number was three times greater than a Valley View Middle School student whose 155 isolation incidents in the Snohomish District were the second most reported to the state for a single student. Michael Haberman, Bellingham's special-education director, said the district does not restrain or isolate students outside of emergency situations. He said privacy laws prohibited him from commenting on the Sehome High student, but Haberman confirmed that the tally is accurate. "It's not what we want to see," Haberman said. "I don't want to see any student restrained or isolated at all. There should be light shined on this." New limits on techniques Federal law requires school districts to provide disabled students with a "free appropriate public education," so a student in special education has specific academic and behavioral programs tailored to the individual's needs. State data shows that 13.5 percent of Washington's almost 1.1 million students have a special-education designation, and prior rules allowed teachers to include the use of restraint or isolation in their programs to correct disruptive behavior, even if it was not an emergency. Washington state's House Bill 1240, which passed in 2015, requires school districts to limit such containment tactics to situations where there is an "imminent likelihood of serious harm." The new law closely mirrors the U.S. Department of Education's recommendation that restraint and seclusion should only occur when there is "a threat of imminent danger of serious physical harm to the student or others." Washington's law joined a growing movement around the country in which several states have pushed for limits on when students can be physically restrained — either in a hold by a school staffer or with a tether — or isolated in a special auxiliary room set aside for seclusion. Children's control position: Another more aggressive hold that should only be... (Illustration by Kelly Shea) More The shift from what had been considered acceptable methods to discipline children with disabilities followed reports of injuries and even deaths of students restrained against their will. Parents, advocates and experts have also said that confining disabled students alone in a room can be a traumatic event. Renay Ferguson, whose 10-year old son has ADHD, gave The Seattle Times school records that show her son was placed in isolation 148 times in the span of two years at two different elementary schools. Each isolation incident ranged from two minutes to three hours, the records show. Ferguson's son felt like he was "going to die" when he was in the Rose Hill Elementary isolation room in Kirkland, and he would take off his clothes to relieve the feeling of suffocation, he reported to his mother and doctor. While in the isolation room April 18, Ferguson's son banged his head against the door and tied his shoelaces around his wrist and neck, according to district records. He suffered a concussion that day, according to a report from his doctor. Ferguson said she and her son no longer trust officials in the Lake Washington school district. "The school district cannot service these kids because they are different," Ferguson said. Paul Vine, the district's special services director, would not comment about Ferguson's son specifically, but he said the Lake Washington School District policy aligns with the state legislation, and officials only use restraint or isolation when there is an emergency. Incomplete picture The OSPI data shows school staff isolated about 1,400 students and restrained about 2,400 others, although the same student may have been both restrained and isolated. Roughly 60 percent of those incidents occurred in elementary schools, according to The Times review of the state's data. The data also tracks the specific method used against the student: closets for isolation, tethers for restraint, weighted blankets for calming and specific physical holds that restrict arm and leg movements. However, the data does not show what triggered the need for restraint or isolation and does not explain how it occurred in an emergency situation. In an effort to determine whether the reported incidents could all be considered an emergency, The Times obtained through the state's public records law reports for more than 5,000 restraint and seclusion incidents from 10 districts. School officials must document each incident and provide those records to the parents, but the records are not reported to OSPI along with the district data. Some of the reports obtained by The Times included details indicating that students had turned violent, punched themselves, run into traffic or attempted to hurt another student or staff member. Others were vague or just had boilerplate language, leaving it unclear whether the techniques were used, as the law allows, to prevent serious harm. But many of the incidents, at least as they were reported, did not appear to justify the need for restraints or isolation. Team control position: A more aggressive hold that should only be used when a student is a risk to himself or others. (Illustration by Kelly Shea) For example, a ninth-grader in Puyallup was placed in isolation for 48 minutes on Nov. 4, 2015, because he had been yelling and wasn't following directions, according to district records. Puyallup's Executive Director of Special Education, Karen Mool, said she could not determine whether the case was an appropriate use of isolation based on only the report. "Every situation has its different uniquenesses. Were there other incidents during the day that added on to this?" she said. "It really depends on the situation and what's happening in the classroom." A May 6 incident report shows that Kent School District staff at Ridgewood Elementary School restrained and isolated a child for 30 minutes because the student threw glue sticks. The district's report did not have more details on the incident. Chris Loftis, the district's executive director of communications, clarified by email that although the incident originated with the student throwing glue sticks, "there was significant aggressive escalation from that point" that included the student punching the principal in the stomach. The district is currently revisiting its reporting forms to include more context for each incident, Loftis said. Two training programs, Right Response and Crisis Prevention Institute (CPI), emphasize that physical restraint should be a last resort. The CPI training teaches educators to identify signs of anxiety, such as pacing, wringing hands or staring, and attempt to ease tensions by listening and giving the student some time to calm down. Two-person escort: Form of physical restraint used to move an agitated student from one location to another. (Illustration by Kelly Shea) If a student acts defensive by refusing to participate in activities or shouting, CPI advises teachers to ask the student to do something simple, such as standing up. The only time physical intervention should be used is if the student could hurt himself or others, such as hitting or self-injurious behavior, according to the training. Despite the uneven compliance with the new law, there does not appear to be widespread discontent with how education officials are using restraint and isolation techniques. State records show that OSPI completed 12 Special Education Citizen Complaint investigations concerning the techniques in 2016, with one case still pending as of mid-October. In one of those 12 cases, University Place School District staff put a first-grade student with high-functioning autism in seclusion "on a number of occasions" when there was no danger, according to OSPI files received in a public records request. The student told his mom that he "thought people hated him" when staff took him to the therapy room, according to the documents. Investigators found in that case and in four others that staff used restraint or isolation outside of emergency situations. Each time OSPI ordered school district officials to ensure its staff are properly trained, the records show. The Office of the Education Ombuds, an agency within the governor's office that resolves complaints and makes policy recommendations, received a total of 34 complaints concerning the use of restraint or isolation techniques from July 2015 through June 2016, records show. Carrie Basas, director of the Ombuds office, said school district officials remain confused over how to implement changes and comply with the new law. "There's just a mix of information out there that could be better supported through greater professional-development resources," Basas said this summer. "Not everyone's on the same page." Seattle Times reporter Mike Baker contributed to this report. Mike Baker: mbaker@seattletimes.com. Ellie Silverman on Twitter @esilverman11. Source: <http://www.seattletimes.com/seattle-news/education/special-ed-student-confined-617-times-in-6-months-despite-state-laws/>

Advocate for troubled teens charged with fraud By Phil Fairbanks Published November 16, 2016 Updated November 16, 2016 SHARE TWEET EMAIL Umar Adeyola is well known for his work with at risk teens. Now he's the one in trouble with the law - again. Adeyola, head of the non-profit HEART Foundation, appeared in Buffalo federal court Wednesday to face allegations that he cheated local health insurers and a California non-profit group out of $365,000. Charged in a multi-count indictment, he is accused of submitting 4,000 fraudulent claims to Blue Cross Blue Shield, Univera Healthcare and Independent Health over a five-year period starting in 2009. Advertisement He also is accused of cheating the Latino Coalition for Faith and Community Leadership in California and its federally-funded program to help adults and high school dropouts prepare for employment. "There are 48 counts," Assistant U.S. Attorney Maura O'Donnell said of the charges against Adeyola. "It's going to be a complex case." Adeyola, who is well-known by judges and others for his advocacy on behalf of troubled teens, was released Wednesday. U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael J. Roemer ordered him to wear an electronic monitoring device and limited his travel to Western New York. This is not Adeyola's first run in with the law. In 2001, he pleaded guilty to identity theft and admitted obtaining the personal information of General Motors employees in the Town of Tonawanda and using those identities to obtain fraudulent consumer loans. He was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Eight years later, Adeyola pleaded guilty again, this time in a case charging him with fraud and making false statements. He was accused of defrauding a local company. [\[Related: Funds pulled from city project tied to ex-con\]](#) For Adeyola, the allegations represent a sharp contrast to his reputation as an advocate for at-risk teens and youth diversion programs. His group, the HEART (Helping Empower At-Risk Teens) Foundation, is closed now but, for years, provided services intended to support young people, many of them in the criminal justice system. Founded in 2008, HEART provided a "full range of counseling, vocational and supportive services" with the goal of empowering teens to succeed, according to its web site. The group operated out of offices on Kensington Avenue. Prosecutors say Adeyola's non-profit organization also allowed him to bill local insurers for $228,000 worth of psychotherapy and other types of care that was never provided. They claim the defendant also cheated the Latino Coalition after the California group received $9 million in federal funding to start a jobs training program. Adeyola's group provided counseling, mental health therapy and other clinical services to the coalition but, according to prosecutors, fraudulently billed the coalition for $135,000 in expenses. The charges against Adeyola, which range from health care fraud to theft of government money, are the result of an investigation by the FBI, the U.S. dept of Health and Human Services, Office of Inspector General, and the U.S. Dept. of Labor. Adeyola's defense lawyer declined to comment Wednesday. In 2011, the Buffalo Urban Renewal Agency awarded $2.18 million for a project to build housing for homeless veterans on Buffalo's East Side, a project that was sponsored by the HEART Foundation. The city agency later withdrew support for the project after reporters from The Buffalo News raised questions about Adeyola's background. Source: <http://buffalonews.com/2016/11/16/advocate-troubled-teens-charged-fraud/>

Parents Of Child Who Nearly Died While In Foster Care Seek $20M From State Child Advocate Finds DCF At Fault In Near Starvation Of Infant A report by state Child Advocate Sarah Eagan finds that DCF workers assigned to the case of an infant boy placed with relatives in Groton were responsible for "staggering failure and omissions" in the child's near starvation. A report by state Child Advocate Sarah Eagan finds that DCF workers assigned to the case of an infant boy placed with relatives in Groton were responsible for "staggering failure and omissions" in the child's near starvation. Josh Kovner Contact Reporter The biological parents of the child who nearly died of starvation, broken bones and head injuries while placed in foster care by the state are seeking permission to sue the Department of Children and Families for $20 million. In a 17-page notice filed with the state claims commissioner, the parents' lawyer, Shelley L. Graves, lays out a blistering portrayal of alleged malpractice and negligence on the part of DCF. With few exceptions, people looking to sue the state must gain permission from the claims commissioner. The foster mother, Crystal Magee of Groton, has been arrested and charged with child abuse, and the Office of the Child Advocate has issued a scathing report identifying breakdowns in care and oversight by DCF that endangered the child's life. Crystal Magee is a cousin of the boy's biological mother. The child, Dallas, was 13 months old when DCF, citing neglect, removed him and his siblings from the home of Kirsten Fauquet and John Stratzman, his biological parents, in June 2015. DCF supervisors and caseworkers placed the boy with Crystal and Donald Magee even though the Magees were not licensed foster-care parents, Donald Magee had a criminal record, and Crystal Magee had a history of child neglect, according to the notice of claim dated Thursday. The Magees also had no car to transport the child to medical appointments, neither had a job, both had significant medical problems, and Crystal Magee had a suspected substance-abuse issue, according to the claim. Many of the assertions in the parents' notice mirror the findings of Child Advocate Sarah Eagan's 64-page investigative report, released in October. After the attorney general's office files a response on behalf of DCF, Claims Commissioner Christy Scott will schedule hearings. Eagan and Associate Child Advocate Faith Vos Winkel called the DCF oversights in the case some of the most egregious they have seen. Several workers and supervisors were disciplined, and DCF Commissioner Joette Katz sent out memos that reaffirmed what appeared to be basic foster-care protocols and child-protection procedures. Dallas spent five months with the Magees – from June to November 2105, before he was removed. The lead social worker admitted in documents obtained by Eagan's office that he never saw the child awake during the times he visited the home. At one point, Crystal Magee called the Groton police and asked if she could get in trouble for allowing a child to cry nonstop for days on end. Crystal Magee also refused to allow child-development workers into the home on several occasions and the child missed medical appointments, according to the claim. Internal emails obtained by Eagan's office showed both an alarming sense of apathy about the case by some workers, and a deep concern by others about what the case said about DCF's foster-care practices in general. Under Katz, the department has emphasized placing children with relatives. Background checks and safety requirements are less stringent for relatives than they are for traditional foster-care families who are not related to the children they take in. The day after Dallas was removed from the Magee household, another foster parent rushed the boy to a local hospital. He was transferred to the Connecticut Children's Medical Center in Hartford. Doctors found an extremely malnourished boy with broken bones and other traumatic injuries. The claim, drafted by Graves, of New London, lists Dallas' injuries. They included: A fracture of his left arm caused by trauma that likely occurred up to three weeks earlier; fractures of his right forearm, caused by trauma, that likely occurred up to six weeks before; traumatic head injuries, such as bleeding of the brain and a hemorrhage of his right eye; emaciation, sagging skin, loss of muscle mass, prominent ribs, sunken eyes, and wasted temple muscles that were "the result of severe malnourishment over a prolonged period of time"; bruises over his body; balding of the back of his head due to lying down for extended periods; burn marks; extensive developmental delays; and emotional trauma. Graves noted in the claim, as Eagan's office had, that the Magees never obtained their foster-care license during the time they had Dallas in their home, and that they lied on the foster-care application. Graves also pointed out that Crystal Magee repeatedly refused to submit to a substance-abuse evaluation requested by DCF. In addition, the claim identifies significant gaps in the electronic case record. Eagan's office found that a large number of entries were added to the electronic record in November, after Dallas' removal, that related to events weeks and months earlier. Some of those events are suggestive of malpractice by DCF workers, according to the claim. For example, Graves writes that a social worker visited the Magee home on Sept. 29, 2015. He said in his notes that Dallas was asleep in his pack-and-play. But the worker "failed to assess Dallas' health at that visit, despite knowing that it had been 43 days since the worker's last visit," when Dallas was also asleep; that the Magees had been canceling medical appointments; that Crystal Magee had refused a drug-abuse evaluation; that outside counselors had expressed concerns about Crystal Magee's ability to cope; and that the Magees had failed to show up for two foster-care training sessions, which are part of the licensing process. Thirty days later, on Oct. 29, 2015, the social worker again visited Dallas, who was asleep in his pack-and-play. The worker wrote in his visit notes that he was "indeed able to confirm that Dallas was breathing," according both the claim and Eagan's report. The claim asserts that as a result of DCF's negligence, Dallas continues to suffer physical and emotional injuries and serious developmental delays. Source: <http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-dcf-abuse-claim-1116-20161115-story.html>

SUFFERING IN SECRET: Illinois hides abuse and neglect of adults with disabilities Barbara Chyette holds up a picture of her late brother, Loren Braun, a group home resident who choked to death during a supervised outing. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) By Michael J. Berens and Patricia Callahan The house had no address; the dead man had no name. Illinois officials blacked out those details from their investigative report. Nobody else was supposed to learn the man's identity or the location of the state-funded facility where his body was found. The investigation was closed as it began, with no public disclosure, and the report was filed away, one of thousands that portray a hidden world of misery and harm. No one would know that Thomas Powers died at 3300 Essington Road in unincorporated Joliet, in a group home managed for adults with developmental and intellectual disabilities. Or that his caregivers forced a 50-year-old man with the intellect of a small child to sleep on a soiled mattress on the floor in a room used for storage. Or that the front door bore a building inspection sticker that warned, "Not approved for occupancy." Not even Powers' grieving family knew the state had looked into his death and found evidence of neglect. As Illinois steers thousands of low-income adults with disabilities into private group homes, a Tribune investigation found Powers was but one of many casualties in a botched strategy to save money and give some of the state's poorest and most vulnerable residents a better life. In the first comprehensive accounting of mistreatment inside Illinois' taxpayer-funded group homes and their day programs, the Tribune uncovered a system where caregivers often failed to provide basic care while regulators cloaked harm and death with secrecy and silence. The Tribune identified 1,311 cases of documented harm since July 2011 — hundreds more cases than publicly reported by the Illinois Department of Human Services. Confronted with those findings, Human Services officials retracted five years of erroneous reports and said the department had launched reforms to ensure accurate reporting. To circumvent state secrecy, the Tribune filed more than 100 public records requests with government agencies. But state files were so heavily redacted and unreliable that the newspaper had to build its own databases by mining state investigative files, court records, law enforcement cases, industry reports, federal audits, grant awards and Medicaid data. The Tribune found at least 42 deaths linked to abuse or neglect in group homes or their day programs over the last seven years. Residents fatally choked on improperly prepared food, succumbed to untreated bed sores and languished in pain from undiagnosed ailments. Other residents suffered forced indignities and loss of freedom, state records show. Some were mocked for their intellectual limitations, barricaded in rooms, abandoned in soiled clothing and deprived of food. A male group home resident, accused of stealing cookies, was beaten to death by his caregiver. Employees at one home bound a woman's hands and ankles with duct tape, covered her head with a blanket and left her for several hours on the kitchen floor. For their own amusement, employees at another home repeatedly ridiculed residents to provoke outbursts, a game the caregivers called "breaking them." And, all too often, vulnerable residents' health and safety has been left to unlicensed, scantily trained employees. Front-line caregivers failed to promptly call 911, perform CPR or respond to medical emergencies that resulted in death. In hundreds of cases, the department allowed employees of group homes to investigate allegations of neglect and mental abuse in their own workplaces, the Tribune discovered. That alliance between group homes and Human Services' investigative arm, the Office of the Inspector General, is not specifically disclosed in state investigative reports. Citing patient privacy laws, state officials maintain that the addresses of the more than 3,000 state-licensed group homes are secret. Illinois officials refuse to disclose the enforcement history of any home, even in cases of fatal abuse and neglect. In contrast, Illinois nursing homes must maintain copies of investigative reports and surveys for public inspection. Additionally, state health officials publish a quarterly report detailing violations accompanied by nursing home names and addresses. There are no similar disclosure requirements for group homes. In this culture of secrecy, even seemingly benign records get shielded from sight. For example, the Tribune requested a state-funded PowerPoint presentation that included a list of needed improvements to community care programs, including group homes. The state responded. Except for the word "Recommendations," the entire slide was blacked out. Citing the Tribune investigation, Human Services Secretary James Dimas has ordered widespread reforms to improve public accountability and streamline investigations. "My concern is that too often agencies hide behind their confidentiality statutes, which makes it harder for the public to know what is going on," said Dimas, who was appointed last year. Dimas said he will push for legislative changes, if necessary, to allow public disclosure of group home enforcement histories. The shift in Illinois from large institutional facilities to less costly residential homes reflects the philosophy that these individuals, if supported, will lead fuller lives in the community, and more than 11,400 now live in group homes statewide. Known as Community Integrated Living Arrangements, or CILAs, these homes accommodate eight or fewer adults in ordinary apartment buildings or houses. The Arc of Illinois, a statewide advocacy group, reports that hundreds of people with disabilities have successfully transitioned into group homes in recent years. In 2011, a lawsuit brought by individuals who wanted to leave state-funded facilities resulted in a court decree that has forced Illinois to move more people into community settings. State officials have touted group homes as a preferred option, citing cost savings that can be used to fund more community care. The annual cost of care for an institutionalized resident is about $219,000 compared with $84,000 at a group home, according to state records. But Illinois has not increased reimbursement rates for group home staff wages in nearly nine years, leading to what industry leaders say are catastrophic conditions in which even the best operators are struggling to provide basic care. Illinois ranks among the five worst states for adequately funding community options, according to federal reports and studies by advocacy groups. Shirley Perez, who directs a family advocacy program for the Arc of Illinois, said: "Some of the phone calls I get from families are that they are afraid." Powers, born with a condition that led to brain damage, spent decades inside state institutions, unable to talk, unpredictable in behavior. When state officials promised him a better life in a real home and told his family he'd gain independence, Powers said yes the only way he knew how. He giggled. But this was not the life that Powers found. Nor did thousands of other adults with developmental and intellectual disabilities, left to the mercy of a system designed to be invisible. Joe Powers talks about his late son, Thomas, at his daughter Kathy's home in Aurora. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) Failures of care In one Will County group home, state records show, a caregiver left a frail woman alone in the bathroom after filling the bathtub with water, unaware that it was scalding because a maintenance worker forgot to install a temperature-control valve. The woman tumbled into the tub and was severely burned. The Trinity Services caregiver put the woman to bed, later pulled socks over her peeling, bleeding skin and didn't seek medical help for more than an hour. The woman died days later. At a Springfield home owned by Sparc, a caregiver forgot to give a man his anti-seizure medication before sending him to a day program in 2013. Rather than deliver the pills, investigators found, the caregiver told a colleague to throw them into the trash. The man suffered a major seizure, turned blue and was treated at a hospital. A caregiver at a Macomb group home managed by Mosaic allowed a man to sleep with a stuffed snowman even though he had been diagnosed with pica — a disorder that compels people to eat nonfood items — and had a history of consuming stuffing, according to inspector general records. In 2012 the man tore open the snowman, ate the filling and choked to death. In case after case, group home businesses have delegated frontline care to inexperienced caregivers with negligible training, a cost-cutting combination that has led to harm, the Tribune investigation found. Indeed, when the newspaper reviewed more than 200 substantiated cases of abuse and neglect, it found the vast majority of injuries and deaths are linked to inadequate staffing levels and failure to closely monitor fragile residents. Records show caregivers trying to cover up mistakes, failing to understand dangers of missed medications and underestimating the complex nature of disabilities. Sparc's chief operating officer, Ryan Dowd, said his company fired the caregiver who directed a colleague to throw out anti-convulsant medicine, added more surveillance cameras in its group homes and switched from paper to electronic medication records so a nurse can better catch mistakes. Nancy Davis, a Mosaic vice president, said her organization dismissed the caregiver who allowed the man to sleep with a stuffed snowman, hired outside behavioral experts to address the needs of residents with pica and retrained caregivers on how to protect those individuals. Caring for adults with profound intellectual and developmental disabilities can be challenging. Some have the strength of a weightlifter with the impulsiveness of a child. In the blink of an eye, they can find themselves in crisis. Yet caregivers in group homes earn an average of $9.35 an hour, according to the Illinois Association of Rehabilitation Facilities. That wage is below the federal poverty level for a family of three. Low pay is a contributing factor in high staff turnover — more than 40 percent annually in some homes. "Staff turnover — it's like a cancer that affects care," said UCP Seguin of Greater Chicago CEO John Voit, who has worked in the industry since the 1970s. Group home executives complain that inadequate state funding has not allowed the industry to increase entry-level pay or raise existing salaries to retain skilled supervisors. They say caregivers can earn more money in many other industries, citing the experienced employees who recently resigned to take higher-paying jobs at Amazon warehouses. To fill vacancies, business operators said they have turned to workers whose backgrounds would have disqualified them from jobs in the past. "You're scraping the barrel," said Little City Executive Director Shawn Jeffers, whose agency's services include group homes for adults with disabilities in the Chicago area. "I have some folks who do some really dumb stuff." Responding to what group home owners call a staffing crisis, state lawmakers in both houses this summer overwhelmingly approved $330 million in funding to boost pay for caregivers. But Gov. Bruce Rauner vetoed the measure in August, citing a lack of state funds. The Tribune also found that the group home industry is exempt from basic staffing standards required elsewhere in the state's long-term care system. Nursing homes, state institutions and other extended-care facilities are required by law to employ on-site registered nurses who can detect and react to sudden changes in patient conditions. Even low-level employees must be state-certified aides who update skills through continuing education. Group homes are not bound by these requirements. Many group home residents are not examined by a licensed nurse for weeks at a time, sometimes for many months, state enforcement records show. Instead, registered nurses often work from remote locations and supervise dozens of residents over the telephone. Some unlicensed workers also are allowed to pass out prescription medications — a practice prohibited by law at nursing homes and state-owned facilities. These and many other relaxed policies place group home residents at greater risk of undetected complications. Few daily activities underscore the dangers of thin staff or the critical role of competent caregivers like the simple act of eating. In 2014, a UCP Seguin group home resident attending the company's day program in Cicero choked to death on a marshmallow that a caregiver handed out as a treat. The victim had dysphagia, putting him at high risk of choking, and staff were supposed to give him only pureed or finely chopped foods, the inspector general found. UCP Seguin CEO Voit said his organization, one of the state's largest group home providers, has retrained staff on choking risks and revised safety protocols. That same year, a man at a Trinity Services group home in Peoria fatally choked on a cheeseburger, carrots and applesauce when a caregiver stepped away. The victim's medical files warned he often swallowed food too fast and needed close supervision, but staff members were not properly trained about his special needs, state records show. In response, Trinity Service officials said, they created a training manual for each group home that details how to monitor residents with diet restrictions and choking risks, including pictures that illustrate how to chop or puree food properly. For Loren Braun, death came from a McDonald's hamburger and an inattentive caregiver who had been hired specifically to watch him. At 61, Braun had no teeth and couldn't wear dentures. Born with developmental disabilities and diagnosed with schizophrenia, he had lived since 1997 in a North Side group home managed by Anixter Center. Braun had a history of choking. His food had to be soft and cut into tiny pieces, and someone had to coach him at every meal to eat slowly and drink water between bites. Braun's sister, Barbara Chyette, tried to protect her younger brother as best she could. Loren Braun, who had no teeth and couldn't wear dentures, choked to death on food during an outing away from his group home. (Family photo) As a former social worker at an Ohio psychiatric hospital, she saw the advantages of a small group home but feared that staffing levels were often inadequate for high-risk residents. Tapping a family foundation set up by her late father, a postal worker, she donated money to pay Anixter for an extra caregiver to shadow her brother three days a week. She also donated a van to the home for community outings. In November 2014, caregivers loaded Braun and four other residents into that van for grocery shopping, haircuts and lunch at a McDonald's. After returning to the group home, a caregiver discovered

Braun unconscious in the back seat. A Chicago Fire Department paramedic reported that he removed "almost an entire hamburger" from Braun's mouth and airway but was unable to revive him. He had choked to death. State investigators cited his personal caregiver for egregious neglect. In a wrongful death suit, Chyette alleges that Anixter failed to address his choking risk, served her brother unsafe food and didn't protect him from neglect. Anixter executives declined to comment. "Loren was like a baby," Chyette said. "Like you would have to be with a 2-year-old or 3-year-old — that's the kind of supervision that clients like Loren need. And the system does not provide that kind of supervision." The attacker next door Illinois group homes were first licensed in the 1970s as state-funded community options for adults with intellectual and developmental disabilities, the beginning of a civil rights movement to empty large institutions and nursing facilities. This shift offered freedom and independence to scores of people with disabilities who were inappropriately consigned to institutional care. But as state downsizing continues, group homes are also destinations for individuals with a history of profound problems, often compounded by mental illness, requiring round-the-clock supervision for their safety and the safety of other residents. A majority of group home businesses report that they cannot afford to provide that level of protection, according to industry trade groups. Fragile individuals with disabilities sometimes live alongside those who have a history of violence or sexual aggression, a risky mix that has led to injury and death, state records show. Group home owners are not required to report resident-on-resident assaults to the inspector general's office unless someone suspects that neglect was a factor, according to state law. But law enforcement and state investigative reports reveal a troubling pattern of violence at group homes since 2010, including three homicides. At a Trinity Services group home in Peoria in 2010, John Vogel, 45, was fatally beaten by a resident whose acts of violence had sent two employees and two housemates to the emergency room months earlier, according to inspector general and coroner records. At a Bolingbrook group home managed by Individual Advocacy Group, Eduardo Formanski, 30, suffocated after another resident, who weighed nearly twice as much as he did, lay on top of him during a fight in 2011, according to police, court and medical examiner records. That same year, Tramayne Yarbrough, 35, died of head injuries after a housemate pushed him down the stairs of a Palos Park group home operated by St. Coletta's of Illinois, according to medical examiner and inspector general records. The assailant had a history of physical aggression and had pushed someone else down the stairs about two months earlier, the inspector general's office found. Responding to questions about the Vogel homicide, Trinity Service officials said they had provided extensive behavioral therapy to the resident responsible for the attack. Afterward, they said, group home employees received enhanced training to better deal with aggressive residents. Addressing the death at the Bolingbrook home, an official for Advocacy Group said it was the only fatal incident in the group home's 17-year history. Attempts to reach St. Coletta's of Illinois for comment were unsuccessful. Residents have also been victimized sexually by other residents, records show. At a West Side day program operated by group home provider Habilitative Systems, a 33-year-old man had a behavior plan that addressed his history of sexually inappropriate behavior, including "engaging in sexual activity without consent." The staff was supposed to make sure he remained at least 3 feet away from program participants, and his care plan called for employees to accompany him even to the restroom. But in July 2010, the man wandered away unnoticed and entered an unlocked restroom where he allegedly persuaded a 27-year-old man to perform oral sex, according to a state report that cited a witness account by a third man who entered the restroom and discovered the pair. An investigator with the inspector general's office termed the sexual act consensual, even though the younger man had profound disabilities, wasn't able to speak and "could not provide any information for this investigation." The office did cite the business for neglect. An official for Habilitative Systems declined to comment about the case. State law allows group home providers to mix defenseless residents with those who have histories of violence as long as businesses maintain adequate supervision and staffing. It's hard to imagine anyone more vulnerable than 36-year-old Aaron Stanley. Born with cerebral palsy and excess fluid in his brain, Stanley has the cognitive capacity of a 2-year-old, his mother said. Spastic quadriplegia restricts movement of his arms and legs, so he can't propel his own wheelchair. At a Berwyn group home managed by UCP Seguin, he was fully dependent on the staff. Colleen Stanley didn't know that her son's bedroom was next to that of a man who not only had an intellectual disability but also was diagnosed with intermittent explosive disorder. A UCP Seguin employee later told police that Stanley's housemate was prone to episodes of unprovoked explosive violence and had "insurmountable strength." In October last year the housemate walked into Stanley's room during the pre-dawn hours and nearly pummeled him to death while he lay in bed — beating him repeatedly in the head with a fire extinguisher, a television and a picture frame before stabbing his face with glass from the broken frame, police records show. Stanley's swollen face was so covered with blood that first responders could not see his eyes. The sole UCP Seguin caregiver on duty that night — a woman alone in the house with seven disabled men — told police she tried to intervene but Stanley's housemate became more violent, and she was afraid he would attack her. No charges were filed against Stanley's housemate, whose psychiatrist told police the man could not comprehend his actions. Instead, Human Services admitted him to a state-run institution for individuals with developmental disabilities, police records show. Stanley, who had to undergo multiple reconstructive surgeries on his face, no longer lives at the UCP Seguin group home. His family is suing the provider for failing to protect him. Citing the lawsuit, UCP Seguin's Voit declined to comment on the specifics of the case. In a written statement he said that, in general, when a person is harmed, his organization figures out the causes, retrains staff, revises safety protocols and disciplines employees to reduce the likelihood of recurrence. "Ultimately, however," the statement said, "there are some occurrences or encounters that can neither be predicted nor prevented, even with the best of training, protocols and processes." In an interview before her death from breast cancer in August, Stanley's mother said the system has to change. "You can't put someone that's violent in the same house as someone that can't even get out of his way," she said. A suspicious death Even as a toddler, it was clear Thomas Powers would need a lifetime of care. He never learned to speak, use a toilet or hold a spoon. He could walk, even run, but he was awkward and crashed into walls and furniture. He couldn't comprehend simple gestures or words, and at times he had trouble recognizing his own family. But he loved to have his hand stroked and his back patted. And he seemed most happy when traveling in a vehicle and staring out the window, family members said. Thomas Powers as a child, front row, second from right, and as an adult with his sister Kathy at her home. (Family photos) Powers, one of nine children, had a rare inherited disorder — phenylketonuria, which can cause severe intellectual disability and medical problems. The condition is readily detected and treated today, but the test did not exist when he was born in 1960, and his disease went untreated as a child. His father, Joe Powers, 83, said the family made the agonizing decision to institutionalize Thomas at age 6, when he had become an oblivious danger to himself and others. In one of many frightening incidents, he held an infant sibling above his head and made a throwing motion. Thomas Powers spent four decades in state institutions, but in 2008 state officials pressured the family to move him because of planned downsizing at his facility, according to one of his sisters, Kathy Powers. She said they promised he would receive more individualized care. A state contractor then steered them to Trinity Services, the state's largest operator of group homes for adults with disabilities. Two years later, however, Trinity Services officials reported that Thomas Powers had become too much to handle. Caregivers complained that he was a whirlwind of motion and mayhem, running from kitchen to bedroom, tossing pans from the stove, breaking lamps, drinking water from the toilet, sometimes stripping naked to express displeasure. "He was just out of control," a Trinity Services supervisor later said in a court deposition. "He was like an animal." To better control Powers' behaviors, Trinity Services officials transferred him in May 2010 to another home, a 2,100-square-foot ranch house on Essington Road in unincorporated Joliet. Following the move, most of his daily activities would take place inside. Thomas Powers, born with a condition that led to brain damage, was found dead in 2010 in a group home in unincorporated Joliet, three days after being transferred from another group home. He was 50. (John J. Kim, Chicago Tribune) Canceled were Powers' weekday trips to a community day program where he had participated in arts and crafts projects with dozens of other people with disabilities. There would be no more of his favorite activity, riding in a transport van. When Powers arrived, three other men were living in the house, state records show. None of them should have been there. Two months earlier, a Will County building inspector had posted a "not approved for occupancy" sticker on the door after determining that Trinity Services had converted a residential property into a group home without proper permits and safety improvements. County officials charged that Trinity Services ignored that order to vacate the home. While Powers' bedroom was being renovated, he slept in a cramped room jammed with boxes of other people's belongings, according to state records. He should have never been left unsupervised with loose objects, medical records show, because he suffered from pica and indiscriminately stuffed items in his mouth. On his third day in the home, he was found dead. His caregiver told state investigators that Powers, wearing pajamas, had rested through the night on a fully assembled bed, according to police and court records. But sheriff's deputies found Powers dressed in blue jeans and belt, lying on the floor next to a mattress so stained that it was hauled away as garbage. The room was cluttered with ripped-open storage boxes, and a box spring with built-in bed frame leaned against a wall. Thomas Powers was living in a group home in unincorporated Joliet in 2010 when he was found dead lying next to a stained mattress in a cluttered room used for storage. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune; Will County sheriff's office) The caregiver first told deputies that she found Powers with a plastic bag "laying over his face, covering it." She later changed her description, saying "it was like a sheet of paper." Dr. J. Scott Denton, who conducted the autopsy for the Will County medical examiner's office, ruled the cause of death undetermined. But later, in a deposition, Denton testified that "it's more likely than not that something unnatural happened," citing Powers' suspicious bruises and cuts, the plastic bag or sheet, the room in disarray and other unusual circumstances. Powers' family, who maintained close contact with group home employees, filed a wrongful death suit and reached a confidential settlement last year. "We will never know what happened for sure," said Kathy Powers. "But something wrong happened." Trinity Services CEO Art Dykstra, a former state director for mental health and disability programs, said Powers thrived for years without incident but experienced sudden and unexplained weight loss and health complications in the months before his death. Caregivers transferred Powers to the Joliet home because it had fewer residents than the home where he lived and might offer a calmer environment to counter his increasingly disruptive behaviors, he said. Most of the building code violations in the Joliet home represented renovations that were underway or completed without proper permits, Dykstra said. "Everyone at Trinity Services feels terrible about this death," he said. "We've tried our hardest to help people with complex needs like Thomas." Records show that the Office of the Inspector General took five years to close the case, issuing its report after the Powers family settled its civil suit with Trinity Services. Investigators cited the business and the caregiver for neglect, noting that residents were placed in a home with code violations and that Powers was forced to sleep on a mattress placed on the floor in a room full of debris. But the state took no further action against Trinity Services. Under Illinois law, the inspector general's office is required to send a notification letter to families or guardians if neglect or abuse is found. But members of Powers' family said they were unaware of the state's investigation until contacted by the Tribune. Inspector General Michael McCotter acknowledged that his office had failed to notify them. Last summer, the Powers family received an apology from McCotter in the mail.

mberens@chicagotribune.com pcallahan@chicagotribune.com Twitter @mberens1 Twitter @tribunetish Illinois' transition to group homes Illinois has been moving toward a group home model for decades. Here are some major factors behind that transition: Beginning in the 1970s, Illinois downsized state-funded institutions because scores of people were inappropriately confined there. In the late 1980s, state officials created a special license for group homes that provide care for eight or fewer adults with intellectual and developmental disabilities. These homes were designated Community Integrated Living Arrangements, or CILAs. There are more than 3,000 such homes today. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1999 that people with disabilities have the right to live in the least restrictive setting possible. Known as the Olmstead decision, the ruling also stated that unnecessary institutionalization violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. The decision forced states to fund more community services. In 2007, Illinois launched the Pathways to Community Living program, a federally funded initiative to transfer thousands of people with disabilities into group homes or other community placements from state institutions or nursing facilities providing long-term care. In a federal settlement known as the Ligas consent decree, Illinois agreed in 2011 to fund community access for adults with disabilities who lived in private intermediate-care facilities with nine or more beds, and those who lived at home but had sought community services or placement. Also in 2011, a federal court approved a sweeping agreement — the Colbert consent decree — that required Illinois to fund more community options for Medicaid-eligible nursing home residents with disabilities. In late 2011, then-Gov. Pat Quinn announced a cost-saving plan to close multiple state institutions and move hundreds of adults with disabilities into group homes. The Jacksonville Developmental Center was closed, but state officials shelved plans to shutter the Murray Developmental Center following a court fight with parents of residents. Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/watchdog/ct-group-home-investigations-cila-met-20161117.htmlstory.html>

When Home Feels Like Prison: My Year In A Group Home November 17, 2016 by Noel Anaya Featured on KQED Photo by: Denise Tejada Listen Now Download Share this story: Noel Anaya spent a year in a group home when he was 12 years old. I was put into foster care when I was two years old, and I've been in the system ever since. The moment I stepped into a group home when I was 12, I felt like it was a mistake. There I was, with about a dozen other teen boys. On my very first day, I got into a fight during a basketball game. I was physically restrained by a staff member and put on "lockdown." That meant except for school, I had to stay in my room, eat alone, and keep apart from the other kids for seven days. I didn't feel like a kid in time out. I felt like an inmate. Even on a regular week, our lives were super regimented. At night, staff walked the halls with flashlights, looking into the rooms. In addition to heavy security, I met regularly with a therapist who prescribed me medication. I remember almost all the kids there were on something. We lined up for our medicine, which was given out in those little, paper, condiment cups. The drugs made me feel like a zombie. After a year, because of good behavior, I was eventually returned to my foster family. It took me a long time to adjust to normal life. Because for so long, I couldn't rely on anyone and I was always afraid of getting in trouble. We were sent to the group home to turn our lives around. But for some of us, we ended up worse off than when we started. That's the problem: group homes are supposed to be a safe haven for kids. But often, they're not. Our adolescent behavior was penalized harshly. New California law requires that starting next year, the state move away from placing teens in foster care in group homes. I have my doubts. But it's a step in the right direction to rethink how we treat kids in foster care. With a Perspective, I'm Noel Anaya. Featured on KQED Source: <https://youthradio.org/journalism/when-home-feels-like-prison-my-year-in-a-group-home/>

Investigation finds widespread abuse of the disabled in Illinois group homes THE ASSOCIATED PRESS 4 hrs ago 0 Getty Images prev next CHICAGO — A newspaper investigation found more than a thousand cases of abuse and neglect of Illinois adults with disabilities who were placed into private group homes. The Chicago Tribune says its investigation revealed mistreatment inside Illinois' taxpayer-funded group homes and their day programs, with caregivers failing to provide basic care while regulators conceal harm and death with secrecy and silence. The investigation found at least 42 deaths linked to abuse and neglect in group homes or their day programs over the last seven years. Residents have been humiliated and lost freedom, state records show. The Chicago Tribune's investigation also shows 1,311 cases of documented harm since July 2011 — hundreds more cases of documented harm than publicly reported by Illinois' Department of Human Services. Thomas Powers was one of those unfortunate cases. He died in a Joliet group home for adults with developmental and intellectual disabilities. Grieving relatives of Powers didn't know there was evidence found of neglect, which included an instance of the 50-year-old, with the intellect of a small child, being forced to sleep on a soiled mattress on the floor in a room for storage. Other incidents similar or worse than Powers' experience have also been revealed. Advertisement Play Current Time 0:00 / Duration Time 0:00 Remaining Time -0:00 Stream TypeLIVE Loaded: 0% Progress: 0% 00:00 Fullscreen 00:00 Mute Playback Rate 1 Subtitles subtitles off Captions captions off Chapters Chapters A male group resident was beaten to death by his caregiver after being accused of stealing cookies. Employees at another home abused a female resident by binding her hands and ankles with duct tape, and covering her head with a blanket and leaving her on a kitchen floor for several hours. In many of these cases, the health and safety of residents has been left to unlicensed and scantily trained employees. The death toll has risen due to caregivers failing to promptly call 911, perform CPR or respond to medical emergencies. Get news headlines sent daily to your inbox TheSouthern.com Daily Headlines Obituaries I understand and agree that registration on or use of this site constitutes agreement to its user agreement and privacy policy. The department in many instances let the group homes investigate allegations of neglect and mental abuse in their own workplaces, the Chicago Tribune found. Human Services officials retracted five years of erroneous reports after confronted with The Chicago Tribune's findings and said the department had launched reforms to ensure accurate reporting. The investigation results from the Chicago Tribune have prompted Human Services Secretary James Dimas to order widespread reforms to improve public accountability and streamline investigations. "My concern is that too often agencies hide behind their confidentiality statutes, which makes it harder for the public to know what is going on," Dimas said. Source: http://thesouthern.com/news/local/state-and-regional/investigation-finds-widespread-abuse-of-the-disabled-in-illinois-group/article_251e7d20-f09a-5dbf-9810-66fab934032.html

Man who raped 15-year-old boy gets 18 years in prison Jeff Ramage, jrumage@gannett.com 8:01 a.m. CST November 23, 2016 Group home operator Jermaro Dantzler has been sentenced to 18 years in prison for second-degree sexual assault and felony bail jumping. (Photo: Milwaukee County Sheriff's Office, Milwaukee County Sheriff's Office) CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE Brown Deer - The group home owner who raped a 15-year-old boy at gunpoint behind bushes on Brown Deer Road in July 2015 was sentenced on Monday, Nov. 22, to 18 years in prison. Jermaro Dantzler, 38, of Brown Deer pleaded not guilty to second-degree sexual assault and felony bail jumping. In addition to the prison sentence, Dantzler was also sentenced to eight years of extended supervision. The 15-year-old victim told Brown Deer police he was walking home on July 19, 2015, when Dantzler allegedly grabbed him by the arm in the 6700 block of West Brown Deer Road. The boy said Dantzler was holding a gun, and warned him to "do exactly what I ask you," according to a criminal complaint. Dantzler led the boy behind some bushes and made him lay in the grass. He also asked the boy his name and where he went to high school, according to the complaint. After having sex with the boy behind the bushes, he gave the boy two $20 bills. More than a month after the alleged rape, the boy told Brown Deer police that he received a Facebook invitation from Dantzler, who he recognized as the alleged rapist. Dantzler was granted a group home license in 2009 to operate Rights of Passage Living Center, 7911 W. Beechwood Ave., Milwaukee. The group home's license was revoked on April 10, 2015, due to financial improprieties, but when Dantzler appealed the revocation, he was allowed to continue to operate during the appeals process. The Department of Children and Families shut down the group home after learning about his arrest. Source: <http://www.mynorthshorenw.com/story/news/local/glendale/2016/11/22/man-who-raped-15-year-old-boy-gets-18-years-prison/94306416/>

Lawmakers to tackle human trafficking-foster care connection By Phil Prazan Published: November 20, 2016, 9:59 pm Updated: November 21, 2016, 5:41 am AUSTIN (KXAN) – Monday, lawmakers at the capitol will tackle a growing issue in Texas, sex and human trafficking. Child advocates say a common victim are children in and out of the Texas foster care system. Steven Phenix looks through the blue prints and sketches of what will soon be “the refuge.” The longtime residential facility just broke ground and will soon house 40 teenage girls – a safe place after being rescued from the sex trade industry. “We’re failing our kids. They’re going after the most vulnerable,” said Phenix. If current statistics hold up, he says he expects three out of every four sex trafficking victim to be a product of Texas foster care. Texas is the second highest in the nation for number of calls to the National Human Trafficking Resources Center. In 2015, there were 330 cases of human trafficking in Texas. Most of the victims were women and more than one hundred were minors. “It’s easier for them to grab a kid off the street who’s just run away, who’s run away from four, five, six times already from four or five, six different types of abuse – not as many people are out there looking for that kid unfortunately. So that’s the reason they are a target,” said Phenix. Texas’s child welfare system has been in the spotlight as a federal judge ruled it violated children’s civil rights. Hundreds of calls of abuse and neglect go un-responded to every day. Lawmakers hope to stem the flow of foster kids into sex trafficking circles. Phenix says more training and awareness can go far but to tackle the big picture it will take more money for more people to find vulnerable Texas children before they’re trafficked. Monday the House Human Services and the House Juvenile Justice and Family Issues committees will have a joint hearing to: “Study and evaluate the practice of youth being recruited into human trafficking. Specifically, evaluate the scope of the pipeline of potential victims from foster care, including methods and means used to lure youth into trafficking. Evaluate the types of services that are available to support children and youth in the conservatorship of DFPS who are victims of human trafficking. Make necessary recommendations to assist DFPS in identifying, recovering, serving, or caring for children and youth who are victims of human trafficking prior to placement in foster care.” Source: <http://kxan.com/2016/11/20/lawmakers-to-tackle-human-trafficking-foster-care-connection/>

Flawed investigations ignore neglect in Illinois group homes The Associated Press LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story CHICAGO A newspaper investigation has found that self-policing played a role in determining whether neglect has occurred in investigations of Illinois group homes serving people with intellectual and developmental disabilities. The Chicago Tribune (<http://trib.in/2geSVt2>) reports group home employees handled at least 550 cases and helped clear their own group home of wrongdoing in the majority of instances. Federal regulators say no other states have given caregivers at group homes full-fledged investigative powers. The examination of the state’s network of 3,000 group homes also found Illinois Department Human Services officials routinely obscured evidence of harm from the public. The inspector general’s office sealed more than 3,200 cases in the last six years in which it found some evidence of abuse or neglect. No one, including family members or even group home residents, are allowed to know the nature of those investigations, the strength of the evidence or what reforms, if any, were mandated or made. In one such case, the Tribune found, the inspector general’s own investigators overlooked obvious clues pointing to neglect and were easily misled by a group home employee who later admitted she made up her story about what had transpired. Human Services Secretary James Dimas says he’ll seek to make public the records of all unsubstantiated cases. “We’re working hard to push the envelope to become more transparent,” he said. “And we’re prepared to seek a change to the legislation if we decide that becomes necessary.” Source: <http://www.kentucky.com/living/health-and-medicine/article116242748.html>

A third of Texas foster care runaways remain missing: CPS By Robert Maxwell Published: November 21, 2016, 6:08 pm AUSTIN (KXAN) — A grim reality is adding to the ongoing shortage of foster homes in Texas. State lawmakers are now hearing a third of the children who ran away from foster care this year have not been found — some as young as 11. In Texas, 973 foster kids ran away this past year, sometimes simply because they didn’t like the house rules, others wanted to return to their parents. A third of those kids — 340 vulnerable young people — have simply disappeared. “We’re still looking for them. So that [973] was a number that was a point in time,” Angela Goodwin, director of Investigations for CPS told KXAN. “We always need the support from law enforcement to help look for missing runaways.” But Goodwin says some police departments won’t add a runaway 17 year old to missing kids’ databases since the law considers them an adult. Those who are found spend an average six weeks on their own. Goodwin told lawmakers Monday at a joint hearing of the Juvenile Justice and Family Issues and Human Services House Committees. That makes the kids prime targets for child sex traffickers and lifelong trauma, advocates say. Last legislative session, a law emerged that mandates CPS to interview rescued foster runaways to find out if they’ve been abused while on the run. This past year, 32 rescued foster runaways admitted they were sexually trafficked. It’s believed the true numbers are higher since some recovered children will not want to share all of what happened to them during their flight. 32 rescued foster runaways admitted they were sexually trafficked And while CPS now assigns a special investigator to each foster runaway to scour social media channels for instance, child safety groups warn sex traffickers can be luring a wayward teen within hours – not days. Some pimps will hang out at a neighborhood convenience store, a place they know teens will gravitate, lawmakers heard. East Texas Rep. James White, R – Woodville, urged CPS leaders to do more before the new legislative session. “My local constable [or sheriff’s deputy or game warden] could act proactively and go to [that road] where the [known] human traffickers are and shut them down today.” Long road to recovery And for those who are rescued, it’s not as simple as returning them to any foster family. Child advocates say these traumatized kids need intensive help. Right now in Texas that kind of safe, therapeutic foster home does not exist – fewer still are emergency beds for rescued foster kids. The Refuge near Austin is a soon-to-open option for sex trafficking survivors along with faith-based non-profits. “This is happening to the most vulnerable children in our community,” says Dixie Hairston, Children At Risk, a Dallas-based non-profit. “If law enforcement goes out, they do a sting operation and they do recover a child, where they are going to take them after they recover them there are just not those places out there.” Child safety groups such as Children at Risk are asking lawmakers to further fund CPS to it can hire specialized caseworkers who deal with only foster kids who have been sex trafficked. CPS also says it has trained thousands of its caseworkers as well as DPS troopers to recognize if someone is being trafficked. The Texas Attorney General’s Office has also created educational materials for law enforcement and teachers around the state. Source: <http://kxan.com/2016/11/21/a-third-of-texas-foster-care-runaways-remain-missing-cps/>

Troy foster care agency raided | Dayton news Troy foster care agency raided Updated: Wednesday, November 23, 2016 @ 2:26 PM By: Breaking News Staff Troy Police executed a search warrant Wednesday afternoon at Isaiah’s Place, a private state-funded foster care agency. Officers removed several documents from the agency, located at 1100 Wayne St. No arrest was made, said Capt. Joe Long of Troy police. He said officers acted on an anonymous tip that as much as $100,000 could be missing. They’ve been investigating the case for about two weeks, Long said. Source: <http://www.whio.com/news/crime-law/troy-foster-care-agency-raided/Wo6oxLcn15a4IFnUI6jTpl/>

South Carolina mother demands answers after son drowned in foster care By Nickelle Smith, WSPA Published: November 27, 2016, 10:48 am Updated: November 27, 2016, 10:52 am GREENVILLE COUNTY, S.C. (WSPA) — A South Carolina mother is demanding answers after her son drowned while in foster care. Njamena Wilcox says she still remembers getting the devastating phone call that her two-year-old son Za’Marion Wilcox drowned at a community pool in Greenville County, while under the care of foster parents. “I just kinda lost everything,” she said. “He was just full of life. He was my only little boy.” Wilcox held a press conference alongside Bruce Wilson, founder of the organization ‘Fighting Injustice Together.’ Since her son’s drowning, the Department of Social Services has been investigating what happened. “All we asked was to be included, for this investigation to be transparent so this mother can know what happened to her baby,” said Wilson. “That didn’t happen.” Media General affiliate WSPA learned the DSS investigation concluded this week and revealed Za’Marion’s death was caused by neglect due to lack of oversight by his foster parents. The foster parents are appealing that decision. “I was mad because no one called to let me know anything,” said Wilcox. “No one still hasn’t called to let me know what’s going on.” The Greenville County Sheriff’s Office is still investigating to see if charges will be filed. Wilcox now wants her 7 year-old-daughter out of DSS custody, and back with her relatives. “They’re supposed to protect your kids but then when they get your kids, stuff like this happens like what happened to my son,” she said. “I don’t know what could happen to my daughter so I want her to be with family.” The Office of Administrative Hearings will now review the DSS decision after the foster parents’ appeal. If that outcome is not reversed the foster parents will be placed on the central registry of abuse and neglect, barring them from working in childcare positions and adopting or fostering again. Source: <http://wric.com/2016/11/27/south-carolina-mother-demands-answers-after-son-drowned-in-foster-care/>

Illinois agency revokes group home provider's license The Associated Press LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story CHICAGO The Illinois Department of Human Services has revoked a group home provider’s license and cited the state-funded business for safety issues and rights violations of individuals with developmental and intellectual disabilities. On Monday, the department's chief licensing official, Felicia Stanton Gray, told Reuben Goodwin Sr. she was revoking the license for his eight group homes and daytime training program, all under the name Disability Services of Illinois, the Chicago Tribune (<http://trib.in/2fLA7zI>) reported. "I think we do a good job to make sure people are safe and that the staff is trained," said Goodwin in an interview last month. Goodwin can appeal the decision by requesting a hearing before Dec. 23, but the department will still move 45 adults to other community-living options in the next two weeks. Human Services spokeswoman Meredith Krantz said the state agency will work toward changing the way group homes "are held accountable in order to ensure individuals with disabilities receive high levels of care." The move comes after Disability Services was spotlighted in an investigation by the newspaper this month that revealed the inspector general's office mishandled a 2012 investigation into neglect allegations at Goodwin's business. The investigation found at least 42 deaths linked to abuse and neglect in group homes or their day programs over the last seven years. Residents have been humiliated and lost freedom, state records show. The probe also identified 1,311 cases of documented harm since July 2011 — hundreds more cases of documented harm than publicly reported by Illinois' Department of Human Services. Results from Chicago Tribune's investigation have prompted Human Services Secretary James Dimas to order widespread reforms to improve public accountability and streamline investigations. "My concern is that too often agencies hide behind their confidentiality statutes, which makes it harder for the public to know what is going on," Dimas said previously. The newspaper's attempts to reach Goodwin for comment were unsuccessful. Read more here: <http://www.bnd.com/news/article117933753.html#storylink=cpy>

Foster care agency funds may have been used for gambling | www.mydaytondailynews.com Foster care agency funds may have been used for gambling, vacations The director of Isaiah's Place has resigned and her brother, the financial officer, has been terminated. Crime & Law By Nancy Bowman - Contributing Writer 0 Updated: 8:06 p.m. Wednesday, Nov. 30, 2016 | Posted: 7:42 p.m. Wednesday, Nov. 30, 2016 Investigators who seized computers and boxes of documents during a Nov. 23 search of the nonprofit Isaiah's Place were looking into allegations of conversion of at least $100,000 in agency funds for personal uses, according to court documents. Isaiah's Place at 1100 Wayne St. is a foster care agency based in Troy. No charges have been filed. Steven Justice, a Troy lawyer representing Isaiah's Place, said the financial issues at the organization came to light during the past two weeks. The agency director, Kelley Gunter, resigned since the search warrant was served and the financial officer, Matthew Gunter, was terminated, Justice said. The Gunters are sister and brother. Employee Irene Early has been named interim director as Justice and board members work with the state on ensuring the agency continues operations, the attorney said. "The others who work there are very hard working people who do a fantastic job of running the agency," Justice said. "This is a good agency. It has done good work." An affidavit filed in Miami County Municipal Court outlines allegations of an agency employee who told police in November that agency funds had been used for gambling, casino trips, home repairs, vacations, clothing and tanning sessions, among other expenses. The alleged misuse was revealed to police by an employee before an audit because the employee said the audit would disclose the problems, according to the search warrant. Isaiah's Place was founded in 2003 and is a Christian-based agency that works with foster agencies in 10 counties, according to its website. In the search warrant inventory, police reported seizing computers along with payroll and bank records, receipts, tax paperwork, board meeting information and other paperwork, according to the inventory from the search filed with the court. Troy Police Capt. Jeff Kunkleman said investigators contacted the Ohio Attorney General's Office for advice due to the amount of documents seized. Source: <http://www.mydaytondailynews.com/news/news/crime-law/foster-care-agency-funds-may-have-been-used-for-ga/ntGxW/>

Illinois agency revokes group home provider's license Published: Thursday, Dec. 1, 2016 10:27 a.m. CST By Chicago Tribune CHICAGO (AP) — The Illinois Department of Human Services has revoked a group home provider's license and cited the state-funded business for safety issues and rights violations of individuals with developmental and intellectual disabilities. On Monday, the department's chief licensing official, Felicia Stanton Gray, told Reuben Goodwin Sr. she was revoking the license for his eight group homes and daytime training program, all under the name Disability Services of Illinois, the Chicago Tribune reported. "I think we do a good job to make sure people are safe and that the staff is trained," said Goodwin in an interview last month. Goodwin can appeal the decision by requesting a hearing before Dec. 23, but the department will still move 45 adults to other community-living options in the next two weeks. Human Services spokeswoman Meredith Krantz said the state agency will work toward changing the way group homes "are held accountable in order to ensure individuals with disabilities receive high levels of care." The move comes after Disability Services was spotlighted in an investigation by the newspaper this month that revealed the inspector general's office mishandled a 2012 investigation into neglect allegations at Goodwin's business. The investigation found at least 42 deaths linked to abuse and neglect in group homes or their day programs over the past 7 years. Residents have been humiliated and lost freedom, state records show. The probe also identified 1,311 cases of documented harm since July 2011 — hundreds more cases of documented harm than publicly reported by Illinois' Department of Human Services. Results from Chicago Tribune's investigation have prompted Human Services Secretary James Dimas to order widespread reforms to improve public accountability and streamline investigations. "My concern is that too often agencies hide behind their confidentiality statutes, which makes it harder for the public to know what is going on," Dimas said previously. The newspaper's attempts to reach Goodwin for comment were unsuccessful. Source: <http://www.saukvalley.com/2016/12/01/illinois-agency-revokes-group-home-providers-license/ar7kc8y/>

Our prison restraint techniques can kill children. Why aren't we using alternatives? Children's prisons use the MMPR regime which is not humane, not safe and not the only option. Our government is responsible for appalling abuses 'A risk assessment carried out by an independent medical adviser concluded that 28 of the 66 sanctioned restraints had a 40% to 60% chance of resulting in injuries.' The Guardian revealed on Tuesday that the Ministry of Justice had been told that the restraint techniques it had approved for use on children in custody could kill them. A risk assessment carried out by an independent medical adviser concluded that 28 of the 66 sanctioned restraints had a 40% to 60% chance of resulting in injuries involving the airway, breathing or circulation that could have catastrophic consequences — catastrophic being defined as "death or permanent severe disability affecting everyday life". It also revealed that many restraints are likely to result in so called "minor" or "moderate" injuries — such as fractures/dislocations and ligament/tendon damage. As well as explicitly chronicling the dangers we are subjecting our children in custody to, the risk assessment table demonstrates another important truth — that bad practice in secure training centres (STC) and young offender institutions (YOI) does not begin and end with G4S, or whichever private security firm is running them. The government itself is responsible for the appalling abuses carried out in the name of restraint because, quite simply, it sanctioned them in the first place. When Panorama and the Guardian exposed dangerous restraint techniques used in a children's prison run by G4S earlier this year, there were howls of outrage from the prison establishment. First, Panorama secretly filmed a boy being squeezed by his windpipe by a guard in Medway secure training centre shouting out that he couldn't breathe. Then the Guardian spoke to two women who had been detainees at Medway five years earlier who also said that they struggled to breathe while being restrained. A number of guards have been charged with misconduct in public office and taking photographs inside the prison. The stories you need to read, in one handy email Sign up to The Guardian Today and get the must-read stories delivered straight to your inbox each morning Read more Soon enough, the Ministry of Justice and the Youth Justice Board, which oversees the safety and security of children in detention, appeared to conclude that G4S itself was the bad apple. Having ordered the company to come up with an improvement plan to prove it was fit to run the STC, in May it announced that the private security company would be stripped of the Medway contract, and that the government would take over its running. In its final report, the Medway improvement board concluded that Medway's leadership team "has driven a culture that appears to be based on control and contract compliance rather than rehabilitation and safeguarding vulnerable young people". It also suggested that official figures on restraint could not be believed because of the allegation that they were being falsified downwards to ensure that G4S complied with its contract. The damning report was perfectly fair. G4S could not have made a bigger botch of running Medway. (In 2015 it also lost the contract to run Rainsbrook STC after a joint report by Ofsted, the Care Quality Commission and the chief inspector of prisons into the centre condemned it for a series of failings.) But what the Medway improvement board never acknowledged was the government's role in nurturing this culture. Current Time 0:00 / Duration Time 0:00 Loaded: 0% Progress: 0% Mute This is a modal window. Facebook Twitter Pinterest Panorama exposes teenage prison abuse Perhaps this is unsurprising. After all, until the risk-assessment table was obtained through one of the many freedom of information requests made by the indefatigable children's rights campaigner Carolyn Willow, we never knew that the government had been advised by an medical expert that its restraints could result in catastrophic injuries. Or to take one particular example, there is a 60% chance of a child being moved through a doorway while being restrained and wearing a waist restraint belt suffering injuries involving the airway, breathing or circulation that can be potentially catastrophic. The irony is that this relatively new restraint regime, known as Minimising and Managing Physical Restraint (MMPR) was only introduced in 2012 as a result of the death of two boys in secure training centres following restraints. (Fifteen-year-old Gareth Myatt choked on his vomit while being restrained by three officers; 14-year-old Adam Rickwood hanged himself after being restrained by four staff, one of whom inflicted a painful restraint on him known "nose

(distraction".) MMPR was supposed to be more humane and safe. So what did the government do when it discovered that it wasn't? It classified the risk-assessment table and heavily redacted the MMPR manual that is publicly available, concluding with absurd Kafkaesque logic that if everything about MMPR was publicly known, children would learn how to resist it and put themselves at more risk of being harmed. For four years, Willow has fought, unsuccessfully, to see the uncensored manuals. In refusing her most recent request, the MoJ wrote: "It is considered that on balance, the likely threat to the good order and security of YOIs and prisons and the safety implication of this for young people and staff in both YOIs and prisons favours non-disclosure of the unredacted version of the MMPR training manual." When we approached the Youth Justice Board about the risk-assessment table, and the fact that it had only praised MMPR without mentioning the dangers, there was much off-the-record handwringing. What's the option, it asked; tell us if a better system exists? Tough love: is this a model prison for children? Last month, 14 young people were compensated for their mistreatment in British prisons. What can we learn from a groundbreaking scheme for young offenders in Spain? Eric Allison and Simon Hattenstone find out Read more So we did. One better system already exists in England and Wales. Secure children's homes are run by local authorities rather than the MoJ, and they house some of the country's most severe child offenders as well as some of the country's most vulnerable non-criminal children. MMPR is banned in secure children's homes (yet shockingly private security guards taking children to and from them can use it). They are expensive to run, but have low children to staff ratios, are learning-focused and are regarded as the closest this country has to model institutions for children in custody. Advertisement Meanwhile, Spain offers an even more impressive model. In 2014 we visited children's prisons in Spain run by a non-profit organisation Diagramma. Some of the buildings we saw were frankly terrifying – old-fashioned Victorian prisons surrounded by barbed wire. But the attitude of staff within them could not be more different to that too often found in the YOIs and STCs of England and Wales. In Spain, the prison officers are called educators, they all have degrees, are relatively well paid, and all have the children's best interests at heart. There were guards on site, but they were rarely called to action. The educators and detainees called each other by first names, ate with each other and treated each other with respect. Love, even. Whereas there is an alarmingly fast turnover of staff in children's prisons in the UK, in Spain we were told that staff rarely left. We asked the director of one institution we visited when restraint had last ended in injury, and he looked at us as if we were mad. Never, was the answer. In fact, he could not remember the last time restraint had been used, full stop. The way in which the staff in these prisons transformed dangerous and feckless youths into responsible young adults looking forward to a bright future was astonishing. If Spain can achieve something so miraculous, there is no reason why we can't. Source: <https://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/2016/dec/06/prison-approved-restraint-techniques-kill-children-alternatives-prisons-mmpr>

Dozens rally against plans to create joint Hennepin/Ramsey juvenile facility About 100 people disrupted a meeting in Richfield, holding signs with slogans such as "No Cages for Kids." The meeting ended with several people yelling. By Kelly Smith Star Tribune December 6, 2016 — 9:47pm Kelly Smith, Star Tribune About 100 protesters came to Tuesday night's meeting in Richfield, the fourth of seven community input meetings on Hennepin and Ramsey counties' plans for a joint juvenile treatment center. Dozens of protesters rallied Tuesday against plans for a juvenile facility for teenage criminal offenders in Hennepin and Ramsey counties, saying they preferred to place the youths in community-based programs instead. About 100 people disrupted a meeting in Richfield, holding signs with slogans such as "No Cages for Kids." The meeting ended with several people yelling, ripping up poster boards and chanting "Foster us, don't criminalize us." Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC 3 "We know this program doesn't work," said Tonja Honsey, who helped start a local campaign called Youth Prison Blockaders. "The systems are old. We need to start taking care of these youth." Tuesday's meeting was the fourth of seven community input meetings the counties are holding on the proposed joint facility. County leaders say that no final decision has been made on a new facility, where it would be located or whether there would be only one building. A final vote from both county boards isn't expected until April, when a final report will be released. The next public meeting will be held in January, followed by ones in February and March. The joint facility would replace the Hennepin County Home School in Minnetonka and Ramsey County's Boys Totem Town in St. Paul, which Honsey's organization and other activists want shut down in favor of more community-based programs for young offenders. Activists have referred to the counties' residential treatment centers as "super juvenile prisons" or "youth prisons." Community input meetings • 6 to 8 p.m. Jan. 10, Arlington Hills Community Center, 1200 Payne Av., St. Paul. • 6 to 8 p.m. Feb 7, Hennepin County Home School, 14300 County Rd. 62, Minnetonka. • 6 to 8 p.m. March 7, Neighborhood House, 179 E. Robie St., St. Paul. But Chet Cooper, Hennepin County community corrections director, said that's a major misconception. He said that the nonsecure facilities, which provide therapy and behavioral treatment, are needed to help a small group of teens who have committed violent or sexual assaults make their way back to the community. "We've heard loud and clear that a big infrastructure, prison-like environment ... is not what the community wants and that's not what we want," Cooper said of community input. "We are not a youth prison ... we are a treatment facility." For more than a century, courts have ordered juveniles committing felonies to attend the Home School and Totem Town. Both state-licensed facilities have aging infrastructure and have seen demand for their services decline as more juvenile offenders have been shifted to in-home treatment. Cooper said that it isn't realistic to get rid of such facilities just yet. "Public safety is still No. 1," he said. "We still have a small number of our youth that need a facility." But he said that community input so far has resulted in helping the counties scale down plans and aim for a campuslike model with no more than 100 teens. IN Equality, which advocates for police and court reform, in November presented the Ramsey County Board with 1,000 postcards signed by people opposing the joint facility. The group is concerned about the disproportionate number of children of color who are sentenced, as well as Hennepin County's 49 percent recidivism rate. In Ramsey County, District Judge Patrick Diamond is one of the juvenile court judges who see the same teens return. "It's not working," he said of a large residential treatment center. "It's frustrating at times there aren't more and better alternatives available." Source: <http://www.startribune.com/dozens-rally-against-plans-to-create-joint-hennepin-ramsey-juvenile-facility/405127716/>

Baldwin County group home teens asked neighbor for help By Grace Tennyson Thursday, December 8th 2016 SBALDWIN COUNTY, Ala. (WEAR) — No criminal charges have been filed against a boys group home in Baldwin County but the sheriff's office is now involved. The Alabama Department of Human Resources (DHR) removed 25 boys from Blessed Hope Boys Academy over the weekend. All the boys are from out-of-state. A neighbor told the news she alerted authorities after two teenagers from the academy came to her for help. "They had to do exercises some days up to 9 hours if they were bad," said Tina Boyington. "They weren't allowed to tell their parents anything negative over the phone or their phone call would get cut off." DHR investigates allegations of abuse or neglect but the department has not provided any details on this investigation. The sheriff's office met with the department on Wednesday, no information has been released from them either. Source: <http://wear.tv.com/news/local/baldwin-county-group-home-update>

Teen says foster parents locked him in basement for months, poured salt on his open wounds - The Washington Post Teen says foster parents locked him in basement for months, poured salt on his open wounds The inside track on Washington politics. Be the first to know about new stories from PowerPost. Sign up to follow, and we'll e-mail you free updates as they're published. You'll receive free e-mail news updates each time a new story is published. You're all set! Sign up *Invalid email address Got it Got it By Travis M. Andrews Morning Mix December 8 at 7:16 AM Alabama teen says he was locked in basement and tortured for months Embed Copy Share Play Video0:34 Last month, a 14-year-old boy was found close to death after being locked in an Alabama basement for months. The boy's brother Eddie Carter spoke out about similar abuse from their foster parents, who are now both in jail. (Reuters) Last month, a 14-year-old boy was found close to death after being locked in an Alabama basement for months. The boy's brother Eddie Carter spoke out about similar abuse from their foster parents, who are now both in jail. Eddie Carter, the brother of a teen found close to death in a Helena, Alabama basement, says he too suffered abuse from his foster parents. (Reuters) "It gets to that point where you're like an animal. You feel like an animal." These are the words of Eddie Carter, an 18-year-old reflecting on the years of abuse he told AL.com that he suffered, years during which he claims his parents would lock him in the basement, sometimes for several months straight. He spoke out to the news organization after his foster parents, Richard and Cynthia Kelly, were charged with aggravated child abuse for keeping his 14-year-old brother trapped in the basement of their Alabama home for much of two years. When the boy was found, he weighed 55 pounds. That's half of the average weight of a 14-year-old boy, 110 pounds, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The Associated Press reported the boy was in critical condition on Nov. 15, and the Helena Police Chief Pete Folmar called it the "worst case of neglect" he's ever seen. The two will appear in court on Dec. 14 and 15 for preliminary hearings. They have not yet entered a plea. But Eddie Carter said he too was mistreated. The teenager was his younger brother, and Carter alleged that the couple once held him in the basement as well. He told AL.com that he and his brother were two of five siblings born to a woman in Huntsville, who eventually lost parental rights to all of them for reasons he did not explain. The five were passed around from foster home to foster home, but Carter and his brother were never separated. "I took care of him a lot, changing his diapers and stuff, making sure he was eating. When he was sleeping, I'd check his chest to make sure he was breathing," Carter told the newspaper. "My little brother was like my golden egg. I just had to keep him safe. It was my main goal not to be separated ever." When was 11 years old and his brother was 7, a Christian adoption agency brought them to the Kellys. Carter remembered feeling excited at the time. "It's a big shot to get adopted," he said. "It's really exciting." It didn't take long for that to change, though. "Like people say, the true colors came out," Carter said. "The honeymoon cycle is over and, after that, everything went to crap." He claimed the couple sent him down to the basement as a punishment after about 18 months, where there was a bed but no bathroom. The light-switches didn't work — they were controlled from the outside. The door to the outside world was locked, and the door to the house was equipped with a motion sensor, prepared to alert the family should he try to leave. Sometimes, he alleged, he would be locked down there for months at a time. If he needed to use the bathroom, he'd do so in a corner of the room, on the floor. "The room stank like piss," he said. "It was really horrible." Sometimes, they would feed him vegetables, which he hated, down there. Sometimes, they would only give him bread and water. "They would say, 'Jesus survived off bread and water, so you can too,'" he said. "It was like a torture method. They were upstairs eating pizza and Chinese, and I'd be eating bread and water." He began chewing his lips until they would bleed, and he claimed the couple would pour salt on the open wounds as punishment. Eventually, he would show his anger. "I would bang on the walls just to keep people awake in the house," Carter told AL.com. "I got aggressive, like, 'I'm not about to stay down here. Hell no. I wasn't having it, and think I said I was going to do something to somebody.'" Wearing a hooded letter jacket and a baseball cap in his recorded interview with the newspaper, Carter said, "I felt like a wild animal at any type of affection, after a while. I didn't really trust anybody." In 2013, Arizona rapper Nick Carter, who goes by Murs, adopted Carter. But not his brother. "I thought about him every single day," Carter said. "At that point, I was blaming myself for getting sent away." But there wasn't much he could do, so he "prayed it didn't happen to him." But more was rotten in Carter's life. A year after his adoption, Murs returned him to the foster care system after he claimed the boy filed false claims of neglect and abuse against him and his wife. "Nothing was substantiated," Murs told Contact Music. "We definitely were able to clear it up once we went to court and they came to the house and also saw the damage he did to my property, and they quickly changed their tune." Added Murs, "Even though he filed a false claim on us, I know he's just angry, I tell him, 'When you hit rock bottom, I'm there for you so call me.'" Now, Carter lives alone in Arizona. Murs and his wife remain Carter's legal parents. The couple bought him a planet ticket to fly from Arizona to Alabama after his brother was found. The Kellys were not arrested for any of these allegations, but for the alleged child abuse of his brother. The arrest warrants alleged he was "subjected to forced isolation for extended period of time." Two days after the teenager was found, a prayer vigil was held for the boy. Eighty people came to pray on a baseball field in the Helena Sports Complex. "We wanted to raise awareness to the unknown things that are going on in our community," Amanda Shannell told the paper. "When we come together and pray together, miracles can happen." For Carter, it seemed as if one did. Sadly, the same couldn't be said for his brother, who WHNT reported remains hospitalized at Children's of Alabama. Richard and Cynthia Kelly are both being held at the Shelby County Jail, their bonds set at $1 million each. Source: <https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/morning-mix/wp/2016/12/08/teen-says-foster-parents-locked-him-in-basement-for-months-poured-salt-on-his-open-wounds/>

Boot camp failures scored by judge Michael Moser Michael Moser Dec 8, 2016 Timothy Joel Boles pleaded guilty to methamphetamine selling charges and theft of property of more than $1,000 in January of this year and was supposed to four years in prison. In July, Boles was released to boot camp probation by the Tennessee Department of Corrections. He met with TDOC probation officer Chad McCaleb on July 6. Boles tested positive for meth — and admitted taking meth — on July 14. Assistant Public Defender Ellie Putman represented Boles in a probation violation hearing Friday and argued that he had completed the boot camp program and that most of his probation violations were "technical" ones. She asked that if his probation were to be revoked, that he be placed under house arrest supervision of community corrections and allowed to remain free. Assistant District Attorney Amanda Worley countered that Boles agreed to the four-year sentence when he pleaded guilty and that he "had weeks to get his problem in check." Judge Gary McKenzie agreed with Worley, commenting Boles "was obviously in violation." The judge then shared his feelings about the TDOC's boot camp program. "It is my experience that the boot camp program doesn't work ... I have very little faith in it," McKenzie added that his concern was that the boot camp program "is setting people up to failure." The judge then revoked Boles' probation and ordered him to serve the balance of his four-year sentence. A similar hearing was held for Douglas Keith Jackson, who pleaded guilty on Jan. 27 of this year to possession of more than .5 grams of meth and received an eight-year sentence. Jackson also had a misdemeanor probation violation in Roane County where he served 30 days in jail. Jackson, too, was released into the TDOC's boot camp program. Once released from boot camp, Jackson failed to report regularly to his probation officer and on one occasion, refused to let his house or room be searched by deputies, despite knowing the refusal could cause his probation to be revoked. Putman argued that Jackson allowed a personal search but did not grant a search of the house or the room in which he was staying because the house belonged to another family member. Putnam asked he be allowed to remain on probation. McKenzie noted that Jackson signed a form before being released from prison stating he understood all the rules and requirements of probation. While failure to report is a low standard in probation violation hearings, McKenzie said it was important that all rules be observed at all times. "All you have to do is report," McKenzie said. He then ordered Jackson to serve the balance of his eight-year sentence. Michael Moser may be reached at mmoser@crossville-chronicle.com Source: http://www.crossville-chronicle.com/news/local_news/boot-camp-failures-scored-by-judge/article_946dcb16-bd85-11e6-8371-1b13a257ab09.html

News Opinion Op-Eds No study needed to know DJS shackling of children is inhumane Susan Villani Op-ed: Md. child psychiatrist urges DJS to end shackling requirement. Here's why. The state Department of Juvenile Services says it is collecting data in order to determine whether the inhuman procedure of shackling children every time they're transported should continue. This strikes me as absurd. I work as a child psychiatrist at a residential treatment center for boys who are in the custody of DJS. These youth most commonly come from detention centers where they have spent months waiting for a determination of what should happen next. Some are released back to the community after serving their time, others are referred on for intensive treatment. Our residents have had numerous evaluations with many pages of reports to convince the court that treatment in a residential treatment center is warranted. By the time they are ordered to a treatment facility, the crime they have committed is months in the past. This is not to minimize the fact that many youth have been involved in significant criminal activity, such as breaking and entering, stealing a car, taking a gun to school, robbing someone with the use of a weapon, and assault and battery. And their criminal records are often not just made up of one offense, but a string of charges occurring over the preceding two to three years. However, when they come to us, they have agreed to participate in treatment. They will live for months on our campus and move daily between locked buildings, their residence, the cafeteria and school, while accompanied by staff. After a period of time of safe behavior, being compliant with the rules of living together, and being respectful to staff and each other, they earn the privilege to go off grounds for staff supervised activities. After weeks of consistent good behavior and family participation in therapy, they can earn passes home, to test how they do with less supervision and to bring back examples of stressful times in order to further examine and work on them in therapy. Family members are also participating in therapy in order to have their children return home. Residents may also need to go to appointments elsewhere. This brings me to the most recent example of shackling. A 15-year-old youth came to us with court ordered testing for fetal alcohol syndrome. He has a court date to review his progress and the status of the testing. Here is an abbreviated version of discussion from a treatment team meeting: Me: How is JD doing this week? Therapist: He has had a good week. No aggression, compliant on the unit and doing well in school. Mother is requesting a pass home before his court date. If he comes home, she can take him to court, and he won't have to be transported by DJS in shackles. Me: What? Why shackles? Therapist: Oh, it is department (DJS) policy that whenever they transport, the kid has to be in shackles. This is when my ire comes up. The youth has been walking to and from the cafeteria, to and from school, going on staff supervised outings and going home on passes home without shackles. Now in order to be transported by DJS to and from court, he would be put in shackles. I sat there wondering about the irony that as his treating psychiatrist, I approve that he is safe enough to go off grounds with staff and sign pass requests for him to go home with family, but to go to court, he needs to be shackled. Each time the youth is shackled, the message he is receiving is that he is unsafe and cannot be trusted. We are saying that we are concerned that he might run away. We are saying that the only way to prevent this is to lock his ankles together in heavy metal shackles. But the treatment team working with him has already decided differently. We have observed his behavior, worked with him to develop trust and are sending him out into the community safely. The purpose of policies within organizations is to have consistent practices that ensure safety. But shackling a youth for transport to and from court from a treatment facility where there is a treatment team assessing safety is unnecessary. No study is needed to determine this. DJS can and should change their shackling policy today. Dr. Susan Villani is a board certified child and adolescent psychiatrist and a fellow of the American Academy of Child Psychiatry; her email is vsusanvillani@gmail.com. Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/opinion/oped/bs-ed-djs-shackling-20161213-story.html>

Special needs Texas teens rescued from home released from hospital (File) Updated: Tue 12:58 PM, Dec 13, 2016 HOUSTON (AP) Seven special-needs teenagers found living in isolation amid squalid conditions at a Houston-area home have been released from a hospital after a nearly three-week stay. Tiffani Butler, a spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, says the teens were released Tuesday and will be kept together under the state's care. The children aren't related, but were adopted by 54-year-old Paula Sinclair and her former husband in 2003 and 2004. Butler says the lengthy hospitalization was due to hospital staff wanting to monitor their eating habits and also to time it took to arrange housing that could keep them together. Sinclair and her husband, Allen Richardson, 78, remain jailed on charges that include causing injury to a child. Online jail records don't indicate whether they have attorneys. A 7-year-old special-needs child died at the same home in January 2011, Texas Department of Family and Protective Services spokeswoman Tiffani Butler told The Associated Press Tuesday. She declined to discuss the circumstances. She said the other seven children were in the home at the time, but were not removed. Butler told AP that no charges were filed in the younger child's death. Investigators determined that all seven of the malnourished children removed from the home last month stayed in one room in the home and that when Sinclair took Richardson to see a doctor, all seven were locked in a closet that measured roughly five feet by eight feet that was filled with clothes and boxes, leaving even less room for the children. "Quite often the adults were gone so long that the children would urinate on themselves," the press release said. "The larger room smelled of urine and feces and the children wore shabby clothes. One of the children suffers from Down syndrome and was wearing a dirty diaper when he was removed from the home," the press release said. Investigators determined that all seven children have learning disabilities and that none had ever attended school. Sinclair was also operating a group home for adults in the same house and three men lived downstairs, authorities said. Investigators went to the home on Nov. 23, Nehls said. Sinclair and Richardson were arrested Saturday. Sinclair and her husband were described as the adoptive parents of the seven children, but the husband did not live in the home and has not been charged, authorities said. The children were removed from the home and were taken to the Fort Bend County Children's Advocacy Center in Rosenberg for interviews and then were transferred to a Houston hospital for treatment. Source: <http://www.kwtx.com/content/news/Special-needs-Texas-teens-rescued-from-home-released-from-hospital-406326525.html>

Sexual Battery at Bradenton Group Home: More Charges Filed The Manatee County Sheriff's Office says two men accused of sexually battering people at a group home also had a 15-year-old male victim. By Sherri Lonon \(Patch Staff\) - December 14, 2016 12:23 pm ET BRADENTON, FL — As the Manatee County Sheriff's Office continues its investigation into alleged sexual misconduct at a Bradenton group home for special needs people, the two men arrested in the case face more charges. According to the agency, a 15-year-old male victim has been identified. Both men arrested in the case now face additional charges, as a result. Jeremiah Damsgaard, 25, was charged with four additional counts of lewd and lascivious battery on a victim age 12 to 16 on Tuesday night. David Makynen, 30, now faces one additional count of lewd and lascivious battery on a victim age 12 to 16, the agency reported in a Wednesday email to media. The investigation into allegations of sexual misconduct began on Nov. 14. That investigation led to the initial arrest of Damsgaard on Nov. 17. At that time, Damsgaard was charged with one count of lewd and lascivious battery on a victim age 12 to 16. He was also charged with four counts of lewd and lascivious molestation on a victim age 12 to 16. Deputies added a count of sexual battery on an adult victim on Monday, Dec. 12. According to the sheriff's office, Damsgaard's initially identified victims are both males, ages 14 and 29 years. Damsgaard, sheriff's office spokesman Dave Bristow said, is friends with Makynen, who worked at several group homes over the past 12 years as a contractor for the State of Florida. Makynen, the sheriff's office said, worked as a support coach for special needs adults. Deputies say Makynen provided Damsgaard access to his alleged victims. Makynen was initially arrested Monday, charged with three counts of sexual battery on adult victims. The victims the sheriff's office originally identified were all men, ages 25, 29 and 50. The two men are also under investigation by the Florida Attorney General's Office's Medicaid Fraud Control Unit, the sheriff's office noted in a Tuesday email to media. Additional charges against both men are pending. The sheriff's office is not releasing the name or location of the group home involved to protect the identity of the victims. Both men are from Bradenton. Bristow confirmed the home where the batteries allegedly occurred is also in Bradenton. Anyone with information about the case or possible additional victims is asked to contact the sheriff's office at 941-747-3011 or Crime Stoppers at 866-634-TIPS. Both Makynen and Damsgaard remained in the Manatee County Jail Wednesday. Booking photos of Makynen and Damsgaard courtesy of the Manatee County Sheriff's Office Source: <http://patch.com/florida/bradenton/sexual-battery-bradenton-group-home-more-charges-filed>

Former Hope House employee accused of raping teen in his care by WRGB Staff ALBANY, NY (WRGB) An Albany man, once employed as a Respite Worker at Hope House in Albany, is accused of raping a teenage girl in his care, according to authorities. The Special Prosecutor for the NYS Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs says that James Whetstone is accused of having sex with a resident under the age of 18 while working an overnight shift at the Hope House. "People receiving treatment at residential centers are there to recover from chemical addictions and dependencies," said Special Prosecutor Gunning. "Employees who abuse these individuals for their own sexual gratification, especially by targeting a teenager who is trying to get help for addiction, are not only breaking the law but they risk undermining and causing a setback to a person's recovery. For such misconduct, they have to be held accountable." Whetstone was arraigned in Albany City Court, accused of Felony rape, Sexual Abuse and Sexual misconduct. Error OK Error OK LEARN MORE Officials say Whetstone was terminated from his position prior to his arrest. BELOW IS THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT FROM HOPE HOUSE Upon learning of the alleged incident, Hope House notified the New York State Justice Center and the Albany City Police. The employee was suspended immediately, and subsequently terminated. Hope House has cooperated with the Justice Center's investigation, and continues to do so, and provided counseling and emotional support to the resident. Hope House submitted the individual's name for a pre-employment background check through the Justice Center and the state Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services and there were no allegations that would disqualify him for employment. "The safety, security and well-being of our residents is our utmost priority, and we have further expanded our oversight with additional cameras in group rooms and common areas," said Kevin Connally, Executive Director of Hope House, which treats individuals with substance abuse addictions through programs including a residential treatment facility. Mr. Connally went on to add, "Hope House treats any allegation of impropriety extremely seriously and we work cooperatively with the Justice Center and NYS OASAS to do what we can to ensure the safety and well being of our clients." Source: <http://cbs6albany.com/news/local/former-hope-house-employee-accused-of-raping-teen-in-his-care>

Hennepin, Ramsey facility for troubled youth is no more after public outcry By Sarah Horner | shorner@pioneerpress.com PUBLISHED: December 15, 2016 at 8:48 pm | UPDATED: December 15, 2016 at 9:38 pm Hennepin and Ramsey counties are abandoning plans to build a joint center for delinquent youth following public outcry that the proposal was not in the best interest of teens and ignored the will of the community. Members of an executive committee comprised of staff and commissioners from both counties met last Wednesday and agreed that halting the building discussion was the right move for all involved. Hennepin and Ramsey will continue to discuss how they might collaborate on programs to better serve area juveniles who run into legal trouble, Ramsey County commissioners said. The decision came a week after a tense and loud public meeting held in Richfield on the proposed merger. Some in the audience held signs and chanted slogans articulating their opposition to the process and discussion to date. Several threatened to shut down future public meetings scheduled across both counties as well. Hennepin and Ramsey officials have been meeting for the past couple years on how they might work together to improve and broaden services for delinquent teens in the metro area. Part of the discussion included building a joint facility to replace Ramsey County's Boys Totem Town facility and Hennepin's Home School. No final decision had been reached on the merger or where such a facility might be built, but an architect had been hired to begin pre-design work. That roughly $240,000 contract will now be terminated. "I wasn't at the Richfield meeting, but the feeling around the table (Wednesday) was that, unfortunately, the messaging around this (merger) ... wasn't focused on what it should be, which is how to provide the best continuum of services for our kids," said Ramsey County Commissioner Rafael Ortega. Ramsey County Commissioner Jim McDonough said the building had become "a distraction" to the counties' broader intent on how to get best help for kids in the community while keeping the public safe. McDonough added that intense emotions and misinformation about the plans complicated the ability to have productive public discussion. "I had people telling me not to build a 160-bed prison. Well, no one was ever thinking anything like that ... but that was one of the perceptions out there," he said. McDonough added that both counties are committed to doing a better job of taking care of juveniles who wade into the criminal justice system and that talks to date between Hennepin and Ramsey will still help both do that. OPPONENTS OF MERGER CELEBRATE Damon Drake, a vocal opponent of the building merger and a past employee at Totem Town, called the decision to abandon building plans "great news." Drake is also a member of In Equality, a community group that had mobilized against the plan. "Throughout this whole process, we were told our efforts were a nonstarter, that we should just get used to this and that this facility was going to be built, ... so, for me, this is a very big win for the community," Drake said. The biggest flaw with the plan was that the community wasn't included early enough in the discussion, Drake continued. He said any plans for changes to the local juvenile system need to address the disproportionate rate of kids of color within it, do a better job of keeping teens close to their communities and make sure that juveniles are not treated the same as adults. Drake added that it never made sense for the counties to build a larger facility given the decline each has seen in the number of youth served. He also pointed out that the collective narrative coming out of the research community is that detaining kids in locked facilities often just leads to reoffending. Ramsey County Commissioner Janice Rettman has been against the merger since the outset. Rettman cheered the news last Wednesday and said she hopes it can be a lesson to both counties about the importance of public engagement. "It's easy to say we read this report or we've done that or we're going to look at that other thing and then we'll take it all to the community to see what they think. ... No, community first, people come first," Rettman said. "They should be a part of the solution at the outset not after some groundwork has been laid about where somebody wants to go." FUTURE OF JUVENILE SYSTEM UNCERTAIN Ramsey County Commissioner Toni Carter said best outcomes for juveniles was always the driver for her and her colleagues on the board but that somehow that mission and commitment got lost in translation. "We may have been having one conversation about services and alternatives to prevent out-of-home placement, but if we ... (were) unable to connect that with the other conversation about replacing an outdated and inadequate facility then we need to listen to our community and find a different way to have that (discussion)," Carter said. "So that is what we are doing." None of the commissioners reached said they know what comes next for Totem Town in light of the development or when its ultimate fate will be decided. Some said it still undoubtedly needs to be replaced; one said it should at least be updated. The building, located on more than 80 acres in St. Paul's Highwood Hills neighborhood, is more than 100 years old and has significant maintenance needs, staff have said. Hennepin's counterpart, Home School, also needs repair. That reality, combined with gaps each county has in its youth programming, propelled the merger discussion. Hennepin's program, for example, serves girls and sex offenders, while Totem Town offers after-care and day treatment options. By combining, the thinking was, the two counties could offer a broader spectrum of services to all area-youth instead of sending some out of the region or state to get their needs met. Ramsey County sent more than 100 kids outside the county for services in 2016, according to county data. Those discussions on how the two can work together to plug holes in the system will continue, commissioners said. The Ramsey County Board is expected to receive a report on those findings in the weeks to come, staff and commissioners said. From there, the county will likely decide its next steps. Source: <http://www.twincities.com/2016/12/15/plans-to-build-a-shared-facility-for-troubled-youth-in-hennepin-and-ramsey-counties-scrapped/>

Report: Foster care has unhappy ending for many By Linda Conner Lambeck Updated 6:17 pm, Thursday, December 15, 2016 1 Ronaelle Williams was 16 when she entered the state's foster care system. She wasn't thinking about anything but getting through high school as she bounced from placement to placement, four in all. "It was really scary, because I didn't know what I didn't know," said Williams, who ended up being one of the lucky ones. Now 20, she's living with a friend and her family in New Haven and making her way through college. Most foster children aren't as lucky, and continue to need significant support once they turn 18 years old and leave the system, a report released Thursday by Connecticut Voices for Children says. More Information What the future looks like for foster care youth In 2016, 79 percent of those who aged out of foster care had a high school diploma, compared to 90 percent of all Connecticut adults. Only 42 percent leave care with a job, and half of those are working just part time. On average, only 15 percent will go on to get a vocational certificate or licensure. More than 13 percent leave care pregnant or parenting at least one child. Follow-up with youth who age out found at least 29 percent had been incarcerated between the ages of 19 and 21. Source: Connecticut Voices For Children. At least half of the aged-out youth rely on public assistance, one in five leaves the foster care system without a high school diploma and only 11 percent go on to earn an associate or bachelor's degree. "The state needs to do more to prepare them to be self-sufficient," said Nicole Updegrove, an associate policy fellow at Connecticut Voices for Children, and one of the study's authors. The report suggests that though some progress has been made in recent years, it is not enough. The state Department of Children and Families, Updegrove said, now manages to keep more children with their families or relatives. More, however, needs to be done when such arrangements can't be made, the study says. Cut loose at 18 or 21 Over the past five years, 1,374 youths have aged out of the state's foster care system. For many, the cut-off age for receiving services is 18. Those who are still in school, or who meet specific guidelines can stay to age 21. Most who age out leave without a job. By age 21, only 16 percent are working full-time. This year, 565 foster care recipients are enrolled in some post-secondary program. DCF Commissioner Joette Katz, who participated in a youth forum Thursday at the State Capitol, said the success of foster children once they leave the system is perhaps the most important measure of how well the agency is serving youth. "Nationally, we know that the outcomes for children who leave foster care are not good," Katz said. "(There is) lower educational achievement, greater poverty and homelessness, less success in employment, and greater involvement in adult mental health and criminal justice systems. Unfortunately, Connecticut foster care faces these challenges as well," Katz said the state needs to build on existing strengths. "We need to continue to work to engage youth, to listen to them, and to remove barriers to their success," she said. Also during the public forum, several lawmakers said they are focused on making the system better. Strengthening protections State Sen. Dante Bartolomeo, D-Meriden, said a law passed in the last session could begin to address some concerns. "It has three components that will be effective as of Jan. 1," Bartolomeo said. The law gives children age 12 and older a stronger voice during hearings, requires youth advisory councils at certain child care facilities, and will survey foster children exiting the system to better recruit, train and retain high-quality foster parents. Williams, who knows the foster care system from the inside, said there needs to be a safety net for young people like her. "I constantly felt I was bothering people, taking up their time when I had questions," she said. "You feel like a burden sometimes when you don't want to be." Williams, who is in the process of transferring from Gateway Community College to the University of Connecticut to study human development, said foster youth need more help to prepare for their future and to maintain connections. She also wants access to someone who can answer questions, even for those who have officially exited the system. "so we don't freak out," she said. "There may be something we forgot to ask." The Voices report recommends that DCF adopt innovative policies in case planning, and better educate youth about post-secondary policies and support once they leave the system. The group recommends a guaranteed 90-day transition period, homelessness prevention and better data collection so those aging out don't "face an abrupt cliff once they become legal adults." Source: <http://www.ctpost.com/local/article/Foster-care-an-unhappy-ending-for-many-10799389.php>

2016 Baltimore Sun pictures of the year News Maryland Sun Investigates Maryland state agencies stop sending youths for treatment to Good Shepherd, group home Erica L. GreenContact Reporter The Baltimore Sun State agencies put a moratorium on youth care at Good Shepherd, group home. Two state agencies have placed a moratorium on sending youths in their custody to Good Shepherd Services, a Baltimore County residential treatment center cited by regulators for not providing proper supervision after one patient reported being sexually assaulted and others showed signs of overdose after taking medicine stolen from a medical cart. The Department of Juvenile Services contracts with Good Shepherd, a nonprofit organization, to provide intensive mental health services to young offenders who have been committed. Agency officials said the program failed to comply with departmental policies and standards. The Department of Human Resources, which oversees the state's child welfare system, including foster care, declined to say what prompted their moratorium but noted that the agency "strives to ensure that each program complies with applicable laws and regulations designed to protect children." Lack of supervision and other problems were documented by the state Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, which regulates residential treatment centers, according to public records obtained by The Baltimore Sun. Regulators investigated a number of incidents this year, interviewing staff members and residents and reviewing surveillance video from the facility. In the case of one resident who reported to staff that she was sexually assaulted on two occasions by another resident, the regulators noted in a report that "failure to enforce facility policies and procedures designed to protect residents may have put [a resident] at risk for the alleged assaults." Maryland task force recommends limits to juvenile shackling policies Erica L. Green A legislative task force on Thursday recommended limiting the situations in which juveniles accused of crimes in Maryland can be bound in restraints, but it stopped short of proposing sweeping reforms that would drastically curtail the controversial practice. The group of 19 — comprising state... A legislative task force on Thursday recommended limiting the situations in which juveniles accused of crimes in Maryland can be bound in restraints, but it stopped short of proposing sweeping reforms that would drastically curtail the controversial practice. The group of 19 — comprising state... \(Erica L. Green\) After three residents exhibited signs of overdose and surveillance video showed that one of them had raided a medicine cart, the regulators concluded that "the facility staff failed to safely store medications, which affected the health and safety of all residents on the unit." In another incident, several youths attacked other residents who were on a "hit list," according to a report. Michele Wyman, president and CEO of Good Shepherd Services, declined to discuss the incident reports but said her staff is highly trained and that the center has taken steps to address the problems. The coed treatment center houses as many as 75 young people, ages 13 to 21, who are suffering from severe emotional and behavioral problems. Juveniles in Maryland's justice system are routinely strip-searched and shackled Erica L. Green The Baltimore girl, 15, stood in front of the judge that spring day two years ago. She'd stolen toilet paper, laundry detergent and clothes because her grandmother was sick and they had little money. The judge said it was time for the serial shoplifter to learn a lesson. He ordered a weekend stay... The Baltimore girl, 15, stood in front of the judge that spring day two years ago. She'd stolen toilet paper, laundry detergent and clothes because her grandmother was sick and they had little money. The judge said it was time for the serial shoplifter to learn a lesson. He ordered a weekend stay... \(Erica L. Green\) "We consider ourselves a learning organization," she said, "which means you look at any kind of deficiency as an opportunity to examine and improve." The departments of juvenile services and human resources also imposed moratoriums on sending youths to Mary's Mount Manor therapeutic group home in Anne Arundel County. State officials declined to specify problems there. Health department officials, who respond to complaints at residential treatment centers and group homes, said no incident reports have been filed this year at Mary's Mount. The group home, which houses up to eight teenage girls, is under contract to house and provide counseling to young offenders and foster children. Chloe Perez, CEO of the nonprofit Hearts and Homes for Youth, which runs Mary's Mount Manor, declined to comment on the moratoriums. Youths at both facilities have been diverted to other locations. State officials declined to say how long the moratoriums would last. Both programs are part of a network of treatment centers and group homes that care for young people who have been committed in the juvenile justice system or are in foster care. There are about 5,000 children in the state's foster care system. An average of 575 juvenile offenders are committed on any given day, many of whom are placed in group homes or residential treatment centers for long-term commitments. Group homes are designed to provide a family-like setting and are regarded as an alternative to institutionalization. Residential treatment centers provide psychiatric and psychological treatment for adolescents who need 24-hour-supervision and a restrictive environment. These centers have come under increasing scrutiny nationwide from children's advocates and government agencies that are demanding better outcomes and lower costs, a group of trade associations for residential treatment centers acknowledged in a statement earlier this year. The group said it would work to identify best practices. "The consensus view is that kids with behavior issues can and should be treated in their own homes, or somewhere else in the communities," said Ira Burnim, legal director of the Judge David L. Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington-based group that advocates for adults and children. Burnim said the treatment centers often keep children away from their homes by putting them in places with a potential for abuse and where they can learn unhealthy behavior from other teens. He also said many have insufficient and untrained staff. "The situation often devolves into a battle for control," he said. In Maryland, residential treatment centers cost an average of $423 a night, and therapeutic group homes cost an average of $255 a night, according to state data. Debbie St. Jean, director of the Juvenile Protection Division of the Maryland Office of the Public Defender, said some residential centers don't provide adequate treatment, noting that juvenile offenders get about 45 minutes a week in individual counseling sessions. "It isn't as though these kids are in a milieu that is therapeutic," St. Jean said. Lucienne Parsley, managing attorney at Disability Rights Maryland, said that many of the agency's clients report not feeling safe at Good Shepherd and other residential treatment centers because of incessant fighting and violence. Residential treatment centers are required to send Disability Rights Maryland, formerly the Maryland Disability Law Center, reports of any incidents resulting in serious physical injury. Under federal law, the organization has statutory authority to conduct investigations of suspected abuse and neglect of individuals with disabilities in such facilities. Parsley said that Good Shepherd has not been complying with the documentation requirement. For example, she said, an incident in which a child was taken to the hospital did not result in a serious-incident report to the agency. "We're looking into rectifying that," she said. Wyman defended the center's programs, saying it provides as much counseling as a youth may need beyond the once-a-week sessions, and that it tries to "do normal things for kids." She said youths committed there have extensive treatment programs that are reviewed every 28 days. The residents also have a family advocate, and the goal is for them to be reunited with their families. She said that her philosophy as a leader is that "transparency is always the best approach." She said, "We do not hesitate to properly report each and every injury deemed serious. In our environment, we believe even one physical altercation is too many, and we are focused on creating the safest setting possible," she added. "Because of the complexity of illness seen in our population, we do sometimes have pockets of volatile behavior that is not dissimilar from other institutions across the country caring for similar populations." Wyman noted that many of the young people "bring histories which are filled with persistent aggression as well as fractured relationship issues that are replayed in a new setting." But she said they learn new skills through the program to reduce aggression. She also acknowledged that in some cases, juvenile offenders would be better served in less restrictive programs. "We all recognize that there's a level of trauma that comes with this setting," she said. "When a child can be managed in the community, they absolutely should be." Several "statement of deficiency" reports filed by state health regulators this year detailed conditions at Good Shepherd. According to the records, the alleged sexual assaults were reported to police, but staff didn't document them in the resident's record for six days, potentially delaying support and services for the victim. The three residents who showed signs of overdose required medical care in the emergency department, and one stayed there overnight for observation, records show. The records also detail several altercations between residents. In one case, a resident was thrown against the wall and hit her head in Good Shepherd's school, which didn't have video surveillance. Staff members didn't investigate the incident, according to the records. Staff members also failed to intervene when one female resident walked into a classroom that wasn't her own, threatened another teen and hit her in the head, landing the victim in the hospital, records show. In another incident, two residents made a hit list and beat two other residents, who suffered concussions. "The facility staff were unable to provide sufficient safeguards in the school to prevent the injuries," the records state. Wyman said a moratorium is "serious." "But it is an opportunity for everyone to pause and evaluate," she said. egreen@baltsun.com Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/investigations/bs-md-juvenile-girls-moratorium-20161216-story.html>

More woes for troubled Wordsworth as former staffer is charged with sexually assaulting three girls Updated: December 17, 2016 — 1:07 AM EST The exterior view of Wordsworth Academy in West Philly. by Nancy Phillips, Staff Writer Nancy Phillips Staff Writer A former staffer at Wordsworth, a residential treatment center for troubled children and teens, has been charged with sexually assaulting three girls in the program, luring them to the basement of the now-shuttered facility for sex and forcing them to take naked photographs of themselves with his iPhone. Isaac Outten, 37, repeatedly had sex with three girls, ages 15 to 17, while they were living at the West Philadelphia center last year, police said. He lured the 15-year-old into performing oral sex and having intercourse in exchange for a promise of money for diapers and milk for her 1-year-old child, they said. He promised another girl, 17, that he would help her with a criminal case in exchange for sex and naked selfies, according to police. And he led the third girl, also 17, to the basement for sex after a counselor left her alone with him, police said, and warned her not to tell anyone because that would get him into trouble. Outten, who was fired after the allegations came to light late last year, faces charges of institutional sexual assault, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, corruption of minors, endangering the welfare of children, and other crimes. He was being held at the Curran-Fromhold Correctional Facility on $200,000 bail in each of the three cases. His arrest Tuesday was the latest setback for Wordsworth, which was ordered to close in October after a 17-year-old boy died in a fight with staffers who had come to his room in search of a stolen iPod. The staffers flipped over the boy's bed and tossed the furniture around, and he grew agitated, according to a report prepared by state officials. As staffers attempted to restrain him, one held the boy's legs as another punched him repeatedly in the ribs, the report said. The boy began gasping for breath, at one point yelling, "Get off me. I can't breathe," according to the report. Then, it said, the room fell silent. No one has been charged in connection with the death, which is being investigated by Philadelphia police and the state Department of Human Services, which regulates Wordsworth. Shortly after the boy's death on Oct. 13, DHS revoked Wordsworth's license and ordered it to close, citing "gross incompetence, negligence and misconduct in operating the facility." Wordsworth officials have appealed the decision. Among the violations cited by state officials in justifying closure were the three girls' allegations that Outten had sexually assaulted them. DHS had ordered Wordsworth to appoint a security manager to ensure the safety of children who live there, strengthen staff training, and make clear that abuse would not be tolerated. In an inspection of the facility four days after the boy's death, state officials reported that Wordsworth had made "inadequate progress" in carrying out those actions. A spokesman for Wordsworth said Outten was immediately suspended when the girls reported the assaults and was fired soon after. She declined further comment, citing pending litigation. Outten's lawyer did not return a phone call seeking comment. In addition to its residential treatment facility, Wordsworth offers educational programs, mental health services, and foster care, and does case-management work for the city Department of Health and Human Services. Those programs are unaffected by the closure order. nphillips@phillynews.com 215-854-2254@PhillipsNancy Staff writer Chris Palmer contributed to this article. Source: http://www.philly.com/philly/news/20161217_More_woes_for_troubled_Wordsworth_as_former_staffer_is_charged_with_sexually_assaulting_three_girls.html

'Spiritual warfare,' 'demonic attacks.' The role religion played in home for sex-trafficking victims Jenny Williamson, photographed at Courage House in 2015. The Sacramento-area home for teen sex-trafficking victims closed in June. Williamson has vowed to reopen and is raising funds. Lezlie Sterling Sacramento Bee file i Jenny Williamson, photographed at Courage House in 2015. The Sacramento-area home for teen sex-trafficking victims closed in June. Williamson has vowed to reopen and is raising funds. Lezlie Sterling Sacramento Bee file By Marjie Lundstrom and Sam Stanton mlundstrom@sacbee.com Twitter Facebook Email Share Two weeks before the voluntary shutdown this year of Courage House, a licensed group home for young sex-trafficking victims near Sacramento, a ritual was performed on a teenage girl. According to findings in a state investigation, the girl's forehead was anointed with oil, a religious verse was recited and the teen was told she would have to be a Christian, or at least denounce Satan, to continue living in the home. Crosses then were handed out to the other girls to wear. Courage House founder Jenny Williamson later would explain that the girl had multiple personalities and posed a danger to herself and others. "She worshipped Satan, and she practiced animal and human sacrifice," she told The Sacramento Bee in August. Williamson told regulators in a June 18 memo responding to the state's unannounced visit that the girl had been the victim of satanic ritualistic abuse and told staff she had "participated in human sacrifice when she was an alter personality." Williamson said the girl terrified staff by announcing that "this week was a blood sacrifice week." The California Department of Social Services did not accept the group home's explanation and issued Courage House a "Type A" citation, the most severe penalty for violations considered serious enough to have an immediate impact on clients' health, safety or personal rights. In its investigation, the state found that the girl had an interest in satanism but did not threaten to perform sacrifices and, instead, had "made a general statement that she enjoyed drawing some of the images" of satanic practice, a state licensing official wrote. Courage House appealed the citation twice, losing again in November, arguing in its appeals documents that the state's investigation was "grossly inadequate" and that "the resident was adamant that she wanted to pray to become a Christian." In addition, her condition left her with frequent amnesia, preventing her from being able to recount "full events," two Courage House officials wrote Oct. 6 in their second appeal to the state. "There was never any pressure given, or ultimatums discussed with her," wrote former program director Melissa Herrmann and clinical director Angela Chanter, who participated in the episode. "She was told she could not perform human and animal sacrifices, or drink the blood of any person there, but she was never told she could not worship Satan nor was she told she had to become a Christian." The clash underscores the tension that can arise between faith-based service providers and government officials – each held accountable for the health and safety of vulnerable clients. Over the last decade, child sex trafficking has become a hot-button topic, spawning new programs and multiple new funding streams. Christian organizations in particular have rallied to the cause, organizing conferences, engaging communities and embarking on worldwide missionary work. Some Christian-based groups, such as Courage House and its nonprofit parent organization, Courage Worldwide Inc. of Rocklin, have gone a step further, establishing their own facilities to house and treat young victims. As the new year approaches, the once-vaunted program is struggling to reopen its Northern California facility for six girls, ages 11 to 17, while undergoing scrutiny from the state – including accusations it has violated children's right to religious freedom. Because Courage Worldwide accepts government money – $9,100 a month per child at the time the group's Sacramento-area home closed in June – the program must stay within regulatory boundaries and not favor one religion over another, or press children to participate. If it is able to reopen, it would be eligible for about $12,000 a month per girl under a new state system in effect next year. Courage Worldwide officials maintain they have found the appropriate balance. "State funds do not mean you cannot be a Christian home – state funds and license mean you cannot force a child to practice any religious ritual, and Courage House does not," said Gil Stieglitz, a board member for Courage Worldwide Inc. and pastor at Bayside Church in Roseville, in an emailed response. From the time Courage Worldwide opened its Sacramento-area group home in 2011 on 52 acres north of the city, the organization has been steeped in Christian beliefs and practices, according to a Bee examination of state licensing records, dozens of internal Courage Worldwide emails and interviews with 17 former employees, business associates and a former client. The group opened a second Courage House around that same time in the east African country of Tanzania that it says now has 12 beds. Over and over, Williamson has publicly recited the story of how God spoke to her in church and directed her to build a home for her "daughters." The organization's major benefactors – and recruiting grounds for volunteers and donations – have included Christian churches in the Sacramento region and other states. Email exchanges in 2012 among corporate executives, obtained from a source, show spirited and sometimes frenetic discussions about "demonic attacks" on the girls and the "spiritual warfare" necessary to counter the threat. "October is a hideous month where the evil one is worshipped daily by his followers and those on our team (and some of our girls in Africa and Nor Cal) that have come out of SRA or witchcraft (satanic ritual abuse) are experience (sic) relentless demonic attacks," employee Stephanie Midthun wrote in an October 2012 email to staff. Midthun and her husband, Joel, are key figures in the Courage Worldwide organization. Joel, the pastor of Elk Grove's Living Water Church, is on the board of directors. Stephanie has served in various roles since 2008, including creative director, chaplain, spiritual adviser and community relations director. A July 2011 email Williamson sent to her staff and supporters warned: "We are at war! We are under great attack and need your prayers ... If you have a personal relationship with the girls – any time this week – morning, noon, afternoon evening please go out to Courage House to pray and prophecy over them, please, please do so!" In a March 2012 email, Herrmann, the former program director, discussed the possibility of taking a young client being discharged from a hospital directly to a hotel room in Elk Grove "while she goes through a more intense deliverance and prayer process before transitioning her back" to Courage House. For years, Williamson has touted an ambitious expansion plan for Courage House Northern California that includes as its centerpiece a shimmering chapel with a large cross, according to architectural renderings. The architect's plan, which also envisions 10 new cottages for 60 girls, describes the chapel "as the most important building on the campus." Despite aggressive fundraising around those plans – and a $300,000-plus kick start in 2011 from Bayside Church – the organization has yet to break ground. She was told she could not perform human and animal sacrifices, or drink the blood of any person there, but she was never told she could not worship Satan nor was she told she had to become a Christian. Courage House officials, in response to state citation Williamson and other Courage Worldwide officials vehemently deny there is any pressure to practice Christianity at Courage House, and said that girls are free to attend services of their choice as staffing levels permit. "We are in full agreement with the state to provide access to religious services when the girls request it, if provided sufficient notice in advance so that we can properly staff for such requests," Courage Worldwide officials said in an emailed statement to The Bee. The state licensing file includes a sample of a "Courage House religious participation form," which allows girls to check a box indicating their preferences. Choices range from no participation to weekly church services to worship nights and other spiritual events. Even so, the state leveled a Type B citation against Courage House in December 2015, finding that the girls were required to attend the Midthuns' church – a concern shared by some staff members. DeAnne Brining, a former therapist at the home, said the girls felt awkward and conspicuous at the church because the congregation knew who they were. "The girls did not want to be known as Courage girls," she said. "Everybody at that church knew they were trafficked." Courage Worldwide officials disputed the state's findings, telling The Bee the Elk Grove church was the girls' "consensus choice." The citation was the first of two issued to Courage House by the department's Community Care Licensing Division for violating children's religious freedom. That in itself is unusual: Citations regarding religious freedom are so rare in California group homes that only nine other group homes out of 1,500 statewide – regardless of size – have been written up for this violation in the last five years, according to an analysis of statewide data, which includes facilities that operated during this period but are now closed. Courage Worldwide's conflicts with the state have extended beyond matters of religious freedom. In the last five years, Courage House has been cited 36 times for regulatory violations, according to the data released to The Bee in early December. That's more than three times the average for citations at the 300 facilities statewide of similar size and classification level. Only 14 facilities in California of similar size and classification logged more citations during that period. Courage Worldwide officials, in their emailed response, noted that while some deficiencies have been about policy, others involved "paperwork issues." "No deficiency has been over an issue that the state viewed as serious enough to shut our facility, as it has at other facilities," the email stated. "Battle worship" and witchcraft A former life coach and motivational speaker, Williamson founded her nonprofit a decade ago, originally under the name Courage To Be You Inc. The organization started with a social mission of empowering people to "fulfill their God-given purpose," then refocused in 2008 to sex trafficking, eventually changing its name to Courage Worldwide to reflect its global aspirations. In recent years, the organization has gained favor in Sacramento's philanthropic community, collecting millions in donations while promoting the grandiose vision of expansion. This year, though, the organization's fundraising practices uncorked a controversy when Williamson and her board quietly decided to close the Northern California facility, a move they say is temporary. The four remaining girls were given seven-day notices and the home closed June 13, with most of the staff laid off over the summer. The organization told regulators in June it needed a temporary "pause" to prepare for next year's overhaul in how the state handles placements of troubled youths, which aims to phase out long-term group homes in favor of more family-based care. However, Courage Worldwide made no public announcement about its pause and continued to actively solicit money. The Bee's investigation into Courage House and its closure prompted several major donors to withdraw or curtail their pledges. From the start, the organization has been open about the role Christianity plays in its mission, and its reliance on fundraising from churches. The Courage Worldwide website now includes a blog post entitled, "Churches are Rising Up to Stand with Courage Worldwide" that lists 25 pastors supporting the group. Documents and emails obtained by The Bee illustrate how staff operations at times have been intertwined with religious pursuits. The Midthuns often were at the center, along with former program director Herrmann, urging prayer sessions and "battle worship nights" to defeat evil. "We are calling for a corporate fast for Courage Worldwide for the following tuesdays in October (October 9, 16, 23 and 30th) as well as a special 'Battle Worship Night' October 31, Halloween night (location TBA)," Midthun wrote to staffers, board members and supporters in October 2012. Midthun warned of a "strategic attack against our reputation" and the finances of the organization, as well as the private business run by Williamson and her husband, Mike. The email does not explain the source of those perceived attacks. "We feel the only way to reverse these spiritual battles or assignment against CWW is on our knees in prayer and working as hard as we can," Midthun wrote. Stieglitz of Bayside Church conducted one such service at the group home, according to an email a week later. "Dr. Gil led the leadership of Courage Worldwide in prayer at Courage House to battle the demonic strongholds at the home in Nor Cal and we all sensed it was very much connected to all over our homes," Midthun wrote. "We came together on our knees with confession and communion, with prayers, tears and worship to battle for our home, our staff and the girls. We sensed a breakthrough in the spirit." In February 2012, Herrmann announced that Midthun and her husband, Joel, had been appointed as "Courage House Spiritual Directors" and that staffers should "pray for extra protection, strength, discernment AND that God would continue to reveal himself to all the girls at Courage House!" Courage House also offered to underwrite the cost of prayer sessions with a pastor it brought in for "individual prayer counseling sessions with staff, volunteers, families and our girls!" according to a January 2012 email from Herrmann with the subject line "Pastor Joe Appointments." "Pastor Joe normally charges $100 for individual prayer counseling sessions," Herrmann wrote to staff. "Courage to Be You is willing to cover 25% of the cost of an appointment with Pastor Joe. "Please pay the $75 to him directly ...". The fight against evil also extended to Courage Worldwide's home in Tanzania, where Courage House officials wrote in an Oct. 24, 2012, email after a trip there that the girls "are still experiencing a lot of demonic attacks." "During this trip we have found out quite a bit about some significant amount of witchcraft that was done on the property previously over a number of years (prior to Courage House). We have also been spending time praying with the girls and brought in some local experts in the area of witchcraft to help pray with them individually." A prayer for rescue Even former employees of Courage House who identified themselves as people of deep faith said they viewed the corporate culture as overbearing and some of its practices as inappropriate for the girls. Arlicia Lorentty, a former social worker at Courage House, said the organization's religious convictions initially were part of the attraction to work there, but that she later came to believe Williamson was "misusing faith" with her dramatic fundraising appearances aimed at "pulling at people's heartstrings." "As a person who is a Christian, and very much believes God has a heart for this population, I don't think this is what he meant," said Lorentty, who left in 2015. "The use of God's name for fundraising – that's the other part that really, really bothers me," she said. "... She's exploiting our faith, she's exploiting these people's generosity." Several former staff members said that the religious intensity continued as the organization grew – along with its pool of government contributions. Today, Courage Worldwide boasts on its website that its therapeutic trauma program for girls is administered by psychologist Benjamin Keyes of Regent University, a private school in Virginia founded by conservative Christian minister and broadcaster Pat Robertson. Courage Worldwide explains that the program is a "Christian therapeutic model" known as Healing Emotional Affective Responses to Trauma (H.E.A.R.T.). Lauren Conklin, who worked at Courage House for four years, said she was uncomfortable with some of her bosses' expectations. At one staff meeting last year, she said, Williamson wanted to wash her employees' feet, symbolic of Jesus' gesture to his disciples. "I said 'no,'" she said. Linda Fiore, the group home administrator at the time the home closed, said she was not at work when the ritual with the oil and crosses occurred. But she said she attended a staff meeting later at which Courage House officials recounted the event and described their success at driving out evil forces. "I was just shocked," said Fiore, who went out on medical leave in June and later was laid off. "It was very uncomfortable just being there." As a person who is a Christian, and very much believes God has a heart for this population, I don't think this is what he meant ... She's exploiting our faith, she's exploiting these people's generosity. Arlicia Lorentty, a former social worker at Courage House Faith-based groups in California and elsewhere are continuing to forge relationships with government to help sex-trafficking victims. Many say they are well aware of the boundaries. Last year, officials announced that the Alameda County District Attorney's Office was teaming up with Catholic Charities of the East Bay to create a safe home in the Bay Area for girls recovering from sex trafficking. Mary Kuhn, Catholic Charities communication director, said the home is "on path" to open in 2017 and will seek to become licensed by the state. "It will be our obligation to meet those requirements," she said. "We do not discriminate. Our services are not about proselytizing," she said. "Our services are about meeting the needs of people." Mandy Porter, who coordinates a faith-based alliance to help trafficking victims, said Christian groups and volunteers must be extremely careful not to thrust their faith upon this population, or be perceived as trying to control or manipulate them. "The idea of choice is so important when treating a trafficking victim because they've had so many choices taken away," said Porter of the Faith Alliance Against Slavery and Trafficking. "... We don't want to be another form of coercion, another thing they have to do in order to belong." Courage House officials say they believe they are in good standing with the state, and that they're working to reopen in early 2017. Fundraising efforts continue. A Dec. 9 fundraising letter posted on the Courage Worldwide website and sent to supporters includes a "giving card" that asks recipients to make a choice: a one-time financial gift; a set monthly contribution; or a commitment to "praying for more children to be rescued out of sex trafficking." Marjie Lundstrom: 916-321-1055, MarjieLundstrom Read more here: <http://www.sacbee.com/news/investigations/the-public-eye/article121546637.html#storylink=cpy>

Keeping foster kids with local families may be the fix Texas needs Filed under Child Protective Services at 12 hrs ago Share Facebook Twitter Email
Written by Robert T. Garrett, Austin Bureau Connect with Robert T. Garrett On Twitter Email Get Daily Dallas News Headlines Don't miss a story. Like us on Facebook: Like Dallas News' Facebook Page Get Unlimited Digital Access Your first month is less than a dollar. $0.99 for first 4 weeks Subscribe Now
MINERAL WELLS — Texas foster care is in crisis, but there is hope for a homegrown, grassroots solution. The current system is discombobulated, with no one really in charge. Worse, it regularly rips kids from their home communities and sends them to live with strangers far away. When Texas foster children turn 18, they often emerge in sorrier shape — distrustful, emotionally scarred, behind their age cohort in school — than when they entered state care, a federal judge says. U.S. District Court Judge Janis Graham Jack of Corpus Christi, the Dallas Morning News Texan of the Year, is demanding that the state do better in response to a class-action lawsuit. Thanks to an experiment called "foster care redesign," it is. A Fort Worth nonprofit is leading the effort, and it's generating excitement in child welfare circles. However, it's not clear that the Texas Legislature will fully embrace -- and fund -- the new procurement method when it meets next year. That's in spite of appeals by many advocates. They say redesign could be a partial answer in a court battle over foster care that so far, the state is losing. Foster Care with a local approach Palo Pinto county's foster care system did not allow for children within CPS to be close to their homes. ACH Child and Fa... h The effort's mottoes are simple, if profound: Get involved. Make decisions locally. Wayne Carson, chief executive of lead vendor ACH Child and Family Services, has honed a civic pride argument. He makes it regularly to audiences at town meetings called "foster care strategy sessions" in Tarrant County and six counties to its south and west. Don't let distant protective-services officials in Austin decide the fate of your local children whom Child Protective Services has removed from dysfunctional and destructive families, Carson says. Because the state faces a severe shortage of foster beds, the children face strong odds they'll be shipped halfway across Texas and live a lonely existence, he warns. The meetings effectively are pep rallies. They are designed to touch the hearts and consciences of local residents. Some will take the momentous step of signing up to be foster parents. Others will play supportive roles as volunteers. Mike Allen, mayor of Mineral Wells, spoke at a Palo Pinto County foster care strategy session at Holiday Hills Country Club in Mineral Wells in August. Nathan Hunsinger/Staff photographer Palo Pinto County, the most rural of the pilot area's counties, had the biggest need in September 2014, when ACH took charge of placing all foster children in the seven counties. Then, Palo Pinto had only three foster homes. Meanwhile, CPS had removed and placed into foster care 89 of the county's children. "Very few of them are here," Mineral Wells Mayor Mike Allen said of local foster kids, speaking at an August strategy session in his town, the county seat. "They're in Houston, Sherman, all over." Residents are concerned and bighearted but knew nothing about their county's shortage of foster homes, he said. What's different in buying a place to stay and services for 92 percent of the state's 17,000 foster children, the state uses "open enrollment" procurement. At CPS, conservatorship caseworkers and placement specialists send email blasts to vendors about their need for a home for a child. The first one to respond often gets the kid. Experts, though, have said that kind of shotgun approach fails to match children well with caregivers. They said that's why at least 40 percent of initial placements fall apart. In redesign, one vendor agrees to be responsible for placing all the children in a geographic area. The contractor also agrees to make sure supply fits demand. ACH, the lead contractor, considers one of its key jobs to raise awareness about local needs — and provide practical ways for people to help, Carson said. Wayne Carson, ACH Child and Family Services chief executive, touted foster care redesign during a Palo Pinto County strategy session in Mineral Wells in August. Nathan Hunsinger/Staff photographer After two years of sophisticated marketing and persuasion — but chiefly aided by a kind of religious revival ignited through collaboration with a local ministerial alliance — ACH is crowing about a turnaround in Palo Pinto County. There, about 30 families have started the process of becoming licensed as foster parents. Others stepped up by pledging to provide babysitting and prayer for the new foster parents. Several empty nesters volunteered to be "court-appointed special advocates." After undergoing training, they befriend the children and appear in court on their behalf. "It's flexing your faith," said J.R. Patterson, a fabrication shop owner who with wife Sheree has been a CASA volunteer for six years. "I'm a God-fearing Jesus freak, OK?" he explained as a panelist at the August session, which drew about 60 people to a country club in Mineral Wells. After learning more about the diaspora of local foster kids, Patterson said he felt a religious conviction that he and Sheree should become foster parents. Still, he worried it's "too big, too tough" a task. Not until further recruitment meetings, which yielded other adults willing to all be trained together, did the Pattersons feel comfortable enough to sign up, he recalled. "You better get ready and own it," he told fellow townspeople at the Holiday Hills Country Club. "They're not broken kids, they're our kids." ACH has culled two of its 44 regional providers for poor performance and has improved communication with those who still take and treat kids, Carson said. The lead vendor tries to remove obstacles that frustrate current and prospective foster families, he said. Early on, it soothed complaints by working with the Department of Family and Protective Services to speed approvals of state-paid day care for foster children under the age of 5, he said. Then Carson learned that the system was losing rural adults, many of whom said they couldn't complete their required 30 hours of training if they had to drive as far as Fort Worth or Arlington. He put out a bid that lured four child-placing agencies to offer the courses in Palo Pinto and Parker counties. Early results promising Early data show good results, though there are challenges because a higher percentage of children coming into Texas foster care are considered "high needs." Across all seven counties in what the department designates as "Region 3B," more children are staying closer to their hometowns. Eighty-three percent are within 50 miles of home, compared with 71 percent before the redesign's launch. In Palo Pinto, the number of foster kids staying in the county has increased sixfold. Backpacks and school work are highly organized at Mineral Wells foster parent Angela Cook's house. (Nathan Hunsinger/Staff photographer) More children are participating in their court cases. More take part in designing their therapies. Eighty-four percent take classes intended to help them "age out" of foster care successfully, compared with 71 percent in the old system. Region 3B, though, still lacks a residential treatment center. The centers, which are numerous in metro Houston but rare in Dallas-Fort Worth, are used to house children with the most severe medical, behavioral and intellectual-development problems. When Texas leaders first kicked around redesign as a concept in early 2010, the geographic imbalance in treatment centers was a big impetus to shake things up. Asked at a town meeting in Cleburne whether and when ACH could lure a provider to start a center in the region, Carson said that if the state improves reimbursements, it could happen within a year. To keep more of the most troubled children closer to home, ACH has created a new category of specially trained "therapeutic" foster parents. Carson has 127 therapeutic foster homes in Region 3B. Two are in Palo Pinto. Elevating one local vendor to be the lead caretaker and spokesman for abused children in a region has helped improve foster children's visibility, he said. "Now, child welfare is at the table. They know who to call," he said of providers, local governments and area mental-health and criminal-justice officials. Before and during the August strategy session in Mineral Wells, Carson huddled with George Cannata, who heads CPS in all of Region 3, and Gretchen Fehrm, a former Plano CPS supervisor who now is the Region 3 redesign administrator. Soon, Carson announced they'd been making calls to child placing agencies, looking for a home for a 17-year-old girl who was a victim of human trafficking. They succeeded, he said, beaming. "In the old system, the state would've called and I would've said no, she's too risky," he said. "She probably would've slept in a conference room [at a CPS office] tonight. In the old model, decision-makers were in Austin. Now, we've got the people who make decisions in this room." Funding prospects, future rollout murky For state GOP leaders, one of the allures of redesign was that it would eradicate perverse financial incentives for providers to let kids linger for years in foster care, especially in group homes or institutions. The state also intends to pay based on good outcomes for children. But while ACH has been building IT systems that track kids more closely and connect all of its subcontractors, performance pay won't begin for a few more years, Carson said. The experiment, meanwhile, has been threatened by state underfunding from the start, most GOP leaders now agree. Former state Family and Protective Services Commissioner Anne Heiligenstein, who helped promote redesign, acknowledged recently that "it certainly costs more than the state is investing today." Amid recession-driven budget cuts in 2011, Heiligenstein said she barely fended off cuts in foster-care reimbursements in the old system. She had to sell the untried procurement method as feasible without a big new cash infusion. EditTouchShare But the placement, capacity building, data gathering and other duties that the lead vendors assume from the state have cost far more than was estimated, Carson said. For years, he's been cajoling the department and lawmakers to provide more funds. Slowly, they have. But ACH, a venerable Fort Worth institution that started in 1915 as a collaboration of Protestant church ladies eager to help the destitute, has had to spend about $5.6 million of its $50 million endowment to make the effort work, he said. Startup costs ran about $3 million more than the state estimated, Carson said. And operating costs -- about $54 million a year of state and federal funds -- are running about $1 million short of actual expenses, he said. In September, current Commissioner Henry "Hank" Whitman asked for additional money in the next two-year budget cycle for redesign in the Fort Worth region and the next area it will be tried, a 30-county swath of West Texas from Abilene to Wichita Falls. Experts have said Whitman appears to have asked for enough to make it a break-even proposition for the lead vendors. But lawmakers, who face a tight budget, still must act. Wayne Carson, chief executive of ACH Child and Family Services Nathan Hunsinger/Staff photographer "I do not have board approval to continue to subsidize the contract," Carson said, noting that ACH's deal with Texas ends Aug. 31. "This model works and ... deserves to be fully funded." Sen. Charles Schwertner, a Georgetown Republican who is the Senate's chief social services policy writer, agrees that redesign is working well in Region 3B and deserves more money. But Schwertner, who's also a key budget writer, said he's wary of the department's push to speed its use in other parts of the state. Whitman wants to take the revamped procurement to eight more regions over two years. That may be too fast, Schwertner said. He noted that in 2013, a for-profit company launched redesign in 60 West Texas counties only to pull out 13 months later, complaining of inadequate state payments and the sprawling region's "unique conditions." Some lawmakers and child advocates say that next year, the Legislature should dramatically increase spending on redesign -- both on reimbursements and a faster rollout. That might help convince the federal judge, Jack, that the state is acting in good faith to remedy shortcomings. Next month or in early February, she is expected to issue a final order in the class-action suit. Schwertner has filed a bill to exclude for-profit vendors. The number of new regions will be decided by budget writers, he said. "As good as ACH has been, do we have eight more ACHs across the state? Are they going to step up?" he said. "My concern is that we fall flat on our face." Staff writer J. David McSwane contributed to this story. Foster care redesign successes Region-wide: 0 - Number of kids who slept in a CPS office in year two (Oct. 1, 2015-Sept. 30, 2016) In county shortest on capacity, Palo Pinto County: 4 - Palo Pinto County foster children placed in home county, September 2014 25 - Palo Pinto County foster children placed in home county, October 2016 95.5 -- Percent placed out of county, September 2014 77.7 -- Percent placed out of county, October 2016 3 - Licensed foster homes in Palo Pinto County as of September 2014 27 - Licensed foster homes in Palo Pinto County as of December 2016 Statewide: 71.5 - Percent of foster children placed in a family setting Across all of Region 3B: (Erath, Hood, Johnson, Palo Pinto, Parker, Somervell and Tarrant counties) 79 - Percent of foster children placed in a family setting ACH chief Wayne Carson regularly holds town meetings, such as this one in Mineral Wells. He talks up foster care redesign and tries to touch people's hearts -- and consciences -- about the need for more foster parents. (Nathan Hunsinger/Staff photographer) Before redesign: 82 - Percent of Region 3B children who have monthly contact with aunts, uncles, grandparents and other approved visitors Redesign, year two: 93 - Percent of Region 3B children having such monthly contacts NOTE: For this measure, visits from caseworkers, therapists and members of a child's immediate family don't count. Innovations that other areas may copy: "Step down" Through a step-down process that provides additional supports, the lead redesign vendor is trying to move very troubled foster kids out of residential treatment centers and into what it calls therapeutic foster homes, which can provide a greater intensity and scope of services. 68 - Percent of the 57 youth in Region 3B treatment centers were successfully moved to family settings, as of Sept. 30 "Turning Point" To prevent family foster placements from breaking down when kids act out, lead vendor ACH Child and Family Services of Fort Worth and Texas Medicaid's behavioral health managed care provider, Cenpatco, have created a 14-day respite program. It moves the child to a group home where he or she gets intensive services. Meanwhile, the foster parents receive counseling. 108 - Number of youths served 89 - Percent who were successfully diverted from entering a psychiatric hospital 88 - Percent who returned to the same, family-style placement after respite care Challenges remain 65 - Percent of sibling groups placed together, year two 64 -- Percent of sibling groups placed together, before redesign 177 - "Therapeutic level" kids who entered foster care, year one 221 - "Therapeutic level" kids who entered foster care, year two NOTE: In redesign lingo, a "therapeutic level" child is one who in the rest of state would be "specialized" or "intensive." Those designations of very needy children trigger higher reimbursements to providers. In redesign, Texas' four gradations of foster children's neediness have been compressed to two: "standard," which encompasses "basic" and "moderate" in the rest of the state; and therapeutic. SOURCES: Texas Department of Family and Protective Services; ACH Child and Family Services Inc.; Dallas Morning News research Source: <http://www.dallasnews.com/news/child-protective-services/2016/12/23/foster-kids-local-owning-may-fix-texas-needs>

New Law Set To End Group Homes As Foster Care Option December 20, 2016 6:42 PM Filed Under: Contra Costa County, Foster Care, Group Home, New Law CONTRA COSTA COUNTY (CBS SF) — Next month, a new state law kicks in to phase out group homes for foster care. KPIX 5 spoke with a former foster child who is hopeful the law will create a more family-like atmosphere for foster kids, especially during the holidays. Contra Costa County has about 1,100 kids in the foster care system. About 100 of those live in group homes, which are essentially private businesses that house up to 6 kids at a time. Onetime foster kid Justice Woods says Christmas in a group home holds little magic. "You wake up, they give you your stuff and then, that's about it, said Woods. You go on with your day, do your chores and then sit around the house and do nothing." Justice is 19 now and on his own, but he has never really had anyone who could care for him for long. He thinks group homes do more harm than good and it seems the State of California agrees with him. In January, a new law will require the phasing out of group homes, which has counties scrambling to recruit enough new foster parents to fill the void. "We want people who really care about children, who want to help them succeed in life, who want to keep them in our community and open up their heart and home to these kids," said Kathy

Marsh, the Interim Director at Contra Costa Children and Family Services That's what Katie and Ron Cisco did. They took in Amelia and her little brother Trace, who really didn't even know each other. It wasn't easy at first. It took a while for everyone to bond. But now these four are happy. And with an adoption on Friday, they are a family. "Open your home. It's doable. It's worth it, said Katie Cisco. They matter. The kids need a chance." The county says it's not looking for perfect parents, just people with room for one more in their homes. Justice says he never really had that, but he still believes that's where the magic is at Christmas or any other time of year. "I feel like, you just come in with open arms and the foster youth, you guys will have a connection," said Woods. "Just like a son and a father or a mother and daughter, you know?" The new state law gives counties two years to end the use of group homes for foster care. Contra Costa County has already hired two full-time recruiters to find people to be foster parents. Source: <http://sanfrancisco.cbslocal.com/2016/12/20/new-law-set-to-end-group-homes-as-foster-care-option/>

In the rush to close institutions, Illinois ignored serious problems in group homes Mark Winkeler needs 24-hour care and has lived his entire adult life at Murray Developmental Center. His mother, Rita, and others sued when the Quinn administration sought to close Murray and move residents into group homes. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) By Michael J. Berens and Patricia Callahan Adults with mild disabilities were the most coveted. In April 2012, as Illinois moved to close several state institutions and relocate adults with disabilities into the community, representatives from group home businesses gathered inside the Jacksonville Developmental Center for a hastily organized auction. A state official read aloud medical histories of residents with intellectual and developmental disabilities, prompting group home officials to raise their hands for desired picks. Group home operators knew that then-Gov. Pat Quinn wanted to empty Jacksonville quickly — before any serious union or community opposition could be mounted — but some were taken aback by what they saw as a dehumanizing approach. "We were appalled by the auction," said Art Dykstra, executive director of Trinity Services, the state's largest group home provider. The problems with Quinn's rapid-deployment plan, however, went beyond mere awkwardness. Officials from the Illinois Department of Human Services promised residents that group homes offered a new beginning — one that would bring them more independence, safe and compassionate care, even a private bedroom. But those promises obscured evidence found in the state's own investigative files that revealed many group homes were underfunded, understaffed and dangerously unprepared for new arrivals with complex needs, a Chicago Tribune investigation found. In the five years preceding the auction, Human Services' inspector general substantiated more than 600 cases of abuse and neglect in group homes, an analysis of state data shows. State investigators tracked an additional 1,420 cases that uncovered evidence of harm or deficiencies but did not result in formal findings. The Tribune's "Suffering in Secret" investigation, first published in November, uncovered a system where caregivers often failed to provide basic care while regulators cloaked harm and death with secrecy and silence. Some cases of neglect found by the Tribune involved individuals who had been relocated to group homes from state institutions. Among the most startling: A man transferred from a state developmental center to a series of group homes died under suspicious circumstances in 2010 after he was forced to sleep on a soiled mattress on the floor of a cluttered room used for storage. With adequate funding and social supports, adults with disabilities fare best when mainstreamed into the community, widely accepted research studies show. Spurred by court decrees and a growing disability-rights movement, most states have closed some or all of their institutions and shifted funding to community-based residences like group homes. But in Illinois, not enough money has followed the people, the Tribune found. Group homes have gone nearly nine years without an increase in reimbursement rates for staff wages. Overall, Illinois consistently ranks among the lowest five states for financial commitment to community care, federal records show. "We've said all along the community system is grossly underfunded," said Zena Naiditch, CEO of Equip for Equality, Illinois' federally empowered disability-rights watchdog. "It's been grossly underfunded for decades." Instead of opening doors to independence, dozens of financially strapped group home businesses reduced or eliminated community activities as too expensive or time-consuming, according to investigative files from multiple state agencies. Complaints of food rationing were common. One home budgeted $1.22 per meal, limited servings to 4 ounces of protein and prohibited second helpings. Even the state's promise of a private bedroom proved illusory. Though group home operators agreed not to admit more than four residents per home, hundreds of providers have routinely bunked up to eight people with disabilities into tight quarters, an analysis of state licensing files and advocacy group reports shows. At the time of the Jacksonville closing, Human Services characterized the state's aging institutions as an antiquated and costly system with a long history of harm and inadequate care. By contrast, state officials described group homes as adequately funded and staffed. But when group home providers were surveyed in 2012 to gauge support for Quinn's plan, they complained of pervasive problems, according to records obtained by the Tribune. Several providers charged that Illinois routinely failed to fully disclose behavioral histories of state developmental center residents who represented a threat to themselves or others. Without that information, group homes can't take the steps necessary to keep all residents safe. Providers also said state funding was inadequate to cover staffing costs, diminishing the quality of care inside group homes and decreasing residents' independence. Other group homes railed against the state's inability to fund necessary levels of nursing care, with one provider writing: "Typically, an individual is funded for approximately one hour per month for nursing oversight." Instead of boosting funding overall or slowing down relocations, however, Human Services officials adopted an extraordinary tactic to obscure problems. They required group home executives accepting transfers to sign a pledge of loyalty, extracting a vow to "not do anything to inhibit, diminish, or undermine" the state's closure plans, the Tribune found. Failure to sign, Human Services officials warned, would restrict access to the Jacksonville auction and result in no referrals of developmental center residents to fill empty beds. To avoid being shut out, at least 67 businesses signed the one-page pledge, state records show. But one group refused to be silent about the state's plans: parents of individuals in institutions who worried their children would not get the care they need in a group home. And in the town of Centralia, about an hour east of St. Louis, a battle was brewing. READ THE SERIES: Part One - Illinois hides abuse and neglect of adults with disabilities Part Two - Flawed investigations ignore victims of neglect Part Three - In the rush to close institutions, Illinois glossed over serious problems in group homes Read full series and continuing coverage Rita Winkeler ties her son Mark's shoelace at Murray Developmental Center. Murray parents were apprehensive about a transition to group homes because they feared many did not offer adequate skilled nursing care. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) Parents fight back Rita Winkeler's 32-year-old son Mark has lived his entire adult life at Murray Developmental Center. His modest private room, equipped with a television and DVD player, is covered with family pictures and Chicago Cubs and St. Louis Cardinals memorabilia. Because of severe developmental and intellectual disabilities, he requires 24-hour care; he needs to be fed, diapered and bathed. Winkeler believes her son is happy and well cared for at the center. But after emptying Jacksonville and moving most of its 180 residents to group homes, the Quinn administration set its sights on Murray. This time, though, parents and guardians of the residents banded together and orchestrated public events to rally support from the community, state labor unions and lawmakers. Soon "Save Murray" signs blanketed Centralia. In a city of just 13,000 people, nearly everyone knew someone who had a connection to the center through a resident, employee or contractor. The potential closure represented a cataclysmic event for the rural community, located about 275 miles south of Chicago. Beyond the economic impact, the battle for Murray centered on choice. For many parents and guardians, Murray was a haven — a place where the staff outnumbered residents, where a registered nurse was never more than a few steps away. In early 2013, 11 parents and guardians of adult children who lived at state institutions, including Winkeler, filed a federal lawsuit to halt the state's plan. Murray's cinder-block buildings border a 120-acre grassy oval crisscrossed by walkways that lead to an outdoor shelter with picnic benches and gardens, a gymnasium and outdoor pool. Built in 1964, Murray resembles an aging community college. But inside it has the look of a nursing home. Its six residential buildings, sheltering about 40 residents each, are dominated by a central desk with hallways branching out to rooms. At the time of the lawsuit, there were 274 residents and 547 staff members, an enviable ratio made possible by a $41 million annual operating budget. Winkeler, a former third-grade teacher and head of the decades-old Murray Parents Association, said Murray families were not opposed to the group home concept. Indeed, Winkeler serves as guardian for her 58-year-old brother, who she said thrives in a group home setting. "Group homes are great for some people like my brother," she said. "But the state wants to fit everyone into the same-size shoe." Rita Winkeler talks about her son, Mark, who lives at Murray Developmental Center, an institution downstate. Mark, 32, has profound developmental disabilities and has lived at the center for his entire adult life. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) Following the lawsuit, the battle lines hardened. Murray supporters alleged the state had used deceitful tactics to steer vulnerable adults into substandard group homes as a way to save money. In 2012, state officials calculated the annual cost of care for an institutionalized resident was about $219,000, compared with $84,000 at a group home. The Arc of Illinois, a nonprofit advocacy group, emerged as a chief proponent for closure, referring to parents as misguided, describing residents as "incarcerated" and exhorting the public in a web blog: "Free our people!" "There's no doubt that the state institutional model is a relic that should have been closed down in Illinois and other states long ago," Tony Paulauski, the group's director, told the Tribune. As part of the court case, Human Services officials said most of the guardians of Jacksonville residents who responded to a state-funded survey were satisfied with the new homes. But Murray parents noted that nearly two-thirds of the guardians didn't answer the survey, which was conducted by the University of Illinois at Chicago. Meanwhile, Human Services tracking records from April 2012 through March 2013 show a total of 84 admissions to hospitals or emergency rooms, 18 psychiatric admissions and 29 police encounters involving transferred Jacksonville residents. All sides understood that the outcome of the court case could dictate the near-term future for how Illinois cared for people with severe disabilities. For the last decade, prodded by a U.S. Supreme Court decision and federal consent decrees, Illinois has worked to transfer hundreds of people with disabilities who had been inappropriately institutionalized. Many of Illinois' now-closed institutions had a long history of horrific conditions. At Murray, a staff member was accused last year of forcing a resident to take a shower as a punishment. The resident, who was deaf and blind, choked in the shower and later died at the hospital. But Murray families argued that residents with severe disabilities who moved into group homes were unlikely to receive the 24-hour assistance they needed. Instead of funding that help, the state has used a cumbersome approval process to authorize extra staffing, typically for a limited number of hours each day. Group home owners said they were forced to guess in advance when the resident might be in the most need of care and oversight. Families who toured prospective group homes said they observed thinly staffed shifts of inexperienced caregivers who acknowledged that they didn't know how to deal with aggressive behaviors or a medical crisis except to call 911, according to court records. Murray parents also expressed fears that many group homes did not offer adequate skilled nursing care — fears that were warranted, a Tribune analysis of state investigative records shows. At one group home business — United Cerebral Palsy Land of Lincoln — the Human Services inspector general cited four nurses for neglect involving three unrelated deaths between 2012 and 2015. Records from one of those cases reveal that two nurses were responsible for 52 residents from Springfield to Bloomington. Since the deaths, CEO Brenda Yarnell said the group home business has hired a director of nursing to oversee two nurses to improve supervision of resident care. Salaries of two nurses are paid through private fundraising efforts, she said, because Human Services won't pay for additional nursing care. Echoing written complaints to Human Services by many providers over the years, Yarnell said state reimbursement rates for nursing are inadequate, often covering costs of just one nurse. "It's been really hard," she said. "The expectation is impossible." New home a bad fit D Despite the pending lawsuit and known problems in the group home industry, Human Services officials in mid-2013 began to move out Murray residents whose state guardians did not oppose the closure. A longtime Murray resident named Carl was among the first to be relocated, but he didn't go far. His new private group home, a 1,300-square-foot ranch house, was across a county road from Murray. In his wheelchair, he could stare out the window at his old life. A Murray resident named Carl was moved across the street to this group home. Murray caregivers complained to officials that Carl's challenges made a group home the wrong fit. He was moved back after multiple hospitalizations. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) Murray caregivers complained to their supervisors and to the governor's office that Carl's severe medical, intellectual and physical challenges did not make him a good candidate for a group home where he would be limited in movement and have less contact with other people, according to court records. Carl has poor vision and must use a wheelchair, though he can walk a few steps with a walker or staff assistance. He understands the concept of yes or no and has a small vocabulary — he can say "cookie" or "food," for instance — but he wears diapers and requires help for the most basic activities, such as bathing, dressing or using the restroom. At his new group home, run by Support Systems & Services, his wheelchair barely fit down the narrow hallway, according to witness accounts in court and state records. A Murray staffer who visited him described Carl as being "like a giant in a dollhouse." According to a written report by a court-appointed guardian, Carl suffered his first seizure in three years after his anti-convulsant medication ran out and he received none for three days. In addition to complaining about the home's size, Murray staffer Lorre Winter wrote a series of emails in July 2013 to Richard Starr, then director of Murray, stating that she was "seeing problems that weren't being addressed." "There is more involved than just placing them in a house and feeding them," she wrote in the emails, which surfaced in the lawsuit against the state. Starr wrote that Winter should "stick to objective concerns rather than subjective." Winter, who had worked with Carl when he was at Murray, responded: "Someone has to speak up for these people and if that is what I have to do then I will and deal with the consequences later." The Tribune verified Carl's identity and the home's location through government records and state emails. After months of discussions, the Illinois Office of State Guardian confirmed that Carl was a state ward. The Tribune is not using Carl's full name, as he is not capable of giving consent. David Jaques, chief executive of Support Systems & Services, told the Tribune that Carl thrived at the home and improved his mobility after a physical therapist trained the home's staff to help him. Jaques attributed the initial lack of anti-convulsant medication for Carl to a billing problem at the pharmacy related to the transition from Murray. While Carl was living in the group home, a federal district judge ruled in July 2014 that guardians of Murray residents could not stop the state from closing the facility. A three-judge appellate court panel later affirmed that decision and called Illinois a "laggard outlier" in the national movement to transition residents from institutions into the community. But the Murray parents found an unexpected supporter in Republican gubernatorial nominee Bruce Rauner, who won the November 2014 election and kept his vow not to close Murray. The parents had held off the state, at least temporarily. Jerry Stermer, who served as a senior adviser to Quinn, defended the former governor's handling of the closure process. The Jacksonville auction, Stermer said, was designed to match residents with group home providers who could meet their needs. Following complaints from businesses, state officials relied on a silent auction process in which group home officials marked preferred resident selections on paper, he said. Quinn's goal, Stermer said, was to shift money from supporting a few hundred people in an expensive state facility to helping a far greater number of individuals receive community-based care. The Rauner administration has stated there will be no institutional closures this fiscal year, which ends in June. About 1,650 residents remain in seven developmental centers, and the Arc of Illinois continues to lobby vigorously for closing at least six of them. In 2012, Quinn targeted four developmental centers for closure but succeeded only with Jacksonville. State records show that Carl was returned to Murray earlier this year, after multiple hospitalizations and new medical complications that caused severe weight loss. Winter now helps provide Carl's care. For now, the state acknowledged, the institution is where Carl needs to be. The Misericordia question H undreds of miles away on the campus of Misericordia Heart of Mercy, the most formidable opponent of the big-is-bad philosophy is gently rallying 200 women at a fundraising luncheon to take on what she calls "the injustice of the system of service for people with disabilities." For nearly half a century, Sister Rosemary Connelly, the Roman Catholic nun who leads Misericordia, has defied convention as she built a community for 600 people with developmental disabilities on the site of an abandoned orphanage in Chicago's West Rogers Park neighborhood. "The bureaucrats have held since the '70s that anything that is big is bad," Connelly tells the crowd at the Christmas luncheon. "They hate Misericordia because of the fact that we're big and we're not bad. We're good. And we're good because so many people believe in us enough to get involved." If Murray resembles an aging community college, then Misericordia's 31 acres look more like an elite liberal arts campus, the antithesis of institutions that confine rather than care for people with intellectual disabilities. Misericordia Heart of Mercy in Chicago serves 600 people with developmental disabilities. Its continuum of care, the size of its staff and the varied programming attract 300 families to Misericordia's waiting list. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) Though the front-porch appeal of the buildings impresses visitors, it's the continuum of care, the size of the staff (about 1,000) and the varied programming (commercial bakery, greenhouse, restaurant, art studio, aquatic center) that attracts 300 families to Misericordia's waiting list. Executives of some group homes pride themselves on taking in residents whom others won't — people with severe behavioral issues and mental illness. Misericordia doesn't do that because, Connelly says, her organization couldn't meet their needs. On-campus housing options range from a village of homes for more independent residents to a skilled-nursing facility for medically fragile children and adults. As medical advances have extended the lives of people with disabilities, Misericordia this year tapped private donations to open four 15-unit homes to cater to the needs of aging residents and those with dementia. But to advocates who push for closing state institutions, any large facility that segregates residents from people without disabilities is a barrier to the ideal of community living and represents an outdated approach. Paulauski, of The Arc, has been engaged in a philosophical tussle with Connelly for four decades as both pursue their vision of working with people with developmental disabilities. "People with disabilities must be able to live in the community, work in the community, and participate in all aspects of community life together with their peers without disabilities," he wrote to supporters in an "action alert" last spring when a bill granting Misericordia special licensing status came up in Springfield. Sister Rosemary Connelly, executive director of Misericordia, works in her office. The Roman Catholic Sister of Mercy for decades has tussled with activists who say all big settings are bad. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) Connelly sees Misericordia as a vibrant community. She doesn't oppose group homes; Misericordia operates 10 of them in Chicago and Lincolnwood. Yet she calls them "isolated houses in the community" and says the 65 residents who live there, most of whom have off-campus jobs, have richer lives because they can come back to campus for activities. After-work social gatherings at Misericordia include clubs geared toward various sports, music, science, technology, sewing, theater and dance. Her view: Big can be bad. Small can be bad, too. Both can be good. The danger comes when policymakers who control the funding insist that one size fits all. "I don't think we're the only way," Connelly said. "All I say is we're a legitimate way." The divide over institutional care threatens the government support of Misericordia and more than 200 of Illinois' other private intermediate-care facilities — settings that serve nine or more people with disabilities under one roof. Statewide, these private facilities care for twice the number of people that state developmental centers do and at a fraction of the cost. Misericordia, for instance, receives about $65,000 annually for each of the 360 residents in its 21 intermediate-care facilities. In his first year in office, Rauner proposed a 12 percent cut to the funding for this type of care, a reduction forestalled only by the state's inability to pass a budget. More broadly, federal and state officials are wrestling with which settings are too "isolated" to merit funding. For example, federal and state regulators have put Misericordia's developmental training program under "heightened scrutiny" because when group home residents bake brownies, package ground coffee or fold clean laundry, they are doing so on Misericordia's campus, the type of setting that the federal government presumes has the "the qualities of an institution." To retain funding for this programming, Connelly and her staff have to prove that the people holding these jobs also have meaningful lives in the larger community. As part of its programming, Misericordia runs the Hearts & Flour Bakery, which helps some residents develop job skills. (John J. Kim / Chicago Tribune) For policymakers, the challenge is that for too long bigger settings were the only option. Stanley Ligas, a man with Down syndrome, could read and balance his checkbook and held a job at a Popeyes chicken restaurant, but the state repeatedly turned him down when he asked to move from a 96-bed intermediate care facility in Woodstock to a smaller home. A federal lawsuit filed on behalf of Ligas and thousands of other people with disabilities led in 2011 to the Ligas consent decree, which requires Illinois to fund community living options for people who want to leave intermediate care facilities and those who are living at home but seek community services or placement. Connelly knows what can happen if government loses faith in a model of care. Misericordia's campus sits on the grounds of the former Angel Guardian Orphanage, which closed in the 1970s when it lost government funding as the state shifted from orphanages to foster homes. Misericordia can provide the care it does because Connelly, her staff and thousands of volunteers raise more than $20 million in private money each year to supplement the government support. But Connelly turned 85 this year. A goal of the Christmas luncheon was not just to raise money but also to build a next generation to take on the big-is-bad activists when she's gone. Connelly wrote to supporters this year that the state can learn a lesson from the shuttered orphanage. "When I see the middle-aged homeless people on the streets of Chicago," she wrote, "I wonder how many are the so-called 'success stories' of the '70s when the government allowed institutions to close without providing adequate support for all involved."

mberens@chicagotribune.com pcallahan@chicagotribune.com Twitter @MJBerens1 Twitter @TribuneTrish Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/watchdog/grouphomes/ct-group-home-investigations-cila-met-20161229-htlstory.html>

When foster care puts kids in peril When foster care puts kids in peril BY Tina Lee NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Saturday, December 31, 2016, 5:00 AM facebook Tweet email BY Tina Lee NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Saturday, December 31, 2016, 5:00 AM Child welfare has been down this road before. A high-profile tragedy involving a death of a child "known to the system" — this time, Zymere Perkins — is followed by an apparent spike in the number of children taken from their homes by the Administration for Children's Services. Caseworkers, their supervisors and other officials, who genuinely care about keeping children safe, realize they are not likely to be held accountable for any harm that comes to children as a result of being placed in foster care. But they may be on the front page, or lose their jobs, if a tragedy occurs after they had the opportunity to remove a child. The fear created by the predictable rush of politicians to attack ACS actually creates less safety for children. This situation is familiar to me. In 2006, I began a long-term, in-depth study of New York City's child welfare system. I spent months watching family court hearings, shadowing caseworkers, talking to families and closely following 250 cases. ACS worker faces ax for missing chances to save Zymere Perkins Just a few months earlier, the child welfare system had been shaken by the death of Nixzmary Brown. Because of the outcry that followed, the share of child maltreatment reports ACS flagged as "indicated" increased, and the rate of foster care placements increased by 53%. Caseworkers described increased workloads, an inability to give all cases the attention they deserved and a prevailing "remove and ask questions later" mentality. In a large majority of the cases, it seemed that removals could have been avoided and that families and children suffered — their lives made worse, not better, by the presence of ACS in their lives. Most child welfare cases involve neglect, with allegations closely related to poverty and a lack of social services to deal with issues such as domestic violence and drug use. Rather than providing services that would have made children safer, parents were punished with child removals. Children suffered. I frequently heard attorneys discuss how children's school performance declined, the mental health and behavioral problems that arose, and how some children had their first expulsion or juvenile justice case. 2016's trail of shock and blood: Trump, terror dominated year During months of observing family courts, it was striking how little evidence was presented about the harms children faced relating to the allegations in their case and how much time children's attorneys discussed the harms children suffered in foster care. Often it was clear that agencies were doing a far worse job of meeting the same needs that parents were accused of neglecting. Nixzmary's death set off a frenzy (Chet Gordon) In one case, workers removed a child, aged 10, because they decided her mother wasn't treating her mental health issues. The child was hospitalized upon removal and caseworkers, 10 days later, still were unable to tell the judge what illness led to the hospitalization. They had not visited her even once to check on her treatment. In another, a single mother who had herself come of age in foster care struggled to raise her children through low-wage jobs. She was accused of using excessive corporal punishment with her middle school-aged son and of recreational marijuana use. She admitted to both and explained she slapped her son after he had been acting out and not taking school seriously enough. The caseworker wanted her to enroll in services. The mother said she never was told to do that. Two weeks later, her children were removed. De Blasio denies deceit in spurious child-services announcement Caseworkers later decided there was little risk after all and decided to send the children back home. (By then, the boy was stealing and failing in school.) But they weren't — because the private foster care agency handling the case determined that her apartment was unsafe. Rather than making the needed repairs, the landlord threatened to evict the mother. This pattern of lives made less secure, not more, is common. Studies that compare children placed in foster care with children who have suffered comparable maltreatment but stayed with their families find that children in foster care fare worse on measures of mental health, education, juvenile delinquency, teen pregnancy, and unemployment. Yes, Zymere Perkins' death was a terrible tragedy. However, flooding the system with more removals, giving caseworkers less time to make thorough assessments and placing more children in foster care unnecessarily will create more harms, not fewer. This time, we should take the road less traveled. Lee is the author of "Catching a Case: Inequality and Fear in New York City's Child Welfare System" and a professor of Anthropology at the University of Wisconsin-Stout. Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/opinion/foster-care-puts-kids-peril-article-1.2929089>

Study shows foster care may be bad for children's health January 2, 2017 186 Children who have been in the U.S. foster care system are at a significantly higher risk of mental and physical health problems than children who haven't been in foster care, according to a University of California, Irvine sociologist. The problems range from learning disabilities, developmental delays and depression to behavioral issues, asthma and obesity. "No previous research has considered how the mental and physical well-being of children who have spent time in foster care compares to that of children in the general population," said study co-author Kristin Turney, UC Irvine associate professor of sociology. "This work makes an important contribution to the research community by showing for the first time that foster care children are in considerably worse health than other children. Our findings also present serious implications for pediatricians by suggesting that foster care placement is a risk factor for health problems in childhood." Published in Pediatrics, the large-scale study is the first to offer health comparisons based on a nationally representative sample of U.S. children. Turney and co-author Christopher Wildeman, associate professor of policy analysis and management at Cornell University, analyzed data from the 2011-2012 National Survey of Children's Health. Of the more than 900,000 kids included in the survey, 1.3 percent were identified as having been in foster care. They were compared to children who hadn't spent time in foster care, those who had been adopted from foster care and those living in a variety of family arrangements, including single-mother and economically disadvantaged households. Using logistic regression models, researchers found that kids who'd been in foster care were: • Seven times as likely to experience depression • Six times as likely to exhibit behavioral problems • Five times as likely to feel anxiety • Three times as likely to have attention deficit disorder, hearing impairments and vision issues • Twice as likely to suffer from learning disabilities, developmental delays, asthma, obesity and speech problems "This is typically a difficult-to-reach population, so having access to descriptive statistics on their living arrangements, physical well-being and behavior provided an excellent opportunity to help identify the health challenges they face," Turney said. "This study expands our understanding of the mental and physical health of these highly vulnerable children, but we must take a closer look if we are to understand how foster care really affects child well-being." Source: <https://knowridge.com/2017/01/study-shows-foster-care-may-be-bad-for-childrens-health/>

Unregulated recovery homes criticized over living conditions | Pittsburgh Post-Gazette Unregulated recovery homes criticized over living conditions January 3, 2017 12:00 AM Group homes for recovering drug addicts could fall under tougher scrutiny statewide this year, targeted for what critics call inconsistent living conditions that can hobble the recovery process. By Adam Smeltz and Molly Born / Pittsburgh Post-Gazette Three-quarter-way houses are meant to be a bridge to independent living for addicts, but critics calling for tougher state oversight say some are so crowded, unsupervised and unstable that they can hobble the recovery process. Neither state nor Allegheny County officials have complete tallies of recovery homes, also known as three-quarter-way or sober-living homes. But market observers believe the housing has proliferated over the last several years amid the opioid epidemic, bringing in short-term tenants after they leave drug court, licensed halfway houses or other care. There are almost no regulations for these homes other than zoning limitations on how many unrelated people can occupy a residence. Some have house managers, mandatory drug testing and other requirements, while others leave tenants to their own devices.

Among hundreds of recovery homes thought to operate in Pennsylvania, a number offer virtually no support to their residents, according to addiction experts and neighborhood watchdogs. Pittsburgh City Council has urged state lawmakers to regulate the residences. Councilwoman Natalia Rudiak said the group homes have been a problem in her district, which includes Carrick, Brookline and Beechview. "They are simply warehousing those who are struggling with addiction and trying to remain sober," Ms. Rudiak said of troubled recovery homes with few amenities. She said tenants arriving there from more structured halfway houses are "basically entering a free-for-all" by comparison. William Davison, 28, of Allentown lived in a recovery home in Ms. Rudiak's district about three years ago. He said that five recovering addicts shared a single bathroom in the Brookline home, where a house manager left to watch over another home, he said. [A property operator identified by Mr. Davison reported no immediate recollection of his having been a tenant.] "Some people started using [drugs] in the house here and there," said Mr. Davison, a recovering heroin addict. He said he "lasted about four months — and then I started using again." His friend Gus DiRenna, 57, who works with addicts, said some operators may fit more than a dozen people into a three- or four-bedroom home. Monthly prices typically run about $450 apiece, at times delivering fat profits for those property owners who skimp on tenant services, Mr. DiRenna said. The time when recovering addicts leave the structure of inpatient centers or halfway houses is often a make-or-break period, he said. A poorly managed three-quarter-way home can undermine months of progress. "At that point, I think, is where you make the difference to keep these kids alive. That's where we're losing them," said Mr. DiRenna, of Whitehall. "We're not losing them in the treatment centers. We're not losing them in the detoxes. It's right afterwards, when they get out of those places and it's time to start over." Allegheny County recorded at least 300 drug overdose deaths through November, according to OverdoseFreePA.org. Mr. DiRenna advocated eliminating the profit motive for operators of recovery homes. A state certification program, he said, could set minimum standards for many facilities, along with a mechanism to gauge — and perhaps reward — their successes. To that end, two recent state bills would establish baseline requirements for recovery homes that receive federal or state support. State Rep. Tina Davis, a Bucks County Democrat, said she will reintroduce her legislation this year. Among its provisions, the measure would require background checks for the affected recovery home owners, sobriety for their house managers and a rule book for their operations. "I live with it every day," said Ms. Davis, who reported frequent complaints about the facilities. Another effort could produce regulations from the state Department of Drug and Alcohol Programs, or DDAP, by early 2017, said Carol Gifford, a spokeswoman for the agency. It's weighing safety recommendations that a task force issued in July. The suggestions include drug and alcohol testing for owners, employees and operators of recovery homes. Those workers also should not involve themselves romantically with residents, should not pay commissions to encourage referrals from health care providers and should not provide therapeutic interventions unless they're licensed to do so, according to the recommendations. Additionally, the task force suggested that major appliances and utilities be in good condition and that any crimes, deaths or overdoses be reported to the state. The standards would apply only to those recovery homes certified to receive state money or referrals from state-licensed treatment programs. At the nonprofit Recovery United Pittsburgh, president John Miller said such regulations are necessary. While his group recovery homes follow internal rules such as curfews and drug tests, he said, other outfits have essentially no structure. He expects state regulations could put many out of business. But the facilities are not a cure-all, Mr. Miller said. "It's up to the person who's trying to get their life together to fix themselves," he said. "It'd be great if they came in, and I waved a wand and said, 'You're done; you're cured.' Unfortunately, that's not what happens." A relative handful of recovery homes in Pennsylvania already face review. State drug officials estimate that more than 50 are contracted at the county level. Inspections are mandatory for those that receive state money, according to the DDAP. Allegheny County contracts with two recovery housing providers, each monitored every year. And the Philadelphia-based Pennsylvania Association of Recovery Residences has certified around 150 homes through its own process, largely in eastern Pennsylvania. Taken together, the dwellings represent a fraction of the 800 to 1,000 recovery homes estimated statewide by Fred Way, the association's executive director. He figured around 1 in 12 of the home operators is a bad actor. Most are helping people, said Mr. Way, who served on the DDAP task force. "It's about being holistic with their recovery and making them better men and women," he said. He supports making independent bodies, such as his association, responsible for issuing state-recognized certifications. Back in Western Pennsylvania, recovery-home owner Leo Hutchison is working to form a regional chapter of the state recovery residence association. He got into the business after seeing unscrupulous practices elsewhere in the field, he said. His residents in Beechview and Carrick must show progress in a 12-step recovery program, among other expectations. Though he follows other guidelines, such as stocking fire extinguishers and allowing a specific number of beds per square foot, he's heard of other facilities that are more lax. "I don't know if they're going to want to stay in this business," Mr. Hutchison said, "with less of a profit margin." Source: <http://www.post-gazette.com/local/city/2017/01/03/Unregulated-recovery-homes-tweaked-for-living-conditions/stories/201701030016> caused by retinal deterioration, which typically manifests as adults age. Specialists said repeated head trauma could have damaged Jessy's eye tissue, preventing it from developing correctly. Vision specialists told the Dussetschlegers there was no way to estimate when he would lose his sight completely. When he was in second grade, Jessy's blindness had worsened to the point where he could no longer see his teacher. The Dussetschlegers said his psychiatrist recommended Jessy get off psychotropic medications, including Thorazine, an anti-psychotic whose side effects include vision problems. "We took him off, and it was amazing how much easier his behavior was, because he didn't have all of those side effects," said Melody. Jessy's medications had caused drooling, insomnia and severe mood swings. "We called them 'the afternoon nasties,'" she said. Tyrone Obaseki understands the emotional side effects of psychotropic medication from his 18 years in the foster care system. "I was living an environment where you are constantly being told that you are retarded," said Obaseki, now a Houston-based therapist and advocate. "That begins to affect the self-esteem of the young person like it did with me, especially in adolescence." Obaseki was on and off psychotropic medication and was admitted to psychiatric hospitals during his time in the system. He believes he was misdiagnosed and pleaded with his foster parents to take him off all medication. After leaving the system, he went on to earn a master's degree in counseling from Prairie View A&M University. "I believe that I am a normal, functioning adult who was dealt a bad hand and is trying to make the best of it," he said. "The solution was not drugs, it was love and support." After decades of working with the state, the Dussetschlegers haven't fostered children since 2010. They said it became too difficult to work with DFPS and its prescriptions for how they should care for children. "It wasn't our home anymore," Melody said. But heartened by the changes that Jack's ruling might spur, the Dussetschlegers, parents of three biological and two adopted children, are thinking of becoming foster parents again. Their house is about to empty. Jessy has a full-time job at a warehouse in Taylor and is eager to move out of his parents' home, and his sister, Shela, is getting married in April. "I have seen true evil in what has happened to these kids, but they are so resilient. Seeing how much they have overcome only strengthens my faith," Melody said. "It makes me full of hope." Read more: The Gilmer Mirror - Texas Foster Care System Faces Concerns About Overmedication of Children Source: http://www.gilmermirror.com/view/full_story/27340055/article-Texas-Foster-Care-System-Faces-Concerns-About-Overmedication-of-Children?instance=lead_story_left_column

Texas Foster Care System Faces Concerns About Overmedication of Children by DAGNEY PRUNER, Reporting Texas The Gilmer Mirror 3 days ago | 783 views | 1 | 4 | | Texas Foster Care System Faces Concerns About Overmedication of Children By DAGNEY PRUNER Reporting Texas Holding a scrapbook inches from his face, Jessy Dussetschleger flips through pages and pages of pictures from his childhood. Smiling and tapping his adoptive mother on her shoulder, he points to a photo of himself with his siblings at a birthday party. Touching memories from early childhood are a rarity for him. Jessy, 22, was born deaf. His mother, a single mom, also was deaf and raised him in an abusive household in Corpus Christi. He was just 4 years old when Child Protective Services removed him from the home. Although it is unclear how much abuse he suffered, scars indicate it was extensive. The state declared that he was "severely traumatized." He had six placements during his first three months in the foster care system before he was placed with Melody and Darrel Dussetschleger. Jessy was unable to communicate and had severe behavioral problems due to his deafness and the abuse. He was holding the scrapbook so close to his face because he also is legally blind. At 4, he was prescribed Focalin, Thorazine and BuSpar to manage his behavior. His sister, Shela, also was fostered by the Dussetschlegers and was on heavy psychotropic medication when she came to them at 3 years old. "Every kid we had was so over-medicated. He was on medication most adults can't even handle. She would just look hollow. It was horrible," said Melody Dussetschleger, 56, a stay-at-home mom. More than 30,000 children are in Texas' foster care system, including more than 1,000 Travis County. In 2015, 15.5 percent of foster children were prescribed psychotropic medication by the state or contract physicians, down from 28 percent in 2002. Psychotropic medication includes drugs that affect mental activity, which includes sedatives, tranquilizers, stimulants, antidepressants and anti-psychotics. Side effects can range from suicidal ideation and cardiac arrest to seizures and sudden death. There are few studies on the long-term effects of those medications. The drugs also can mask underlying problems that could be treated with therapy. "The medications are not only approved, you have to give it to them. They are pushed by the state. We didn't have a choice," said Darrel Dussetschleger, 60, a self-employed contractor. His family has fostered 32 children over the past 25 years. Jessy was their first. In December 2015, U.S. District Judge Janis Jack ruled that Texas' foster care system was unconstitutional. She found that the system subjected children to unreasonable risk of harm and that children left foster care more damaged than when they entered. The state is responsible for children "shuttled throughout a system where rape, abuse, psychotropic medication and instability are the norm," Jack's ruling said. Jack ordered an expert review of the system, which found that psychotropic medication had been prescribed widely, often without evaluation and with missing medical records. The report, which was released in November, recommended that the state establish regular review of children's diagnoses and medication dosages and create an informed consent protocol. Marissa Gonzales, a spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, said it conducted an "extensive review" of prescription practices for children in foster care more than a decade ago. "In general, the use of psychotropic medication in foster children has declined significantly in recent years, even as the number of children entering the foster care system has continued to rise," she said. Concerns about the use of psychotropic medication in the foster care system date at least to 2008, when the federal Government Accountability Office compared Medicaid data from five states. The GAO found that in Texas, 32 percent of foster children were prescribed psychotropic drugs, compared to 7 percent of children outside of foster care. No other state had such a big disparity. Timothy Belseth said medication made it difficult to get to the root of the trauma he saw kids endure in foster care. "You can't get a pill to take away trauma," said Belseth, 26, who entered Texas' foster care system when he was 15. He is now a research coordinator at the Texas Institute for Child and Family Wellbeing in Austin. "It's easier to deal with a doped-up kid than to deal with one that is constantly mouthing off," Belseth said. The Department of Family and Protective Services now revises its guidelines on psychotropic medication, which were introduced in 2005, every three years based on recommendations from the experts at the University of Texas at Austin's College of Pharmacy and other medical professionals. The guidelines set limits for dosages and designate "red flags" for mixing medications that trigger a review of the child's treatment plan. However, scarce resources make it difficult to enforce the parameters. "Certainly, kids need more psychotherapy than they're getting," said Dr. Steven Pliszka, a child and adolescent psychiatrist who helps DFPS develop the medication parameters. The goal is not to get children completely off medication but to reduce practices such as prescribing multiple drugs to treat the same behavioral disorder, he said. "We know very little about childhood PTSD and really the best treatments. For the most part, we are extrapolating from the adult data, and that's true in therapy as well as medication," Pliszka said. Jessy suffers from macular degeneration, a condition that causes blind spots to grow in his field of vision. The disease is

South Florida con artists turn 'sober homes' into insurance scam Thomas Cordy Palm Beach Post By Fred Grimm fgrimm@miamiherald.com LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story What the hell is it about South Florida and drug-addiction profiteering? First we spawned a national opioid epidemic, allowing some 200 sham pain clinics to dispense oxycodone pills like Skittles. Cash-only pill mills, most of them operating out of strip shopping centers in Broward, Palm Beach and Miami-Dade counties (no insurance allowed) peddled 8.2 million oxy tablets in 2009 alone. Florida claimed all 50 of the nation's top 50 docs who prescribed that highly addictive narcotic. Through the first decade of the 21st century, South Florida's pill mills supplied the bulk of the oxycodone behind an addiction epidemic that still ravages Appalachia and America's rust belt. When Florida finally cracked down on its freewheeling pain clinics, the nation's oxy addicts turned to cheap Mexican heroin. And lately, to fentanyl, a synthetic heroin and another South Florida speciality. All of which led to our latest drug-addiction scam — faux "sober homes," group homes for recovering addicts in league with substance-abuse treatment programs that are hardly more than vehicles for insurance fraud. ADVERTISING Hundreds of barely regulated sober homes have proliferated in Palm Beach and Broward counties over the past decade. Many are tied into very lucrative addiction-treatment programs exploiting well-meaning federal laws that put behavioral disabilities (including alcohol and drug addiction) on par with physical handicaps. And make them eligible for medical insurance coverage. "Over the past, bad actors have been using these laws to hide their exploitation of the very people that these laws were meant to protect," a Palm Beach grand jury warned in a special report issued last month. "This is especially true in the business of recovery housing, where many unregulated homes have become unsafe and overcrowded 'flopouses,' where crimes like rape, theft, human trafficking, prostitution, and illegal drug use are commonplace." The grand jury described a kind of lowdown medical tourism designed to exploit the drug epidemic. Desperate parents, reacting to deceptive advertising, ship their addicted children to South Florida treatment programs. What their kids get, according to the grand jury, is rank exploitation. Many unregulated homes have become unsafe and overcrowded 'flopouses,' where crimes like rape, theft, human trafficking, prostitution, and illegal drug use are commonplace. Palm Beach Grand Jury Report Sleazy operators make millions by billing insurance carriers for useless drug tests. The Palm Beach Post, which exposed the sober house racket in a stunning investigative series that began in 2015, described how operators were making thousands on routine urine tests that should have cost no more than $10 or $20. After the Post series, Palm Beach State Attorney Dave Aronberg created the state's (maybe the nation's) first sober house task force. So far the task force has busted 10 drug treatment and sober home operators, most of them for illegal patient brokering. The latest was Leonard R. Dobard, 49, of the House of Chance group home in Boynton Beach, charged Wednesday with accepting thousands of dollars in bounties for delivering patients to the Whole Life Recovery treatment center. (Owner, James Kigar, 55, who was arrested in October, has been charged with 95 counts of patient brokering.) Federal investigators, carrying out their own sober home sleaze sweep, arrested six industry operatives last month, including two doctors, tied to treatment centers in Broward and Palm Beach counties. The feds said the centers were run by Kenneth Chatman, 46, a notorious ex-con, who was accused of coercing "female patients and residents into prostitution, telling them that they need not pay rent or participate in treatment or testing so long as they would allow him to continue to bill their insurance companies for substance abuse treatment and testing that the patients did not receive." And there was more. Chatman, according to federal prosecutors, "engaged in various tactics to keep patients from being able to leave" his programs, "including threatening violence, and confiscating their belongings, such as car keys, telephones, medications, and food stamps, in order to maintain the ability to continue fraudulently billing the insurance companies." Sober house operators have also exploited federal disabilities laws that prevent local governments from using zoning laws to ban or limit the number of group homes in residential neighborhoods. Towns like Boynton Beach and Delray Beach have become the unwilling host to hundreds of sober homes, some taking over expensive houses in gated communities. According to the Post, the sober homes often dump out-of-state addicts onto local streets after their insurance dries up. They become instant local social burdens. There was a familiar name among the treatment industry pirates swept up by the Palm Beach County Sober Home Task Force. Christopher Lee Hutson, 36, who was charged with patient brokering in October, had pleaded guilty back in 2011 to another set of racketeering charges. The Wellington man had been implicated in an infamous pain clinic operation that had peddled 20 million oxycodone pills in Broward and Palm Beach counties. Hutson, like so many other of South Florida's other drug industry con artists, had exploited the addiction crisis coming and going. Fred Grimm: fgrimm@miamiherald.com, @grimm_fred Read more here: <http://www.miamiherald.com/news/local/news-columns-blogs/fred-grimm/article124838879.html#storylink=cpy>

Clark County man charged after group home resident 'duct taped' in room Billy Gross Spicer i Billy Gross Spicer By Morgan Eads meads@herald-leader.com A Winchester man has been charged with abuse after working as a caregiver in an adult group home. Billy Gross Spicer, 21, was charged with knowingly abusing or neglecting an adult, which is a Class C felony, according to a news release from the office of Attorney General Andy Beshear. Spicer is also charged with unlawful imprisonment and terroristic threatening. Spicer worked at a Clark County group home for adults with intellectual or developmental disabilities, according to the news release. While caring for a resident overnight, Spicer "either duct taped the resident in his room or failed to remove duct tape from the resident's door, which prevented the resident from leaving his room and which prevented Spicer from providing the required level of care," according to the news release. "Abuse of any kind is unacceptable," Beshear said in the release. "One of the core missions of my office is to protect Kentucky's most vulnerable citizens from abuse and exploitation — and to prosecute offenders to the fullest extent of the law." Spicer was indicted on Dec. 8 and, if convicted of the charges, could serve up to 15 years in prison, according to the news release. The attorney general's office has a tip line for reporting allegations of abuse, neglect or exploitation in Medicaid facilities, 1-877-ABUSE TIP (1-877-228-7384). Reports can also be made to Adult Protective Services by calling 1-800-752-6200. Morgan Eads: 859-231-1330, @HLPublicSafety Read more here: <http://www.kentucky.com/news/local/crime/article124966684.html#storylink=cpy>

RM LAW Announces Class Action Lawsuit Against Universal Health Services, Inc. News provided by RM LAW, P.C. Jan 06, 2017, 19:45 ET Share this article WAYNE, Pa., Jan. 6, 2017/PRNewswire/ -- RM LAW, P.C. announces that a class action lawsuit has been filed in United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania on behalf of all persons or entities that purchased Universal Health Services, Inc. ("Universal Health" or the "Company") (NYSE: UHS) securities between February 26, 2015 and December 7, 2016, inclusive (the "Class Period"). Universal Health shareholders may, no later than February 21, 2017, move the Court for appointment as a lead plaintiff of the Class. If you purchased shares of Universal Health and would like to learn more about these claims or if you wish to discuss these matters and have any questions concerning this announcement or your rights, contact Richard A. Maniskas, Esquire toll-free at (877) 316-3218 or to sign up online, visit: www.rmclasslaw.com/cases/uhs. The Complaint alleges that throughout the Class Period Defendants made false and/or misleading statements and/or failed to disclose that: (1) Universal Health admitted patients based on its own financial considerations and not upon the medical necessity of the patient; (2) Universal Health would keep patients admitted until their insurance payments ran out in order to ensure the maximum payment for its services; (3) as a result, Universal Health's revenues from inpatient care relied on unsustainable practices; (4) in turn, Universal Health lacked effective internal control concerning its practices and policies of admitting patients; and (5) as a result, Universal Health's public statements were materially false and misleading at all relevant times. On December 7, 2016, BuzzFeed published an investigative story on Universal Health alleging, among other things, that Universal Health put profits ahead of people. On December 7, 2016, BuzzFeed issued a report revealing the results of its investigation into Universal Health. BuzzFeed's investigation was based upon interviews with current and former Universal Health employees, including executives who had operational responsibilities in hospitals. The investigation also included interviews with patients and government investigators. According to the report, employees from Universal Health hospitals said they were "under pressure to fill beds by almost any method – which sometimes meant exaggerating people's symptoms or twisting their words to make them seem suicidal – and to hold them until their insurance payments ran out." On this news, shares of Universal Health fell over 12% to close at just $111.36 per share on December 7, 2016. If you are a member of the class, you may, no later than February 21, 2017, request that the Court appoint you as lead plaintiff of the class. A lead plaintiff is a representative party that acts on behalf of other class members in directing the litigation. In order to be appointed lead plaintiff, the Court must determine that the class member's claim is typical of the claims of other class members, and that the class member will adequately represent the class. Under certain circumstances, one or more class members may together serve as "lead plaintiff." Your ability to share in any recovery is not, however, affected by the decision whether or not to serve as a lead plaintiff. You may retain RM LAW, P.C. or other counsel of your choice, to serve as your counsel in this action. For more information regarding this, please contact RM LAW, P.C. (Richard A. Maniskas, Esquire) toll-free at (877) 316-3218 or by email at rmaniskas@rmclasslaw.com or visit: www.rmclasslaw.com/cases/uhs. For more information about class action cases in general or to learn more about RM LAW, P.C. please visit our website: www.rmclasslaw.com. RM LAW, P.C. is a national shareholder litigation firm. RM LAW, P.C. is devoted to protecting the interests of individual and institutional investors in shareholder actions in state and federal courts nationwide. CONTACT: RM LAW, P.C. Richard A. Maniskas, Esquire 995 Old Eagle School Rd., Suite 311 Wayne, PA 19087 484-588-5518 877-316-3218 www.rmclasslaw.com/cases/cnc rmaniskas@rmclasslaw.com To view the original version on PR Newswire, visit: <http://www.prnewswire.com/news-releases/rm-law-announces-class-action-lawsuit-against-universal-health-services-inc-300387254.html> SOURCE RM LAW, P.C.

Child abuse victims testify in group home trial by Jasmine Williams Tuesday, January 10th 2017 Share Video Share Video 00:00 00:00 MOBILE, Ala. (WPMI) — Mobile county jurors heard from child abuse victims today in the Saving Youth Foundation case. Three of the facilities operators are on trial right now in Mobile, charged with 14 counts of felony aggravated child abuse charges. Jurors saw images of an isolation room today were investigators say teens would be locked for days at a time. all at the hands of the facilities owners. John Young, William Knott, and Aleshia are accused of abusing teens at the Saving Youth Foundation in Mobile. The facility was associated with the church Solid Rock Ministries. Prosecutors say troubled teens were voluntarily sent there by parents all over the country. Last year, the state removed 15 girls from their building on Sullivan Avenue and 21 boys from their Springhill Avenue location. Investigators say they excessively used isolation, physical restraints, and extensive exercise as punishment. Prichard police first investigated the operators of this facility five years ago, when it was called Restoration Youth Academy. Testimony resumes tomorrow morning with more witnesses from the state. Source: <http://local15tv.com/news/local/child-abuse-victims-testify-in-group-home-trial>

State finds violations at local addiction treatment center Woodhaven By Natalie Tendall Published: January 8, 2017, 9:20 pm Updated: January 9, 2017, 11:37 am DAYTON, Ohio (WDTN) - A 2 NEWS Investigation uncovers the state of Ohio's Mental Health and Addiction Services found several violations at a local drug and alcohol residential treatment facility months ago and there still has been no action taken. According to a document 2 NEWS Investigates obtained, the state is proposing to revoke the non-medical community certification for Woodhaven Alcohol and Drug Addiction Services out of 1 Elizabeth Place in Dayton. State investigators say they violated the law in at least four areas. 2 NEWS was contacted by several current and former clients and employees of the inpatient addiction treatment center. All had concerns with how the program is being run. Former patient, Sarah Stern is one of them. 2 NEWS Investigates found the state has been investigating allegations at the center over the past year. We obtained the letter sent in August to Woodhaven from the state. It lays out several violations against the facility including, inadequate staffing and supervision, failure to set forth individual treatment plans and a violation of client rights. The document says most interviews took place in February of 2016. The first claim says residents reported being harassed, sometimes sexually by upper management. This is something Sara says she witnessed first hand. You can read the full document here. *2 NEWS is redacting any names of those mentioned in the allegations because no official charges have been filed. "Conversations that an owner of a facility shouldn't be having in front of clients," said Stern. The letter from the state also said they received complaints that clients were being verbally and emotionally abused by staff. It also noted that former clients claim three separate sexual incidents occurred at Woodhaven and the proper reports were not filled out. "A lot of women are used to being taken advantage of or using sex to get what they want, especially with being an addict. So the fact that that was going on wasn't okay. Women at these treatment facilities need to feel safe and like they don't have to do that kind of stuff to get attention of something they need," said Stern. The state is also noting a violation because the only physician at Woodhaven at the time of the investigation did not have the proper substance abuse scope of practice and the nursing staff was not adequately supervised. The report also said they found Woodhaven did not have a client rights officer like they are supposed to, who would take complaints from clients. The letter from the Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services says they've reviewed the alleged violations and are proposing to revoke Woodhaven's certification. We've learned Woodhaven management has since requested a hearing to contest the allegations but months later, no date has been set. The hearing officer will decide whether or not Woodhaven should close. After talking with several staff members and former clients, they DON'T want to see a closure. They say the facility has a great opportunity to help people with addiction in the community. They just want to see better leadership and a better environment for those who are working through their addiction. "To shut it down when there is such an epidemic would be tragic. There is already a wait list at every other center for a bed," said Stern. 2 NEWS reached out to Woodhaven management several times about these allegations and have left a message with their attorney. We did receive a statement back from CEO James Goodwin that says, "Woodhaven has been working closely with the state of Ohio to address accusations it has made against it, most of which - including the most severe - we dispute. Woodhaven has worked hard to ensure it is delivering the highest quality services and care to those suffering from substance abuse, and is taking all necessary measures to ensure that those services will continue." We'll stay on top of this story and let you know what happens at that hearing. Source: <http://wdtn.com/investigative-story/state-finds-violations-at-local-addiction-treatment-center/>

ACS Still Doing Business With Deficient Foster Care Providers, Comptroller Audit Finds by Raphael Pope-Sussman in News on Jan 12, 2017 4:45 pm State Comptroller Thomas DiNapoli. (NYS Comptroller's Office) The Administration for Children's Services continues to do business with private foster care providers that have allowed children in their care to be abused or neglected, according to an audit released this week by the New York State Comptroller's Office. According to the audit, which follows up on a 2015 audit from the comptroller studying ACS contracts and contractor performance, ACS has made "virtually no progress" on the major recommendations in the original audit. That audit, which examined a sample of 40 ACS contracts, found that ACS had frequently awarded non-competitive or semi-competitive contracts to foster care providers found to have failed to protect children in their care from abuse or neglect. The report found that ACS renewed and extended contracts with these contractors. It also found deficiencies in ACS's reporting of contracts to the city comptroller's office. It called for ACS to increase the lead time for contract awards to facilitate competitive bidding processes, provide thorough documentation justifying decisions to award non-competitive contracts, improve monitoring of contractor performance, and renew contracts based on performance. But according to the findings of a follow-up audit, which were released in the form of a letter sent to ACS Commissioner Gladys Carrión, ACS has not implemented these recommendations. The follow-up audit examined a random sample of 10 contracts—eight contract renewals, one extension, and one new contract—awarded during the 2015-2016 fiscal year. The deaths of two children whose families had been repeatedly investigated by ACS for abuse but who were not removed from their homes has placed ACS under immense scrutiny in recent months. In October, weeks after the death of one of those children, Zymere Perkins, Mayor Bill de Blasio said that he would be instituting major reforms at ACS. Last month, Commissioner Carrión announced that she would be stepping down from her position. According to ACS, she will stay on as commissioner until a qualified replacement is found. ACS spokesperson Aja Worthy-Davis defended the agency's record in a statement to Gothamist. "We are working closely with providers to ensure that they are able to complete the complex application process to register contracts on time," she said. "Our rigorous monitoring of foster care agencies include monthly safety checks, random case reviews, improvement plans, and other assessments." Source: http://gothamist.com/2017/01/12/acs_audit_comptroller.php

Utah County treatment center owner filed $700K in false claims, feds say By Dennis Romboy Deseret News@dennisromboy Published: Jan. 13, 2017 4:35 p.m. Updated: Jan. 13, 2017 5:06 p.m. 2 Comments Sun Jan 15 17:05:37 2017 SALT LAKE CITY — The owner of two Utah drug and alcohol treatment centers submitted more than $700,000 in fraudulent claims to a health care benefits program, federal prosecutors say. A federal indictment charges Dustin Joseph Long, 29, of Santaquin, with six counts of health care fraud and six counts of wire fraud. He pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court this week. A trial is scheduled for March 17. Long is the co-owner of Arcadia Recovery Center in Payson and Arcadia Residential Treatment Center in Bluffdale. Arcadia used a third-party biller, CloudMedicalBilling, to prepare, submit and track claims filed with Humana. Long was a co-owner of the billing company. The indictment alleges that despite numerous requests, Long denied CloudMedicalBilling employees access to BestNotes, the most accurate source of Arcadia client information available, to prepare claims and to verify the accuracy of the rosters he provided. In late June 2015, the billing company discovered that Long's rosters falsely identified continued drug and alcohol treatment services well past Arcadia clients' discharge dates, according to the indictment. Although the company notified Long about the billing discrepancies, he failed to correct any errors, did not refund money to Humana and continued to submit false rosters until October 2015. The indictment alleges Long submitted more than 900 false claims involving 14 clients, totaling more than $700,000 in payments from Humana to Arcadia. The maximum penalty for each of the six health care fraud counts is 10 years in prison term and a $250,000 fine. The wire fraud counts each carry a 20-year sentence and a $250,000 fine. Source: <http://www.deseretnews.com/article/865671089/Utah-County-treatment-center-owner-filed-700K-in-false-claims-feds-say.html>

'Spiritual warfare,' 'demonic attacks' The role religion played in home for sex-trafficking victims posted Jan. 13, 2017 2:50 p.m. (CDT) email article print font size - + by / Marjie Lundstrom and Sam Stanton Share 2 SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Two weeks before the voluntary shutdown last year of Courage House, a licensed group home for young sex-trafficking victims near Sacramento, a ritual was performed on a teenage girl. According to findings in a state investigation, the girl's forehead was anointed with oil, a religious verse was recited, and the teen was told she would have to be a Christian, or at least denounce Satan, to continue living in the home. Crosses then were handed out to the other girls to wear. Courage House founder Jenny Williamson later would explain that the girl had multiple personalities and posed a danger to herself and others. "She worshipped Satan, and she practiced animal and human sacrifice," she said in August. Williamson told regulators in a June 18 memo responding to the state's unannounced visit that the girl had been the victim of satanic ritualistic abuse and told staff she had "participated in human sacrifice when she was an alter personality." Williamson said the girl terrified staff by announcing that "this week was a blood sacrifice week." The California Department of Social Services did not accept the group home's explanation and issued Courage House a "Type A" citation, the most severe penalty for violations considered serious enough to have an immediate impact on clients' health, safety or personal rights. In its investigation, the state found that the girl had an interest in satanism but did not threaten to perform sacrifices and, instead, had "made a general statement that she enjoyed drawing some of the images" of satanic practice, a state licensing official wrote. Courage House appealed the citation twice, losing again in November, arguing in its appeals documents that the state's investigation was "grossly inadequate" and that "the resident was adamant that she wanted to pray to become a Christian." In addition, her condition left her with frequent amnesia, preventing her from being able to recount "full events," two Courage House officials wrote Oct. 6 in their second appeal to the state. "There was never any pressure given, or ultimatums discussed with her," wrote former program director Melissa Herrmann and clinical director Angela Chanter, who participated in the episode. "She was told she could not perform human and animal sacrifices, or drink the blood of any person there, but she was never told she could not worship Satan nor was she told she had to become a Christian." The clash underscores the tension that can arise between faith-based service providers and government officials — each held accountable for the health and safety of vulnerable clients. Over the past decade, child sex trafficking has become a hot-button topic, spawning new programs and multiple new funding streams. Christian organizations in particular have rallied to the cause, organizing conferences, engaging communities and embarking on worldwide missionary work. Some Christian-based groups, such as Courage House and its nonprofit parent organization, Courage Worldwide Inc. of Rocklin, Calif., have gone a step further, establishing their own facilities to house and treat young victims. The once-vaunted program is struggling to reopen its Northern California facility for six girls, ages 11 to 17, while undergoing scrutiny from the state — including accusations it has violated children's right to religious freedom. Because Courage Worldwide accepts government money — $9,100 a month per child at the time the group's Sacramento-area home closed in June — the program must stay within regulatory boundaries and not favor one religion over another, or press children to participate. If it is able to reopen, it would be eligible for about $12,000 a month per girl under a new state system in effect next year. Courage Worldwide officials maintain they have found the appropriate balance. "State funds do not mean you cannot be a Christian home — state funds and license mean you cannot force a child to practice any religious ritual, and Courage House does not," said Gil Stieglitz, a board member for Courage Worldwide Inc. and pastor at Bayside Church in Roseville, Calif., in an emailed response. From the time Courage Worldwide opened its Sacramento-area group home in 2011 on 52 acres north of the city, the organization has been steeped in Christian beliefs and practices, according to a Bee examination of state licensing records, dozens of internal Courage Worldwide emails and interviews with 17 former employees, business associates and a former client. The group opened a second Courage House around that same time in the east African country of Tanzania that it says now has 12 beds. For years, Williamson has touted an ambitious expansion plan for Courage House Northern California that includes as its centerpiece a shimmering chapel with a large cross, according to architectural renderings. The architect's plan, which also envisions 10 new cottages for 60 girls, describes the chapel "as the most important building on the campus." Despite aggressive fundraising around those plans — and a $300,000-plus kick start in 2011 from Bayside Church — the organization has yet to break ground. Williamson and other Courage Worldwide officials vehemently deny there is any pressure to practice Christianity at Courage House, and said that girls are free to attend services of their choice as staffing levels permit. "We are in full agreement with the state to provide access to religious services when the girls request it, if provided sufficient notice in advance so that we can properly staff for such requests," Courage Worldwide officials said in an emailed statement to The Bee. The state licensing file includes a sample of a "Courage House religious participation form," which allows girls to check a box indicating their preferences. Choices range from no participation to weekly church services to worship nights and other spiritual events. Even so, the state leveled a Type B citation against Courage House in December 2015, finding that the girls were required to attend the Midthuns' church — a concern shared by some staff members. DeAnne Brining, a former therapist at the home, said the girls felt awkward and conspicuous at the church because the congregation knew who they were. "The girls did not want to be known as Courage girls," she said. "Everybody at that church knew they were trafficked." Courage Worldwide officials disputed the state's findings, telling The Bee the Elk Grove church was the girls' "consensus choice." Courage Worldwide's conflicts with the state have extended beyond matters of religious freedom. In the last five years, Courage House has been cited 36 times for regulatory violations, according to the data released to The Bee in early December. That's more than three times the average for citations at the 300 facilities statewide of similar size and classification level. Source: <http://www.leadertelegram.com/Features/Religion/2017/01/07/Spiritual-warfare-demonic-attacks-nbsp.html>

The Real Lesson from the Fall of R.I.S.E.: Group Homes Don't Work By Richard Wexler Saturday Jan 14, 2017 · 4:00 PM PST 2017/01/14 · 16:00 2 Comments \(9 New\) The great filmmaker Costa Gavras, known for making "political films" such as "Z" and "The Confession," once said: "The issues in politics are not complex, even though politicians tell us so in order to convince us of the politicians' importance ... and to keep us from criticizing them." It works the same way in child welfare. The bloviations of assorted "providers" concerning the complexity of this or that problem usually are rhetorical fog, created to obscure the simple fact that whatever it is the providers are providing has failed. Case in point: a story in The Chronicle of Social Change about the closing of the Residential Intervention for the Sexually Exploited (R.I.S.E.) group home for commercially sexually exploited children (CSEC — yes, there's already a dehumanizing acronym) in Redwood City, Calif. The story goes on and on about how the closing illustrates the "complexities faced by the entities engaged in serving and protecting [such] children," how the group home ran up against "complicated" protocols, etc. But the real story is simple: Group homes are almost always a bad idea. Someone opened a group home. It failed. It was forced to close. Only item four on the list is unusual. Indeed, given what the San Jose Mercury News exposed about group homes and institutions California allows to remain open, you have to wonder about a place authorities found so bad they shut it down after only two years with the owner agreeing never to open a group home in Redwood City again. But The Chronicle of Social Change does not wonder. It does not dig into the details about the failures at R.I.S.E. that led to the closure. Perhaps that's understandable. Two years ago, The Chronicle did a 2,000 word encomium to R.I.S.E. featuring gushy paragraphs like this: The interior walls of the yellow craftsman style home ... are all painted bright colors and dusted with empowering quotes; the aesthetics a small indication of the lengths to which Annie Corbett ... and her staff have gone to ensure that this home is a safe place ... Right. Because if the walls look pretty and the quotes are “empowering” what could possibly go wrong? I’m sure Corbett meant well. But in that story, she already is portraying herself as a child welfare Gulliver, always at risk of being tied down by the Lilliputians of licensing who can, she says, “inflict torment any way they want.” As for actually helping these young people by placing them with families: Corbett says foster parents “don’t want these kids.” Needless to say birth parents are not even mentioned. Layers of Faux Complexity Now that the program has shut down, The Chronicle buries the basics in layers of faux “complexity.” The most recent story begins: In foster care most of her life, 17-year-old Amber [not her real name] finally found a little stability at R.I.S.E. House. After cycling through 35 foster and group homes, she developed relationships at R.I.S.E. and was poised to graduate from high school. Normally in a news story a claim such as this would be followed by something to back it up – at least a quote from Amber herself. But no evidence, and no quote, is offered. Apparently, the reporter just took someone’s word for it. (In fact neither Chronicle story quotes any current or former resident of R.I.S.E.) Only toward the very end of the story do we learn that, notwithstanding the claims about “stability” and “relationships,” Amber had run away from R.I.S.E. not once, but five times. The story does quote from a report by the California Child Welfare Council – but selectively. The story notes the report’s call for “stable housing and specialized placement options.” But the report also says: CSEC survivors who have successfully left their exploitative relationship often point to the emotional connections and trusting relationships they built with caring adults as significant factors in their recovery. In contrast, CSEC survivors identify significant difficulties with living in group homes. For example, in those placements, no one caregiver looks out for their well-being. CSEC may also pose risks to the other children in the home. Group home placement can even exacerbate CSEC victimization, because pimps use such facilities as recruiting grounds. Pattern Seen All Over the Country That’s exactly what has happened over and over, all over the country. Yet despite the mountain of evidence that group homes and institutions are a failure for all populations, the group home industry persists in pushing institutionalization for this especially vulnerable group. And when it all goes wrong, it’s everyone else’s fault. The licensers are “harassing and intimidating us,” Corbett says. The police put her program “in a vice grip.” And, of course, only she really cares about the children. In a comment reminiscent of Donald Trump’s declaration that “I alone can fix it,” Corbett says she is working “with a population everyone else gets rid of.” Shutting down her group home, she says, is just another example of “the marginalization and discrimination against these vulnerable and traumatized kids.” In her telling, the problem isn’t that, as authorities said, there was no therapeutic program, issues with the staff-child ratio, poor school attendance, and trouble with staff training (which is odd since the earlier Chronicle story assured readers that staff already were specifically trained to deal with this population). No, Corbett says, those awful police and licensing people were at the home so often there just wasn’t time to run a worthwhile program. Here’s another possibility: They were there so often because R.I.S.E. was a bad idea, badly executed. There is nothing a group home can do that can’t be done better by providing wraparound services to children living either with their own families or with foster families. You can find foster families to accept “these kids” if they know they will have the intensive support they need to help them. Indeed, the California Child Welfare Council report recommends that the state “create a CSEC subspecialty within Wraparound programs that will ensure caregivers have the knowledge and resources needed to care for CSEC victims.” Some things in child welfare are complicated, such as funding formulas. But the issues in child welfare are not complex, even though providers tell us so in order to convince us of the providers’ importance. And to keep us from criticizing them. _____ Richard Wexler is Executive Director of the National Coalition for Child Protection Reform, www.nccpr.org. This column originally appeared in the Chronicle of Social Change. Source: http://www.dailykos.com/stories/2017/1/14/1619640/-The-Real-Lesson-from-the-Fall-of-R-I-S-E-Group-Homes-Don-t-Work

How Texas’ Overburdened Foster Care System has Produced a Generation of Lost Adults Posted By Alex Zielinski on Tue, Jan 17, 2017 at 5:00 AM click to enlarge Illustration by Jess Blank On Caleb Pitts’ 18th birthday, two letters were delivered to his Comal County jail cell. One was from his foster mother, Elaine, who’d watched him dart in and out of juvenile detention for years. The other was from the state of Texas, informing Pitts that he had officially become an adult. Suddenly, after 11 years in the state’s foster system, 20 foster homes, dozens of forgotten schools, a blur of paperwork and a lifetime of trauma, Pitts was on his own. Sitting alone in the cold, familiar cell, he couldn’t have felt less prepared. Pitts was plucked from his home and put into state custody when he was seven years old, after his meth-addicted mother was sent to prison (his absent father was already homeless, somewhere). The state immediately separated Pitts from his three biological brothers, and the trauma left Pitts with uncontrollable anger issues — issues few foster parents could tolerate. So, instead of living with a family, Pitts spent the majority of his childhood living in prison-like facilities for kids with “behavioral issues,” alongside other heavily-medicated, equally pissed-off boys. It was unusual for a kid to leave these “homes” without a criminal record. Pitts is one of the 1,180 kids who “age out” of Texas’ foster care system each year — children in state custody who are essentially pushed out the door with a birth certificate, a few bucks, and serious trust issues. Many leave with undiagnosed mental health problems, often linked to the sexual, physical, or emotional abuse sustained in different foster homes. The few transitional tools the state gives foster kids are outdated, unrealistic, and pushed on them without context. With little preparation for the adult world, hundreds of these kids quickly slide into chronic homelessness or incarceration. Some might return to an abusive household or start one of their own. Texas knows it’s a terrible parent. Numerous court cases, leaked state documents, and now a federal lawsuit underscoring the severity of the state’s neglect have officials clamoring for reform. But long-time foster advocates have heard this before — and know a successful overhaul of the state’s gargantuan Department of Family and Protective Services would take years. In the state’s absence, local organizations and agencies are working to cobble together some kind of realistic safety net to catch their community’s most vulnerable adults before it’s too late. It’s a net that still has many holes. Pitts, now 23, should actually be considered a foster care success story. He’s working part-time, taking business classes at San Antonio College, off drugs, pays rent on time, and only has the occasional run-in with the law. He had to do most of this without the state’s help. The majority of kids Texas has chewed up and spit out into adulthood, including Pitts’ biological brothers, face a much darker reality. These are the children Texas has raised.  For as long as she can remember, Jessica Urias has always been on some kind of medication. Her biological mother fed her sleep aids and adderall to keep her quiet from age five, threatening to punch her daughter when she bothered her. When DFPS shuttled her into foster care at age ten, Urias says doctors just added more prescriptions, antidepressants and bipolar medication. “I don’t remember a lot of that time,” she said. “I lost a lot of weight, because the pills make me sick.” If her foster parents knew she wasn’t eating, they’d think she was trying to get them in trouble with DFPS, Urias said. So she hid it from them. Rampant overmedication is just one of the many pieces of the Texas foster system U.S. District Court Judge Janis Jack condemned in her blistering 2015 ruling on DFPS failures. Texas’ 28,000 wards of the state, she wrote, “have been shuttled throughout a system where rape, abuse, psychotropic medication, and instability are the norm.” According to her ruling, this system had gone unchecked for more than 20 years, leaving behind a generation of troubled adults in its wake. “It is widely recognized that foster youths who age out generally experience poorer life outcomes,” Jack said. This ruling was triggered by Texas’ refusal to settle a 4-year-old lawsuit from a national child advocacy group that claimed DFPS violated children’s rights. The 12,000 foster children in permanent state custody had been “doubly traumatized,” attorneys argued: “First by the abuse and neglect that brought them into foster care, and second by their treatment at the hands of their state custodians.” They spoke for dozens of foster children who’d been raped, hog-tied, suffocated in closets, and severely beaten in foster homes. Then-Attorney General Greg Abbott, however, contended that the state isn’t “liable for the psychological well-being and emotional development of every child in foster care.” Jack saw things differently. She immediately assigned two child welfare experts to investigate the tangled foster care system and present recommendations to the state. True to form, Texas officials rejected the federal interference, calling the 56 recommendations “impractical” and unnecessary. Texas could take care of itself. But more than a year after her original ruling, little has changed. “The state’s overall response to this lawsuit was a general unveiling of how poor they are at their job,” said Katherine Barillas, the director of child welfare policy at One Voice Texas — a Texas nonprofit that advocates for public policy issues. While Texas has yet to suggest its own comprehensive solution, DFPS did approve a substantial salary boost for the state’s notoriously overworked social workers. But without expanding the number of salaried workers, Barillas doesn’t see the point. “We need a dramatic investment in these workers to ensure the kids get any attention. The change we’re talking about is massive. We need to change the entire system. Even if one part is broken, we’ll fail thousands of these kids,” Barillas said. “We can’t just implement one thing and walk away.” Doing so would only continue the state’s vicious cycle of neglect — one best illustrated by Judge Jack’s ruling. “Children ... suffer abuse and neglect that is rarely confirmed or treated, are shuttled between placements—often inappropriate for their needs—throughout the state...are medicated with psychotropic drugs, and then age out of foster care at the Intense service level, damaged, institutionalized, and unable to succeed as adults,” she wrote. “Foster children often age out of care more damaged than when they entered.”  click to enlarge Jessica Urias Courtesy of Jessica Urias Urias learned to never get too comfortable in a foster home, or too attached to her foster family. She never knew when a family would decide she was too much work, or would simply dislike her, and give Child Protective Services a call. “I had been rejected by so many families I started to expedite the process in every new home,” she said. “I knew how to push my parents enough to make them put in their 30 day notice [to have her removed by CPS]. I always felt like an inconvenience. I just wanted to get it over with.” Her nomadic living situation isn’t unusual. According to 2015 data, foster kids who age out of the system in Bexar County have lived in an average 6.8 homes.

In some Texas counties, it's closer to 15. Not able to find love from these state-selected families, Urias created her own. She became pregnant at 16, eager to give her baby the parental love she never received. But shortly after giving birth, the state put her daughter up for adoption. This is a familiar cycle for DFPS. According to a 2012 survey of former foster youth, 10 percent of Texas' foster kids have given birth to or fathered a child before turning 18. And more than 50 percent of foster youth who age out of the system have children before they're 20 (nationally, only 30 percent of young adults get pregnant before 20). "Every girl I know who's left the system either already had a kid or immediately got pregnant," Urias said. "You have to understand — we're children. We'll do anything to give or get love. And that's what a baby is for us." Seventy percent of those kids are funneled back into the foster care system. These numbers have inspired Texas lawmakers to mandate that DFPS start tracking just how many girls become pregnant while in foster care. The state's first annual report will come out next month. After losing her baby, Urias spiraled into a deep depression, one that couldn't be solved with just more meds. Two weeks before aging out of the system, she tried to commit suicide. "No one wanted me," she said. The emotional damage the foster system had inflicted on her left Urias with little hope for the future. Pitts managed to hop through 20 different foster homes from the time he entered the system, at 7 years old, to when he aged out. But unlike Urias, he spent a lot of his childhood living in what the state calls a "Residential Treatment Center," a facility for foster kids with "serious emotional disturbances or mental health issues." Pitts, who had been traumatized when DFPS separated him from his three biological brothers, would tear apart foster homes when he was upset — punching walls, tearing down doors, smashing anything in sight. At one point, he was on nine medications all at once ("like a lab rat," he now says), but nothing worked. In Texas' eyes, RTCs were the answer. When Pitts describes life in the RTCs, he's basically describing a prison. "You're in close quarters with a lot of angry guys," he said. "If you didn't fight, you didn't survive." He was supposed to be under constant supervision — a "perk" of the RTCs — but rarely felt like the staff were looking out for him. "When we'd fight in the halls, it was like a gladiator match. We'd get bloody and beat up and the staff would just watch," he said. "They wouldn't do anything." In some RTC campuses surrounded by barbed wire, the foster kids would go to school and live alongside kids serving time in juvenile detention. The state didn't differentiate between the two. It's no surprise, then, that Pitts spent his teenage years flitting in and out of detention — mostly for fights and selling meth. After aging out, Pitts was diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder from the trauma he'd sustained while in the state's RTCs. Some 30 percent of all Texas foster kids leave the system with a PTSD diagnosis. Pitts says he easily could have joined the thousands of other foster kids who graduate to prison after they age out — that is, if he didn't have a foster mom rooting for him. According to state statistics, some 11 percent of Texas' foster youth are incarcerated by the time they turn 20. To him, jail was a familiar setting, a place where someone else could continue to make all of his decisions for him. "The foster mentality is pretty similar to the prison mentality," he said. "It felt like home."  Stop by the San Antonio PALS center (short for Preparation for Adult Living) on a weekday afternoon, and you'll find a few teens tapping away along a wall of computers or slumped into a couch, watching 2 Fast 2 Furious on a flatscreen TV. You'll also find Jose Chapa, the head coordinator for DFPS' Region 8 — a 28-county swath of South Texas with San Antonio as its headquarters. "I'm the first to admit that it's a tough age group to work with," said Chapa, who's been working with foster teens for over a decade — and is what some local youth advocates call "a beacon of hope." To successfully do his job, he said, he's become half guidance counselor and half parent. "If we help them too much, they'll expect us to help them with everything," he said. "If we give them too little, they'll fail." Chapa and his eight coworkers are responsible for connecting all of Region 8's foster youth with resources that will help them age out of the system with ease. Their main job is to conduct the PALS course, a voluntary, week-long life skills class for 15-year-old foster kids where they learn how to write a check, rent an apartment, or make a resume. This class, offered two years before they age out, is how the state prepares kids for adulthood. Barillas said the PALS program hasn't changed much in the past decade — and it's far from adequate. "This shouldn't just be a week in a classroom, this should be a program built on consistent, age appropriate experiential learning," she said. "Teach them to cook, take them to a bank, go to a laundromat. You can't expect this one class to turn them into an instant adult when they age out. I mean, really, who still writes checks?" Urias, who attended the PALS course, says she has absolutely no recollection of what she was taught. "I was 15, what do you expect?" she says. Granted, PALS connects kids with other resources meant to soften the blow of adulthood — and on paper, they seem pretty fantastic. But, according to foster advocates, they come with problematic caveats. By law, the state of Texas must cover in-state college tuition costs for any former foster youth. Which sounds great, if you assume a foster kid would be prepared to enter college after what is often an inconsistent and incomplete education. In reality, less than half of the kids who age out of the Texas foster program each year even have a high school diploma. "Even if they cover tuition, who will pay for the dorms, the text books, or the transportation? It's unrealistic," said Dr. Harriett Romo, the director of UTSA's Child & Adolescent Policy Research Institute. "Many do express the desire to go to college, but don't have the proper support system. Nobody is there to help them." On average, only 4 percent of former foster youth have earned a 4-year college degree by the time they're 26 — compared to 36 percent of the general population by that time. Thanks to legislation Congress passed in 2009, Texas is required to offer extended housing and care to kids aging out of the foster system. In Texas, these "Supervised Independent Living" facilities give 18-year-olds an apartment-like home with social workers on-site to ease them into independent living. Residents can easily get help searching for work, applying to college, and perfecting other "life skills" like buying a car or signing up for health insurance. But Texas only has nine of these SIL facilities with varying capacity—the largest location offers 34 rooms (the smallest can house eight). At best, Texas' SIL program could only house 10 percent of kids aging out each year. Chapa says the wait list is so daunting it can take some kids up to two years to get in. So what happens when aged-out foster kids can't get into supportive housing? Chapa says he has to send them to a local homeless shelter. Urias was homeless for the first three months after she turned 18. Thankfully, an older cousin let her move in — but not all kids have that kind of fallback. A whopping 37 percent of Texas foster youth report being homeless at least once after leaving foster care. "We're the parent, the state's the parent, and we're letting them live like this," Barillas said. "How would state lawmakers feel about someone's biological parents treating their kids that way?" Other state programs in California and Connecticut have rolled out an even more transitional housing program for foster kids, allowing them a few smaller steps even before living in a supervised housing unit. This is a model Texas should follow, Barillas says. "In Texas, youth go from one setting to being on their own or living in Supervised Independent Living — which may be too big of a leap to independence for some."  Child advocates unequivocally agree on one obvious solution to Texas' poor parenting: Mentorships. And the only person in Bexar County working to connect foster kids with mentors is Elaine Hartle. Pitts said he'd still be behind bars if it wasn't for Hartle. Hartle was Pitts' last foster parent he had before DFPS passed him through the RTC system. Even after Pitts punched holes in her walls and threatened her safety, forcing her multiple times to call the police, Hartle stayed by his side. It was Hartle (and her husband) who ultimately convinced Pitts to clean up his act. "She'd send me letters in jail and they'd visit me whenever they could," Pitts said. "They cared about me — and I didn't want to ruin their life. So I went to rehab and got my GED." The struggle she went through to raise Pitts, an angry teenage boy already hurt by the foster system, motivated Hartle to help more kids left behind by Texas' failed parenting. "Imagine your child's going off to college," she said. "You give them a big hug and a little money and say, 'We wish you the best but you can never come back or call. Good luck.' That's, essentially, what Texas is doing." Hartle created the THRU Project — a nonprofit connecting local foster teens to volunteer mentors — to combat this cycle. Now five years old, THRU has connected some 70 foster kids with more than 100 adult mentors in the community who help them navigate adulthood — whether that's going with them to a car dealership, helping them finish school, or just being an ear on the other end of the line. "When you've never been allowed to make your own choices in life, it's impossible to start from scratch," Hartle said. "You quit planning for the long term when you move every six months. Mentors can see further ahead than these kids, and steer them in the right direction." Her main goal is to help kids "find a better normal," whatever that may look like. In the Bexar County children's court system, judges wish this "normal" was a state mandate. "The success stories are when I see someone connect with a kid — whether it's a THRU mentor, an attorney, a CASA representative, or a judge," said county District Judge Peter Sakai. "But we don't have enough of those people in our community." Sakai has worked with foster children in the county courts since 1995 — and he's seen far fewer success stories than he would have liked. He's come to the conclusion that his work, placing at-risk children in foster care, is far from a cure-all solution. click to enlarge District Judge Peter Sakai Sakai recalls one particular case that best illustrates this problem. The state was taking away a young couple's baby, after they both failed drug rehab programs and denied needed mental health care. Both parents were former foster kids. As he remembers it, the child's father said, "You took me away from my parents when I was three, and nobody ever gave a shit about me. What do you expect? You think you're fixing things, but you're just making it worse." "I realized, he's got a point," Sakai said. "This guy got screwed by the foster care system. He should have fought harder for his kid — but he didn't know how to. And that's our fault." Sakai has little trust that the state will build a reliable safety net for these young adults anytime soon. Instead, he's urging communities to care for their own. "We need local solutions to make up for the state's tenuous safety net," he said. "There are all these little ways we can make our own safety net, right here. It just requires a lot of cooperation." In fact, the most comprehensive, bipartisan bill filed in the state legislature — meant to reform DFPS — suggests the state do just that. Under the proposed law, Texas would coordinate with regional nonprofits and child welfare groups to "increase child safety, placement stability, and permanency."  click to enlarge Caleb

Pitts Pitts never imagined he'd go to college. He never thought he'd have his own apartment. He definitely didn't think he'd have a shot at becoming a realtor — the main reason he's getting a business degree. "I didn't think I had a future," he said. Sure, he still struggles with PTSD-fueled outbursts of rage, and Hartle still isn't surprised when she gets a call from the cops. But Pitts comes from a generation of foster kids thrown into a system that, according to the courts, has done "more harm to our children than good." The fact that he found a pathway out of incarceration or homelessness or addiction appears to exceed state expectations. He's one of the lucky ones — something he's reminded of whenever he hears an old friend has been sentenced to decades behind bars or that his biological brother is still struggling with drug addiction. Just a few months ago, Pitts and Hartle walked by the Greyhound station in downtown San Antonio. Pitts paused. Two people sitting near the station looked familiar — both were around his age and both looked like they lived on the streets. He went up and talked to them, and confirmed his suspicion: they were his former foster siblings. One was on some kind of drug, he told Hartle, the other was working as a prostitute to make ends meet. Both were homeless. "Damn," he said, as they continued down the sidewalk. "That could have been me." Source: <http://www.sacurrent.com/the-daily/archives/2017/01/17/how-texas-overburdened-foster-care-system-has-produced-a-generation-of-lost-adults>

Judge properly moved teen into adult system to protect him Posted: Jan 18, 2017 12:04 PM CST Updated: Jan 18, 2017 12:06 PM CST Jason Morrison/FreeImages.com Jason Morrison/FreeImages.com News Data Wisconsin Traffic Fatalities Map Madison Crime Map MADISON, Wis. - The state appeals court said a judge properly moved a teen offender into the adult system after saying he thought the boy would be safer there than in the state's troubled youth prison. The teen was accused of sexually assaulting a fifth-grader. Prosecutors asked Racine County Circuit Judge John S. Jude to waive him into adult court, citing the "cloud over Lincoln Hills" and newspaper articles detailing problems there. Federal investigators are probing allegations that the youth prison's staff abused inmates. Jude said he believed the teen would be safer in the adult system. The teen argued Jude improperly considered news coverage and out-of-court information about Lincoln Hills. The 2nd District Court of Appeals ruled Wednesday that the evidence supported waiver into the adult system. Source: <http://www.channel3000.com/news/judge-properly-moved-teen-into-adult-system-to-protect-him/276665798>

Redwood City: Youth counselor arrested for alleged sex with teen client By Robert Salonga | rsalonga@bayareanewsgroup.com | PUBLISHED: January 19, 2017 at 11:38 am | UPDATED: January 19, 2017 at 2:44 pm REDWOOD CITY — A youth counselor has been arrested on suspicion of having a sexual relationship with a teen client while working at a Redwood City group home last summer, according to the San Mateo County Sheriff's Office. When he was arrested last week, he was still working as a youth counselor, at another group home in San Jose. Francis Caceres, 28, of Mountain View, was arrested Jan. 12, 2017 on suspicion of having a sexual relationship with a teen client while working as a youth counselor at a Redwood City group home in the summer of 2016. Francis Caceres, 28, of Mountain View, was arrested Jan. 12 and has been charged with one count each of a lewd act with a child 14 or 15 years old with at least a 10-year difference in age, and unlawful sexual intercourse with a victim under 16 years old while being over 21 years old. He is being held in the Maguire Correctional Facility on $200,000 bail. In late December, San Mateo County's Child Protective Services contacted the Sheriff's Office to report an illicit relationship involving a 15-year-old female victim. Caceres was alleged to have met the girl in July, when she was staying at Your House South in Redwood City, where Caceres was a youth counselor. By the time detectives launched an investigation, Caceres had already been fired by the group home, though the exact reason has not been specified. They found evidence that he and the girl had sex at an undisclosed location away from the home, the Sheriff's Office said. When detectives gathered enough information to make an arrest, Caceres was working as a youth counselor at Tayler Group Home in San Jose. Because the investigation did not begin until several months after the alleged acts, it is unlikely that they would have surfaced in a background check. When reached by phone, the director of the San Jose group home declined to comment on the case. Investigators are exploring the possibility that other victims may be connected to Caceres. Anyone with information authorities can contact Detective Joe Cang at 650-259-2417 or at jcang@smcgov.org, or leave an anonymous tip at 800-547-2700. Source: <http://www.mercurynews.com/2017/01/19/redwood-city-youth-counselor-arrested-for-alleged-sex-with-teen-client/>

DHEC cites child treatment facility in Florence for violations An autistic 20-year-old with the mind of a child, pictured before losing 40 pounds while in the care of a facility in Florence. Photo provided to the Greenville News i Tim Smith - The Greenville News tcsmith@greenvillenews.com COLUMBIA, SC State officials have cited a residential treatment facility for children with 19 violations including abuse, understaffing, and not controlling youth who bit and attacked each other more than a dozen times last year, according to documents obtained by The Greenville News. The state Department of Health and Environmental Control also cited the facility for insufficient snacks and menu problems, for failing to adequately watch over the children and for maintenance issues. DHEC, which licenses Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health in Florence, issued the citations in the wake of allegations reported by The Greenville News in December and earlier this month. Adrianna Bradley, a spokeswoman for DHEC, said the violations were found after three visits of the facility on Dec. 13, Dec. 28 and Jan. 5. She said the facility remains under investigation and must submit plans of correction for each of the violations. According to DHEC regulations, violations can result in monetary penalties ranging from several hundred dollars to several thousand dollars, depending on the classification of the violation and whether it is a repeat offense. Halle Mechling, business development director for Palmetto Pee Dee, submitted a statement on behalf of the facility saying it strives to "maximize the safety of our patients." "Like all healthcare providers we are subject to unannounced inspections," the statement read. "The facility takes all feedback we receive seriously and constantly explores how we can improve the services we deliver. "We are certainly mindful that over the course of treating more than 100 patients annually, irregular and unpredictable events can occur. In each of these situations, including the recent DHEC inspections, the facility works to learn from these incidents and enhance the quality of our care, if applicable." The News earlier this month reported that current and former workers at the facility alleged that children at the facility have been hurt after altercations with staff, were given inadequate food and programming, and the facility often has been short-staffed. Workers also said the aging facility has suffered a host of maintenance problems, including broken laundry equipment, malfunctioning showers and mold. Training has been inadequate, workers have been forced to work 16-hour shifts, staph infections and scabies have been found at the facility, and children there have been subjected to verbal abuse by staff, the concerned workers told the newspaper. Those allegations came after DHEC confirmed it was looking into complaints by a Columbia mother that her autistic child had lost excessive weight at the facility and had been bitten repeatedly while there, with one of the wounds becoming infected, The News reported Dec. 12. Workers allege a host of problems at children's facility The first of the investigation results released this week dealt with those allegations. The findings do not name any resident, parent or staff member, but the summary appeared to mirror the Columbia mother's allegations that her son's weight had dropped from 132 pounds to 96 pounds and that he had been bitten four to five times by other residents during the past four months. Among the investigation's findings was that a diet order for the resident was not available for review. The facility's administrator told DHEC the resident's diet was not addressed upon admission. The mother told the newspaper that at one point she provided a list of food her son would eat and pestered the staff to buy peanut butter. DHEC reported 14 incidents in which the resident was attacked and injured by other residents. "These injuries included kicking, punching, and biting and occurred during each of the three shifts," the agency's report stated. "The Administrator stated that the clients in Resident A's unit need more care/supervision and are less independent than other units. However, all units are staffed the same, regardless of the condition of the residents." The DHEC report noted a number of the incidents, including a body audit of the adolescent on Oct. 8 that observed five bite marks on the youth's back but offered no explanation for how they got there. On Oct. 30, DHEC reported, a bite mark on an arm was observed after he was bitten by another resident. Later that night, staff reported bite marks on his back after being bitten by a roommate, according to DHEC. On Nov. 21, the youth was bitten in the upper shoulder/upper back while in class, DHEC reported. The next day, DHEC reported, he was bitten on the left hand by another resident while in group. There were 23 other children or adolescents on the same unit as the resident who was repeatedly attacked, according to DHEC, and others on the unit also had been attacked or had attacked others. Some, the agency said, were "out of control," according to staff. "The facility did not staff sufficiently to provide supervision for all residents as determined by the condition of the residents," the agency concluded. Using staff log sheets, DHEC cited certain dates and shifts in which it said staff was insufficient for the unit, including one shift during which only two staff were present. Documentation for another shift, DHEC found, was "unavailable for review." The investigation also found multiple violations with the resident's individual treatment plan, which it found lacked descriptions of the resident's nutritional needs, social and recreational activities and visits by health care providers. DHEC noted that the resident's weight dropped to 99 pounds and his nutritional needs had not been coordinated even though the facility had documented his weight loss. According to the mother of the autistic youth, her son was placed in Palmetto Pee Dee by the Lexington-Richland Disabilities and Special Needs Board. The agency previously said it could not comment on individual cases due to federal health privacy laws. Altogether, DHEC cited the facility for 10 violations, including two Class 1 violations, the most serious type. According to DHEC's website, Class 1 violations "present an imminent danger to the health, safety, or well-being of the persons in the facility." Liane Hughes Turner, the mother of the autistic boy who first called attention to the facility over her son's weight loss and bites, said what has happened at the facility is "just so sad." "Management is allowing this to happen," she said. "That's where the fix needs to start." She said she is "counting the days" until her son is moved from the facility, though she said the facility now appears to be doing better at caring for him. She suggested DHEC conduct more unannounced visits and follow-up with their findings to be sure planned corrections are implemented. The second investigation, in December, looked at 11 allegations, citing the facility for six of them. It again cited the facility for understaffing as well as for violating a facility policy of having residents within sight or sound observation of staff and conducting welfare checks of residents no more than every 15 minutes. It noted one case in which a resident had attempted suicide, having been found on the floor, blue in the face with a shirt tied around their neck. It also cited the facility for a case of abuse in which a resident said they were physically abused by a female staff member on Nov. 25 after calling the resident "stupid." DHEC reported that, "Resident then stated that 'Staff Member A got into my face and I pushed her and that's when she punched me in the face, grab my hair and hit my head on the rail.' There were two witnesses present that separated the staff from the resident." The facility was cited over menu or snack issues, including snacks that were "not suitable for the residents," including one snack offering that consisted of just saltines. The facility also was cited for a number of maintenance issues, including missing faucet knobs, a hole in the wall, malfunctioning fire doors, brown stains on the ceiling, dead insects and dust. DHEC could not verify allegations of a staff member choking a resident, of marijuana found at the facility, of a lack of hygiene products or of the presence then of mold or a staph infection. The report said it could find no documentation of the choking incident and that it found storage containers with adequate hygiene supplies. Staff said they did not know anything of a staph infection, according to the report, and DHEC found no mold in the facility. Workers previously told The News that the mold was sometimes painted over. Some workers told the newspaper that they bought hygiene items themselves to help the children because such products were either in short supply or were locked up. An investigation on Jan. 5 again cited the facility for understaffing, finding a staff of two on one unit's shift and four on another unit's shift that dwindled to one by the end of the shift after workers left. Four of the 19 violations were repeat instances, DHEC reported. "Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health strives to continually improve our quality of care and maximize the safety of our patients," the facility said in its statement. "The facility is licensed by the State of South Carolina Department of Health and Environmental Control (DHEC) and fully accredited by The Joint Commission, whose rigorous accreditation and clinical quality assessment protocols are widely respected throughout the healthcare industry. We also operate a robust quality improvement program." Mechling said in her response earlier this month that the workers' allegations were "dubious" and said in a statement to the newspaper that the residents' care was the company's highest priority. Children there are referred from a variety of sources, including local disabilities boards, although the center is not a qualified provider of the state Department of Disabilities and Special Needs, and it does not oversee its care. Palmetto Pee Dee is owned by Universal Health Services, the largest facility-based behavioral health provider in the nation, with more than 230 facilities in 37 states, according to its website. UHS facilities, according to its website, outperformed the industry in 2015 in Joint Commission surveys and many were recognized as "Top Performers" in key metrics. Mechling said federal regulations prohibit facility officials from discussing details of the care and treatment of any individual. Source: <http://www.thestate.com/news/state/south-carolina/article127374639.html>

Months after teen dies in Wordsworth treatment home, CEO quietly leaves her job Updated: January 20, 2017 — 6:25 PM EST 9Share Tweet Tumblr Email REPRINTS Popular Stories Philly march doubled expected size, D.C. rerouted for huge crowd: Live blog replay about 1 hour ago Delaware River Bridge closed after crack in steel truss is found about 2 hours ago Avi Steinhardt In addition to the now-shuttered treatment facility, Wordsworth offers educational programs, mental health services and foster care and does case-management work for the city Department of Health and Human Services. by Nancy Phillips, Staff Writer @PhillipsNancy Email @PhillipsNancy 215-854-2254 Nancy Phillips Staff Writer More by Nancy Phillips Months after teen dies in Wordsworth treatment home, CEO quietly leaves her job Jan 20 More from Nancy Phillips The president and chief executive officer of Wordsworth, a residential treatment center for troubled young people, has quietly left her post, months after a child died in the care of the West Philadelphia facility and the state ordered it closed. Debra Lacks, who led the agency for eight years, was replaced by Diana Ramsay, who was named interim CEO, Wordsworth officials said Friday. Lacks' departure comes three months after a 17-year-old boy died in a fight with staffers who accused him of stealing an iPod. And it follows the December arrest of a former staffer who is charged with sexually assaulting three girls in the program. In a terse three-paragraph statement, Wordsworth welcomed Ramsay and made no mention of Lacks or the turmoil that has engulfed the program in recent months. "Debbie is no longer with Wordsworth," said Stephanie Shell, the agency's director of organizational advancement. "She's just no longer with Wordsworth," said board chairman Tom Johnson. "That's all I can really say at this moment." Efforts to reach Lacks were unsuccessful Friday. Ramsay, the interim leader, is a former president and CEO of Woods, a Langhorne-based program for people with behavioral and intellectual disabilities. She could not be reached for comment Friday. In addition to the now-shuttered treatment facility, Wordsworth offers educational programs, mental health services, and foster care, and does case-management work for the city Department of Human Services. The state Department of Human Services ordered the residential program closed in late October, saying conditions posed "a serious danger to the health and safety of residents." The closure followed the Oct. 13 death of David Hess, 17, of Lebanon, Pa. Hess died after a clash with staffers who went to his room in search of a stolen iPod. Video captured one staffer pushing and shoving Hess in a hallway while escorting him to his room shortly after 8 p.m. In the confrontation that followed, three staffers flipped over his bed and tossed furniture around, according to a report by the state DHS. Hess grew agitated, the report said, and three staffers attempted to restrain him. One held his legs as another punched him repeatedly in the ribs, according to the report. Soon after, the report said, Hess began gasping for breath, saying, "Get off me, I can't breathe." Then, it said, the room fell silent. No one has been charged in connection with his death, which is under investigation by Philadelphia police, the city Medical Examiner's Office, and DHS. James Garrow, a spokesman for the Medical Examiner's Office, said Friday that a report on the cause and manner of death was not yet complete. Officials with the city Department of Human Services have declined to comment on Hess' death while the investigations are underway. In a statement Friday, a spokeswoman for DHS Commissioner Cynthia Figueroa said she supported Wordsworth's leadership and had spoken to Ramsay to offer support. Before ordering the facility to shut down, state officials had repeatedly cited Wordsworth for unsafe building conditions, lapses in training, and instances of improper restraints. Earlier this year, it ordered Wordsworth to step up security and surveillance in the building after the three girls reported that they had been sexually assaulted by staffer Isaac Outten. Outten, 37, is charged with institutional sexual assault, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, corruption of minors, and other crimes. Police say he repeatedly had sex with three girls in the program, ages 15 to 17, luring them to the basement for sex and forcing them to take naked selfies with his iPhone. Source: <http://www.philly.com/philly/news/Wordsworth-teen-dies-treatment-home-CEO-leaves.html>

Madison Township group home license to be revoked after manager charged with patient abuse Megan Hickey 11:16 PM, Jan 20, 2017 12:02 AM, Jan 21, 2017 Share Article x Can 'Raindrop Procedure' make reading glasses a thing of the past? Madison Twp group home license to be revoked after manager charged with patient abuse Copyright 2016 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Madison Twp group home license to be revoked after manager charged with patient abuse MADISON TWP, Ohio - The Madison Township assisted living facility at the center of patient abuse allegations is in the process of having its license revoked, according to written records provided by The Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services. Hubbard Road Meadows Administrator Alice Ramsey, 54, was arrested and charged with patient abuse on Jan. 13, stemming from a Jan. 3 report of abuse that allegedly sent an 85-year-old patient to the hospital. According to letter provided by the Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services, on Jan. 3, Ramsey "abused a resident resulting in that resident's hospitalization. Adult Protective Services filed a complaint on Jan. 5. According to the letter, staff heard banging in the resident's room. And when staff entered the room the resident "was found to have her head wedged in a nightstand." According to the report, Ramsey also "verbally abused residents by yelling at them." The Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services notified Owner Marvin Bruno of plans to revoke the facility's license in a letter dated Jan. 17. In addition to patient abuse, the letter also cited a failure to before adequate background checks on employees, facility violations, failure to list food allergies, dietary requirements and medical and mental health diagnosis, multiple occurrences of patient falls and the failure to provide documentation of training requirements. Madison Township Police told News 5 that the case then took a tragic turn when the victim died on Jan. 17. "Depending on the outcome of the autopsy there absolutely could be further charges coming out," Patrolman Ron Hess told News 5. Since the charges were made public, Hess said multiple current and former employees as well as family members of patients came forward with similar allegations of abuse committed by Ramsey. News 5 spoke with one of the former employees who said she witnessed Ramsey "slap and hit" patients on several occasions. "She was physically and verbally abusive," the employee, who asked not to be named, said. She said she made multiple attempts to alert the facility's owner but nothing changed. "I would come home bawling my eyes out and I didn't know what else I could do," she said. Attempts to contact the owner on Friday were not successful. Ramsey's preliminary hearing is set for January 30 in Painesville Municipal Court.

Madison Township police are requesting that anyone else with information related to this case contact Detective Tim Doyle at 440-428-2115. Source: <http://www.newsnet5.com/news/local-news/oh-lake/madison-twp-group-home-license-to-be-revoked-after-manager-charged-with-patient-abuse>

Ex-foster parent accused of abuse arrested Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Saturday, January 21, 2017 11:00 pm Ex-foster parent accused of abuse arrested By Duane Barbati Alamogordo Daily News The Santa Fe New Mexican ALAMOGORDO — A 41-year-old former foster care parent was arrested Tuesday after Alamogordo Police Department detectives learned the man allegedly sexually abused a 7-year-old girl in his care, an APD spokesman said. Deputy Police Chief Roger Schoolcraft said Jason Goodman is charged with one count of first-degree felony criminal sexual penetration of a minor under 13 years of age, three counts of second-degree felony sexual contact of a minor under 13 years of age and one count of fourth-degree felony contributing to the delinquency of a minor. Goodman was jailed at the Otero County Detention Center on a $25,000 no-10 percent bond pending his appearance in court. Schoolcraft said on Nov. 4, 2016 Alamogordo detectives received a New Mexico Children, Youth and Families Department intake report regarding the suspected sexual abuse of the girl. He said after detectives received the report, they conducted a lengthy investigation into the suspected sexual abuse allegations. As a result of the investigation, detectives obtained a court warrant for Goodman's arrest, Schoolcraft said. According to court records, the girl had been placed in Goodman's care between March 29, 2016 and May 19, 2016. Goodman allegedly told investigators that he became a foster parent about a year and a half or two years ago, but he quit being a foster parent, according to court records obtained by the Daily News. According to records, investigators learned through two safe house interviews with the girl that Goodman allegedly had the girl massage his feet then he moved the girl's hand up to his private area. During interviews with the girl, investigators learned the abuse occurred between March 2016 and May 2016, records show. The girl allegedly told investigators that Goodman also allegedly molested the girl while they were in his bedroom, according to records. According to court records, the girl told investigators Goodman did yucky things to her almost every night that she was staying at the home. During a safe house interview, the girl allegedly told investigators that she prayed "Dear heavenly father please let me have this nightmare over" while she was staying at the home, according to records. According to records, the girl was moved to another foster home then told her treatment foster mother about the alleged abuse in November 2016. Schoolcraft said he believes CYFD and APD detectives were very thorough in their investigation of the case. "Based on what they learned from the victim, there was enough probable cause to draft an arrest warrant for Mr. Goodman," he said. Source: http://www.santafenewmexican.com/news/ex-foster-parent-accused-of-abuse-arrested/article_37b8d41a-b885-50dc-85dc-0b03dfb6e99b.html

State says Maple Leaf violated policy, workers allege hostile environment Jan. 24, 2017, 11:56 am by Morgan True 2 Comments Maple Leaf Farm Executive Director Catey Iacuzzi testifies in the Senate Health and Welfare Committee earlier this month. Photo by Elizabeth Hewitt/VTdigger UNDERHILL — A report from the state Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program says unlicensed and uncertified staff at Maple Leaf Treatment Center were providing clinical services in violation of state policy. The report released Monday found at least one instance in which a patient who had been under treatment for addiction for five days and hadn't yet been given a treatment plan. In addition, unlicensed staff provided billable hours in violation of state policy, and clinical notes written by unlicensed staff were not reviewed by licensed counselor or doctor, according to the report. On Jan. 15, Maple Leaf was forced to temporarily close due to a large number of vacancies. The inpatient treatment facility is expected to reopen in mid-February if the facility can address staffing deficiencies. Current and former employees say those vacancies are directly related to a hostile work environment. The company, Maple Leaf Treatment Associates, Inc., runs a separate outpatient drug rehabilitation program in Colchester that will continue to operate. Maple Leaf staff was told in early January that during the closure they will be involved in training and projects to improve the facility. Employees will continue to be paid during the temporary closure, company officials say. The Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program forwarded complaints to the Division of Licensure and Protection, which licenses health care facilities. Those complaints, which are not public, triggered the division's "immediate jeopardy standard," meaning they suggested clients were in danger. The Division of Licensure and Protection investigation report was completed Jan. 12 and is expected to be released this week once Maple Leaf has submitted a plan to correct findings in the report, according to Suzanne Leavitt, the assistant director of the division. Leavitt said if Maple Leaf isn't able to correct problems identified in the Division of Licensure and Protection report, the facility could lose its certification and close permanently. She said she's not aware of any facility that has remained open without state certification. Maple Leaf, with 41 inpatient drug treatment beds, accounts for 30 percent of the inpatient beds at treatment centers in Vermont. The Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program has accepted a separate plan from Maple Leaf to increase staffing and reopen after a 30-day closure. Ken Liatsos, the company spokesman, said in a Monday statement that Maple Leaf "has been working diligently and transparently with various Vermont state agencies to ensure that we provide our clients with the best standard of care available." "We are taking, and will take, all appropriate actions to correct any deficiencies," Liatsos said. Maple Leaf CEO Catey Iacuzzi has said staff departures were part of the normal churn faced by drug rehabilitation programs, many of which struggle to retain a qualified workforce. However, five current and former employees told VTdigger that the turnover at Maple Leaf is the result of a hostile work environment. The workers said there was a previous wave of departures from Maple Leaf in June and July, shortly after Dr. Charles Sprague Simonds was hired as clinical director in May. More than two dozen employees have quit in the last six to eight months, they said. The workers, who asked not to be identified for fear of retaliation, said Simonds repeatedly made comments about female clients bodies and made several female staff so uncomfortable that they quit. Iacuzzi has been unwilling to address with Simonds' behavior, they said. In a joint statement on Jan. 9, Iacuzzi and the Maple Leaf Board of directors said they are "aware of these allegations and take them very seriously. Maple Leaf Treatment Center management, under the oversight of the Board of Directors, is investigating all aspects of this situation, and will take appropriate action swiftly pending the results." Maple Leaf's attorney, Thomas Somers, issued a statement in response to a request to interview Simonds. "Certain false and defamatory allegations have been made against Dr. Simonds by anonymous individuals concerning personnel matters at Maple Leaf Treatment Center," Somers wrote. "State agency investigations into Dr. Simonds' conduct have been closed with the finding that the allegations were not substantiated based on the information gathered during the investigations." "Internal Maple Leaf Treatment Center investigations have reached similar conclusions. These allegations against Dr. Simonds have no basis in fact," the statement concludes. Maple Leaf Farm Treatment Center in Underhill. Somers would not say what state agencies he was referring to, or what documentation or evidence there is that the claims made by current and former employees are false and defamatory. Neither the ADAP or DLP investigation reports had been provided to Maple Leaf on Jan. 11 when Somers delivered his statement, according to both agencies. Simonds is a licensed psychologist, and his license is issued and regulated by the Office of Professional Regulation. Officials there said they can't confirm a pending investigation, but currently no action has been taken against Simonds license. OPR has its own prosecuting attorneys and their investigations only become public once charges are brought against a licensee. Simonds was arrested in Cape Elizabeth, Maine, in 2010 and charged with domestic violence assault. Court records show the case was resolved only after Simonds agreed to stay away from his alleged victim and undergo "psychological counseling." The charges were dismissed in 2012. In addition, a former case manager said he was directed to refer clients from Maple Leaf's inpatient program to the company's outpatient program, regardless of whether the person had a different preference or if there was a more convenient location for them to receive those services. The manager said they quit, in part, because they believed the arrangement was unethical. They said they were told to keep referrals in house because Maple Leaf's outpatient program, which opened last summer, was losing money. Inpatient treatment is typically for people with addiction who need time to detox with medical or mental health support services. Outpatient treatment involves regular visits for medication and counseling. Source: <https://vtdigger.org/2017/01/24/state-says-maple-leaf-violated-policy-workers-allege-hostile-environment/>

Child deaths, hundreds of police calls from youth group home prompt discussion at City Council MIKE SIMONS/Tulsa World file Buy this photo Posted: Tuesday, January 24, 2017 12:00 am | Updated: 3:20 pm, Tue Jan 24, 2017. Child deaths, hundreds of police calls from youth group home prompt discussion at City Council By Harrison Grimwood Tulsa World TulsaWorld.com | 2 comments Two city councilors are pushing for a discussion after finding that nearly 400 police calls over three years came from a Tulsa group home where authorities recorded a second runaway child death in less than four years from the facility. Councilors Jeannie Cue and Karen Gilbert are seeking the talk "regarding the number of emergency calls to state supported 'group homes,'" according to a Wednesday agenda posted for the Public Works Committee. Gilbert said they are not trying to single out a single facility, but the only group home in the city is Realations Community Services of Oklahoma, according to the state Office of Juvenile System Oversight. "If we have police officers responding to 90 calls in less than six months, then why are we (the city) not putting policies and procedures in place to protect these kids?" Gilbert said. Police responded to 158 calls for service in 2016, 115 calls in 2015 and 119 calls in 2014 at that group home, according to Tulsa Police Department records. About 53 percent of those calls for all three years were for runaways or missing persons. The next most frequent call types — canceled calls and disturbances — made up about 10 percent and 6 percent of the calls for service, according to police records. “The biggest concern is the last person who died on U.S. 75 ... he was from that home,” Cue told the Tulsa World. Chase Dakota Bridges, 11, was killed Dec. 28 attempting to cross a section of Interstate 244 in west Tulsa sometimes referred to as U.S. 75. A 2010 Subaru hit Bridges at about 6 p.m. that day on the highway near 31st Street. Chase was a resident of Realations — a group home for abused and neglected children who cannot be placed in foster care. Chase had walked away from the facility earlier in the day, according to a previous story. Another resident from the group home, Christopher Seaton, 11, was killed in April 2013 while attempting to cross Interstate 44. Cue also referenced Tulsa residents’ concerns about burglaries and larcenies in the area of Realations, located on the 2000 block of West Skelly Drive. “We’re hoping they (the Department of Human Services) will look at the facility to see if that facility is the proper place for these kids,” Cue said. “If we’ve had two foster children die from auto-pedestrian accidents, are they being properly supervised?” Cue and Gilbert are initiating the discussion about the group home between Tulsa police and the Working in Neighborhoods department. It is scheduled to take place during the 2:30 p.m. Wednesday committee meeting at Room 411 at One Technology Center, located at 175 E. Second St. “That’s what I want to get down to: what can we do to help the group homes keep the children safe?” Gilbert said. “As a city, what role can we play?” Gilbert said she hopes Wednesday’s discussion can lay out what the city and its departments can do to address the safety of the children and the community. Mark Jackson, owner of Realations, said Monday morning he was unaware that his group home was scheduled to be discussed by the City Council. Since Chase’s death, Jackson said Realations assigned an additional staff member to patrol the grounds between 3 p.m. and 6 p.m. He said that time frame was the busiest for residents leaving the facility. In a previous interview, Jackson said Chase had walked away the day of his death about 3 p.m. “We’re not a detention center, we’re not a prison,” Jackson said. “We can’t physically stop them from going AWOL.” Part of Realations’ protocol for a runaway is to notify police. Many of the runaway reports are residents who repeatedly leave the facility, Jackson said. Jackson said he is looking to relocate the facility into the country for many reasons, including the two deaths. His company made an offer last Friday on a 100-acre piece of property in Osage County, he said. “Our kids, with what they’ve been through in their lives, have a lot of noise in their heads,” Jackson said in a previous interview. “And I think the rural setting would help to quiet that.” The Osage County property is, “as the crow flies,” about 10 miles from downtown Tulsa, he said. The Department of Human Services’ primary goal in placing youth in a Level D-plus group home such as Realations “is to help youth cope with and control” emotional, behavioral disorders or problems the youth might have through counseling and treatment, DHS spokeswoman Sheree Powell said. Powell stated that Level D-plus facilities are paid a fixed rate of $134 per day per bed. According to DHS records, two facilities fall under the Realations umbrella, totaling 32 beds. Powell, in a previous statement to the Tulsa World, said the DHS Office of Client Accountability is “investigating the circumstances of this child leaving the group home to establish whether or not the facility followed protocols designed to prevent the child from running away short of locking children down, which we cannot do by state and federal requirements.” Harrison Grimwood 918-581-8369 harrison.grimwood@tulsaworld.com Twitter: @grimwood_hmg Source: http://www.tulsaworld.com/news/local/child-deaths-hundreds-of-police-calls-from-youth-group-home/article_1136117f-5868-56e8-97df-c1abee8e8d47.html

Lincoln Hills inmate: Guards 'treat the kids there like dogs' MOLLY BECK mbeck@madison.com Molly Beck | Wisconsin State Journal 15 hrs ago 8 Buy Now MOLLY BECK, STATE JOURNAL An inmate at the Lincoln Hills School for Boys juvenile facility, pictured here on Dec. 16, alleges in a column published in the Guardian US he and other inmates were treated like “dogs” by guards at the state’s youth prison. prev next Inmates at the state’s youth prison are routinely placed in solitary confinement for minor offenses, a current inmate and a plaintiff in a lawsuit against the state alleges in a column published Wednesday. “Being in solitary messes you up: you can’t sleep, you feel anxious, and the longer you are there the angrier it makes you feel. I mean, you try sleeping with the light on 24 hours a day, or having to distract yourself in a small, dirty, smelly space,” the inmate listed as “J.J.” wrote in a column published in the Guardian U.S. “And they give you 30 or 60 days in solitary for whatever – disrespecting staff, running, not even stuff that hurts other people.” A Department of Corrections spokesman declined to comment because of the pending litigation. A spokesman for Gov. Scott Walker did not respond to a request for comment. The inmate, who wrote he has been at Lincoln Hills for about two years, is one of four plaintiffs in a lawsuit brought by the ACLU this week against the state DOC for alleged violations of inmates’ constitutional rights, including the right to live free from cruel and unusual punishment. A former Lincoln Hills guard disputes the inmate’s claims, which appear in the lawsuit. “There are very few incidents other than fighting or battery for which a youth may be sent to security,” said Doug Curtis, who retired in October after 20 years. The two buildings at the prison’s campus with solitary cells are known as “security cottages.” Curtis rejected describing the cells as “solitary confinement.” He said the inmates are removed from the cells frequently and contribute to a negative atmosphere in the security cottages. “Frequently they plug their toilets and flood both their rooms and the halls. They smear feces, cover their cameras, cover their door windows, pound and kick their doors, scream (obscenities) and do everything they can to disrupt the security building,” Curtis said. “Their pounding and noise can be heard hundreds of yards away.” The inmate wrote in the column he was first sent to the Irma facility when he was 15 after getting “in trouble with the law,” but did not say what crime he committed. “I didn’t know they’d be sending me four hours away to Irma, Wisconsin, where I would be surrounded by guards who treat the kids there like dogs,” the inmate wrote, adding he also saw guards beating kids and that he has been sent to the prison’s solitary confinement cells about 10 times. “I’ve spent most of my time at Lincoln Hills in solitary confinement,” the inmate wrote. “Honestly, I feel like the guards intentionally provoke kids to get them to react so they can put them there and not have to worry about them.” But Curtis disputed the inmates’ characterization of the treatment of inmates by guards. Curtis said in an interview Wednesday that the inmates are not routinely kept in the security cottages’ cells for all but one hour out of a day. Like this story? Get local news sent to your inbox I understand and agree that registration on or use of this site constitutes agreement to its user agreement and privacy policy. “It’s determined by the kid’s behavior,” Curtis said of how long stays are. “If they are still wild and combative, well then they’re going to stay there until they calm down. ... If they’re threatening everyone in the world, then we don’t really feel confident in sending them back to their cottage to beat up everyone in there.” The ACLU lawsuit also focuses on the staff’s use of pepper spray. The inmate wrote he has been sprayed five or six times. “One time, I wasn’t cooperating when they tried to take me to solitary, so they pepper-sprayed me,” he wrote. “They do that to a lot of kids, even for nonviolent stuff like refusing a staff order. ... Sometimes they spray it into the cell, sometimes they spray it right into your face. It makes you temporarily blind and hurts really bad.” Curtis said pepper spray is used as a “last resort” and that guards make decisions in response to inmates’ behavior. The ACLU lawsuit comes after two years of state and federal authorities investigating allegations ranging from child abuse to sexual assault to official misconduct at the facility. Source: http://host.madison.com/wsj/news/local/govt-and-politics/lincoln-hills-inmate-guards-treat-the-kids-there-like-dogs/article_7633cdc3-99af-5ded-93f4-5add40dfba77.html

Missouri Valley resident sentenced for sex trafficking minors Jan 26, 2017 Updated Jan 26, 2017 0 Courtesy Pottawattamie County Jail John F. Thomsen prev next On Wednesday, Jan. 25, John F. Thomsen, a 47-year-old resident of Missouri Valley, was sentenced by Chief United States District Court Judge John A. Jarvey to 235 months in prison for coercion and enticement of a minor for sex and for transporting a minor with intent to engage in sexual activity, announced United States Attorney Kevin E. VanderSchel. Thomsen will be required to serve 15 years of supervised release after his prison term. Thomsen pleaded guilty to the two counts on Sept. 1, 2016. The guilty pleas and sentencing were the result of an investigation into the transportation of minor females from Arkansas to Missouri Valley so the minors could engage in sexual acts. The investigation showed Thomsen had met a 14-year-old female while working at a group home in Arkansas. After leaving his group home employment, Thomsen used social media to keep in contact with the minor female and convince her to live with him, and his wife, Trudy Thomsen, in Missouri Valley. The Thomsens traveled to Arkansas and drove the minor to Missouri Valley, where the Thomsens engaged in various sexual acts with the girl. After the minor was returned to the group home, John Thomsen again contacted her via social media and arranged to have her, and a second minor female, transported back to Missouri Valley for sexual activities. Co-defendant Trudy Thomsen is pending sentencing in the Southern District of Iowa. This investigation was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation Child Exploitation Task Force, Arkansas State Police, Missouri Valley Police Department, Council Bluffs Police Department, Omaha Police Department, La Vista Police Department, and the Harrison County Attorney’s Office. The case was prosecuted by the United States Attorney’s Office for the Southern District of Iowa. Source: http://www.enterprisepub.com/movalley/news/missouri-valley-resident-sentenced-for-sex-trafficking-minors/article_3d830d02-e418-11e6-bb06-07d11a3624ac.html

UPDATED: Alleged rapes occurred at Lakes Homes group homes in DL — Administrator says all employees undergo state background checks | Detroit Lakes Online UPDATED: Alleged rapes occurred at Lakes Homes group homes in DL — Administrator says all employees undergo state background checks By Paula Quam and Nathan Bowe Today at 3:09 p.m. AddThis Sharing Buttons Share to FacebookShare to TwitterShare to RedditShare to EmailShare to Copy Link The administrator of Lakes Homes and Program Development, which operates a number of homes for developmentally disabled people in the region, says

all employees are subjected to background checks prior to being hired. That includes two former employees, each accused of raping a vulnerable woman, in incidents that allegedly occurred at two different Lakes Homes group homes in Detroit Lakes. The two men are Jallah Sallah Kollie of West Fargo and Varfee Kamara of Fargo. Both face felony rapes charges in Becker County District Court. "We had done a background study prior to their employment and they passed the background study," said Lakes Homes Executive Director Tom Reiffenberger. "We had no information to believe there was an issue with them." Varfee had worked for Lakes Homes only a few months, and Kollie for less than a year, he said. Reiffenberger said an earlier version of this story, posted on the Detroit Lakes Online website, incorrectly stated that Lakes Homes failed to do background checks on employees. It's true that Lakes Homes had been cited once by the Minnesota Department of Human Services, which regulates group homes, for not running a background check on an employee, but that incident did not involve Kollie or Kamara, he said. Rather it involved an employee who got married, changed their name, and failed to undergo a new background check under the new name. A background check is required by the state for all group home applicants, and the state conducts the study, then provides the results to the group home operator prior to an applicant being hired, Reiffenberger said. On Jan. 6, DHS issued its findings to Reiffenberger, that stated the company "did not comply with background study requirements" in that case as is required by state law. Lakes Homes is being fined $200 for the violation. According to the investigation memorandum filed by the Minnesota Department of Human Services, one of the alleged rapes happened at a Lakes Home group home at 920 Summit Ave. The employee in question, Jallah Sallah Kollie, 39, of 219 Second Ave. W., West Fargo, was charged in Becker County District Court with felony counts of first- and third-degree criminal sexual conduct — victim mentally impaired. He remains in the Todd County Jail. Authorities responded to the group home on Sept. 13 after another employee reported walking in on Kollie and the victim, who was naked, in the bathroom. According to the DHS report, the victim is a vulnerable adult who has a "lack of understanding of sexuality" but is somebody "who does not need assistance in personal hygiene care." The report states that when the other employee saw blood on the victim's buttocks, they told Kollie to leave and began questioning the victim on what had happened. The victim explained in graphic, childlike detail of an assault that involved raping several parts of her body and that after she told him to "get out of here", Kollie told her to "shut up" and just "be touched". Kollie denied having any sexual contact with the victim, but authorities say a sexual assault kit administered at the hospital points to him. The location of the second alleged rape was at 405 E. North Street in Detroit Lakes, which is a group home also run by Lakes Homes and Program Development. The alleged victim in the case resided at "The Willow Home" at the time, but was part of a cleaning crew with the suspect, Varfee Kamara, 30, of 2602 18th St. S., Fargo. He has been charged in Becker County District Court with felony counts of first- and third-degree criminal sexual conduct — victim mentally impaired. This incident reportedly occurred June 17 when, according to the the complaint filed in Becker County District Court, he allegedly followed the mentally impaired woman into a bathroom at the group home and sexually assaulted her. The DHS report in this cases stated the vulnerable adult was "likely to seek or cooperate in an abusive situation" and that she had a history of past sexual abuse. The report indicated that both the victim and Kamara testified that the vulnerable adult instigated the sexual situation, but it also states staff is prohibited from any sexual contact with residents. Kamara denied any contact with the woman, but a sexual assault kit allegedly pointed to him as the perpetrator. Kamara was in trouble with the law at least three times after the date of the alleged rape. He was arrested by a Hawley police officer after being clocked driving over 100 mph west on Highway 10. He was arrested in Fargo with a group of other men caught stealing from parked cars, and he was wanted for "criminal conspiracy" in the Fargo-Moorhead area, according to Valley News Live. Reiffenberger said the two accused men do not represent the excellent employees at Lakes Homes. "We believe we do a very good service, we try hard and we have very good employees," Reiffenberger said. "We do a very good job with training ... it's a bad situation and we understand that, but that's not what Lakes Homes is all about." Marked history This isn't the first time Lakes Homes and Program Development has been in the news. According to a story filed by MPR News, a state investigation into the death of a vulnerable adult in Detroit Lakes found that the facility, Lakes Homes, failed to perform CPR when staff found the resident unresponsive in March of 2016. The MPR report states that in an interview with management, the staff said one of them told the other not to perform CPR because the vulnerable adult was already "not alive" and was "already gone." He was not deceased at that point, however - he died at a hospital shortly after the incident. Investigators in that case found evidence of neglect and that nursing staff "always waited too long" to get medical help for that resident, who staff said was curled up in a ball in pain on the floor in the hour prior to his death. The MPR report goes on to say that in August of 2015, the state issued another investigative memorandum for Lakes Homes, which found neglect and maltreatment in response to another death in one of its homes. According to MPR, "In that incident, staff took the vulnerable adult to a picnic and saw the vulnerable adult appeared sweaty, pale and gray. Staff took the person back to the group home then to the emergency room where the vulnerable adult was pronounced dead. That investigation determined staff knew the resident was severely ill prior to the death and neglected to seek medical attention immediately." Lakes Homes provides adult foster care to roughly 20 different homes around Detroit Lakes, Mahanomen and Fergus Falls. Source: <http://www.dl-online.com/news/crime/4206511-suspected-group-home-rapists-go-unchecked-lakes-homes-cited-failing-do-background>

State: Patients reported verbal abuse at Maple Leaf Jan. 29, 2017, 6:12 pm by Morgan True Leave a Comment Maple Leaf Treatment Center Executive Director Catey Iacuzzi appears before legislators. File photo by Elizabeth Hewitt/VTDigger UNDERHILL — State investigators have identified a number of violations at Maple Leaf Treatment Center. The most serious are unreported complaints from clients who say they were verbally abused by a staff member at Maple Leaf, according to a report released last week. Residential treatment centers such as Maple Leaf are required to report complaints of abuse to the state Adult Protective Services program within 48 hours, but multiple complaints of abuse from patients, dating back to July, were never reported. Maple Leaf is a drug rehabilitation program with 41 inpatient beds. It accounts for 30 percent of inpatient beds at treatment centers in Vermont. Earlier this month, the facility was forced to close temporarily due to staff vacancies. Investigators at the Division of Licensure and Protection, which regulates health care facilities under the Adult Protective Services program, say they identified seven instances in which "suspected, reported or alleged" incidents of "abuse, neglect or exploitation" were not reported to state officials. The division also found that clients at Maple Leaf did not receive information about their rights; staff did not receive the proper training; and the program was not keeping records of whether the facility was properly staffed. Maple Leaf employees told investigators staffing was insufficient. Maple Leaf has submitted a plan of correction to state officials, which has been accepted. The facility has 60 days to implement the plan. If the plan is not implemented within that period, the facility could lose its certification and be forced to close permanently. A spokesman for Maple Leaf did not respond to a request for comment Thursday after the report was released. Neither did Executive Director Catey Iacuzzi or multiple board members. One member, reached by phone, referred VTDigger to the company spokesperson. Maple Leaf Treatment Center is in Underhill. Ken Liatsos, the spokesperson for Maple Leaf, said in an email Wednesday that the board, which met Tuesday night, is "intimately involved in ensuring that (Maple Leaf) regains a stable footing, and they will continue to meet regularly." Liatsos said the board is "flat out" and members would not speak to a reporter until the "end of next month." The state's report does not identify the person or people alleged to have acted abusively toward clients. However, five current and former staffers told VTDigger that complaints at Maple Leaf centered on the behavior of Clinical Director Dr. Charles Sprague Simonds, who was hired in May, about the time complaints of abuse identified by state investigators began. The workers, who asked not to be identified for fear of retaliation, said Iacuzzi did nothing to rein in Simonds' alleged behavior when staff reported it to her, and would instead defend him. State investigators reported that staff who witnessed abusive behavior toward clients did not report it to state officials as required. Simonds would frequently make remarks about the bodies of female staff and clients, the workers said. Two female former staffers said Simonds made them so uncomfortable they quit. "I still have nightmares," one said. "He used physical proximity to staff and patients to keep them where he wanted so he could speak with them." After VTDigger made multiple attempts to reach Simonds over several weeks, Maple Leaf's attorney, Thomas Somers, replied with the following statement: "Certain false and defamatory allegations have been made against Dr. Simonds by anonymous individuals concerning personnel matters at Maple Leaf Treatment Center. State agency investigations into Dr. Simonds' conduct have been closed with the finding that the allegations were not substantiated based on the information gathered during the investigations." "Internal Maple Leaf Treatment Center investigations have reached similar conclusions. These allegations against Dr. Simonds have no basis in fact," the statement concludes. Somers declined to answer follow-up questions asking what state agencies he was referring to, or what documentation or evidence there is that the claims made by current and former employees are "false and defamatory." Two state agencies investigating Maple Leaf said they had not provided the company with their findings at the time Somers sent his statement. According to the state report released last week, a Maple Leaf administrator interviewed by state investigators said that in May and July someone on staff reported "harassment and unprofessional conduct" by a co-worker. Around that time, staff reported that the same co-worker "used a sexual term towards a resident." The administrator said the allegations were investigated internally by the human resources department, which determined the complaints were "boiled down through the gossip vine and had zero concerns," according to the report. One person being treated at the facility told investigators during an unannounced visit in December that a staff person asked "inappropriate and unprofessional" questions about the client's history of trauma and abuse that left the client feeling

"violated," according to the Division of Licensing and Protection report. The incident was not reported to Adult Protective Services by a staff person who witnessed it or by Iacuzzi, who told investigators she was aware of the incident. Iacuzzi told investigators the client was not interviewed to obtain a statement about the "inappropriate" questioning. Investigators found Maple Leaf has a written policy that complaints of abuse should be vetted by the clinical director or an on-call physician before being reported, which violates the Vermont Abuse Reporting Requirements, according to the report. When staff made female clients, who reported Simonds was commenting on their bodies, aware of Maple Leaf's grievance process in July, Iacuzzi told workers during a staff meeting that they should resign if they planned to encourage clients to complain, according to two people who were present at the meeting. "You have these women coming from backgrounds where if they're being sexually harassed by a man who has power over them, they might need someone to let them know it's all right to say something," said one former staffer. The report confirms that two grievances were filed by people being treated at the facility in July who reported "inappropriate and unprofessional" behavior by someone on staff. Iacuzzi told investigators that she received the grievances but did not respond in writing to the people who filed them, as required by Maple Leaf's written policies, according to the report. Source: <https://vtdigger.org/2017/01/29/state-patients-reported-verbal-abuse-maple-leaf/>

Tucson foster-home worker is facing federal child-porn charges By Caitlin Schmidt Arizona Daily Star Caitlin Schmidt Jan 31, 2017 Updated 1 hr ago Courtesy of Pima County Sheriff's Department Taylor Ray Freeman — Credit: Courtesy of Pima County Sheriff's Department A Tucson group foster home worker has been arrested on federal charges of distributing child pornography, records show. Taylor Ray Freeman, 27, was booked into the Pima County jail on Jan. 10 and spent less than 24 hours in custody before being extradited by federal authorities to an undisclosed location, said Deputy Cody Gress, a Pima County Sheriff's Department spokesman. In a Dec. 27 online chat, Freeman, using the screen name "AMERICANPSYCHO06," told an undercover police officer in Australia that he had a "sexual interest in children," and said he had "naughty" pictures to trade, according to a complaint filed in federal court here. Freeman emailed the officer a photo of an underage girl on a bed with her genitalia exposed, and made obscene comments about what he'd like to do to her, the complaint shows. Agents with Homeland Security Investigations tracked the email to his computer and on Jan. 10 a federal warrant was served at his home. Agents seized a smart phone, an internal hard drive, revealing photos and videos depicting child pornography, according to the complaint. It said Freeman told investigators he used his email address to send and receive pornography. Freeman was arrested by the sheriff's department that day and held in jail until he could be transferred to federal custody, Gress said. On Jan. 11, U.S. Magistrate Judge Bernardo P. Velasco signed a detention order, saying Freeman would remain in federal detention until his trial. Velasco accepted the recommendation of Pretrial Services, which said there was a "serious risk" Freeman wouldn't appear at trial, the order shows. Arizona Department of Child Safety records show Freeman was hired in 2013 by local nonprofit TMM Family Services, which provides social services outreach. TMM's executive director, Donald Strauch, did not immediately respond to the Star's inquiry as to whether Freeman had contact with children. TMM provides shelter services for up to 38 children ages 3 to 17, according to an Arizona Department of Economic Security license issued in 2011. Contact reporter Caitlin Schmidt at cschmidt@tucson.com or 573-4191. Twitter: @caitlinschmidt Source: http://tucson.com/news/local/watchdog/tucson-group-home-employee-faces-federal-child-porn-charges/article_cd529a58-a727-5ac9-9018-bdd0c4608612.html

Ex-SBU football player is charged for beating at group home Abuse charges filed against former SBU football player Abuse charges filed against former SBU football player Abuse charges filed against former SBU football player Share Video Playlist Next Up Ex - SBU football player faces assault charge 00:00 01:50 Abuse charges filed against former SBU football player Ex - SBU football player faces assault charge By reporter Linda Russell and videographer Tim Leimkuhler, KY3 News | Posted: Wed 11:01 AM, Feb 01, 2017 | Updated: Wed 6:12 PM, Feb 01, 2017 BOLIVAR, Mo. (KY3) - A former all-America Southwest Baptist University football player now faces charges after being accused of beating a boy at a group home outside Bolivar last summer. Prosecutors charged ViaVia Manuma with one count of child abuse and one count of first-degree assault. Detectives say they became aware of the beating in mid-January from a video shared on Facebook. SBU dismissed Manuma and another student on Tuesday after its own investigation found it violated its Code of Conduct for students. Investigators say the incident at a group home near Bolivar happened July 17, 2016. Manuma was an employee at that group home. That video shows a man punching a young man in the group home run by Home Court Advantage. It contracts with the he state Children's Division to provide residential treatment programs for children with special needs. That video prompted an investigation. A Polk County detective said in a probable cause statement that the video showed Manuma fighting with a teenager, later identified as a Home Court Advantage resident. The detective said he saw Manuma physically struggling and hitting the boy. The detective said he saw the teenager struck twice in the face, possibly becoming unconscious. The detective also wrote in the probable cause statement that he observed a second staff member videotaping the assault appeared to kick the child in the head. The investigator said, when the boy regained consciousness, a third staff member and Manuma helped the boy to his feet. That is when the video ends. The detective noted someone in the background of the video is laughing and making statements such as "oh yeah" and "how do you like that sh." The probable cause statement says, during an interview with a detective, the teenager said he was attacked by Manuma and two other men. The boy says he was advised to stay in a room he was in until medications were completely distributed to all residents. The boy told investigators he wanted to go to his room anyway. The teenager says that is when he was grabbed by Manuma. The boy told investigators he pulled away and went into the bathroom. The boy then says Manuma pushed him into a bathtub. That is when the boy says he began to fight back, grabbing a shower rod, the probable cause statement says. The boy said he then swung that shower rod at Manuma. The boy said that is when Manuma struck him several times. The second man then kicked him in the head. The boy says he then stopped fighting. Staff then escorted him to his room and provided him an icepack. The detective say he attempted to interview ViaVia Manuma, but he said he would not speak without an attorney being present. A reporter contacted Manuma on Monday. In a Facebook message, he said "the kid was threaten(ing) to kill the staff and was looking for a weapon." He also said, "It was my fault for even touch (ing) the kid but it was a quick reaction from my part." After a reporter starting asking state officials about the video, which was posted on Facebook and shared with reporters on Monday, Gov. Eric Greitens and other state officials held a news conference in Jefferson City late Monday afternoon. They said they've been aware of the video since last week and have special teams investigating its circumstances. "I saw this video. It is deeply disturbing," said Governor Greitens. "Both as your governor and as a father, I can tell you, we will not stand for this. It is doubly disturbing, because it appears to have taken place in a facility that was responsible for the protection and care of some of our most vulnerable children." Tim Decker, director of Missouri's Children's Division said state investigators worked through the weekend to ensure all the kids at the home near Bolivar were safe and that the alleged abusers were removed. The Home Court Advantage facility houses 64 children. Decker said the company has had contracts with the state for many years. Southwest Baptist University officials said Monday that they were aware of the video and were cooperating with law enforcement. They said they also conducted their own investigation. "The University acted swiftly and respectfully upon receiving information last week related to the incident, resulting in the immediate contacting of authorities. In this, as with all allegations of student misconduct, it is imperative that we follow our internal processes and procedures," said President Pat Taylor. "This resulted in the dismissal of two students from our University." The two other staff members named in the probable cause statement also were football players. No charges against them showed up on Wednesday on Missouri Casenet, the online record of court cases for the state. Manuma was named a Division II all-American on Tuesday. If he's convicted, he faces a prison sentence of at least five years. An email message sent to his attorney, a public defender, had not been answered by early Wednesday evening. Earlier Wednesday, SBU put out this statement after the charges were filed: "The alleged incident related to the video was not connected to Southwest Baptist University or any University-sanctioned activity. "The alleged incident related to the video did not occur on the Southwest Baptist University campus. "It is our understanding that the individuals related to the incident in the video were employed by Home Court Advantage. Their employment was not through or associated with SBU. "On the morning of Tuesday, January 24, 2017, SBU administration was made aware of a video of an off-campus incident. Immediate and appropriate actions were taken that same morning, including communications with law enforcement and a hot-line phone call made to the State of Missouri Department of Social Services Children's Division. SBU cooperated with law enforcement. SBU also cooperated with the Children's Division. University policies also were followed as to the individuals allegedly involved." Source: <http://www.ky3.com/content/news/Ex-Southwest-Baptist-football-player-charged-for-videotaped-beating-at-group-home-412430853.html>

A teacher accused of having sex with a female student at a school for troubled youth is out of job A Pennsylvania teacher is out of a job as the case of institutional sexual assault ramps up against her. Twenty-eight-year-old Nina Scott was fired in December after accusations surfaced that she had illicit sexual contact with a 16-year-old female student at a school for youths with emotional and behavioral issues from February to October in 2016. Scott now faces 34 counts each of institutional sexual assault of a minor and corruption of minors, according to Philly.com. She was arrested Wednesday. Some of the alleged correspondence between Scott and the teen has shown up in the criminal complaint. Scott allegedly exchanged 30 letters with the student. In one conversation,

Scott is said to referred to her bed as “our bed.” In another, she referred to her 2-year-old child as “our baby girl.” In yet another, she said she was “rolling over in [her] bed and missing [the student] because she was not there.” Police also said that Scott often signed the letters “Pretty.” RELATED: Yet another teacher has been accused of having sex with a student — what she called him is something else The student’s journal also made clear references to Scott, calling her “future wife,” “the love of my life” and “good in bed.” Ad by Kleenex Be ready to care for all of life’s moments with the gentle touch of Kleenex. Save 50¢ now! Get coupons and special offers on Kleenex products today and be ready for all of life’s moments. Scott and the student allegedly had sexual contact several times at the teacher’s apartment, in her car and in the classroom at the Village, the school for troubled youth. “The mission of the Village is to promote the healing of the spirits of children, families and communities broken by trauma including violence, neglect, addiction, poverty, mental illness, racism and other serious societal problems,” the Village describes its mission on its website. The relationship came to light after the student left the school. Staff members at Mid-Atlantic Youth Services found the teen’s journal and reported it to police. The teen said that the relationship began when she gave Scott a note saying, “How would you feel if I kissed you?” The teen also asked if Scott would tell anyone. At first, Scott and her legal team denied that a sexual relationship had taken place. They later admitted that there was a relationship. Scott declined comment when she appeared outside of court and was asked if she had sex with a minor. WTXF/screenshot RELATED: Teacher arrested in crazy sex scandal with student case has entered her plea The Radnor Police Superintendent called Scott’s alleged actions “downright disgusting.” “As a parent and as a police officer for 36 years. It never ceases to amaze me when you put children in the care of a position such as a teacher, and they violate that trust,” William Colarulo said. Scott had been working at the school since October 2016. Source: <http://rare.us/story/a-teacher-accused-of-having-sex-with-a-female-student-at-a-school-for-troubled-youth-is-out-of-job/>

State says Logan County group home staff taught kids to get high State: West Liberty group home workers injured, got high with kids local By Katherine Collins - Staff Writer ... Posted: 5:55 a.m. Friday, February 03, 2017 The state has revoked a West Liberty group home’s license following several alleged violations against staff members, including injuring children and showing them how to “get high.” The Adriel School, which houses and teaches children with behavioral issues from across Southwest and Central Ohio, plans to appeal the loss of its license from the Ohio Department of Job and Family Services. But CEO Todd Hanes said it might shut down its residential program anyway. RELATED: Fights lead to 9 juvenile arrests at Adriel group home in Logan Co. “At this point I think we do need to take a hard look at what our future is and does that include residential,” Hanes said. The Ohio Department of Job and Family Services sent an 11-page letter dated Jan. 24 to Adriel saying it had determined the group home hadn’t complied with several state regulations. The letter, obtained by the Springfield News-Sun, alleges several incidents were caught on video in February 2016, including a staff member mixing cough medicine and soda. The video appears to show the staff member and three children drinking the mixture “for a ‘high,’” the document says. Related State: West Liberty group home workers injured, got high with kids A state agency has revoked the license for the Adriel facility in West Liberty. JEFF GUERINI/STAFF READ MORE: Adriel School under state, county investigation In the same month, another video appears to show a staff member crushing pills and showing the children how to make a straw from paper bills, before snorting the crushed pills with three children, according to the state’s letter. “We dealt with it when it happened,” Hanes said of these incidents. “These employees were held accountable. They were terminated. These were unacceptable things that happened here.” A child also sustained a broken wrist during restraint that wasn’t treated medically until the next day, the state’s letter says, despite the child’s complaints. A former employee at Adriel, Debbie Roberts, said that behavior doesn’t surprise her. “It wasn’t the kids that were shocking, it was the other employees and the supervisors and the things that went on that I saw personally that were not OK,” she said. DETAILS: Spike in police calls to youth home challenges community Roberts worked nights in the home in 2015 and said she was fired after she tried to come forward about what she saw as possible violations. “I blame the people at the very top,” she said. “And I think that Adriel, if it’s going to have a future, needs to get back to their roots.” Jon Keeling, spokesman for Ohio Department of Job and Family Services, said in an email that the safety and security of the young people who live at this location are the state’s first priority. “Our inspectors take this responsibility very seriously, and as a result of their investigation a determination was made to revoke this location’s license,” he said. “As is protocol, Adriel has 30 days to appeal.” Adriel had previously developed a corrective action plan for re-certification that was implemented Feb. 1, 2016. The state’s letter also cites a physical abuse report of one child that was substantiated by Clermont County Children Services in March 2016. A July 19, 2016, complaint alleged a staff member showed two children a video of men engaging in a sex act together, according to the state’s letter. EARLIER COVERAGE: Police calls to youth center nearly double Another citation against Adriel was that children weren’t allowed to attend religious services when requested. Hanes doesn’t deny the letter’s accuracy, but he said all situations were addressed and new policies have been put in place to prevent them from happening again. “Our defense is not that they didn’t happen,” he said. “Our defense is that they happened, they’re unacceptable and absolutely not tolerable.” The board will discuss if the group home should close, he said, to focus on its foster care division. West Liberty Police Chief Shane Oelker said his department frequently responds to the group home and he’s glad its operations are being examined. “There’s obviously some changes that need to be made,” he said. Hanes took over as CEO of Adriel in October 2015. Before then, the West Liberty campus was riddled with complaints from the community and police department, mostly about runaways. But so far this year, there has been runaways and large fights again. Staying with the story The Springfield News-Sun has provided extensive coverage of problems at the Adriel School for more than three years, including stories digging into the number of police calls to the group home and concerns of neighbors. Source: <http://www.mydaytondailynews.com/news/crime-law/state-west-liberty-group-home-workers-injured-got-high-with-kids/sVpJeWV7A6Liopaq79TNwL/>

Ex-official at Minn. treatment center who sexually assaulted patient had extensive criminal history The incident underscores serious gaps that still persist in Minnesota’s system for screening thousands of caregivers and other staffers who care for vulnerable adults and children. By Chris Serres Star Tribune February 2, 2017 — 11:57pm, Star Tribune A police photo of Bruce Biddlecome, age 42, of St. Paul. Text size share tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint In 2013, a recovering methamphetamine addict with an extensive criminal history — including a charge for engaging in prostitution — was hired to run one of the largest chemical dependency treatment centers in the state. The decision would have dire consequences. After being hired, Bruce Biddlecome threatened a female patient and coerced her to have sex with him at Douglas Place Treatment Center in East Grand Forks, Minn. Early in the morning on Christmas Eve of 2014, the woman awoke in her bedroom to find Biddlecome “petting her face and stroking her hair.” After promising the patient an “early Christmas present,” Biddlecome pulled down her shorts and sexually assaulted her, according to state and local law enforcement reports. Advertisement: Replay Ad Ads by ZINC 3 Biddlecome, 42, was sentenced to five months in jail for sexual abuse of a vulnerable adult, and now the patient is suing Douglas Place and its parent company for negligent hiring and supervision. The incident underscores serious gaps that still persist in Minnesota’s system for screening tens of thousands of caregivers and other staff who care for vulnerable adults and children at state-licensed treatment centers. A long-touted plan for automating and improving criminal background checks is still being rolled out statewide nearly three years after the Legislature approved it. A spokeswoman for the Minnesota Department of Human Services said the rollout is nearly complete, and most providers should be on the new system by the end of this month. Meanwhile, fines for violations are often minimal. In sworn depositions filed this week in Ramsey County District Court, executives for the treatment center’s parent company, Meridian Behavioral Health of New Brighton, admitted they hired Biddlecome as executive director despite knowing about his guilty plea for prostitution. Biddlecome said Meridian’s chief executive “thanked me for my honesty” when he confessed to paying $100 for a prostitute at a hotel. “I was an open book,” said Biddlecome, who also had a previous conviction for felony vehicle theft and a charge for misdemeanor assault with a deadly weapon before he moved here from California. “I said, ‘Look, there are some things in my background that you need to be aware of,’ and they appreciated that.” A spokesman for Meridian declined to answer questions about the case. The new job placed Biddlecome in a position of authority at Douglas Place, an 85-bed residential treatment center. He could enter patients’ rooms, take them on trips alone in his personal vehicle, and even change the surveillance cameras, records show. After the assault, the patient told state investigators that Biddlecome threatened to send her “back to prison” if she did not comply with his demands for sex, according to a state investigative report. Following the Christmas Eve incident, the patient left a handwritten note on her bed describing what happened and then provided police with a napkin with Biddlecome’s bodily fluids. Police later made a match to his DNA sample, and staff found condoms when they cleaned out Biddlecome’s desk, records show. State investigators concluded that Biddlecome had sex with the patient “on more than one occasion,” and immediately disqualified him from working in state-licensed programs. “It’s clear that he ... had unfettered power,” said Roberta Opheim, state ombudsman for mental health and developmental disabilities. “It would have been very hard for a client to fight against that level of power.” Prostitution sting In a recent interview, Biddlecome denied that he threatened or coerced the patient and said Meridian officials never told him state law prohibits facility staff from having sexual contact with patients. Biddlecome recalled signing a packet of documents at his job orientation, which may have included information about abuse of vulnerable adults, but said he never actually read them before signing. “I should have known better but ... I'm a guy and sometimes you're not always thinking straight," he said. "I knew what I was doing was unethical, but I didn't know it was something that I would be charged with — and would have to do jail time." This was not Biddlecome's first encounter with the law. In 2012, he responded to a posting on Backpage.com advertising a "fun and relaxing time with a sexy and flirty girl next door." Biddlecome arranged a meeting with a woman who turned out to be a decoy police officer at a Days Inn in Maplewood, where he placed $100 on the nightstand and began to undress. Police officers entered the room and arrested him, according to a criminal complaint. Biddlecome would plead guilty to loitering with intent to participate in prostitution, a misdemeanor. But that did not appear to dissuade Meridian from hiring him. In testimony in the Ramsey County lawsuit, Biddlecome said he told Meridian's president and chief executive, Fran Sauvageau, of the prostitution case. "[Sauvageau] said that thanks for telling him ... but we wouldn't have to speak about it again," Biddlecome said. The problems at Douglas Place went beyond the rape allegations. In a recent deposition, a former counselor described a facility that had become chaotic and unsafe during Biddlecome's tenure. Patrick Plemel said people were bringing drugs into the facility in pizza delivery boxes, and that others were entering the facility at night and taping drugs to the garbage dumpster. Plemel said no one questioned why Biddlecome was taking a female patient on unaccompanied trips outside the facility. "It was a madhouse," Plemel said. During a licensing review in March 2015, the state Department of Human Services cited the facility for 33 violations and placed its license on conditional status. The facility was fined $200 for each background study violation, a total of just $600, records show. As for Biddlecome, who has a wife and two children, he said he is trying to rebuild his life and put the abuse conviction behind him. He works at an oil-change shop in St. Paul and has been "clean and sober" for more than 14 years, he said. "I believe in second chances. I can tell you that I'm not seeing prostitutes, you know what I mean," he said. "You learn from your mistakes and your experiences." Twitter: @chrisserrres Source: <http://www.startribune.com/man-who-sexually-assaulted-patient-at-minn-treatment-center-had-extensive-criminal-history/412625193/>

Unregulated transfer of children's guardianship advances despite safety fears ERIN LORANGER erin.loranger@helenair.com Feb 4, 2017 Updated Feb 4, 2017 0 +1 Roger Webb +1 TownNews.com Content Exchange HELENA — A bill allowing the care of children to be transferred from a parent to someone else via power of attorney passed second reading in the Senate Friday. An investigative report in 2013 by Reuters on unregulated private re-homing networks revealed that children were being passed around to new families without any oversight. As a result, many states have banned the transfer of custody via power of attorney to stop private adoptions from circumventing state foster care. Sen. Roger Webb, R-Billings, wants to make it easier to transfer guardianship without state interference. Webb said Senate Bill 117 would allow a faith-based organization to temporarily care for a child if a parent voluntarily asked for help. Democratic senators said the bill could allow a child to be transferred to a stranger with no accountability. The Foundation for Government Accountability asked Webb to carry the bill in 2015, where it died on the Senate floor. Senate Bill 117 is the revival of that legislation, which passed second reading 30 to 19 on Friday. Webb said the bill would allow the Foundation for Government Accountability to take in children via power of attorney. The website for its Safe Families program says children are in its temporary custody for an average of six weeks, but there isn't a time limit on if or when a child must be returned to a parent. Power of attorney allows people to go around a legal adoption, which requires a court and vetting of adoptive or foster families. A power-of-attorney document is one piece of notarized paper that declares the child to be in the care of someone else. It isn't filed anywhere and, as reported by Reuters, acts more like a receipt. While organizations like Safe Families screen volunteer families, there isn't a consistent process to make sure all parents are subject to the same standards. It's also impossible for Child and Family Services to monitor whether those children are at risk of being abused or neglected. During discussion on the floor, Webb said the foster-care system is broken and his bill provides a safe alternative. "It gives a faith-based organization an opportunity to help these people," he said. "We're not asking for help from the state." Specific cases gone wrong in the Reuters investigation were mentioned on the floor by Democrats, who strongly oppose the bill. One family was struggling to raise Quita, a child they adopted from Liberia. The Puchalla family posted an ad online and a few weeks later drove from Wisconsin to a mobile-home park in Illinois to hand off Quita. The only paperwork was a notarized statement transferring guardianship. The Reuters investigation later found that Nicole Eason, who took guardianship of Quita, lost custody of her two biological children after she was found to be violent. Nicole and her husband Calvin Eason were also accused of sexually abusing the children they babysat, although no charges were filed. On the first night Quita stayed with the Easons, she was asked to sleep in their bed where Nicole slept naked. When the family called to check up on Quita, they couldn't reach the Easons, and she hadn't shown up at the school she was supposed to attend. The Puchalla family called the police, who located Quita in New York and took her out of the Easons' custody. Law enforcement didn't take any action to stop the Easons from using online networks to take in another child. In one case, Nicole Eason and a man took custody of a 10-year-old child in a motel parking lot. That man was later sent to prison for trading child pornography. Sen. Jen Gross, D-Billings, said similar situations could unfold in Montana if SB117 takes effect. She said the bill doesn't implement any of the safeguards and regulations used by the Department of Health and Human Services. "No background checks. No requirement for a home check either before or during the temporary transfer of custody," she said. "We could very well call this bill legalizing parking-lot abandonment," Gross said. Sen. Dick Barrett, D-Missoula, had similar concerns that one organization having a screening and background process doesn't mean other organizations or individuals will hold themselves to the same standard. "My understanding of the role of the faith-based group is that it would be providing something of a safeguard to make sure these transfers of custody were not made improperly, but in fact, in the bill, there is no provision for any safeguard of that kind," Barrett said. Shannon McDonald, deputy chief of legal counsel at DPHHS, said the bill is dangerous without regulations. "This bill would really take us in the opposite direction," she said. Webb said he believes the foster-care caseload would go down by 25 percent if his legislation passes, but McDonald said there hasn't been any evidence introduced to support his claim. Sen. Mary Caferro, D-Helena, said the legislation is coming forward at a time when the Legislature should be reforming Child and Family Services, not making it more difficult to monitor the safety of children in Montana. While Webb pointed out the large number of children in foster care in Montana, Caferro said the high number isn't necessarily a sign of a bad system. "It could be that state workers are doing a better job of keeping kids safe and removing them from a dangerous situation," she said. Source: http://www.kpvi.com/news/national_news/unregulated-transfer-of-children-s-guardianship-advances-despite-safety-fears/article_a008ac3e-a10c-574a-9a7b-0c41da10791f.html

Texas foster care advocates clash with privatization supporters By Jonathan Baker • Feb 4, 2017 TweetShareGoogle+Email Credit Astrid Westvang / Creative Commons In Texas, foster care providers have clashed with court judges over a senator's proposal to privatize foster care. As The Dallas Morning News reports, the debate centers around whether private contractors in Texas should be allowed to completely take over supervision of abused and neglected children. As it stands now, private contractors already provide 90 percent of foster care in the state. But under Sen. Charles Schwertner's plan, "case management" would also be outsourced. That would mean that social workers working for private companies would take over the duties of CPS workers. These private workers would coordinate foster kids' therapies, visit with birth families, write court reports and appear before judges. Critics say this solution would lead the private contractors to take advantage of the state's inability to handle the work, and jack up prices, thus costing taxpayers more in the long run. Source: <http://hprp.org/post/texas-foster-care-advocates-clash-privatization-supporters>

Bills Would Expand Oversight Of DCF, Shift Death Investigations To Child Advocate DCF Ronald DeRosa The Department of Children and Families' office in Hartford. The Department of Children and Families' office in Hartford. (Ronald DeRosa) Josh KovnerContact Reporter The Department of Children and Families falters in gauging risky households, enforcing foster-care licensing rules, and relying on unenforceable "safety plans" for children when family members have troubling backgrounds, two legislative leaders testified Tuesday. With those assertions as the backdrop, Sen. Leonard Fasano, a Republican of North Haven, and Rep. Toni Walker, a Democrat of New Haven, proposed four bills that they said would markedly increase the independent oversight of the sprawling department. Saying the agency is highly scrutinized as it is, DCF officials objected to all four bills, and the co-chairwoman of the committee on children said some of the measures duplicate functions that already exist. The panel did not immediately vote on the bills, which require General Assembly approval. The House and Senate last week rejected an agreement that would have reduced oversight of DCF. One measure proposed Tuesday would have the Office of the Child Advocate take over the responsibility of investigating deaths of children in DCF care, so the department would no longer be "investigating itself," Fasano said. Personnel would have to be added to Child Advocate Sarah Eagan's office, making passage of the bill less likely with the state's gaping budget deficit. Another bill, raised and defeated two years ago, would remove the ombudsman's office from inside DCF and establish it as a separate service, so people inside and outside the department could register complaints "without strings attached," Fasano said. A fifth bill, proposed by Rep. Timothy Ackert, a Republican of Coventry, dealt with unruly group homes. It would give towns more authority to take action when residents of DCF group homes trespassed, committed vandalism, or otherwise broke the law. Coventry resident Gary Jonas testified that the town's 15-member police department responded to 62 calls at one group home last year. Details of the proposal haven't yet been published, but several advocacy groups were concerned that such a law would discriminate against teenagers in the custody of DCF, who deserve a shot at living in family neighborhoods. "We don't want to see policies enacted that have an element of 'nimbysm,'" said Kathleen Flaherty, of the Connecticut Legal Rights Project. Ackert and Jonas said they were not pressing for the closure of the group home, only more local control. Fasano and Walker cited child deaths or foster-care placements gone awry that relate to what they see as DCF's most critical problems: misdiagnosing the level of risk to children in a household, improperly vetting relatives before children are placed with them, and using "safety agreements" that purport to keep certain household members away from children, but that are ultimately unenforceable. In addition to assigning the child advocate as the lead death investigator and establishing an independent ombudsman, the lawmakers proposed creating a DCF oversight council made up of a wide cross-section of experts and community members, and transferring the care and detention of the most serious or needy juvenile delinquents from DCF to the Judicial Branch.

Legislature Rejects Deal To Shrink Federal Oversight Of DCF JOSH KOVNER The General Assembly Wednesday rejected a deal that would have shielded the Department of Children and Families' budget from any cuts in exchange for a quicker exit from the federal-court oversight that has loomed over the agency for more than a quarter century. The Senate vote was 25-8. The tally... The General Assembly Wednesday rejected a deal that would have shielded the Department of Children and Families' budget from any cuts in exchange for a quicker exit from the federal-court oversight that has loomed over the agency for more than a quarter century. The Senate vote was 25-8. The tally... (JOSH KOVNER) The proposals would result in greater accountability and responsiveness on DCF's part, said Walker and Fasano. Rep. Robyn Porter, a Democrat of Hamden, also was a sponsor of the measures. DCF Commissioner Joette Katz said the bills were unnecessary. She said DCF has the expertise and professional commitment to investigate child deaths on its watch, and to vigorously follow up on complaints that come to ombudsman Kenneth Mysogland, a veteran DCF internal investigator. Mysogland's office handles 2,000 complaints and information requests each year. That includes nearly 100 grievances annually from juveniles detained at the Connecticut Juvenile Training School in Middletown, which is slated to close next year. "It's not pleasant for DCF staff when they get an email from us," said Mysogland, who said he has access to administrators and staff members at all levels when investigating complaints. "Families have expressed frustration to me," said Sen. Len Suzio, a Republican whose district includes Meriden and Middletown. He said people feel as if they have "battered up against a cold bureaucracy" and that they have been "churned up by the machine." Katz said she would like to personally hear about every person who feels that they have not been heard, and said she would follow up on each case. "But sometimes families don't get the answer they want to hear, and that is a different matter," Katz said. Diana Urban, a Democrat of North Stonington and co-chair of the committee on children, said that the State Advisory Committee on Children already does what Fasano and Walker's proposed oversight panel would do. She said the committee could be expanded, if needed. Egan, the child advocate, said the current panel serves an advisory role and has no authority. Source: <http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-commission-on-children-0208-20170207-story.html>

Special Needs Teen's Asphyxiation Death at Philadelphia Treatment Center Ruled a Homicide By Steve Helling • @stevehelling Posted on February 14, 2017 at 4:29pm EST Share Tweet Email Wordsworth Academy The death of a 17-year-old at a private Philadelphia treatment facility for special needs children has been ruled a homicide, PEOPLE confirms. David Hess died of suffocation after a physical altercation with staff members at the Wordsworth Academy, a residential treatment center for children and teens with emotional and behavioral needs, according to a report by the Pennsylvania Department of Human Services. The cause of death was asphyxiation, according to the Philadelphia Medical Examiner's Office. "One or more people caused the death," a spokesman for the Medical Examiner said in a statement "It is not a determination of criminality. It is the role of the District Attorney's Office to determine if these actions were crimes and, if so, if there is sufficient evidence to charge any person(s) with a crime." According to a Department of Human Services report obtained by PEOPLE, the incident began when staffers allegedly suspected that Hess had stolen an iPod from another student. Several Wordsworth staff members searched his room. The report describes Hess as being "aggressive" as the staffers allegedly flipped over his mattress and went through his things. At some point, the staffers allegedly restrained Hess. Witnesses allege to DHS that Hess initially taunted the staffers, saying, "I can take this, that's the only thing you got, give me more." Eventually, however, Hess allegedly began gasping and yelling, "Get off me. I can't breathe." He died shortly thereafter. The report notes that the iPod was eventually found in a soap box in Hess's room. • Want to keep up with the latest crime coverage? Click here to get breaking crime news, ongoing trial coverage and details of intriguing unsolved cases in the True Crime Newsletter. Four days after the incident, DHS revoked the treatment center's license. In a letter obtained by PEOPLE, DHS told Wordsworth that it was being closed due to "your failure to comply with the Department's regulations and gross incompetence, negligence and misconduct." In a statement, Wordsworth's Chairman of the Board expressed sorrow over the teen's death. "Everyone at Wordsworth Academy was deeply saddened by the loss of this young man, and the medical examiner's finding underscores the tragic nature of this situation," Chairman Tom Johnson said in the statement. "Our thoughts continue to be with his family and friends during this difficult time." The District's Attorney's office did not return PEOPLE's requests for comment, but a spokesperson refused comment to the Philadelphia Inquirer, citing an ongoing investigation. No one has been criminally charged in Hess's death. Source: <http://people.com/crime/david-hess-special-needs-teen-death-philadelphia-treatment-center-homicide/>

APNewsBreak: Grand jury report blasts NY foster care system By Frank Eltman, Associated Press HAUPPAUGE, N.Y. — Feb 15, 2017, 1:01 PM ET Share Email Star Share Email A foster parent accused of sexually abusing boys in his care could have been stopped years earlier if not for "abysmal" communication among the child-welfare agencies involved, according to a special grand jury report obtained by The Associated Press. In the 83-page report, the Suffolk County Supreme Court jury outlined a remarkable series of failures that allowed Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu to take in more than 100 children over 20 years, despite being the subject of 18 separate child-abuse investigations. Rules intended to protect the reputations of falsely accused foster parents were partly to blame, the report said. Substandard abuse investigations were another issue. But the biggest problem, the report said, was the simple failure of the four governmental and one nonprofit child-welfare agencies to share information. One agency, the Suffolk County Department of Social Services, became so concerned with the number of suspected abuse reports against Gonzales-Mugaburu in 2002 that it asked a contractor to stop placing children with him. Yet, the agency did not document the reasoning behind that decision or communicate it to anyone in writing, including other agencies that were also sending children to the home, the grand jury report said. It identifies Gonzales-Mugaburu only by the letter "A," but its description of the allegations against him are identical to facts that have been made public in his criminal proceeding. "The foster care system in the state of New York is a bureaucratic nightmare," said Suffolk District Attorney Thomas Spota, who empaneled the grand jury. "There has to be some corrections that are made, especially with respect to how these agencies interact with each other." The report recommended a number of reforms. Among them: The state should get rid of the statute of limitations for prosecuting child sex abuse, create a central registry of foster homes and widen access to reports of abuse, even if they have been determined to be unfounded. The break that led to Gonzales-Mugaburu's arrest came early last year after detectives say two brothers came forward with credible stories of abuse. Others credible accusers followed. Gonzales-Mugaburu, 60, now faces trial next month on charges he sexually abused eight children as young as 8 years old inside his home in Ridge, on eastern Long Island. Prosecutors said statute of limitations laws precluded them from bringing even more charges. Gonzales-Mugaburu has pleaded not guilty. His attorney says he denies ever abusing children and contends the accusers are lying. Prosecutors say Gonzales-Mugaburu earned more than $1.5 million in tax-free income caring for foster children between 1996 and his arrest in January 2016. All of them were boys, including many deemed to require special treatment because of emotional or physical challenges. New York's clearinghouse for suspected child abuse complaints received 18 reports regarding Gonzales-Mugaburu as far back as 1998, each of which was investigated by Suffolk County child welfare officials. Some were for less serious issues, including failing to fill a child's eyeglasses prescription. There was also at least one allegation of sexual abuse. One complaint, involving a child with bruises, went as far as a formal hearing before officials decided the allegations were false. All the complaints were ultimately deemed by investigators to be unfounded. Still, in 2001 or 2002, Suffolk County's Department of Social Services "verbally requested" that SCO Family of Services, one of the state's largest foster home providers, stop placing children with Gonzales-Mugaburu, according to the grand jury report. But that request was apparently never communicated in writing and no one could explain how the notification occurred. "One witness, in fact, testified that this notification could have potentially have been made in passing during a conversation in a hallway," the report said. "For some reason, and with tragic results," the grand jury wrote, the decision was never communicated to other agencies, including New York City's massive child welfare agency, the Administration for Children's Services, which continued to place dozens of children with Gonzales-Mugaburu. The grand jury specifically criticized an arrangement under which the New York City agency ceded responsibility for overseeing case management to SCO Family of Services because of a special state waiver. "There was virtually no contact by ACS with these children or the foster parent," Spota said. "They basically delegated every single responsibility they had to these nonprofit agencies and said to them, 'They're yours. Goodbye.' And that is so wrong." SCO Family of Services said it never uncovered evidence of sexual abuse or improper sexual behavior in the home. But the organization's chief strategy officer, Rose Anello, said last summer there were other issues, "and in retrospect and knowing what we know now, a decision to close the home should have been made at that time."

SCO said it has worked with the state, ACS and Suffolk County "to diligently address each and every concern about the quality of care provided in this home." Spokeswoman Leslie Johnson's statement added the agency has "undertaken a rigorous corrective action plan to ensure complete transparency and significantly strengthen our foster care program. We are hopeful the findings included in this report will advance meaningful and systemic foster care reform in New York." ACS and Suffolk County child welfare department representatives did not immediately respond to requests for comment. Source: <http://abcnews.go.com/US/wireStory/apnewsbreak-grand-jury-report-blasts-ny-foster-care-45512208>

Good Shepherd Services to close Baltimore County residential treatment program Sarah Gantz and Erica L. Green Contact Reporters The Baltimore Sun Good Shepherd Services will close its residential treatment program Good Shepherd Services will close its troubled residential treatment program for adolescents in Halethorpe after two state agencies decided to withdraw the children they had placed there. The decision to withdraw the children followed moratoriums imposed late last year by the agencies on sending more youths to the Baltimore County treatment center. Good Shepherd was cited last year by state health regulators for not providing proper supervision after one patient reported being sexually assaulted and others showed signs of overdose after taking medicine stolen from a medical cart. The state citations were disclosed in public records obtained by The Baltimore Sun in December. The 49 children currently being treated at Good Shepherd will be moved to other facilities within 30 days, the agency said. The Catholic nonprofit's decision puts some 200 Good Shepherd employees out of a job and affects another 100 contract workers and vendors. Paid Post What's This? Paid Posts are created by our advertisers. Our editorial and reporting staffs are not involved in the creation or production of Paid Posts. Why the Internet Loves This Mattress Sponsored by Casper Casper's outrageously comfortable mattress was designed to have just the right sink and just the right bounce. Plus it ships for free in a "how did they do that?" sized box. See More Good Shepherd leaders expressed frustration Thursday about their decision to shutter the 150-year-old program and said they had not been given an opportunity to work with the state to resolve the problems that led to the moratoriums by the Department of Human Resources and the Department of Juvenile Services. Maryland state agencies stop sending youths for treatment to Good Shepherd, group home Erica L. Green Two state agencies have placed a moratorium on sending youths in their custody to Good Shepherd Services, a Baltimore County residential treatment center cited by regulators for not providing proper supervision after one patient reported being sexually assaulted and others showed signs of overdose... Two state agencies have placed a moratorium on sending youths in their custody to Good Shepherd Services, a Baltimore County residential treatment center cited by regulators for not providing proper supervision after one patient reported being sexually assaulted and others showed signs of overdose... \(Erica L. Green\) "It's hard to fathom that state leadership and Good Shepherd leadership couldn't come together to ensure the long-term best interest of these children and their families," said Michele Wyman, Good Shepherd's president and CEO. "It's heartbreaking." The Department of Juvenile Services, which contracted with Good Shepherd for mental health services for young offenders, rejected Wyman's claim that the agency had refused to work with the facility. Since 2013, the department has enacted four moratoriums against Good Shepherd, including three last year. The moratoriums, which ranged from a couple of days to a few months, were lifted after resolving the issues that led to the action. Caption OCC student suspended for recording professor's "anti-Trump" comments appeals Victoria Lugo, interim dean of students at the Costa Mesa college, informed Caleb O'Neil of the suspension for one "primary (fall/spring) semester in addition to the summer" and other disciplinary actions against him, including that he submit a written apology to the professor, Olga Perez Stable Cox. Victoria Lugo, interim dean of students at the Costa Mesa college, informed Caleb O'Neil of the suspension for one "primary (fall/spring) semester in addition to the summer" and other disciplinary actions against him, including that he submit a written apology to the professor, Olga Perez Stable Cox. Caption A missing mother and daughter from Baltimore Baltimore Police Department need the public help in the disappearance of a mother and daughter from Baltimore city. (Baltimore Sun video) Baltimore Police Department need the public help in the disappearance of a mother and daughter from Baltimore city. (Baltimore Sun video) "The department's highest priority is the safety and security of the youth in our care and custody," Audra Harrison, the department's spokeswoman, said in a statement. "We will continue to work with Good Shepherd, families, stakeholders, and the state's other human service agencies to ensure a smooth transition and minimal impact on the youths' treatment." The Department of Human Resources, which oversees the state's child welfare programs, including foster care, said Thursday that the safety and well-being of the youth it cares for is its main priority. "We are transitioning our youth from Good Shepherd to new placements based on each of their specific needs," it said without elaborating on its reasoning. After citing Good Shepherd for multiple problems last year, the state Department of Health and Mental Hygiene's Office of Health Care Quality gave Good Shepherd a "directed plan of correction" in January, a spokesman said. Such plans order providers to take corrective actions. About two-thirds of the youths Good Shepherd treated were referred to the facility by the state Juvenile Services and Human Resources departments. The agencies' decision earlier this month to withdraw the remaining children they had placed in the facility's care "thrust Good Shepherd into a financial corner," said the organization's chairman, William Buttarazzi. "We are deeply saddened for the disruption this will cause to the care of the children and additional pain it will bring to their families," Buttarazzi said in a statement. "We are further saddened for the several hundred dedicated and loyal workers who will be adversely impacted by the state's precipitous actions." Good Shepherd traces its roots in Baltimore to 1864 when the Catholic order of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, founded to help women and girls in crisis, opened the House of the Good Shepherd at Mount and Hollins streets in the city. It opened a second house in 1892 and moved to the current 70-acre location in Halethorpe in 1970. In recent years, the organization provided troubled youth with residential as well as psychological, psychiatric, clinical and health services. There was a school on the grounds so the youths could sustain their education. The residential program had been serving between 65 and 75 youths a day, but its ranks began to dwindle after the two state agencies stopped sending children and others were discharged as planned. Wyman said the organization would have tried to continue operating with a reduced population if its leaders thought they would be able to work with the state agencies to make improvements. "If we'd been having some kind of meaningful discussion or conversation, we would have held on to hope this could be resolved," she said. The program's closure means 200 employees — a range of support staff, social workers, medical professionals and kitchen and maintenance workers — will lose their jobs. Affected workers will stay on with the company for about two months. As Good Shepherd winds down its residential treatment center, one of its cornerstone programs, leaders are re-evaluating the organization's mission. Good Shepherd plans to establish a task force within the next three months charged with determining how to shape programming. The organization has been considering a turn toward community-based programs, though Wyman didn't rule out the possibility of restarting a residential program in the future. "I think the board sees this as an opportunity to pause and really take stock of the needs of the state, and the community we serve, and what they need," Wyman said. Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/business/bs-md-good-shepherd-services-20170216-story.html>

System of self-reporting makes it impossible to assess medication errors in group homes Limited training and fear of losing employment cast low number of recorded medication errors in a suspicious light Written by Caitlin Russell Edited by JPat Brown A direct care provider working in a group home looks at the clock and sees that it's 2 p.m. - too late to hand out the medications scheduled for noon. Protocol is to immediately contact a Medication Administration Program (MAP) consultant and the employee will have an official medication occurrence on his or her record. Many companies contracted to operate group homes for the Department of Developmental Services (DDS) allow three medication errors (or "occurrences"), before an employee is either retrained or fired. When a person is one lost paycheck away from their life falling apart, the prospect of weeks to months of lost paychecks is a nightmare scenario, especially when the job provides health insurance. So why would a person risk their job risk it when perhaps they could just wait it out, make sure the client who missed the medication, or got the wrong medication doesn't die or have any obvious adverse reaction, and resolve to never make a med error again. Until they do. In group homes across Massachusetts, the administration of medication is entrusted not to medical professionals such as nurses, but to direct care providers who pass a three-day course in the MAP. The relatively low number of medication errors that occur each year according to the Massachusetts DDS seems miraculous in light of the limited training and large number of doses handed out every year. DDS estimates that in 2015, there were 5,833 medication errors out of the approximately 41.9 million doses of medication doled out. Expecting employees who make little more than minimum wage to self report mistakes that could result in the loss of a job that provides regular hours and health insurance is unrealistic. It places employees in an extremely difficult position, which in turn puts DDS clients at risk. The impact this sort of mistake can have on a client obviously varies depending on the type of medication. For example, a person will have a less severe reaction to missing a dose of an antihistamine than they would to receiving a large dose of antipsychotics that aren't prescribed to them. Some companies, for example the May Institute, provide the bare minimum of training in medication administration - 16 hours over three days. One could also look at it as four years worth of nursing school crammed into three days. Hiring a nurse for every residential facility - or even one nurse for every five facilities - would be far more expensive than giving bare bones training to employees making $25,000 to $30,000 per year. Nurses train direct care staff, and pop in for the occasional surprise visit at residential facilities to see if the med books are in order, the medication closet is locked, and the narcotics are double locked, but they aren't there every day to distribute medication or to provide their expertise while observing a client's reaction to medications. For example, increasing a person's dose of Prozac can cause stomach problems that make it difficult for a person to eat. The average direct care provider is not nearly as likely to know this as a nurse would be and might misinterpret a client's refusal to eat as a bid for attention or a sign of depression as opposed to a normal reaction to physical discomfort. A system of self-reporting will not succeed when employees are set up for failure through a combination of inadequate training, and the fear of making a mistake and losing their jobs. Companies contracted with DDS to run residential facilities relentlessly hammer home the seriousness of medication administration to its employees, but the unwillingness of these companies to hire medical professionals to administer medication belies the fact that they're shirking their responsibility to provide the best care possible, and in the process, shifting that responsibility to their lowest paid employees. Read DDS' full data on medication occurrences embedded below, or on the request page. Source: <https://www.muckrock.com/news/archives/2017/feb/15/system-self-reporting-makes-it-impossible-assess-m/>

West Liberty group home closes after license revoked, staff shortages crime By Katherine Collins - Staff Writer 0 The Adriel School in West Liberty. Bill Lackey/Staff Posted: 6:00 a.m. Saturday, February 18, 2017 A Logan County group home whose license had been revoked recently has closed after leaders say it wasn't able to maintain a trained workforce. The Adriel School in West Liberty housed and taught about 40 kids with behavioral issues from across Southwest and Central Ohio. In the past several years, West Liberty Police had responded to the campus hundreds of times for everything from fights to stolen cars. RELATED: State alleges Logan Co. group home workers taught kids to snort, smoke "With them being closed, it'll reduce our calls for service and we'll be able to focus on some other things," West Liberty Police Chief Shane Oelker said. The decision to close was difficult, Adriel CEO Todd Hanes said, since the campus has been a residential facility for more than 100 years. "There is no question that this is painful," he said. Earlier this month, a letter from the Ohio Department of Job and Family Services said the state had revoked the home's license and alleged employees violated regulations on several occasions, including reportedly showing kids how to snort pills to get high and not seeking prompt medical care for injured children. Hanes hasn't denied the allegations but said that the employees involved were terminated and the home took steps to improve. But those issues weren't the main reason Adriel closed, Hanes. MORE COVERAGE: Fights lead to 9 juvenile arrests at Adriel group home in Logan Co. "Our top reason is finding a sufficient number of staff here in this area," he said. It wasn't possible to hire enough qualified workers in a small town like West Liberty, he said. "We have no intention of operating a residential facility," he said, "and that's independent of ODJFS." On Friday, the remaining seven children at the home were picked up, he said. Workers began finding other placements for the children two weeks ago, he said, and were able to find foster homes for some children. Others were picked up by the counties they're from. Neighbors have complained over the past few years about vandalism and thefts. But some neighbors, like Janet Yoder, are worried about the well-being of the children. "The things that have happened are wrong and they need to be taken care of in the right way," she said. "But where are these children going to go?" She used to raise money for the home, she said, and saw how it gave children a stable environment. EARLIER COVERAGE: Spike in police calls to youth home challenges community "The bad things you hear are always going to overshadow the good things because that's what we focus on," she said. "And that's a shame." Adriel will now focus on the other services it provides, Hanes said, including its foster care network, family preservation and visitation programs. Its leaders are looking to discuss options with the local school district or educational service center for the school building on its campus that will now go unused, he said. Adriel has assisted the 52 employees who will lose their jobs because of the closure, he said. They've offered job fairs and interviews on campus. "Things do change and this organization has undergone changes several times in its past," he said. "I think we'll come through this stronger." It's in the best interest of the children to close the school, Oelker said, if the company isn't able to keep a qualified staff. "We're going to continue to work with them if they ask for our help with things," the police chief said. He plans to focus more on community policing. Adriel had previously appealed the state's decision to revoke its license but Hanes said no decision has been made as to whether the home will continue that appeal. Staying with the story The Springfield News-Sun has reported on problems at the Adriel School in West Liberty for nearly three years, including stories digging into complaints from neighbors and police officials and state investigations of the group home. By the numbers 40: Approximate number of children housed at the Adriel group home 52: Employees laid off because of the group home closure 100: Years Adriel has had a residential home in West Liberty Source: <http://www.springfieldnewssun.com/news/crime-law/west-liberty-group-home-closes-after-license-revoked-staff-shortages/mrex7SDtQYWlfoJ2BSiSK/>

Three Separate School Fights Top Mount Pleasant Police Blotter Carol Reif Share Tweet Pin It Email Print 0 Comments Mount Pleasant police are investigating three separate incidents of violence at a local high school and at two residential treatment schools. Photo Credit: File More Articles police & fire Female Teen Swings Lacrosse Stick In St. Thomas Aquinas Fight... Condo Fire Contained Off Route 6 In Mohegan Lake Man In Trench Coat Reportedly Took Photos Near School, North ... comment 0 Read / Add Comments MOUNT PLEASANT, N.Y. -- Several young people are facing assault and harassment charges in three separate altercations in Mount Pleasant, police said. The first incident, which police said took place at Westlake High School on Wednesday, Feb. 8, involved a 17-year-old and an 18-year-old from Thornwood. They both were charged with third-degree assault and had been scheduled to appear in Town Court on an unspecified date. Police said the second incident involved an 18-year-old Peekskill girl who is attending the Edenwald School, which is part of the Mount Pleasant-Cottage Union Free School District. The teen was charged with second-degree harassment after police charged her with hitting another student with "a rolling pin," on Friday, Feb. 10, police said. Edenwald serves about 130 residential and day students with academic, social, behavioral and vocational needs. Meanwhile, on Thursday, Feb. 16, five residents of the Hawthorne Cedar Knolls Residential Treatment Center are being accused of attacking and injuring a classmate's mother, police said. The five, all girls, were charged with third-degree assault. Three of them are under 16 and were referred to Westchester County Family Court. The other two, ages 16 and 17, were referred to Town Court, police said. Hawthorne Cedar Knolls provides mental health, social and therapeutic services to at-risk boys and girls, ages eight to 18. The next day, a 17-year-old resident of the Mann Center Residential Treatment Center at Hawthorne Cedar Knolls was charged with falsely reporting an incident. Police accuse the teen of intentionally setting off a fire alarm at the facility. In other police blotter items: Saturday, Feb. 11: A 41-year-old Pleasantville man was charged with Endangering the welfare of a child after police accused him of committing a lewd act at the family's home. Tuesday, Feb. 14: - A 42-year-old Yonkers woman, pulled over by police on Elwood Avenue in Hawthorne, is facing several vehicle and traffic charges. Police said she had a suspended registration and the vehicle she was driving was unregistered and uninsured. Wednesday, Feb. 15: A 31-year-old Thornwood man was charged with harassment and criminal contempt in connection with, police said, "ongoing family issues." Thursday, Feb. 16: A 32-year-old Hawthorne man has been charged with leaving the scene of an accident. Police accused him of striking another car on Pythian Avenue and then fleeing. A brief investigation by the Mount Pleasant police patrol, with assistance from a resident's home video surveillance, led officers to the suspect as well as his damaged vehicle. He was also charged with operating without a driver's license. The driver of the other vehicle was treated for a fractured hand. Friday, Feb. 17: A 30-year-old Ossining woman was charged with aggravated unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle after becoming stuck in the median on Phelps Way (Route 117) in Pleasantville. Sunday, Feb. 19: A 23-year-old Ossining woman was charged with driving while intoxicated after driving her car off the road into the center median on Phelps Way (Route 117) in Pleasantville near the entrance to Rockefeller State Park. Source: <http://mountpleasant.dailyvoice.com/police-fire/three-separate-school-fights-top-mount-pleasant-police-blotter/700579/>

New York to pay $3M to family of disabled boy molested by staffer at group home which perv called 'a predator's dream' New York to pay $3M to family of boy molested at group home THE ASSOCIATED PRESS Monday, February 20, 2017, 1:04 PM facebook Tweet email Stephen DeProspero, right, in Oneida County Court in Utica, N.Y., as he is arraigned on charges of predatory sexual assault against a young child in Aug. 2010. (Rocco LaDuca/AP) THE ASSOCIATED PRESS Monday, February 20, 2017, 1:04 PM ALBANY, N.Y. — New York state is paying $3 million to the family of developmentally disabled boy repeatedly molested by a staffer at a state-run group home who later wrote that lax supervision at the facility made it "a predator's dream." The former staffer, Stephen DeProspero, is now imprisoned in the Attica Correctional Facility. He was incriminated by videos and photographs he took of the molestation, which occurred from 2005 to 2008 at the facility located in central New York. "The lack of supervision there made it easy to do what I did," DeProspero said in a handwritten affidavit obtained by The Associated Press. "I could have stayed in that house for years and abused him every day without anybody even noticing at all. It was a predator's dream." State officials say new policies are in place to prevent similar crimes. But a leading critic of state institutional care said the problems persist. "Tragically, this sexual predator case is a drop in the bucket in regards to the rampant sexual abuse occurring within New York State's mental health care system today," said Michael Carey, whose autistic son was killed by a state caregiver 10 years ago this month. The Office for People With Developmental Disabilities, which oversees care for more than 128,000 New Yorkers, has taken steps to strengthen safety and security, according to spokesman Scott Sandman. They include pre-employment psychological assessments and enhanced staff training on ways to prevent, recognize and report abuse and neglect. Senior administrators are required to make unannounced inspections of state-run facilities. "We also increased the minimum qualifications for our state direct support staff and put more stringent background checks in place," he said, adding that an agency created by Democratic Gov. Andrew Cuomo and known as the Justice Center has the power to investigate "any abuse or neglect of a person we serve." The Justice Center investigated only six of the nearly 1,400 deaths of developmentally disabled people who died in state care from June 30, 2013, to May 31, 2015, according to a review last year by the AP. In the case of DeProspero, red flags that might have prompted an investigation went unnoticed. Some of the abuse occurred in an open, common area of the group home, according to legal documents. In another instance, DeProspero recorded a video of abuse over the course of four hours on Christmas Eve 2007, even though DeProspero was not scheduled to work that day. "I was confident that a supervisor would never check in to see what was going on," DeProspero wrote in his statement. "The supervisors spent the vast majority of their shifts in their offices doing paperwork. They were rarely out of their offices." DeProspero, 43, pleaded guilty to predatory sexual assault in 2010 and was sentenced to 18 years to life. He also pleaded guilty to manufacturing child pornography and was sentenced to 40 years. The sentences are being served concurrently. He came to the attention of authorities in 2009 when an investigation of online child pornography led them to his computer. Photos and video of the molestation were later discovered. The $3 million settlement between the state and the family of the victim was finalized late last year. It's intended to pay for the victim's future care and visits with his mother. The victim, now 20, has autism and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and is mostly nonverbal. He remains at a state-operated group home. "This is a case where you had someone who really was evil. But what failed here was the system," said Andrew Celli, an attorney with the New York City firm of Emery Celli Brinckerhoff & Abady LLP, which represented the boy's family in the case. "You have to have systems in place to ensure the safety of children who have needs, and they just fell down on the job here." Carey wants state leaders to require surveillance cameras in group homes. He's also pushed legislation that would require complaints about possible abuse or neglect of disabled or mentally ill people in state care to go to 911 and local prosecutors rather than investigative units within state agencies. Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/new-york-pay-3m-family-boy-molested-group-home-article-1.2977392>

Sick, Dying and Raped in New York's Mental Health Facilities & Group Homes Jonathan Carey "Champion for the Disabled" Born September 12, 1993 Killed by caregivers on February 15, 2007 Governor Cuomo has refused to take vital basic emergency actions to protect disabled children and adults from premature death, sexual abuse and rape Governor Cuomo had every opportunity to right many wrongs, but chose to continue to cover-up most of the damages and loss of lives instead." — Michael Carey DELMAR, NEW YORK, UNITED STATES, February 23, 2017 /EINPresswire.com/ -- You can take the CNN investigative report titled, "Sick, Dying and Raped in America's Nursing Homes" <http://cnnpressroom.blogs.cnn.com/2017/02/22/sick-dying-and-raped-in-america-s-nursing-homes-a-cnn-investigation/> and simply change the words America to New York State and Nursing Homes to Mental Health Facilities and Group Homes, the similarities are almost identical. New York State documents obtained through Freedom of Information Law (FOIL) reveal staggering numbers of deaths and sexual assaults in these facilities. These massive problems cannot continue to be pushed aside and ignored by the Governor of New York State. Governor Cuomo has claimed publicly saying "I am disabled" <http://newyork.cbslocal.com/2017/01/29/cuomo-travel-ban-hotline/> which is obviously not true, but he was using it, along with other statements, to say that he is fighting for people with disabilities and their rights, which also sadly not true. The sheer staggering numbers of reported deaths and sexual assaults in these State and private facilities and group homes throughout New York State speak volumes. The truth is, we have severe systemic failures and very ugly things are happening behind these closed doors and many innocent and extremely vulnerable people with disabilities are dying and being raped as a result. State documents reveal that 11-12 deaths on average are reported a day and 1,300 sexual assaults within the Office of People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD) system alone on average every year or close to four a day. Most of the deaths are covered-up because Governor Cuomo's Justice Center is not notifying County elected District Attorney's and Medical Examiners or Coroners of most of these deaths. It is hard to fathom that they continue to get away with this evil and these crimes as I continue to expose it and shout it from the rooftops, but hopefully it will be stopped soon. In regards to sexual assaults, the numbers exponentially increase when we look at the full reality and fact that almost all of these sexual assault crimes against these disabled victims, that in most cases cannot speak or defend themselves, will never be witnessed or reported. A well known report titled "Prevalence of Violence" <http://www.mass.gov/dppe/abuse-recognize/prevalence-of-violence.html> has been up on the State of Massachusetts website for a long time, brings an even more powerful fact to light, which is a horrible fact that only 3% of these sexual assaults and rapes of the developmentally disabled will ever be reported. Using this statistical data along with the known New York State numbers of reported sexual assaults could mean that approximately one third of the developmentally disabled living in State and private facilities within the OPWDD system alone are sexually assaulted on average once a year. Sexual abuse and rape of the disabled in these facilities is a massive problem which has been known by Governor Cuomo for many years. Most deaths and sexual assault crimes of New Yorkers with disabilities living in known unsafe residential care facilities and group homes are swept under the rug and covered-up by Cuomo's fraudulent Justice Center. There are basic safety and abuse prevention measures that will make the system much better and safer and dramatically reduce the staggering numbers of deaths and sexual abuse crimes occurring in these facilities, but Governor Cuomo has refused to take action. Surveillance cameras must finally be installed within all mental health facilities and group homes, as well as all transport vehicles, this is vital to prevent these deaths, crimes and to hold sexual predators accountable. Immediate and direct reporting by mandated reporters to 911 and not a State whitewash/cover-up entity is not only critical to hold criminals accountable, but will also save many lives. No longer can New York State continue to deny innocent and extremely vulnerable children and adults with disabilities living outside their family's home 911 emergency first responder medical and police services and assistance, this is discrimination and in many cases it is deadly. Bypassing local authorities, laws in place for everyone and local courts also denies this specific group of people their 14th Amendment right to "equal protection of laws." Included are two very important news pieces. AP News just reported on a disgusting case in which a New York State caregiver was molesting a disabled child in a State run group home. Thankfully, there was some measure of justice in this case, but most are being covered-up by Governor Cuomo's wrongfully named Justice Center which is keeping most reported sexual assault crimes from local police and County elected District Attorney's. Here is the story followed by another horrific one as well; "New York to pay $3M to family of boy molested at group home" <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/new-york-pay-3m-family-boy-molested-group-home-article-1.2977392>. New York State's system is made up of thousands of State run and privately operated facilities and group homes and the rampant sexual abuse in these facilities can easily be dramatically reduced, but not if basic prevention measures continue to be ignored. The award winning New York Times "Abused & Used" investigative reporting series which was a runner up for a Pulitzer Prize, exposed New York State's extremely dangerous and deadly system in 2011. Governor Cuomo was already aware of the severe problems because it was brought to his attention while he was the NYS Attorney General. Governor Cuomo had every opportunity to right many wrongs, but chose to continue to cover-up most of the damages and loss of lives instead. The very first NY Times investigative report that came out in March of 2011, two months after Cuomo became Governor, details how a sexual predator was caught in the act and that he was still protected and shielded by the State <http://www.nytimes.com/2011/03/13/nyregion/13homes.html>. Here is the extremely disturbing quote from this investigative report; "At a home upstate in Hudson Falls, two days before Christmas in 2006, an employee discovered her supervisor, Ricky W. Sousie, in the bedroom of a severely disabled, 54-year-old woman. Mr. Sousie, a stocky man with wispy hair, was standing between the woman's legs. His pants were around his ankles, his hand was on her knee and her diaper was pulled down. The police were called, and semen was found on the victim. But the state did not seek to discipline Mr. Sousie. Instead, it transferred him to work at another home." Pretty graphic, but this type of evil must come out into the light and dramatic steps must be taken to prevent these horrible sex crimes and rapes of disabled men, women, boys and girls whom are extremely vulnerable and in most cases cannot defend themselves. Bypassing 911 and local police is how New York State currently gets away with covering-up thousands of crimes and deaths annually. Michael Carey Mr. 5188529377 email.us.here The incredible life and tragic preventable death of Jonathan Carey, who was disabled, had autism, was non-verbal & only 13 when he was killed by his caregivers Source: http://www.einnews.com/pr_news/367915136/sick-dying-and-raped-in-new-york-s-mental-health-facilities-group-homes

Foster care worker pleads guilty to falsifying records Foster care worker pleads guilty to falsifying records AMY BENNETT WILLIAMS and MELANIE PAYNE, The News-Press Published 1:02 p.m. ET Feb. 24, 2017 | Updated 21 hours ago Denny Kern, 53, a child welfare caseworker for the state pleaded guilty to falsifying documents. (Photo: Florida Department of Corrections) 74 CONNECT TWEET 1 LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A DCF subcontractor who lied multiple times about an at-risk toddler's whereabouts has pleaded guilty to falsifying and destroying records. Cape Coral resident Denny Kern, 53, was sentenced to four years' probation for the crime. Kern was arrested in November after an Office of the Inspector General investigation determined he had falsified records. Kern was a case manager, required to make regular health and welfare checks on children under the supervision of the Department of Children and Families. Kern is by no means the only child welfare worker to file fake paperwork. His was one of 25 cases involving falsification of case management records investigated in the past seven years; of those, 20 ended in employees being fired or quitting. There was one suspension and four cases that were unsubstantiated or had no action taken. While working for Lutheran Services, which has a contract with Children's Network, the private company that provides services to the state's Department of Children and Families, Kern reported he'd visited the toddler girl in Cape Coral. Although Kern knew the child had been moved to West Palm Beach because her mother was in jail, he filed a log detailing visits to the child in March, April and May. The falsified documents came to light only after Kern was fired in May 2015 for poor job performance. When Lutheran Services supervisor Gwen Doyle took over Kern's 38-child caseload, she started hearing from family members and caregivers that he hadn't been doing his job. According to the investigative report, "When Mr. Kern visited (Caregiver 1's) home, Mr. Kern would come to the door, have a blank piece of paper, and ask Caregiver 1 to sign it. Mr. Kern never came inside the home. ... He indicated that Mr. Kern was aware that Child 1 was not present in the home and did not need to see (her)." In another case, Kern admitted another child he was supposed to visit regularly was sometimes "probably not" at home when he said she was, though "Kern believed 90 percent of the case notes were accurate and 10 percent of the case notes ... were false, but could not recall which case notes were false." 4-month old dies in Pine Manor, DCF takes sibling

The fabrications included details that led supervisors to believe Kern had been doing his job. In logs for visits to a child he had not seen, he wrote: "(She) was dressed in a blouse, shorts, socks." "(She) was playing in the back yard when (Kern) arrived and that was where (Kern) conducted private discussion." "(She) likes to play with her toys and be outside (She) does miss her (jailed) mother." In his testimony, Kern told investigators that "He liked (his job) at times; however, it did not suit him. This was a result of caseloads expanding to about 30 cases, with 50 children on a caseload." Kern testified when he asked Doyle for help, she told him to "figure it out." He began going to a counselor because he was feeling personally and professionally overwhelmed, he said, and that's when he began submitting false case notes. Kern admitted he lied "because he wanted to 'get it done' and indicated, 'It was poor workmanship.' ... Kern indicated that he is embarrassed, feels ashamed, and regrets his conduct." Uneven DCF funding worries child welfare advocates

James Miller, assistant state attorney and chief of the economic crime unit for the Office of the State Attorney, said Kern told investigators the requirements of the job "got to be too much" and that he was working weekends just to keep up. "He believed he had a nervous breakdown." Prosecutors wanted Kern to be found guilty, Miller said, giving him a felony record and precluding him from future employment in a position of public trust. After a retired judge from another state testified on Kern's behalf, Miller said, Judge Ramiro Manalich withheld adjudication, which means that if Kern completes his probation he will not have a felony record. Kern's lawyer, Scott Thomas Moorey, declined to comment, citing attorney/client privilege. DCF spokeswoman Natalie Harrell said any time there's suspicion a DCF employee or subcontractor has falsified records, the concerns are immediately reported to the Office of the Inspector General, an independent state watchdog agency. "They then determine if it rises to the level of an investigation," she said. Falsification, omission, or misrepresentation is the most-investigated category of wrongdoing, accounting for 80 percent of the 225 allegations the Inspector General's office investigated in the 2015-2016 period. When allegations are found to be true, all cases are referred to law enforcement, Harrell said. "The department maintains a zero tolerance policy for falsifying documents. Any time an employee is found to have falsified documentation, the most appropriate and aggressive action, including dismissal, will be taken (and) any individual investigated by the department, whether an employee or not, who is found to have violated the law, including through the falsification of records, is referred to law enforcement for criminal investigation," she said.

Kern timeline April 13, 2013: Started as a case manager at Lutheran Services Jan. 2015: Placed on performance-improvement plan May 14, 2015: Fired for ongoing poor performance; supervisor Gwen Doyle takes over Kern's 38-child caseload May 29, 2015: Lutheran Services reports falsified records to the office of the Inspector General Dec. 18, 2015: Case referred to the Florida Department of Law Enforcement Sept. 16, 2016: FDLE referred the case to the State Attorney's office Nov. 16, 2016: Kern arrested by the Lee County Sheriff's Office Feb. 6: Kern pleads guilty and is sentenced to four years probation Source: <http://www.news-press.com/story/news/2017/02/24/ex-dcf-subcontractor-pleads-guilty-falsifying-records/98302196/>

Child Abuse Council Launches Investigation into County Foster Care System Following NBC Bay Area Investigation High turnover rates and a social worker shortage are at the center of a new investigation by the Santa Clara County Child Abuse Council looking into the Department of Family and Children's Services which provides support to more than 1,300 children By Vicky Nguyen, Michael Bott, and Mark Villarreal Child Abuse Council Launches Investigation into County Foster Care System Following NBC Bay Area Investigation Link Embed Copy Close Link to this video Copy Close Embed this video Replay More videos (1 of 9) ⌂ CC Options Captions FCC × Font Size 1.00 Opacity 100.00% Text Color Background Border Edge Effects This is a preview of your caption settings. This is a preview of your caption settings. This is a preview of your caption settings. This is a preview of your caption settings. This is a preview of your caption settings. This is a preview of your caption settings. 1:40 / 4:57 Share High turnover rates and a severe social worker shortage are at the center of a new investigation by the Santa Clara County Child Abuse Council looking into the Department of Family and Children's Services which provides support to more than 1,300 children in the foster system. The investigation comes in response to a series of NBC Bay Area reports exposing serious concerns about severe abuse and even a child's death following questionable actions at DFCS. (Published Friday, Feb. 24, 2017) The Santa Clara County Child Abuse Council has launched a probe into the Department of Family and Children Services following a series of reports by NBC Bay Area's Investigative Unit. The advisory committee wants to find out what's causing high turnover rates and complaints among social workers that they are not able to provide vital services to vulnerable children. Last August, a group of six social workers spoke to NBC Bay Area, alleging a "toxic" work environment at the agency was driving out social workers, leading to dozens of unfilled vacancies and unmanageable caseloads. According to a spokesperson for the Santa Clara County Social Services Agency, the department has lost 110 social workers over the past two years. The agency says it's actively working to replace those workers, but progress has been slow. In fact, the agency currently has 42 unfilled vacancies, 50 percent more than last June when there were only 28 vacancies. "That just leads to bad outcomes for the children and parents that are getting services from DFCS," said Andrew Cain, Chairperson of the Santa Clara County Child Abuse Council. He's also the Supervising Attorney with Legal Advocates for Children and Youth. "We really wanted to see what are some of the issues that are contributing to that." NBC Bay Area first revealed concerns about decision making at DFCS in October 2015, when a young girl was nearly killed after reports and signs of her abuse were missed by multiple social workers. Last March, foster parent Shellie Nichol spoke out after social workers removed 2-year-old Kelly Nguyen from her care, placing the girl with her father in a men's halfway house. The medically fragile toddler died there two months later on February 28th. Nearly a year after her death, the coroner's office says the results of the autopsy are still pending. Nichol told NBC Bay Area she repeatedly questioned the decision to move Nguyen, and warned social workers it wasn't in the best interest of the special needs child. "We were gravely concerned," Nichol said. Hiring and retaining social workers is a constant struggle for many California counties, but Cain said the issues he's witnessed in Santa Clara firsthand and in NBC Bay Area's reporting warranted further investigation. Cain said the working group created by the Child Abuse Council has just started gathering information, and the investigation will result in a list of recommendations to the Board of Supervisors about how to address the key problems at DFCS. When social workers are spread so thin, foster parents are often among the first to see how vulnerable children can slip through the cracks. "[Social workers] are too overworked, too overwhelmed and don't have enough education or training," Jane Ramirez said. The veteran foster parent has cared for more than 50 children and teens in Santa Clara County over the past 30 years. "These are children's lives in the balance. Those are my kids' lives. Those were kids I invested myself in that I loved, that I considered my kids. And for things to happen to them is just so sad." Ramirez is licensed in Santa Clara County but she's currently fostering 4-year-old Damien, a medically fragile toddler from Monterrey County. She said she's thankful the Child Abuse Council is taking on the investigation, and hopes the staffing challenges plaguing the agency can be addressed. "One of the things the Child Abuse Council is doing right now is trying to gather more information through looking at very concrete things like exit surveys, staff complaints that were filed with management, and trying to parse through that information," Cain said. The Department of Family and Children's Services conducted an internal investigation last year when a group of frustrated social workers brought their grievances to management, but the report was never made public. Those social workers told NBC Bay Area they had hoped to keep their complaints in-house, and only decided to go public when they felt ignored. NBC Bay Area requested an interview with Francesca LeRue, the new director for the Santa Clara County Department of Family and Children's Services, to discuss her vision for the agency and how she plans to address staffing issues there, but the request was declined. In a written statement, LeRue said: "Our goal for 2017-2018 will be to align all existing efforts and resources to build a strong infrastructure to meet federal and state performance outcome measures, focusing on doing what is required and doing it well. In this way, we will hold ourselves accountable, while we also respect and support one another, and celebrate our successes." While hiring and turnover continue to be an issue, the agency has managed to dramatically improve the rate of calls answered at the Child Abuse and Neglect (CAN) Center, which manages the county's 24 hour child abuse hotline. A 2013 audit found the CAN Center failed to answer about 40 percent of calls on the hotline. This month, a county spokesperson said 99 percent of those calls are now being answered. The department acknowledged some of those calls go to voicemail or are answered by clerical staff, rather than a licensed social worker trained to assess the safety of a child. Cain says he hopes the Child Abuse Council will wrap up its investigation within the next three months. He said they'll take their findings to the Board of Supervisors and present possible solutions to any issues they uncover. For now, Cain said his priorities are to shrink caseloads for social workers and make sure they feel supported. "Social work is arguably the toughest job that we have out there," Cain said. "In order for them to do their job in the way to best serve these children, they need to feel supported." Ramirez says she's glad the agency has a new leader at the helm, and hopes that will translate to improvements for children in the foster system and the resource families that take care of them. Despite the challenges and frustrations she's experienced at times over the last three decades, Ramirez said she would happily do it all over again. "I would not give up children or fosters for anything in the world," Ramirez said. "It has enriched our lives so much. That's why you do it – for the kids. If the system wasn't so crazy there would be so many more people out there doing what I'm doing and love it." You can see the rest of our reporting on the Department of Family and Children's Services here: Click here to watch Part I Click here to watch Part II Click here to watch Part III Click here to watch Part IV If you have a tip for Vicky Nguyen, email her at vicky@nbcbayarea.com. You can follow her on Twitter @vickynguyen and Facebook www.facebook.com/vickynguyenTV for updates. If you have a tip for Investigative Producer Michael Bott, email him at michael.bott@nbcuni.com. You can follow him on Twitter at @TweetBottNBC. Or give the Unit a call at 888-996-TIPS (8477) Source: Child Abuse Council Launches Investigation into County Foster Care System Following NBC Bay Area Investigation | NBC Bay Area <http://www.nbcbayarea.com/investigations/Child-Abuse-Council-Launches-Investigation-into-County-Foster-Care-System-Following-NBC-Bay-Area-Investigation-414752083.html#ixzz4ZkSrSGLq> Follow us: @NBCBayArea on Twitter | NBCBayArea on Facebook Source: <http://www.nbcbayarea.com/investigations/Child-Abuse-Council-Launches-Investigation-into-County-Foster-Care-System-Following-NBC-Bay-Area-Investigation-414752083.html>

A local treatment center accused of putting profits over people A local treatment center accused of putting profits over people WKYC 10:14 AM. EST February 28, 2017 Abraxas Ohio is a residential treatment center located near Mansfield. They house about 100 teenaged boys, most sent by the juvenile court system because of drug or alcohol problems. A former employee, who was hired as a Clinical Supervisor, spoke to Tom Meyer about her concerns on the quality of treatment these teens received. She alleges Abraxas "Falsely represented the qualifications and training of personnel." She alleges many so-called Abraxas counselors were actually unemployed plumbers, roofers, laborers, who needed a job. She also alleged that group sessions did not take place. Yet, the facility billed Medicaid as if they did. "It's a total misuse of the money. It's corruption at its best." she said. Residential Treatment Centers are supposed to be helping troubled kids get back on track - overcome addiction - and mental illnesses. So how can we make sure they don't put profits over people? Source: <http://www.wkyc.com/news/a-local-treatment-center-accused-of-putting-profits-over-people/416112708>

Former group home worker sentenced to jail, probation Brad Dicken | The Chronicle-Telegram Published on Feb. 28, 2017 | Updated 2:09 p. m. Share Tweet Share Email Comments A former worker at the Lorain County Juvenile Court's Stepping Stone group home was sentenced Monday to four years probation and 30 days in the Lorain County Jail for trading drugs with residents at the facility. Sean Justice, 30, who pleaded guilty in January to attempted corrupting another with drugs and two counts of conspiracy, also was ordered to pay a $5,000 fine by county Common Pleas Judge John Miraldi. Sean Justice CT FILE Enlarge Justice's attorney, Paul St. Marie, said his client's legal problems were the result of a back injury he sustained while in the U.S. Navy as a nuclear technician. St. Marie wrote in a sentencing memorandum that Justice suffered herniated disks in his back when his submarine was hit by a wave and "unexpectedly lurched and rolled" while at sea. He said Justice became addicted to the painkillers he was prescribed. Justice said he lied to himself about the nature of his problem, although he insisted that he has since gotten clean. "I'm sorry that it ever got this far, that I didn't ask for help sooner," Justice said during the hearing. Justice resigned from his county job in January 2014 after he was confronted at his home by court staff about allegations that he was involved in drug activity at Stepping Stone. A Lorain County Drug Task Force report on the investigation said when investigators later raided Justice's Elyria home he confessed to giving one teenager $90 to get him pills and that he received a painkiller and one hit of acid from a teen at the facility. He also acknowledged that he had sent a series of text messages to teens from the facility in which he discussed drugs and asked teen to obtain drugs for him. A group of residents at Stepping Stone called themselves the "Justice Four" because of the preferential treatment they received. One boy told investigators Justice gave him synthetic marijuana and anti-anxiety medication in exchange for good behavior, while another said he traded his attention deficit disorder medication to Justice for other drugs. The task force's report noted that court officials' decision to pursue their own review of the allegations against Justice interfered with the criminal investigations. It also complained about the account of the activity that Juvenile Court Administrator Jody Barilla gave to state regulators. Barilla has previously said that once the court had information concerning wrongdoing by an employee they were required to take action and tried not to interfere with the criminal investigation. The probe into Justice wasn't the first time his superiors at the court grew concerned about his possible involvement with drugs. He was investigated in March 2013 after a resident reported Justice asked him if he knew anyone who could get him painkillers. Although text messages seemed to confirm the allegations against Justice, he told court officials someone must have "swiped" his phone and used the device to send the messages. He was reprimanded and returned to work. The mother of one of the boys involved in the case that led to charges against Justice attended the hearing and afterward said while she wasn't happy with how the case was handled by the court system and had expected Justice to receive a longer sentence, but that she hoped he has cleaned up his life. "I hope he gets his act together," she said. Contact Brad Dicken at 329-7147 or bdicken@chroniclet.com. Follow him on Twitter @BradDickenCT. Source: <http://www.chroniclet.com/cops-and-courts/2017/02/28/Former-group-home-worker-sentenced-to-jail-probation.html>

In our opinion: Lawmakers should explore flexible, compassionate system for juvenile offenders By Deseret News editorial board Published: Feb. 28, 2017 7:00 a.m. Updated: Feb. 27, 2017 9:26 p.m. 2 Comments View 1 Item Laura Seitz, Deseret News FILE æ" A youth stands in his room at the Salt Lake Juvenile Detention Center in Salt Lake City on Friday, Feb. 5, 2016. Vignette V6 651bc87f7cc034217fab1d44951b1bd390b0947 Thu Mar 02 15:51:08 2017 Vignette V6 40794f7adc70e00321d79965a41a59ee448730eb Thu Mar 02 15:51:08 2017 It's been two years since the Utah Legislature initiated a comprehensive reform of the state's justice system, a work still in progress but one that would substantially revise the way juvenile courts handle low-risk offenders. Though the effort will cost more up-front, in the long run it promises to save the state money and will work to keep many youth out who don't deserve to be caught up in the detention system. The measure, HB239, envisions a more flexible and compassionate system for juvenile offenders that lawmakers should explore. First, the new system would make it easier for authorities to deal with offenders on a more individualized basis. Second, it would emphasize early intervention to head off behavioral problems that could escalate into more serious offenses. Third, it would reduce overall costs by allowing more kids to stay in their homes while undergoing court proceedings or counseling instead of facing lockup in a detention facility. Keeping youth in secure lockup or in a group home costs significantly more than monitoring their behavior while they stay with their families. Additionally, in many instances, reintegrating offenders with their family can be more conducive to reform. The current legislative proposal emanates from a study conducted after the 2015 legislative session worked to revise sentencing standards and other procedures in the adult court system. The Juvenile Justice Working Group was tasked by the governor, legislative leaders and leaders of the state judiciary to undertake a data-driven study of the juvenile court system in order to find ways to improve outcomes for offenders and their families while protecting public safety and containing costs. The group's report has resulted in the proposed legislation now before the House. The working group identified trends that show the current system, by requiring nearly all offenders of even minor crimes to be held in at least temporary detention, can be detrimental to rehabilitation and does not lower rates of recidivism. Some will undoubtedly worry that juvenile justice reform may lead to losses in terms of public safety. These are legitimate concerns. However, the working group found that there is evidence that spending time in detention actually increases the risk of a juvenile re-offending, thus compounding the public safety risks. Meanwhile, in recent years, the rate of recidivism among juvenile offenders in Utah has risen while there has also been an increase in serious felony offenses by juveniles. These trends speak to the need to re-evaluate the way young offenders are dealt with the system, and the proposed legislation demonstrates an understanding backed by data that intervention and home-based treatment is more effective than long-term detention. It has long been the philosophy of the justice system to treat juvenile offenders differently than adult criminals with the intent of offering youth a chance to quickly make amends for an offense and move forward with their lives. The current system now skews more toward incarceration, requiring even low-risk offenders to be taken to a detention facility for offenses as minor as truancy from school. HB239 represents a sound, sensible and more compassionate way to deal with kids who fall into wayward behavior. Source: <http://www.deseretnews.com/article/865674416/In-our-opinion-Lawmakers-should-explore-flexible-compassionate-system-for-jvenile-offenders.html>

Wisconsin youth prison bill moves through hearing AP February 28, 2017 at 12:00 pm | The Associated Press MADISON, Wis. (AP) — A bill addressing abuse allegations at Wisconsin's troubled youth prison is gaining traction. The measure would make guards at the facility outside Irma mandatory child abuse reporters, a move that would protect the guards from being fired for reporting incidents. The bill sailed through a Senate judiciary committee public hearing Tuesday. Sen. LaTonya Johnson, one of the bill's chief authors, was the only person who spoke on the measure, saying it would create accountability and transparency. The committee expects to vote Thursday on whether to forward the measure to the full Senate. The FBI is currently investigating allegations of widespread abuse at the prison. Current and former inmates have filed two federal lawsuits challenging conditions there. The GOP-controlled Legislature has yet to pass anything addressing the prison. Source: <http://www.beloitdailynews.com/article/20170228/AP/302289857>

Whistleblower: Millions wasted at NE Ohio rehab center for teens Whistleblower: millions wasted at NE treatment center Phil Trexler, WKYC 11:24 PM. EST February 28, 2017 Lavonte Hinchey was a former client at Abraxas Ohio (Photo: Phil Trexler, WKYC) CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN GOOGLE+ PINTEREST SHELBY - One of the nation's largest private prison companies is defending itself against Medicaid fraud charges filed by a former clinical supervisor at an Ohio residential treatment center for teens. Lynn Roycroft's federal lawsuit alleges Abraxas Ohio in Shelby, an all-male, treatment center owned by GEO Group Inc., billed the government for years on "false or fraudulent" claims, including counseling sessions never happened. "I would say it was a pretty egregious abuse of your tax dollars," Roycroft told WKYC Channel 3 News. "Because treatment did not happen for the most part." According to state Medicaid officials, Abraxas received more than $9 million in payments in 2016 and more than $33 million since 2012. Roycroft, who has spent 33 years in counseling, alleges the federal government was billed by Abraxas for group counseling sessions that were never held. She also alleges progress reports were "cut and pasted" from one resident to another. She also contends men and women who once worked blue collar jobs such as plumbers and roofers were hired by Abraxas, given a week of training and then acted as professional counselors for the 100 boys who were housed at the residential facility in Richland County. Abraxas, she said, misrepresented the credentials and qualifications of some counselors. The teens treated at Abraxas were generally sent to the facility to obtain counseling and treatment after having cases heard in juvenile courts across Ohio, including Cuyahoga and Summit counties. Aside from financial and billing irregularities, Roycroft says the teenage boys were often improperly restrained and that "counselors" spent more time "controlling behaviors" instead of providing counseling for drug and alcohol abuse. "The philosophy of the institution was to get as many kids in there as you could and bill [Medicaid] your three hours of group [counseling] a day, whether the groups happened or not," Roycroft said. "To me, it's just blatant fraud." Pablo Paez, a GEO Group spokesman, said Roycroft's lawsuit "has no merit" and that the company will defend it "vigorously." He declined further comment. Abraxas Ohio's director is Erich Dumbeck, who once headed the Huron County Department of Jobs and Family Services. In 2007, Dumbeck resigned in the wake of world-wide attention focusing his agency and a couple who kept their foster children in crudely built cages. Dumbeck declined comment. Lavonte Hinchey of Cleveland was twice sent to Abraxas for three-month stints in 2008 and 2009. He called the programming "a joke" and said teens were not provided counseling. "A lot of the friends I made there...you can look it up, they're having problems today out on the streets," said Hinchey. "They don't know how to handle their problems day to day. "A lot of people's tax dollars went in, but nothing came out of it." That's largely due to the lack of counseling and proper training of staff, Roycroft said. When she was hired in 2008, Roycroft said she was expected to address myriad problems inside the expansive residential center near Mansfield. Some group sessions never met, however, reports were filled out as if they did occur, she said. Those forms were then submitted to Medicaid for billing purposes. "It was totally out of control when I got there," she said. "A lot of the time, I was really just spending trying to wrap my head around what I was being told." The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court, is pending. Roycroft is seeking unspecified damages. She and her attorney say taxpayers were defrauded, but the children and their families continue to suffer because they never received the help needed to overcome addictions or other mental health issues. "This is fraud," said attorney Warner Mendenhall of Akron. "This is very abusive. The worst type of abuse because it's victimizing the most vulnerable people in our society." Source: <http://www.wkyc.com/news/investigations/whistleblower-alleges-tax-dollar-fraud-at-ne-ohio-rehab-center/416246626>

How States Turn K-12 Scholarships Into Money-Laundering Schemes How States Turn K-12 Scholarships Into Money-Laundering Schemes Carl Davis March 3, 2017 "School choice" happy talk obscures how privatizing education dollars allows wealthy taxpayers to scam the government. PinIt Share30 InstaPaperPocketEmailPrint (Photo: Shutterstock) Politicians have long had a knack for framing policy proposals, however controversial, in terms that make them more palatable to voters. This is why unpopular tax cuts for the wealthy are often sold as plans to "invest" in America or to stimulate "growth." Likewise, school voucher programs that funnel public money to religious schools are cast as "school choice," because underwriting parochial schools with taxpayer dollars is controversial. The "choice" frame has heightened public awareness of school voucher programs, and helped their advocates make significant inroads in convincing states to allow the use of public dollars for private schools. Obscured in the spin, however, is how some states, in their zeal to subsidize private schools, have created an egregious tax scam that allows wealthy taxpayers to profit by donating to private school scholarship funds in return for lucrative tax credits. Many states have constitutional provisions that expressly prohibit the use of public dollars for private religious schools. To sidestep these prohibitions and public aversion to the practice, voucher proponents and their legislative allies in 17 states have created generous tax credits to encourage taxpayers to donate to private school scholarship funds. Critics who object that vouchers drain resources away from public schools would be doubly outraged if they knew how these vouchers were, in some cases, fleecing the public till. "Neovouchers," as these scholarship funds are often called, have received considerable attention as education policy initiatives, but their full impact as tax policies has drawn less notice. Critics who object that vouchers drain resources away from public schools would be doubly outraged if they knew how these vouchers were, in some cases, fleecing the public till. By offering tax subsidies in exchange for donations to private school scholarship programs, states are using private citizens as middlemen. Rather than include line-items in state budgets for spending on school vouchers, lawmakers ask taxpayers to undertake such spending on the state's behalf, in return for a generous tax giveaway. Advertisement Incentivizing philanthropy through state tax codes is nothing new, of course. For example, donating $100 to a veterans' organization, food pantry, or cancer research institute might shave $5 to $10 off a taxpayer's state tax bill, if the donor claims a deduction for that contribution. But with profit-making "neovoucher" schemes, states supercharge the incentive to donate, rewarding charitable gifts to private schools much more handsomely. Louisiana, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia, for example, all provide tax credits worth between $65 and $95 on every $100 donated. Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Montana, and South Carolina go even further by providing dollar-for-dollar tax credits: Donate $100, and receive $100 back in tax credits. Because taxpayers are also permitted to claim a federal charitable tax deduction on their donations to "neovoucher" programs—even if they were already fully reimbursed for those gifts by their state governments—the result for some taxpayers is a tax cut as large as \$1.35 for each dollar donated. Like many tax loopholes, this one is not geared toward ordinary taxpayers. A quirk in federal law limits the benefit primarily to high-income taxpayers. So, in effect, a handful of states have created elaborate tax schemes that allow wealthy taxpayers to generate risk-free private returns of up to 35 percent. A one-year, guaranteed return of 35 percent on a legitimate investment is uncommon, and a publicly funded return of that size on a so-called charitable donation is patently outrageous. This perverse use of the tax code on two fronts should raise the ire of taxpayers everywhere. The money-making aspect of these "neovouchers" is not lost on organizations running scholarship funds or on wealth managers. One organization based in Georgia, for example, brags to potential donors that, "you will end with more money than when you started." Similarly, a tax lawyer in Alabama notes on her firm's website that for some taxpayers, "donating" will "put money in your pocket." And private schools in Oklahoma and Pennsylvania have demonstrated the potential monetary gains of "donating" with hypothetical examples that show the financial returns for participants in their states' programs. Perhaps the most candid marketing language, however, comes from a wealth-management firm in Virginia. It notes that a taxpayer can enjoy a savings that is "more than their original donation," before going on to explain that "there is very little logic to the tax code. Even if you don't agree with the law, you should take advantage of the tax benefits." Until these tax credits are repealed or reformed, it will remain hard to argue with that conclusion. But it doesn't make it any less shameful. Source: <http://prospect.org/article/how-states-turn-k-12-scholarships-money-laundering-schemes>

Troubled St. Cloud center for children to close residential treatment Troubled St. Cloud Children's Home to move 30 children, lay off 95 staffers. By Chris Serres Star Tribune March 2, 2017 — 8:31pm Cottage at St. Cloud Children's Home Text size comment share tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint A St. Cloud mental health treatment center for children, which state regulators have cited for repeatedly failing to protect young patients from harm, has stopped accepting patients for residential services and instead will focus on day treatment. St. Cloud Children's Home, a 60-bed treatment center operated by Catholic Charities of the Diocese of St. Cloud, made the announcement just weeks after state regulators cited it for 33 violations of state rules governing the health and safety of vulnerable young patients. Regulators found that children had been allowed to bang their heads against walls and windows, resulting in multiple concussions, facial injuries and head trauma. Staff knew about the head-banging, but allowed the practice to continue, regulators found. In an interview Thursday, Steve Pareja, executive director of Catholic Charities of the Diocese of St. Cloud, said a state licensing order last month was "one factor among many" in the decision to shutter the residential mental health program, which opened in 1964. The facility has seen a gradual shift away from residential services, while the population the program treats has grown more difficult and aggressive, he said. "I would say behaviors have become more aggressive — and these behaviors escalate more quickly," he said. "We are all committed to providing safe environments ... and I needed to be assured that we could continue doing that." The closure comes amid rising concerns about an acute shortage of psychiatric services for children and as the state weighs legislation that would expand mental health care in schools. Statewide, there are 19 residential facilities with 744 beds certified to provide mental health services for children. But the wait to get into these facilities can be months. Many families have been forced to send their children out of state for care, said Sue Abderholden, executive director of the National Alliance on Mental Illness of Minnesota. "This is a big deal in terms of access," Abderholden said. "We already have a lot of children in this state who should be in treatment but are at home or at school because they can't get into a facility." The St. Cloud Children's Home, which still houses about 30 children and teens in its on-campus cottages in St. Cloud, has been plagued with health and safety violations in recent years. In 2012, the site was hit with 46 licensing violations, after state inspectors found that unsupervised children were having sex with each other on the facility grounds. In one incident, a patient was forced to have oral sex by another patient while a staff member played a video game nearby, state records show. Head-banging The scope of the recent violations alarmed mental health advocates. Last October, state inspectors found that staff members "at all levels of authority" were aware that children were banging their heads against walls, but failed to take action. The noise was so loud that it could be heard throughout one of the cottages, investigators found. At least two children got emergency medical treatment. They also sustained black eyes, swollen faces, headaches and abrasions, regulators found. Regulators also found that children were subjected to an unusual form of punishment known as "freeze" that was not therapeutic or approved by a mental health professional. During freeze, children who were noncompliant or aggressive were forced to sit in an assigned area for at least 24 hours, even after they had calmed down. Citing the "nature, chronicity and severity" of the violations, the Minnesota Department of Human Services in early February took the unusual step of placing the center's license on conditional status for three years. Under the conditional license, the home would have operated under greater state scrutiny and was required to submit detailed plans for improving safety and supervision of residents. 95 lost jobs The decision to close residential services means that children and teens will receive treatment at the center and go home to their families in the evening. The 30 children who still are housed at the facility will be discharged or transferred to other sites over the next two months, officials said. About 95 employees will lose their jobs as part of the transition, although more jobs will become available as the center expands its day treatment program. Pareja said that St. Cloud Children's Home has about 60 children in its day treatment programs, which he expects to expand by 30 to 40 patients. Source: <http://www.startribune.com/troubled-st-cloud-center-for-children-to-close-residential-treatment/415241974/>

EXCLUSIVE: Developmentally disabled residents at Bronx state-run group home endured abuse, neglect over decade, lawsuit claims Disabled Bronx group home residents abused over decade: lawsuit BY Victoria Bekiempis NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, March 1, 2017, 10:26 PM facebook Tweet email Guardians of the facility's residents sued Union Ave. IRA staffers in an effort to end the alleged abuse. (Luiz C. Ribeiro for New York Daily News) BY Victoria Bekiempis NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, March 1, 2017, 10:26 PM Several disabled residents of a state-run group home may have suffered abuse and neglect dozens of times over the course of a decade, according to new court papers. The residents of Union Ave. IRA, in the Bronx, endured physical abuse, as well as neglect, while living in the group home, a Manhattan Federal Court lawsuit filed by their guardians alleges. One of the guardians has even claimed that her sister was raped while under the supervision of Union Ave. IRA. The residents' guardians sued Union Ave. staffers, as well as officials from the Office for People with Developmental Disabilities, a state entity that oversees residences for mentally handicapped people, to put an end to the alleged abuse. As part of the ongoing lawsuit — originally filed by their guardians last May — the disabilities agency filed paperwork on Feb. 13 describing its records on abuse and neglect for three residents whose guardians are suing the home. Agency officials said records show that from 2006 to this year there were 24 incidents of alleged abuse or neglect toward one of these three residents. Since 2005, there were 20 incidents of alleged abuse or neglect toward another resident. And from 2006 to this year, there were 13 incidents of alleged abuse or neglect toward yet another resident whose guardian is suing the home, records show. The guardians' lawyer, Ilann Maazel, said he's "never seen so many allegations of abuse" in a group home throughout his years representing alleged abuse victims. The disabilities office said it hasn't completed its search for records on abuse allegations. Incidents involving alleged abuse and neglect were not tracked electronically until 2006, so it's possible additional records exist, the agency said in court papers. The agency did not comment when reached by the Daily News on Wednesday. The disabilities office did not comment specifically on the allegations, but said on Feb. 23 that it is taking steps to prevent abuse. "The safety and well-being of individuals supported by (the agency) is our highest priority. We committed to ensuring that all allegations of abuse and neglect in our service system are thoroughly and quickly addressed, investigated, and that appropriate measures are taken if substantiated," the office said in the statement. "Any abuse of the people in our care is completely unacceptable." Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/bronx/disabled-bronx-group-home-residents-abused-decade-lawsuit-article-1.2986415>

HCJFS boss during 'caged kids' episode now heads teen treatment center facing lawsuit • Updated Mar 2, 2017 at 7:47 AM SHELBY — The former boss at the Huron County Department of Jobs and Family Services is in the news again. Erich Dumbeck now serves as the Ohio director for Abraxas Ohio, a residential treatment center for male teens in Shelby that is owned by GEO Group Inc. — one of the nation's largest private prison companies. He headed Huron County's welfare agency during the "caged kids" scandal that garnered international attention. Abraxas Ohio is the subject of a federal lawsuit filed by Lynn Roycroft, a former clinical supervisor there. Tom Meyer, an investigator for WKYC Channel 3 news, interviewed Roycroft and discussed the lawsuit for a segment that aired during the 11 p.m. newscast Tuesday. Trending Articles Sponsored By: Kathleen J. Holzwart Norwalk woman who enjoyed baking and being a grandma was 85. Powered By: The lawsuit claims Abraxas billed the government for "false or fraudulent" claims, including counseling sessions never happened. Among other allegations, Roycroft said out-of-work plumbers and roofers, after receiving only one week of training, were hired to act as professional counselors for the 100 boys who were housed at the Richland County residential facility, according to WKYC. A GEO spokesman told Channel 3 that Roycroft's lawsuit "has no merit" and that the company will defend it "vigorously." Dumbeck declined to comment for the Channel 3 story. Dumbeck joined the Huron County Department of Jobs and Family Services in 1997 as a child abuse investigator. Two years later, he was named the social services supervisor. In June 2004, the county commissioners — Terry Boose, Ardeth Chupp and Mike Adelman — promoted Dumbeck to serve as the agency's director. He held that position until resigning in April 2007. By then, Gary Bauer and Ralph Fegley had joined Adelman as the county's three commissioners and a review of the agency was under way. In August 2005, during Dumbeck's reign, authorities discovered Michael and Sharen Gravelle had been forcing some of their 11 adopted children to sleep in enclosed beds in the family's Clarksfield Township home. The story made international headlines, and a flock of media outlets followed every step of the investigation and prosecution. The Gravelles and social worker Elaine Thompson eventually were convicted of criminal charges, and the Gravelles served prison time. Trial proceedings revealed JFS employees had known about the abuse for at least two years before an investigation was started. Immediately after the Gravelles' three-week-long trial, Dumbeck told reporters his agency had refined some of its procedures involving complaints and adjusted the checks-and-balances system to prevent another Gravelle-like incident, which Dumbeck called a "1 in 10 million" occurrence. Just months after Dumbeck was hired, the first of the agency's several high-profile cases broke. In October 2004, Paul Efaw stabbed and killed his foster daughter, Connee Dixon, after she attacked him with a knife. A jury eventually awarded Dixon's estate \$600,000 in a wrongful death lawsuit against the county for failing to properly screen Efaw, a Monroeville man who served three years for voluntary manslaughter. Also during Dumbeck's time as JFS director, a sexual harassment complaint was filed against him. The complaint was dismissed early in 2007. An independent review found that he did have an unwanted, inappropriate relationship with a HCDJFS employee, but it was prior to his promotion to director. When the review of the agency began in February 2007, Dumbeck was relieved of some of his day-to-day duties and asked to focus exclusively on the Children Services division. David Broehl, head of that division, had announced his retirement around that time. Shortly after Dumbeck submitted his resignation letter, a woman filed a lawsuit against him and agency, alleging she was denied multiple promotions because of sexual discrimination — including "Dumbeck's infatuation with her." The suit also stated Dumbeck was married with two children at the time the "unwanted" contact began, and she was a single mother of one in a relationship with a single man. The suit focused on events that happened between January 2004 and January 2007. In his resignation letter, Dumbeck stated in part: "I believe that God leads in directions that are sometimes unknown to us but are part of a greater plan. I feel that He is leading me in the direction to serve individuals in a different capacity." Source: <http://www.norwalkreflector.com/Local/2017/03/01/Former-HCJFS-boss.html?ip=1&ci=breaking>

Residential treatment facility for children in Florence cited again by DHEC by Tonya Brown Friday, March 3rd 2017 The S.C. Department of Health and Environmental Control (DHEC) has once again cited Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health in Florence for violations. (WPDE file image) Florence, S.C.

(WPDE) — The S.C. Department of Health and Environmental Control (DHEC) has once again cited Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health in Florence for violations, according to a DHEC citation report. The facility is located on Gregg Avenue in Florence. The facility's website says it's a residential treatment facility for people ages 7 to 21 seeking "care for a range of psychiatric or addictive disease diagnoses including general psychiatric issues, dually diagnosed, post-traumatic stress disorder, Asperger's Syndrome, autism, mild to moderate mental retardation, and pervasive developmental disorders." DHEC's report says it cited the facility in early January for several violations following an unannounced visit in response to a complaint. The facility was hit then with citations because it did not have a written policy and procedure, titled Diet Orders, implemented; for not having enough staff to sufficiently provide supervision for all residents as determined by the condition of the residents; and for not having a written description of its philosophy regarding each living group size, group composition and staff involvement, including group management and supervision, available for review, according to the report. DHEC said it cited the facility again following an inspection on January 31. Some of the violations included, staffing issues, facility food menus and the facility's upkeep. Related: DHEC cites Florence residential treatment facility for violations Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health released the following statement on the citation and violations: "Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health, like all healthcare facilities, experiences both routine and unannounced visits by state regulators. Regarding the results from the January 31, 2017 visit by DHEC, we do not agree with the merits of all the findings and have submitted a request for reconsideration. Although we may disagree with instances of alleged non-compliance, Palmetto Pee Dee Behavioral Health shares DHEC's goal of ensuring that all patients receive treatment in a safe and therapeutic environment. We continue to devote the necessary resources to ensuring that our patients receive the high quality mental health services they need and deserve." DHEC said it's working with the facility on a plan of correction for the violations. Source: <http://wpde.com/news/local/residential-treatment-facility-for-children-in-florence-cited-again-by-dhec>

19 girls die in fire at home for troubled teens in Guatemala Last updated 08:05, March 9 2017 At least 19 girls have died in a fire in a government-run home for abused teens, Guatemalan police say, with local media reporting that dozens of residents had escaped the overcrowded home following a melee. A crowd of relatives, many of them wailing with grief, gathered outside the Virgen de Asuncion home for children up to 18 years old, in the municipality of San Jose Pinula, 25 kilometres southwest of the capital Guatemala City. Nery Ramos, the head of Guatemala's national police, said at the scene on Thursday morning (NZT) that 19 people, all girls, were confirmed dead. Nineteen dead in fire at Guatemala children's shelter Video will play in 1 secondPlay Now! Stop REUTERS Nineteen girls have been killed by a fire at a children's home in Guatemala. "This is a painful situation," he said, adding that the fire was started by a group of young people at the centre. R The fire was started by a group of young people at the centre. Plagued by Latin America's highest rates of child malnutrition and street gangs like the Mara Salvatrucha that often prey on minors, Guatemala has long been a traumatic place to grow up. Conditions in public institutions are often dismal with widespread overcrowding. Burnt bodies partially covered in blankets were strewn across the floor of a blackened room in the home, pictures posted to Twitter by the firefighters showed. REUTERS Five hundred children lived in the home, despite its capacity to hold only 400. On Tuesday night (Wednesday NZT), riot police were sent in to quell unrest over the crowded living conditions at the home during which some 60 residents escaped, images on Guatemalan television news showed. Ad Feedback Local media said more than 500 children lived there, despite its capacity to hold only 400. Pablo Castillo, a spokesman for Guatemalan police, said 38 children had been transferred to local hospitals with burns, some of them severe. Outside the home on Wednesday, Andrea Palomo told reporters in tears that she had brought her 15-year-old son to the home to discipline him. But he told her he was mistreated and complained that gang members there tattooed the children, she said. "We have been given no information since last night," Palomo said outside the home, which takes in children who have been abandoned as well as victims of abuse and trafficking. The home is run by the Ministry for Social Welfare and the attorney general for human rights decides whether children are placed in the home or not. Source: <http://www.stuff.co.nz/world/americas/90223174/19-die-in-fire-at-guatemala-orphanage>

Foster parents accused of sexually assaulting, torturing and strangling 11 kids in their care, including toddlers Foster parents accused of sexually assaulting, torturing and strangling 11 kids in their care, including toddler Daniel Spurgeon and Jenise Spurgeon have been charged with hundreds of horrific sex crimes By Emma Foster 9th March 2017, 12:13 am Updated: 9th March 2017, 1:57 am A FOSTER couple have been accused of sexually assaulting, torturing and strangling 11 kids in their care – including toddlers. Florida couple Daniel Spurgeon and Jenise Spurgeon have been charged with hundreds of horrific sex crimes against children. 1 Foster parents Daniel and Jenise Spurgeon are accused of hundreds of sex crimes against kids in their care They have been accused of abusing 11 children who were either fostered or adopted by them when they lived in Alabama and committing incest. Daniel Spurgeon has been charged with 115 counts of first-degree sex abuse, 122 counts of child abuse and four counts of sexual torture. He also stands accused of raping, strangling and suffocating the children. The adoptive dad also faces 115 counts of enticing a child for immoral purposes, six counts of incest and 11 counts of first-degree human trafficking. His wife Jenise has been charged with 100 counts of child abuse, human trafficking, endangering the welfare of a child and enticing a child for immoral purposes. Police said there were 11 victims in total and they were aged from "toddler-age to mid and upper teens." The crimes allegedly took place while the couple lived in Florence, Alabama, before they moved to Cape Coral, Florida in 2015. The Spurgeons are currently in jail in Florida on other charges but will be extradited to Alabama. Source: <https://www.thesun.co.uk/news/3045816/foster-parents-accused-of-hundreds-of-sex-crimes-against-kids-as-young-as-toddlers/>

Woman accused of sex assault, corrupting minors at center for troubled youth Updated: Mar 16, 2017 - 8:35 AM 0 Woman accused of sex assault, corrupting minors at center for troubled youth <http://on.wpxi.com/2nGd7Xr> A 31-year-old woman is accused of sexually assaulting two teens at a treatment center for troubled youth where she worked. Kelly Zawodniak is charged with institutional sexual assault and corruption of minors in connection with two incidents. Officials said Zawodniak had only worked at Adelphoi Village in Latrobe for eight days when the alleged crimes took place. During that time, police detailed the encounters and interactions she had with at least two teens. Source: <http://www.wpxi.com/news/woman-accused-of-sex-assault-corrupting-minors-at-center-for-troubled-youth/502962320>

Alabama state lawmaker seeks crackdown on troubled youth programs after ABC News report By BRIAN EPSTEIN Close Follow on Twitter More from Brian Brian Ross Close Follow on Twitter More from Brian Mar 17, 2017, 9:29 AM ET Share Email Star PlayABC News WatchUndercover at a so-called gay conversion camp Share Email In the wake of an ABC News 20/20 investigation, a key Alabama lawmaker is pushing for a crackdown on unlicensed religious youth programs that use brutality against "troubled teens," including gay teens. "The display that you showed on television, I think, really brought this home to a lot of people," said Republican state representative Steve McMillan, who has introduced legislation requiring closer supervision of such programs. "I've talked to a lot of people that just did not believe the circumstances," McMillan said of the ABC News report which detailed allegations from teens who said they were beaten and abused at programs. Two so-called Christian pastors and a third person were sentenced to 20 years in prison last month after being found guilty of child abuse at a facility that operated in Mobile and Pritchard, Alabama. Under the state's Religious Freedom law, such programs had been exempt from state inspections. Under legislation proposed by McMillan, state officials would be able to conduct unannounced inspections, and teens would have the right to speak privately to investigators and to their parents or guardians. McMillan said he believe the law has broad support from legislators and mainstream religious groups that feel something needs to be done about unlicensed programs with records of brutality or violence in their state. "They'll either go out of business or shape up and do the right things," said McMillan. The director of the non-profit Youth Reach Gulfport in Alabama welcomed the proposed legislation. "Juvenile facilities need accountability," said Richard Crawford, who decried the child abuse documented in the ABC News report. "Especially programs that are seeking money for their services," he said. "That's when things often get twisted here with these ministries if there is no accountability." The state representative praised the efforts of a retired Alabama police captain, Charles Kennedy [HEAL Alabama Coordinator], who has campaigned for years against the unlicensed programs. "I guess you could call him a persistent angel, because his heart's in the right place, he really feels strongly about this, and without his persistence it would never have come to pass," said the legislator. Source: <http://abcnews.go.com/US/alabama-state-lawmaker-seeks-crackdown-troubled-youth-programs/story?id=46181915>

14-year-old who streamed her suicide on Facebook suffered years of sexual and physical abuse WITW Staff 03.16.17, Naika Venant (Facebook) An inquest into the death of Naika Venant, a 14-year-old foster child who broadcast her own suicide by hanging on Facebook, has revealed that the teenager had been sent to more than 14 foster homes and endured years of sexual and physical abuse. According to a report released by the Florida Department of Children and Families on Monday, Venant's relationship with her allegedly abusive mother Gina Alexis may also have played a tragic role in her death. "Despite everything that had occurred between Naika and her mother, Naika longed to be home," the report said. "Naika often told her therapist that she greatly missed her mother and really wanted to go back home." The report detailed a number of disturbing incidents, including a case when 4-year-old Naika was left unattended by a male babysitter without food or running water. The next year, the child welfare agency was contacted after Naika was sent to the emergency room with an undisclosed chronic health condition. Alexis, reportedly, had called her daughter "a liar and a faker." When Naika was 6, the report found that Alexis had beaten her with a belt for being sexually aggressive with another child. According to Naika's therapists, the child told them that she slept in the same room as her mother's boyfriends and watched "sex movies." At the age of 11, Naika reportedly ran away from home out of fear of being beaten by her mother. Alexis then refused to take Naika back, telling investigators that she would beat her if they insisted on returning the child to her. Against the recommendations of caseworkers and Naika's court-ordered lay guardian, a Miami judge ordered the girl returned to her mother two months later. Last April, Alexis returned custody of Naika to the state — reportedly because she'd had enough of the child's "behavior." Naika hanged herself with a scarf on January 22 in the shower stall of her latest foster home, streaming the horrific scene on Facebook Live. The report concluded that mental health professionals had failed Naika by not sufficiently treating the trauma caused by her abuse and her failed relationship with her mother. A lawyer for Alexis has questioned the veracity of the report, describing it as "an apparent whitewash of the systemic failures" of the care system. Source: <http://nytlive.nytimes.com/womenintheworld/2017/03/16/14-year-old-who-streamed-her-suicide-on-facebook-suffered-years-of-sexual-and-physical-abuse/>

How Unaccompanied Youth Become Exploited Workers in the US Sunday, March 19, 2017 By Stephanie L. Canizales, The Conversation | News Analysis
font size decrease font size increase font size Print The Trump administration has released a series of executive orders targeting immigration at the U.S. southern border. Central American families and children traveling alone represent nearly half of all unauthorized migrants apprehended by Customs and Border Protection. The criminalization of immigrants at the U.S. southern border disproportionately affects Central American children and youth. Nearly 153,000 unaccompanied Mexican and Central American children have been apprehended at the U.S. southern border since 2014. Of those detained by Customs and Border Protection and processed by the Office of Refugee Resettlement, 60 percent have been reunited with a sponsor, typically a parent. The other 40 percent are placed with a nonparent sponsor. With the guidance of a parent or guardian, these youths might obtain financial, legal, health and social support. Others who enter without detection and remain unaccompanied when they arrive in the U.S. are financially independent and may never gain access to formal resettlement services. Recent orders by the Trump administration that prioritize unaccompanied child migrants for deportation heighten the vulnerability of immigrant children in the U.S. Since 2012, I have conducted in-depth observations and interviews with undocumented immigrant youth who arrived in Los Angeles, California as unaccompanied minors and have remained without a parent throughout their settlement in the U.S. I use pseudonyms for confidentiality as research participants are migrant youth living and working in the U.S. without authorization. Pundits and scholars tend to frame immigrant youth as students and adult migrants as workers. However, being unaccompanied at settlement requires youth to become financially independent and take up low-wage occupations to make ends meet. My ongoing research shows that unaccompanied migrant youth face labor exploitation and suggests that Trump's orders exacerbate the precarious work conditions of unaccompanied immigrant youth workers in the U.S. Workplace Violence Undocumented working youth migrate to Los Angeles in hopes of working to support their families who remain in their home countries. They come to the U.S. with low levels of education and English language fluency. Romero arrived in Los Angeles from Guatemala at the age of 15 and immediately began looking for work in downtown LA garment factories. In an interview, he recalled: "The bosses would tell me, 'do you have experience?' I would say yes. And they would say, 'you are a child still. Go to school.' But I thought, 'yes I would like to go to school but no one is going to [financially] support me. Just me. Who else? It's me by myself.'" Unaccompanied minors like him enter industries such as garment production, service, construction and domestic work. Youth working in the garment industry often make a median of US$350 in wages per week for more than 60 hours of work. Undocumented youth garment workers spend hours in dimly lit factories where shop owners often leave doors and windows locked throughout the work day to remain discreet and avoid workplace inspection. The lack of ventilation, heat and loud noises from factory machines, and strenuous work schedules physically and mentally exhaust youth who are then unable to attend school due to headaches, eye tension and back pain. Much like with their adult coworkers, economic necessity and fear of removal from the workplace and the country keep undocumented migrant youth workers quiet in cases of exploitation, and docile and efficient on the job. For example, three young workers at the same factory told me the story of a young Salvadoran woman who was pushed to the shop floor by the factory manager for incorrectly sewing the seams on a batch of dresses. They sorrowfully recalled their inability to help her out of fear of losing their jobs. In early February 2017, the Department of Homeland Security conducted "a series of targeted enforcement operations" in workplaces and neighborhoods across 12 states that led to the arrest of 680 immigrants. Raids in today's immigrant destinations, including Los Angeles, increase the hostility that workers must navigate in already precarious occupations. Research shows that deportation can have detrimental mental health effects on children and lead to financial hardship among families. In 2008, the largest workplace immigration raid in U.S. history impacted hundreds of Central American workers, including minors. These actions can further mental health and financial instability in the lives of child migrants. Overcoming and Giving Back In the last four years, I have encountered youth who have been entangled with drug and alcohol addictions, experienced bouts of homelessness or toiled in depression and anxiety as they searched for ways to cope. Far from being the "bad hombres" Trump describes, youths' desires to overcome these circumstances permeated our conversations and organized their daily lives. In fact, many see their tenacity in enduring workplace violence as a marker of their commitment to their families and communities. "I didn't come here with a bad intention. I didn't come here to be a burden," says 22-year-old Berenice who arrived from El Salvador at the age of 17. A 19-year-old Salvadoran man explained, "People say Central Americans are gang bangers but we all come here with a dream. We want to help our families. There aren't jobs over there and we come here to work. We are not selfish. We want to help." These young people participate in various community organizations such as churches, book clubs, support groups and recreational sports teams. A 25-year-old Guatemalan man who has lived in the U.S. for nine years said: "What is important here is that we stay united and we support each other. We all want to be helped and to also help. Like in my case, the way someone lent me a hand, I want to lend it to others. That's how I overcame [my trauma]." Young people construct moral identities based on work, participating in the local economy, giving back to their local community via organizational involvement and community service. They also demonstrate a commitment to their transnational community. A 24-year-old man who arrived in Los Angeles at age 16 gave up attending English classes at an adult language school to remit a few extra dollars to his family abroad after his youngest brother expressed a desire to migrate to the U.S. to attend school. "No quiero que venga a sufrir aca," he said, "I do not want him to come here to suffer." Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/news/item/39903-how-unaccompanied-youth-become-exploited-workers-in-the-us>

Ex-Springfield teacher sentenced for sexually abusing teen in her foster care Giacomo Bologna, GBOLOGNA@NEWS-LEADER.COM Published 4:53 p.m. CT March 10, 2017 | Updated 4:54 p.m. CT March 10, 2017 Jessica Jones (Photo: Greene County Jail) 378 CONNECT TWEET 5 LINKEDIN 4 COMMENT EMAIL MORE A former Springfield teacher convicted of statutory sodomy said in court Friday that she made mistakes, but it was the then-14-year-old former student in her foster care who initiated physical contact. Jessica Jones, 33, was sentenced to five years in prison for sexually abusing the teen between 2013 and 2015, though Jones could be out of prison in as few as 120 days if she successfully completes a stint in a sex offender's unit. The assistant prosecuting attorney described Jones' behavior as predatory and called it "disgusting" that Jones and her lawyer argued Jones was "seduced" by the victim. "This was not an isolated incident," said Dawn Diel, the prosecuting attorney. Jones, in a statement to the court, said she had tried to provide a welcome atmosphere for the troubled girl but was drawn into a relationship with a teen much more mature than her age indicated. "She didn't speak or act like a typical teenager," Jones said. As Jones and the girl became closer, Jones said she and her partner of six years broke up. When Jones and the girl visited Jones' parents, Jones said there was only one bed available, so they shared it. "I crossed the line that night," Jones said. "A decision I will forever regret." Jones said the girl told her she loved her, then kissed Jones and placed Jones' hands on her. Her attorney, Jason Coatney, said Jones' behavior was anything but predatory, saying Jones did not want to foster the girl but was worn down by repeated requests. Coatney said that the girl is currently in the custody of the Missouri Department of Corrections for her role in a drive-by shooting. Coatney argued that Jones' crime was one of "opportunity" and that she would not re-offend if released on probation. Jones' mother also testified at the sentencing, telling the judge she had been praying "long and hard about this day." "I truly believe my daughter was targeted by this troubled teen because of her lifestyle choice," Jones' mother said. "My daughter was in over her head ... My daughter's life became a nightmare because of this troubled teen." Jones, who was hired by Springfield Public Schools in August 2006, taught art at Watkins Elementary for nearly all of her nine years with the district. According to a state database that shows assignments, she also worked at Bissett and McGregor elementary schools, Wilson's Creek Intermediate, the former Study Middle School and the Springfield Option Site, a school on the Great

Circle campus (formerly known as Boys and Girls Town). Jones was working for the district when she met the girl, a student of hers, according to court documents. It was not clear which school the girl attended at the time. According to court documents, the teen girl requested to be placed in the foster care of Jones, who completed the necessary steps to become her foster parent. The girl moved into Jones' home in May 2013. The documents show police were tipped off about the possibility of an inappropriate relationship between Jones and the girl in 2014. In July 2014, the girl was interviewed at the Child Advocacy Center but didn't disclose any information. Days later, a second child in Jones' care told interviewers that Jones and the other girl slept in the same bed and visited an adult entertainment store to purchase pornography. The second child also told interviewers she had found photos on a phone of Jones and the victim kissing. The phone was collected by a police detective, but the investigation was suspended — before the phone was checked — because of "conflicting information," according to court documents. A year ago, a new police report was made by a Children's Division investigator after the victim disclosed she was involved in a sexual relationship with Jones. A short while later, police obtained a warrant to review the seized phone and discovered photos of Jones kissing the girl, which corroborated the account of the second child, the documents showed. According to court documents, the victim told investigators during a June 9, 2015, interview that she lied in the previous interview because she "felt she had nowhere else to go and she did not want Jessica to get in trouble." Documents show the teen also alleged the following: • Jones had sexually abused her since she was 14. • The first incident of sexual abuse occurred in July 2013, after she and Jones had been drinking together. Jones performed oral sex on the victim, and the next morning Jones asked her if they were "together." • The victim said the two had performed oral sex on each other "so many times she could not remember." She said the last time was in May 2015. • The victim said Jones had told her that if someone found out what happened between them, "I'd probably go to prison because of statutory rape." • The victim also said she smoked marijuana with Jones and in one instance was given $80 by Jones to purchase marijuana. Source: <http://www.news-leader.com/story/news/crime/2017/03/10/ex-springfield-teacher-sentenced-sexually-abusing-teen-her-foster-care/99026412/>

After Two Suicides In 60 Days, Lawyer Says Florida's Privatization Of Foster Care Is A Failure By Rowan Moore Gerety • Mar 10, 2017

Tweet/Share/Google+Email Naika Venant Facebook A preliminary hearing was held Thursday in the case of Naika Venant, the 14-year-old girl who broadcast her suicide on Facebook Live from her Miami Gardens foster home earlier this year. It was the second suicide of a teenager in foster care overseen by the agency Our Kids in less than 60 days. In December, 16-year-old Laurny Martin hanged herself with a scarf in her room at the Florida Keys Children's Shelter on Plantation Key. Howard Talenfeld, a lawyer representing Naika Venant's biological family, says it's just the latest evidence that the state's move to privatize foster care isn't working. "It's the Department of Children and Families that gives the job to a contractor like Our Kids, and they contract out with case management agencies," he says. "We're seeing kids that just aren't in the right kinds of placements, don't receive the right kinds of services. In her case, she wasn't supposed to be anywhere near the internet." Talenfeld says it's too early to say what legal remedies the family might pursue to avoid another death like Naika's. "We're trying to get at the truth. Until we know what the truth is, we couldn't even begin to try to determine what's appropriate," he says. Talenfeld says it's been 40 days since his firm requested relevant records from DCF and Our Kids, and it hasn't gotten anything yet. "We're hopeful that this kind of information becomes available very soon so that the Florida Legislature can hear more than the fact that 'this kid was just a kid we couldn't help.' " Representatives of DCF and Our Kids did not respond immediately to requests for comment. Source: <http://wlrn.org/post/after-two-suicides-60-days-lawyer-says-floridas-privatization-foster-care-failure>

Federal judge in Texas foster care suit scolds CPS leaders for withholding information Filed under Child Protective Services at Mar 17 Share Facebook Twitter Email Written by Robert T. Garrett, Austin Bureau Connect with Robert T. Garrett On Twitter Email Get Daily Dallas News Headlines Don't miss a story. Like us on Facebook. Like Dallas News' Facebook Page Get Unlimited Digital Access Your first month is less than a dollar. \$0.99 for first 4 weeks Subscribe Now AUSTIN — The federal judge in a lawsuit over Texas foster care has chided state officials for rebuffing information requests and has vowed to stick to her previously stated timetables for fashioning remedies that will overhaul the system, two plaintiffs' lawyers said Friday. In her Corpus Christi courtroom Thursday, U.S. District Judge Janis Graham Jack flashed with irritation over the Department of Family and Protective Services' refusal to supply requested information to her two special masters in the case, the lawyers recounted. Department spokesman Patrick Crimmins, though, downplayed the disagreements. U.S. District Judge Janis Graham Jack "We have worked cooperatively with special masters and will continue to do so," he said in a written statement. Plaintiffs' lawyers Lonny Hoffman of Houston and Marcia Robinson Lowry of Chappaqua, N.Y., said that during a 90-minute status conference, Jack pressed state lawyers to explain why the department hasn't responded to queries about foster children's computerized case files, medical records and policies on how to handle abused children who are sexually aggressive. "The special masters sent them interrogatories that were very specific, saying things like, 'Do you have a policy on this?' and 'Where in the record does this appear?'" said Lowry, who has led class-action suits against many states over their foster care systems. "On some of those issues, [state lawyers] said, 'We don't think we have to deal with that. We haven't been ordered to do so yet,'" she recalled. Hoffman, a civil procedure professor at the University of Houston Law Center who has advised the plaintiffs' lawyers in the case, said Jack was upset over some of the state's latest replies to special masters Kevin Ryan and Francis McGovern. The responses "looked as though the state was at least partially stonewalling and hiding behind legalistic objections," Hoffman said. "And she was none too happy about that. She made it clear that she has firm deadlines in her interim order that she expects to keep." Jennifer Speller, a spokeswoman for Attorney General Ken Paxton, declined to comment. Crimmins emphasized that Gov. Greg Abbott and the Legislature "have made CPS and foster care an urgent priority." In December 2015, Jack ruled that the state's long-term foster care arrangements are "broken" places where "rape, abuse, psychotropic medication and instability are the norm." In a final set of remedies she perhaps will issue this summer or fall, Jack is expected to demand that the state hire more Child Protective Services foster care caseworkers and spend more to make sure it has contracts with a wider array of vendors who will house and help foster children. Abbott, Paxton and GOP legislative leaders have criticized Jack for overreaching. They have said the state was making improvements and argued the suit was an unnecessary infringement on state's rights. Since December's emergency CPS funding request that Abbott and the legislative leaders approved, CPS has begun adding 105 more of the "conservatorship caseworkers." This week's tentatively approved budgets in the budget-writing committees of both chambers would add hundreds more. They also would provide some additional money for rolling out a new procurement method known as "foster care redesign." At Thursday's conference, Jack said "she was waiting to see what the Legislature winds up doing," Lowry recounted. The judge may hold another status conference, possibly in Dallas, shortly after lawmakers adjourn May 29, according to Lowry, Hoffman and Crimmins. Jack asked for a courtroom demonstration of CPS' databases affecting foster children, Lowry said. "The computer system is chaotic," she said. "It takes quite a lot for a caseworker to find things. Sometimes, they absolutely can't." Crimmins said the database "is admittedly an out-of-date system, but modernization is already underway and the system is more user-friendly for caseworkers." On Thursday, Protective Services Commissioner Henry "Hank" Whitman testified before Jack. "The judge indicated she was impressed with the commissioner's commitment," Crimmins said. Jack complimented him, Hoffman and Lowry said. But they said she expressed frustration over how lawyers for Paxton and the department continue to vow to appeal. "The lawyers for the state and the AG's office are continuing to fight us at every turn," Hoffman said. Source: <http://www.dallasnews.com/news/child-protective-services/2017/03/17/federal-judge-texas-foster-care-suit-scolds-cps-leaders-withholding-information>

Committee forming to fight group homes KATHLEEN MOORE kmoore@poststar.com Kathleen Moore Mar 18, 2017 Buy Now Kathleen Moore, kmoore@poststar.com Brian Underwood presents his committee idea to the Washington County Board of Supervisors on Friday. prev next FORT EDWARD — A Washington County man is starting a committee to fight the proposed Brand New Beginnings homes for troubled youth. "This committee has the power and authority to deny or revoke the operating license of any organization that is a direct threat to the citizens it represents," Brian Underwood told the Washington County Board of Supervisors on Friday. The Brand organization wants to house 24 teenagers in two homes, in Jackson and Salem. They would attend the Salem and Cambridge school districts. The teens would have committed sexual offenses, started fires or have addictions. To fight the proposal, Underwood plans to hold a public hearing on the issue "before May," and asked the county to arrange the venue and announce the time and place. Supervisors were generally receptive to his complaints about the group homes, but officials weren't able to find any way in which a committee could revoke a state license. Underwood declined to explain his reasoning. He acknowledged that it wouldn't be easy to revoke the license. "I assume this is going to be challenged," he said. But he will even go so far as to file a lawsuit — which he called "federal charges" — against Brand New Beginnings and the state of New York "for clearly violating our community's constitutional right to public safety," he said. While he wants to stop Brand New Beginnings, he said he wants the committee to be made up only of people who are not directly impacted by the proposal. That means no supervisors or other leaders from Jackson, Salem and Hebron. "I want this to be clean," he said. Although no one could find a way in which his committee could actually revoke a state license, District Attorney Tony Jordan said he could use the committee to send letters to the state. The letters could urge the state Office of Children and Family Services to not issue a license for the Brand New Beginnings homes. "Your conduit there will be your state representative," Jordan said. Advertisement Play Current Time 0:00 / Duration Time 0:00 Remaining Time -0:00 Stream TypeLIVE Loaded: 0% Progress: 0% 00:00 Fullscreen 00:00 Mute Playback Rate 1 Subtitles subtitles off Captions captions off Chapters Chapters He also tried to advise Underwood to be careful in how he talks about the group home. Underwood said that youth who run away from the home would be "AWOL criminals." "They are youth," Jordan said. "Don't allow word choices to detract from your important message." "No, they are criminals," Underwood answered. Jordan said they would not all be criminals. Some would be younger than 16, and others would have been adjudicated through Family Court, rather than being charged with a misdemeanor or felony in criminal court, he said. Hebron Supervisor Brian Campbell praised Underwood's plan, but also cautioned against words like "criminal." "I commend him," Campbell said before telling Underwood directly, "Salem (school district) survives by those Vermont kids coming in. You don't want to make it sound so bad they pull out. Then you kill the whole school district." The proposal will probably never get a state license, Campbell added, noting the many holes in the required state application. "They'll probably never come," he said. The organization is still searching for an experienced program director who could handle 24 "hard to place" teenagers, including those with sexual offenses, fire-starting tendencies or addictions. Without a director, the homes can't open. Also needed is a "statement of need in our area," said DSS Commissioner Tammy DeLorme. The statement might be difficult, since the region rarely needs to place teenaged sexual offenders or fire-starters. The statement has not been submitted yet by the Brand New Beginnings organization, she said. Source: http://poststar.com/news/local/committee-forming-to-fight-group-homes/article_84774a88-5989-56de-aea2-d11a77e305d6.html

Former group home administrator accused of sexually assaulting residents Posted: Wed 5:04 PM, Mar 22, 2017 ALLOUEZ, Wis. (WBAY) - A Howard man is accused of sexually assaulting residents at an Allouez group home he used to run. That group home provides care for elderly, cognitively disabled individuals. John Vogel is charged with two counts of second-degree sexual assault and two counts of victim intimidation. Court documents indicate three female residents told police Vogel touched them sexually and told them not to tell anyone. He's also accused of grabbing a resident's hand and putting it on his genitalia. The victims said Vogel and his wife Linda suggested the victims would go to jail if they told police. Linda Vogel is also charged with two counts of victim intimidation. John Vogel is due in court next month for his preliminary hearing. Source: <http://www.wbay.com/content/news/Former-group-home-administrator-accused-of-sexually-assaulting-residents-416871203.html>

Campaign to close Wisconsin youth prison launches Campaign to close Wisconsin youth prison launches Ashley Luthern, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel Published 3:26 p.m. CT March 22, 2017 | Updated 11:03 a.m. CT March 23, 2017 Thomas Leonard, Program Coordinator, Urban Underground and Juvenile Justice Advocate, speaks at the Wisconsin Black Historical Society Museum. Michael Sears / Milwaukee Journal Sentinel Fullscreen Buy Photo Sharlen Moore, Executive Director of Urban Underground and founding member of Youth Justice Milwaukee, speaks. Milwaukee NAACP president Fred Royal speaks at the Wisconsin Black Historical Society Museum. Jeffery Roman, Program Officer of Community Advocates Public Policy Institute and founding member of Youth Justice Milwaukee, introduces the speakers at the event. Youth Justice Milwaukee advocates alternatives to youth prison Youth Justice Milwaukee is seeking to close the state's juvenile prisons. Sharlen Moore, executive director of Urban Underground and founding member of Youth Justice Milwaukee, says such facilities are "traumatizing" youth and their families. A wide-ranging coalition of community groups and youth advocates launched a campaign Wednesday to close youth prisons in Wisconsin. "We have traumatized our kids by locking them up in these old outdated and obsolete prisons," said Sharlen Moore, executive director of Urban Underground and a founding member of Youth Justice Milwaukee. "We are traumatizing their families and the communities that they live in and it needs to stop." The effort comes while Lincoln Hills School for Boys and Copper Lake School for Girls, youth prisons located in northern Wisconsin, remain under criminal investigation for child abuse and neglect. The probe has been going on for two years. In January, four inmates and their parents filed a class-action federal lawsuit against state officials, alleging guards used pepper spray excessively and kept teens in solitary confinement for weeks or months at a time. The lawsuit was brought by the American Civil Liberties Union of Wisconsin and the Philadelphia-based Juvenile Law Center. Youth Justice Milwaukee is calling for the closure of youth prisons in the state and replacing those facilities with community-based, family centered, restorative programs. CONTINUING COVERAGE: Lincoln Hills and Copper Lake schools scandal RELATED: Facing problems, Missouri revamped juvenile justice EDITORIAL: Time to close Lincoln Hills and Copper Lake Such programs, supporters say, have proved to have better success rehabilitating young offenders and cost taxpayers less money than incarceration. Wisconsin spends more than $30 million annually operating youth prisons and 61% of former inmates committed a new criminal offense within three years of release, according to the coalition's analysis of state data. At a news conference Wednesday, a college student named Marcus who had spent 14 months at Lincoln Hills urged local officials to invest in prevention, rather than incarceration. The 19-year-old said he was placed in foster care at the age of 9 months and suffered physical and sexual abuse as a child. Marcus requested to be identified only by his first name. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel also does not name victims of sexual assault. When he was placed in another foster home, his guardians tried to find him programs to prevent him from going down the wrong path, but there were none to be found, Marcus said. Instead, he made "poor choices" and ended up in Lincoln Hills. "I never suffered physical abuse," he said of his time at the Northwoods prison. "But what I can say is I watched and had no choice but to stand by as I watched others get verbally abused, physically abused." About 90% of 400 people surveyed in Milwaukee County expressed support for treatment and rehabilitation plans that include a youth's family in planning and services, according to poll data released Wednesday by Youth Justice Milwaukee. Of those surveyed, 83% supported providing financial incentives for states and municipalities to invest in alternatives to youth incarceration; and 73% supported requiring states to reduce racial and ethnic disparities in the youth justice system. A state Department of Corrections spokesman said Thursday that youth confined at Lincoln Hills and Copper Lake have typically been unsuccessful in community-based programs and the department has invested in improvements at both facilities. The department also has conducted internal investigations related to the allegations and held staff accountable, he said. The coalition is asking people who want get involved to go online to www.youthjusticemke.org. Source: <http://www.jsonline.com/story/news/crime/2017/03/22/campaign-close-wisconsin-youth-prison-launches/99493470/>

Mother claims child suffered years of abuse in foster care Jonathan Bell Published Mar 25, 2017 at 8:00 am (Updated Mar 25, 2017 at 12:28 am) 3 Comments Make text smaller Make text larger ShareThis FirstPrev... NextLast Related Stories Speech expert helps young develop Toddlers on the ball! Public urged to provide leadership for young Little Seedlings grow love of environment Family services budget down 2% A woman has spoken out after her child was sent overseas for treatment without her consent — claiming the teenager had suffered years of abuse under foster care. "What hurts me most is that it was all kept from me," said the woman, whose child was placed in the care of her paternal family shortly after she was born. According to assessments provided to The Royal Gazette, the girl developed a host of psychological complaints after alleging a lifetime of bullying, including "emotional abuse within the home". Her mother said she felt let down by the system of care offered through Child and Family Services, maintaining that instances of neglect and abuse had been swept under the rug. The family cannot be identified for legal reasons. According to a 2002 court order granted as part of her divorce from the father, who lives overseas, a parent's written approval would be required to send her daughter overseas. "The Supreme Court said that Child and Family Services overrode the restriction on her travelling, but I signed nothing," she said. Child and Family Service refers clients to facilities in the United States for psychological and educational treatment, and an assessment provided to this newspaper shows a range of problematic symptoms, from stuttering to self-harm, suicidal thoughts and "aggressive behaviour", that were deemed to qualify for intervention. With limited financial resources, her mother is seeking legal aid to pursue a case against the foster family that she maintains mistreated her daughter. "It's hard for me to live knowing what happened to her over all those years, and what she's been through," her mother said. "I feel betrayed because they didn't tell me. I could have been there for her." Source: <http://www.royalgazette.com/news/article/20170325/mother-claims-child-suffered-years-of-abuse-in-foster-care>

Teens Say This For-Profit Alternative School 'Feels More Like Prison' Mar 24, 2017 VIOLENCE, POVERTY AND VERBAL ABUSE: Alternative education for troubled teens is one of the dark parts of the school systems that does not get much coverage. In a report published by Slate earlier this month titled, "This Company Calls its Schools 'Alternative' Some Students Say They Are More Like Prison," Sarah Carr, Francesca Berardi, Zoë Kirsch, and Stephen Smiley (of Columbia University's The Teacher Project) expose allegations of physical and verbal abuse that have followed for-profit alternative education providers for years. Camelot Education, the for-profit alternative school service provider for the Reading School District in Pennsylvania, is depicted in the report as, "racially biased, isolated, punitive, unnecessarily violent, and designed, above all else, to maintain obedience and control." Students were occasionally subject to violence for violating the company's or instructor's stringent rules, which included things like: "no jewelry, book bags, or using the water fountain or bathroom without permission.” Ismael Seals, who worked for Camelot as a behavioral specialist (and was sentenced to prison for lying about his instructional practices) was documented telling students to, “Shut the f up.” He reportedly warned students that the next one to talk would get body slammed through the door—and according to the report—he followed through on his threat by beating up a 17-year-old. Stats in the report disclose that 23 percent of Camelot students are homeless, and 45 percent said they experienced violence in their previous schools that affected them academically. Descriptions of student treatment in the story ring eerily reminiscent of activist complaints surrounding the “School-to-Prison Pipeline.” Source: <https://www.edsurge.com/news/2017-03-24-teens-say-this-for-profit-alternative-school-feels-more-like-prison>

Top disability services provider Lifestyle Solutions investigated over series of deaths Four Corners By Linton Besser, Klaus Toft, Jeanavive McGregor and Alison Branley Updated about 2 hours ago Sun 26 Mar 2017, 3:10pm Media player: "Space" to play, "M" to mute, "left" and "right" to seek. Australian Broadcasting Corporation ... Other videos 00:00 00:00 00:00 Other videos Video: WARNING: GRAPHIC CONTENT. Footage shows a fight between two boys at a group home \(ABC News\) Map: NSW One of Australia's most high-profile providers of disability services, Lifestyle Solutions, is under review by both the Victorian Government and the NSW Ombudsman after a series of deaths of its clients and other alarming reports about the abuse and neglect of some disabled people in its care. Key points: Failings were identified after four patient deaths In one incident, a woman who had her legs amputated was left alone overnight and had no way to seek help Victorian Government cancelled contract with Lifestyle Solutions after complaints The Newcastle-based not-for-profit organisation earned revenues last year of more than $124 million — almost all of it from taxpayers — to care for 1,200 disabled adults and 300 foster children across the country. It was a broadcast sponsor of the 2016 Rio Paralympic Games. Now, a Four Corners investigation has found that in many cases the care provided by Lifestyle Solutions has been profoundly inadequate. Interviews conducted by the program paint a picture of an organisation which has spent much of the past decade lurching from crisis to crisis, with several of its clients experiencing significant harm as a result of poor care. Some adults and children with disabilities in its accommodation have suffered physical and sexual assault, and others have been hospitalised as a result of serious medication errors. Do you know more? Email besser.linton@abc.net.au In one case, thousands of dollars belonging to disabled clients was stolen by a rogue employee, and in another, the organisation so badly mishandled an investigation into a 2012 assault perpetrated by a member of staff that it prevented the NSW Police from potentially charging the offender. Failures identified in relation to four deaths Deputy NSW Ombudsman Steve Kinmond said the organisation's conduct had been deeply concerning. "We saw enough evidence of significant matters that should not have taken place ... to draw a line in the sand," Mr Kinmond said. Photo: Deputy NSW Ombudsman Steve Kinmond said the conduct of Lifestyle Solutions has been concerning. \(Four Corners\) His office has now demanded sweeping reforms of the organisation. In 2014 alone, in just the Newcastle and Hunter Valley region of NSW, four of Lifestyle Solutions clients died amidst practice failures which were later identified. A fifth death, in March last year, of a man suspected to have overdosed on prescription medication inside a Lifestyle Solutions home in Goulburn NSW will be the subject of an upcoming inquest by the NSW coroner. Key records went missing after patient's death The NSW Ombudsman has already found that the death in November 2014 of one of those clients — Julie Jacobson — was potentially preventable. The 51-year-old woman was morbidly obese and had lost both her legs to amputation, yet Lifestyle Solutions had taken away her overnight care, meaning she had no way to visit the bathroom or seek help for other needs. She died during the night of a heart-attack. Mr Kinmond said there had been a "range of weaknesses" in her care, which "included the failure, more generally, to recognise that this client had very significant health challenges which, if they weren't appropriately addressed ... there was a risk of death." "I believe that it's appropriate in terms of my role, to make the judgement call that the practices [with respect to Ms Jacobson's care] were clearly unacceptable," he said. Alarmingly, Four Corners has established that in the days after her death, amidst a flurry of internal panic about what had occurred, critical records — which documented failures in the organisation's care for Ms Jacobson — suddenly went missing. Insiders who spoke to Four Corners on the condition of anonymity said a formal inquiry was conducted by the organisation's own investigators into what happened to the files, before finally a set of documents was handed over to the authorities. Mr Kinmond said when the documents concerning Ms Jacobson's care finally arrived in his office there were a set of progress notes missing — Lifestyle Solutions told him it could not locate them. He said that the documentation he was given was, in any case, evidence of "very significant shortcomings in practice". "One of the concerns that I had in the middle of last year, which caused me to escalate this matter, was the fact that we were, on occasions, receiving a lack of information in relation to critical issues," he told Four Corners. Lifestyle Solutions did not answer questions put to it by the program regarding the provenance of the records it produced. Managers left amid internal investigations Last year at least six senior managers and directors departed Lifestyle Solutions following a series of internal inquiries into complaints about the practices of the organisation. One inquiry examined the circumstances which led to the placement — against internal advice — of a high-risk 13-year-old boy into a western Sydney home who went on to sexually abuse one of his fellow residents. Former employee Milissa Christian told Four Corners that it was just one example of young people in the care of the organisation who have been "physically harmed". "They've lived in what I would describe as a domestic violence situation in services," she said. A 2015 video obtained by Four Corners shows another violent attack inside one of their homes in western Sydney; the video shows a disabled teenager being choked by another client until he loses consciousness and begins having a seizure. Victorian Government contract revoked after complaints Earlier this year, the Victorian Department of Health and Human Services revoked a contract with Lifestyle Solutions for the management of one of its three disability group homes in that state, and is now conducting a wider review into the non-profit group. Photo: Martin Foley said the Victorian Government has acted on complaints. \(Four Corners\) Martin Foley, the Minister for Housing, Disability and Ageing, said: "We've had complaints and we've acted on them". He confirmed that in Victoria its clients had experienced physical harm. There has been repeated instances of insufficient monitoring that has allowed very vulnerable people to go missing from their homes, including in two serious cases in 2009. In one, a profoundly disabled 40-year-old woman disappeared unnoticed during the night from a temporary accommodation facility in a wilderness area in the NSW Hunter Valley, tumbled over a series of cliffs at a 450-metre-high lookout, and was rescued by helicopter the following day. In the other, a 10-year-old girl was killed by a car outside Rockhampton, Queensland, after running away one night from her group home where she had been subjected to repeated violence. In January this year, by sheer luck, NSW Police found two highly autistic teenage boys at 5:00 one morning who were lost, wandering along an unlit main road in western Sydney — one of them was found about 6 kilometres from the Lifestyle Solutions group home where they lived. The carers were unaware the boys had gone missing. Overdose death to be investigated by coroner In March last year a 35-year-old intellectually disabled man, David Veech, died in a Lifestyle Solutions home in Goulburn NSW of a suspected drug overdose. The exact circumstances leading up to his death is to be established by a coronial inquest scheduled for late this year or early next. After being released on parole after a long jail term for serious assault, and despite being known to be a significant abuser of drugs, Four Corners has been told there are concerns Lifestyle Solutions may not have properly restricted his access to prescription drugs on the premises. A spokesman for the NSW Coroner said "care and treatment issues will certainly be explored at inquest". In a statement, Andrew Hyland, Lifestyle Solution's newly-appointed chief executive, said his staff "do very good work" with "some of the most complex and challenging matters". He said that where past investigations had identified shortcomings, "the findings have informed improvements in our policies and procedures". In 2012, a Newcastle Lifestyle Solutions employee, Kim Craig, was convicted of stealing $11,000 from disabled clients living in the organisation's group homes. Lifestyle Solution's previous boss and founder, David Hogg, also resigned midway through last year. In December, the NSW Police charged Mr Hogg with the sexual assault of a 16-year-old woman in 1988, a charge his lawyer says he will "vigorously" defend. Source: <http://www.abc.net.au/news/2017-03-27/disability-service-provider-investigated-over-deaths/8388050>

Prosecutor: Home Of LI Foster Parent Accused Of Sex Abuse A 'House Of Horrors' March 29, 2017 5:40 PM Filed Under: Cesar Gonzalez-Mugaburu, Long Island, Sophia Hall RIVERHEAD, N.Y. (CBSNewYork/AP) — A Long Island foster father who took in more than 100 troubled boys over 20 years is on trial on charges he sexually abused eight of the children. In addition to the alleged abuse of the boys, prosecutors also say Cesar Gonzales-Mugaburu sexually abused a dog in front of a child. "The kids used to come by but they were never allowed to talk to anybody, probably because he didn't want them to let the secret out," neighbor Kathy Stein told CBS2's Jennifer McLogan. Opening arguments began Wednesday on Long Island. The trial could last a month or longer. According to a grand jury report, Gonzales-Mugaburu fostered as many as 140 boys over two decades, despite having 18 separate open child abuse investigations. Prosecutors say statute of limitation laws prevent them from bringing even more charges in the case. Prosecutor Laurie Moroff called Gonzales-Mugaburu's Suffolk County residence a "house of horrors," where one of his eight victims was allegedly abused sexually for seven years. "They lived in fear. They were afraid. They don't function as you and I would function. They have low IQs and disabilities," she said. Moroff said Gonzales-Mugaburu would punch and threaten his victims is they did not listen to what he said. "It was a horrific place to live," Moroff said. "Eating on the floor, not allowed to do anything without asking for permission — including going to the bathroom," Moroff said. The jury was told the Gonzales-Mugaburu was supposed to be the boys' savior, but preyed upon them — treating his home like a candy store filled with boys, and more boys — isolating them and threatening them into submission. But defense attorney Donald Mates said the boys are all troubled and they are lying — some for financial gain, WCBS 880's Sophia Hall reported. "There's a lawsuit going on, in federal district court, asking for money," Mates said. Gonzales-Mugaburu was given over $1.5 million in tax-free money for taking in the foster children. Before his arrest, Gonzales-Mugaburu was the subject of nine previous investigations involving alleged abuse dating back to 1998, according to a spokeswoman for Suffolk County. Each of those inquiries led to a finding that the allegations weren't credible, and none of them led to the removal of children from Gonzales-Mugaburu's split-level ranch home in Ridge. Gonzales-Mugaburu has pleaded not-guilty. If convicted, Gonzales-Mugaburu could face up to life in prison. The case against Gonzales-Mugaburu sparked an investigation into New York's foster care system that found "abysmal" communication among the child welfare agencies involved in placing boys in the home. The children will be called to testify. The jury was also told the boys were forbidden to join after school clubs, play team sports, or have girlfriends. Source: <http://newyork.cbslocal.com/2017/03/29/li-foster-care-sex-abuse-trial/>

Foster parents from hell: Utah couple accused of hog-tying boy, stuffing him in suitcase for a month by Ellen Killoran March 28, 2017 "This was not reckless ... This was intentional," says investigator 3,668 Shares Tweet A pair of foster parents in Roy, Utah, are facing child abuse charges after investigators discovered their three adopted sons living in unspeakable conditions. According to the Deseret News, Matthew Earl Waldmiller, 40, and Diane Seifert Waldmiller, 41, were arrested late last week, and each were charged on Tuesday with three counts of child abuse. An investigation launched earlier this month found that the Waldmillers' three sons, ages 7 through 11, had been spending up to 13 hours a day locked in a bedroom with no light, no food or water, and no linens on their twin sized mattresses. According to charging documents obtained by the Deseret News, the boys, who were reportedly adopted in October 2015, were routinely locked in a room overnight, with the younger boys forced to wear diapers. The 11-year-old boy described additional instances of abuse — including being stuffed in a suitcase for a month — to the investigators: The 11-year-old disclosed that he and his brothers are given 'night pills' to sleep. He stated that he and his brothers have been hit with a 2x4 piece of wood on the 'butt.' He disclosed that Diane hits him on the nose and causes it to bleed. He stated he is not allowed to drink after 6 p.m. He further described that he was zip tied in a 'hog-tie' style and put in a suitcase for a month period of time. The other boys also reported being restrained with zip ties that functioned as handcuffs, and having duct tape placed over their eyes and mouth. One of the boys said he was forced to perform exercises in order to earn food. Roy Police Sgt. Matt Gwynn told the newspaper the investigation began after the Utah Division of Child and Family Services received a neglect complaint on March 17 and alerted authorities. Investigators reportedly responded right away and visited the home, where they found the three boys to be suffering from serious neglect: All three were underweight and not being properly fed. Advertisement The boys reportedly told investigators that at one point, they had escaped the bedroom through a window to go searching for food in dumpsters. Investigators told the newspaper that the parents punished them by serving them rice that was intentionally over- seasoned with salt and cayenne pepper. The window the boys escaped from was locked and painted black. It was the only window in the bedroom, and the light fixture did not have a bulb. "This was not reckless. It was not negligent," Sgt. Gwynn told the newspaper. "This was intentional. The Waldmillers have reportedly had an active foster care license in Utah since 2013. A 2-year-old foster child, a girl, was living in the home at the time of the arrest, and did not exhibit any signs of abuse or neglect. "We think this might have been 'discipline' directed at the boys," Sgt. Gwynn said, "but we really don't know what the motivation behind this is." The Waldmillers reportedly admitted in police interviews to locking the boys in the room for an extended period, covering their faces with duct tape, and tying their wrists together with zip ties. All four of the children, including the 2-year-old girl, have been removed from the home. Source: <http://www.crimeonline.com/2017/03/28/foster-parents-from-hell-utah-couple-accused-of-hog-tying-boy-stuffing-him-in-suitcase-for-a-month/>

Documentary on Florida's troubled foster care system draws big St. Pete crowd Les Neuhaus 10 hours ago March 30, 2017 Facebook Twitter Google+ LinkedIn Pinterest A new film focusing on Florida's troubled foster care system drew a large crowd at a screening in Gulfport Wednesday night. 'Foster Shock' is a documentary highlighting the ills of the state's child welfare system showed how a government body had completely turned over the responsibility and care of children to contracted, for-profit companies, who, in turn, contract out the work to other companies, exposing minors to dangers such as violence, drugs, sex trafficking and criminalization. Directed by Mari Frankel and narrated by Tim Malloy, with cinematography by Brian Bayerl, Foster Shock takes the viewer inside the world of foster children after they are yanked from their homes. They screened the movie at Stetson Law School in Gulfport to a packed room. Frankel, who once worked as a Guardian ad Litem in Palm Beach County, addressed those in attendance, setting the mood for the film. She told the story of the first child she advocated — a 12-year-old boy with special needs who had been sexually abused in his foster home. After she came and got the boy, the caseworker was nonchalantly prepared to put the young man back in the same home. That didn't happen, Frankel said, but soon after that, another child was placed in that home and was sexually abused, even though Department of Children and Families staff knew of the earlier sexual abuse. "We need to raise the bar, and we need to raise the bar high," she said. "We need to know that we can make a change. I know it doesn't take legislation to be caring, to be loving." Sometimes the parents screwed up or are abusive. Sometimes, children are just prematurely or wrongly removed from their homes. No matter what, they often wind up being placed in settings that were worse than where they came from, enduring life-scarring traumas. At one hour, seven minutes, the film follows the stories of several young adults who "aged out" of the foster care system or in a couple of lucky instances, were adopted and allowed to flourish to be who they wanted to be — something they were not able to do in the prisonlike group homes scattered across the state, housing thousands of children due to a lack of housing placements. In the homes, privacy is nonexistent; fights are commonplace; staff abuse is rampant and inappropriately large dosages of psychotropic drugs are forced onto children by staff lacking any kind of credentials. While film does a good job of portraying group homes, it mentions nothing of the murders, killings and ongoing deaths occurring throughout the state on a routine basis under the care of the so-called "CBCs," or community-based care agencies, like Our Kids of Miami-Dade Monroe, Eckerd Youth Alternatives, Community Partnership for Children, Inc., etc., who continue to have the contracts with DCF renewed, despite the continuing deaths. Meanwhile, filmmakers say CEOs of CBCs are grossly overpaid — as an example, David Dennis, the chief executive officer of Eckerd, made $708,028 in fiscal year 2015. After the screening, four young adults in their late teens and mid-20s fielded questions from a Pinellas County dependency judge, sharing their experiences with the crowd. Source: <http://floridapolitics.com/archives/235013-documentary-floridas-troubled-foster-care-system-draws-big-st-pete-crowd>

Hanna Boys Center hit with $2.7 million whistleblower suit | The Press Democrat Hanna Boys Center hit with $2.7 million whistleblower suit PAUL PAYNE THE PRESS DEMOCRAT | March 30, 2017, 2:23PM | Updated 3 hours ago. A Sonoma Valley facility for troubled teens has been slapped with a $2.7 million whistleblower lawsuit by a former clinical director who claims he was fired after bringing to light unchecked bullying by some youths that caused serious safety concerns. Timothy Norman, who served in the role at Hanna Boys Center for 31 years, alleges he was dismissed in November after complaining about a lack of response to several incidents, including one in which a boy was teased in a shower and another in which a youth was violated with a lint brush. After airing his concerns to the center's board of trustees, Norman claims Executive Director Brian Farragher called him into his office and fired him, telling him "there was no room" in the organization for both of them, according to the suit filed earlier this year in Sonoma County Superior Court. Norman, 71, claims it was retaliation, and is now seeking punitive and other damages. "There was no rigorous system of discipline when boys prey on one another," said Norman's lawyer, Vic Thuesen. Farragher did not immediately return calls Thursday seeking comment. Hanna Boys Center, founded in 1945, is a residential treatment center and school for about 100 at-risk boys on Arnold Drive. It is associated with the Santa Rosa diocese of the Catholic Church. Related Stories Makeover gives boost to Sonoma Valley boys center Norman, hired in 1985, oversaw therapists and guided treatment plans, among other things. In his lawsuit, he said his concerns about bullying arose in the months after Farragher was appointed to the top spot in 2014. When nothing was done, he spoke out about campus violence in a series of staff meetings in which he suggested Farragher downplayed the problem. In one meeting he said Farragher threatened staff members with dismissal, saying, "If you can't get on board, get off the bus." Soon after, Norman contacted board chairman, Jack Bertges, and was hit with a three-day suspension for "back-channeling" complaints, the suit said. His concerns continued over the next two years until October when the board convened a special meeting to address safety issues. Norman was asked to speak candidly about what he saw, he said. Farragher, responded, minimizing the shower and lint brush incidents, in an attempt to cover-up what was happening, Norman claims. Twenty-four days later, Norman claims Farragher summarily fired him. Hanna Boys Center has been cited over the past year for a number of violations including operating a facility with an incorrect staff-to-student ratio. In December, it received a citation after a counselor was found to be having an inappropriate sexual relationship with a boy. The counselor was fired, according to a report from the Community Care Licensing Division of the state Department of Social Services. You can reach Staff Writer Paul Payne at 707-568-5312 or paul.payne@pressdemocrat.com. On Twitter @ppayne. Source: <http://www.pressdemocrat.com/news/6834848-181/hanna-boys-center-hit-with>

Records: Embattled agency paid Sara Packer to work as foster parent and case manager By Jo Ciavaglia, staff writer Jo Ciavaglia 23 hrs ago 0 Buy Now William Thomas Cain Sara Packer leaves her arraignment Sunday, January 8, 2017, in Newtown. She is accused of conspiring with her boyfriend Jacob Sullivan, to rape and kill her daughter Grace Packer, dismembering her body and dumping her remains in a wooded area of Northeastern Pennsylvania, some 100 miles from where Grace lived in Abington Township. A private, for-profit child welfare agency allowed a former Abington woman accused of murdering her daughter last year to provide foster care services for children in its custody while the woman was also an agency employee, this news organization has confirmed. While state Department of Human Services regulations do not prohibit employees of licensed child welfare agencies from providing foster care services for agencies they work for, potential financial conflicts of interest require the agency to get a waiver and state permission first. DHS has no record of a waiver for Sara Packer that would have allowed her to provide foster care services while she also was employed at The IMPACT Project Inc., of Emmaus in Lehigh County. In the last five years, the state has given only three approvals to county agencies to allow employees to act as foster parents to children in the agency's custody, according to DHS spokeswoman Rachel Kostelac. Neither Bucks nor Montgomery counties' children and youth departments allow staff to act as foster parents for children in the agencies' custody. Courtney Wagaman, the executive director at IMPACT, did not immediately respond to an email Friday seeking comment. Packer, 42, of Abington and Richland, and her boyfriend, Jacob Sullivan, 44, of Horsham, are accused of planning and carrying out the July 8 rape, murder, dismemberment and dumping of 14-year-old Grace Packer, then later filing a missing person report with Abington police. Grace's remains were found Oct. 31 in a remote section of Luzerne County. Sullivan was formally arraigned Friday on murder, rape and related charges. Sara Packer was formally arraigned in March on murder and related charges, including one that she cashed government checks meant for Grace after the child's death. Both defendants face the death penalty, if convicted. Since the January arrests of Packer and Sullivan, state and county child welfare officials have released limited information about Packer and her ex-husband, David W. Packer, who were licensed foster parents for 10 years. The Packers took in 30 foster children from 11 counties between 2000 and 2010. That included four from Bucks and three from Montgomery, according to information from the state. Twenty-three of those children lived in five counties that contracted with IMPACT for foster care services, including Bucks and Montgomery, according to county and state officials. This news organization filed multiple Right-to-Know requests seeking county records, including ones showing how much money was paid to the Packers for foster care services. In answer to those requests, Berks, Bucks, Lehigh, Montgomery and Northampton counties claimed they had no records of any direct or indirect payments to the Packers during the time frame when they provided foster care. In its response, Bucks County included a claim from IMPACT's president and CEO, Joseph Abraham, that the agency "simply does not have documentation of payments to the Packer family for either per diem rates or expenses." Abraham cited state and federal tax guidelines that require retaining financial records for only seven years, and state regulations that require foster parent and child documentation be maintained for only five years. "Any number we gave would be a guess and inaccurate," Abraham said in the response. "Essentially, we don't have that information." Delaware County, which had five children placed with the Packers, provided payment information that shows that IMPACT was paid nearly $80,000 between 2000 and 2009 for foster care services provided by the Packers. The information also confirmed that Sara Packer worked as a foster parent for IMPACT while she was a case manager for the agency. Available records state that Sara Packer worked for IMPACT from 1999 to 2002; she and her ex-husband became licensed as foster parents in 2000. In 2004, IMPACT placed Grace Packer — then known as Susan Hunsicker — and her two siblings with the Packers. At the time, Sara Packer was working for Northampton County's Office of Children, Youth and Families as a case manager and later was promoted to adoption supervisor at the agency. The couple later adopted Grace and her younger brother in March 2007. The Packers also provided foster care services for three Montgomery County children, two Lehigh County children and nine Berks County children, according to the state. Northampton, Monroe, Dauphin, Schuylkill, Tioga and York counties and the state of Delaware each had one child placed with the Packers during that time. In 2010, the state revoked the Packers' foster care license amid a criminal investigating involving allegations of sexual abuse against David W. Packer, who was charged that year with assaulting two foster children, including Grace. He later was convicted and served five years in prison before he was released in 2015. He is registered as a sexually violent predator with the state's Megan's Law registry. He and Sara Packer divorced in 2016. Sara Packer was terminated from her job with Northampton County. The year after the couple lost their foster care license, Sara Packer applied for Social Security Administration benefits on behalf of Grace Packer, according to Berks County records filed in connection with criminal charges against Sara Packer for alleged government check fraud. Packer received a government stipend of $712 per month on behalf of Grace — or $8,544 annually over five years. Packer also collected a $291.02 monthly stipend from Berks County as part of a subsidized adoption agreement, according to court documents. The county stipend provided the Packers another $3,492 a year for almost nine years, until the payments stopped in September. Berks officials have not indicated in available court documents why the payments stopped. Recently, IMPACT has come under state and local scrutiny after allegations surfaced from former foster children placed with the Packers more than a decade ago who claim its workers failed to address abuse claims involving Sara and David Packer. The women — who came forward after Sara Packer's arrest on murder charges — claim they each told IMPACT caseworkers about the couple's abusive behavior toward foster children in their care, including Grace. The state is reviewing IMPACT's current cases, administrative policies and internal oversight, according to a Department of Human Services spokeswoman. Montgomery, Lehigh, Delaware and Northampton counties have suspended foster care referrals to IMPACT. Bucks County Children and Youth Social Services had contracted with IMPACT in the past, but currently does not. The county's court administrator did not respond to a request about whether the county's juvenile probation department uses IMPACT. Berks County has contracted with IMPACT since 2001, but generally doesn't use the agency because it doesn't have foster homes in the county, according to Krista McInaney, administrator of Children and Youth Services. The current contract expires June 30 when it will be reevaluated, McInaney said, adding that currently the county has no foster children placed with IMPACT. In press releases, IMPACT has insisted it has operated in the best interest, safety and welfare of the children in its care since 1991 and adhered "without exception" to state regulations for reporting any instance of suspected child abuse to appropriate authorities. The agency also has stated it cannot comment on its relationship with Sara Packer, citing confidentiality rules. State records show that IMPACT has routinely passed annual license renewal inspections, the most recent on April 19 and 20. At the time, the agency had 78 children in its care, 41 approved foster care families, and employed 20 staffers. The 2016 review mentioned the agency's personnel records were "in good condition with excellent training and supervision." Source: http://www.theintell.com/news/local/records-embattled-agency-paid-sara-packer-to-work-as-foster/article_123d7bf7-850f-5c92-a1b0-c72859215599.html

DHS group homes are riddled with assault, crime and chaos, officials claim Story Comments \(2\) Image \(2\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next Courtesy Marland Children's Home 1 At Marland Children's Home in Ponca City, 23 out of 44 residents have been charged with delinquent offenses and police calls have increased 451 percent from 2014 to 2016. Courtesy Courtesy Marland Children's Home 2 Residents play basketball at Marland Children's Home. The Oklahoma Commission on Children and Youth has reported a number of problems at group homes for troubled youths. Courtesy Posted: Sunday, April 2, 2017 12:00 am DHS group homes are riddled with assault, crime and chaos, officials claim By Brianna Bailey and Jaclyn Cosgrove The Oklahoman TulsaWorld.com | 2 comments OKLAHOMA CITY — Children who were sexually assaulted after running away from state custody, attacks on staff members and hundreds of calls to police are just some of the problems that the Oklahoma Commission on Children and Youth claims exist in at least two state-contracted group homes for troubled youths. Lisa Smith, the commission's director, said her agency has called DHS to address systemic issues that endanger children in state care. "We feel if children are going to be taken from their homes, they need to be provided for," Smith said. "The state has a duty to provide children good quality of life if we're going to take them from their home." Officials at the Oklahoma Department of Human Services said they've long been aware of the allegations in the letter that Smith sent DHS in late February, outlining issues at group homes, and they are investigating them. Source: http://www.tulsaworld.com/homepagelatest/dhs-group-homes-are-riddled-with-assault-crime-and-chaos/article_36376d86-6be4-51bb-acb6-3449f7f23e33.html

Lawsuit alleges Seattle Mayor Ed Murray sexually abused troubled teen in 1980s Originally published April 6, 2017 at 3:13 pm Updated April 6, 2017 at 5:58 pm 1 of 6 Ed Murray, elected Seattle mayor in 2013, is running for a second term this year. (Alan Berner/The Seattle Times file, 2016) A new lawsuit accuses Seattle Mayor Ed Murray of child sexual abuse decades ago. Two other men have told The Seattle Times they too were abused by Murray as teenagers in the 1980s. The mayor vigorously denies all the accusations. Section Sponsor Share story By Lewis Kamb and Jim Brunner Seattle Times staff reporters A 46-year-old Kent man sued Seattle Mayor Ed Murray on Thursday, claiming Murray "raped and molested him" over several years, beginning in 1986 when the man was a 15-year-old high-school dropout. The lawsuit in King County Superior Court, filed under the man's initials, "D.H.," alleges Murray sexually abused the crack-cocaine addicted teen on numerous occasions for payments of $10 to $20. "I have been dealing with this for over 30 years," the man, now sober for a year, said in an interview with The Seattle Times. He said he was coming forward as part of a “healing process” after years of “the shame, the embarrassment, the guilt, the humiliation that I put myself through and that he put me through.” Attorney for Mayor Ed Murray responds to sexual-abuse allegations Murray vehemently denied the allegations and abruptly canceled a news conference about police reform scheduled for Thursday afternoon. A statement from Murray’s personal spokesman Jeff Reading said, “These false accusations are intended to damage a prominent elected official who has been a defender of vulnerable populations for decades. It is not a coincidence that this shakedown effort comes within weeks of the campaign filing deadline. These unsubstantiated assertions, dating back three decades, are categorically false. Mayor Murray has never engaged in an inappropriate relationship with any minor. ... Mayor Murray will vigorously fight these allegations in court.” D.H. is not the first to accuse Murray, one of the state’s most powerful politicians, of sexual abuse that occurred decades ago. Murray, 61, has known of other allegations for years, and has quietly, but vigorously denied them. Subscribe to The Seattle Times Watchdog newsletter Sign up to get exclusive updates and insights from our investigations team. * indicates required Email Address * Two men, Jeff Simpson and Lloyd Anderson, said they knew Murray when they were teenagers and growing up in a Portland center for troubled children. They accuse Murray of abusing them in the 1980s when he was in his 20s. Simpson made the claim as a teenager in 1984, and talked with a social worker and detective at the time. No charges were filed. Both men raised the allegations a decade ago in calls to reporters and Washington state lawmakers, and they repeated them in recent interviews with The Seattle Times, saying they would testify in court if needed. Now, with the D.H. lawsuit, Murray faces a formal public accusation for the first time, and details of the case bear similarities to the earlier allegations. Featured Video The legacy of Lin's Tackle \(5:05\) Most Read Stories Norwegian launches Seattle-London flights with \$199 one-way fares Dozens of University of Washington programs make top 10 in new global ranking Lawsuit alleges Seattle Mayor Ed Murray sexually abused troubled teen in 1980s VIEW Seahawks GM John Schneider on Richard Sherman trade rumors: 'What you've seen lately in the news is real' What luck: We dithered so long, Bertha's tunnel now makes more sense | Danny Westneat VIEW 3-course dinners for \$32 starting April 2. While The Seattle Times chose not to publish the 2008 allegations, the similarities between those claims and the new public case gave additional weight and relevance to the previous information. Reading’s statement also acknowledged Simpson and Anderson’s accusations: “The two older accusations were promoted by extreme right-wing anti-gay activists in the midst of the marriage equality campaign, and were thoroughly investigated and dismissed by both law enforcement authorities and the media.” Taking action now In his lawsuit, D.H. said he first met Murray on a Metro bus on Capitol Hill, and that Murray invited him back to his apartment, propositioning him for sex. The two haggled over the price — $10 or $15, D.H. said in an interview this week, adding that Murray continued to pay him for the next four to five years, at least 50 times. “And there’s times he would be doing certain things and I would tell him to stop and he wouldn’t stop, and I let it happen because I wanted that money so I can go get those drugs,” D.H. said in the interview. The lawsuit gives details about Murray’s 1980s Capitol Hill apartment, accurately recalls Murray’s phone number from the time, and offers a description of his genitals. Before first paying D.H. for sex in 1986, according to the lawsuit, “Mr. Murray asked D.H. his age, and he responded truthfully, age 15.” Murray was then in his early 30s. Having sex with a child under 16 — the age of legal consent in Washington in 1986 and today — constitutes rape of a child under state law. The statute of limitations to bring any criminal charges based on the man’s claims expired long ago. The civil lawsuit seeks unspecified damages, and notes that D.H. has not previously made “any financial demands” of Murray. D.H. initially took his allegations to Lawand Anderson, a Des Moines lawyer. She has teamed up on the lawsuit with Lincoln Beauregard and Julie Kays with Connelly Law Offices, a high-powered firm that has won major judgments in abuse cases. D.H. said he is taking action now, in part, because his father’s recent death has freed him of a desire to keep the abuse secret. He’s also now getting counseling and participating in addiction-recovery programs. Like D.H., Simpson and Anderson, the two men who lived in Portland, allege that Murray paid them for sex when they were teenagers. Simpson, who is 49, also says Murray — whom he thought of as a father — raped him over several years, starting at age 13, and in later years, paid him. A knock on the door On a recent Sunday, two Times reporters showed up unannounced at the Portland-area apartment that Simpson, now a public roads crew worker, shares with his wife and teenaged son. He appeared surprised, but immediately said he had prayed someone would eventually come knock on his door. “I would really like for him to admit it and to take responsibility ...” Simpson said of Murray. “I don’t necessarily think that he destroyed my life but I believe a lot of the problems I have stemmed from this.” Jeff Simpson, seen here in a 1984 yearbook picture, said he knew Murray when Simpson was a teenager growing up in a Portland center for troubled children. (Archive photo) Simpson’s effort in 2007, with support from Lloyd Anderson, to bring a case against Murray fell apart when his lawyer withdrew. A few months later, in March 2008, Simpson started the calls to media organizations and lawmakers in Olympia, spreading the word that Murray, then a state senator, was a “pedophile” who had sexually abused him. Murray denied the accusations to reporters and hired a lawyer, who worked to discredit the men largely based on their criminal pasts. Neither The Seattle Times nor other media publicly reported the allegations, and Murray’s political career continued to rise. Anderson told a paralegal for Simpson’s attorney about his alleged sexual acts with Murray during a 2007 interview and described distinctive physical features. “During these encounters, (he) noticed that Ed had an unusual bump on his penis and bright red pubic hair,” the paralegal wrote in a memo in 2007. In his lawsuit, D.H. described Murray as having “reddish pubic hair and a unique mole on his scrotum — it is a small bump.” In separate interviews, Simpson and Anderson said they were unaware of any forthcoming lawsuit. They said they had not talked with anyone about their own allegations for years. National Sexual Assault Hotline RAINN operates a free and confidential hotline for sexual assault survivors at 800-656-HOPE (800-656-4673). There is also an online chat option here. Similarly, D.H. said he didn’t know of anyone else claiming abuse by Murray. His attorney Beauregard said Wednesday he didn’t recognize Simpson or Anderson’s names. “Only parent that I know” Murray, a progressive Democrat whose work in the Legislature made him a champion for gay rights, was elected Seattle’s mayor in 2013. He’s enjoyed a series of successes in his first term, and lately he’s drawn national attention as a prominent face of resistance to President Donald Trump’s agenda. He has been considered well-positioned this year to win a second term. Long before he got into politics, Murray, one of seven children in an Irish Catholic family, considered the priesthood. He spent a year at a seminary in 1976 before studying sociology at the University of Portland, a private Catholic institution, according to news profiles. While Murray was in college, Simpson said, he worked with kids at the Parry Center for Children. That’s where they met, said Simpson, who went to live there when he was 6. At age 3, Simpson said, his adoptive parents had abandoned him for setting a Christmas tree on fire, burning the family house. The alleged sexual abuse by Murray began in 1980, Simpson says, when he lived at a group home after leaving the Parry Center, and was allowed to spend the night at Murray’s apartment. Simpson says the two were watching TV, when Murray, then in his mid-20s, began to stroke the 13-year-old’s legs. “Hey ... Jeff, can you keep a secret?” Simpson said Murray asked him. Simpson claims Murray told him “you really excite me” and asked whether he could take off the boy’s clothes and touch him. Simpson says he told Murray he wasn’t comfortable, and Murray stopped. But later, Murray pulled off Simpson’s clothes and performed oral sex, Simpson claims. “I told him no, no, no ... I don’t want to do any of this,” Simpson said. “I started crying... and we stopped.” The next day, he said, Murray took him back to the group home in Beaverton and asked him not to say anything. Months later, Murray again abused him on an overnight visit, Simpson claims. The abuse, he said, went on for years. All the while, Murray also seemed to genuinely care about his welfare, Simpson said. Murray tried helping Simpson find foster homes, and eventually took him in. “That’s why this is so hard for me,” Simpson said. “He’s the only parent that I know, as messed up as that is.” Simpson said he was about 15 when he went to live with Murray. At the time, Simpson had been running away and getting into trouble at other homes. While living alone with Murray, Simpson claims “the abuse was going on regularly” but with one difference: Murray started paying him for sex. Simpson said he used the cash to buy pot. “I was young” Anderson, 51, says that while he lived at the Parry Center from about 1973 to 1980, he became “best friends” with Simpson and also came to know Murray. In a telephone interview Thursday, Anderson said he left the center at age 14 or 15, to live with a Portland-area couple. He cried when recounting that Simpson later visited him and confided he’d been having a sexual relationship with Murray. “It wasn’t exactly voluntary,” Anderson said Simpson told him. “He was crying.” In 1981 or 1982, when Anderson was about 16, he said he left the home where he’d been staying periodically to live on the streets and do drugs. One day, Anderson said, he had a chance encounter downtown with Murray, who invited him to his apartment in Northwest Portland. Anderson said Murray later offered to pay him $30 and some marijuana for oral sex — and he agreed. Anderson said he would meet Murray at his apartment for sex after that. The encounters continued until Anderson was about 17, he said. Murray paid him from $15 to $30 during each encounter, Anderson said. “Look, the guy took advantage of my situation,” said Anderson, who now lives in Florida. “I was young, I was homeless and doing drugs and everything.” About two years later, in 1984, Simpson said, Murray kicked him out of his apartment following a fight. Simpson said he went back to a group home, where he became angry and depressed, and cut his wrists in the shower. Simpson said he told a group-home administrator Murray had molested him, triggering a police investigation. Despite the alleged abuse, Simpson said he told authorities he wanted to return to live with Murray. Simpson said he was interviewed by police and child-services investigators, but no charges were filed against Murray, who for a time in Portland worked in a public defender office. Representatives for Portland police and Oregon’s Department of Human Services, which oversees child-welfare cases, each said the investigation occurred so long ago, the records would have been destroyed. The only remaining record corroborating the investigation is a "case fact sheet" entry from an old Multnomah County District Attorney's database. It indicates the DA's office considered but rejected a felony third-degree sodomy case that identified Murray in May 1984. Simpson admitted he was a bad witness, running away to live on the streets, doing drugs and earning cash as a prostitute. A few months later, Murray moved from Portland to Seattle, records show. While living on Capitol Hill, he worked as a paralegal, according to news accounts. Moving to Seattle in 1986, D.H. claims, he met Murray shortly after dropping out of Seattle's Nathan Hale High School during his freshman year. He said he was hanging out on Broadway, and Murray, then in his early 30s, "propositioned D.H. for private visits to his Capitol Hill apartment," the lawsuit contends. Simpson says that around the same time, while he was in his late teens, Murray also was paying to have sex with him in his Capitol Hill apartment. Despite his previous allegations against Murray in Portland, Simpson said he followed Murray north to Seattle. Simpson was mostly homeless then, but at times stayed with Murray. Simpson last month accurately recalled the apartment's location. He also described where the bathroom and bedroom were in the third-floor unit, much as D.H. described them in his lawsuit. Court records show Simpson was arrested several times in Seattle between 1986 and 1988, drawing theft, weapons and prostitution charges, among others. Simpson often gave aliases during his frequent run-ins with the law. During at least one encounter with police involving a firearms violation, he identified himself as "Jeffrey David Murray," court records show. He also used Murray's Harvard Avenue address as his own on court documents during a 1987 credit-card theft and forgery case, records show. "Position of trust" All three of Murray's accusers have substantial criminal records. D.H. admits to drug addiction and has a long history of criminal convictions and charges, including a prostitution arrest in 1990. He's now in recovery programs and attends community college, studying to become a chemical-dependency counselor. He said his parents were crack addicts and died of drug overdoses. For years, he said, he has struggled with shame over the alleged abuse. "I tried to commit suicide a couple of times, just because I was disgusted with myself, but I'm past that now," D.H. said. Anderson, who accused Murray with Simpson in 2007, also abused drugs and alcohol. A registered sex offender, he was convicted in 1998 for several counts of felony sexual contact with a minor. He spent eight years in prison. Anderson said he now lives with his longtime wife, has two grown children and for a time managed a steakhouse. He no longer uses drugs, he said. Simpson has convictions for burglaries, robberies and selling drugs to support his meth addiction. In 1990, he was convicted of armed robbery and served nine years in prison in Oregon. After leaving prison, Simpson said, he continued to sell drugs. He began to get sober after his son's birth a year later. Court records show he has not had a criminal conviction since 2004. In 2007, as part of his long recovery, Simpson said he felt compelled to go public with his allegations. By then, Murray had served in the Washington Legislature for more than decade. Simpson said he contacted a Portland attorney, and after a lawsuit wasn't filed, he started calling news organizations and lawmakers in early 2008. He also said he spoke on the phone with the Rev. Ken Hutcherson, a chief opponent of gay rights (Hutcherson died in 2013). Murray hired a Portland attorney, Katherine Heekin, who distributed Simpson's and Anderson's criminal records and attacked their credibility, saying their story was false. Murray paid Heekin more than $10,700 from his surplus campaign funds in 2008, according to Public Disclosure Commission records. Another $8,000 went to a private investigator. Simpson said he understands why no one believed him then. "I get it. I understand, my past is less than stellar," he said. "... People did think I was nuts and nobody wanted to believe it. But I felt I needed to tell the truth, finally tell the truth." Sitting his lawyer's office Wednesday afternoon, D.H. said he didn't see how Murray would be able to deny the alleged abuse. His attorneys want to question Murray under oath within 90 days. D.H. said he wants Murray held accountable for treating him "like I was just nothing, like I was worthless." His lawsuit said he "is disturbed that Mr. Murray maintains a position of trust and authority, and believes that the public has a right to full information when a trusted official exploits a child." Staff reporters Gene Balk, Daniel Beekman and Hal Bernton contributed to this report. Jim Brunner: 206-515-5628 or jbrunner@seattletimes.com. On Twitter @Jim_Brunner. Lewis Kamb: 206-464-2932 or lkamb@seattletimes.com. On Twitter @lewiskamb. Source: <http://www.seattletimes.com/seattle-news/politics/lawsuit-alleges-seattle-mayor-ed-murray-sexually-abused-troubled-teen-in-1980s/>

FOX25 Investigates: State warned years ago about school investigators phoning it in | FOX25 Delivered To Your Inbox Newsletter: Breaking News Morning Headlines Please Wait Thank You for Subscribing! Your newsletters will be arriving soon. FOX25 Investigates: State warned years ago about school investigators phoning it in by: Eric Rasmussen, Erin Smith Updated: Apr 5, 2017 - 11:15 PM 0 Share this with your friends! From To Compose your message FOX25 Investigates: State warned years ago about school investigators phoning it in <http://fox25.com/2o4RvqI> BOSTON - A child advocate sounded the alarm nearly three years ago that school regulators were investigating suspected abuse at day cares and residential schools by phone, FOX25 Investigates has learned. Investigative Reporter Eric Rasmussen first uncovered in November that state license regulators at the Department of Early Education and Care were "phoning in" investigations of suspected abuse – rather than visiting residential schools and day cares in person. Now, one child advocate tells FOX25 Investigates she raised concerns about the problem in emails to EEC in 2014 – but the agency failed to take action. FOX25 Investigates obtained emails Angela Smith of HEAL sent to the agency, writing that investigators should have interviewed children in person at a residential school facing abuse allegations "instead of asking the program director by phone and leaving the investigation at that." "I think it's outrageous," Smith told FOX25. "In my years of child advocacy, I know that is not how you handle a special victim's report." While the Department of Children and Families looks into specific allegations of abuse, EEC licensing inspectors investigate the school programs and day cares where suspected abuse happened. Investigative Reporter Eric Rasmussen caught up with state Education Secretary Jim Peyser and asked why EEC is still conducting so many investigations by phone. "So, phone investigations, as well as in-person investigations depend on the circumstances," Peyser told FOX25 Investigates. "There's some judgment that has to be made about how to most effectively follow up on allegations." But Peyser also said EEC is asking for more money to do more in-person investigations. "Hopefully we'll be able to build more capacity to do more of it, so we don't necessarily have to make choices that are sub-optimal," said Peyser. Last year, EEC Commissioner Tom Weber told state lawmakers his agency had just five investigators to oversee 9,000 day cares, after-school programs and residential schools across Massachusetts. But Smith says she isn't satisfied. "Lack of funding is no excuse when children's lives are at risk," said Smith. FOX25 Investigates uncovered in November that the state agency in charge of overseeing day cares and school programs rarely opens investigations into complaints of neglect and abuse – a troubling pattern uncovered by FOX25 Investigates. And when EEC did assign its school inspectors to look into complaints, FOX25 found that much of the work was done by phone – rather than visiting in person. FOX25 Investigates reported in November that EEC opened nine investigation reports at Chamberlain International School, a residential school in Middleboro, over a year and a half but made just one in-person visit by an EEC investigator during that time. Those reports detailed allegations of abuse, a school staff member meeting "fully naked" with a student and another student "dizzy and disoriented" and hospitalized after taking the wrong medication – all incidents EEC investigated by interviewing the school's assistant director "via phone." A spokesman for Chamberlain School sent FOX25 Investigates an email this week saying it "self-reported" all of the cases in question to the state and insists "the proper state agency" – DCF – investigated those cases "on-site." "Chamberlain International School has faith in the state reporting and licensing agencies," said the school in a statement. PREVIOUS: FOX25 Investigates: State school investigators phoning it in FOX25 Investigates: State agency overseeing day cares rarely investigates problems Source: <http://www.fox25boston.com/news/fox25-investigates-state-warned-years-ago-about-school-investigators-phoning-it-in/509534221>

Group Home Workers Accused of Assaulting Patient With Disabilities Trending Stories 1 Privacy policy | More Newsletters Hamden Police Two group home workers in Hamden are accused of hitting a patient with disabilities with a mop handle, police said. The director of resident services for ARC of Meriden and Wallingford reported suspicious injuries on a 19-year-old patient that may have been inflicted by two staff members on Jan. 12, according to Hamden Police. US Launches Missile Strike on Syrian Airfield, Killing 7 Video footage from the group home shows two "direct support staff members", Victoria Dancy, 50, and Melissa Smith, 41, attempting to restrain the victim. The video then shows Dancy and Smith hitting the victim with a broom and mop handle, the police investigation revealed. Later, the video shows the victim lying on her back while Dancy chokes her. After, Dancy is seen striking the victim with the mop handle again, while the victim lays on the floor, Hamden Police said. After Syria Strikes, US and Russia Spiral Into Confrontation When the victim's mother noticed the bruises, she contacted the Department of Developmental Services. Dancy and Smith were arrested on April 6 and 7, respectively. Dancy, of New Haven, was charged with cruelty to persons, assault of a disabled person, strangulation in the second degree, reckless endangerment in the second degree and disorderly conduct. Dancy, who was released after posting bond, is scheduled to appear in court in Meriden on April 20. Smith, of Stratford, was charged with cruelty to persons, assault of a disabled person, reckless endangerment in the second degree and disorderly conduct. Smith, who was detained on a $25,000.00 bond, is scheduled to appear in court in Meriden on April 20. Source: Group Home Workers Accused of Assaulting Patient With Disabilities | NBC Connecticut <http://www.nbcconnecticut.com/news/local/Group-Home-Workers-Accused-of-Assaulting-Patient-With-Disabilities-418673843.html#ixzz4dc6OjVPO> Follow us: @nbcconnecticut on Twitter | NBCConnecticut on Facebook

Council: Conditions at Teens' Group Homes Need State Intervention Haverhill Local News 2 days ago Deputy Chief Anthony Haugh Haverhill city councilors say they fear conditions at three group homes for troubled teens and adolescents are reaching crisis proportions, potentially putting neighbors and the young residents themselves at risk. The homes, at 4 and 31 S. Kimball St. and at 230 Liberty St., are run by a Danvers-based nonprofit, NFI Massachusetts, under a contract with the state Department of Children and Families. All three homes are co-ed and serve children ages 12 to 18. In total, they have the capacity to house 42 children, most of whom were removed from their family homes because of abuse and neglect. Deputy police Chief Anthony Haugh told city councilors that the number of police service calls to the three homes have increased over the past few years, and he estimates the number will exceed 700 this year, based on the number of times police have been called to the homes in the last few months. Haugh asked City Council to reach out to the homes' management, as well as state agencies and officials, to try to find ways to curb the number of calls to police. The deputy chief said the majority of calls, as many as 80 percent, are for runaways. The others are for incidents such as fights or medical situations. Police are concerned about whether the homes are properly staffed and whether residents are being adequately supervised, Haugh said, noting cases of resident-on-resident sexual assault have been reported to police. "This program needs direct intervention from the state," said City Councilor Thomas J. Sullivan. He called for a meeting including Mayor James J. Fiorentini, the city's legislative delegation, NFI, and top leadership of the state Division of Children and Families to answer to the issues at the homes and find solutions. Councilor Joseph J. Bevilacqua revived a suggestion he made several months ago that NFI hire security at its Haverhill group homes. Source: <http://www.whav.net/cms/council-conditions-at-teens-group-homes-need-state-intervention/>

Maltreatment charged in group home client choking death April 11, 2017 Local News A state investigation has determined that there was maltreatment on the part of a group home worker, associated with a choking death of a client. The person who died was a vulnerable adult who was living at the Community Options and Resources group home in Madelia and was brought to the Mankato Pizza Ranch on February 5. While eating, the vulnerable adult, who had a specific dietary plan because of a prior stroke and a lack of teeth, began choking on food. The vulnerable adult pointed to his/her mouth and mouthed that s/he could not breathe. The group home staff members removed food from his/her mouth, but the vulnerable adult shortly after went limp and later died from asphyxiation. An investigation by the Minnesota Department of Human Services determined that there was maltreatment by one of the staff members who brought the vulnerable adult there, because that staff person had been trained in the Heimlich maneuver, but never performed it in order to try to save the vulnerable adult's life. The report says the staff person thought that s/he was not supposed to perform the Heimlich as part of the vulnerable adult's health care directive, but that was not the case. The directive did call for such action to be taken in the event of an emergency illness/situation. The staff person has not been disqualified from providing direct care services because of this incident, but has been warned that they will be disqualified if there's another substantiated act of maltreatment. - See more at: <http://www.mvklgr.com/2017/04/11/maltreatment-by-group-home-worker-in-client-choking-death/#sthash.GuGK7Y4E.dpuf>

TX foster care ministry accused of sexual abuse by David Roach, posted Monday, April 10, 2017 \(3 days ago\) Tags: sexual abuse Texas Baptist Home for Children SBTC FORT WORTH, Texas (BP) -- A $7 million lawsuit alleges children were "seriously sexually abused" and neglected at a Baptist children's home in Texas. The Texas Baptist Home for Children (TBHC) -- an "affiliated ministry" of the Southern Baptists of Texas Convention -- did not respond specifically to the suit but told Baptist Press it maintains the highest standards of safety for children in its care. The lawsuit, filed April 5 in Tarrant County civil court, claims seven siblings under age 14 suffered sexual and physical abuse as well as "serious medical and other neglect" in 2013 while under the care of foster parents at cottages owned by TBHC in Waxahachie, Texas. Among the suit's allegations are that TBHC failed to "properly investigate reports of abuse," "perform adequate background checks or follow-ups on foster parents" and "take prompt action against perpetrators." Hal Browne, an attorney representing the siblings, told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram three of the male siblings were sexually abused by "other, older children" while the four additional siblings suffered neglect. The plaintiffs are requesting awards "in excess of" $1 million for each of the seven children, according to a copy of the suit provided to BP by Browne. "We don't file lawsuits lightly," Browne told the Star-Telegram. "If we didn't feel the abuse was severe and long-term, we wouldn't have filed the lawsuit." TBHC interim president Randy Odom told BP April 10 he had not been served with the suit yet but noted all TBHC foster parents undergo a "very extensive process" to be licensed. "Our standards go well beyond state standards," Odom said. The suit names the SBTC as a codefendant, noting TBHC is an affiliated ministry of the convention. The SBTC has "representation" on the TBHC trustee board and provides funding to the ministry, according to the lawsuit. The SBTC told BP in a statement it "is aware of the lawsuit, and we pray for a resolution that facilitates the continued ministry of the Texas Baptist Home for Children as they meet the needs of at-risk children and families." Another codefendant is the Baptist Missionary Association of Texas, a network of 400 churches listed on the SBTC website as a "related ministry" that "operates" the TBHC. According to the Star-Telegram, allegations in the lawsuit appear to match facts from a previously publicized case in which the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services "found no deficiencies in its own inquiry of" the TBHC. The state recommended, however, that foster parents who cared for two of the siblings "increase supervision and not allow the children to have any unsupervised contact with one another." The Southern Baptist Convention, with which the SBTC maintains a cooperative relationship, adopted a 2013 resolution "on sexual abuse of children" that "remind[ed] all Southern Baptists of their legal and moral responsibility to report any accusations of child abuse to authorities." The resolution "call[ed] upon all Southern Baptists to cooperate fully with law enforcement officials in exposing and bringing to justice all perpetrators," urged the use of background checks for ministry staff and volunteers and "encourage[d] all denominational leaders ... to utilize the highest sense of discernment in affiliating with groups and or individuals that possess questionable policies and practices in protecting our children from criminal abuse." Source: <http://www.bpnnews.net/48650/tx-foster-care-ministry-accused-of-sexual-abuse>

$4.5 million awarded in Davis group home neglect case Posted: 04/12/17, 6:45 AM PDT | Updated: 22 hrs ago 0 Comments SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) — A former resident of a children's group home in Northern California has been awarded nearly $4.5 million after jurors found he was severely neglected by the home's caregivers while living at the facility. The Sacramento Bee reports (<http://bit.ly/2p7KWIM>) the jurors determined Tuesday that EMQ FamiliesFirst caused the child emotional distress and concealed information from him and his family. The alleged neglect took place at the Davis group home in 2012 and 2013, starting when the boy was 11. The plaintiff's attorney alleged in court documents that the boy had been sexually and physically assaulted while away from the home one night. Advertisement The group home ultimately lost its state license in 2013. It had shed about 100 employees amid allegations of sexual assaults and unsupervised children walking away from the facility. ____ Source: <http://www.montereyherald.com/general-news/20170412/45-million-awarded-in-davis-group-home-neglect-case>

To help address foster care tragedies, better understand and listen to youth By Christine Gendron, April 14, 2017 Photo by iStock.com Earlier this month, two teenagers in foster care were struck by a vehicle after running away from Child Protective Services (CPS) offices in Houston, where they had been staying because of a lack of appropriate placement options. One, a 15-year-old girl, died from her injuries. The tragic fatality has heightened attention on Texas' foster care capacity crisis, but it is important to recognize that the issues Texas must address are much broader. Due to challenges with how information was collected and stored in previous years, CPS does not know exactly how many young people who should be in foster care have fled and not returned. The agency does know that 1,068 children ran from care in 2016 and that only 776 of them were located. The whereabouts of the remaining 292 runaways are unknown, but research suggests they are at very high risk of being victimized, particularly by sex traffickers. What should we do about this? We must recognize that housing children in CPS offices is unacceptable. Appropriate funding is needed to address this capacity crisis by supporting an array of quality foster care services that can meet demand for all children, including those with more challenging behaviors who require higher levels of care. Texas legislators have proposed significant funding increases for foster care, and the Texas Network of Youth Services applauds their leadership on this important issue. Additionally, Texas must develop appropriate strategies to prevent and respond to runaways and potential runaways. The Legislature has insisted that CPS find the young people who have run away from care. CPS should absolutely make every effort to do that, but there is a larger problem, too: How will CPS keep them from running again, since this behavior is not unusual for children who do not want to be in care and who have experienced severe physical and emotional trauma? This challenge requires a multi-faceted approach that includes increased training for providers and thoughtful discussion about how the system approaches care. One approach is to create "cultures of care" — climates that recognize past trauma youth have experienced and that work to prevent triggers that cause and escalate challenging behaviors such as running away. For four years, our organization supported the development of cultures of care at a handful of residential treatment centers serving some of the most challenging youth across Texas. Evaluations results show the initiative was extremely successful; most programs substantially reduced their use of seclusion and restraint practices, which are often used to control behaviors but can create more trauma. This initiative can serve as a blueprint for preventing future foster care tragedies: by investing in evidence-based training and support services for providers to create climates that don't prompt so many runaways.

Working collaboratively with youth and valuing their perspectives is another key part of the solution. Young people are telling us something when they run from care, and it is time to start listening. They often know what works best for them and research suggests that allowing youth to participate in decisions about their lives may help them heal. Perhaps youth should be able to exercise more choice regarding their placements, or even be given the choice to “opt out” of foster care placement during their later teen years and instead enter supportive living environments with fewer restrictions and strings attached. These ideas may seem radical, but traditional foster care settings are just not working for everyone, and we risk future tragedies if we don’t adapt. In addition to increasing Texas’ foster care capacity, we must work to better understand and listen to youth in foster care so that we can keep them healthy, safe and on the right path. Source: <https://www.tribtalk.org/2017/04/14/to-help-address-foster-care-tragedies-better-understand-and-listen-to-youth/>

State foster care system comes under fire during forum State foster care system comes under fire during forum Federico Martinez , San Angelo Standard-Times Published 9:35 p.m. CT April 13, 2017 | Updated 5 hours ago More than 75 percent of reported child abuse cases that occur in foster homes go unresolved in Texas every year, said Houston attorney Chris Porter Chris Porter (Photo: Contributed photo) 6 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE More than 75 percent of reported child abuse cases that occur in Texas foster homes go unresolved every year because state politicians and government leaders ignore reports by Child Protective Services, said Chris Porter, a prominent Houston attorney who is among several attorneys suing the state for child neglect. Porter was the featured speaker during a “Truth About CPS” community forum Thursday night at Stephens Central Library. The forum was organized by the Tom Green County Democratic Club. “This is currently one of the biggest issues in the state,” said David Currie, chairman of the county Democratic Party. “This state doesn’t do a good job of taking care of our children, and we know why: Poor children don’t have money to donate to political campaigns.” Yetter Coleman, which Porter works for, is one of several law firms in Texas that joined forces and filed a lawsuit in 2014 alleging the state is guilty of child neglect because it has failed to address ongoing problems in the foster care system. The law firms in 2015 won an initial judgement in 5th Circuit Court, but the state has filed an appeal. Porter said his side believes the state will continue to ignore the problems until a federal court orders reform in the foster care system. “There’s always a lot of talk about change during the election season, but then it never happens,” Porter said. “To be clear, we started looking into the problem in 2004 and didn’t take it to court until 2014. In 2015 we got an opinion in our favor. “The state has had at least 13 years to do something, but there have been no changes.” According to research findings that Porter and other attorneys have already presented in court, there are 12,000 children “trapped” in the state’s foster care system, meaning those children have been in the system for more than 18 months with little hope of ever finding permanent placement. National guidelines recommend that each social worker should have 12-15 cases assigned at one time, Porter said. Most Texas social workers have 67 percent to 100 percent more cases than the national guideline. “What that means is they have so many cases that they can’t do their jobs,” Porter said. “The result is our children are being deprived of services.” Attorneys also discovered the state doesn’t keep track of caseloads, even though those numbers are kept and easily available, Porter said. State officials also refuse to acknowledge child abuse incidents that occur in foster homes involving children physically or sexually assaulting other children. Those incidents are tracked by CPS programs throughout Texas, but state officials do not include them in public reports, Porter said. Of the more than 4,000 cases identified by the attorneys’ group in 2013, the state investigated less than 15 of the incidents. The forum comes at a time when both state Senate and House leaders are discussing the idea of privatizing CPS. The state already uses some private, for-profit facilities to house foster care children, Porter said. In recent years CPS departments throughout Texas, including San Angelo, have been forced to place children in hotel rooms or make them sleep in office waiting rooms because there aren’t enough foster homes to place the children at, Porter and Currie said. The Tom Green County Club each month hosts a public forum on different issues. Source: <http://www.gosanangelo.com/story/news/2017/04/13/state-foster-care-system-comes-under-fire-during-forum/100448774/>

I Was Abused While Living In Foster Care 04/18/2017 03:25 am ET | Updated 2 days ago Six years, 312 weeks, 2,190 days — those are 3 different ways to describe how much time I spent living in 18 different group homes or foster homes as a ward of the Toronto Children’s Aid Society and a Crown Ward. No matter how you calculate it or sum it up, I was YOUR child as Crown Wards are children under legal guardianship of the province. Your tax dollars paid for my medication, your tax dollars fed me, and your tax dollars also paid for the salaries of the people who abused me over this six-year period. You see, I was born to an intellectually disabled single mother who wanted to adopt me. But my grandmother, who had always dreamed of having a grandchild, stepped in and offered to assist in raising me in return for my mother calling the adoption off. When I was five years old, my grandmother was diagnosed with Alzheimer’s disease, and so my mother was left to care for a child she never really wanted in the first place. My mother had a difficult time choosing between caring for me and caring for my grandmother, and at times, I ended up facing the wrath of my mother’s hands and other objects. When I was around seven or eight years old, the Children’s Aid Society (CAS) began to investigate, and when I was nine years old, I was apprehended. And so began my journey living out of garbage bags (that’s what was used to put my belongings in when I moved from home to another). Little did I know that I was trading one abusive environment for another. Last year, the Government of Ontario announced that it was introducing new legislation in order to enhance the experience of youth living in care. There is absolutely no discussion about having children and youth served by people who are actually qualified to do so. In a previous blog I talked about the need to have licensed workers in group homes and specialized foster homes which would improve accountability. For most of my time living in care, I had an undiagnosed mental illness that was written off as behavioral, and rather than spending time to dig into what was actually causing my so-called behavior, I suffered abuse and eventually shipped off to yet another group home or foster home. No youth worker will admit what they did to me was abuse, instead they’ll tell you they were using different techniques as a means of putting a stop to my behavior. I remember one day when I was 10 years old I found out my grandmother had been rushed to the hospital, upon receiving this news, I ran to my room, sat in my chair and began to cry. Rather than coming into my room and consoling me, a worker in my group home charged into my room and immediately put me on the floor and restrained me. I later learned they thought I was harming myself because I was crying so loudly. So rather than finding out what was wrong first, they just assumed the worst and restrained me. The louder I cried, the harder the restraint got. This is still a memory that brings me to tears and one that will forever haunt me; I will never forget the person that did this to me, nor will I forgive them. In another group home, I had my door taken off its hinges. In that same group home, the residents’ shoes were locked up and as punishment we sometimes had our clothes taken away and given hot pink (or some other really tacky color) of pajamas to wear. When I threatened to jump out my second floor window, a worker in my group home brought me a step stool and said, “If you do it, I’ll say you accidentally fell.” To deter “behavioral” issues, sometimes my fellow residents and I were given Cream of Wheat or something of that nature as punishment. I remember eating this and having a group home worker tell me, “You’re lucky I didn’t urinate in it.” Every child living in care has the right to freedom of religion (and that includes refusing to go to church or other religious activities) in one particular foster home I lived in for several months when I was 12 years old I refused to participate in a weekly bible study session. Over a two-week period that resulted in me having to stay in my bedroom when I got home from school at 3:30pm until 7:30am the next morning. I was only allowed out of my room to bathe or use the washroom. I had to even stay in my room on weekends. All my meals were brought to me. The only items allowed in my room were my homework and a bible. This is only a small snapshot of the abuse I suffered at the hands of the very system that was supposed to protect me. A few years ago I was diagnosed with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), which the psychiatrist believed to be a direct result of my experience with the child protection system. I did try and assert my rights and stand up for myself while living in care. I made dozens of calls to The Provincial Advocate for Children & Youth (The Advocate’s Office) whose powers are somewhat limited as to how they can intervene. At most my advocate would try to mediate the issue but more times than not that just pissed off the group home which led to the entire house going bowling while I had to stay at the group home and scrub floors. Each child is given a ‘Rights and Responsibilities Handbook’ which is reviewed with the child/youth every 3 months. Just like the law, every single worker and foster parent interpreted every single word of the rights and responsibilities differently and at the end of the day I was told that my foster parent or group home worker was in charge and sometimes their methods were more creative than others yet had to be respected. Group homes and foster homes are inspected annually but are usually given weeks if not months to prepare. My experience was that the inspections usually happened when the kids were outside of the house and if we did see the inspector it was just as they were leaving the house. Ask any youth or former youth in care and they’ll tell you that we were rewarded for saying positive things to the inspector and we were all penalized for saying negative things to the inspector; usually in the form of being put off-program (the group home version of lockdown). The government says as part of its new legislation it hopes to include unannounced inspections. I’ve said it before and I’ll say it again; our children and youth of Ontario deserve better! Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/entry/i-was-abused-while-living-in-foster-care_us_58f5ba3e4b04cae050dca81

Home-Based Drug Treatment Program Costs Less And Works April 17, 2017 By Jack Rodolico Share closemore Hannah Berkowitz in her parents' home in West Hartford, Conn. Getting intensive in-home drug treatment is what ultimately helped her get back on track, she and her mom agree. Hannah Berkowitz is 20 years old. When she was a senior in high school her life flew off the rails. She was getting high on whatever drugs she could get her hands on. She was suicidal. Berkowitz moved into a therapeutic boarding school to get sober, but could only stay sober while she was on campus during the week. "I'd come home and try to stay sober really hard — really, really hard," says Berkowitz. "Sometimes I'd make it through the weekend, and sometimes I just couldn't make it. It was white-knuckling it, just holding on." The transition back home always triggered a relapse for Berkowitz. "I thought it was just my fault and there was no hope," she says. No hope — but Berkowitz did have luck. She had private health insurance and she lived in Connecticut, where a startup company, Aware Recovery Care, had begun treating clients in the very environment where Hannah was struggling to stay sober: her home. A chronic disease approach Treating addiction is a growing business, but a lot of the treatment that's available is expensive and patients often relapse. Fortunately, there is a way to help some people pay less for better results, says Matt Eacott, vice president of Aware Recovery Care. "Ninety-nine percent of the industry really treats addiction as an acute problem — like a rash on your arm that you rub lotion on and you're done," says Eacott. Instead, Aware treats addiction as a chronic illness — it doesn't disappear just because symptoms are temporarily under control. The approach is a cost-effective way of treating addiction, Eacott says, with better results than most competitors achieve. Aware comes into clients' homes and connects them with a nurse, a primary care doctor, a therapist, peer support, 12-step meetings and a case manager. Clients hooked on opioids can get medication-assisted treatment. They can also submit to urine screening and GPS tracking, if that helps them stick with the program. Hannah's mother, Lois Berkowitz, says the program is intense at first. But as Hannah built coping skills the supports faded into the background. "It's not like they're doing the work for the addict," says Lois Berkowitz, "they're just basically taking them by the hand and saying, 'Here are the places you need to go that will help you. And I'm going to go with you to start, so it doesn't feel that uncomfortable. And then we're going to let you fly.' " Before they "fly," Aware clients have a pretty long runway. The treatment lasts for a full year. Benefits worth the initial cost, insurer says Aware has now expanded from its base in Connecticut into New Hampshire. The program is expensive. It costs $38,000 a year. As of now, it's only available to private-pay clients and people insured through Anthem health insurance in New Hampshire and Connecticut. Anthem became the first insurer to pay Aware, because the treatment is based on hard science that's yielding solid results for clients, says Dr. Steven Korn, Anthem's behavioral health medical director. Science and results are rare in addiction treatment, he says. "There are old, old notions that have hung pretty tough," says Korn. "When I was young — when I was in training — as soon as substance abuse was mentioned, the response of physicians was, 'Well, go to AA. That's not our problem. We don't treat that.' " For a year of treatment, Anthem says it's paying Aware about the same as the cost of a month or two of inpatient treatment. Anthem also says 72 percent of Aware clients are either sober at the end of one year or still in active treatment. That's about twice the sobriety rate of people who check in to a facility for a month and then get no follow-up care, says Dr. Stuart Gitlow, past president of the American Society of Addiction Medicine. Treating addiction at home makes sense because it's the exact place where people learned all their bad habits, Gitlow says. "It's all based on this concept that addiction is not about the substance use," he says, "but is about what led to the substance use in the first place. And you can't really get there without getting to know the patient." Aware says it's in negotiations with four more major insurers. The program hopes to have a couple hundred clients in New Hampshire by the end of the year. Source: <http://www.wbur.org/npr/523016186/home-based-drug-treatment-program-costs-less-and-works>

Family wants more answers, transparency from a local group home By Jenn Schanz, News 4 Reporter Published: April 18, 2017, 6:13 pm WILLIAMSVILLE, N.Y. (WIVB)- The Adams adopted their daughter Wendy when she was four. The now 48-year-old is blind and non-verbal. "We didn't have much choice when we had to place Wendy in a group home, it bothered us immensely," Clayton Adams, Wendy's father told News 4. Wendy lives in a group home in Williamsville run by Aspire of Western New York. Almost a year ago, the Adams got a call Wendy suffered a minor injury, burns to several fingers on her left hand. "They said it was discovered at day program but they don't know if it happened at day program, if it happened at the house," said Pamela Adams, Wendy's mother. The Adams were only notified of the burns after Wendy was taken to the doctor. News 4 spoke to an Aspire spokesperson, who didn't want to go on camera. They told us protocol was followed; they are legally required to notify families of an injuries within 24 hours, which they claim they did. Pamela said the fact that Aspire staff couldn't tell her how the injury occurred is not acceptable. "There seems to be very little consistent follow through," Clayton said. According to a corrective action report from Aspire, the staff member was "re-trained to notify family prior to doctor appointments when an individual has an injury." Pamela said there have been other causes for concern; how to properly guide a blind person, she said, didn't appear to be known by some staff. "One person grabbed her by the back of the neck and steered her around," she explained. Their concerns were investigated by Aspire internally. Aspire would not provide copies of their internal investigation, but told us they made changes to alleviate some of the Adams' concerns, like upping Wendy's supervision. "They're going to fall back on the fact that they can't question Wendy specifically to find out what she wants to say," Clayton said. "Basically it's a nonverbal individual against an organization that is obviously going to try to defend itself." Source: <http://wivb.com/2017/04/18/family-wants-more-answers-transparency-from-a-local-group-home/>

Former CEO of Florida Group Home Association Convicted of Conspiracy to Defraud SSA Date: Wednesday, April 19, 2017 Office Affiliation: The Office of Investigations From the U.S. Attorney's Office, Middle District of Florida: Tampa, FL – Acting United States Attorney W. Stephen Muldrow announces that a federal jury today found Richard Lilliston (70, Brooksville) guilty of conspiracy to defraud the United States, and to make false statements to the Social Security Administration. He faces a maximum penalty of five years in federal prison and a fine of $250,000. A sentencing date has not yet been set. According to court documents, the Hillsborough Achievement and Resource Centers (HARC), formerly the Hillsborough Association for Retarded Citizens, was established in 1953 to positively impact the future for all people living with developmental disabilities, such as Alzheimer's disease and Down syndrome. HARC opened and operated group homes that served its target client population. HARC also spearheaded various community programs for its clients focused on inclusion activities for youths, adults, and seniors with disabilities. Many of the HARC clients received SSA benefits due to various developmental disabilities. For certain HARC clients who lacked the capacity to manage their own SSA benefits, SSA approved one or more HARC officials to act as a "Representative Payee" to receive the client's benefits and to use them exclusively for that client's benefit. As a Representative Payee, the HARC official was required to complete and submit to the SSA a "Representative Payee Report" that included information about each HARC client's living situation and the financial benefits received and expended on behalf of that client. Lilliston began working at HARC in 1997 as the Chief Executive Officer. While working in that capacity, he and others orchestrated a scheme whereby HARC client funds, purportedly saved solely for HARC's developmentally disabled clients' needs and use in a HARC bank account ("Endowment Account"), had been and were being wrongfully diverted from the clients to the HARC operating account for other purposes. In November 2009, in an effort to conceal that HARC client funds were being wrongfully diverted from the clients and to make it appear as if HARC's Endowment Account had been properly established and maintained, Lilliston directed the former HARC CFO and Controller to secure signatures from the developmentally disabled HARC clients on a document backdated to 2007, titled "Pooled Trust Joinder Agreement." The CFO and Controller did as instructed, knowing that the HARC clients who signed the Pooled Trust Joinder Agreement document did not have the capacity necessary to understand the importance of the document. Notwithstanding, Lilliston and other HARC employees signed the backdated agreements. Trial testimony further revealed that Lilliston was terminated from his HARC CEO position in November 2011, following a discovery by the HARC Board of Directors that he had wrongfully taken an additional $10,000 in salary ($160,000 rather than the approved $150,000) and had allotted himself a car allowance of $1,850 per month. In June 2013, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed a Verified Complaint for Forfeiture Rem in a related case (Case No. 8:13-cv-1601-T-17TBM), seeking the forfeiture of $87,000 held in a Synovus Bank account. That complaint raised like allegations that HARC clients' SSA benefits had been wrongfully diverted from the clients and used by HARC for other purposes and was supported by facts contained in the sworn affidavit of a special agent with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services - Office of Inspector General. On September 30, 2013, the district court entered a Default Judgment of Forfeiture in which the court ordered the forfeiture of the $87,000 to the United States. This case was investigated by the Social Security Administration - Office of the Inspector General, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services - Office of Inspector General, and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, along with the State of Florida's Department of Financial Services - Office of Fiscal Integrity. It is being prosecuted by Assistant United States Attorney Jay G. Trezevant. Source: <https://oig.ssa.gov/audits-and-investigations/investigations/april19-harc-ceo-convicted>

Sharon Group Home Employee Charged With Abusing Developmentally Disabled Resident April 21, 2017 11:31 AM Filed Under: Sharon Patricia Afriyie-Yeboah. (Image Credit: Sharon Police) SHARON (CBS) – Police have charged a Sharon group home employee with abusing a developmentally disabled resident using a shower rod. Sharon Police began an investigation into the reported abuse, which stemmed from an incident on Tuesday. Staff members alerted police to the abuse, and after an investigation police arrested Patricia Afriyie-Yeboah of Stoughton. The 22-year-old group home resident was not seriously injured. Afriyie-Yeboah was suspended immediately after the incident was reported. She was arraigned Thursday in Stoughton District Court on charges of assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon and assault and battery on a disabled person. Source: <http://boston.cbslocal.com/2017/04/21/sharon-group-home-abuse-arrest-patricia-afriyie-yeboah/>

Death, rapes, and broken bones at Philly's only residential treatment center for troubled youth Updated: April 22, 2017 — 6:00 AM EDT 923Share Tweet Tumblr Email 91 Comment REPRINTS Popular Stories Death, rapes, and broken bones at Philly's only residential treatment center for troubled youth 6:29 AM What the soda tax has done to a 210-year-old black cherry elixir Apr 21 - 5:42 PM Buy Photo JESSICA GRIFFIN / Staff Photographer The gravestone of David Hess at Merion Memorial Park by Nancy Phillips & Chris Palmer - Staff Writers Email @PhillipsNancy 215-854-2254 Nancy Phillips Staff Writer Nancy Phillips is a member of the Inquirer's investigative team. She has reported on police misconduct, political corruption, the failings of Philadelphia's child welfare system, and dysfunction in city courts. She has won numerous state and national awards, including a special citation from Investigative Reporters & Editors for her work solving a murder by eliciting a confession from a killer. She is a former Inquirer city editor and a former assistant to the publisher of the Inquirer, Daily News and Philly.com. Shortly after David Hess died in a struggle with staffers at Wordsworth last fall, the state shuttered the West Philadelphia facility, decrying it as "an immediate and serious danger" to the children who lived there. Family photo David Hess, 17, died in a confrontation with staffers at Wordsworth, a residential treatment center for troubled young people. The death of Hess, 17 — ruled a homicide — was yet another violent chapter in a hidden history of abuse at the city's only residential treatment center for troubled young people. In the last decade, at least 49 sex crimes have been reported at Wordsworth, including 12 rapes and 23 accounts of sexual abuse, an Inquirer investigation has found. Interviews, court records, state inspection reports, and police records reveal a trail of injuries to children, from broken bones to assaults to the suffocation death of Hess. Along the way, lawyers, licensing inspectors, and others found conditions there appalling and sounded the alarm with little success. In 2015, three girls at the center were sexually assaulted by a counselor who lured them with promises of money and gifts, they would later tell police. While rumors of the incidents swirled, Wordsworth officials were slow to investigate, and the girls say the assaults continued for weeks. "I couldn't believe that. It's pretty outrageous," said Frank Cervone, executive director of the Support Center for Child Advocates, which represents victims of child abuse and neglect. For Hess, who suffered from profound mental illness, and the other behaviorally challenged young people who called Wordsworth home, the center was supposed to be a refuge, a place to get needed help. Taxpayers shelled out $119,000 a year for the care of each child, but all too often reaped failure. "He died a child," said Hess' sister, Elizabeth, 28. "He died a child in a facility designed to help him, and it didn't help him. It killed him." "Exceptional hardships" On the sprawling grounds of a former hospital on Ford Road, Wordsworth, a nonprofit, runs a variety of programs that aim to help children and families in need. The redbrick-and-glass residential treatment facility housed 82 young people the night Hess died. Many had been placed there by the city after suffering abuse or neglect. Others were ordered to stay there by juvenile court after committing a crime. All had mental illness or behavioral problems, posing severe challenges for their caregivers. Ranging in age from 10 to 21, the young people in Wordsworth's care lived in a rundown facility and slept in rooms with holes in the walls, exposed wiring, broken light fixtures, and faulty heaters. There, records show, they were sometimes tended to by ill-trained staffers. Family photo David Hess. "He died a child in a facility designed to help him, and it didn't help him. It killed him," says his sister Elizabeth. Despite its deficiencies, Wordsworth had its license renewed by the state Department of Human Services again and again, and child welfare agencies and the courts continued to send young people there. DHS officials declined to explain its decisions to allow Wordsworth to operate after compiling a long history of violations. They said the agency is examining how it handled problems at Wordsworth and whether changes need to be made. Officials at Wordsworth, which has appealed the closure order, declined to be interviewed and declined to respond to a detailed list of questions. In a statement, Wordsworth's board chairman, Thomas V. Johnson, said: "At Wordsworth, there is no greater value we have than the responsibility to care for our children." He said many of the young people who live there "had experienced exceptional hardships in their lives with behavioral and other mental health issues." Johnson said pending lawsuits prevented him from discussing specific incidents at the facility. However, he said, "we would like to state unequivocally that Wordsworth remains committed to ensuring a safe and secure environment for all children in our care." He also noted that in January Wordsworth hired a new CEO. Community Behavioral Health, a nonprofit that oversees publicly funded mental-health services for the city, funneled about $6 million a year in state and federal money to Wordsworth to care for a steady stream of young people at an average cost of $326 per day. The agency continued to write those checks even after it learned of serious problems at the facility, including sexual assaults. "Our approach to agencies generally is that we need them, and if there are opportunities to improve, we work with them," said Joan Erney, chief executive of Community Behavioral Health. "We did rely on Wordsworth extensively," she added. "Places outside of Philadelphia don't want to take our kids. They tell us our kids are too complicated. They tell us our kids are too hard. We have kids with some really difficult problems." "Nobody believes you" In the last decade, police were summoned to Wordsworth more than 800 times for incidents ranging from minor disturbances and tripped fire alarms to rape. Police records show reports of 12 rapes, two cases of involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, seven reports of indecent exposure, four cases of corruption of the morals of a minor, and one case of child endangerment. In addition, police were called to investigate 23 reports of sexual abuse, and six reports of physical abuse against children. Police declined to provide details of those cases, but records obtained by the Inquirer shed light on some of those crimes, which began shortly after the center opened in 2006. The next year, for instance, staffer Norman Thompson went to a 16-year-old girl's room at 4 a.m., touched her genitals, and forced her to touch his penis, court records show. Thompson, then 26, later pleaded no contest to indecent exposure and corruption of a minor and was sentenced to five years' probation. Another case that year turned out much differently. A girl, 13, told police a staffer came into her room one night and raped her. She told her social worker, who took her to the hospital and alerted police. Other staffers were less supportive, said the woman, now 23, whose name the Inquirer is withholding because it does not identify victims of alleged sexual assault without their permission. "They didn't believe me when I told," she said. "Nobody believes you. They all stick together." After she reported the assault, she said, she was moved to what Wordsworth called the "safe room" and she never saw her attacker again. But word of her allegations spread through the facility, she said. "People kept calling me a liar," she said. "So I just told my social worker I didn't want to do it [pursue the case] anymore, and they didn't force me." The woman described Wordsworth as a violent place where young people fight among themselves and with the staff. "That place was horrible," she said. Another woman reported a sexual assault by a staffer at Wordsworth in 2008 when she was 16. She said the man came into her room at night, assaulted her, and ejaculated on her. Afterward, she remembered feeling confused. In ways that she now understands to be wrong, part of her felt good about it. "I was just happy that somebody touched me," she said. "I never had a guy touch me because I was in placement for so long." The woman, now 25, said she and her brothers were removed from their home because their mother had mental problems and tried to harm them. After the assault at Wordsworth, she said, she finally told her social worker. "She was like my mom because I'd been there for so long" — since age 11, the woman said. "She told me, 'That's wrong,' and she reported it." The woman said she knew girls at Wordsworth who had sex with staffers. "They'd say, 'Hey, Daddy.' Like you call your man, 'Hey, Daddy.'" It was tolerated, she said. "Nothing came to light down there," she said. Among dozens of sex crimes reported at the facility, records show, arrests were made in just four cases. Those include the one involving Thompson and the arrest of a staffer charged with assaulting the three girls. Also charged were two boys, 16 and 13, accused in separate incidents of raping other boys at the center. "They just lost track of the place" Wordsworth, founded in 1952 as a school for children with reading disabilities, expanded rapidly in recent years. Beginning in 2013, it won city contracts to provide foster care, education, and social services for children at risk of abuse, neglect, or delinquency, with public funding rising to $55 million a year. These contracts fueled enormous growth. Wordsworth grew into a behemoth organization with a $77 million-a-year budget that also runs a school and an acute psychiatric facility and says it serves more than 5,600 children and families each year. As Wordsworth's work expanded well beyond the troubled youth home, said Cervone, of the Child Advocacy center, "it's possible that they just lost track of the place." Over the years, inspectors from the state Department of Human Services repeatedly cited the facility for failing to ensure that its workers had the required training in the care and management of children. ELIZABETH ROBERTSON / Staff Photographer "You're either allowed to be around children or you're not," says Steven F. Marino, a lawyer for the Hess family. "It's like carrying a gun without a license. You either have it or you don't," said Steven F. Marino, a lawyer for the Hess family who plans to sue Wordsworth. "You're either allowed to be around children or you're not." Proper training in how to safely restrain a child is essential in facilities such as Wordsworth, where children can grow combative quickly, experts say. State officials warned Wordsworth about the importance of the proper use of restraint in inspections of the facility in 2012, 2013, 2015, and 2016. Wordsworth officials repeatedly pledged to be more diligent. If staff aren't properly trained in proper restraint techniques, "they use techniques they'd use in the street," Marino said. Lissy Sherman says that's what she experienced at Wordsworth in 2008 when she was 17. In an interview, Sherman, now 26, said it was "med call,” or time to get medication, and she didn’t come out of her room on time. A mental-health technician, Isaac Wilson, came in to get her, she said. “He literally dragged me out the room pulling my clothes, dragging me, pulling me,” she said. “You could see my bone sticking out.” — Lissy Sherman, who was injured at Wordsworth when she was 17. As it happened, her friend saw the attack. “He had her on the ground and bent her arm back,” the woman recalled. “She was crying.” During the struggle, Sherman said, her arm was fractured. “You could see my bone sticking out.” Sherman remembers that Wilson turned to her and said: “I didn’t do that.” A lawsuit Sherman’s mother later filed on her behalf said the injury to her arm required surgery to realign the bone. In court papers, a lawyer for Wordsworth said Sherman had been “combative and aggressive” and contributed to her own injury. The suit was settled for a sum not disclosed in court documents. Sherman said she was paid $47,000. In another incident, a 17-year-old girl suffered a broken jaw in 2010 in a struggle with a staffer who was trying to break up a fight she was having with another girl. Shakara Holly said in court papers that the staffer, Ahmadou Mbengue, used “unusually harsh force” as he attempted to restrain her. Lawyers for Wordsworth and Mbengue denied that and the lawsuit ended when Wordsworth agreed to pay an undisclosed sum. Then came a terrible event that reverberated outside the Wordsworth campus. In April 2015, a 16-year-old boy at Wordsworth was awakened at 4:30 in the morning by another boy who forced him to perform oral sex and then pushed him to the floor and raped him. At the time of the assault, Craig Roberts, who was sent to Wordsworth after committing a robbery and threatening to inflict bodily harm on someone, was supposed to be kept under one-on-one supervision, lawyers for the victim said. Instead, he was left alone and attacked the boy. When the victim initially reported the crime, staffers were dismissive, the teen said, and he had to beg to be taken to the hospital. An exam there found tears in his anus. Police investigated and Roberts, now 18, was arrested and adjudicated delinquent on a sexual-assault charge. The victim was moved to another wing at Wordsworth, where he was raped by a second attacker, he later told police. These crimes and other troubling reports so concerned lawyers at the Defender Association of Philadelphia that they began holding monthly meetings with officials at Wordsworth and Community Behavioral Health. Also at the meetings were representatives of the city and its Department of Human Services, which is responsible for the care of children who have been abused or neglected or have been adjudicated delinquent after committing crimes; the state Department of Human Services, which licenses and inspects the facility; and representatives of Philadelphia’s juvenile probation department. Wordsworth officials agreed to put cameras in the building and fix up conditions inside, Erney said. They also pledged to improve training. AVI STEINHARDT / For the Inquirer A visitor enters Wordsworth. Crimes and other troubling reports so concerned lawyers at the Defender Association of Philadelphia that they began holding monthly meetings with officials at Wordsworth and Community Behavioral Health. But as part of their review, Community Behavioral Health officials neglected to read the state inspection reports on Wordsworth. Had they done so, they would have learned of lingering problems, including lapses in training, delays in medical care, injuries to children through improper restraints, and reported abuse. The monthly meetings became bimonthly meetings. “Everyone seemed to think that they were on the right path, and we were going to go to every six months” for meetings, Erney said. But several months later, in 2015, three girls, ages 15 to 17, reported repeated sexual assaults by residential counselor Isaac Outten. The girls said Outten took them to the basement for sex and forced them to take naked photographs of themselves with his iPhone. He lured the 15-year-old to the basement by promising her diapers and milk for her 1-year-old child in exchange for oral sex and intercourse, she later told police. He promised another girl, 17, that he would help her with a criminal case in exchange for sex and naked selfies, police said. And the third girl, also 17, told police Outten took her to the basement for sex after a counselor left her alone with him. She said he told her not to tell anyone or he would get in trouble. Wordsworth suspended and later fired Outten after one of the girls told a counselor what happened. But some staffers had heard rumblings that Outten was having sex with one or more of the girls and they did nothing, according to a summary of interviews Wordsworth officials conducted in preparation for the defense of a lawsuit. State DHS officials learned of at least one of the alleged rapes through its abuse hotline, Childline, in late November. A month later, the agency renewed Wordsworth’s license. Outten, 38, was later charged with institutional sexual assault, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, corruption of minors, child endangerment, and other crimes. He has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial. Through his lawyer, Outten declined to comment. DAVID SWANSON / Staff Photographer “It is unfortunate that Wordsworth did not follow protocol that would have prevented their employee from preying on these vulnerable girls,” says lawyer Nadeem A. Bezar, who has sued Wordsworth on behalf of two assault victims. Nadeem A. Bezar, a lawyer with Kline & Specter who has sued Wordsworth on behalf of two of the girls, said the center breached its duty to them by allowing Outten to be alone with them. “It is unfortunate that Wordsworth did not follow protocol that would have prevented their employee from preying on these vulnerable girls,” he said. He also faulted it for not investigating the rumors that Outten was having sex with the girls. Cynthia Figueroa, commissioner of the city’s Department of Human Services, also decried the reported assaults on the girls. And she said she was horrified by the death of Hess. Figueroa was new to the job when Hess was killed at Wordsworth and she visited the center days later to investigate. “I wanted to see it with my own eyes,” she said. “You could feel the stress and tension when you walked into the building.” — Cynthia Figueroa, commissioner of the city’s Department of Human Services. What she found shocked her. The place was in “horrible condition,” she said. “It was not the conditions conducive to a child that would be in our care,” she said. “It was really worn down.” Michael Bryant / Staff Photographer Cynthia Figueroa, commissioner of the city’s Department of Human Services, visited Wordsworth after the death of David Hess. The physical plant aside, Figueroa said, “you could feel the stress and tension when you walked into the building.” Still, she said, some children told her that they were happy there, that the staff was like family, that they considered Wordsworth their home. Others wanted to leave. Within days of the closure order, all of the children were sent to residential treatment centers in other states or to acute psychiatric facilities. A stolen iPod, a death On Oct. 13, three Wordsworth staffers entered David Hess’ bedroom in search of a stolen iPod. Two of them did not have the required annual training in the proper methods of restraining a child and should not have been allowed to work with children, state records show. As they flipped over his bed and tossed furniture around his room in search of the iPod, the 5-foot-9, 149-pound Hess grew agitated and struggled with them. At one point, a staffer held him down while another punched him repeatedly in the ribs, witnesses later told state investigators. “Get off me,” he cried, according to a state report on the incident. “I can’t breathe.” And then, witnesses said, the room fell silent. The city Medical Examiner’s Office ruled that Hess died from suffocation. Just a few days earlier, Hess’ mother, Maryann Roth, had spoken to her son about his coming home for Christmas. Roth, who adopted Hess and his two brothers when he was two, said it was too painful to talk about what happened to him at Wordsworth. Born into a family with a history of mental illness, Hess was removed from his biological mother’s home in Germantown when he was a toddler. His birth mother was schizophrenic, drug-addicted, and given to bouts of anger, said Marino, the lawyer for the Hess family. Hess and his brothers were adopted together and moved to Lebanon, Pa., where they lived with Roth, her husband, and five other children. As he grew, Hess exhibited signs of mental illness, paranoia, explosive anger, and self-destructive tendencies. “He was a very, very difficult child,” Marino said. “This child’s parents couldn’t manage him.” For a time, he was sent to live at the Bradley Center, a residential treatment facility in Pittsburgh that specializes in helping children with mental-health problems. But officials there found him to be too much of a challenge, Marino said, and he was sent to Wordsworth. “It’s hard to find a setting for kids with these disabilities,” he said. “You’re dealing with a tough population.” At the same time, he said, Wordsworth, in accepting the challenge of admitting and treating Hess, had a duty to help him. “Wordsworth says, ‘We’ll take on the responsibility.’ They take the money and they can’t manage him,” Marino said. Law enforcement officials declined to comment but continue to investigate Hess’ death. Wordsworth paid for his funeral and tombstone. To Elizabeth Hess, the loss of her brother’s life was senseless. “An iPod,” she said. “Are we really OK with that being the cause of my brother’s death?” Staff writer Mike Newall contributed to this article. Source: <http://www.philly.com/philly/news/pennsylvania/philadelphia/Death-rape-Philadelphia-Wordsworth-residential-treatment-center-troubled-youth.html>

Some offenders allowed to work at group homes JON BRINES jonathan.brines@journaltimes.com Jonathan Brines 7 hrs ago 0 +1 Crawford +1 Larry RACINE COUNTY — Two employees of a group home run by Love of Caring LLC in the 100 block of Howland Avenue, Racine, are facing misdemeanor battery and disorderly conduct charges after a physical fight on Jan. 5 at the home between the employees over work schedules. The court commissioner in the case ordered the two employees, Tierre Crawford, 40, and Tonya Larry, 40, to stay away from the group home or its residents. At the time of the incident, Larry told The Journal Times she was working for Crawford, who didn’t show up for work to care for two mentally challenged residents. “I was on the job,” Larry said. Larry said Crawford showed up three hours later with a family member. “They slapped me and slapped the phone out of my hand and pulled my hair. What was I supposed to do? I called the police,” Larry said. “I was defending myself.” Larry said she lost her job over the incident, even though she had five good years without incident with the company. Love of Caring LLC officials could not be reached for comment. Larry said she feels victimized by a co-worker whom she said has a criminal record. “She never should have been hired,” Larry said. “She shouldn’t be working in this industry.” According to court records, Crawford has a 2013 guilty plea in a misdemeanor disorderly conduct case for a previous parking-lot fight in which she assaulted a man. Crawford also pleaded guilty to obstructing an officer and bail jumping in 2003 and a hit-and-run charge in 2001. Crawford could not be reached for comment. Both Larry and Crawford, if convicted of the new charges, could still potentially be allowed to work in another group home, according to Wisconsin state statutes that list seven acceptable felonies convictions for employment: battery to an unborn child, battery with special circumstances, reckless endangerment, harassment, invasion of privacy, disorderly conduct and misdemeanor battery. Larry said she wants the state to make changes to eliminate the exceptions even if it means she's barred from employment over the incident. "People put their family in the group home and never visit them," Larry said. "I liked taking care of them. They connect with you and depend on you and they don't feel lonely." Larry said she misses the residents she cared for every day and hopes they are well taken care of. Background checks Elizabeth Goodstitt, a spokeswoman for the Wisconsin Department of Health Services, which regulates group homes, confirmed the seven non-serious convictions do not prohibit employment but do require the employer to obtain more information to see if they still want to make the hire. "The criminal complaint and judgment of conviction provide the employer with more information regarding the actual circumstances of the conviction," Goodstitt said. "Under Fair Employment Law, an employer may refuse to hire someone if the person has been convicted of an offense that is not on the offenses list but is, in the estimation of the entity, substantially related to the duties or circumstances of the job or residency." Larry said she's trying to get a job at another group home, and that that group home is delaying hiring her until her charges are resolved. DHS conducts a criminal background check on everyone who does anything for the home, including the licensee. They do so when a new group home is licensed, then every three years after that. If something happens in between, the employee is required to self-report a criminal allegation, especially if it involves his or her job. The department is looking for convictions and pending criminal charges which "substantially relates to the care of dependent" resident or the funds or property of the resident in the group home, according to DHS policy 88. DHS is allowed to drop in for an assessment of a home at anytime, generally every two years, and can order drug and mental evaluations for workers if necessary. The DHS Bureau of Assisted Living — which oversees facilities including group homes — reports seeing increases in complaints last year associated with residents wandering away, medical issues and challenging behaviors, as well as other issues, including a lack of qualified staff, low staffing levels and properly trained staff. "I think we have had some good group homes, and some not-so-good ones," said Luann Simpson, who works for the Racine chapter of National Alliance on Mental Illness. "There are not enough people to do that kind of work. We pay more to take care of our cars than people." Get breaking news sent instantly to your inbox I understand and agree that registration on or use of this site constitutes agreement to its user agreement and privacy policy. The Madison-based Personal Care Association has reported a worker in a group home makes on average $10.75 an hour. Misconduct Registry DHS does maintain a list of names of nurse aides with a substantiated finding of caregiver misconduct, including misappropriated funds or property of the resident and neglect or abuse of a resident. Called the Wisconsin Caregiver Misconduct Registry, it shows the first name, last name and date of birth of the individual so employers can use this to determine if a potential employee is eligible to work, according to DHS. Neither Larry nor Crawford are on that list. Burlington resident Becky Borucki has a finding on the registry and is no longer eligible to work with the mentally disabled, or the elderly in group homes or other state facilities. Borucki pleaded guilty in 2012 of stealing from the patients under her care and was sentenced to three years in prison and to pay $15,000 in restitution to the victims. Burlington Police discovered Borucki was stealing from three residents — reportedly about $24,383 — after they were contacted by the legal guardian of one of the men who noticed discrepancies in bank records. All residents in her care were relocated. Due to Borucki being in jail, DHS suspended the license and revoked it after Borucki's sentencing. According to DHS documents obtained by The Journal Times, the facility Borucki operated in her home was closed due to DHS revocation on Nov. 30, 2012. Subsequently, the facility is no longer listed on the DHS website and its history is only available via public information request. Last year, the state had 36 inspectors to oversee 4,166 assisted living facilities statewide; the largest type was group homes, according to DHS. Simpson concerned Simpson said the state needs to do a better job protecting those who can't help themselves. "The thing is, the majority of people who have mental health issues, who are living in a group home, they don't have a lot of choice," she said. "If they are in there under commitment, the county decides where they're going to go." Simpson said for the situation to change, the community needs to think differently about at-risk individuals at group homes: "I think a lot of it boils down to: What value do we put on mental health in our society? I think a piece of it is a stigma. I think somehow we look at mental illnesses as not an illness. I think that has to change. Source: http://journaltimes.com/news/local/some-offenders-allowed-to-work-at-group-homes/article_706ca217-c113-51e8-9226-fe37255b563b.html

'Horrorified' Council members call for cancellation of Wordsworth contracts Updated: April 26, 2017 — 4:33 PM EDT 524Share Tweet Tumblr Email 171 Comment REPRINTS Avi Steinhardt In a letter to the heads of two city agencies charged with helping children in need, council members said they were "horrorified" and "sickened" by an Inquirer and Daily News investigation over the weekend detailing violence and abuse at Wordsworth, the only residential treatment center for troubled young people in the city. by Nancy Phillips & Chris Palmer - Staff Writers Email @PhillipsNancy.215-854-2254 Nancy Phillips Staff Writer Nancy Phillips is a member of the Inquirer's investigative team. She has reported on police misconduct, political corruption, the failings of Philadelphia's child welfare system, and dysfunction in city courts. She has won numerous state and national awards, including a special citation from Investigative Reporters & Editors for her work solving a murder by eliciting a confession from a killer. She is a former Inquirer city editor and a former assistant to the publisher of the Inquirer, Daily News and Philly.com. More by Nancy Phillips State legislators call for hearings on troubled Wordsworth Apr 26 'Horrorified' Council members call for cancellation of Wordsworth contracts Apr 25 Death, rapes, and broken bones at Philly's only residential treatment center for troubled youth Apr 21 More from Nancy Phillips Email @cs.palmer.215-854-2817 Chris Palmer Staff Writer Chris Palmer covers crime and law enforcement. More by Chris Palmer 7 Philly teens missing after escaping from Western Pa. juvenile facility Apr 27 State legislators call for hearings on troubled Wordsworth Apr 26 Off-duty cop to be charged for speeding into, killing pedestrian Apr 26 More from Chris Palmer Nine members of Philadelphia City Council on Tuesday called for sweeping reforms in oversight of the city's child welfare system, saying it had failed to protect scores of vulnerable children. More Coverage Death, rapes, and broken bones at Philly's only residential treatment center for troubled youth Abuse at Wordsworth: 'The people who did this need to be punished' State DHS shares blame for teen's death In a letter to the heads of two city agencies charged with helping children in need, the Council members said they were "horrorified" and "sickened" by an Inquirer and Daily News investigation over the weekend detailing years of violence and abuse at Wordsworth, the only residential treatment center for troubled young people in the city. "It is clear that for far too long, residential treatment facilities for children have operated without adequate oversight, public accountability, and transparency," said the letter, signed by Helen Gym, chair of the Council Committee on Children and Youth, and eight colleagues. They called for the cancellation of Wordsworth's remaining $55 million in city contracts to provide foster care, education, and social services for Philadelphia children who have been abused or neglected or are at risk of delinquency. "My colleagues and I are appalled by what was endured by some of the city's most vulnerable children," Gym said in an interview. Others who signed the letter included Cindy Bass, chair of the Committee on Public Health and Human Services, and Curtis Jones Jr., who heads the Committee on Public Safety. The Inquirer and Daily News reported that Wordsworth's now-shuttered facility in West Philadelphia had a hidden history of abuse. Over the last decade, more than four dozen sex crimes, including 12 rapes, were reported at the center, which served mentally ill and behaviorally challenged children. Other children suffered broken bones and assaults there. And in October, David Hess, 17, was killed in a clash with staffers who suspected he had stolen an iPod. He died of suffocation, prompting state officials to close the facility on Ford Road. The Medical Examiner's Office later ruled the death a homicide. Police continue to investigate. Since Wordsworth's opening in 2006, police were summoned there more than 800 times, records show, for incidents ranging from minor disturbances and tripped fire alarms to sexual assaults. Council members in their Tuesday letter -- sent to Cynthia Figueroa, commissioner of the city Department of Human Services, and Joan Erney, CEO of Community Behavioral Health, a nonprofit that oversees mental-health services for the city -- decried Wordsworth's stewardship of children in its care. In a statement Wednesday, Wordsworth interim CEO Diana Ramsay said: "We understand and share the concerns raised by members of Philadelphia's City Council." She pledged to work with Council and city and state social-service agencies to find solutions "in the best interest of the children, families and communities we serve." Gym and her colleagues also said the city needed a "complete overhaul" of the way residential treatment facilities are monitored, and they faulted city agencies charged with overseeing Wordsworth and other residential centers for "a profound failure of oversight." The Council members said their concerns extended beyond Wordsworth. "If this can happen at one facility under our watch," they said, "it can happen anywhere." They said the overlapping roles of several agencies had allowed them to "disclaim responsibility and point fingers elsewhere." Gym and her colleagues called on each agency to assign one staffer to oversee and publicly report on the safety and conditions of residential facilities within 60 days. Other suggested reforms include: Requiring DHS and CBH staffers to visit all residential treatment facilities that hold contracts with the city within 60 days. With the closure of Wordsworth, Philadelphia children who live there have been sent to treatment centers elsewhere. Requiring those city agencies to make public quarterly reports on the safety and conditions inside. Requiring all residential treatment facilities to provide the city with safety training plans. Heather Keafer, DHS spokeswoman, said the agency shared Council's concerns and was "open to considering the recommendations presented to us" in the letter. She also said Wordsworth was exploring the possibility of being acquired by another company. If the deal went through, she said, that company, Public Health Management Corp., would take over

Wordsworth's remaining city contracts. In a statement Tuesday evening, CBH officials said they were committed to working with the city and DHS as well as the court system to improve treatment programs for children. Gym said Council plans to hold hearings on the issue of safety in such facilities. She and her colleagues said victims and families needed a forum to discuss their experiences with residential treatment and to air concerns. They called on city agencies to create a so-called Truth and Reconciliation Commission for that purpose. An earlier version of this article misstated a potential deal between two companies, Wordsworth and Public Health Management Corp. Wordsworth is exploring being acquired by the company, not merging with it. Source:

<http://www.philly.com/philly/news/crime/City-Council-members-ask-for-Wordsworth-city-contracts-to-be-canceled.html>

Group home for troubled foster kids shutting down in Sonoma County MARTIN ESPINOZA THE PRESS DEMOCRAT | May 1, 2017, 8:03PM After 45 years in operation, Sonoma County's only group home for foster kids who struggle with both mental illness and drug abuse is shutting its doors. The group home, known as R House, is being forced to close because of $250,000 in losses stemming from costly upgrades and other changes designed to meet new state requirements, program officials said. Sweeping reforms to the state's foster care system call for long-term group homes to transform into short-term, therapeutic facilities or shut down. R House made those changes and has been operating under the new model since January, but the state will not increase its funding for the program at the new, higher reimbursement rate offered to such facilities until it is certified — a process that could take two to three months. The decision to close the Santa Rosa program will displace roughly 40 staffers and a dozen residents, R House director Sylvie Vatinelle said. R House is the only group home in the region that houses "dual-diagnosis" kids, those with both a mental illness and drug addiction, the most troubled and most difficult to place in a family setting. When R House closes, these kids will have nowhere else to go in the North Coast, Vatinelle said. "These kids need this help. There isn't anywhere else for them to go," Vatinelle said. R House, which is run as a subsidiary of nonprofit California Human Development, consists of two residential sites and a school, the Abraxis Charter School. All three sites are closing. Staff will continue working for about two weeks until placements are found for the remaining residents. Some may have to be sent out of state because there are so few facilities in California that provide such a high level of treatment. The foster care system serves children removed from their homes due to abuse or neglect. The overhaul of the system, known as the Continuum of Care Reform, or CCR, is aimed at dramatically scaling back group home placements while increasing the use of home-based family care. The effort began about five years ago when state officials and county welfare directors began working on a statutory and policy framework to overhaul placement and treatment options for foster youth. That led to state legislation, AB 403, which was signed last fall by Gov. Jerry Brown and began phasing in changes at the start of this year. Jay Takacs, secretary of the R House board of directors, said R House made costly changes to the program at the beginning of the year because he and others were led to believe the state would retroactively reimburse the program once it received certification as a short-term residential therapeutic program. For example, R House increased wages to recruit staff with proper credentials to meet the new requirements, Vatinelle said. The state notified R House last month it would not reimburse the program retroactively, Takacs said. By becoming a short-term residential therapeutic program, R House expected it would receive $12,000 a month for each youth in its care. But without the proper certification, it was reimbursed $9,000 a month for each teen it served. Its financial woes were compounded by a dramatic decrease in the number of children referred to the program by the county probation department. Two years ago, R House served 22 children a day, on average. Today, it houses 10 to 12 youths a day, Vatinelle said. The lower reimbursement rate and the lower daily census have crippled the program, Takacs said. Expenses have outpaced revenues for a current loss of $250,000, he said. "We were forced into a position by the state where we can't sustain cash flow," he said. "We had no choice but to shut down, and it's completely heartbreaking." Michael Weston, a spokesman for the state Department of Social Services, confirmed that R House was being reimbursed under the old model. Related Stories Major transition underway for children's group homes Foster care program desperately seeking families County works to move foster care to family homes The program had not yet received certification as a short-term therapeutic facility, although it could have gotten a two-year extension to operate under the old model, he said. R House applied for certification as a short-term therapeutic facility on April 11, Weston said. It typically takes 60 to 90 days for the Department of Social Services to process an application, he said. On April 22, R House representatives notified the state they would be closing the program, he said. There is no retroactive reimbursement for group homes trying to convert to short-term therapeutic facilities, Weston said. Under the old group home model, R House relied heavily on referrals from the county probation department. Such referrals were court-ordered and kids had to stick with the program to complete their sentences. David Koch, Sonoma County's chief probation officer, said his department has been referring fewer kids to group homes for several years, even before the CCR changes. He said his department is using more intensive in-home support services that enable kids on probation to stay with their families But he said the most troubled kids will be left without a short-term therapeutic facility in the county. "I think it is unfortunate that R House is closing. For certain youth, they fill an important niche," Koch said. "Absent that being in the county, we'll have to look at resources outside the county." Takacs said there is very little that can be done to keep the program running, short of a half-million dollar donation. You can reach Staff Writer Martin Espinoza at 707-521-5213 or martin.espinoza@pressdemocrat.com. Source: <http://www.pressdemocrat.com/news/6936112-181/group-home-for-troubled-foster?article=0>

House honors Tribune's group home abuse series Politics Caitlin Nordahl | May 8, 2017 Tribune Tower, Chicago Rep. Charlie Meier (R-Okawville) and the Illinois House of Representatives formally congratulated the Chicago Tribune for its award-winning coverage of documented harm in state-funded group homes. "The three-part series published by the Chicago Tribune, which exposed the abuse and neglect that unfortunately occurred in group homes throughout the state, was in part due to the Murray Parents Association bringing their concerns to light," Meier said. "The story had to be told in order to further prevent these incidents of abuse and neglect from ever happening again." The Tribune won the 2016 Worth Bingham Prize for Investigative Journalism for the series. Told in three parts, "Suffering in Secret" exposes 1,311 cases of documented harm in group homes for the developmentally disabled, including at least 42 deaths connected to abuse or neglect, in the past six years. "This Worth Bingham Prize for Investigative Journalism will help ensure the story of abuse and neglect that occurred is not forgotten as it will be printed in newspapers throughout the country," said Meier. "I am hopeful this story will cause other states to reevaluate how they care for the developmentally disabled by making sure what happened in our state doesn't occur in their state." Source: <http://metroeastsun.com/stories/511109594-house-honors-tribune-s-group-home-abuse-series>

Plaintiffs receive 7-figure settlement in Milhous lawsuits, attorney says Alan Riquelmy ariquelmy@theunion.com May 7, 2017 Article Comments (0) Share Elias.Funez@theunion.com | A sign on the corner of Milhous Drive and Highway 49, signals the Mountain Valley Child and Family Services (formerly Milhous Children's Services), en... Elias.Funez@theunion.com | A sign on the corner of Milhous Drive and Highway 49, signals the Mountain Valley Child and Family Services (formerly Milhous Children's Services), en... Elias.Funez@theunion.com | Signs referencing the former Milhous Children's Services, now Mountain Valley Child and Family Services, warns passersby to keep out of the privately ... Elias.Funez@theunion.com | Signs referencing the former Milhous Children's Services, now Mountain Valley Child and Family Services, warns passersby to keep out of the privately ... Prev 1 of 4 images Next Milhous Children's Services has agreed to settle two civil lawsuits filed against it in the wake of a former employee's molestation conviction, with four plaintiffs receiving a seven-figure sum, their attorney said. The settlement amount, which isn't public record and wasn't disclosed by either party, was distributed between the unnamed plaintiffs, according to attorney Joseph George, the Sacramento attorney who represents them. "The clients feel satisfied that they received compensation which hopefully helps them get back on their feet and back on track," George said. The settlement money came from Milhous' insurance, George added. The lawsuits against Milhous — now named Mountain Valley Child and Family Services, Inc. — stem from allegations that a former employee molested children at the group home. That former employee, Jonathan Scott Foote, was arrested in February 2013 on accusations he inappropriately touched boys. He later pleaded no contest to five of 39 charges, and was sentenced in 2014 to 30 years to life in prison. Allegations The lawsuits, dismissed March 20, alleged Milhous staff members failed to report suspected child abuse, tried to conceal the allegations and allowed Foote to resign. The lawsuits also alleged negligent supervision and retention of an employee, negligent supervision of a minor, negligent failure to warn a minor, negligent failure to report suspected child abuse, intentional infliction of emotional distress and sexual battery. "Jonathan Scott Foote admitted to molesting children in our local community and at MCS 15 years ago," Dan Petrie, CEO of Milhous, said in an email. "He is alone at fault for his actions and is in prison. As one of over 5,000 employees over the past 49 years, whom we trusted to protect and serve children in our facility, he violated that trust by his own admission. As his former employer we have been held responsible for his actions at that time." Milhous houses boys who have a range of behavioral issues. It also meets a stringent group home classification standard allowing it to treat children at risk to hurt themselves or others, and who may have autism, PTSD and other disorders. Those children can be violent, suicidal and may have criminal histories, the Milhous website states. Funding Milhous receives most of its funding from contributions and grants, which include payments from county governments. Milhous Children's Services received $10,357,275 in contributions and grants during the 2014-

15 fiscal year. Its total revenue for that time was $11,846,542, documents state. Some of Milhous' revenue came from Nevada County. The county's Health and Human Services Agency has a contract with the group home for $15,000 from July 1, 2014, through June 30. It has paid $4,183.54 on that contract, said Alison Lehman, assistant CEO of Nevada County. Other counties that contract with Milhous include Lake County, which paid it $440,000 between fiscal years 2011-12 and 2016-17, said Todd Metcalf, the county's behavioral health administrator. Sutter County has paid Milhous $323,056.11 from February 2013 to the present, said Charles Smith, public information officer for that county. Alameda County paid $232,230 between fiscal years 2015-16 and 2016-17, officials said. To contact Staff Writer Alan Riquelmy, email ariquelmy@theunion.com or call 530-477-4239. Source: <http://www.theunion.com/news/local-news/plaintiffs-receive-7-figure-settlement-in-milhous-lawsuits-attorney-says/>

After assaults, no new students at Hawthorne Cedar Knolls After assaults, no new students at Hawthorne Cedar Knolls Christopher J. Eberhart and Colleen Wilson, The Journal News Published 7:09 p.m. ET May 9, 2017 | Updated 10:55 a.m. ET May 10, 2017 Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls is halting student intake just days after two runaways from the residential treatment center were arrested for allegedly robbing a woman at a train station. Video by Christopher J. Eberhart/lohud.com. Wochit Buy Photo A residential cottage at Hawthorne Cedar Knolls, a residential treatment center in Mount Pleasant. (Photo: File photo by Seth Harrison/The Journal News) Buy Photo 57 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE VALHALLA — Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls is halting student intake just days after two runaways from the residential treatment center were arrested for allegedly robbing a woman at a train station. This week, the state Office of Children and Family Services ruled that the Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls RTC program will no longer accept students. The ruling takes effect immediately. The ruling affects the residential treatment center, which is run by the Jewish Board of Family and Children's Services, a private organization, not the Hawthorne Cedar Knolls "special-act" school district. The OCFS said in a statement that the treatment center's intake will remain closed indefinitely and is overseeing a directive requiring the Jewish Board "to conduct a thorough review of the incident, assess whether the youth currently at the Hawthorne campus are appropriately placed, review its admission and intake protocols and staff supervision of youth." "The OCFS will continue to monitor the agency closely, including announced and unannounced compliance checks," the agency said in the statement. The ruling comes on the heels of Sunday evening's arrests of two Cedar Knolls runaways — 15 and 18 years old. Metropolitan Transportation Authority spokeswoman Nancy Gamerman said the teenagers allegedly mugged a woman and stole her purse and cellphone around 7:30 p.m. Sunday. Mount Pleasant and MTA police responded to the scene. Both teens were arrested and turned over to MTA police custody. Their names weren't released because of their ages, but Gamerman said both were charged with second-degree robbery and assault. She said the 15-year-old was issued an appearance ticket to show up at Family Court, and the other teen is in custody and awaiting arraignment in criminal court. She said the victim didn't sustain any injuries. Mount Pleasant police said on its Facebook page that both teenagers were runaways from the Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls RTC, which helps emotionally troubled teenagers. The Jewish Board said in an emailed statement that teenagers who live at Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls have suffered physical and sexual abuse, "severe" neglect and the loss of family and friends, "often under horrific circumstances." The Jewish Board said residents are there voluntarily, and state regulations prevent it from restraining anyone who leaves the site. The board says staff members typically follow runaways and try to convince them to come back. Teenagers in the treatment center have been arrested for violent outbursts in the facility and in the surrounding community in the last year, including a large riot and an incident with makeshift flamethrowers and a fight on consecutive days last May, a slashing incident in June and an attack of a local restaurant owner by four Cedar Knolls residents who refused to pay a bill last month. EDITORIAL: Mount Pleasant, troubled youth centers seek accord: Stern NEWS: Residential centers may boost security Mount Pleasant Police Chief Paul Oliva said in June that police had responded to a total of 1,504 calls — 827 at Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls and 677 at the Pleasantville Cottage School — from May 2015 to May 2016. Source: <http://www.lohud.com/story/news/crime/2017/05/09/hawthorne-cedar-knolls-no-longer-taking-students-following-assaults/314923001/>

Former Head of Corrupt Portland Foster Care Provider Indicted on Federal Charges Mary Holden arrested in Mississippi; now faces extradition to Oregon for misuse of funds meant for needy children. Mary Holden and her Lake Oswego home. By Nigel Jaquiss | May 10 at 1:40 PM U.S. Attorney for Oregon Billy Williams today unsealed an indictment of Mary Holden Ayala, the former executive director of the now-defunct foster care provider Give Us This Day. The charges against Holden (as she is known in Portland) include a slew of felonies: five counts of theft; five counts of filing a false tax return one count of money laundering; two counts of engaging in monetary transactions in criminally derived property; failing to file a tax return; and, money laundering. Holden's agency received about $1.5 million a year from the Oregon Department of Human Services to take care of some of the state's neediest foster children. Because much of that money originally came from the federal government, charges against her will play out in federal, rather than state, court. She was arrested by FBI agents Tuesday in Holly Springs, Miss. and will face charges in U.S. District Court in Portland. WW first brought Holden's actions to public attention with a 2015 cover story. The story explained that although she ran one of the state's largest and oldest foster care nonprofits and received premiums for accepting hard-to-place children, Holden was chronically short of money to pay for children's basic needs, including food, toilet paper and sanitary supplies; that she regularly failed to pay employees; and that although her organization had been given valuable properties by Multnomah County, she was in danger of losing property to foreclosure. An Oregon Department of Justice investigation found that Holden had diverted as much as two million dollars for personal use, including trips to the Caribbean and numerous casinos; shopping sprees luxury stores and to the renovation of her West Linn home; her mortgage payments and the purchase of property unrelated to child welfare. While children in her care went hungry, she spent at least $20,000 at "nail salons, beauty supply stores, medical spas, and a cosmetic surgery clinic," and another $25,000 at "luxury retail stores including but not limited to Louis Vuitton, Ferragamo, Michael Kors, Coach, and Nordstrom." The federal indictment pegs the amount she diverted to personal use at $800,000—a number that is probably conservative. Perhaps the most troubling part of Holden's story is that officials at the Oregon Department of Human Services knew for years that Give Us This Day was failing to serve the vulnerable children placed in its care and that the organization's financial troubles were just a symptom of far bigger problems. After WW published DHS emails showing that officials had turned a blind eye to obvious problems at the foster care provider, Gov. Kate Brown fired top agency officials and lawmakers passed legislation aimed at holding DHS and providers more accountable for their supervision of foster children. The indictment shows that long after Holden's activities became public, she continued her alleged crimes. In particular, in September 2016, Holden allegedly sold a piece of property at 4128 NE Martin Luther King Jr., Blvd., for $800,000. She'd bought the property in 2012, the indictment says, for $300,000, nearly half of which was diverted from funds intended for the welfare of children in Give Us This Day's custody. Holden's West Linn Home—partially purchase and subsequently remodeled with money meant for foster children, the indictment alleges—was foreclosed upon in 2015 but in addition to penalties including possible prison time, the indictment seeks the forfeiture of any remaining assets Holden acquired improperly. Holden is in custody in Mississippi and could not be reached for comment. The U.S. Attorney's office declined comment. Source: <http://www.wweek.com/news/2017/05/10/former-head-of-corrupt-portland-foster-care-provider-indicted-on-federal-charges/>

Ex-group home counselor charged with sex trafficking | Updated: 8:48 PM EDT May 10, 2017 Cranston Police Ex-group home counselor charged with sex trafficking | Updated: 8:48 PM EDT May 10, 2017 Share Copy Link {copyShortcut} to copy Link copied! PROVIDENCE, R.I. — A former group home counselor and another man are charged with trafficking a 17-year-old girl at hotels in Rhode Island, New York and Massachusetts. Advertisement A federal grand jury this week indicted 27-year-old Reysean "Sincere" Williams, of Pawtucket, and 18-year-old Providence resident Leandro "Leo" Gomes on multiple sex trafficking charges. Prosecutors allege the duo trafficked the victim at hotels in Warwick, Rhode Island; Queens, New York; and locations in Massachusetts in March. The Providence Journal reports that Williams had worked at the Blackstone Valley Youth and Family Collaborative in Pawtucket but was fired. Prosecutors allege Williams recruited Gomes into the scheme at a group home. Gomes' lawyer says his client had a troubled family life. Williams' attorney described his client as a family man and suggested the victim was a co-conspirator. Source: <http://www.wcvb.com/article/ex-group-home-counselor-charged-with-sex-trafficking/9634628>

Group homes for people with a disability must be phased out to prevent abuse, academics say By the National Reporting Team's Alison Branley Posted Wed at 1:23pm Wed 17 May 2017, 1:23pm Media player: "Space" to play, "M" to mute, "left" and "right" to seek. Australian Broadcasting Corporation ... 00:00 00:00 00:00 Video: Open letter calls for royal commission into treatment of people with disabilities \(Lateline\) Related Story: Group home 'hell': Open letter calls for inquiry into abuse of people with disabilities Related Story: Royal commission into alleged abuse of people with disabilities ditched Map: Australia There are growing calls to phase out the practice of placing people with a disability together in group homes amid growing reports of neglect and abuse. Key points: More than 100 academics have published an open letter calling for a royal commission into abuse at the homes Industrial designer says NDIS offers opportunity to go beyond group housing model The Government maintains its new NDIS "quality framework" will protect people More than 100

academics have published an open letter calling on Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull to hold a royal commission into abuses and neglect in the homes. They say the residences have become the location for similar abuses of the past, and some have said it is time to move to new housing models. Among those is a former support worker, who only wants to be known as Catherine, who worked in the Hunter Valley for more than a decade. "I saw people with disability being abused by staff," she told the ABC. "I saw staff playing mind games with people with Down syndrome, I saw staff giving people with disabilities cold showers. I saw one person with a disability having to change another urinated client and the staff member hid in his office." What Catherine witnessed took such a toll that she herself ended up in a mental health unit. "I couldn't handle it. I've been put on anti-psychotics and anti-depressants," she said. Catherine said the problems were not just limited to one provider. "I think it's across the board," she said. Do you know more about this story? Email investigations@abc.net.au Philippa Carnemolla, an industrial designer at the University of Technology Sydney, said the National Disability Insurance Scheme was an opportunity to go a step beyond the group home model. Photo: Philippa Carnemolla proposes alternative living arrangements for people with a disability. \(Supplied\) "A group home might be four bedrooms or even five people in this mixed-tenure model," she said. "I'm looking at much smaller individualised apartments." Dr Carnemolla said new designs included people living by themselves or with one other person and being monitored by support workers through sensor technology. "So, for example, we might know if a person who normally received support is in the bathroom, we might be alerted to that," she said. "So there's ways of supporting people without someone having to be there all the time." No-one understands why nothing is being done: expert Specialist academics in fields ranging from sociology to criminology want Mr Turnbull to reconsider his decision not to hold a royal commission. Photo: Claire Spivakovsky says a royal commission is the only way to thoroughly address abuse against people with a disability. \(Supplied\) A 2015 Senate inquiry made a key recommendation that there be a royal commission to delve into many allegations of abuse the inquiry received. Criminologist Dr Claire Spivakovsky from Monash University is among the academics to sign the open letter. "I think the average person's at home response [to reports of abuse] has generally been outrage," she said. But she said no-one understood why nothing was being done. "What so many of us have seen through our own research in this space is people with a disability experience higher rates of violence, abuse and neglect," she said. "What the reports are saying is people are being subjected to range of different abuses... people essentially having their bodies controlled by other people." Dr Spivakovsky said it was incredibly difficult to find out what was really going on in a group home because of the limitations of residents and culture of silence. Locked away in suburbia A hundred years ago people with an intellectual disability were locked up in "lunatic asylums". Today they're still locked away, but it's just behind the walls of suburbia, writes Alison Branley. "A royal commission is one of the only things we have that is actually possible to go in and do some substantial investigations, to actually go in and visit institutional environments and refer criminal matters to the police," she said. The Government maintains its new NDIS "quality framework" will protect people in the future. In a statement, a Federal Government spokesperson said last week's budget included $209 million to establish a new independent body, the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission, to implement the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Framework. "The establishment of the commission from next year forms the basis of the Government's response to the senate committee inquiry into violence, abuse and neglect against people with disability in institutional and residential settings," the spokesperson said. "The Government has agreed or noted 29 of the 30 recommendations of the committee's report. "Rather than proceeding with another inquiry through a royal commission, the Government is focused on establishing the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission and implementing the framework, which will address many of the issues raised by the committee." Source: <http://www.abc.net.au/news/2017-05-18/group-homes-for-people-with-disability-must-be-phased-out/8534506>

Is Charter School Fraud the Next Enron? Thursday, May 25, 2017 By Preston Green III, The Conversation | News Analysis font size decrease font size increase font size Print In 2001, Texas-based energy giant Enron shocked the world by declaring bankruptcy. Thousands of employees lost their jobs, and investors lost billions. As a scholar who studies the legal and policy issues pertaining to school choice, I've observed that the same type of fraud that occurred at Enron has been cropping up in the charter school sector. A handful of school officials have been caught using the Enron playbook to divert funding slated for these schools into their own pockets. As school choice champions like Secretary of Education Betsy DeVos push to make charter schools a larger part of the educational landscape, it's important to understand the Enron scandal and how charter schools are vulnerable to similar schemes. What Is a Related-Party Transaction? Enron's downfall was caused largely by something called "related-party transactions." Understanding this concept is crucial for grasping how charter schools may also be in danger. Related-party transactions are business arrangements between companies with close associations. It could be between two companies owned or managed by the same group or it could be between one large company and a smaller company that it owns. Although related-party transactions are legal, they can create severe conflicts of interest, allowing those in power to profit from employees, investors and even taxpayers. This is what happened at Enron. Because Enron wanted to look good to investors, the company created thousands of "special purpose entities" to hide its debt. Because of these off-the-books partnerships, Enron was able to artificially boost its profits, thus tricking investors. Enron's Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow managed several of these special purpose entities, benefiting from his position of power at the expense of the company's shareholders. For instance, these companies paid him US$30 million in management fees -- far more than his Enron salary. Fastow also conspired with other Enron employees to pocket another $30 million from one of these entities, and he moved $4.5 million from this scheme into his family foundation. Enron's collapse revealed the weaknesses of the gatekeepers -- including boards of directors and the Securities and Exchange Commission -- that are responsible for protecting the markets. Because of lax accountability and federal deregulation, these watchdogs failed to detect the dangers posed by Fastow's conflict of interest until it was too late. Congress responded by passing the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which tightened the requirements for oversight. How Do Related-Party Transactions Occur in Charter Schools? Forty-four states and the District of Columbia have legislation that allows for charter schools. Just like public schools, charter schools receive public funding. However, unlike public schools, charter schools are exempt from many laws governing financial transparency. Without strict regulation, some bad actors have been able to take advantage of charter schools as an opportunity for private investment. In the worst cases, individuals have been able to use related-party transactions to fraudulently funnel public money intended for charter schools into other business ventures that they control. Such was the case with Ivy Academia, a Los Angeles-area charter school. The co-founders, Yevgeny Selivanov and Tatayana Berkovich, also owned a private preschool that shared facilities with the charter school. The preschool entered into a sublease for the facilities at a monthly rent of $18,390 -- the fair-market value. The preschool then assigned the sublease to the charter school at a monthly rent of $43,870. The Los Angeles district attorney's office charged the husband-and-wife team with multiple counts of fraud. Selivanov was sentenced to nearly five years in jail in 2013. Fraudulent related-party transactions can also occur between education management organizations (EMOs) and their affiliates. EMOs are for-profit or nonprofit entities that sometimes manage charter schools, and might also own smaller companies that could provide services to those schools. For example, Imagine Schools is a nonprofit EMO that runs 63 charter schools enrolling 33,000 students across the country. It also owns SchoolHouse Finance, a for-profit company that, among other things, handles real estate for many of Imagine's charter schools. Though charter schools typically spend around 14 percent of their funding on rent, some of the Imagine Schools were paying SchoolHouse Finance up to 40 percent of their funding for rent. One of the charter schools operated by Imagine Schools, Renaissance Academy in Kansas City, sued the company for charging it excessive rent. In 2015, a federal judge agreed, ordering Imagine Schools to pay almost \$1 million in damages to Renaissance. The court's ruling suggested that Imagine Schools was essentially taking advantage of the charter school: The EMO profited from the excessive rent and failed to tell the school's board of directors how the cost might disrupt the school's ability to pay for textbooks and teacher salaries. The Problem Could Get Worse Because of insufficient oversight, Fastow's fraudulent use of related-party transactions at Enron was not stopped until it was too late. Similarly, the Ivy Academia and Renaissance Academy examples reveal insufficient checks and balances in the charter school sector. In both cases, the monitors responsible for protecting charter schools found nothing wrong with the rental agreements. It might be tempting to conclude that Ivy Academia and Renaissance Academy stories are anecdotal -- that fear of widespread abuse of related-party transactions is overblown. However, there have been dozens of allegations of similar transgressions, including against industry giants such as K12 Inc. and Pennsylvania Cyber Charter School. Though only a handful of these allegations have resulted in the removal of the charter school operators, related-party fraud in the charter school sector is an emerging issue. In September 2016, the Education Department's inspector general released the findings of an audit of several dozen charter schools detailing significant problems with related-party transactions. The report also made several recommendations for additional oversight. Such protection could come at the state level (e.g., providing guidance to states regarding charter school contractual agreements with EMOs) or at the federal level (e.g., improving the Department's own monitoring of charter school-EMO relationships). However, Trump has generally expressed a dislike of federal regulations, and DeVos, who played a major role in the development of Michigan's charter school law, has successfully fought attempts to increase oversight of Michigan's charter school sector. With such anti-regulatory stances, it seems unlikely that Trump or DeVos will support the kind of oversight that's needed to protect charter schools. This aversion to regulation at the federal level could group care. But The Chronicle's exposure of hundreds of arrests of foster youth for low-level offenses troubled some who led the reform. State Assemblyman Mark Stone, D-Santa Cruz, authored the 2015 legislation to reconfigure the state's foster care system to rely more on emergency family homes and relatives, scaling back group homes and limiting children's stays in shelters to just 10 days. Already three shelters have closed, or plan to close, by year's end. But new legislation may soon be in order "if shelters do not respond to the problems revealed in the report," Stone said. "Now we need to be looking at the shelters with a critical eye. Their interactions with children have to be different — and if they are not, then that's an alarm and we are going to have to step in." Children in most California counties who enter the foster care system do not go to shelters. Instead, they are placed in emergency foster homes or with relatives, or they spend just a few days in an assessment center where emotional blowups are less likely to be considered crimes. "One answer to this problem is to close the shelters," said Patrick Tondreau, presiding judge of the Santa Clara County Juvenile Court, who chairs a statewide task force studying foster youth who cross over into the juvenile justice system. Tondreau's county shut down its shelter more than a decade ago, in part due to the excessive calls to law enforcement. "Every effort needs to be made by everyone at all levels not to transition these kids to a delinquency system," Tondreau said. "They have been seriously traumatized, and it is natural for them to react with anger. Using law enforcement in most of these situations is taking the lazy way out." Reaction to The Chronicle's findings was swift in San Joaquin County where more than half the juvenile hall bookings originated. Last week, shortly after being informed of the newspaper's findings, Mary Graham shelter director Gary Gunderson announced he was going on medical leave. Gunderson and other county officials did not respond to repeated requests for additional information regarding the leave, including when it began, how long it was expected to last and who would take over in the interim. Vickie Delph, the San Joaquin County assistant deputy public defender, said The Chronicle's findings confirmed long-held concerns within her office, which represents children and parents in the juvenile justice and child welfare systems. Meanwhile, other county officials announced their own plans to make change: San Joaquin County Supervisor Miguel Villapudua, whose district includes Mary Graham, said in a statement that he would be initiating a review of the incidents that led to arrest, as well as the facility's policies. And the county Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Commission plans to interview law enforcement and Mary Graham officials about the number of sheriff contacts and arrests at the children's shelter. Some youth advocates and former foster youth demanded that Mary Graham be closed. Michael Provencio, 30, stayed at Mary Graham multiple times in the late 1990s and early 2000s. While there, he said he saw children hauled off to juvenile hall, including a girl who wrapped a towel around her hand and broke several windows and another child who started a fight by throwing a pencil at someone. Provencio now works as a youth coordinator at Fathers and Families of San Joaquin, a local organization serving low-income communities. He and his wife adopted their son several years ago, in part to keep him from the turmoil that Provencio had known in the foster care system. Provencio said he was outraged to learn that more than a decade after he stayed at Mary Graham, the shelter was still relying on law enforcement to handle seemingly minor incidents. "The people in positions of power aren't doing anything. We shouldn't even have a children's shelter," he said. "All of these calls to law enforcement, and all of these kids. It just breaks my heart." Karen de Sá, Joaquin Palomino and Cynthia Dizikes are staff writers on The San Francisco Chronicle's Investigative Team. Email: kdesa@sfchronicle.com, jpalomino@sfchronicle.com, cdizikes@sfchronicle.com; Twitter: @JoaquinPalomino, @cdizikes Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/article/Chronicle-investigation-spurs-calls-to-close-11165519.php>

Wisconsin's Youth Prison Hit With Another Lawsuit A 17-year-old boy who was an inmate at Wisconsin's embattled youth prison is suing the facility, alleging he suffered substantial physical and emotional abuse during his time there. | May 23, 2017, at 5:22 p.m. MORE LinkedIn StumbleUpon Google + Cancel Wisconsin's Youth Prison Hit With Another Lawsuit Share × Share on Facebook Post on Twitter Post to Reddit Email Share in LinkedIn Share on StumbleUpon Share on Google Plus MADISON, Wis. (AP) — A 17-year-old boy who was an inmate at Wisconsin's embattled youth prison is suing the facility, alleging he suffered substantial physical and emotional abuse while there. The Wisconsin State Journal reported Tuesday (<http://bit.ly/2rRj0mR>) that the boy's lawsuit filed this month alleges he was body slammed, pepper sprayed so much that he has permanent vision damage and kept in solitary confinement for weeks at Lincoln Hills in Irma. Conditions at the facility are already under federal investigation. Another lawsuit filed earlier this year by several former inmates alleges an overuse of solitary confinement and pepper spray there. Wisconsin Department of Corrections officials named as defendants in the boy's lawsuit began limiting the use of solitary confinement months ago. DOC spokesman Tristan Cook didn't immediately respond to a message. Source: <https://www.usnews.com/news/best-states/wisconsin/articles/2017-05-23/wisconsins-youth-prison-hit-with-another-lawsuit>

Married couple — both foster care executives — sentenced for embezzling public funds Sarah Parvini Contact Reporter A couple has been sentenced for misappropriating public funds for a group of foster homes they ran, according to the Los Angeles County district attorney's office. CSJ Kidogo, 76, was sentenced to 180 days in county jail on Wednesday and placed on five years of formal probation. His wife, Hitaji Kidogo, 65, was sentenced to three years of summary probation, the district attorney's office said. The pair paid $109,093 in restitution and were ordered to stop running foster homes. CSJ Kidogo pleaded guilty to one felony count of misappropriation of public money in September 2015, authorities said. He is the former executive director of Little People's World Inc. His wife, the company's former assistant executive director, pleaded guilty to one misdemeanor count of embezzlement. Little People's World ran four group homes that provided foster care to more than two dozen children in Los Angeles County. A county audit revealed that CSJ Kidogo borrowed money marked for foster care to buy real estate for himself. He also used that money to pay mortgages on properties not used for the foster care program, the district attorney's office said. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/lanow/la-me-ln-foster-care-20170525-story.html>

Baby Fold to close residential treatment center Paul Swiech pswiech@pantagraph.com Paul Swiech 5 hrs ago 5 +2 Buy Now Schultz +2 Buy Now Beam Buy Now THE BABY FOLD, For The Pantagraph The Baby Fold agency is shown at 612 Oglesby Ave., Normal. prev next NORMAL — Responding to nearly two years without a state budget, The Baby Fold will discontinue residential treatment center services, the Normal-based human services agency announced Thursday. The program, which was reduced from serving 28 children to 14 children in 2015, will cease operations June 30. Including all its programs, Baby Fold serves more than 1,000 vulnerable children and families. "We will be working diligently to arrange new placements for the children over the next 30 to 60 days so they can be well-settled prior to the next school year," Baby Fold President and CEO Dianne Schultz said in a prepared statement. "I am saddened by the circumstances surrounding the state budget impasse that have made this decision necessary," Schultz said. Growth in other programs may allow some residential treatment center staff members to be absorbed into 14 open positions throughout the agency. But the cut has the potential to impact 27 full-time and 16 part-time staff members from Baby Fold's workforce of 248 people. "The State of Illinois has neglected to invest what is necessary to pay providers who offer this type of specialized, intensive treatment for children in residential care," Schultz said. The residential treatment center is for children who have been removed from their homes because of trauma, abuse or neglect and have significant mental health issues. The program in Normal is believed to be the only one of its kind in Central Illinois. When the reduction was made in 2015, some children returned to their biological families and some moved to foster care after they completed their treatment. "Rates paid to The Baby Fold for these services have not increased in over 10 years. Even after downsizing this program, the agency has been forced to subsidize $1.6 million over the last two years to compensate for the lack of appropriate funding. Additionally the budget impasse has created an atmosphere of uncertainty about the funding available for residential services in the future," Schultz said. Meanwhile, an expansion of Hammitt School — announced in April in response to growing community needs to serve children with cognitive and learning disorders, including autism — will go forward as planned. "The remodeling of the building at 612 Oglesby in Normal will begin in June," said Aimee Beam, Baby Fold vice president of development and public relations. Baby Fold hopes that the Hammitt School expansion will be complete in August 2018. Source: http://www.pantagraph.com/news/local/baby-fold-to-close-residential-treatment-center/article_ebdac8fc-622b-5ace-9158-6725186b0b2c.html

Foster care shift: Colorado kids removed from homes now more likely to live with relatives than in group setting Some worry the shift was too abrupt for community-based programs to keep up. SRJ Sangosti, The Denver Post High school science teacher Ty McVicker gives a student a high-five during class at Griffith Centers for Children on May 19, 2017 in Colorado Springs. Griffith Centers for Children teaches students who were truant or had behavior problems so bad that many were kicked out of public school. By Jennifer Brown | jbrown@denverpost.com | The Denver Post PUBLISHED: May 24, 2017 at 3:24 pm | UPDATED: May 24, 2017 at 3:52 pm Colorado once sent more foster children to austere and clinical residential centers than it did to the homes of relatives, institutionalizing more than 1,000 of the most challenging wards of the state each year. That has shifted dramatically over the past decade, a transition so swift and stark that more than 20 residential treatment centers in Colorado have closed. Calm, nurturing homes are better for kids, say child advocates and government officials. The downside, though, is that children with more acute needs — those who in the past would have gone to treatment centers with round-the-clock paid staff — now are going to foster parents and relatives who in some cases are overwhelmed. And although nonprofits that once operated residential centers are embarking on new business models to bring therapy to kids in their homes, some worry the shift was too abrupt for community-based programs to keep up and say funding for the new programs is inadequate. Colorado tallied 1,483 child welfare placements in residential treatment centers in 2003, a number that dropped to 526 by 2016, according to data gathered by the Colorado Association of Family and Children's Agencies and presented to state lawmakers in March. At the same time, the number of placements with relatives, called "kinship" placements, rose from 1,308 to 2,401. Colorado's goal is to reduce its percentage of kids sent to "congregate care" — which includes residential centers and group homes — to less than 15 percent of the total 4,880 kids who spent time in out-of-home placements last year. That percentage has dropped from 24 percent in 2012 to 17.8 percent last year — specifically, from 1,109 kids to 870 — according to state Department of Human Services data. "We know that congregate care is not where children need to grow up," said Paige Rosemond, associate director of programs for the state Division of Child Welfare. Residential treatment centers for children began their boom in the 1990s, after Colorado closed hundreds of psychiatric beds for children across the state. Children with severe mental illness who would have used those beds began filling up residential treatment centers, at high cost to state and county child welfare departments. Then the state changed its payment policy, forcing counties to foot a higher portion of the cost of residential care. At the same time, research piled on, concluding that children were better off in family environments. Children placed in congregate care are almost three times as likely to have a mental disorder and six times more likely to have been removed from a home because of a "behavior problem," according to a report from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Griffith Centers for Children is among the agencies that shut down residential treatment centers in recent years in Colorado. The nonprofit has closed 280 beds in Larkspur, Rifle and Grand Junction since 2010. Griffith now has just 37 beds in Colorado Springs. Griffith instead has opened new programs to bring therapy to 1,500 families, including programs to help at-risk youths who have skipped enough school to trigger action by child protection caseworkers. Youths with the most severe problems still require residential care, but their stays are shorter than they once were. RJ Sangosti, The Denver Post A student reads during english class at Griffith Centers for Children, that teaches students who were truant or had behavior problems so bad that many were kicked out of public school, on May 19, 2017 in Colorado Springs. Because many of the students are wards of the state they could not be identified in the photos. Marley Day, an eighth-grader who attended school only a handful of days in two years, is among the more than 500 kids who will spend time in Colorado residential treatment centers this year. His mother dropped him off about a month ago at Griffith's residential center in Colorado Springs, where he has no choice but to wake up at 6:45 a.m., eat breakfast at 7:15 and get to an on-campus classroom by 7:45. "He's doing something now," said Marley's mother, Gigi, who once tried, unsuccessfully, to get him to school by dragging him by his sweatshirt hood. Related Articles May 24, 2017 4 children died in accidental shooting deaths in Colorado between 2014-2016 May 23, 2017 Ask Amy: Unhealthy nutrition early in life might mean problems later May 21, 2017 Fidget spinners, the hit toy that spun out of nowhere May 18, 2017 Marijuana sending more teenagers to the emergency room, Children's Hospital doctor finds May 14, 2017 With sleek new kids-only helicopter, Children's Hospital and Flight For Life are transforming Colorado air transport Three years ago, most of the 40 students at Griffith's school lived in the next-door residential treatment center. That number has dropped to half. And to help them return to public school sooner, Griffith in August started a program that assigns each student a long-term therapist to help with the transition. Another agency that closed its residential center is Excelsior, which ran a "last resort" facility in Aurora for adolescent girls, a place for teens who typically had already been through numerous foster homes and had run away more than once. The 33-acre campus, with 250 girls in living quarters and an on-site school, closed in August. Instead, Excelsior began offering in-home mental health therapy for youths and took on an early-childhood program that teaches struggling parents how to bond with their kids, from infants to 6-year-olds, before they are removed from their homes. The nonprofit receives state money to work with people who are court-ordered or required by child welfare departments to take parenting classes. Excelsior's staff has dropped to 60 from 150 a year ago, marking the hardest part of its transition from residential care to child abuse prevention, said Nicole Bennett, communications manager. The increase in community-based services, therapies and help that come straight into the home where a child is living, whether with their parents or a foster family, is especially helpful for kids who didn't belong in residential care facilities, she said. "Some, frankly, got worse, because they were surrounded by peers with bigger issues," Bennett said. Other youths would improve at Excelsior, only to return home to the same situation and then regress, she said. "In residential treatment, you get only glimpses of success," she said. "These kids are very damaged, and it takes a long time for them to change. We are still here and we are doing great things. It's just different now." Mount Saint Vincent, a home in Denver for children with severe behavioral issues who have often lived in several foster homes, began taking children from other states in 2015 to fill beds left vacant by Colorado's policy shift. Despite adding kids from California, Wyoming and Idaho, the average number of kids living at Mount Saint Vincent on any given day has dropped from almost 30 in 2012 to 21 this year. Mount Saint Vincent has taken on a foster care recruitment program, setting up information booths at churches, community events and large companies in the hopes of finding families willing to take kids who are ready to leave residential care. Mount Saint Vincent staff train and certify new foster parents, then collect an administrative fee from county human services departments, although the business model is not a moneymaker, said Kirk Ward, executive director of the northwest Denver home that was once an orphanage. Ward agrees that kids who are ready are better off in homes than a treatment center. Instead of focusing on meeting a target number of kids in residential treatment, including the 15 percent set by the state or a goal of removing kids from residential treatment by the three-month mark, child welfare officials should decide what's best for each child, he said. "The system is so overburdened and doesn't have the resources it requires to take care of all these kids. Sometimes that gets lost," he said. Fewer residential treatment beds, combined with dwindling psychiatric beds in the state, move kids with more acute mental health needs further down the chain of care. "It just pushes it down all the way to foster parents," Ward said. In response, Colorado has developed "treatment foster care," a level between a group home and a foster home. Treatment foster families receive extra training and are linked with a "wrap-around" team to help with counseling and other in-home therapies. A "warm, soothing setting," where a parent or foster parent can respond to behavior and there is less feedback from peers, helps kids learn to self-regulate their emotions, said Camille Harding, division director of community behavioral health at the state Department of Human Services. "Ideally, a kid might go into a treatment center for a short time but then go back into a lower level of care with lots of supports around them," she said. RJ Sangosti, The Denver Post Math teacher Heilleen Klos radios for an a student to be escorted to the restroom at Griffith Centers for Children, that teaches students who were truant or had behavior problems, so bad that many were kicked out of public school, on May 19, 2017 in Colorado Springs. Because many of the students are wards of the state they could not be identified in the photos. State reimbursement rates to the agencies providing community programs to at-risk youths are "critically low," so low they are "jeopardizing the well-being of Colorado foster (youths)," said Skip Barber, former director of Denver Children's Home and now head of the Colorado Association of Family and Children's Services. Agencies that provide the programs are struggling to hire and retain staff at a time when they are helping children with more acute needs, he said. Kids who don't need a residential treatment center shouldn't live in one, but at the same time, child protection officials shouldn't send kids who aren't ready to live in a family home to foster parents or relatives, Barber said. The system "burns out" foster families. "We put kids in their home and there is no way they can manage them," he said. "The trick is getting right service at the right time for the right kid. That's where we are still struggling." Source: <http://www.denverpost.com/2017/05/24/colorado-foster-care-shift/>

Bench warrant is issued for ex-Potty Boot Camp operator Rebecca Stapp, 42, was last known to be living on Oahu Local News May 25, 2017 Rebecca Stapp The Maui News A $20,000 bench warrant was issued for a woman who didn't show up in 2nd Circuit Court on Monday for her trial on a charge alleging she assaulted a toddler in her potty-training "boot camp" four years ago. Rebecca Stapp, 42, who was last known to be living on Oahu, hadn't had contact since early March with the Oahu Intake Service Center, which was supervising her, according to court documents. Another bench warrant for $10,000 was issued for her on April 7 alleging she violated her bail conditions by not staying in contact with the service center. On March 3, Stapp informed the Oahu center that she planned to return to Maui but hadn't had contact with either the Oahu or Maui offices since then, according to an affidavit filed in court. Stapp has pleaded not guilty to a charge of third-degree assault of a boy who was dropped off for her Potty Boot Camp training at her rented Wailuku residence on May 1, 2013. In a separate trial, Stapp was found guilty of third-degree assault of another toddler, a 17-month-old Paia boy, on the same day at the same daylong potty-training session. Wailuku District Judge Kelsey Kawano found that Stapp had used "substantial force" to hold down the child, who had bruises on his inner thighs, groin, chest and back. In September 2015, Stapp was sentenced to a three-month jail term as part of one year's probation. The jail sentence was delayed while she appealed. On Dec. 23, the state Intermediate Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction. Stapp sought a review by the state Supreme Court, which rejected the request Feb. 28. Three days later, Deputy Prosecutor Justine Hura filed a motion to have Stapp serve the jail term. She hasn't shown up to serve the jail term. Court records show Stapp also is being sought on an $11,000 bench warrant issued May 8 when she didn't show up for a hearing in 1st Circuit Court on Oahu. She was charged with second-degree theft in a Jan. 28, 2016, incident, according to court records. At the May 8 hearing, Stapp's attorney said she was receiving mental health treatment on the Mainland, according to court records. In issuing the warrant, the court noted Stapp hadn't reported when she would return and didn't have permission to leave the state. Her $2,000 bail in that case was forfeited. Source: <http://www.mauinews.com/news/local-news/2017/05/bench-warrant-is-issued-for-ex-potty-boot-camp-operator/>

Woman sentenced for stealing from Kansas group home charges By - Associated Press - Thursday, June 1, 2017 LAWRENCE, Kan. (AP) - A woman has been sentenced to 11 months in prison for stealing from children under her care at a Lawrence group home. The Lawrence Journal-World (<http://bit.ly/2rgW6b0>) reports that 37-year-old Jennifer Silva Guerrero, of Lawrence, also will serve 18 months of probation after she is released from prison and must pay nearly $8,000 in restitution to at least nine of her victims. If she violates the terms of her probation, Guerrero will have to serve more than four years in prison. Douglas County District Attorney spokeswoman Cheryl Wright Kunard says Guerrero was recently convicted of three felony theft charges, two felony forgery charges and one felony charge of making false information. The thefts occurred in 2015 and 2016 at The Villages group home, where she also lived before being fired. Source: <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2017/jun/1/woman-sentenced-for-stealing-from-kansas-group-home/>

Who cares when children are taken from home to foster home – and abused? June 3, 2017 by Michelle Chan Our children are our future. We must nurture them, protect them, give them the tools necessary to survive in this harsh and unforgiving world. What if I told you that the very system designated to care for and safeguard abused and neglected children is in gross and willful negligence of its role as “protector of innocence?” Shafari Harris and Lillian “Monique” Williams are strong and brave sisters who survived severe abuse at home and in foster care. Why would Child Protective Services, or CPS, remove children from parental custody that have not been abused or neglected? The answer is simple and incredibly sad: financial incentives. For Title IV-E federal funding alone, San Francisco gets roughly $1.5 billion per year. This is in addition to Title IV-D federal funding and funding from the Fostering Connections to Success Act, which incentivizes adoption. There are strict terms and conditions intended to protect children from unnecessary removals and to protect the American taxpayers from fraud. However, there is hardly any oversight or enforcement of the state and federal guidelines and laws designed to ensure that children’s rights are upheld. Further impacting the abuses are the rules of confidentiality that serve to shield CPS and dependency courts from scrutiny. Children who have been legitimately removed from bad situations often have histories of chronic and complex trauma that contribute to adverse mental health outcomes. Further complicating their emotional and mental well-being is the devastating sense of loss and loneliness all children – even those who have been abused and neglected – feel when being separated from their families. For these reasons, the transition into foster care is never easy. Consider, then, that many children entering into foster care are re-traumatized: abused and neglected by the very people who are supposedly “saving” them? According to the Children’s Bureau, somewhere around 1 percent of foster children nationwide are abused in foster care. However, these numbers are self-reported by child welfare agencies and the statistic is so incredibly low it is evidence of gross underreporting or non-existent reporting. Actual accounts from former foster youth tell a drastically different story. The transition into foster care is never easy. Consider, then, that many children entering into foster care are re-traumatized: abused and neglected by the very people who are supposedly “saving” them? Lillian “Monique” Williams and Shafari Harris, born four years apart, are sisters and victims of the foster care system. The circumstances leading up to their removals represent traumas children never should endure. What happened after CPS intervention was even worse. The sisters’ mother was a drug addict with criminal inclinations. The older sister, Shafari, landed in foster care after a series of unfortunate events following their mother’s arrest for shoplifting. Lillian remained in their mother’s custody only to be poly-victimized years later. For three days straight, Lillian watched as her mother’s boyfriend continuously beat her mother. He took regular breaks to molest Lillian, who was 11 years old at the time. Lillian recalls with vivid accuracy being called to the principal’s office. She remembers walking down the hall in fear, certain she had done something naughty. When the principal reached out to her, with the sincerest intentions, Lillian truly believed things would get better. She was wrong. After spending two years in a home with foster parents who made no efforts to comfort or love her – this girl who had arrived in their lives damaged from the molestation, abuse and domestic violence – Lillian was gangraped at knifepoint by a local turf-crew at the age of 13. “I thought it was all over for me,” she said. “Like my horrible life was coming to a horrible end. I felt like a nothing, a nobody, a disgusting piece of trash that could be thrown out at any time.” The foster parents did nothing to defend or soothe the child who, for the second time in her life, had been the victim of violent sexual assault. They did, however, send her away to live in a group home. Lillian “Monique” Williams and Shafari Harris, born four years apart, are sisters and victims of the foster care system. The circumstances leading up to their removals represent traumas children never should endure. What happened after CPS intervention was even worse. Meanwhile, Lillian’s older sister, Shafari, had been molested in her foster home at the age of 9 by her 23-year-old foster brother. “He used to come into our room every night, taking turns with me and the other foster girl. All I remember is him grabbing me, pushing me ... I would put my head in the blanket, saying ‘no, no, no,’” Shafari said. “I felt like a toilet that was tired of being shit and pissed on, that anyone could do anything to me and I could do nothing about it.” Shafari was rescued from that situation at the age of 12, only to be revictimized by an 18-year-old who impregnated her. Although she was just a child, she has lived with the perceived shame of being “fast” her entire life. The two sisters speak of the mental anguish and bleeding hearts that have followed them into adulthood. They ask themselves questions that have no answers. They reach deep within to find the strength, courage and wisdom to go on, to love, to live. Lillian has joined Parents Against CPS Corruption, or PACC, to fight for other children who have been neglected and abused by the foster care system. PACC continues to work towards greater oversight and accountability, due process, equal protection under the law, and increased efforts towards kinship placement and timely reunification. Lillian has joined Parents Against CPS Corruption, or PACC, to fight for other children who have been neglected and abused by the foster care system. For information on protests and marches, to join their cause, or for advocacy, peer support or court attendance, visit ParentsAgainstCPSCorruption.com, email protest@parentsagainstCPSCorruption.com, or call 415-815-9415. PACC is encouraging people to continue calling the SFPD fraud unit at 415-553-1521 and the SF District Attorney’s Office at 415-553-1751 to urge them to investigate and prosecute, to the fullest extent of the law, crimes committed by CPS workers against parents in the process of removing children from parental custody. Social workers do not have immunity for violating penal codes and absolutely must be held accountable. Michelle Chan, co-founder of Parents Against CPS Corruption, can be reached at protest@parentsagainsteps Corruption.com or on Twitter, @proteststeps. Source: <http://sfbayview.com/2017/06/who-cares-when-children-are-taken-from-home-to-foster-home-and-abused/>

Victims of predatory foster parent sue former DHS employees Lawsuit says DHS staffers knew about abuse, did nothing. By Benjamin Hardy Arkansas Nonprofit News Network click to enlarge Clarence Garretson Seven sexual assault victims of former Arkansas foster parent Clarence “Charlie” Garretson filed a federal lawsuit Monday alleging negligence and due process violations on the part of several former employees of the Arkansas Department of Human Services as well as their assailant’s wife, Lisa Garretson. The suit was filed in Fort Smith less than a week after Clarence Garretson was sentenced to life in federal prison for assaulting a series of minors in his care, most of them foster children placed in the Garretson household by DHS — the agency responsible for Arkansas’s foster care system — between 1998 and 2004. DHS placed some 35 children in the home over that period, and prosecutors have said there is evidence that at least 14 of them were sexually abused by Garretson. At Garretson’s sentencing hearing May 31, one victim — who is also one of the plaintiffs in the civil suit — told the court that she had repeatedly attempted to inform DHS authorities of the abuse, which began when she was 11. “Arkansas DHS put me and many others in the hands of a monster,” she said at the hearing. U.S. District Judge P.K. Holmes, who presided over the hearing, commented that the case constituted an “extreme failure on the part of the Department of Human Services” and said of Lisa Garretson, “if she didn’t know what was going on, she should have known.” Holmes was also assigned the civil suit filed Monday. The plaintiffs’ allegations of DHS negligence go further. Their suit alleges that DHS approved the Garretsons to be foster parents despite DHS substantiating a report one year earlier that Clarence Garretson had sexually assaulted two children at knifepoint. The lawsuit names as defendants former DHS Director Kurt Knickrehm, who headed the agency from 1999 to 2005, and Richard Weiss, who served as interim director for six months in 1998. The other six DHS defendants are Debbie Williams, Nikkole Hurst, Carol Gillis, Patsy Chase and Robbie McKay, all of whom allegedly served as caseworkers for one or more of the children abused by Garretson, and Dick Pickarts, the DHS director of Logan County at the time of the abuse, according to the lawsuit. The complaint alleges that the DHS caseworkers and the county director “obtained actual knowledge” that at least one of the children in the Garretson home was sexually assaulted, but took no action. A long-haul truck driver, Garretson would take children on cross-country trips, sexually assault them in the cab of his truck and coerce them into silence afterward, according to federal prosecutors. DHS revoked the foster home’s license in 2004 — yet Garretson was not charged with a crime until he raped another child in 2014. That victim reported the abuse to her mother in 2016, leading to an FBI investigation that uncovered the pattern of earlier assaults that occurred when the Garretsons operated their foster home a decade earlier. Garretson pleaded guilty in October to five counts of interstate transportation of a minor with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity. In exchange, federal prosecutors dropped six additional counts and agreed to not prosecute Lisa Garretson. Many of the facts of the criminal case against Clarence Garretson remain unknown to the public because key court documents are under seal. The civil suit filed Monday includes a detail that was not stated in the criminal case: The minor who reported Garretson’s actions in 2016 was herself the child of a teenage victim of Garretson more than a decade earlier, who became pregnant by “a relative of the Garretsons” while she was living in the household as a foster child from 2000 to 2004. (How the minor daughter came to be in Garretson’s company in 2014 is not made clear.) The complaint alleges negligence on the part of those defendants with direct contact with the former foster children — Williams, Pickarts, Hurst, Gillis, Chase, McKay and Lisa Garretson — stating that each “had reasonable cause to suspect that Charlie was sexually abusing children” and “had a duty to report such abuse.” Each “willfully and knowingly failed to report such abuse,” which violated an Arkansas statute requiring foster parents and DHS employees to “immediately notify the Child Abuse Hotline if he or she has reasonable cause to suspect that a child has been subjected to child maltreatment.” In addition to negligence, the complaint also states two separate causes of action against all defendants, including former DHS Director Knickrehm and former interim director Weiss. The first is a federal civil rights claim. Because foster children are in the custody of DHS, which has “the fundamental duty to ensure that each foster child is in an appropriate placement and confirm that each foster child ... is safe and healthy,” the agency’s failure to do so constituted a violation of the children’s “fundamental rights to physical safety and to be free from the infliction of unnecessary pain.” The complaint states that the defendants demonstrated “a pervasive pattern of indifference” to the victims and their due process rights. The second claim is based on a federal statute that allows minor victims of certain federal crimes (or those who were minors at the time the crime was committed) to seek civil remedies. The plaintiffs are seeking damages that include the costs of medical expenses, pain and suffering, mental anguish and legal fees, along with punitive damages. An amount is not specified in the complaint. The plaintiffs are seeking a jury trial. DHS itself is not named as a defendant in the lawsuit, and the agency typically does not comment on litigation. Confidentiality laws prohibit DHS from commenting on individual foster care cases, meaning the agency cannot publicly refute specific allegations of misconduct. When asked about the Garretson case in October, DHS spokeswoman Amy Webb said, “This is a tragic situation, and DHS would never intentionally put a child in harm’s way. Sadly, there are people who prey upon children and may try to use the foster system to do so. When that happens today, we act swiftly to ensure youth in foster care are in safe homes. “The system for vetting foster families is much stronger and more thorough today than it was 20 years ago. ... We conduct state and federal background checks, child maltreatment checks, home studies, and training. We also do re-evaluations of homes annually and new background and maltreatment checks every two years. In addition, we have a more sophisticated computer system. We also now have a system in place that automatically notifies [the DHS division responsible for foster care] when there is a call into the child abuse hotline that includes an allegation against a foster parent.” As of Monday night, attempts to reach two of the named defendants for comment were unsuccessful. Source: <https://www.arktimes.com/arkansas/victims-of-predatory-foster-parent-sue-former-dhs-employees/Content?oid=7219469>

Study questions New Mexico spending on traumatized children Story Comments Share Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Wednesday, June 7, 2017 6:23 pm | Updated: 6:45 pm, Wed Jun 7, 2017. Study questions New Mexico spending on traumatized children Associated Press | 0 comments SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) — New Mexico is spending enormous amounts of money in potentially ineffective ways to treat a relatively small number of children for mental health problems related to household trauma and depression, several state agencies announced Wednesday in a report presented to lawmakers. The study showed that over a three-year period, New Mexico spent an average of $60,000 a year per child in Medicaid funds to treat 190 patients with acute behavioral conditions. Costs linked to those severe conditions dominated the state's spending on children for behavior health problems — making it more difficult to invest in preventative programs that can keep children out of the juvenile justice system and foster care, the study found. Maria Griego, a program evaluator with the Legislative Finance Committee, said $89 million out of the $196 million spent on children's mental and behavior health went to acute interventions largely at away-from-home facilities such as psychiatric hospitals and residential treatment centers. “Keep them in their homes, in their communities — the outcomes are better,” Griego said. “It is a more cost efficient way to handle children's behavior health.” The state treats more than 43,000 children for behavior and mental health issues. Residential treatment programs for just over 1,000 children consumed an average of $42,000 per child. “Residential treatment is an area that has been studied more than any other area for kids and it's consistently been demonstrated that it doesn't get the results,” said Wayne Lindstrom, director of the state's Behavior Health Services Division. Efforts to shift spending to behavior health programs that keep children close to home and active in their communities have been hampered by a lack of data and monitoring. The study looked at the cost effectiveness of dozens of state- and federally funded programs, from juvenile drug courts to games introduced in New Mexico public elementary schools to decrease disruptive behavior. National studies have highlighted the financial strain of treating a small number of children for acute mental health and behavioral problems. A 2013 study of Medicaid-enrolled children found that 4 percent of behavioral health patients accounted for 19 percent of costs. In New Mexico, officials said mental-health treatment spending on children has gravitated toward traumatic stress and mood-related disorders often brought on by household strife, and away from traditional psychiatric conditions. Children in New Mexico were more likely than peers nationwide to witness domestic violence or be the focus of physical and mental abuse, the study noted. Above average rates of poverty, substance abuse and domestic violence put children in New Mexico at a relatively high risk of mental health problems. Teen suicide death rates in New Mexico are double the national average. The state has been shaken by a series of child-abuse related killings, including the slaying last August of 10-year-old Victoria Martens. Sen. Gerald Ortiz y Pino said expensive residential programs still have a place in the state's behavior health portfolio for children. “If after three years at $150,000 they go to college, get into the Air Force, start a family, are a good father, then that's money well spent,” he said. Source: http://www.ccenterdispatch.com/news/state/article_66bc996f-b383-5dac-a16f-94bc35768810.html

Former Sonoma Group Home Counselor Accused Of Sexually Abusing Teenage Boy Breaking: Authorities allege the Rohnert Park man and youth ministry volunteer committed the acts as a counselor at Hanna Boys Center. By Maggie Avants \(Patch Staff\) - Updated June 12, 2017 2:51 pm ET Share Tweet Google Plus Reddit Email Comments SONOMA COUNTY, CA -- A Rohnert Park man was arrested Saturday on suspicion of committing lewd and lascivious acts with a minor and sexual assault of a minor while employed as a counselor at a residential treatment center for at-risk boys. Sonoma County sheriff's detectives began investigating Kevin Scott Thorpe, 39, on June 1 when a 23-year-old man reported that he had been a victim of sexual abuse while residing at the Hanna Boys Center in the Sonoma Valley between 2006 and 2011, Sonoma sheriff's Sgt. Spencer Crum said Monday. The abuse, which allegedly began when the boy was 13 years old and continued until the victim was 18, occurred not only at the Hanna Boys Center campus but at Thorpe's home, according to the sergeant. “The victim was in fear of getting in trouble and being kicked out of the Sonoma group home if he told anyone so he kept this private until now, as he fears of ongoing sexual abuse with other minors,” Crum said. Get free real-time news alerts from the Rohnert Park-Cotati Patch. Subscribe “Detectives from the Sonoma County Sheriff's Office's Domestic Violence/Sexual Assault Unit investigated the man's claims and they feel there is sufficient evidence to believe Thorpe sexually assaulted the victim as a teenager,” Crum said. Thorpe was taken into custody by the detectives Saturday when a warrant was served at his Rohnert Park home. Thorpe was booked into the Sonoma County Jail, where he was being held in lieu of $250,000 bail. Detectives believe there may be additional possible victims, either at Hanna Boys Center or in the community where Thorpe volunteers in a youth ministry program for teens, Crum said. Additional victims or anyone with information regarding the investigation should contact the detectives assigned to the case by calling 707-565-4300. Source: <https://patch.com/california/rohnertpark-cotati/former-sonoma-group-home-counselor-accused-sexually-abusing-teenage-boy>

Missouri Sued Over Psychotropic Drugs for Foster Care Kids Missouri being sued over allegations of inappropriately providing psychotropic drugs to foster care children. June 12, 2017, at 3:42 p.m. MORE LinkedIn StumbleUpon Google + Cancel Missouri Sued Over Psychotropic Drugs for Foster Care Kids Share × Share on Facebook Post on Twitter Post to Reddit Email Share in LinkedIn Share on StumbleUpon Share on Google Plus By SUMMER BALLENTINE, Associated Press JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (AP) — Child advocates filed a federal lawsuit against the Missouri Department of Social Services on Monday over allegations of inappropriately providing psychotropic drugs to foster care children and systemic lack of oversight of the medications. Attorneys for Children's Rights, the National Center for Youth Law and Saint Louis University School of Law Legal Clinics say the lawsuit is the first of its kind nationwide that focuses only on psychotropic drugs given to foster children. The state attorney general's office didn't immediately comment Monday on the lawsuit. The organizations filed the lawsuit on behalf of several Missouri children currently or formerly in foster care, including a 14-year-old boy who has been prescribed as many as seven psychotropic drugs at one time. Attorneys for the children are asking a federal district judge to grant the lawsuit class-action status and order Missouri to implement systemic changes aimed at curtailing potential overprescribing of the drugs. ADVERTISING The lawsuit claims psychotropic drugs are often prescribed as “chemical straight-jackets” for foster care children with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder or conduct disorder even though there are few to no Food and Drug Administration-approved uses for the drugs among children. The plaintiffs' attorneys say there's little research on how the drugs impact children's brains, and that possible side effects include disorders that cause twitching, Type 2 diabetes, psychosis and suicidal thoughts. “The bottom line is young kids — still developing bodies and brains — are exposed to powerful psychotropic medications in what is in almost in all circumstances off-label prescriptions,” Sara Bartosz, deputy director of litigation strategy at Children's Rights, told The Associated Press in an interview late last month. The lawsuit alleges that there's not enough state oversight of psychotropic medications and that the state keeps shoddy medical records for children in foster care, making it difficult for foster parents to properly administer medications. The suit calls for the judge to order the state to keep better records, develop a stronger informed-consent policy and implement a system to flag potential overprescribing of psychotropic drugs. According to court records, one former foster parent said she received a brown grocery bag full of medications in November 2015 when she first picked up the 14-year-old boy. She said she didn't get information on his medical history or directions for how to give him the medications. The woman said after giving the teenager his medications one night, he told her it felt like he had knives in his eyes and that he was scared to sleep. She said he also twitched, which she thought might be a side effect of his medications. He later was prescribed a drug used to treat tics caused by Parkinson's disease, according to the lawsuit. The lawsuit says in January the teen was taking seven psychotropic medications at the same time, including three antipsychotics. The former foster parent, who stopped serving in that role after the teen threatened her life but still kept in contact with him, said she visited him after he moved to a different state facility in April and that he was "an entirely changed child." She said he was "lethargic, slurring his speech, and falling asleep in broad daylight." According to court records, the teen told the former foster parent he had been hearing voices that told him to kill himself. Others who the lawsuit was filed on behalf of include sisters, ages 2 and 3, who were prescribed the antipsychotic drug Risperdal, which the lawsuit says is not FDA-approved for children younger than age 5. Source: <https://www.usnews.com/news/best-states/missouri/articles/2017-06-12/missouri-sued-over-psychotropic-drugs-for-foster-care-kids>

Maryville group home closes after years of reported problems WATE 6 On Your Side Staff Published: June 13, 2017, 6:50 pm Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) 339Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) 339 Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) Whispering Pines Related Coverage Reports show years of problems at Maryville adult home Blount County adult home under investigation MARYVILLE (WATE) – A group home under scrutiny is now closed after years of problems. Whispering Pines was stopped from accepting new residents in March as federal and state agencies investigated. In the weeks that followed, WATE 6 On Your Side's Don Dare tried to visit the place and get answers from operators, but had no luck. Pictures inside the facility showed a lack of space. State investigators found bugs, dirty conditions, training problems and more. Catholic Charities says it has taken the remaining residents in. The state of Tennessee says the facility was denied licensure renewal. Source: <http://wate.com/2017/06/13/marvville-group-home-closes-after-years-of-reported-problems/>

Youth residential treatment center closes down - Story | Utah Youth residential treatment center closes down Former staff members say clients are being forced out too early By: RICK AARON Posted: Jun 15, 2017 10:04 PM MDT Updated: Jun 15, 2017 10:25 PM MDT AddThis Sharing Buttons Share to FacebookShare to TwitterShare to PrintShare to EmailShare to More132 Salt Lake City - SALT LAKE CITY (ABC4 Utah News) - A residential treatment program for youth with substance abuse and mental health issues is closing down and some former employees say it's putting those clients in danger. Valley Behavioral Health, a private nonprofit organization, had planned to close down the ARTEC Center on 6200 South but workers say they received assurances that the 12 to 18 year old clients would be able to complete their treatment. On Wednesday two employees who worked with those clients were fired and they told ABC4 Utah News the teen clients were being discharged Thursday. One counselor said without the structure of the live-in program, those teens are in danger of relapse, sexual assault or even suicide. "I'm appalled honestly," Taylor Berhow said. "After working for this company for two years, a company that claims to pride itself on the care of its clients and it's staff, the fact that this would happen is honestly inconceivable to me." Susan Pizitz, the Director of Children's Services for Valley Behavioral Health, says that the closure is part of a trend away from residential treatment facilities to in-home and community based programs. "Valley cares deeply about our clients," Pizitz said. "We care about their health and their well-being and we provide a wide array of services to meet needs." Pizitz says all clients will be individually evaluated and moved into other appropriate programs within the Valley Behavioral system. Source: <http://www.good4utah.com/news/local-news/youth-residential-treatment-center-closes-down/742846672>

Columbia NAACP investigating juvenile detention center The Middle Tennessee Juvenile Detention Center in Columbia detains teens who have been accused of delinquent offenses. (WSMV) By WSMV-TV Saturday Posted Jun 24, 2017 at 8:22 AM Updated Jun 24, 2017 at 8:48 AM Share Various records examined by WSMV-TV's investigative team have raised questions about how some troubled teens were getting treated at a Columbia juvenile detention center. Now there's more details about who is running that facility – and how the facility compares to other ones like it across the state. You can find them all over Tennessee: Nine juvenile detention centers that contract with the Department of Children's Services. Every now and then, the agency investigates allegations of abuse or neglect. But one facility stands out from the rest: the Middle Tennessee Juvenile Detention Center in Columbia. And after what WSMV uncovered, one community leader wants answers. "When there is smoke, there is fire," said Rev. TD Byrdsong, president of Columbia's NAACP chapter. Over the course of three years, DCS conducted 42 investigations at MTJDC, according to an open records request filed by WSMV. That's more than the number at all other facilities combined. At all other juvenile detention facilities that contract with DCS, investigators looked into a total of 25 complaints. For months, WSMV has been uncovering allegations surrounding the center, everything from claims of teens not getting proper medical attention to 911 calls detailing abuse allegations. The center is run by a private facility, and its director, Tom Irwin, had little to say about the allegations. "Are these accusations unfounded?" asked reporter Alanna Autler. "We are trying to get your side of the story." "I have no comment," Irwin told her in May. So who is Tom Irwin? WSMV started looking into this past and what we found has some calling his integrity into question. "We are concerned about the character of the man, and that's something we look for more than anything," Byrdsong said. Personnel records show before Irwin worked at MTJDC, he was a trooper for the Tennessee Highway Patrol. But in 2007, Irwin was fired over a sexual harassment allegation. A civil service document states on multiple occasions, Irwin allegedly harassed a court employee. He was accused of trying to kiss her, and then trying to persuade her from reporting it. Irwin was never charged with a crime, and in the eyes of DCS is still considered fit for the position. "Yes, he has been cleared to work around kids, and they're aware of that," said Rob Johnson, a spokesman for DCS. Yet DCS was unaware of what else the I-Team uncovered. In 2008, Irwin joined the Spring Hill Police Department, but only briefly. In his personnel file, an investigator noted Irwin had stated on his application that he was POST certified, which is a requirement for all law enforcement officers. But the investigator wrote that Irwin was not POST certified. Soon after, Irwin submitted his resignation letter, admitting he was not POST certified. "Do you view that as a problem?" Autler asked. "I'm sure we could take the information and take a look at it and have our licensing people at DCS take a look at it," Johnson said. "I'm personally not aware of it." Byrdsong said the Columbia NAACP chapter has launched its own investigation into the facility. He said the first step is holding its leaders accountable. "To me, it's a failing administration and that's something we want to try to make better," Byrdsong said. Only two allegations of abuse have been substantiated at the center since 2014. That's the same number of cases that have been substantiated at the other centers, combined. The director did not respond to questions about whether his past has any bearing on his ability to care for troubled teens. When we asked why MTJDC faced so many more complaints, a DCS spokesman re-sent a previous statement: "The Middle Tennessee Juvenile Detention Center serves the toughest youth in the state. Many who pass through MTJDC have gang ties. Many face serious criminal charges. "They also tend to be unsettled and fearful about what their futures hold. All youth make mistakes, but we don't give up on them. "DCS investigators look into every referral that meets the criteria for abuse and neglect. The DCS staff finds that the center is prompt to fix the state's concerns. Also, MTJDC has adopted the rigorous federal standards designed to reduce the risk of sexual assault. The substantiation rate for abuse and neglect has proven to be low. "DCS requires the center to keep its youth safe. That's not all, though: The center must keep its environment safe — for the workers, teachers, nurses and counselors who serve a challenging population." Source: <http://www.columbiadailyherald.com/news/20170624/columbia-naacp-investigating-juvenile-detention-center>

Civil Rights Lawsuit Claims Minnesota Foster Care System Fails To Provide Safe Placements News Report | June 25, 2017 On May 31, 2017, child welfare advocates sued Hennepin County, Minnesota for violating the civil rights of children in foster care by failing to provide safe placements. The complaint, filed by A Better Childhood and co-counsel Faegre, Baker Daniels, said public data suggests that the Hennepin County child protection system is among the most deficient in the nation, and is a "confusing, underfunded, and erratic system" that inflicts harm to the children it is responsible for protecting. Source: <https://www.openminds.com/market-intelligence/news/civil-rights-lawsuit-claims-minnesota-foster-care-system-fails-provide-safe-placements/>

Tanzania: Boarding School for Under-Tens? Not Ideal By Jimmy Lwagili Sending children aged below ten to a boarding school is denying them their basic rights, which include parental love and care. The remarks were made by the Acting Director of Temeke Municipality, Mr John Bwana who is also Head of Children Department in the Municipality, in Dar es Salaam on the occasion to mark the International African Child Day. He was speaking during an event organised by BRAC Tanzania, which is involved in education, agriculture and entrepreneurship. The theme of this year was 'Strengthen protection and equal opportunities for children'. He advised the parents to not let guests visiting their homes to sleep in the same room with the children because most of them are not trustworthy. According to him, children being in the same room with adults is not a healthy idea because they could be treated cruelly and might be afraid to reveal it after being threatened. "Now days the world has changed, people are not trustworthy. Even close relatives can mistreat our children by subjecting them to practices that are unsuitable for their age like sexual issues," he said. Mr Bwana, who was the guest of honour said sending children below ten years old to boarding schools contributes to lack of parental love and care to the children. "According to various studies at a tender age, children could learn immoral behaviours at boarding schools. They may even face bullying which affects their lives, acts like homosexuality mostly begin in boarding schools because sometimes their matrons and patrons are unfaithful," he said. He urged the public to unveil and report the acts of violence against children whenever this occurs in their areas to the police instead of solving the matters at the family level. He stressed that most of violence against children begins at family level. He said protection and excellent care to all children is the duty of the parent in order to raise the children with the base of discipline and good moral. The move will help build the future nation of patriotic people. A parent of two children, Aisha Ramadhan said she can't let her children stay in boarding school when they are at the level of primary school. "I won't let my children stay in a boarding school when they are still in primary school level because I need to closely follow up on their behaviour and they have to understand what I like and what I dislike them to behave," she said. Ms Ramadhan said although her husband and herself could afford to send their children to a boarding school of any cost they have agreed to do not so because they both like to see their children at home. She said sending a child of below the age of 15 to boarding school is not good although many parents see it as the fashion without thinking the side effects that could face a child. In boarding school children are missing parental love and care and it is easy for them to learn risky behaviours. "Many children are ending in risky behaviour due to acts they learnt in boarding school because they met with wrong people who taught them bad things and it is also too difficult to parents to notice the changes because they stay with children only few days of holidays," she added. Sponsored The Evolving Himalayan Sherpa A study has determined that Himalayan Sherpas have a different physiology, allowing them to use oxygen more efficiently. Is this proof that man is ... Parent Daniel Chillu, a father of two children a daughter and son said before the age of ten for a child is the time to understand his or parents and the time for parents to create friendship with the kids in order to help a kid to be open to the parents. He said a child living far from parent is a problem because it is easy for a child to experience bad behaviour without a parent knowing. Without a friendship between parents and children it is difficult to the children to tell or ask the parents for help when they face a problem or any challenge. "I really love my children, I won't let them live far from me until they complete ordinary level of secondary school. They will go to school and in the evening I want them back at home, it is helpful to monitor their discipline," said Daniel. The BRAC Tanzania Project Manager of Growth and Care for the children, Janeth Malela said to strength protection and equal opportunities to the children is to make sure all children are getting equal rights against physical, sexual and psychological violence. She commented that parental love and care is very necessary in raising a child in this moment where the society is facing many challenges of indiscipline and moral decays. "I advise the public to give equal opportunities to all children from family to national level, the opportunities are in education, health and other studies by staying close to them especially in the earlier age." She said. Ms Malela said nothing is worth to the children than education because education will set a child free from many bad things and will help them to know their rights and responsibilities as children. At the pre-primary school level, it targets underprivileged children to prepare them for mainstream primary school entry. BRAC primary schools are designed to give a second chance at learning to disadvantaged children who have been left out of the formal education system due to extreme poverty, violence, displacement or discrimination. The non-formal primary schools complement the mainstream school system with innovative teaching methods and materials. She said BRAC Tanzania through the Accelerated Learning Process (ALP), has benefited 1890 children in Dar es Salaam, Iringa, Tanga, Dodoma and Mbeya. In the Tanga region 900 female children have got entrepreneurship studies. The overall goal of the preprimary school programme is to make children aged between 5-6 years participate in early learning activities in safe, child-friendly, learning environments in centres, homes and communities and develop their cognitive, emotional, linguistic and numerical abilities to communicate, socialise and learn, and become better prepared for school. Tanzania Tanzanian Passport Is Second Most Powerful in EAC Tanzania's passport is the second most powerful travelling document in East Africa after Kenya, according to The Henley... Read more » Source: <http://allafrica.com/stories/201706290630.html>

Alleged sexual harassment, poor conditions force teen group home's closure Jen French June 28, 2017 10:19 PM CLOVIS, N.M. — Alleged deplorable conditions, neglect, and sexual comments from staff toward teens forced the Children Youth and Families Department's Licensing and Certification Authority to close New Visions Group Home in Clovis. Advertisement State inspectors discovered the home that was supposed to help teenage boys and girls may have actually been hurting them. New Visions Group Home was home to eight teenage girls and nine teenage boys, all between the ages of 14 to 19. This past March, the state filed a motion to revoke the youth group home's certification and forced it to shut down. The revocation comes after allegations of sparse window coverings, old mattresses and even the adult staff making lewd comments toward the teenage girls. State documents obtained by 4 Investigates reveal David Jackson, the sole therapist and part owner, of New Visions Group Home allegedly told a teenage girl living there that she "had a nice butt," and stared at her breasts. He's also accused of giving her a box of condoms as a gift. Jackson is also accused of telling other teenage residents they "looked slutty" and even telling one "she was going to be good at being a whore." CYFD spokesperson Henry Varela tells 4 Investigates there were numerous regulatory deficiencies and neglect allegations that were being probed by the state as early as March 2016. CYFD's probing of the private group home eventually led to the home losing its contract with CYFD. "We immediately got them [the teenagers] relocated to other areas and then the program," Varela said. "The facility was then closed down." Youth also claimed former employee Christopher Thompson gave gifts and wrote letters to the girls. Teens told state investigators that he was in a relationship with one of the girls. The group home eventually fired Thompson. KOB-TV requested to speak to Thompson, but he did not want to speak to media. As of Wednesday evening, KOB-TV is still waiting for a response from Jackson. "It's very disappointing that something like this happened," Varela said. "You have instances in communities—whether it's a community like Clovis or Albuquerque—these communities really look to these providers to provide the help and assistance to the youth who are placed there." The group home owners have the legal right to request to be recertified. Varela said based on the home's prior history it's not likely that New Visions Group Home will reopen—even under a different name. Clovis Police also investigated claims against staff. However, the district attorney in Curry County has yet to file charges against Jackson or Thompson. At this time, the men do not face any criminal charges relating to New Visions Group Home. <http://www.kob.com/investigative-news/new-visions-group-home-closure-alleged-sexual-harassment-cyfd-children-youth-families-department/4528586/>

Wordsworth Academy files for bankruptcy, will be acquired Updated: June 30, 2017 — 10:45 AM EDT 14Share Tweet Tumblr Email 1 Comment REPRINTS Popular Stories Trump responds to claim he tried to blackmail 'Morning Joe' hosts 1:26 PM Chester County woman fatally shot in head in apparent road rage 11:54 AM Brand Content Take The Philadelphia Inquirer and Daily News on the go with our replica editions Paid for by: Philadelphia Media Network Avi Steinhardt Wordsworth, which operated the Ford Road residential treatment center for troubled young people, has agreed to be acquired as part of a deal that will send the nonprofit through bankruptcy. by Harold Brubaker, Staff Writer @InqBrubaker | hbrubaker@phillynews.com Email @InqBrubaker Harold Brubaker Staff Writer Harold Brubaker is a business writer. He writes about the financial side of health care and many other topics. More by Harold Brubaker Wordsworth Academy files for bankruptcy, will be acquired June 30 New merged Jefferson U. will field sports teams June 29 Troubled Mount Laurel nursing home has buyer, will stay open June 29 More from Harold Brubaker Public Health Management Corp. has agreed to acquire Wordsworth Academy Inc. — which operated a residential treatment facility where a teenager died last fall in a struggle with staffers — in a deal that will send the Philadelphia human-services agency through bankruptcy, the two nonprofits announced Friday. "Wordsworth has had its share of problems," said Lawrence G. McMichael, a Dilworth Paxson attorney hired to handle the bankruptcy, which was filed Friday. "They have litigation against them. They have litigation threatened. They have lost the license to operate the Ford Road facility." That West Philadelphia facility is where David Hess, 17, of Lebanon, died Oct. 13 in a fight over an iPod. Hess's death by suffocation was ruled a homicide in February, but charges have not been filed. His death capped a decade of allegations and charges of sexual and physical abuse at what was the city's only residential treatment center for troubled youth, as chronicled by the Inquirer and Daily News in April. "They are not financially viable as a standalone at this point without some relief. Having shut down the Ford Road facility, they have a huge lease obligation there to a landlord, which they can't pay," McMichael said. "Even with all of that, this is an agency we have to save because they are still administering the needs of 5,500 kids in Philadelphia." An attorney representing three victims of Isaac Outten, a counselor who was charged in December with sexually assaulting three girls, said the bankruptcy and acquisition could be a good thing if it allows Wordsworth to continue its important work serving children. "The bad thing is if this bankruptcy and acquisition is used to rob the victims of compensation for the poor treatment that they've received through Wordsworth. That's a real bad thing," said attorney Nadeem A. Bezar, a partner at Kline & Specter PC. Public Health Management Corp. (PHMC), based in Philadelphia, has already taken over the management of Wordsworth's remaining programs under a contract that started Monday. Those programs include a school in Fort Washington, community behavioral-health services, and two community umbrella agencies that provide services for families and children in parts of West and Northwest Philadelphia under license from the city's Department of Human Services. "We very much believe in the coming together of not-for-profits so that we can wrap services around people and serve people, their families, and their communities," PHMC president and chief executive Richard J. Cohen said. PHMC had explored joining forces with Wordsworth several times over the years, Cohen said. This year, given Wordsworth's legal and financial woes, there was greater urgency when its interim CEO, Diana Ramsay, approached PHMC and other possible acquirers about a deal. "They asked what we would do with them. We had very productive talks about we would continue the legacy of Wordsworth," Cohen said. "We were chosen after they looked at several folks." Community Behavioral Health, a city-related nonprofit that funnels Medicaid money to providers, said PHMC is already part of its network. "We support this acquisition enthusiastically and believe it's in the best interest of the youth in our community who are receiving behavioral health services," a spokesman said. A Department of Human Services spokeswoman called the Wordsworth acquisition "a step in the right direction." Bankruptcy is key to the deal because Wordsworth has little or no value as a going concern if it cannot be stripped of liabilities from leases it cannot afford and from anticipated legal settlements. "PHMC would never do this if they were going to be exposed to potential unlimited liabilities," McMichael said. "They wouldn't touch it with a 10-foot pole. Nobody else would either. That's why a bankruptcy is necessary." The initial bankruptcy petition provides little financial detail, but it lists the largest unsecured claims against Wordsworth, totaling $8.5 million, with most of the money owed to other child-welfare agencies. Listed as undetermined is a litigation claim by the Hess family. Stephen Marino, the family's attorney, could not be reached for comment Friday. It is not clear how much money from liability insurance will be available to satisfy claims from the Hess family's anticipated lawsuit and others still pending. The goal of bankruptcy would be to allow for an orderly distribution of however much money is available. Bezar said he has looked at Wordsworth's insurance coverage for the period in which Outten is accused of assaulting the girls he represents. "I would suggest that the coverage is inadequate for what these victims went through at the time, so the bankruptcy is of concern," he said. Source: <http://www.philly.com/philly/business/wordsworth-academy-files-for-bankruptcy-will-be-acquired-20170630.html>

WA man accused of abusing hostel children AAP on June 30, 2017, 5:37 pm Share Tweet Whatsapp Email Share Man charged with abuse in WA group homes - Yahoo7 Pinterest Tumblr A former WA Department of Child Protection employee accused of sexually assaulting two girls and a boy at group homes he worked at has appeared briefly in court. Stephen John Gale, 59, allegedly abused the children, who were aged between eight and 10, while working at the Doubleview Group Home and Darlington Hostel between 1998 and 2000. He faced the Midland Magistrates Court on Friday, charged with nine counts of sexual penetration of a child under 13, and five counts of indecently dealing with a child under 13. Gale is due to appear in the Perth Magistrates Court on September 20. Source: <https://au.news.yahoo.com/wa/a/36215162/man-charged-with-abuse-in-wa-group-homes/#page1>

Young girl sexually abused after OCS places her in foster care OCS Share Video Share Video 00:0002:0300:00 02:03 Posted: Thu 7:35 PM, Jun 29, 2017 The Alaska Office of Ombudsman released an investigative report on the several complaints about a caseworker at the office of children's services. The Ombudsman investigates citizen complaints against state government agencies and employees. In one of the cases, the father, who lived out of state, was trying to get custody of his daughter. According to the report, he called the caseworker more than 130 times. During the time, his daughter was sexually abused by her foster father. The caseworker was alerted to the alleged abuse, but it was several months before the girl was removed from the home. In another case, an infant was removed from her mother at birth. For two years, the mother has requested the caseworker contact the great-grandfather for placement of the baby. The caseworker allegedly lied in court twice that she had started the placement process, even though she did not. The Office of Children's Services Director, Christy Lawton, has responded that the main reason behind the complaints is due to the worker's case load being too high. "I guess what I would say is that Director Lawton has spoken with regards to this report about the crushing burdensome workload that our workers are facing. In the area where this occurred in our South Central area, we've got caseloads that are up to 43 cases per worker and when you consider that the national average is 12 per worker, that's a pretty stunning caseload." State Representative Tammy Wilson does not believe that is an acceptable excuse, especially when a child is sexually abused in the process. She believes Lawton should be removed from her duties as Director. "When we looked at it and saw Christy Lawton, who is the director, her response was, 'Well we are overloaded and things happen.' That's just unacceptable. A child was sexually abused when taken out of a home by the state. We have seen that there are issues. It's time for the governor and for the commissioner to say, we need a change and it starts with the director. Ms. Lawton for whatever reason, in my opinion, has lost touch and it's time to say we are not going to let our children be injured." Source: <http://www.webcenter11.com/content/news/Young-girl-sexually-abused-after-OCS-places-her-in-foster-care--431679283.html>

Suit accuses boarding school of turning 'blind eye' to sexual abuse <http://www.ajc.com/news/local/suit-accuses-boarding-school-turning-blind-eye-sexual-abuse/1Emr0waXnSSrDBr9BfL7uM/> 13 News View CaptionHide Caption Wilcox Hall on the Darlington School's campus in Rome, where teacher Roger Stifflemire is accused of molesting students in the 1970s and 1980s. BOB ANDRES/BANDRES@AJC.COM A group of former students from the Darlington School, a private boarding school in northwest Georgia, filed a lawsuit late Friday claiming a teacher sexually abused them for years and that administrators did nothing in response. "Darlington turned a blind eye to the pain and suffering of its students," according to the lawsuit, filed in Floyd Superior Court in Rome, where the school was founded in 1905. The abuse allegations are the subject of an investigation published this week by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. Seven former students told the newspaper that teacher Roger Stifflemire, who worked at Darlington from 1974 to 1994, sexually abused or propositioned them during the 1970s and 1980s. Stifflemire did not respond to numerous requests for an interview. The school said it hired an Atlanta law firm to investigate the allegations. Nine former students filed the lawsuit, along with the representative of the estate of another, Charles Mark Day, who killed himself last year. In his suicide note, the suit says, Day cited decades-old abuse by Stifflemire and another man. The other man, Fred Marquette, ran a water-ski club on Lake Jordan in Alabama. The suit accuses him of also molesting at least one Darlington student who accompanied Stifflemire on overnight trips to Marquette's lake house. In a recent interview with the AJC, Marquette said he asked Stifflemire not to return after discovering he was having "affairs" with some of the boys. Marquette, now 97 and a registered sex offender in Alabama, said he couldn't remember whether he had also abused the boys but didn't think so. Several of the men who filed the suit said they reported their abuse to various school officials. One said that after Stifflemire molested him on a Boy Scouts camping trip in the eighth grade, he told other students. For telling about the abuse, the lawsuit alleges, a school administrator picked up the student and threw him across a courtyard. The suit also accuses a former student who allegedly molested at least two boys, one age 6. Lawyers for the former students filed the lawsuit ahead of a deadline created by a 2015 state law that temporarily extended the statute of limitations for cases involving childhood sexual abuse. The close of business Friday ended the extension. The suit was filed by attorneys Paul Mones of Los Angeles and Darren Penn of Atlanta. Darlington, the suit says, presented itself as a "safe and morally upright school," but took no steps to investigate or stop sexual abuse. Source: <http://www.ajc.com/news/local/suit-accuses-boarding-school-turning-blind-eye-sexual-abuse/1Emr0waXnSSrDBr9BfL7uM/>

Unusual loan in Wordsworth Academy bankruptcy case Updated: July 1, 2017 — 9:00 PM EDT 18Share Tweet Tumblr Email 3 Comment REPRINTS Wordsworth Academy's, West Philadelphia residential facility where a patient was killed last year. by Harold Brubaker, Staff Writer @InqBrubaker | hbrubaker@phillynews.com Email @InqBrubaker Harold Brubaker Staff Writer Harold Brubaker is a business writer. He writes about the financial side of health care and many other topics. More by Harold Brubaker Unusual loan in Wordsworth Academy bankruptcy case Jul 1 Wordsworth Academy files for bankruptcy, will be acquired Jun 30 More from Harold Brubaker When attorneys for bankrupt Wordsworth Academy go before a judge Thursday in the case's first hearing, they will present a highly unusual proposal to fund the human-service agency's operations during the early stages of its bankruptcy: a $1.5 million loan from another nonprofit that leases space from it. The lender, Play & Learn, an operator of preschools, was once affiliated with Wordsworth and had a member of its board, Gerald Schatz, in common with Wordsworth until Schatz resigned from the Wordsworth board shortly before the bankruptcy filing Friday. Wordsworth operated a residential treatment facility in West Philadelphia where a teenager died last fall in a struggle with staffers. Lawrence G. McMichael, a Dilworth Paxson bankruptcy attorney representing Wordsworth, acknowledged that the proposed financing arrangement was unusual, but said it was appropriate. "Despite substantial efforts, the debtors have been unable to secure alternative financing from any source other than Play and Learn in the time frame required," Wordsworth said in a motion Friday asking U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Ashley M. Chan to approve the loan. "Play and Learn is obviously not a traditional lender, but has mobilized quickly to solve the debtors' immediate liquidity crisis. Without Play and Learn, the viability of debtors' Chapter 11 cases would be jeopardized," the filing said. A traditional financing package is in the works from Siena Lending Group that would supplement the proposed loan from Play & Learn. But the current arrangement illustrates the difficult financial position Wordsworth was in before it resorted to bankruptcy, coupled with a plan to be acquired by Public Health Management Corp. (PHMC), a Philadelphia nonprofit that provides health and community services. "It's not as bad as it seems," McMichael said Saturday. Like many businesses, Wordsworth faces a gap between when it has to pay its bills, such as payroll, and when it gets paid. That gap is typically covered by a line of credit, and Wordsworth had a $5 million line of credit with M&T Bank. A month ago, McMichael said, M&T froze the line of credit while it had a zero balance. "That was one of the reasons for this bankruptcy," McMichael said. Other reasons include numerous lawsuits after a decade of allegations and charges of sexual and physical abuse at what was Philadelphia's only residential treatment center for troubled youth, as chronicled by the Inquirer and Daily News in April. Wordsworth, which provides education, behavioral health, and child welfare services to children and youth and is now being managed by PHMC, still owes $4.7 million to M&T on a separate loan. The board, including Schatz, approved the bankruptcy filing June 12. Schatz and other representatives of Play & Learn, which was founded in 1981 by Wordsworth educators and psychiatrists, could not be reached for comment Saturday. Until about a decade ago, Schatz was president of Wordsworth, which was founded in 1952. The website of Wyncote Academy, a private school in Elkins Park, describes Schatz as founder of Wordsworth Academy, Play & Learn Children's Centers, and Wyncote Academy. The latest available 990 tax return for Play & Learn, for the year ended June 30, 2015, lists Schatz as president. As part of the proposed loan agreement, PHMC will negotiate with Play & Learn on the possible sale of the property Play & Learn occupies on Wordsworth's Fort Washington campus, which a bank appraised at $9.35 million in 2014. "We have aligned interests. Where they are getting the $1.5 million, I don't know," McMichael said. The 990 shows that Play & Learn had $7.7 million in investments two years ago. Laura Otten, executive director of the Nonprofit Center at La Salle University, said a nonprofit is permitted to make such a loan as long as it is from unrestricted money and the board approves it, though she wondered how Play & Learn has that level of liquid assets. "It is very unusual," she said. Source: <http://www.philly.com/philly/business/unusual-loan-in-wordsworth-academy-bankruptcy-case-20170702.html>

'We're devastated' Family mourns boy, 14, after suicide in group home By Lisa Kashinsky lkashinsky@eagletribune.com Lisa Kashinsky Jul 2, 2017 CARL RUSSO/Staff photo. From left, Katti Matias, Sebastian's adopted mother; Natalia Matias, his adopted sister and biological cousin and Ivy Wheeler, Sebastian's biological mother. Natalia is holding a photo of Sebastian during his wake at Farrah's Funeral Home on Thursday. Sebastian is holding his third place certificate he won at the School For Exceptional Studies science fair. Sebastian Wheeler, 14, who graduated from the School For Exceptional Studies on June 14, committed suicide at St. Ann's in Methuen on June 21. His family is speaking out about mistreatment there and trying to prevent this from happening to another family. 6/29/2017 Carl Russo CARL RUSSO/Staff copy photo Sebastian Wheeler, 14 Carl Russo prev next METHUEN — A few minutes before 1 p.m. on Wednesday, June 21, Methuen police received a 911 call that a 14-year-old boy had hung himself in the shower area at St. Ann's home on Haverhill Street. The police and fire department responded, along with St. Ann's staff. Rescue breaths and CPR were performed until the boy was taken to Lawrence General Hospital. Initial reports to police said the boy was not breathing, but medical professionals were able to get a pulse. He was taken via medical flight to Tufts New England Medical Center in Boston. But doctors there told police the boy had no brain activity. By the next morning, Sebastian Wheeler was dead. Wheeler — whose name was released by his family — is yet another child who died under the watch of the Department of Children and Families. Police reported that he was in the department's custody and had been living at St. Ann's Home & School, a facility that provides treatment services for children with behavioral and emotional needs, including through a residential program. According to the state Office of the Child Advocate, 35 children died under the watch of DCF in fiscal year 2016. The causes of their deaths varied from medical conditions, to car accidents, to suicide. DCF had more than 9,000 children in out-of-home placements at the end of fiscal year 2016 and more than 40,000 others on its caseload, making the deaths less than 1 percent of the total population of children with cases under DCF, the annual report said. As Wheeler's family mourns his death, they're also left wondering what went wrong. "We're devastated," said Natalia Matias, Wheeler's biological cousin and adoptive sister. "I wouldn't want another family to go through what we're going through right now to lose a 14-year-old little brother, or for another child to decide this is the only way out," she continued. "I think my family just wants to prevent this from happening to someone else." The teenager's death is being investigated by authorities, including state and Methuen police, DCF and the Department of Early Education and Care. The Department of Early Education and Care did not respond to a request for comment as of press time. Denis Grandbois, president and CEO of St. Ann's, said his staff is "deeply affected" by the death and working with authorities on the investigation. "This is an organizational crisis," Grandbois said. "Sebastian was loved here." "It's not right" The terms of DCF's involvement with Wheeler were not clear as of press time due to confidentiality laws, authorities said. His family said he was adopted from another family member and had dealt with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and autism spectrum disorder. Police reports indicate Wheeler was in DCF custody and that he was reported missing from group homes in Methuen three times. The first, in September 2014, was from The Key Program on Mystic Street. The other two times were from St. Ann's on Jan. 1 of this year and again on June 2, just three weeks before his death. He was located and returned to the homes all three times. In the days leading up to his death, Wheeler's family said he was contacting them asking for reassurances that he was loved. "We were really close before he passed away. It surprises us he would take his life," Matias said. Wheeler's suicide came just a couple of weeks after his eighth-grade graduation and just a few weeks shy of his 15th birthday. The police report from the day of Wheeler's suicide details the response from St. Ann's staff and the Methuen Police and Fire Departments. It says that a police sergeant who was already in the facility's vicinity was on scene doing rescue breaths while a St. Ann's staff member performed CPR. Efforts continued until Wheeler was transported by ambulance to Lawrence General Hospital, the report says. Wheeler was taken to Tufts medical center in Boston, where doctors said he had no brain activity. State police detectives were notified in accordance with protocol for deaths and began an investigation, Methuen police said. The Police Department received notice that Wheeler had died around 2:30 a.m. June 22. Grandbois, of St. Ann's, said staff there "responded to it as well as possible." "We did everything we could," he said. Days after Wheeler's death, his family — members of whom had come from several states to join together in mourning — had set up a small vigil for him in their Lawrence home, including a photograph flanked by candles. His wake was held Thursday. "It's not right to take a child from his mother for a better place, and for him to die in that better place," said Rose Matias, translating for Katti Matias, Wheeler's adoptive mother. DCF reforms St. Ann's Home & School was established in 1925 as an orphanage by the pastor of the former St. Ann's Parish in Lawrence. In 1966, it was reorganized into a residential treatment center for children with emotional issues, according to its website. The group home program was established in 1972, followed by a program in 1982 offering services for children who are either at high risk of out-of-home placements, or for families of children who are returning home from those placements. Wheeler is not the first suicide of someone under the care of St. Ann's in recent memory. In 2011, authorities conducted an extensive search for 15-year-old Brynne Kurmas, who was believed to have walked away from St. Ann's and jumped off the Spicket Falls footbridge. Her body was pulled from the river a few weeks later. Of the critical incident reports reviewed by the Office of the Child Advocate in the fiscal year 2016 report, there were 35 fatalities, 10 near-fatalities and two serious bodily injuries. The majority of the deaths were children ages 3 and under. Two youths between the ages of 16 to 20 committed suicide, and two near-fatalities were attempted suicides. These reports include both children who are in DCF custody and those who are in the care of DCF, meaning the family has an open case with the agency but the child remains at home instead of being placed elsewhere, according to the OCA. Stories of deaths and mistreatment of children under the watch of DCF have plagued the department for years, leading Gov. Charlie Baker in 2015 to say he would implement changes to the state agency. Baker's office did not respond to comment by press time. DCF issued a statement to The Eagle-Tribune outlining some of those changes. "Since September 2015, DCF's been committed to a full and complete systematic reform that includes: hiring a full-time medical director and medical social workers for all 29 DCF offices; hiring an additional 280 social workers and 96 managers; reducing caseloads for social workers; implementing new policies and improving oversight," said DCF spokeswoman Andrea Grossman. Some of the new policies include a new intake policy with a set of procedures that guide DCF's review and investigations of reports of abuse and neglect. There is also a policy to strengthen supervisory support for social workers by, in part, identifying practice areas that require special attention, including parental history, the parent's ability to care safely for a child, and risk factors such as substance abuse, mental health challenges or domestic violence, according to the department. "Any child fatality is one too many as there is no greater priority for DCF than to keep kids safe," Grossman said. Follow Lisa Kashinsky on Twitter @lisakash23. Source: http://www.eagletribune.com/news/merrimack_valley/we-re-devastated/article_58fd2536-f1d3-5603-8432-c96af9fedf3b.html

Jersey's 'house of horrors' children's home should be demolished, abuse inquiry report concludes Haut de la Garenne, dubbed 'the house of horrors', where hundreds of crimes were carried out over decades before it was shut in the 1980s Credit: EDDIE MULHOLLAND for The Telegraph Olivia Rudgard, Social Affairs Correspondent 3 July 2017 • 3:15pm The notorious Haut de la Garenne children's home in Jersey should be demolished, a long-awaited report into abuse and mistreatment of youngsters on the island has recommended. In its final report the inquiry, chaired by Frances Oldham QC, said the buildings were "a reminder of an unhappy past or shameful history for many people". It added that "consideration [should] be given as to how the buildings can be demolished and that any youth or outdoor activity or services for children located on the site should be in modern buildings bearing no resemblance to what went before". The report found that the care system on the island had been dogged by long-running failings caused by "state indifference" and a failure to keep up with modern social care practice. There was "an absence of political and professional will to set or monitor standards of care", it said, and the island's care homes did not develop the standards which were widespread in the rest of the world. Multiple children's homes are criticised by the report, which found that some of them subjected children to an "abusive" regime which was devoid of affection and did not prioritise their wellbeing and happiness. The report concludes: "Unsuitable people who were appointed to management roles, often on the basis of local connections, lacked the leadership skills to manage and raise practice standards and had little up-to-date knowledge of child care theory and practice. As a result, ill-suited carers continued to look after children in unsuitable facilities, using outdated practices. The consequences for the children in their care were devastating and, in many instances, lifelong". Police searching the former Haut de la Garenne children's home in 2008 Credit: EDDIE MULHOLLAND for The Telegraph There was also no way for children to report allegations of abuse until the 1990s, and many were too afraid to speak out, it said, and a "patrician and hierarchical" society in which "children in care were marginalised" contributed to a culture of disbelief. Recommendations in multiple reports commissioned into what happened in the Jersey care system have been ignored, it added. In Jersey Home for Boys and Jersey Home for Girls, children were subject to a regime in the late 1950s that had been substantially unchanged since 1924. Children were subject to "cruel and degrading punishments" such as being "humiliated and beaten with nettles for bedwetting", the report found. At one of the most notorious care homes, Blanche Pierre, children lived in an "oppressive and fearful" environment, and house parents Jane and Alan Maguire had an "inexcusable" approach to bedwetting which constituted "humiliating and degrading treatment", it said. Police forensics officers inside the former Haut de la Garenne children's home in February 2008 Credit: EDDIE MULHOLLAND for The Telegraph It added that Mrs Maguire's friendship with senior child care officer Brenda Chappell was "unprofessional" because it prevented proper scrutiny of the home. Jane and Alan Maguire were charged with abusing children but police dropped the case in 1998 due to a lack of evidence. Another school, Les Chênes was "managed in a strict and physically dominant way", it said. Child protection groups said recommendations including a new Commissioner for Children and Children's Rights Officer, and an "empowered" inspectorate making regular inspections of children's homes should be "implemented without delay". The report also said that Jersey's residency rules could be relaxed to make finding quality staff easier, and new legislation should be introduced to ensure that the island keeps up-to-date with neighbouring countries. An spokesman for the NSPCC said: "Appallingly children who spoke out about abuse were not listened to and those in authority failed to act as part of a culture of fear. Recommendations to improve Jersey's care systems were not just missed but were ignored." The inquiry was set up to establish what went wrong over many years in the care system on the island, which has been rocked by horrific revelations of sex abuse against children in care. The most notorious of the Jersey children's homes was Haut de la Garenne, dubbed 'the house of horrors' Credit: Anthony Devlin/PA The most notorious of them was Haut de la Garenne, dubbed "the house of horrors", where hundreds of crimes were carried out over decades before it was shut in the 1980s. Paedophile Jimmy Savile was implicated in the home's shady past, with an allegation received by police in 2008 that an indecent assault occurred there in the 1970s. But it was decided there was insufficient evidence to proceed. The States of Jersey asked the inquiry to probe the abuse and mistreatment of youngsters placed in children's homes and in foster care on the island from the Second World War. In December 2010, the island's chief minister Terry Le Sueur issued a formal apology to all victims who suffered in the states' residential care system. The apology followed the end of an investigation by the States of Jersey Police, codenamed Operation Rectangle, into historical child sexual, emotional and physical abuse in institutions. The probe reported 553 alleged offences between September 2007 and December 2010 – and most, 315, were reported to have been committed at the Haut de la Garenne. Police identified 151 named offenders and 192 victims but just eight people were prosecuted for 145 offences, with seven convictions. Four of them related to Haut de la Garenne. The probe left the reputation of the island's police tarnished with claims of murders at Haut de la Garenne made in 2008 later discredited after a piece of "skull" was found to be coconut and what had been called "punishment rooms" where children were tortured were found to be too small for an adult to stand up in. Jimmy Savile was implicated in the shady past of Haut de la Garenne children's home Credit: Alex Maguire/REX/Shutterstock Then in 2013, the States Assembly agreed terms of reference for a public inquiry to carry out a wide-ranging investigation into the historical abuse in Jersey. Inquiry chair Frances Oldham QC promised a "robust and fearless" examination of what went wrong and to find answers for the victims. At a preliminary hearing in 2014, Ms Oldham said they would investigate what abuse took place, whether it was reported and what was done, and whether abuse was covered up. She also promised to review the actions of the police, the justice system, politicians and the various government agencies to consider how each responded to child abuse in Jersey. Three phases of hearings were held in public in St Helier between July 2014 and June 2016. Source: <http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/2017/07/03/jerseys-house-horrors-childrens-home-should-demolished-abuse/>

Juvenile corrections officer accused of injuring inmate By KRISTIN HOPPA khoppa@wacotrib.com Kristin Hoppa 2 hrs ago (0) McNeil A Texas Juvenile Justice Department correctional officer was arrested Wednesday, accused of pushing a handcuffed inmate into a wall face first then lying on top of the inmate June 24 at the McLennan County State Juvenile Correctional Facility in Mart. Kerry A. McNeil, 42, of Killeen, was arrested on a Class A misdemeanor charge of official oppression after the incident. The juvenile, who was also in a mask to prevent spitting on officers, received three 3-centimeter-long scrapes to the face and an "egg-sized" bruise on the forehead, according to the affidavit. Details of what led to the incident are not included in the affidavit. The age of the inmate and the reason for being in custody also were not included. A correctional sergeant reviewed surveillance video that shows the inmate's hands were securely handcuffed during the push and while McNeil lay on the inmate, who was face-down on a concrete floor, according to the affidavit. McNeil has been employed at the correctional facility since July 2014, records state. He was arrested and taken to McLennan County Jail, where he remained Thursday afternoon with bond listed at $1,000. Source: http://www.wacotrib.com/news/police/juvenile-corrections-officer-accused-of-injuring-inmate/article_015f6abc-2e9e-5437-aa2e-023ad1accfe6.html

Juvenile Detention Officer Accused of Sexually Assaulting Teenage Inmate Posted By Sierra Juarez on Thu, Jul 6, 2017 at 10:46 AM Bexar County Sheriff's Office A Bexar County Juvenile Detention officer accused of sexually assaulting a teenage inmate was arrested Wednesday. The county sheriff Javier Salazar arrested Jasquel Jamal Spell, 23, after an inmate reported a possible inappropriate relationship between the detention officer and a 15-year-old girl. On one occasion, Spell removed the girl from her room forcing her to engage in "unlawful sexual acts," according to Kens5. Officers say they found video surveillance that showed a sexual encounter between Spell and the inmate. Texas Juvenile Investigator officials reported that Spell confessed to the crime over the phone. "The most tragic thing in this case is that somebody like Spell, in a position of authority for this young lady, was obviously there for her protection yet used that position to prey upon her," Salazar told the Express-News. Salazar said further charges could be filed against the detention officer if officials find evidence of any other victims. Spell is in the Bexar County Jail waiting for a judge to set a bail. Abuse against young inmates has been on the rise, according to ProPublica. A 2016 Justice Department Bureau survey found that nearly 10 percent of youth in detention centers have reported sexual abuse by either the staff or peers. Source: <https://www.sacurrent.com/the-daily/archives/2017/07/06/juvenile-detention-officer-accused-of-sexually-assaulting-teenage-inmate>

Videos show teen inmates being pepper sprayed at Wisconsin youth prison From the Alleged abuses uncovered at Wisconsin youth prison series MOLLY BECK mbeck@madison.com Molly Beck | Wisconsin State Journal 4 hrs ago This Dec. 10, 2015 aerial photo, shows Lincoln Hills School in Irma. A federal judge in June branded Wisconsin's juvenile prison for boys as a "troubled institution," saying it puts too many inmates in isolation and over-relies on pepper spray and shackles when other less intrusive alternatives to control behavior could be used. MARK HOFFMAN, MILWAUKEE JOURNAL SENTINEL prev next Videos of two teen inmates being sprayed repeatedly by guards at the state's youth prison in Irma were released to the public on Thursday. The recordings were shown during a two-day court hearing last month in lawsuit filed against the state Department of Corrections by former and current inmates at the Lincoln Hills School for Boys and Copper Lake School for Girls juvenile correctional facility. The inmates are being represented by the American Civil Liberties Union of Wisconsin and the Juvenile Law Center. One recording from April 2016 shows a female inmate being sprayed after refusing to go to her cell. Instead, the girl remained in the hallway pacing around. Eventually, a guard pepper-sprayed her when she continued to refuse to walk into her room. A guard sprayed her again after she dropped on the hallway floor with other guards holding her. In a second video, guards twice sprayed an inmate who was inside his cell but refused to move his arms into the cell. The plaintiffs' attorney showed two videos of incidents during which prison staff used pepper spray on inmates: one from a fixed security camera in the hallway of a Copper Lake housing unit and another from a handheld camera used to film an incident in a Lincoln Hills unit. Redacted versions of the recordings were released Thursday after Judge James Peterson denied a request made on June 20 by lawyers representing the plaintiffs to show the videos in private. The Wisconsin State Journal, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, The Associated Press, the Wisconsin Newspaper Association and the Wisconsin Freedom of Information Council had urged Peterson to allow the videos to be shown in court, and the judge agreed if those in the courtroom agreed not to identify the juveniles in the videos. The recordings highlighted the youth prison's practice of using pepper spray to subdue teen inmates at the prison — a type of behavior management that expert witnesses for the plaintiffs argued was causing permanent damage to the teen inmates emotional development when used in conjunction with solitary confinement and restraints. Peterson ordered DOC and the plaintiffs' attorneys to come up with a plan to dramatically reduce the use of all three techniques at the prison. The plan is due Friday. Tristan Cook, spokesman for the DOC, said in a statement that the department has made "significant changes to institution operations and continues to identify opportunities for further improvement." "We look forward to furthering our efforts to reduce the use of chemical agents and restraints, decrease the frequency and duration of youth stays in restrictive housing, and enhance education and programming provided to youth at Copper Lake School/Lincoln Hills School," he said. Source: http://host.madison.com/wsj/news/local/courts/videos-show-teen-inmates-being-pepper-sprayed-at-wisconsin-youth/article_ecacf326-5d08-5745-9806-5640af4015ab.html

State investigating group home after claims of neglect The owner of a group home was not arrested but sheriff's investigators said they sent five felony counts of neglect to the state attorney, who will decide whether to prosecute. Share Shares Copy Link {copyShortcut} to copy Link copied! Updated: 5:16 PM EDT Jul 6, 2017 PALM COAST, Fla. — The owner of a group home was not arrested but sheriff's investigators said they sent five felony counts of neglect to the state attorney, who will decide whether to prosecute. Funmi Oduyejo said the state inspector, who insisted two residents from his group home on Braddock Lane in Palm Coast go to the hospital, is new and unfamiliar with their medical histories. Advertisement He said resident's leg swelling the inspector found alarming is because the severely disabled patients use wheelchairs to get around. State inspectors and sheriff's deputies said all five disabled residents were in jeopardy because of the heat. The air conditioning, which was finally repaired Thursday, went out Monday. Temperatures in the house reached 91 degrees. The owner said the air conditioning compressor went out and a new one had to be ordered but the Fourth of July holiday delayed the repairs. The state sent three of the five residents who were in good health be moved to a hotel. A spokesman with the state said all the residents will have the option to move to a different group home. The group home owner said he checked on those who are hospitalized. State officials told WESH 2 they will be regularly inspecting the group home just to ensure that the residents are safe. They said they will look at this one and another that the same owner has in the neighborhood. Source: <http://www.wesh.com/article/state-investigating-group-home-after-claims-of-neglect/10269627>

Inslee signs bill to fund pilot project on legal representation for foster kids Posted By Wilson Criscione on Fri, Jul 7, 2017 at 2:54 PM click to enlarge Washington will fund a pilot project that will provide legal representation to foster kids in two counties where those kids would otherwise be left navigating court proceedings with no attorney. Gov. Jay Inslee signed the bill Thursday — Senate Bill 5890 — that makes improvements to the state's foster care system, including a total of $1.4 million over the next two years for the project to test legal representation for foster kids. "We are definitely considering this a win," says Alicia LeVezu of the UW School of Law's children and youth advocacy clinic. Inslee also signed a separate bill that creates the Department of Children, Youth and Families, which will combine multiple agencies overseeing services for vulnerable children into one. Currently, Washington has no law that requires abused or neglected children to have an attorney during dependency proceedings. In Spokane County, children are automatically appointed counsel starting at age 12, but other many other counties don't have similar rules or policies. That can effectively leave kids without a voice during critical conversations about where they will live and their future, according to several lawyers, children's advocates and state lawmakers. Rep. Noel Frame (D-Seattle) sponsored a bill this year that would have granted all kids over 2 an attorney in dependency hearings, but the bill failed to make it out of the legislature. Instead, the state will study the effects that legal representation would have on foster kids in four smaller counties in the state — Grant, Lewis, Douglas and Whatcom. Two of those counties will have attorneys provided for kids, and the other two will act as a control group for the state to quantify differences in experiences for children represented by an attorney and for children or are not. The funding for the project goes until December 31, 2019, at which point the Washington state center for court research will report its findings to the legislature. The UW's LeVezu authored a report on the topic last year. Researchers in King, Snohomish and Pierce counties found that children had an 84 percent change of having their opinion shared with the court if both a Court Appointed Special Advocate (volunteers that represent children's best interests) and an attorney advocated for kids. Yet less than 20 percent had their opinion shared in court with only a CASA but no attorney. Many attorneys argue that children need attorneys so that they may have a greater chance of staying with family members or to achieve permanency, rather than languish in the foster care system. Only attorneys can file motions in court on behalf of children. "This study will provide critical information for lawmakers about the importance of attorneys in reducing system-wide inefficiencies and expenses," Hillary Madsen, staff attorney at Columbia Legal Services, said in a statement. LeVezu says this state study is exciting because it will look at permanency outcomes, child welfare indicators and overall child well-being. "I'm hoping it will demonstrate the positive impacts of these kids having advocates," she says. Source: <https://www.inlander.com/Bloglander/archives/2017/07/07/inslee-signs-bill-to-fund-pilot-project-on-legal-representation-for-foster-kids>

US's richest boarding school showed anti-gay video Newsweek 10 Jul 2017 at 17:03 ET A former student at a Pennsylvania high school claims he was forced to watch anti-gay propaganda after teachers discovered him watching homosexual porn. Adam Dobson, who attended the The Milton Hershey School from 2010 to 2013, claimed in federal court that the private boarding school forced 'anti-gay therapy' on him, prompting him to attempt suicide during his time there. Dobson, who was expelled from the school in 2013, allegedly after a suicide attempt, said he was made to watch a film made by 'ex-gay' activist Sy Rogers called One of the Boys, by the 'parents' of his boarding house, The Philadelphia Inquirer reported. The video advises against the content being shown to minors. In court documents seen by The Inquirer, the school's lawyers admitted such footage was shown to students, although it did not state whether or not the same kind of video was shown to Dobson. However, the school initially denied Dobson's charges, stating in 2016 that the claims against them were "an outrageous allegation and a practice the administration would never allow or condone." On Friday, a spokesperson for the school told The Inquirer: "Unequivocally, the school does not promote or endorse any program that could be remotely characterized as gay conversion therapy. "Any suggestion otherwise is a gross mischaracterization of our values and the environment on our campus," the spokesperson added. The country's wealthiest private school is currently facing lawsuits over two former students, one from Dobson and another from the parents of former student Abbie Bartels, who committed suicide in June 2013 after allegedly being banned from the school after she was treated for suicidal thoughts. The suit filed by Bartels' parents stated: "Abbie was terminated by [the school] and released back to a poor, unstable, and at-risk environment, contrary to any reasonable treatment." Both cases are being heard at the federal court in Harrisburg. Source: <http://www.rawstory.com/2017/07/uss-richest-boarding-school-dhowed-anti-gay-video/>

Lansing group helps adults with disabilities live on their own, in community with others By Stateside Staff • Jul 10, 2017 Related Programs: The Next Idea Stateside TweetShareGoogle+Email A volunteer landscaping crew stands outside LINC's first home, which will house three individuals in its pilot intentional community. Courtesy of LINC The Next Idea Parents of children on the autism spectrum face significant challenges in getting the right education, support and other life tools for their kids. But the difficulties don't go away when these kids grow up. Can they live alone, support themselves, be a part of society? And what happens when their adult caregivers age out of watching over them? Mary Douglass is one of many working to combat these challenges. Douglass is the president of Lansing Intentional Communities, or LINC. The organization's goal is to promote the creation of spaces, called intentional communities, where adults with developmental disabilities live together. "We're putting these individuals in close proximity with each other so we can help them create community together and support them as they create community with their surrounding neighborhood," Douglass said. "Really the individual is making their own self-determined choices about where they live, who they live with, how they get supported, what the neighborhood looks like." Douglass says there's no one model or format the communities must follow. LINC recently bought its first house for three people, but several apartments, for example, could work just as well. "It doesn't matter how we acquire that housing. What really matters is that we're being intentional about keeping ourselves close together and creating community with each other." LINC then inserts what it calls a community builder, Douglass said, to live within the community. They might plan outings, or just help out when needed. "I like to think of it as an RA, like when you go to college," Douglass said. The intentional community model is different from a group home. It purposefully has less of a rigid schedule to give as much independent choice as possible to individuals. This is a fluid model that can change and improve with different circumstances, Douglass said, but it's a distinct improvement from the past. Source: <http://michiganradio.org/post/lansing-group-helps-adults-disabilities-live-their-own-community-others>

California Says Goodbye to Group Homes for Probation Youth by Brian Rinker July 12, 2017 | Brian Rinker Amiri Whisenton was 10 years old when he was sent to foster care. He tore through so many foster homes across Alameda County he can't remember them all. The foster families were often either too strict or too lenient. He'd get kicked out for either staying out past curfew, smoking cannabis, being disrespectful, or for doing all three. Sometimes he just ran away and didn't come back. "I wasn't bad, but I was wild," Whisenton said, now 19 and living in East Oakland. "I wouldn't listen to nobody. I was disrespectful. I was off the hook.” Whisenton had found a pseudo-family on the streets. He hung out with older guys and started smoking cannabis. By 14, he was carrying a gun and robbing people. He went on a day-long crime spree that landed him in juvenile hall. After that, Whisenton was placed in group homes. After a judge extended his stay in a group home rather than releasing him to his father, Whisenton was so frustrated that he ran away and became homeless. Whisenton’s journey is not unique. Thousands of foster families struggle to support high-needs kids like Whisenton. Once inside the California’s probation system, kids who are removed from their home are usually sent to live with either a relative, a group home or juvenile hall. For Whisenton, his chances of getting back to a foster home after being locked up were near zero, at least while on probation. And in Alameda County, most kids who don’t have relatives to stay with are sent to a group home outside the county, sometimes out of the state. With the advent of new state laws that restrict the use of group homes, probation departments are looking to find ways to help youth like Whisenton so they don’t fall through cracks and come out more damaged than when they entered the system. Sabrina Forte, a juvenile justice attorney for Bay Legal Aid, said many of her clients struggle with post-traumatic stress disorder and depression as a result of poverty and growing up without a parent. And doing drugs is a common coping mechanism for them. To deal, “a lot of our kids self-medicate,” she said. Forte said that if Whisenton and others like him are going to get the help they need, probation has to begin to view these behaviors through a “mental health and poverty lens.” “Amiri’s behaviors are symptomatic of broader trauma or mental health,” said Forte, who represented Whisenton when he was 17. New California laws known as the Continuum of Care Reform (CCR) have mandated that juvenile probation departments embrace the latest in child psychology. That is, youth do best when they are living in a family-like setting and receiving community-based services. Starting this year, California began rolling out the reforms, which will also heavily impact the state’s child welfare system. Under CCR group homes are no longer an option to house kids for more than six months. As a result, the new mandates have probation department across the state hustling to the make the necessary changes from a disciplinary corrections agency that relies heavily on group homes to one that now must place kids in the least restrictive setting possible — typically with relatives or friends or foster homes. And for high-needs kids like Whisenton, CCR requires probation to have a robust infrastructure of foster homes as well as a network of therapeutic and wrap-around services necessary for these families to support the youth. In additional, CCR will increase a number of resources — financial and training — so that families are better equipped to deal with kids who might smoke weed or have other behavioral problems. Not alienate them or kick them out. The Alameda County Probation Department has historically sent most of its kids who can’t live with a relative to a group home in another county or state. To meet the mandates of CCR, the department will need more family placements. It has contracted with two Foster Family Agencies, or FFAs, which are private organizations that place kids with foster homes. These agencies will help find placements for kids and help train family or relatives in becoming approved probation placements. “For the probation department, this is just a whole new game. So, there was a much steeper learning curve,” said Stacey Wooten, deputy chief of Alameda County’s juvenile probation. In preparation for CCR, Wooten said that probation has tried to place some youth with an FFA. But most of the kids didn’t get matched because they weren’t appropriate for their clientele. “We kind of expected that because of the stigma attached to probation youth,” Wooten said. They did place one youth, however, but Wooten wasn’t aware of his current status. In the past “if there was no friend or relative willing to work with the youth, we were sort of forced to send them to out-of-town residential placements,” Wooten said. “CCR has really caused a change in how we do our work in probation.” CCR provides more money for family and friends who want to step up and house a youth. But to become an approved placement requires 12 hours of training, background checks and psycho-social evaluation. All of which can be barriers for them. “It can be very daunting for some of our families,” Wooten said. “There is such a stigma attached to the probation youth that we think it may be difficult to find those families — not impossible but difficult.” To help place a probation-involved kid in the most appropriate setting, probation departments will now work together with child welfare services, the courts, the family or guardian to ensure the best options for the youth. All group homes in the state will have to get relicensed as short-term therapeutic centers. In June, Alameda had 51 youth living in out-of-home residential placements, but only three were located in-county, in Oakland. The rest were sent all over California or out of state, as far away as Pennsylvania. As CCR continues to be implemented, youth will still remain in out-of-county treatment centers or group homes. No effort yet is being made to bring them home. “I don’t think it is appropriate to bring them home in the middle of treatment just because of the change of how we do business in the future,” Wooten said. In the meantime, kids like Whisenton continue to get lost navigating a system in which they feel helpless and alone. Whisenton believes the old system set him up to fail. Whisenton now lives with his girlfriend, their nine-month-old daughter and his girlfriend’s brothers in East Oakland. He works as an in-home supportive services provider for his mom in West Oakland. With a son on the way, he also receives state foster care benefits, including $889 for himself under the California’s extended foster care (AB 12) and $900 for his daughter. He is hoping to get a warehouse job and a Section 8 voucher that would offer a new home to settle down with his growing family. Whisenton said he no longer admires the street life. “I just want to live a comfortable life and raise my kids,” he said. “I don’t want no drama.” Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/analysis/california-says-goodbye-to-group-homes-for-probation-youth>

Dayton group home operator could lose license over conviction Dayton group home owner could lose license over forgery conviction County says home’s 14 clients will be cared for if home shuts down. local By Josh Sweigart - Staff Writer ... Clark’s Boarding Home, 915 W. Grand Ave. Posted: 4:55 p.m. Tuesday, July 11, 2017 A mental health residential home in Dayton is at risk of losing its license to operate after its owner pleaded guilty to forging checks — and now faces additional theft charges. Clark’s Boarding Home, 915 W. Grand Ave., currently houses 14 clients, according to an employee of the home who wouldn’t give her name. State records show the home is owned and operated by Karen L. Clark, who told the newspaper she is appealing a June ruling by the Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services that bars her from owning a adult care facility for seven years. RELATED: Dayton mental health agency has national impact Under state law, individuals who have been convicted of certain crimes, including forgery, are prohibited from working in a residential facility, the department said in its ruling. Clark pleaded guilty to three counts of forgery in Delaware County in 2015. Those charges followed an investigation by Westerville police into allegations Clark deposited fraudulent checks claiming to be from two Dayton non-profits — Choices in Community Living and Senior Resource Connection — into a business bank account in the Columbus area and then withdrew money from the account before the checks were declined, according to Westerville police records. The investigation also revealed that Clark wrote fraudulent cashier’s checks from Day Air Credit Union to a Marriott Execustay in Westerville, those same police records show. Clark pleaded guilty in November 2015 and was given community control and ordered to pay $5,240 in restitution to U.S. Bank and $6,100 in restitution to Execustay. But a Montgomery County grand jury last month indicted her on theft charges stemming from checks cashed in 2014. CLICK HERE FOR MORE FROM THIS REPORTER The checks were from Senior Resource Connection for clients sent to Clark’s Boarding Home. Senior Resource Connection is a non-profit that provides support services for seniors, adults with special needs and their caregivers throughout the Miami Valley, according to the organization’s website. A Dayton police department report from last November shows Susan Spencer, supervisor of financial services for the non-profit, told police that Clark’s Boarding Home double-cashed rent checks from Senior Resource Connection four times in 2014, totaling $2,652. “It appears from the copies of bank documents that the check was initially deposited and then a few days later taken and deposited at a ‘Check ‘n Go,’” the police report says. A call to Spencer to ask about the case was not returned. RELATED: County strained by efforts to curb drug deaths Clark said in an interview that she plans to appeal the ruling by the Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services to suspend her license. Montgomery County property records show The Huntington National Bank purchased the property in March from KL Clark Property Management LLC. “The facility is not closing,” said Clark, who said another entity is taking over the business. When asked about the theft charges in Montgomery County, Clark said they were against a different Karen L. Clark. Both the Montgomery County case and the one in Delaware County, however, list the same name, mailing address, birthday and affiliation with Clark’s Boarding House. State business records say the trade name Clark’s Boarding Home was cancelled in May for failure to file required paperwork. The trade name was controlled by K & J Adult Day Care, which has a business license listing Karen Clark as its statutory agent. Ann Stevens, a spokeswoman with the Alcohol, Drug Addiction and Mental Health Services Board of Montgomery County, said the residents at Clark’s Boarding House will be cared for if the facility closes. “They all have case managers who will work with the providers to find housing and whatever else they need,” she said. Source: <http://www.daytondailynews.com/news/crime-law/group-home-operator-risks-losing-license-over-forgery-conviction/iRtwuJ8eT1R8CXKnP6fM/>

17-year-old commits suicide in group home after assault at DOC halfway house Corrections won't explain lack of monitoring Jessica Arp Posted: Jul 17, 2017 08:29 PM CDT Updated: Jul 18, 2017 06:41 AM CDT 17-year-old commits suicide in group... MADISON, Wis. - Wisconsin Department of Corrections officials would not explain to News 3 why daily monitoring was not done of sex offenders at a home where a 17-year-old girl reported a sexual assault last year. That young woman later died inside a group home in Dane County that also closed following citations from the state. News 3 has spent the last year investigating the case and supervision in both homes. The sexual assault was reported in July of 2016, at 3150 St. Paul Ave. in the town of Blooming Grove.

The area, while seemingly in Madison, is under the jurisdiction of the Dane County Sheriff's Department. "We learned there had been a party hosted at an apartment that was actually housing individuals under DOC supervision as sexual predators," said Dane County Sheriff Dave Mahoney. Court documents show the 17-year-old girl smoked weed and took Ecstasy and was taken to the party by a man on the Dane County Bail Monitoring program. Investigators say she was told by the three men who lived at the house, who were all registered sex offenders, that "she wanted this" and she reported being repeatedly raped. One offender who was arrested for the crime, James Phillips, told investigators the four men were "taking turns," that the girl was "tossed around like a rag doll" and estimated she was assaulted 11 times. The apartments where the incident happened were emergency housing for recently-released sex offenders, a place the DOC says was used for offenders at risk of homelessness. Documents released to News 3 by the DOC show that regular daily monitoring of the offenders at the home did not happen. "You had to rely upon one another, one predator in charge of watching another one," Mahoney said of the situation his investigators found. "So kind of like putting the wolf inside the henhouse." Those probation and parole documents show that the sex offenders were only seen in occasional home visits over the year prior to the assault. The offenders largely also knew when agents were coming, as nearly all visits were scheduled ahead of time. There was an agent at the home the day of the alleged assault on July 7. She was meeting with Reginald Patton to move him into the house. Patton was later one of the four men charged in the case. Another offender charged, Stephon Hiler, has already pleaded guilty to his role in the assault. His attorney says he has cognitive issues, and DOC documents from the day he was placed in the home show he was "low-functioning" and could not read or write. "It's a travesty what happened, but part of the blame lies in them putting this cognitively disabled person inside this facility with no one to supervise them," said attorney Michael Covey. Covey says he will ask for a shorter sentence for Hiler in part because he says the DOC bears some responsibility for what happened, and they set his client up to fail. "There were drugs being used, lots of sex happening in this building and that's from police reports and witness testimony," Covey said. "It was animal house." The Department of Corrections declined News 3's repeated requests for interviews. In a statement, a spokesman said the department discontinued the lease on the home and was no longer using any emergency housing locations in Dane County. Instead they're using "transitional housing" programs and have a policy that requires additional monitoring beyond monthly agent visits. "Contracted staff must conduct three site checks per day in addition to regular home visits from probation and parole agents," said spokesman Tristan Cook in an email. But the question remains why the Department of Corrections wasn't regularly monitoring the residence before this happened, especially given that it is just more than half a mile from the St. Paul Avenue house. Department officials would not tell News 3 if anyone was disciplined or fired and would not release any internal investigation results. The second home connected to this young woman, though, is where she met her end. The victim had been living at a group home in Dane County called the Spohn Avenue House for Girls, which has since closed. Jennifer Ginsburg, program manager at Safe Harbor Child Advocacy Center, is familiar with this case and the victim. "We have a teenager that was victimized by two failed systems," Ginsburg said. According to documents provided by the Department of Children and Families, the victim reported the rape to a staff member at the home at 1:30 a.m. on July 8. It wasn't until she told the group home director nine hours later that police were called, as is required by the state. Then one month later, on Aug. 5, 2016, the victim of this sexual assault hung herself from a rod in her closet at the group home. She later died at the hospital. "We know that kids who are sexually assaulted are much more likely to have suicidal thoughts and suicide attempts, and it's awful," Ginsburg said. "A group home should be a place where we're able to stop a suicide from happening." The group home was cited by the state in August of last year for violating abuse and neglect reporting requirements for not reporting the sexual assault immediately. In October, the nonprofit that ran the home was issued another order saying the home "failed to provide a safe, stable and humane environment" and ordering it to correct the environment or face sanctions. Rather than take corrective action, Orion Family Services, which ran the group home, chose to close its doors. The executive director of Orion Family Services, Hugh Myers, declined to be interviewed by News 3, but said that discussions to close the home were already underway at the time of the order. He also disputed findings in the state documents, saying they reflect "a highly inaccurate assessment of the situation." Those in the community say their hope is that the right people are watching next time. "I know that the only way for this tragedy to not be completely in vain is for there to be changes," Ginsburg said. News 3 reached out to the family of the victim, which declined to comment but said they had retained an attorney. Source: <http://www.channel3000.com/news/17-year-old-commits-suicide-in-group-home-after-assault-at-doc-halfway-house/589013743>

State's top child welfare agency is doing bad job overseeing foster care providers. DiNapoli study says OCFS is doing bad job overseeing foster care providers: report BY Glenn Blain NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Friday, July 21, 2017, 5:40 PM facebook Tweet email State Controller Thomas DiNapoli's report blasted the Office of Children and Family Services for doing a poor job overseeing foster care providers in NY. (Mike Groll/AP) BY Glenn Blain NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Friday, July 21, 2017, 5:40 PM ALBANY — The state's top child welfare agency is doing a poor job overseeing foster care providers in New York, according to an audit made public Friday. State Controller Thomas DiNapoli's report blasted the Office of Children and Family Services for failing to ensure that local governments and volunteer agencies provide foster care that meets state requirements. "The agency is not ensuring that caseworkers are making timely and frequent contact with children, their parents and their foster parents," DiNapoli said. "While the demands on the agency are significant, oversight needs to be improved." DiNapoli's auditors reviewed a sample of 150 cases from a group of upstate and suburban counties and found that in 33 instances there was no record of caseworkers making the required two visitations within 30 days of a child's placement. DiNapoli hails volunteers at Citizenship Now! center as 'heroes' In one instance, a foster child in Schenectady County did not receive a visit from a caseworker until 91 days after placement. DiNapoli's auditors also found instances where there was no evidence that foster care providers had been properly certified or that criminal background checks had been conducted on foster care providers or others who come in contact with the children. The failure to ensure certification increased the risk that children would be placed in an "unacceptable environment," the audit stated. In a blistering statement, OCFS officials rejected DiNapoli's findings. "This audit contains fundamental and egregious errors in the interpretation of state regulations," the agency said in a statement. "The OSC ignored voluminous documentation provided by OCFS refuting the accuracy of its findings. The audit is factually incorrect and cannot be responsibly viewed as reliable in assessing OCFS's performance in its oversight of New York State's foster care program, which currently helps 16,000 children whose parents are unable to care for them." Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/ocfs-bad-job-overseeing-foster-care-providers-report-article-1.3345871>

Arkansas girl announces St. George sexual assault lawsuit By The Independent - 07 25 17 - 6:00 am On July 26 at 11 a.m. in the conference room at Courtyard by Marriott in St. George, a mother and her teenage daughter from Arkansas will speak at a press event to discuss a lawsuit they will file earlier that day detailing alleged sexual assaults at a therapeutic boarding school and treatment center for troubled teenagers in the St. George area. They will discuss the alleged sexual assaults, betrayal of trust, and broken promises. Attorneys Craig Vernon and Wes Larsen represent this family and will be present as well. Source: <http://suindependent.com/arkansas-girl-announces-st-george-sexual-assault-lawsuit/>

Rolla woman pleads guilty in federal fraud case Posted: Jul 24, 2017 9:45 AM PDT Updated: Jul 24, 2017 9:45 AM PDT By Associated Press_Credit: KMOV ST. LOUIS (AP) — A central Missouri woman has pleaded guilty to federal charges for defrauding her employer. Prosecutors said Monday that 54-year-old Denise Rea Barner of Rolla pleaded guilty to access device fraud. She could face up to 10 years in prison at sentencing on Oct. 20. Court documents say Barner worked from 1991 through February 2016 for the Robert L. Kyle Center for Semi-Independent Living in Rolla, a residential treatment facility for people with mental and developmental disabilities. Barner became a director in 2004. Federal prosecutors say that starting in November 2007 she began using the organization's debit cards to make unauthorized purchases and ATM withdrawals. The U.S. Attorney's office in St. Louis says the center lost between $95,000 and $150,000. Source: <http://www.kmov.com/story/35956267/rolla-woman-pleads-guilty-in-federal-fraud-case>

Steep rise in police calls to Schenectady facility for troubled teens Paul Nelson Updated 5:32 pm, Wednesday, July 26, 2017 3 SCHENECTADY— City Councilman Vince Riggi wants to know what's behind the precipitous rise in calls for service over the past two years at the Northeast Parent & Child Society, a residential home for troubled youngsters on Park Avenue. "There's a cost associated with this. Yes, we have to provide the service, but do they have their facility under control?" Riggi said Wednesday. "My concern is if they can't control their residents, then that's a problem for the city of Schenectady, and then it becomes a taxpayer problem." Riggi requested an analysis of the call volume from the city police department, which revealed the upward trend of police and emergency calls to the facility after a neighbor who lives near Northeast brought the matter to his attention. There were 406 calls through July 14 of this year. For the same period in 2016, the number of calls was 427. It's not clear if every call required a police visit to the facility. The website for Northern Rivers, the parent organization for the Northeast Parent & Child Society, states it is "committed to helping children, adults, and families." In a prepared statement, Northern Rivers CEO William T. Gettman said child-welfare employees "receive intensive, specialized training to address the challenges of youths placed with us in residential care." He said there is a 1-to-5 ratio of staff to residents, typically ages 12 to 18. "Nothing is more important than the safety and well-being of those in our care,"

Gettman said. "In the course of their treatment, our residents may experience issues that by both regulation and best practice require that police, fire and emergency medical professionals provide outside assistance." Gettman said administrators "monitor trends, explore causes of behaviors and train our staff to minimize the impact of issues that are not beyond our control," and staffing ratios are mandated by the state Office of Children and Family Services, the regulatory body that licenses this facility. "We work closely with local authorities to reduce the number of calls for intervention and with officials in Schenectady to further refine our efforts every day," Gettman said. Residents are placed in the nonsecure facility by the court system because "they face challenges that require intensive treatment in a residential setting." Though the residents are not locked in, they cannot come and go as they please, Gettman said. The police analysis indicates that the department was called 135 times in 2014 through July 15. The next year during that period the number rose to 227. With the exception of 2014, "get a report" and "juvenile incidents" accounted for the vast majority of calls that brought police to the facility. Assistant Chief Jack Falvo explained that classification, which is generated by police dispatch system, is a catch-all phrase that could encompass "several different type of offenses" such as a runaway juvenile or a rules violation. Besides the cost associated with the police response, Riggi expressed concern about the potential adverse effect on the quality of life for people who live near the Park Avenue facility. He plans to ask for the matter to be placed on the City Council committee agenda for the Aug. 7. meeting and hopes to have police officials present then. Falvo said police met a few months with management at the facility to discuss thefts, mostly of cars in Schenectady and elsewhere, allegedly involving a few residents at Northeast. He said a follow-up meeting will be scheduled to discuss the jump in call volume and other matters. Source: <http://www.timesunion.com/news/article/Steep-rise-in-police-calls-to-facility-for-11438060.php>

Police: Phoenix group home worker accused of child molestation Joe Enea 11:50 AM, Jul 27, 2017 3 hours ago glendale | west valley Share Article Keith Wayne Harrington MCSO Copyright 2017 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Copyright 2017 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Keith Wayne Harrington MCSO PHOENIX - A man has been accused of molesting teenaged girls in the Phoenix group home where he works. Police report that in February, a teenage girl came forward accusing 47-year-old Keith Wayne Harrington of offering her dresses. "So she could wear them around the house without underwear, so he could touch her." He also allegedly offered to pay her to wear short clothing and dance for him. In another instance, Harrington reportedly touched the victim and himself in a sexual manner, saying, "This is mine, this is yours." Reports state Harrington offered the girl marijuana, clothes, and a cell phone for sex. Police say they are awaiting lab results of biological evidence they collected in this incident. In July, another teenaged girl came forward accusing Harrington of offering her marijuana for sex. She accused him of sexually assaulting her in the group home, until a family member rang the doorbell. Harrington was arrested Sunday at his home near 75th and Glendale avenues. He's being held on a $100,000 bond for child molestation. Source: <http://www.abc15.com/news/crime/police-phoenix-group-home-worker-accused-of-child-molestation>

12 Images From Seneca Indian Boarding School From 1872 to 1980, Seneca Indian Boarding School assimilated Native American students ICMN Staff • July 29, 2017 Construction on Seneca Indian Boarding School, in Wyandotte, Oklahoma, began in 1871, and classes began in 1872, according to the Oklahoma Historical Society. Wyandotte, a town named to honor the Wyandotte Tribe, is about one mile south of U.S. Highway 60 and 12 miles southeast of Miami, the county seat. According to the Oklahoma Historical Society, the land for the Seneca Indian Boarding School was donated to the Society of Friends (Quakers)—who established a mission in the area in 1869—by the Wyandotte Tribal Council to operate a boarding school for Seneca, Wyandotte, and Shawnee children. It was Colonel Richard Henry Pratt who coined the term "Kill the Indian in him and save the man," with the founding of Carlisle Indian School in Pennsylvania in 1879. The goal of boarding schools was to remove Native American children from their homelands and traditional ways and assimilate them into Western religion and ways of life. Download Today! Heroes of Native Resistance Discover Native American Heroes! Download our special Free Report Sitting Bull, Crazy Horse, Geronimo, Tecumseh and other Heroes of Native Resistance. Joe Kagey, who served as principal of Seneca Indian Boarding School from 1928 until he retired in 1956 organized his school on a three-quarter day system. Native American students attended academic classes on day, then the next half-day participated in vocational exercises, wrote A.M. Gibson in "Joe Kagey: Indian Educator." Gibson also reported that the boys worked in the Seneca Indian Boarding School carpentry and machine shops, and were taught animal husbandry, modern farm management, and maintenance. The girls were taught cooking, sewing, home management, and grooming. Courtesy Department of the Interior/Bureau of Indian Affairs/Miami Agency/National Archives and Records Administration/Wikimedia Commons This image was most likely taken around 1905 by Charles R. Scott, an employee of the Seneca Indian Boarding School, for Superintendent Horace B. Durant. The boys at the school worked in carpentry and machine shops. Courtesy Department of the Interior/Bureau of Indian Affairs/Miami Agency/National Archives and Records Administration/Wikimedia Commons This image was most likely taken around 1905 by Charles R. Scott, an employee of the Seneca Indian Boarding School, for Superintendent Horace B. Durant. The girls at the school were taught cooking, sewing, home management, and grooming. Gibson noted that during Kagey's administration of Seneca Indian Boarding School, Native American students excelled in athletic competitions. "For many years, the Seneca team ranked with the State's best, placing high or winning most local and regional tournaments," Gibson said in the article about Kagey. "The school was involved in an interscholastic athletic program too, which included football, basketball, baseball, tennis, and track... The highlight of the athletic year was the Athletic Field Meet, held on the campus each year, and included all sorts of sports competition." Lawrence Panther talks about daily life in the 1960s at Seneca Indian Boarding School, and notes how the many different sports programs helped him adjust to being away from home. Courtesy Department of the Interior/Bureau of Indian Affairs/Miami Agency/National Archives and Records Administration/Wikimedia Commons This image was most likely taken around 1905 by Charles R. Scott, an employee of the Seneca Indian Boarding School, for Superintendent Horace B. Durant. Baseball was one of the many sports programs offered at the school. Panther was brought to the boarding school after a new admittance policy was passed requiring that Native American students were at least one-quarter Indian, reports Gibson. At that time, most of the students enrolled were Cherokee—173 students out of 273. The Seneca Indian Boarding School closed in 1980. Check out these 12 images from the boarding school. Source: <https://indiancountrymedianetwork.com/history/people/12-images-seneca-indian-boarding-school/>

Documents: Maple Leaf under investigation by AG's Office Elizabeth Murray, Free Press Staff Writer Published 4:58 p.m. ET July 31, 2017 | Updated 10:07 a.m. ET Aug. 1, 2017 PMaple Leaf center filing for bankruptcy CLOSE Court papers show the drug treatment center in Underhill has total liabilities to creditors in excess of $1.1 million. Wochit Buy Photo The Maple Leaf Treatment Center in Underhill on Wednesday, March 1, 2017. The Vermont Attorney General's Office's Medicaid fraud unit is investigating the now closed Maple Leaf Treatment Center, according to court documents filed in U.S. Bankruptcy Court. The state agency wrote in a motion that its investigation is in accordance with the Vermont False Claims Act and regards Maple Leaf's filing of Medicaid claims. As part of the investigation, the Attorney General's Office is trying "to ascertain the amount of damages suffered by the Vermont Medicaid program due to the Debtor's filing of false claims," a motion filed in May stated. VTDigger.org was first to report the existence of the investigation by the Attorney General's Office. The former Underhill drug and alcohol addiction treatment center closed unexpectedly in February and filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy. Maple Leaf had served as one of three residential treatment centers for opiate addiction treatment in the state. Staffing and financing were among a "combination of factors" considered when the board discussed the future of the nonprofit, the board's president, Jeffrey Messina, has said. Court documents filed by the Attorney General's Office in the bankruptcy case state that the former treatment center has been under investigation since at least late February when it filed for bankruptcy. Attempts on Monday to reach Assistant Attorney General Jason Turner, who leads the Medicaid fraud unit, were unsuccessful. Buy Photo The Maple Leaf Treatment Center in Underhill on Wednesday, March 1, 2017. The Attorney General's Office filed documents in the center's bankruptcy case in May to ask for an extension in filing proof of a claim against the estate. State investigators had asked for documents the state needs to "ascertain the precise value of its claim," but said the case's trustee, Douglas Wolinsky, had encountered "certain difficulties" in locating and accessing those documents, the motion stated. Wolinsky, of the law firm Primmer Piper Eggleston & Cramer PC, declined to comment Monday. However, a letter from Wolinsky was included with the state's May request consenting to an extension until either Aug. 1 or 45 days after the Attorney General's Office receives the documents — whichever was earlier. RELATED COVERAGE: Maple Leaf to sell assets at Underhill location Documents: Maple Leaf had to fill 8 positions Maple Leaf Treatment Center files for bankruptcy Doctor: Maple Leaf's closure 'irresponsible' On Monday, the Attorney General's Office asked the court for a second extension, saying investigators received the documents from Wolinsky on July 19, but would need more than 13 days to review the documents. Buy Photo The Maple Leaf Treatment Center in Underhill on Wednesday, March 1, 2017. "The Trustee encountered greater challenges in locating and accessing documentation ... than anticipated," Assistant Attorney General Charity Clark wrote in a motion filed Monday. She added that "given the quantity and nature of the responsive documents," the state and Wolinsky agreed to an extension of the deadline to file a claim until Sept. 22. The judge has not yet ruled on the motion as of 4:15 p.m. on Monday. The treatment center's indefinite closure followed what was described as a temporary 30-day closure during which Maple Leaf planned to restore staffing levels and conduct training. The nonprofit, which was licensed through the state, also ran an outpatient center in Colchester for addicts taking part in medication-assisted treatment. Bankruptcy filings show that Maple Leaf has total liabilities to creditors in excess of $1.1 million. Buy Photo The Maple Leaf Treatment Center in Underhill on Wednesday, March 1, 2017. Contact Elizabeth Murray at 651-4835 or emurray@freepressmedia.com. Follow her on Twitter at @LizMurrayBFP. Source: <http://www.burlingtonfreepress.com/story/news/local/2017/07/31/documents-maple-leaf-under-investigation-ags-office/526443001/>

Closed addiction treatment center investigated for fraud | Bradenton Herald Closed addiction treatment center investigated for fraud burlrlkm The Associated Press August 01, 2017 10:02 AM UNDERHILL, Vt. A now-closed residential addiction treatment center in Vermont is being investigated for possible Medicaid fraud. Court documents filed in U.S. bankruptcy court show the Medicaid fraud unit of the Vermont attorney general's office is investigating Maple Leaf Treatment Center regarding its filing of Medicaid claims. VTDigger.org first reported on the investigation. Maple Leaf's Underhill and Colchester locations closed suddenly early this year. The treatment center filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection in February. The Burlington Free Press reports (<http://bfpne.ws/2uUIQZA>) that it was one of three residential treatment centers for opiate addiction treatment in Vermont. The board's president said staffing and financing were among a mix of factors considered in discussing the future of the nonprofit. Read more here: <http://www.bradenton.com/news/business/article164709237.html#storylink=cpy>

Iowa Girls Sue Over Alleged Abuse at Wisconsin Youth Prison Two Iowa teenagers have filed federal lawsuits alleging they were placed in solitary confinement for months at Wisconsin's troubled youth even after they both tried to kill themselves. Aug. 2, 2017, at 8:38 p.m. MORE LinkedIn StumbleUpon Google + Cancel Iowa Girls Sue Over Alleged Abuse at Wisconsin Youth Prison Share × Share on Facebook Post on Twitter Post to Reddit Email Share in LinkedIn Share on StumbleUpon Share on Google Plus MADISON, Wis. (AP) — Two Iowa teenagers filed federal lawsuits alleging they were placed in solitary confinement for months at Wisconsin's troubled youth prison even after they both tried to kill themselves. One of the girls alleges she placed her head beneath a cot to hurt herself after she became suicidal in solitary confinement, the Wisconsin State Journal reported. A guard then walked on top of the cot in order to tighten it around her neck, her lawsuit alleges. She also claims she didn't get any medical attention was sent back to her cell alone after guards found her unresponsive with a nightgown around her neck in November 2015. The girls were sent to the prison in Iowa that year because Iowa officials had closed a similar facility over allegations of abuse, according to the lawsuits. They were inmates at the prison starting in March and July of 2015 and were held there until February and August of 2016. They were both 16 years old at the time. The girls allege they spent four and five months in solitary and were let out of their cells for two hours a day. They argue their mental health deteriorated during the isolation. The second girl alleged she tried to hang and cut herself and received more time in solitary as punishment. Department of Corrections spokesman Tristan Cook said the agency is reviewing the new lawsuits. The filings are the fourth and fifth lawsuits filed in federal court this year alleging prison staff have been placing inmates in solitary too often and using pepper spray and mechanical restraints too much. A judge earlier this year ordered prison staff to dramatically reduce the use of solitary, pepper spray and shackles. Department of Corrections officials have said prison staff will comply. The FBI is currently investigating conditions at the prison. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker signed a bill Wednesday that makes guards at the prison mandatory child abuse reporters. That status protects them from retaliation for reporting incidents. Source: <https://www.usnews.com/news/best-states/wisconsin/articles/2017-08-02/iowa-girls-sue-over-alleged-abuse-at-wisconsin-youth-prison>

Police report 19 incidents at DHR home for teens Posted by Jason Johnson | Aug 2, 2017 | Bav Briefs | 0 It's been nearly a month since Ragen "River" Freil walked out of a group home in south Mobile County, but while the investigation launched to find him is still active, the 17-year-old is said to be communicating with the caseworkers who originally placed him there. Before Freil left, he was one of several residents at a "transitional age home" on Three Notch Road in Theodore. The 10-bedroom facility currently houses eight young men ages 17 to 20, all of whom are in the custody of the Alabama Department of Human Resources (DHR). On July 8, 2017, Ragen "River" Freil was reported missing by staff members from a group home where he was living in Theodore. (MCSO) The home is staffed and monitored by employees from AltaPointe Health Systems, which operates more than 20 other groups homes licensed through the Alabama Department of Mental Health serving the developmentally and mentally disabled. Unlike those homes, though, the transitional home Freil left last month is unique because it isn't intended for disabled residents. It's also the only facility serving the 17-20 age group within AltaPointe's network across Mobile, Baldwin and Washington counties. Transitional Age Services Coordinator Katherine Rouse said because AltaPointe is contracted to through DHR to run the home, children throughout Alabama may be placed there. "These kids have a variety of backgrounds, but typically, for some reason, they are not able to stay at home. It could be they don't have parents or that their home life was so chaotic DHR had to pull them out," said. "We focus on emotional and behavioral goals, but also educational and vocational goals because they're in this transitional age where their next step needs to be hopefully toward independence." In most situations, Rouse said DHR acts like each residents' parent would at home. Staff members take the boys to school, prepare their daily meals, provide them with transportation and chaperone them when they get haircuts, go shopping or meet a friend at the movies. Those of school age attend Theodore High School, where many have individualized education plans their case manager works with the school staff to implement. Currently, four residents are seniors, two are pursuing their GED and two have already graduated from high school. Even though the residents are in DHR custody, they aren't court ordered to live at the transitional age home. Rouse made it clear that living there is voluntary and said AltaPointe's policy forbids staff members from physically restraining residents. However, the policy can make things tricky if a resident decides he wants to leave. "If one of them says, 'Well, I'm leaving,' we will try to talk them out of it, but if they try to leave anyway, we're not going to tackle them or hold them down or anything like that," Rouse said. "They have choices." Despite those choices, when residents leave without supervision, it's immediately reported to local authorities, and according to the Mobile County Sheriff's Office, deputies have responded to 19 incidents at 9151 Three Notch Road over the past 12 months. Of those, 10 were related to missing persons, and Assistant Director of Children's Intensive Services Lorian Kriner told Lagniappe that half of those involved a single resident whom she described as "an adolescent boy who is no longer in the program." "They're teenage boys, there's going to be trouble and they're going to clash with other residents, but it doesn't happen often," Kriner said. "Ninety percent of [calls last year] are just kids that left the property because they wanted to go somewhere like Wal-Mart and we couldn't take them because it isn't in the day's schedule so they're going to walk. And they come back, but because of our policy, we do have to notify authorities, unfortunately." While those incidents occur, Kriner said the staff tries to accommodate as many requests from residents as possible, sometimes calling in additional supervisors if two groups are interested in different off-site activities on the same day. Because DHR cases aren't disclosed to the public, staff members declined to address Freil's case directly. However, Captain Paul Burch said an MCSO detective located Freil July 31, and he has since been placed back in the custody of social services. Burch said Freil had "been communicating with his DHR case worker" during his absence, adding that, even as he continued to be listed as a runaway, authorities hadn't suspected he was in any danger during the majority of the time he was missing from the home. Runaways aren't the only cases reported by MCSO, though. Police have also been called to the house for animal nuisance, harassment, attempted suicide, medical emergencies, an individual with a weapon, property damage and domestic violence since July 2016. In 2015, an 18-year-old resident from Cullman was charged with misdemeanor assault following an incident at the home. The same resident was later involved in a separate altercation with guards at Mobile County Metro Jail that left him paralyzed. Despite those incidents, Children's Outpatient Services Director Olivia Nettles said there are plenty of success stories. She called the AltaPointe facility a "therapeutic home," and said when minor issues arise among residents the staff tries to address them constructively. "If there is a fight or some kind of a disagreement, we try to take that as an opportunity to help the kids work through it in an appropriate way," Nettles said. "I'm proud of this program because this isn't often an easy age group to deal with, and we've got a wonderful staff who really care and who really want these boys to succeed, and they go the extra mile to do that." Nettles said there are at least two residential staff members on the premises at all times, though the number increases as caseworkers and therapists visit the home for scheduled activities. Sabrina Davis is one of the members of the residential staff, one who can sometimes spend an entire 12-hour shift with residents. Davis said she sees her role as more than just providing basic needs; she hopes to "give them [the] love" that other children receive at home, too. "I'm basically the cook in the house, so they're really amiable with me, and they're thankful," Davis said. "Everybody has good days and bad days. That's life ... but they're good boys." Updated at 2 p.m., Aug. 3, to include new information about the missing person's case involving Ragen "River" Freil. Source: <https://lagniappemobile.com/police-report-19-incidents-dhr-home-teens/>

Eldora boys school accused of using isolation, restraints on troubled boys State school accused of using isolation, restraints on troubled boys who need treatment Tony Leys, tleys@dmreg.com Published 3:59 p.m. CT Aug. 7, 2017 | Updated 4:17 p.m. CT Aug. 7, 2017 Eldora boys school mistreatment allegation... CLOSE Disability Rights Iowa says the Boys State Training School has overused isolation and restraints on teens for misbehavior, which the school denies. Wochit "The wrap" is a restraint device used at Iowa's Boys State Training School at Eldora. (Photo: Disability Rights Iowa) 14 Iowa's main institution for troubled boys often puts teens with mental illness in isolation or straps them to beds in ways that are banned in most similar facilities, a new report alleges. The scathing report on the State Training School for Boys at Eldora, titled "Unlicensed and Unlawful," was released Monday by Disability Rights Iowa. The group's allegations about mistreatment at the state's Toledo facility for troubled girls helped spark that center's closure in 2014. The Boys State Training School at Eldora houses more than 100 teens who have been found to be delinquent in juvenile court. "There's a view of it as a punishment facility, but the statute says it's for treatment and rehabilitation," said Jane Hudson, executive director of Disability Rights Iowa. Hudson's group is not seeking an immediate closure of the Eldora facility but is demanding major changes. The school's superintendent, Mark Day, strenuously defended the program in an interview Monday. He said most of the school's residents proved too angry and violent for other programs. "They sent them to us because they could not manage their behaviors," he said. "We take kids they can't handle." Disability Rights Iowa defends the legal rights of people with disabilities, including mental-health issues. The new report says two-thirds of the Eldora facility's residents are on psychiatric medications. But the school has scant mental-health services, and it relies on seclusion rooms and physical restraints to control boys who act out, the report says. "Sadly, this continues to victimize youth who have high rates of childhood victimization," it says. The report's findings include: Three-quarters of the facility's residents have been placed in seclusion at some point. Six percent of those incidents lasted longer than 24 hours, which violates national standards, the report says. Staff members often restrain boys with an apparatus called "the wrap." The report describes the device as "a restraint bed with a strap for each arm and leg, and then a Velcro body wrap that is applied over the full body. This has been used multiple times on students with high mental-health needs and well-documented histories of childhood trauma instead of providing therapeutic interventions." The Eldora school is not required to have a state license, which means it is not subject to regular inspection by the Iowa Department of Inspections and Appeals. Licenses are required for most similar programs, such as Polk County's juvenile detention facility and state institutions for people with mental illness or intellectual disabilities. Under the licensing rules, such facilities would be fined and could be suspended if they used physical restraints on children the way the Eldora facility does, Disability Rights Iowa lawyers said. The school's shorthanded mental-health staff includes a full-time counselor who is referred to as a psychologist, even though he is not licensed as one. Disability Rights Iowa is a federally chartered group that can file lawsuits to try to force changes in how people with disabilities are treated. It recently filed a federal lawsuit against Iowa's governor and Department of Human Services for cuts in in-home services to disabled Iowans since the state hired private companies to run its Medicaid program. The new report says the group might file another lawsuit if the state doesn't improve treatment of boys at the Eldora facility. A building at the Boys State Training School at Eldora. (Photo: Disability Rights Iowa) The school was founded in the 1880s. Its residents average 16.7 years old and stay for an average of 10 months, the department says. Day, the superintendent, said Monday he agrees with Disability Rights Iowa that mental-health services should be improved at the facility. "Like every other program in this state — and I would hazard to guess every other program similar to this in the country — we would love to have more resources," he said. But mental-health professionals are scarce, and so is money, he said. The school, like most other state programs, faced a significant cut this year, losing about $800,000 out of last year's $12 million budget. Department spokeswoman Amy McCoy said administrators will try to implement the budget cut without harming services. Day defended the school's use of "the wrap." He called it "a swaddling device," with no sharp edges, metal or leather. He said staff members try to minimize the need for restraints, but they use the cloth and canvas device in a way that's safer than trying to hold aggressive teens. He added that some out-of-control students ask to be placed in "the wrap" to calm down. Buy Photo Mark Day leads a tour of the auto-shop at the Boys State Training School at Eldora in November 2016. (Photo: Tony Leys/Des Moines Register) "It is a de-escalation chamber for them," he said. "They don't trust themselves. They know their propensity, their proclivity for violence, and they engage in that. We've had numerous students frequently say, 'I'm going to keep this up until you put me in the wrap.'" The wrap is generally used for 20 to 60 minutes, Day said. Its use did not draw objections from experts from the University of Iowa and Drexel University in Pennsylvania, he added. Nathan Kirstein, a lawyer for Disability Rights Iowa, countered Monday that Eldora students his group interviewed had been put into the wrap unwillingly. He added staff could use other measures, such as weighted blankets, to soothe agitated students without restraining them. Staff members at the Boys State Training School removed the minute and hour hands from this clock as a joke, to indicate time doesn't exist there. Disability Rights Iowa cites the clock as a sign of the staff's disregard for students' experiences. (Photo: Disability Rights Iowa) Day also denied the allegation his school overuses seclusion of students. Most such sessions last less than an hour and they are only invoked when necessary to calm outraged teens, he said. Day acknowledged that the counselor the Eldora school's "psychologist" does not have a state psychology license. He said the employee has 30 years of experience and has a master's degree in psychology. A spokeswoman for the Iowa Department of Health confirmed later Monday that state employees are exempt from requirements that they have doctorates and psychologists' licenses in order to legally call themselves psychologists. In his defense of the school, Day emphasized how serious the students' behavioral problems can be. They include teens who have assaulted, robbed, sexually assaulted or even killed other people, he said. "I've got students here convicted of murder, manslaughter, aggravated manslaughter," he said. "I've got 20 or 30 with charges of sexual offending. I've got weapons charges, gangbangers, dozens of convictions for robbery, many, many aggravated assaults and assault with injury, and assault against a police officer." The program's students typically have failed in eight to 10 other programs before being court-ordered into the Eldora facility, Day said. The school, which is not fenced, offers classes and training. Students learn skills, such as welding, carpentry and baking, and they can earn high-school diplomas, he said. "We keep them safe. We give them a successful discharge," he said. "We keep them from running away, we them from hurting themselves, and we keep them from hurting others." Day said if legislators required the Eldora school to comply with state licensing requirements, they would have to pay for significant changes on its campus. One of the main changes would be to stop having up to 30 students sleep in a large, open room, he said. That setup helps the staff keep students safe but would not be allowed under current licensing rules. Department of Human Services officials noted the facility is accredited by the American Correctional Association and can be investigated by state inspectors if problems are reported. Disability Rights Iowa lawyer contend the national accreditation is "toothless," and they want the school to undergo regular inspections by independent state experts who oversee most similar programs in Iowa. Disability Rights Iowa lawyers said many of the students suffered abuse or other traumas as children, which had not been sufficiently addressed. Many of their criminal charges stemmed from times when they lashed out in previous treatment programs, said Emily Ehlers, a staff lawyer for the group. "These kids are struggling with mental-health issues," she said. "Law enforcement looks at this as a behavior issue — that these kids are trouble." The group's allegations include that students who lack money are prevented from making long-distance calls to their parents or other relatives, whose support they need. Day denied the allegation. He said students can call home at least every other week at the school's expense, and they are provided with free paper, envelopes and stamps to write letters home. In the long run, Disability Rights Iowa wants to see the state strengthen programs in the community so they can handle all the students now at the Eldora school. But the group doesn't want to see the state abruptly close the Eldora facility the way former Gov. Terry Branstad closed the Toledo school for troubled girls or state mental hospitals at Clarinda and Mount Pleasant. "We don't want a knee-jerk political reaction that leads to chaos," Kirstein said. Disability Rights Iowa report on the Boys State Training School at Eldora by dmronline on Scribd Source: <http://www.desmoinesregister.com/story/news/health/2017/08/07/eldora-boys-school-accused-using-isolation-restraints-troubled-boys/544892001/>

Report critical of methods used at Boys State Training School in Eldora August 8, 2017 By Pat Curtis A report from a nonprofit law center claims the Boys State Training School is overusing seclusion rooms and restraints in dealing with troubled youth who are placed at the facility in Eldora. Nathan Kirstein, an attorney for Disability Rights Iowa, says there is no independent State licensure or oversight of the Boys State Training School. "Right off the bat, we have issue with that because why is it that DHS (Department of Human Services) gets to exempt themselves from that? They don't have to have regulations, oversight or licensure," Kirstein says. The Training School, operated by the DHS, currently houses around 120 teenage boys. Kirstein says they are sometimes confined to seclusion rooms for over 24 hours at a time. "No other facility in Iowa is allowed to do that, 24 hours is the max," Kirstein says. "In fact, in detention facilities, after you go over 12 hours, you need a court order, and you have to notify the juvenile court officer and the defense attorney." Wraps. The report also takes issue with what Kirstein calls "the wrap" — a bed that involves straps placed over the arms and legs. The school's superintendent defended use of the bed to the Des Moines Register, calling it a "swaddling device." Kirstein says the wrap is not therapeutic and a weighted blanket would be more appropriate. "If you're putting someone in the wrap, it is the staff and others who have the control of when you go in and when you get out of that," Kirstein says. "What's important to recognize about that is locus of control is very important when you're talking about youth who've had adverse childhood experiences — meaning they've experienced early childhood trauma — abuse, neglect, and particularly sexual abuse." Disability Rights Iowa is not calling for the closure of the Boys State Training School, but Kirstein suggests youth with mental health needs should not be housed there. The report claims about two-thirds of the teens at the school have been diagnosed as having a serious mental illness. "We hope this report also points out the gaps in services along the way for these youth who end up at the Boys State Training School. Not every youth that ends up there should be there necessarily. They're more suited for another placement, but no other places will take them in Iowa," Kirstein says. According to Kirstein, Disability Rights Iowa will consider filing a lawsuit in federal court against the Governor, the DHS Director and other state officials, "if they do not remedy the problems identified in the report." Amy McCorty the spokesperson for DHS, released this statement: Juvenile courts order youth with the most serious criminal offenses to the Iowa State Training School for Boys at Eldora. Criminal offenses that result in boys being ordered to the State Training School include assault, theft, robbery, weapons charges, sexual assault, attempted murder, and murder. The State Training School provides supervision and support to keep more than 250 youth each year safe from themselves and others, protect the community, keep staff safe, and rehabilitate youth to reduce the likelihood of re-offense. · The State Training School is independently accredited by the American Correctional Association (100 percent compliance), met or exceeded all Prison Rape Elimination Act requirements. · Eldora reports all suspected incidents of abuse to the Department of Inspection and Appeals for review and follow-up. · The academic school is accredited by the Department of Education. The State Training School has arranged and welcomed visits from a juvenile justice expert, psychiatrists from the University of Iowa Hospital and Clinics, school professionals from Oregon and Florida, and a Department of Education mentor. Visitors have high praise for the facility especially noting its high caliber leadership; excellent, dedicated, caring staff; and well cared for junior college type campus with no fences. The State Training School has goals for continuous quality improvement and more mental health resources that are similar to our partners, but the timelines may not align as we balance resources during tight budget times. DHS report on the school: Heilbrun Report PDF Source: <http://www.radioiowa.com/2017/08/08/report-critical-of-methods-used-at-boys-state-training-school-in-eldora/>

Ex-boarding school head gets 48 years for molesting student The former headmaster of a Carlsbad military boarding school was found guilty Monday on six counts of molesting a cadet at the campus nearly 20 years ago, but acquitted on five other charges involving the same student. The former headmaster of a Carlsbad military boarding school was found guilty Monday on six counts of molesting a cadet at the campus nearly 20 years ago, but acquitted on five other charges involving the same student. Teri Figueroa Contact Reporter The former headmaster of a Carlsbad military boarding school was sentenced Monday to 48 years in prison for repeatedly molesting a ninth-grade cadet starting in 1999. It was the maximum punishment for Jeffrey Barton, 59, who proclaimed his innocence during his sentencing hearing in a Vista courtroom, saying his accuser had lied and that he was a victim of a "witch hunt." "I cannot feel remorse for crimes I never committed," Barton told Superior Court Judge Harry Elias during a roughly 30-minute statement in which he tried to rebut minutia of case and said the accusations were prompted by people "gunning for money." "God knows I didn't do the crimes," Barton said. P After the hearing, Deputy District Attorney Patricia Lavermicocca, who had asked for the maximum term, said Barton's lengthy prison sentence "is what he deserves to bring justice to these kids who have suffered for many years." "He may want to deny it for the rest of his life, but we know what happened," the prosecutor said. "Forty-eight years is a small measure of justice." Charlie Neuman Defendant Jeffrey Barton argues his innocence in his conviction for molesting a cadet at Carlsbad's Army and Navy Academy during his sentencing hearing at the Vista courthouse Monday. At left is his lawyer Sherry Stone. Defendant Jeffrey Barton argues his innocence in his conviction for molesting a cadet at Carlsbad's Army and Navy Academy during his sentencing hearing at the Vista courthouse Monday. At left is his lawyer Sherry Stone. (Charlie Neuman) Barton did not react when he heard the length of his sentence. He will not be eligible for release until he is in his 90s. In June, a jury found Barton guilty of molesting the Army and Navy Academy student from 1999 to 2001, both on campus and during out-of-town trips. The victim said the abuse started when he was 14 and a cadet at the seaside academy where Barton lived and taught. The accuser did not disclose the alleged abuse until 2013, but the prosecution offered corroborating evidence, including contemporaneous suspicions from adults at the school, and other accusers dating back decades at different schools. Barton was not charged with molesting accusers from out-of-state schools; however, trial testimony from two of them was offered as corroboration. In handing down the sentence Monday, Elias said Barton is "a serious danger," and that a key aggravating factor for him was Barton's position of trust as a faculty member and a mentor — not just for the accuser from the Carlsbad school, but also for two other men who said Barton had molested them decades ago. "I believe there is evidence that shows that these offenses were committed in a serial manner over a significant period of time," the judge said. Related Ex-headmaster convicted of molestation After the allegations from the former Carlsbad cadet arose in 2013, Barton resigned after working 18 years at the private college-preparatory academy, the only military boarding school in California. In his final year at the academy, Barton had served as head of schools, which is the administrator in charge of academic and residential programs. An Army and Navy Academy spokesperson did not immediately respond to requests for comment following Barton's sentencing. When Barton was convicted in June, the school noted that his actions had happened long ago, under a different school administration and board of trustees. Barton's conviction came in his second trial. In 2015, another jury deadlocked on the charges involving the main accuser, known in court as John Doe. The victim, Doe, was in court and did not speak during Monday's hearing, but rather submitted a statement read aloud by prosecutor Lavermicocca. The victim wrote that Barton "sexually abused me many times, taking advantage of my youth, inexperience and vulnerability, forever altering the trajectory of my life." "He is a danger to society, and should spend the remainder of his adult years in prison," the statement read. Barton used his own statement to the judge as a chance to rail against his accusers, saying they had lied and that Doe was chasing money. The former cadet is suing Barton and the school. Trial is set for March. Later, as Barton was led from the courtroom at the end of the hearing, he yelled out "Enjoy your millions, bud." (Earlier this summer, the law firm representing Doe had represented another former cadet who had accused a different former Army and Navy employee of wrongdoing. The North County jury awarded that ex-cadet $1.9 million.) Before the current case, Carlsbad police had twice before investigated Barton, once in 2000 and again in 2010, after adults reported suspicious behavior with particular cadets. In each instance, the cadets — including Doe — denied abuse, and the investigations fizzled. When Doe came forward in 2013, his delayed disclosure prompted a new police investigation, one in which six more former students from boarding schools in a total of three states came forward with allegations that Barton had abused them decades earlier. Among the new accusers was a man who said he had never spoken of the abuse until he read of Barton's arrest in October 2013 online. The man, now in his 40s, testified that he threw up, then drove home from work to tell his wife what had happened to him at a South Carolina boarding school in the 1980s. He later paid his own way to testify against Barton. The other out-of-state accuser said Barton had molested him during an overnight trip in the early 1990s, and that he had reported the incident to his mother the next day. That report eventually led Barton to leave a Tennessee school, but he was not criminally charged. In the current case, Barton was charged only with molestation involving former cadets at the Carlsbad school. At the end of his first trial, in fall 2015, a North County jury cleared Barton on four charges alleging he drugged and molested two middle-school cadets during a 1997 ski trip. But the jury deadlocked as to all counts related to Doe. Barton was retried this year solely on the charges involving Doe. Doe testified that Barton began molesting him not long after his mother shipped him off to the Carlsbad military boarding school in 1999, with promises the boy could come home if he did not misbehave during the school year. The accuser, who had been small, scrawny and reportedly bullied by other cadets — said that Barton had groomed him with gifts and special attention, and said that Barton threatened to tell his mother he was making trouble if he did not comply with the molestations. Elias, in explaining his findings behind the hefty sentence Monday, said that the "psychological injury" that John Doe suffered showed "callousness" from Barton. "I think the psychological impact of the relationship between Mr. Barton and the victim is tantamount to at least a psychological threat," the judge said. On Monday, Elias also heard from the two out-of-state accusers via video phone calls. Both asked for Barton to receive a lengthy sentence, and both spoke of guilt for either for not coming forward or for not pressing the matter further many years ago. "Other children were hurt because I didn't stand up," said the man who had attended the Tennessee school. Barton's second trial was not without controversy. During deliberations, one of the jurors was removed from the panel after other jurors accused her of refusing to deliberate. After an alternate juror was in place, the jury reached its verdicts, finding Barton guilty of six counts of molestation, and acquitting him of five other counts. Barton has indicated that he will appeal his conviction. Source: <http://www.sandiegouniontribune.com/communities/north-county/>

Boarding school finds evidence of sexual misconduct by former headmaster - CBS News Boarding school finds evidence of sexual misconduct by former headmaster The Willis Northampton School Google Maps 4 Comment Share Tweet Stumble Email EASTHAMPTON, Mass. -- A private boarding school in Massachusetts says it has uncovered credible reports of sexual misconduct by a former headmaster that involved students. Masslive.com reports that Williston Northampton School in Easthampton sent a letter to the school community this week that said it had four firsthand reports that former headmaster Robert Ward "violated the standards of professional boundaries" during his tenure from 1972 until 1979. Williston Northampton began investigating after another private school -- The Loomis Chaffee School in Windsor, Connecticut -- said it had uncovered credible sexual assault reports involving Ward that dated to the 1960s. Ward died in 1986. The letter from current Williston Northampton headmaster Robert Hill III and trustees President John Hazen White Jr. said further details will not be released in deference to privacy concerns. Source: <http://www.cbsnews.com/news/boarding-school-finds-evidence-of-sexual-misconduct-by-former-headmaster/>

Employee of group home for troubled girls charged with sexual assault of resident, contributing to delinquency of a minor Employee of group home for troubled girls charged with sexual assault of resident, contributing to delinquency of a minor Jesse Garza, Milwaukee Journal Sentinel Published 7:22 p.m. CT Aug. 9, 2017 | Updated 10:24 a.m. CT Aug. 10, 2017 Are the scales of justice equal when it comes to adjudication of traffic tickets?(Photo: Creatas / GETTY IMAGES) 1 CONNECT TWEETLINKEDINEMAILMORE An employee at a Wauwatosa group home for troubled girls is accused of sexually assaulting a resident after helping her run away from the facility. Anthony D. Johnson, 27, is charged with second-degree sexual assault of a child younger than 16, a felony, and contributing to the delinquency of a minor, a misdemeanor, according to the complaint. Johnson helped the 15-year-old girl run away from Milwaukee Academy, 9501 W. Watertown Plank Road, May 5 and allowed her to stay at his home, according to the complaint. He got the girl high on liquor and marijuana cookies and had sex with her multiple times between May 5 and May 23, when she was recovered by her family, according to the complaint, which does not describe the nature of Johnson's employment. Milwaukee Academy is a residential treatment center for adolescent girls, according to its website. Treatment services at the facility include, "recovery from/prevention of sexual exploitation," according to the website. The facility is operated by Clinicare, 11919 W. Bluemound Road in Wauwatosa, which was closed Wednesday evening. Johnson was in custody Wednesday at the Milwaukee County Jail, with his bail set at $5,000, according to jail records. Source: <http://www.jsonline.com/story/news/2017/08/09/employee-group-home-troubled-girls-charged-sexual-assault-resident-contributing-delinquency-minor/554489001/>

Danger in R.I. group homes Providence-- Aug. 9, 2017---- At least three times in the last five months staff decisions at state-run group homes left children in their care hospitalized, exploited or endangered, a ProJo investigation has found The Providence Journal Hide caption A redacted report by the state Office of the Child Advocate to the Department of Children, Youth & Families on an incident July 28, when a resident of a Providence group home suffered paralysis and required emergency spine surgery after taking a fall during a reportedly unauthorized outing to a trampoline park. Child welfare officials have questioned why the 17-year-old boy was at the children's park, where he reportedly had been injured once before; the home lacked permission from his mother or a state supervisor. [The Providence Journal / Sandor Bodo] Hide caption 246 Sackett St., Providence: Last March a woman told police her 16-year-old foster daughter was missing. A worker from this Whitmarsh Corp. group home had picked her up in North Providence and brought her back to the home, where she spent the night with her 20-year-old boyfriend. [The Providence Journal / Kris Craig] Hide caption 35 Amey Drive, Pawtucket: A former worker at this group home, run by Blackstone Valley Youth and Family Collaborative, is charged with sex trafficking a 17-year-old girl in state care. [The Providence Journal / Kris Craig] Hide caption DCYF Director Trista Piccola, left, listens to Deb Buffi, head of contracts and compliance, talk about problems at state-regulated group homes. [The Providence Journal Steve Szydlowski] Hide caption Laura Kiesler oversees the Resource Families Unit with DCYF. [The Providence Journal Steve Szydlowski] Hide caption 164 Massachusetts Ave., Providence: A 17-year-old boy staying in this Whitmarsh group home underwent emergency spine surgery after injuring himself during a reportedly unauthorized outing at a trampoline park. [The Providence Journal / Kris Craig] Hide caption 120 Girard Ave., Newport: During a late-night argument, a former worker in this Child and Family Services group home allegedly ordered two teenage female residents outside, where they were assaulted by the his girlfriend. [The Providence Journal / Kris Craig] Hide caption The recommendations by the state Office of the Child Advocate to the Department of Children, Youth & Families about one of the state's group-home operators notes that "[Whitmarsh] staff admittedly falsified documentation and left youth alone and unattended for extended periods of time and relied on a maintenance worker to provide staff coverage." As a response in cases of staff members assaulting residents, the report says, "the Whitmarsh administration simply moves the perpetrator to a different location." [The Providence Journal / Sandor Bodo] Hide caption Providence-- Aug. 9, 2017---- Laura Kiesler, left, who oversees the Resource Families Unit with DCYF talks with the department's director, Trista Piccola, about problems at state-regulated group homes. [The Providence Journal / Steve Szydlowski] Hide caption At least three times in the last five months staff decisions at state-run group homes left children in their care hospitalized, exploited or endangered, a ProJo investigation has found The Providence Journal By Tom Mooney / and Jennifer Bogdan, / Journal Staff Writers Saturday Posted Aug 12, 2017 at 4:14 PM Share Prostitution. Assaults arranged by a staff member. A clandestine overnight visit by a teenage girlfriend as the police searched for her. A paralyzing injury. Investigators say they've found all this and more connected to group homes — places where Rhode Island is supposed to provide refuge to young people it has removed from unfit living conditions. At least four times in the last five months, workers at state-regulated group homes took actions that left young people in their care hospitalized, endangered or exploited, a Providence Journal investigation has found. In two cases, group-home employees attempted to cover up slack supervision and management with forged log books or falsified statements, investigators reported. In one Pawtucket home, an employee used the agency van to help run a teenage sex-trafficking operation, prosecutors allege. In addition: By the numbers 194: Children, up to age 21, currently living in state-regulated group homes 41: Group homes hosting these wards of the state $29,644,257: Cost of Rhode Island group homes last fiscal year $90 to $420: Cost, per day, per child, depending on services they need Source: R.I. Department of Children, Youth & Families * At a Providence home, a worker drove the company van to North Providence to taxi a 16-year-old girl with autism — who had been reported missing to police — back to the all-male group home. When child-welfare investigators visited the home where the girl stayed the night, they found the building reeking of marijuana, a bedroom littered with garbage and condoms, little food, and a maintenance man left in charge. * A third incident happened July 28, when a resident of another Providence group home suffered paralysis and required emergency spine surgery after he fell during an outing to a trampoline park. Related content 'We need families' — R.I. seeks foster homes for children + video August 12, 2017 Group-home troubles add to DCYF's woes August 12, 2017 Alan Rosenberg: Sleepless nights over DCYF August 12, 2017 Child welfare officials have questioned why the 17-year-old boy was at the children's park where he reportedly had been injured once before; the home lacked permission from his mother or a state supervisor. * The latest incident occurred last Monday, Aug. 7, at a Newport group home for girls. During an argument at about 3:30 a.m., a man working at the Girard Avenue home challenged two residents to a fight outside, investigators say. The girls went outside and the worker's girlfriend emerged from a car and assaulted them, investigators say. Both girls suffered minor injuries and were taken to the hospital. Then the worker quit. Meanwhile, all four homes remain open under the auspices of the Department of Children, Youth & Families. The DCYF, however, has stopped placing children at two of the group homes, both run by the Providence-based Whitmarsh Corp. The Providence Journal interviewed employees of the group homes, and reviewed court and police documents as well as reports from the state's Child Advocate office, which serves as an independent watchdog for children in state care. Three DCYF officials, including Director Trista Piccola, declined in an interview to address many of the specific details in this story, citing ongoing investigations and client confidentiality. But Piccola said Wednesday that while the DCYF was no longer placing children in Whitmarsh homes, those already there would remain unless the department felt the children were endangered. "If we believed any of the kids placed with Whitmarsh today, sitting there right now, were unsafe, they would have been removed," she said. That goes for children placed in any group home, she said. "If we believe a child is unsafe, they're not staying there. I want to be really, really clear about that... If we feel the kid's safety can be maintained there, then we will continue to work with" the group homes. Across the state, 194 children of all ages and up to 21, currently reside in 41 state-regulated group homes. Many have complex behavioral and mental-health challenges. Many are traumatized. In the last fiscal year, the DCYF says, Rhode Island spent $29,644,257 serving group home children (a combination of state and federal dollars). The daily cost per resident ranges from $89.92 to $420 depending on the level of services needed. These living arrangements are supposed to provide more stability and safety than the conditions from which they were removed. In an interview, the state's child advocate, Jennifer Griffith, said: "It is unacceptable that children are being removed from their homes due to varied circumstances with the promise of a safer, more therapeutic environment, only to be placed in substandard group homes riddled with drug use, improper supervision, criminal activity, inferior housing conditions, lack of appropriate support and mental-health treatment." The Providence cases The cases of the missing 16-year-old girl and the injured 17-year-old boy involved group homes run by Whitmarsh, which has been providing housing for children in state care for 45 years. (The Journal is not naming any group-home residents in this story.) Beyond the issue of safety, both cases raised concerns with investigators from the Office of the Child Advocate about the integrity of record-keeping in the homes: they allege that Whitmarsh employees doctored log entries of resident activities after they were called to produce them and also supplied false statements. Griffith said her office "remains extremely concerned with the [Whitmarsh] administrative team, documentation, lack of documentation and the validity of any and all reports." A child advocate report says that when investigators initially asked for documents relating to what happened to the injured boy, Laura Hay, residential director for Whitmarsh Corp, blamed missing entries for July 28 in the home's log book on a poor copying job. (A group home's log book is supposed to track all residents' and workers' whereabouts and activities.) But in reviewing a second copy of the log that Hay sent to the advocate's office, "It was glaringly evident," a child advocate investigator wrote, "the dates were hand-written in today, August 1, 2017, along with the numbering of pages. None of which was evident in the first set of documents sent to this office." The advocate's report also criticized Whitmarsh workers for filing reports days after the boy's injury even though they were not witnesses to the incident. In an interview, Hay refused to discuss the allegations of forged logs and false reports, citing client confidentiality. "Sometimes things do come up," Hay said at her office on North Main Street, Providence. "But our agency is completely committed to our children and will do whatever is best for our children to ensure they're receiving the best services possible." On the March night that a woman reported to police that her 16-year-old foster daughter was missing, a veteran staff worker at Whitmarsh's group home on Sackett Street, Providence, had picked up the girl in the agency's van at a North Providence coffee shop parking lot around 8:30 p.m. and brought her to the group home to visit her 20-year-old boyfriend. As police in several communities searched for her, the girl spent the night in the group home. The staff worker later told a supervisor he had spoken to the girl's mother and expected she was going to pick up her daughter at the home, documents show. But child advocate investigators learned — and reported to DCYF officials — that the worker never spoke to the girl's mother, never checked the young man's bedroom, as required, to make sure she had left — and that the home's log book had no entries at all for that day. The 16-year-old returned to her foster mother's home, incoherent, three days later. An ambulance transported her to the hospital for suspected drug and alcohol abuse, as well as for being off her prescribed medication. Upon learning what had happened, the girl's foster mother was "extremely upset that a grown man would pick up a juvenile female without permission and bring her to an apartment and leave her unsupervised with a 20-year-old man," reads one report. Meanwhile, upset by the chain of events, the girl's boyfriend left the group home without permission. When he returned, he, too, was transported to the hospital for possible drug and alcohol abuse. Whitmarsh, which specializes in behavioral and special needs and transgender youth, fired the employee of 30 years who transported the 16-year-old girl to the Sackett Street group home, documents show. That worker declined to comment when reached by The Journal. Documents show that the DCYF inspected the group home a week after the girl went missing and noted numerous violations regarding safety, food supplies, cleanliness and drug use. The Pawtucket case: sex trafficking. A third group home, run by Pawtucket-based Blackstone Valley Youth and Family Collaborative, which also contracts with the DCYF, is part of a federal criminal investigation. An employee, Reysean Williams, 27, of Pawtucket, was charged in March with sex trafficking a 17-year-old girl in state care. At the time of the arrest, a DCYF spokeswoman told The Journal that the incident wasn't related to Williams' work at Blackstone. But a federal prosecutor described Williams in court documents as a ringleader of a prostitution enterprise who used the group home's van to collect money from young women who were being prostituted. Williams, along with Leandro "Leo" Gomes, 18, of Providence, allegedly booked hotel rooms in Rhode Island, Massachusetts and New York and advertised young women for prostitution online. Dan Brito, executive director of the Blackstone group home agency, said he fired Williams after the sex-trafficking allegation arose. But in an interview, Brito said the incident had not led to any new policy procedures at the home. "Honestly, I'm not sure what we could have done to foresee that happening," Brito said. Home workers have access to the vans to transport residents to work, school and social gatherings. A worker can stop in the course of the day for a meal or an errand, he said. Though the incident is "shocking and disappointing," Brito said he can't control "what's in someone's mind and heart." "The folks I've spoken with at DCYF, they're like, 'Dan, this is not something anyone can fix. It's circumstances you find yourself in.'" When the charges were filed against Williams in April, Brito told The Journal: "It's sad that we have people in this field who engage in this behavior." Brito said he hired Williams, who had passed criminal background checks, about nine months ago on the referral of his niece. She was dating Williams, he said. Standard group-home workers who provide only supervision and no actual services to children are not licensed social workers, the DCYF's Piccola said. But many undergo training on how to manage behavior and de-escalate tense situations, said Marty Sinnott, the CEO of Child and Family Services. Child and Family Services operates six group homes in Rhode Island — including the Newport home where last week a staff worker "miserably failed in his responsibilities," said Sinnott. The Newport case: Arranged assault. Police detectives are still investigating the incident that began early Monday morning when the house supervisor, whom Sinnott said was hired about 18 months ago, began arguing with two teenage girl residents. The argument had carried out into the street where the house worker challenged the two girls, both about 15 years old, to a fight. Investigators say he apparently had arranged for his girlfriend — to confront the girls once outside. In the scuffle, both girls suffered scratches and abrasions, Sinnott said, but no major injuries. "I'm angry that someone employed by us would treat kids in this manner," Sinnott said, adding the man probably would have been suspended or fired had he not quit. "This was bad behavior on the part of staff, not the kids." While DCYF officials won't talk about the specifics of these incidents, Piccola said far too many children are in group homes in Rhode Island, an "overused" system that she says costs taxpayers millions of dollars each year and yet too often fails to adequately prepare troubled youth for successful futures. "Long-term residential and group care for kids is really not what's best for them," she said. "It doesn't help them launch successfully into adulthood." tmooney@providencejournal.com

Emotional abuse substantiated at Catholic Charities group home Emotional abuse substantiated at Catholic Charities group home Stephanie Dickrell, sdickrell@stcloudtimes.com Published 3:47 p.m. CT Aug. 12, 2017 | Updated 9:41 a.m. CT Aug. 13, 2017 Skip in Skip x Embed x Share CLOSE According to most recent CDC statistics, an estimated 1 in 4 children in America experience maltreatment at some point in their lives. Here is what to do if you suspect child abuse and how to report it. USA Today Network, Stephanie Dickrell Steve Pareja is the executive director of Catholic Charities of the Diocese of St. Cloud. (Photo: Courtesy of Dianne Towalski and Catholic Charities of the Diocese of St. Cloud) 221 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN 4 COMMENT EMAIL MORE A state agency has substantiated claims of emotional abuse at a Catholic Charities group home in Paynesville, it said in a recently released report. The Department of Human Services determined a staffer's behavior in incidents earlier this summer constituted emotional abuse and maltreatment. The staffer was accused of mocking a vulnerable adult and sharing video of the adult on Snapchat, both of which are violations of privacy protections and the nonprofit's policies. In a statement released last week, Catholic Charities of the Diocese of St. Cloud said that not only did the employee violate policy and statute, "they violated Catholic Charities' mission of enhancing human dignity." The department's report says the staffer told the vulnerable adult to pee in his or her pants, when they indicated they needed to use the bathroom. The same staffer said having that person in the house was "like having a dog in the house." The staffer also took a video of the adult dancing and asked the adult to make the sound a cat makes, and then sent the video on Snapchat. The department relied on interviews with staff and on a text message sent on June 9 by accused staffer to another Catholic Charities employee. (Note: The gender of the vulnerable adult is not indicated by the Department of Human Services to preserve confidentiality, so the singular "they" is used.) OMG...I love being here at work. It's better than cable. (The vulnerable adult) was sitting in (their) chair listening to (their) book and then (they) started chatting away while (another client) was watching TV. (They) kept saying (they) had to pee so I told (them) to pee in (their) pants and (they) did, because (they) couldn't hold it. But (the vulnerable adult) kept talking away and (another client) was like shut up you stupid bitch. (The vulnerable adult) got all pissed and started swearing at (the client). And then (they) called me a bitch and (the client) stood up for me and (they're) like no you're the stupid bitch. Then (another client) was like wow I came home to this shit...ha ha. Then when (the vulnerable adult) peed in (their) chair I was like dam it's like having a dog in the house and (the vulnerable adult) was like I'm not a (expletive deleted) dog. I couldn't stop laughing. After its own investigation, Catholic Charities fired the employee on June 22, before the department's investigation started. The fired staffer chose not to participate in the investigation. Catholic Charities said all current employees who were asked to participate in the investigation did so. The department found the policies and procedures of Catholic Charities were adequate, but the social media policy was not followed. "Social media is something that is challenging for all of us to monitor on a regular basis," said Executive Director Steve Pareja. "We are looking at how we can readdress or revise our social media policy to hopefully eliminate these types of events in the future." Catholic Charities plans to clarify which staffers can use social media as part of their job. They expect to complete that process in several weeks and will begin retraining the rest of Catholic Charities staff as needed. The nonprofit also retrained employees at the group home on when to report incidents to the Department of Human Services. The employee who didn't immediately report the text message to a supervisor received formal disciplinary action. "I think we have addressed everything that DHS had in their investigation, through the citation," Pareja said. "Many of the corrections were made prior to DHS initiating the investigation. ... We did act quickly." In addition to losing their job, the staffer in questions was also told by the Department of Human Services if the agency substantiates any more accusations of maltreatment by this person, they will be disqualified from working with vulnerable adults. Read the entire investigative memorandum from the Department of Human Services here. Follow Stephanie Dickrell on Twitter @SctimesSteph, like her on Facebook at www.facebook.com/sctimessteph, call her at 255-8749 or find more stories at www.sctimes.com/sdickrell. Source: <http://www.sctimes.com/story/news/local/2017/08/12/emotional-abuse-substantiated-catholic-charities-group-home/555851001/>

Employee at treatment center for teenagers accused of sexual assault Posted: Aug 16, 2017 3:36 AM PDT Updated: Aug 16, 2017 3:36 AM PDT Employee at treatment center for teenagers accused of sexual assault A staff member at a Torrington treatment center for teenagers has been charged with sexually assaulting one of the girls in his care. A staff member at a Torrington treatment center for teenagers has been charged with sexually assaulting one of the girls in his care. According to police, Ulyses Alvarez, of Waterbury, sexually assaulted the girl at the Touchstone Treatment Center back in April. The residential treatment center is for teenage girls in the custody of the State Department of Children and Families. Police say in addition to sexual assault, Alvarez is charged with having child pornography. Source: <http://connecticut.news12.com/story/36146178/employee-at-treatment-center-for-teenagers-accused-of-sexual-assault>

Residential Treatment Center Staff Member Arrested August 15, 2017 6:42 PM Filed Under: arrest, Litchfield, sexual assault (LITCHFIELD,Conn./CBS Connecticut) – State Police have arrested a Waterbury man following an investigation into a complaint from a 15 year old girl at the Touchstone Residential Treatment Program facility in Litchfield in April, alleging she had been sexually abused by a staff member. 24 year old Ulyses Alvarez was arrested Tuesday without incident. He has been charged with Risk of Injury/Impairing the Morals of Children, Promoting a Minor in an Obscene Performance, Illegal Possession of Child Pornography and Sexual Assault in the 4th Degree. Alvarez posted the $75,000 court set surety bond and is scheduled to appear in court August 29th. Source: <http://connecticut.cbslocal.com/2017/08/15/residential-treatment-center-staff-member-arrested/>

Debauchery, abuse at Florida youth program leads to 3 arrests | Miami Herald Youth academy steeped in sex, physical abuse, cover-ups, sheriff says By Carol Marbin Miller cmarbin@miamiherald.com Linked In Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story August 18, 2017 3:26 PM Some of the youth workers were having sex with the underage boys in their care. Others were smuggling drugs, money, cellphones and porn. A top administrator reportedly sent a kid to the hospital during a violent restraint, bragging: "You gonna learn; this my program." But if conditions at the Highlands Youth Academy in Avon Park were not exactly conducive to the rehabilitation of delinquent youths, state juvenile justice administrators were doing little to turn things around. So, on Thursday, the Polk County sheriff arrested three former top administrators, saying the charges appeared to be the only way to clean the place up. The Department of Juvenile Justice, Polk Sheriff Grady Judd said Friday, "did not provide checks and balances and appropriate oversight. If they did, they would have discovered what we discovered." ADVERTISING A riot at the Highlands Youth Academy in 2013 left the premises trashed. Polk County Sheriff's Office In a prepared statement Friday afternoon, DJJ said it had taken "significant steps" to improve Highlands since a youth uprising four years ago, including the installation of security cameras, increased staff-to-youth ratios, and $2 million in structural improvements. "Any assertion that DJJ has not worked to improve this facility's operations and services is false. We are 100% committed to youth safety and will hold anyone accountable who is not. We have not, do not, and will not tolerate staff who endanger the safety and well-being of youth placed in our care," the statement said. "We take every allegation of misconduct at our contracted programs very seriously and DJJ's Inspector General's Office is actively investigating the allegations at Highlands Youth Academy. We appreciate the efforts of our law enforcement partners to investigate incidents at Highlands Youth Academy and will work with them to bring a resolution to this matter." The Highlands Youth Academy has a long and troubled history: On Aug. 17, 2013, a full-scale riot erupted at the compound after a disagreement over a basketball game bet. About 150 law officers, including a SWAT team, were needed to quell the unrest, and 61 boys were arrested, records say. A grand jury in Polk County released a blistering report on the academy on July 14, 2015, expressing "grave concerns" over DJJ's inability to "intervene, to treat our troubled youth, while protecting the public." "We told them at the time, you've got to follow the law, appropriately report to [child abuse investigators] and you've got to quit doing this stuff," Judd told the Miami Herald Friday. "They ignored us." Juvenile justice administrators, Judd said, seemed "personally offended that we were messing around in their business." So, the sheriff said, he dug in his heels, and his detectives have been investigating the 80-bed mental health and drug treatment center ever since. In November 2015, detectives received tips about other "criminal activity," including sexual abuse, juveniles being beaten by, or beating up, workers — and supervisors covering it all up, a spokeswoman said. The far-ranging investigation that followed resulted in the May 12, 2016, arrest of former youth worker Deidre Baucom on charges of sexual misconduct and contraband smuggling. Deidre Baucom Polk County Sheriff's Office On Thursday, the department made three additional arrests: Norma Wynn, 56, of Sebring, the program's former top administrator, on 12 charges of child neglect, failure to report and evidence tampering; Jose Sanchez, 63, of Sebring, a former assistant administrator, on eight charges of child neglect and evidence tampering; and Johnny Hart, 40, of Okaloosa County, another former assistant administrator, on six counts of child abuse, child neglect and evidence tampering. Though he had been accused in May 2016 of slamming a youth to the ground, and then grinding his elbow into the teen's head and neck, Hart was arrested Friday at another DJJ youth program, the Okaloosa Youth Development Center in Crestview, where he is the program administrator. The youth whom Hart restrained suffered injuries to his shoulder, leg and neck, records say. "We hauled him away from that facility in handcuffs," Judd said of Hart. "The Highlands Youth Academy has been, and likely still is, a mess," Judd said. "Since the riot in 2013, warning bells have been ringing loud and clear. About the only thing I can tell that [DJJ] has done about it has been to turn the alarm off and circle the wagons," he added. In arrest records the department released Friday, the department says DJJ was not alone in concealing wrongdoing. In December 2015, detectives received an anonymous complaint about multiple female youth workers "having sexual relationships with the youthful offenders" housed at Highlands, the sheriff's office said. One of the suspects was now-27-year-old Deidre Baucom, a youth worker at the time. The previous March, a 16-year-old boy had disclosed having sex with Baucom in the bathroom of his dormitory. It is illegal under state and federal law to have sex with youth who are in custody. The incident, however, remained hidden for months. The 16-year-old wrote a statement detailing Baucom's misconduct, and gave it to a youth worker, and at least two other detainees alleged similar behavior. A shift supervisor later told detectives that he'd turned the witness statements over to Sanchez, one of the assistant administrators. But when a DJJ inspector asked for any records detailing Baucom's alleged misconduct, Wynn told her there weren't any. "The facility found no truth to the allegations," the inspector, Lori Hardyman, was told, an arrest affidavit said. The day she was arrested, May 12, 2016, Baucom "admitted to having sexual intercourse" with the teen, an arrest report says. She is now on probation, and is listed as a registered sex offender in Polk County. The sheriff's office's investigation also turned up "numerous concerns" about another female youth worker, records say. Around August of 2015, a colleague witnessed the worker sitting in the open doorway of a boy's bedroom. "Her left arm was extended into the door frame, at waist level, and was making a flexing motion," a report said. When the witness got closer, he "heard the sound of an elastic waistband snapping." Since the riot in 2013, warning bells have been ringing loud and clear. About the only thing I can tell that [DJJ] has done about it has been to turn the alarm off and circle the wagons. Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd Inside the bedroom was a detained boy, "with an erect penis, shrouded by his issued shorts," the report said. The youth later acknowledged the worker had been performing a sexual act. The witness also notified Sanchez about what he saw, and submitted an incident report. But later, Wynn told the witness' boss "to not document the incident on any other reports, as the incident was closed," an arrest report says. The witness was transferred to another unit. The youth worker was returned to her post. She was never charged "as there was not enough evidence to be able to prove it in court," said a Sheriff's Office spokeswoman, Carrie Horstman. "Although the victim was credible, it was not a prosecutable case. We believe it happened and we believe the victim," Horstman added. Another youth worker also told detectives that she was aware of the uncharged staffer's activities, and that they should have been reported and investigated. "Instead, the witnesses were called to a meeting after the incident and were told [by an administrator] 'if you didn't visually see anything, don't say anything about it,'" an arrest report said. The youth academy "wasn't reporting what was occurring to DJJ, and DJJ was ignoring the obvious," Judd said. "They ignored it all." The company that operated Highlands at the time, G4S, "stopped cooperating with or reporting crimes to local law enforcement," Judd wrote in a prepared statement. "There has been an ongoing pernicious conspiracy of silence and corruption. DJJ has coddled and covered up for G4S. Our investigation shows that G4S and their staff routinely covered up, or tried to cover up, fights, uses of force, contraband problems, children "huffing" gas, escapes, and even reports of staff having sex with children." Source: <http://www.miamiherald.com/news/state/article168011957.html#storylink=cpy>

Abuse reports, deaths, fall through the cracks in DHHS system Families can't count on a complex reporting system to work properly, imperiling adults with developmental disabilities who are vulnerable to abuse and neglect. By Noel K. Gallagher Staff Writer Follow on Facebook Follow on Twitter Email Writer 207-791-6387 ARUNDEL, ME - AUGUST 19: Terri Earley of Topsham looks through photos of her late son while vacationing in her camper in Arundel. Bradley LaPointe, who was diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder, was 22 when he died in a group home. Staff photo by Ben McCanna Terri Earley had always cared for her nonverbal autistic son at home, but as he got older, she worried about being able to truly take care of him the way he needed. So about a year ago, 21-year-old Bradley started living in a group home. Six months later — in October — he was found dead in his bed, discovered not by one of the overnight caretakers, but by the manager arriving for work in the morning. Wayne LaPointe and Terri Earley of Topsham hold a portrait of their autistic son, Bradley, who died in a group home in October. He was 22 years old. Staff photo by Ben McCanna ARUNDEL, ME - AUGUST 19: Photos of Bradley LaPointe who died at age 22 in a group home. LaPointe's mother Terri Earley, center left, said the state failed her son, both in the care they provided to him and for the lack of an investigation into his death. Staff photo by Ben McCanna SHARE YOUR STORY Do you have an adult family member with a developmental disability who receives services through MaineCare? If so, we'd like to hear about your experience working with providers or the Department of Health and Human Services. Send an email to: tips@pressherald.com. We will not use your name without your permission. Search photos available for purchase: [Photo Store →] "I wanted him to have a better life. I thought he would be better attended, not less attended," said Earley, of Topsham. Worse, she still has questions about just what happened. All she has is a death certificate, which says he died of a seizure. But she's still not sure there was ever an investigation or whether there was any corrective action taken to prevent the same thing happening to someone else. "I'm not here to say it's the home's fault, but I don't know. It was an unattended death," she said. "You would have thought there would be some kind of investigation – maybe it was a training issue, or they didn't follow procedures. He got nothing." In fact, there are many laws governing the care of people with developmental disabilities who live with community-based providers. The Maine Department of Health and Human Services has oversight of the very complex system, which includes multiple state agencies, a network of hundreds of providers across the state, formal and informal advocates and the families and clients themselves. Clients such as Bradley need transportation, help in the workplace and medical care. Funding is a mix of federal and state money, some of it determined by the Legislature and championed or decreased by any given governor, while legal issues can wind up in district attorney's offices, before family court judges or even the medical examiner. All of it requires clear delineation of duties and responsibilities, and intensive communication. AUDIT PROMPTS A STRONG RESPONSE An audit published Aug. 10 by the Office of Inspector General of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services focused on how the state handled situations where something went wrong for 2,640 adults who receive community-based services under Medicaid. The audit compared hospital emergency room visit data to a state database where providers log all critical incidents – events that rise to the level that they must be reported to the state. Under the law, each critical incident must be reviewed, and perhaps investigated, starting with the three primary players: DHHS, the providers themselves, and Disability Rights Maine, which has a $330,000 annual contract with the state to be the independent, third-party advocate for clients living with providers. The audit prompted a strong response from all three players. DHHS took issue with several of the audit's findings, adding that the department had already made changes and that the audit represented past practices. Providers, represented by an association, said the root problem was money and that the state needed to increase the providers' reimbursement rate and fix the system. Disability Rights Maine also pointed to a financial concern – but it thinks the state needs more money, specifically for Adult Protective Services, in order to hire more people and be more active in enforcement. So how is the system supposed to work when something goes wrong? It starts with the client and the provider. There is a list of events that qualify as "critical incidents" or "reportable events" that run the gamut from verbal abuse or a medication issue to sexual abuse or death. Providers must file a report within a day about that incident into a state database maintained and monitored by DHHS. Someone there reviews the incoming incident reports and routes them to the appropriate agency for follow-up. In cases of possible abuse, neglect, exploitation or a death, the Adult Protective Services unit of DHHS gets involved. If an incident falls into one of the other categories, the providers themselves do an administrative review and report their findings to DHHS within 30 days. Federal and state regulations define a reportable event or critical incident as "any event that has or may have an adverse impact on the safety, welfare, rights, or dignity of adults with developmental disabilities or autism." AUDITORS UNCOVER REPORTING GAP It all adds up to a huge number of reportable incidents, covering everything from a badly stubbed toe to a death. During the 30-month period – January 2013 through June 2015 – covered by the audit, there were 36,616 critical events reported, or about 40 a day. Providers, and the auditors, note that many incidents turn out to be relatively minor, and don't require full investigations. In one case, a client didn't take a vitamin for three weeks, generating 21 "incidents" even though the vitamin was not medically needed. In the audit, almost a third of the 13,039 medication "critical incident" reports were about patients refusing to take their medication, which the auditors said they didn't consider potential abuse, neglect or a rights violation. The audit found that community service providers were not always reporting critical incidents or doing follow-up reviews, and in turn cited DHHS for not properly overseeing the providers. Auditors uncovered the reporting gap by comparing hospital emergency room visit information with the state database where providers report all critical incidents within a day. The auditors found that, of 2,243 emergency room visits, there were 34 percent, or 769 visits, for which no critical incident reports were submitted to DHHS, cutting off any ability for the state to investigate the circumstances that led to the visits. Of those 769 unreported incidents, 104 were considered "high-risk," including head injuries, the auditor said. Providers gave "various reasons, such as staff turnover and clerical errors," for why they did not always report critical incidents, the auditors wrote. "We're dealing with human beings," said Bonnie-Jean Brooks, chief executive officer of OHI, a provider with services in Hermon and Brewer. During the audit period, her company reported 400 medication issues – but that was out of more than 900,000 medications handed out. As for failing to report incidents, she said caretakers can get busy, or distracted by a more serious situation. Advertisement The auditors wrote that DHHS did not give them an explanation for why it did not ensure that providers reported all critical incidents to the database. FLAWS IN THE REVIEW PROCESS Each incident that gets reported gets at least an initial review by DHHS. Officials don't want providers reviewing themselves on serious incidents, so DHHS is required to investigate all allegations of abuse, neglect, exploitation or deaths within 30 days. On all other kinds of critical incidents – medication issues, serious injuries, suicidal acts and dangerous situations – the providers do their own, internal, administrative review and file a report with DHHS within 30 days. At that point, DHHS can either accept their report and close the case, or request more information until it is satisfied the situation is resolved. The auditors found significant problems with the review process: Out of 8,678 critical incidents that required follow-up reviews from providers, DHHS did not have any reviews at all. Providers had done the reviews, but told auditors the state had told them to stop sending them in, a charge the state denied. The auditors said DHHS couldn't explain why it didn't notice or take action when providers stopped sending in reviews, or how the state could close the cases without the reviews. Advertisement The more serious incident reports submitted to DHHS are sent to the Adult Protective Services unit. If someone has died, Adult Protective Services reviews the circumstances, and if abuse, neglect or exploitation may have been a factor, it must notify law enforcement. Law enforcement in turn may refer the case to a district attorney or the Maine Attorney General's State Health Care Crimes Unit. Ultimately, the case is reviewed by the Mortality Review Committee. If a critical incident involves abuse, neglect or exploitation, it must be referred to Adult Protective Services. That unit, in turn, must report all suspected abuse, neglect or exploitation cases to a district attorney. Once Adult Protective Services completes its own investigation, any evidence that someone was abusing, neglecting or exploiting another person must be reported to a district attorney. In one case, the auditors found that the state didn't investigate two independent reports from mandatory reporters that a caretaker was making unwanted sexual advances and physically touching a client, including pulling her onto his lap and rubbing her thigh. The provider told auditors that the client had a "long history of making false accusations," but the auditors said the state should have immediately investigated the incidents and reported them to a district attorney's office. RIGHTS AND RESTRAINTS Finally, there are two kinds of incidents – restraining a client beyond what is recommended in that person's individual care plan, and any rights violation – that must be referred to Disability Rights Maine. Advertisement If it is a rights violation, Disability Rights Maine must do a preliminary investigation and attempt to contact the client within five days. Sometimes it intervenes with a simple phone call or email to DHHS, sometimes escalating to mediation or requiring a legal remedy. Ultimately, DRM reports the outcome of its actions into the same state database that tracks each incident. Incidents range from a client being denied access to food or to his or her own money, and could include an objection to not having enough privacy, according to DRM executive director Kim Moody. The agency has stepped in when, for example, a client was being abused by a particular staff person, which led to that staffer being fired. "We've gone in to shared living situations, and found (the client) was doing all the shoveling, all the wood stacking and living in the basement," Moody said. "The clients we represent are being abused. Our clients are not having good lives." The audit found the state wasn't properly sharing restraint data. However, Moody said that since January, DRM has begun to receive monthly summaries of restraint reports from DHHS. Ideally, Moody said, no one would ever be restrained beyond what was therapeutically recommended. But DRM has found that clients are routinely restrained by caretakers in community-based settings. Earley, the mother from Topsham, said she wants the state to improve its oversight of providers, and follow-up on all critical incidents. If the system were working the way it's supposed to, she'd know what happened to her son, Bradley, and what the state did about it. "I find it very disturbing that somebody dies and that's it, and nothing happens. Something obviously needs to change," said Earley. "I don't want his death to be in vain." Noel K. Gallagher can be contacted at 791-6387 or at: ngallagher@pressherald.com Source: <http://www.pressherald.com/2017/08/20/abuse-reports-deaths-fall-through-the-cracks-in-dhhs-system/>

Report Cites Abuse In Portsmouth Boarding School By Former Monks By Chuck Hinman • 8 hours ago TweetShareGoogle+Email Portsmouth Abbey School Campus Courtesy of Portsmouth Abbey School / Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 4.0 A new report commissioned by the Portsmouth Abbey School, a Catholic boarding school, describes what it calls "credible allegations" of sexual abuse by two former monks. The report identifies the accused abusers as Father Bede Gorman, who died in 1985, and Father Geoffrey Chase, who is in his eighties and critically ill. The school sent a letter Wednesday apologizing to its students and community for the abuse said to have occurred between 1959 and the early 1980s. The Abbey is pledging to fund therapy for victims.

Source: <http://ripr.org/post/report-cites-abuse-portsmouth-boarding-school-former-monks#stream/0>

$9.5 million lawsuit claims death of foster child, 15, was stress-related Updated on September 1, 2017 at 12:02 PM Posted on September 1, 2017 at 11:21 AM A friend of the family of Gloria Joya, who was a 15-year-old foster child when she died in April 2016, set up this gofundme page to help pay for the girl's funeral costs. (Screenshot from gofundme) 596 shares By Aimee Green agreen@oregonian.com The Oregonian/OregonLive The estate of a 15-year-old Albany girl who died from severe gastrointestinal problems while under child-welfare workers' watch filed a $9.5 million lawsuit Thursday against the state of Oregon. The estate of Gloria Joya claims the girl lived a life filled with abuse and neglect from her earliest years, and the stress from that contributed to gastrointestinal issues that weren't properly treated and led to her death in April 2016. According to the lawsuit and the state's own investigation into the circumstances leading to Gloria's death, state child-welfare workers failed to intervene in the girl's life despite reports of: Her parents fighting, throwing objects and breaking them -- causing Gloria and her frightened siblings to move to another room. Finger marks on the girl's neck and her statement that she'd been choked. Her mother repeatedly using methamphetamine and living with the girl in a shelter. The girl missing school. The girl witnessing her mother engaged in sexual activity with others. During a 13½-year period, child-welfare workers were contacted 28 times with concerns about Gloria's health and safety. The Oregon Department of Human Services closed many of the reports at screening without further investigation because it determined the reported conduct wasn't considered abuse or to be a threat to Gloria's safety. In one case, a screener determined a report that Gloria's mother was using meth shouldn't be investigated further because the caller was "unable to demonstrate how the mother's drug use impacted her ability to provide care for her child." The lawsuit claims DHS didn't remove Gloria from her mother's custody until about a year before the girl's death -- years after the first signs of stress-related gastrointestinal problems surfaced and shortly after the girl had contemplated suicide. The suit claims that in the days before her April 2016 death, she began isolating herself in her room in her temporary, emergency foster home. The suit claims the foster parents failed to check on her for a few days. The suit also claims that when the foster parents and a caseworker realized Gloria was in poor health physically and mentally, they sent her to her aunt's house instead of bringing her to the hospital on the night of April 26, 2016. The aunt was worried about the girl's severely distended stomach and pain and brought her to the hospital the next morning, the suit states. Gloria died the next day, according to the suit. DHS spokeswoman Andrea Cantu-Schomus declined comment Friday for this story. Under state law, DHS officials are required to conduct an investigation and write a "critical incident report" after children under their watch are badly injured or die. In Gloria's case, the critical incident report identified lapses in DHS's supervision of Gloria's care -- including that information about Gloria's gastrointestinal problems and schedule of taking medication weren't relayed to the emergency foster family she was placed with in the days before her death. But DHS also stated in its report that Gloria was embarrassed by her gastrointestinal problems and tried to hide them. "The Designated Medical Provider (DMP) reviewed the case postmortem and concluded that no adult in the home could have predicted or prevented the fatality, as they were not provided adequate information regarding G.J.'s medical and mental health history, how these concerns intersect, and how significant stress made the child vulnerable to severe complications," the critical incident report reads. Read DHS's critical incident report here. Beaverton attorney Paul Galm and Steve Milla are representing Gloria's estate. Read the lawsuit here. Gloria's parents are listed as the two heirs to her estate. But that's in dispute. An attorney for Gloria's 10-year-old sister has filed court papers asking that a judge void their claims to the estate because her father "willfully deserted" Gloria in the 10 years leading up to her death and her mother neglected her, the court papers say. If a judge grants that request, any cash settlement or jury award for the lawsuit would go entirely to Gloria's younger siblings. -- Aimee Green agreen@oregonian.com Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/pacific-northwest-news/index.ssf/2017/09/05_9.5_million_lawsuit_claims_fost.html

High school teacher hired just months ago suspended after sending nude photos of herself to at least FIVE students in her class Tracy Miller, 27, admitted to sending multiple images to male pupils over the course of several months through a social media app on her phone Logan High School officials were alerted of the matter after one of the teens came to them showing the explicit pictures she sent him It's unclear whether images were solicited by some students and why Miller had the teens' phone numbers to begin with Miller was arrested Friday on three counts of distribution of obscene matter to minors after she admitted to the incidents The Logan County Sheriff's Department is currently investigating further By Jessa Schroeder For DailyMail.com Published: 15:09 EDT, 2 September 2017 | Updated: 12:00 EDT, 3 September 2017 e-mail 2kshares View comments A teacher in Logan, West Virginia was arrested Friday on three counts of distribution of obscene matter to minors after she admittedly sent nude images of herself to students she mentored. Tracy Miller, 27, reportedly sent multiple images to male pupils over the course of several months through a social media app on her phone. Officials at Logan High School say they were alerted of the matter after one of the teens came to them and showed the explicit pictures he received via cell. Miller told police during questioning she recalled exchanging inappropriate pictures with at least five students this year, WSAZ reports. Scroll down for video +2 Copy link to paste in your message Tracy Miller, 27, was arrested Friday on three counts of distribution of obscene matter to minors after she admitted to sending nude pictures to students Copy link to paste in your message Investigators say the arrest comes after deputies were contacted Thursday by administrators at Logan High School +2 Copy link to paste in your message The Logan County Sheriff's Office is currently investigating the events further Officials at the school are currently investigating the matter further. Authorities will question other students to determine who else may be involved and whether or not Miller had physical contact with them. It's unclear as to when Miller got their cell numbers and why she had access in the first place. Miller was employed at the school since January as a health instructor. She is currently on suspension without pay until further notice. Logan High School released a public statement on the matter Friday. 'We are dealing with the situation by following county policy governing Employee Code of Conduct. The teacher in question has been suspended at this time.' The incident is just one of countless teacher-pupil related crimes to take place in recent months and years. Video playing bottom right... Last month, a teacher who led a group of troubled youth at the Village School near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, was arrested after she sent more than 30 love letters to a 16-year-old girl. Nina Scott, 28, reportedly referred to the minor as 'her girlfriend' and said in the letters that her bed was 'our bed' and her two-year-old daughter was 'our baby girl', according to WCAU. Police were informed of the letters after the student transferred to a new school and a staff member found her journal with the notes inside during a routine search at the residence. The Village, an educational child-care facility where children with behavioral and emotional issues stay, said their goal is to help students change the direction of their lives for the better. 'We work together with children, families and communities impacted by trauma to support healing and resilience, to encourage hope and to empower them to realize their greatest potential,' according to its website. Scott is serving a minimum of three months on electronic home monitoring and faces five years of sex offender probation afterward. Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-4846970/Teacher-arrested-sending-nude-photos-teen-students.html#ixzz4rl0vA8NJ> Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

Posted September 2, 2017 08:29 pm - Updated September 2, 2017 08:42 pm By Sandy Hodson Staff Writer Third arrest this year made at center to help troubled children For the third time in the past year, an employee entrusted to care for troubled children was charged with sexually molesting them instead. Timothy T. Carroll, 47, was arrested Aug. 23. The charge of aggravated child molestation involves a 14-year-old girl committed to Lighthouse Care Center. The victim was at the facility because of a suicide attempt over the July 4 weekend, said her father. "This is the third incident in the past year, that's not acceptable," he said. Carroll was suspected of inappropriate contact with two other girls before his daughter was molested, the father said. "You can't keep just doing background checks and say that's enough," said the father, who is a teacher. "Lighthouse Care Center of Augusta is committed to providing high quality, compassionate care in a safe, therapeutic environment," reads a prepared statement from Lighthouse. While employees are already screened and trained, the center will conduct additional evaluation of recruiting, hiring and training, review all staff and assess existing security measures. Carroll and Jacey M. Haskell, 23, were immediately fired following an investigation of the allegations against them, according to Lighthouse's statement. Haskell has been indicted on a charge of sexual assault by a person with supervisory authority over another. He is accused of having a sexual encounter with a teen at the center on Feb. 7. A third person, Chris Calhoun, 29, had worked at Lighthouse where he met a girl he later molested. He was sentenced July 13 to 10 years in prison followed by 10 years on probation for child molestation. Assistant District Attorney McKenzie Gray said Calhoun picked up the victim from her Columbia County high school and took her to his home in Richmond County for a sexual encounter. While the father of Carroll's alleged victim said that there are a lot of great people at Lighthouse, more needs to be done to ensure the children are safe. Another father of a teen-age girl wasn't as forgiving of Lighthouse staff. His daughter went into the center in March. Carroll was one of the staff members who said she had to stay, said Robert Trinidad. She was there for three days and during half that time she was physically sick with a temperature and then the staff said she was good to go. What kind of treatment could she have received in such a short time, Trinidad asked. When he came to Augusta to pick up his daughter, the staff initially brought him another child, he said. "You expect that place to be safe for your kid," Trinidad said. "They're supposed to help recovery from trauma and then you hear about this." The leadership and staff at Lighthouse was shocked and abhorred by the alleged misconduct of the individuals charged, according to the center's statement. Such conduct will not be tolerated. Reach Sandy Hodson at (706) 823-3226 or sandy.hodson@augustachronicle.com. Source: <http://chronicle.augusta.com/news/2017-09-02/third-arrest-year-made-center-help-troubled-children>

Law firm probes allegations against boarding school faculty Originally published September 6, 2017 at 8:05 am Updated September 6, 2017 at 8:16 am
Share story By MICHAEL MELIA The Associated Press HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — A Connecticut boarding school that earlier this year detailed allegations of sexual abuse spanning several decades has hired a law firm to look into new allegations of inappropriate behavior by faculty members, including some who remain on staff today. Choate Rosemary Hall said the new reports involve "boundary crossing behavior" by a few current faculty members that took place in the 1980s and early 1990s. In April, the school released a report on allegations of misconduct by a dozen staff members between 1963 and 2010 including kissing and sexual intercourse. Afterward, the school received additional complaints concerning past and current faculty members, and it hired the law firm Day Pitney to investigate. "Day Pitney has now reported back to Choate that it 'has conducted its investigation into allegations against current faculty and, based on evidence developed to date, Day Pitney has found no basis to take any action against any current faculty member,'" Head of School Alex Curtis and trustees chairman Michael Carr wrote Tuesday in a letter to the school community. F The school said the firm is still investigating reported instances of sexual misconduct by former faculty members. The new investigation was first reported last week by the Meriden Record-Journal. Sign up for the Morning Brief Delivered bright and early weekday mornings, this email provides a quick overview of top stories and need-to-know news. Email address One of the former students who recently came forward, Amanda Hampton, said a teacher who is still employed by Choate said inappropriate things to her and attempted to start a relationship with her over a couple weeks in the 1980s. During a meal at a faculty house, she said, the man gave her Valentine's Day candies that said "Be Mine" and "Choose Me." Hampton said she knows of three current faculty members who have been accused of inappropriate behavior, though none are accused of sexual assault. She said she spoke out because she felt the school was not responding adequately to her concerns. "I don't know what they're going to do with these faculty but I'm not sending my kids to Choate," she said. "I think they are looking to the future but they have a big mess to clean up with people from my era." Famous alumni of the private school in Wallingford include John F. Kennedy, Michael Douglas, and Glenn Close. In the letter to the school community, Choate said it had updated its sexual misconduct policies and appointed a coordinator in charge of overseeing the school's misconduct prevention and response efforts. Source: <http://www.seattletimes.com/nation-world/law-firm-probes-allegations-against-boarding-school-faculty/>

Audit Finds 134 Cases of Medicare Beneficiaries Who Were Abused or Neglected Cases of alleged rape, sexual and physical abuse, neglect, maltreatment, and sadism cited Share Tweet Email Getty Images BY: Ali Meyer Follow @DJAliMeyer September 5, 2017 2:15 pm There were 134 Medicare beneficiaries who were found with injuries that were the result of possible abuse dating back to 2015, according to an audit from the office of inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services. The inspector general created the memorandum to alert the agency that abuse and neglect was affecting beneficiaries in skilled nursing facilities. Under the Social Security Act, when a beneficiary living in a long-term care facility is exposed to abuse or neglect, the incident is required to be reported to a law enforcement agency so it can be investigated. The audit found there were 134 cases from Jan. 1, 2015, to Dec. 31, 2016, where there was a beneficiary found with an injury due to abuse or neglect, and a large percentage of these were not reported. According to the report, included in the 134 incidents were cases of alleged rape, seduction, sexual abuse, physical abuse, neglect, abandonment, maltreatment, and sadism. For example, one Medicare beneficiary who had verbal and mobile limitations was found victim to sexual assault. "According to the emergency room record, a male resident of the [skilled nursing facility] allegedly sexually assaulted Ms. Doe," the audit states. "Nursing aides found the man on top of Ms. Doe squeezing and touching her breast and ejaculating on her. The emergency room record further noted that Ms. Doe's right breast was an 'area of discomfort,' and 'two silver-dollar-sized bruises were observed on her breast.'" The audit finds that this incident was not immediately reported to law enforcement. Instead, employees at the facility told the patient's family, and the family had to report the incident. Auditors said the agency does not have proper procedures in place to ensure these cases are reported and identified. Additionally, this is not the first time the inspector general has seen problems with quality of care and neglect and abuse. The Office of Inspector General "has issued numerous reports that have detailed problems with the quality of care and the reporting and investigation of potential abuse or neglect at group homes, nursing homes and [skilled nursing facilities]," the report states. "For example, OIG's recent audit reports on critical incident reporting at group homes showed that group home providers did not report up to 15 percent of critical incidents to the appropriate State agencies." An estimated 22 percent of beneficiaries have been through adverse effects at skilled nursing facilities that include medication-induced bleeding, ulcers, and infections. A majority of these events—69 percent—could have been prevented. Auditors are suggesting the agency take immediate action to ensure these incidents are immediately reported. "The information in this alert is preliminary, and our audit is continuing," the auditors said. "We will issue a draft report at the conclusion of the audit and include the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Service's comments and actions taken in response to this Early Alert." Source: <http://freebeacon.com/issues/audit-finds-134-cases-medicare-beneficiaries-abused-neglected/>

Year 8 schoolgirl put in 'isolation' and 'treated like a prisoner' after teachers said her LILAC hair colour broke uniform policy By Carl Stroud 7th September 2017, 2:19 pm Updated: 7th September 2017, 4:06 pm A SCHOOLGIRL has been treated "like a prisoner" after being put in isolation for dyeing her hair lilac, her furious parents claim. Kadey Wood's punishment came on the first day of the new school year after her mum Carla coloured her locks at the start of the summer holidays. SWNS:South West News Service, 3 Year eight pupil Kadey was put in isolation after returning to school with hair dyed lilac Meopham School in Kent says hair must be a "natural" colour and Carla says she will keep her 12-year-old daughter off school until the dye has faded out. The 29-year-old mum-of-three said: "It's going to affect her learning not being with each subject teacher and not socialising with her peers. "It has upset her because she does like school and being able to see her friends. "I feel this will be much more detrimental to her education than a lilac tint in her hair." She added: "She's not even allowed out at lunch or break to see her friends - her lunch is brought to her. "She can only leave to use the toilet. SWNS:South West News Service, 3 Kadey's mum Carla is now keeping her 12-year-old daughter off school after she was put in isolation "We were told if other children see her walking round the school building they might think it is OK to dye their hair." Dad Chris, 36, said: "I understand they try to enforce conformity to all the students but this is just plain ridiculous. "Locking her up in solitary confinement? Like prison? "It's not acceptable to treat a child like this." Suzanne Dickinson, said: "We have extremely high standards at Meopham School. "Our uniform policy clearly states that hair must be of natural colour." Full-time mum Carla, who lives in Northfleet, said she cannot use a shop-bought product to remove the colour from Kadey's hair as it cannot be used over her natural-looking bleach highlights, and a trip to the hairdresser will cost up to £60. The lilac dye cost £9 for two packs in Superdrug. SWNS:South West News Service, 3 Kadey's mum Carla died her daughter's locks at the beginning of the summer holidays Carla claims the school have refused to let Kadey take work home and is classing the time off as unauthorised absence - meaning the parents could face a fine. It comes as an 11-year-old girl was given detention on her first day at senior school because she didn't have a calculator. Source: <https://www.thesun.co.uk/news/4413358/schoolgirl-isolation-treated-like-a-prisoner-dyeing-hair-lilac/>

Home For Troubled Girls On Gifford Street Closes By BRITTANY FELDOTT Sep 8, 2017 0 Home Falmouth Falmouth News Cape START, a short-term residential program for adolescent girls who have experienced trauma or family disruption, has ceased operations at its location on Gifford Street in Falmouth. Children's Study Home, the parent organization that oversees Cape START, plans to open a new location on its campus in Springfield. The decision to close the residential program in Falmouth has been under discussion at the organization for several years, due to the difficulties of operating a residential program from across the state. The previous program manager in Falmouth recently resigned, prompting the transition. "It's a question we've had over the years on and off, and recently we had a great opportunity to make a move," said Eliza Crescentini, executive director of Children's Study Home, last month. The nonprofit organization is headquartered in Springfield and operates several programs across Western Massachusetts and Cape Cod as a private provider for the Massachusetts Department of Children and Families. The Cape START (Short Term Adolescent Residential Treatment) house at 215 Gifford Street opened in 1993. Many of the teenagers in the Falmouth program—and other similar programs—struggled with mental or behavioral health challenges. The state refers adolescents to Children's Study Home if they are identified as having a need for structure; a therapeutic environment; or opportunities for sustained social emotional academic wellness. Cape START was a transitory program, providing young girls the support to help them plan for a more permanent living situation. The average length of stay in Cape START was six months. Although adolescents in this type of residential program are in custody of the state, they are not necessarily in foster care. Some of the adolescents come from disrupted families and transition to foster care after their stay, while others return to family care or independent living situations. At full capacity, CapeSTART housed 12 teenagers and employed six residential counselors, a program manager, assistant program manager and one licensed clinician. On August 10, Ms. Crescentini reported that seven girls were then living in the Falmouth residential facility. Yesterday,

DCF director of public affairs Andrea Grossman reported that all children in state custody had been moved to other placements. Some of the residents already had plans to transition out of the Falmouth house before the decision to close was made. Ms. Crescentini said some girls may relocate to the new Springfield location, but the state does not disclose actual placement locations of children. Ms. Crescentini emphasized that placing adolescents as close to their communities and families as possible is a priority for Children's Study Home. There are currently 30 residential programs similar to Cape START across Massachusetts, and the next closest one to the Cape is in Fall River. Other options for relocating the girls include group homes, residential schools or foster homes. Children's Study Home did not return several calls requesting information on the number of staff recently at Cape START, the recently resigned program manager, and future plans for the children. Assistant director of residential programs Christopher Langelier acted as interim program manager and oversaw the transition at Cape START. A statement prepared by the Department of Children and Families on August 18 reads: "DCF is working to ensure that the needs of all children served by Cape Start [sic] are met and will work with our providers, and foster families to ensure that the service needs of the Cape will continue to be met going forward. We greatly value our providers, and in this situation, Children's Study Home (CSH), based out in Springfield, determined that continuing to operate a program (CapeStart) on the Cape was no longer feasible." Children's Study Home operates three residential programs in total, but Cape START was the only one outside the Pioneer Valley region. Last month, Ms. Crescentini said the organization has had difficulty staffing the Falmouth program, particularly hiring clinical support. Cape START and other residential programs rely heavily on specialized staff because the participating adolescents have a diverse set of needs resulting from their history with trauma. Cape START offered its residents therapeutic and clinical groups, and the girls also received private counseling and treatment in the community. At times, Ms. Crescentini said, Children's Study Home had to partner with community organizations such as Gosnold on Cape Cod to provide treatment for its Falmouth residents while seeking an in-house clinician. The program's distance from the main headquarters also posed a challenge for training and providing ongoing support for staff. Children's Study Home's move to densely populated Springfield offers it better access to trained and experienced counselors and clinicians from nearby colleges and institutions, Ms. Crescentini said. Specifically, the Springfield location has a behavioral health and education school on the campus. "We're making a decision to move the program, so it can benefit from the effects of other like programs, other professionals," Ms. Crescentini said. Children's Study Home did consider relocating the program to Hyannis and began a search for a suitable property about a year ago, but ultimately decided the relocation would not solve all the challenges of operating a residential program so far from its headquarters. The nonprofit organization extended opportunities to Falmouth staff to relocate to its new campus in Springfield, but Ms. Crescentini did not know whether anyone would make the transfer. In addition to the Falmouth facility, Children's Study Home also offers therapeutic family after-school programs in Hyannis, which will continue their operation. Source: https://www.capeenews.net/falmouth/news/home-for-troubled-girls-on-gifford-street-closes/article_2e39b8a4-4843-5429-a083-bfde5ca09e58.html

Former Detroit Lakes group home worker from West Fargo gets 12 years for rape | Brainerd Dispatch Former Detroit Lakes group home worker from West Fargo gets 12 years for rape By Nathan Bowe / Forum News Service on Sep 12, 2017 at 5:24 p.m. AddThis Sharing Buttons Share to Facebook32Share to TwitterShare to RedditShare to EmailShare to Copy Link Jallah Sallah Kollie DETROIT LAKES, Minn. — A former worker at a Detroit Lakes group home has been sentenced to 12 years in prison for raping a woman resident with the mental capacity of a young child. Jallah Sallah Kollie, 39, of 219 Second Ave. W., West Fargo, was sentenced Tuesday, Sept. 12, in Becker County District Court on felony counts of first- and third-degree criminal sexual conduct-victim mentally impaired. "You are a predator of the worst kind," a grandmother of the victim told Kollie in a victim's impact statement. "You preyed on an innocent, vulnerable, beautiful woman with childlike innocence. You violated her body in the worst way. Hopefully, some justice will be found by putting a monster like you behind bars. It will save other women." The grandmother said that after the rape, her granddaughter sat alone and terrified at the group home for 27 hours before the grandmother was notified and took her home where she felt safe. According to the investigation memorandum filed by the Minnesota Department of Human Services, the rape happened at a Lakes Home group home in Detroit Lakes. Authorities responded at the group home on Sept. 13, 2016, after another employee reported walking in on Kollie and the victim, who was naked in the bathroom. According to the DHS report, the victim is a vulnerable adult who has a "lack of understanding of sexuality," but is somebody "who does not need assistance in personal hygiene care." The report states that when the other employee saw blood on the victim's buttocks, they told Kollie to leave and began questioning the victim on what had happened. The victim described in graphic, childlike detail an assault that involved raping several parts of her body and that after she told him to "get out of here," Kollie told her to "shut up" and just "be touched." Authorities say a sexual assault kit administered at the hospital points to him. Throughout his jury trial Aug. 8 and on through his sentencing hearing on Tuesday, Kollie steadfastly denied having any sexual contact with the victim, who operates on the intellectual level of about a 6-year-old. The witness testified during the trial, as did the victim and Kollie. It took the jury about 2½ hours to convict him. On Tuesday, he told Becker County District Judge Jay Carlson that he is not evil, never touched the woman, and is going to appeal his conviction. Kollie's attorney, Simon George of Detroit Lakes, asked the judge for a lighter sentence than the state sentencing guideline, arguing, among other things, that Kollie has no prior offenses on his record. He asked the judge to stay execution of sentencing on the first count and sentence him on the second count, which would be about 50 months in prison. Becker County Attorney Tammy Merkins strongly objected, saying that would essentially nullify the jury verdict on count 1. She pointed to the vulnerability of the victim, the caretaker role of the defendant, and that the assault violated the sanctity of the victim's home. Judge Carlson agreed with Merkins. Noting that the first-degree felony charge of criminal sexual conduct carries a maximum sentence of 30 years in prison and a $40,000 fine, he sentenced Kollie to the exact amount of time recommended by state sentencing guideline — 144 months — with 96 months of that served in prison and 48 months on supervised release, as long as there are no disciplinary problems while he is in prison. He was granted credit for 246 days served in jail and was fined $50 plus court fees, including the public defender fee. He was ordered to provide a DNA sample and to register as a predatory sexual offender when he is released from prison. He was not adjudicated on the second count. Because of the length of the sentence, no civil commitment proceedings were initiated by the state. Source: <http://www.brainerddispatch.com/news/4326850-former-detroit-lakes-group-home-worker-west-fargo-gets-12-years-rape>

"I got so many conflicting stories." Mom wants answers after teen suffers serious brain injury at Norman boys home Posted 6:21 pm, September 13, 2017, by Kelsey Gibbs Facebook Twitter Pinterest LinkedIn Reddit Email NORMAN - A mother is desperately searching for answers as to what happened at a metro boys home. Josiah Hill is in a battle Wednesday night. The 15-year-old is facing a serious brain injury after an incident at a Norman boys home for teens. But, what happened is the question from the mother. "I got another call, stating that he was not going to Norman Regional, they were now going to send him to Children's Hospital," said Veonna Butler. It was the call no parent ever wants to receive. "He was intubated already. He was on a ventilator. He was not responding at all," Butler said. Hill is a resident of the Cornerstone Group Home for Boys in Norman. His mother admits her son's behavior and bad influences landed him here. But, she never expected her son to get seriously hurt while he was getting help. "Did he bump his head? Did somebody hit him on his head? He looks to have a spinal cord injury as well, like he was hit from behind," Butler said. All questions Butler wants answers to. She tells news 4 staff at the group home told her Hill collapsed while playing a game of basketball. However, it an excuse she's not buying. "When you see a kid like that and then you see him today laying there not talking, it's just mind-boggling," she said. Butler said this week's head injury wasn't her son's first. Just last week, during a visit, she noticed his face was swollen from an alleged attack by another resident. He told her he was attacked. "I was sitting down, and the kid came and started going in on me from behind" and he was like, "When I stood up, I started to fight him back to defend myself," Butler said. In a statement, Oklahoma Juvenile Affairs director Steven Buck tells us: "We are aware of a serious health event impacting a young person in OJA custody. Many of our staff has worked with this youth and their family, and we offer our best wishes during this challenging time. We are prepared to assist the family as needed. OJA stands ready to assist any agency involved in investigating the circumstances surrounding this person's health. By statute, the OKDHS Office of Client Advocacy has investigative authority for licensing group homes and local law enforcement is involved as appropriate. As any investigation unfolds, we will act accordingly on any issues that are identified." It's a challenging time for a mother who's seeking the truth. "I got so many conflicting stories," Butler said. Right now, Norman police investigators are looking into the situation. Source: <http://kfor.com/2017/09/13/i-got-so-many-conflicting-stories-mom-wants-answers-after-teen-suffers-serious-brain-injury-at-norman-boys-home/>

Norman Teen In Coma After Injury At Group Home Posted: Sep 14, 2017 4:05 PM PDT Updated: Sep 14, 2017 4:13 PM PDT By Aaron Brilbeck, News 9 NORMAN, Oklahoma - A Norman teen is in a coma after he was injured at a state-contracted group home. His mother says she can't get any answers about what happened. On Monday, Vionna Butler got a call that her son, 15-year-old Josiah Hill, overheated while playing basketball at the Cornerstone Boys Home for troubled teens in Norman. She went to the hospital, figuring she'd find him with an IV and a headache. Instead, "I saw my son laying basically lifeless. He was on a ventilator of course not talking, not responding, and they basically told me that there was nothing that they could do." Butler says the director of the home told her Josiah got sick playing ball, but she says a social worker said her son was hurt racing with other boys. Butler says doctors told her a mass on her son's brain burst after he was hit. "They said that he did have a mass that was in his brain and some sort of trauma caused it to burst." And Butler says this isn't the first time her son was hurt at the facility and no one told her about it. Just last month she says, "I show up there and his face is swollen. You know? And I asked him what happened and he told me he was sitting down, some kid came up behind him and just started going in on him." Butler said. "I wasn't told about it. I wasn't called. I wasn't let know." The Cornerstone Boys Home is not commenting and the state Office of Juvenile Affairs released a statement that says: "We are aware of a serious health event impacting a young person in OJA custody. Many of our staff have worked with this youth and their family and will continue to do so as medical treatment is provided. We are prepared to assist the family as needed moving forward and extend our support in this difficult time. OJA stands ready to assist any agency involved in investigating the circumstances surrounding this person's health. By statute, the OKDHS Office of Client Advocacy has investigative authority for licensing group homes and local law enforcement is involved as appropriate. As any investigation unfolds, we will act accordingly on any issues that are identified. Additional comment is not appropriate as we have not received a conclusive summary of the situation." Butler wants answers. "At the end of the day you're the parent and it's really up to you to make sure that they're ok." Source: <http://www.news9.com/story/36370929/norman-teen-in-coma-after-injury-at-group-home>

Iowa boarding school owner charged with sexually abusing teenage students IOWA CITY, Iowa (AP) — Investigators say the former owner of an Iowa boarding school used his position to coerce one teenager into a sexual relationship and others to undress for his arousal. Former Midwest Academy owner Benjamin Trane is charged with third-degree sexual abuse, sexual exploitation by a counselor and child endangerment. He turned himself in Thursday after a 19-month investigation into abuse allegations at the private, for-profit boarding school Trane operated in Keokuk. The school, which had about 100 students from mostly well-off families, closed in January 2016. Investigators allege that Trane coerced one student to engage in sex acts in order to advance in the program and be allowed to contact relatives. Trane also allegedly had others undress for "body image therapy" sessions he led, and kept students in isolation for extended periods. Source: <http://www.nh1.com/news/iowa-boarding-school-owner-charged-with-sexually-a>

Neighbors say group home for children is out of control by: Tina Terry Updated: Sep 15, 2017 - 6:21 PM MINT HILL, N.C. - Frustrated neighbors are fed up with fights, violent outbursts and daily calls to police about a group home for children. Mint Hill town leaders are researching what it would take to close it down if things don't change. The home is not far from Albemarle and Lawyers roads. The state agency that regulates the home is investigating the report. Turn Around has been certified since 2001. The police chief said his officers have been called to the house 114 times since January. Neighbors said their area used to be quiet and peaceful. "They (are) throwing things, loud and fighting constantly," neighbor Veronica Tukan said. Teens reportedly threw objects at staff in some cases. "There needs to be a change. It's my opinion that the people that supervise these girls have is non-existent," neighbor Mike Bustetter said. One neighbor said an angry teen threw this metal pipe during a recent tirade. "It's like we on the battlefield," Tukan said. The owner said she knows there is a problem and is working with police, but neighbors are taking their own steps. They complained to town leaders during a board meeting Thursday night. The police chief said he's working with other leaders to possibly strengthen the nuisance ordinance to close a facility down in situations like this. The owner said clients who act out can be relocated, but it can take more than 30 days. Source: <http://www.wsocvtv.com/news/local/neighbors-say-group-home-for-children-is-out-of-control/610022900>

Numerous violations cited at Sacramento foster care shelter campus By Karen de Sá, Cynthia Dizikes, and Joaquin Palomino September 17, 2017 Photo: Paul Chinn, The Chronicle The Children's Receiving Home of Sacramento has been cited more than 120 times in the past few years for inappropriate staff conduct, mishandled medications and filthy dorms. The Children's Receiving Home of Sacramento has been cited more... A Sacramento agency running one of the few remaining foster care shelters in California has violated health and safety laws and the personal rights of children more than 120 times in recent years — a number matched only by state-licensed facilities that have been shut down or placed on probation. State citations since 2012 at the Children's Receiving Home of Sacramento describe poorly trained staff, mishandled medications and filthy dorms. This year, an employee was terminated for an "inappropriate relationship" with an underage client and for smoking marijuana with runaway foster youth. On Sept. 8, a state inspector was unable to remain in a bedroom because the stench of urine overwhelmed her. The privately run facility has a troubled history of poor performance it has not yet overcome. Three years ago, state regulators placed the Receiving Home on an extensive 12-month correction plan, after its failure to make earlier, promised reforms. Supervisors "failed to report multiple allegations of sexual and other inappropriate conduct by staff toward clients at the facility"; children were assaulted and injured due to lack of care and supervision; and staff failed to call 911 when a child nearly drowned in the facility's pool, a January 2014 letter from the California Department of Social Services states. The number of citations at the 89-bed facility on Auburn Boulevard "doesn't surprise me, not at all. It sounds about right," said foster youth Malik Pinckney, 18, who was sent as a younger teen to the Receiving Home campus. "It's almost like they want to get shut down, like they don't think people are going to check. It's just neglectful, pure neglect, of everything at the place — the buildings, and the kids." More on Foster Care State demands fixes in San Joaquin foster care system State orders troubled Sacramento foster care office to close Foster children at risk in Sacramento intake center Licensing violations can be found throughout California's network of more than 900 children's residential care facilities, which range from two to 216 beds. But the total number of citations at the shelter and adjoining residential programs run by the Children's Receiving Home of Sacramento stands out, state records show, with a notably high number of violations that pose "an immediate risk." David Ballard, longtime CEO of the nonprofit Children's Receiving Home, said his agency strives to provide the best of care for foster youth, and he attributed the high number of citations to particularly diligent reporting to state authorities. "We've made a decision to err on the side of caution and over-reporting," Ballard said. "If we think we have a problem, we don't debate it here, we report it to licensing and they come out. That's something we have asked for to make sure we have a crisp and clean operation." State and county officials declined to comment on the significance of the high number of citations, saying individual foster care facilities are unique and should not be compared. A Chronicle investigation published this year revealed additional hazards for youth placed at the facility. The report documented hundreds of questionable arrests on shelter campuses following minor misbehavior by foster youth. In Sacramento, there were more than 40 instances of foster youth being arrested and booked at the county's juvenile hall in 2015 and 2016 from the Children's Receiving Home campus, including some children as young as 9 and 10. Unlike group homes in California, which are shifting to short-term treatment centers, shelters simply house children that the foster care system can't place. Most California counties have moved away from the shelter model, which is considered outmoded. Next year, just seven of the state's 58 counties will operate shelters, under new requirements that children remain no more than 10 days. The Sacramento facility, however, is expanding its services to accommodate more children, and is set to receive an additional $700,000 in county funding. The Children's Receiving Home is in some ways unique. Its main campus contains the 49-bed emergency shelter for newborns through children up to 18 years old, and several residential treatment programs. It also leases space to Sacramento County, which operates a central intake office where social workers and police bring children immediately after they've been removed from troubled homes. As The Chronicle reported in July, for years, hundreds of children have been left to sleep on the floor of the county intake office, in an illegal, makeshift arrangement that left teenagers vulnerable to human trafficking in the neighborhood and other safety hazards. Following exposure, county officials responsible for the intake office are now taking steps to end the illegal housing practice — mainly by shifting children with more challenging behaviors into the adjacent shelter, with one-on-one staffing and additional mental health services. Pinckney, who now lives with a foster family, recalls some employees' kindnesses at the Sacramento facility — granting extra time on the basketball court, or simply listening when kids needed to talk. But twice in 10 days, he said, "savage" fights broke out that counselors failed to break up with any urgency, and girls left campus alone late at night with no one trying to stop them. Pinckney described conditions in the dorms and bathrooms as "nasty." Although foster youths' medical records are often hard to access amid their many moves, the Sacramento facility has repeatedly been cited for avoidable errors, such as an incident where a child was mistakenly given a sibling's medications. Authorities also noted: "There have been numerous incidents in which clients did not receive their medications as prescribed due to errors, communication problems and medications not filled timely." In some cases, employees' poor choices resulted in injuries, such as staff failing to take a child to the doctor in time to get stitches after a fight broke out. State citations also reveal shortcomings in ensuring children are provided structured activities to make their lives in institutional care more normal and less dull. The facility has not "utilized an activity plan to keep the children engaged," investigators noted in one report, canceling activities for some youth that prompted them to run away. On rarer occasions, abuse by staffers has also been documented, including a former counselor sentenced to a year in jail in 2013 for having sex with a 16-year-old client and furnishing her with marijuana. Another citation for a staffer smoking marijuana with clients was issued just last month. The licensing division of the state

Department of Social Services responds to complaints and conducts inspections of residential care facilities. When citations are issued, a facility must submit a plan of correction. If those plans fail, the department has a range of enforcement options, from issuing citations and civil penalties to revoking a facility's license. Observers say the repeated violations in Sacramento illustrate troubling patterns. Pay at the Sacramento facility is the lowest among 10 shelter programs reviewed by the newspaper, with a starting hourly wage recently raised to $11.50 — $1 less than at the local In-N-Out Burger. "It's most disheartening that they haven't cleaned up their act in any appreciable way — the staff has carte blanche to do whatever they want to do without any competent supervision by the administration there," said Sacramento psychologist and attorney Joseph George, who represented the abused 16-year-old foster youth and whose office interviewed more than 18 former employees. Director Ballard would not comment on specific staff abuse cases, but said he has been disturbed by the repeated incidents: "I've been very conscious of that, and I do see that pattern," he said. Ballard said the facility has responded to each citation through termination, discipline, improved training or policy changes. "It's still a work in progress, but my goal is to be responsive to the fact that I was seeing too many staff errors, and my goal is to see fewer errors." He later wrote to the newspaper to clarify those remarks, stating his facility "does critically needed work, for the best kids, delivered by the most dedicated staff, every day. We make mistakes. Everybody does. But the ledger here — the work itself — is overwhelmingly to the good." Sacramento County is heavily reliant on the Receiving Home to house foster youth who social workers have been unable to place with relatives or foster parents. The facility is well-known locally, visited regularly by local and state elected officials. Yet citations in recent years include "dirt and grime" throughout bedrooms, and soiled shower stalls. At the cottage housing children 6 years old and younger, water ran as hot as 129.5 degrees, well above scalding temperature. On Sept. 8, a state Licensing Program Analyst was repelled by what she found on an unannounced visit to a dorm: "Bedroom #5 has a very strong smell of urine and there were 6 flies observed over the bed of one of the clients," she wrote. "The odor was so strong LPA was unable to stay in the room." Foster youth Pinckney, who is now studying music and psychology at Cosumnes River College in Sacramento, said the shelter environment led him to one conclusion: "You just don't want to be there longer than you have to. It was just an overall terrible experience that I wouldn't recommend for anybody." Karen de Sá, Cynthia Dizikes and Joaquin Palomino are staff writers on The San Francisco Chronicle's Investigative Team. Email: kdesa@sfgchronicle.com, ipalomino@sfgchronicle.com, cdizikes@sfgchronicle.com Twitter: @JoaquinPalomino, @cdizikes Source: <http://www.sfgchronicle.com/news/article/Numerous-violations-cited-at-Sacramento-foster-12203449.php>

No foster child will be forgotten: A state mandate means all kids in the system will have attorneys on their side L.E. Baskow Elliot Brittain, a (now) 22-year-old who received a lawyer through the Children's Attorneys Project, takes a little time at the Rainbow Family Park on Tuesday, September 12, 2017. By April Corbin (contact) Monday, Sept. 18, 2017 | 2 a.m. When Elliot Brittain was 17, the two people who'd been raising him — his grandparents — both died unexpectedly, and he found himself immersed in the Clark County foster care system. He was called to family court for a hearing to determine whether his mother, who had relinquished custody of him when he was 5, or his father, whom he had never met and knew only by name, were willing and able to take care of him. "I was not prepared for these circumstances," said Brittain, now 22. "Although I was almost considered an adult, I was unprepared to begin my life." Fortunately, he was not alone. Through the Legal Aid Center of Southern Nevada's Children's Attorneys Project, Brittain was assigned a lawyer to help him navigate the legal process and protect his interests. "He represented me and walked me through every step of the process," Brittain said, "everything from taking your shoes off at the scanner (when entering the courthouse) to what was expected of me. He made the language plain. He represented my wishes." Brittain described that lawyer as a mentor who helped him become the man he is today — a UNLV student who strives to someday work with people suffering from mental illness and substance abuse issues. As a member of the nonprofit's youth advisory panel, Brittain also is adamant that all children deserve the same legal representation and assistance he received. The state of Nevada agrees. During this year's legislative session, lawmakers passed Senate Bill 305, which requires courts to appoint an attorney to represent children during civil cases involving abuse or neglect and the termination of parental rights. The bill also allows counties to increase recorder fees by $3 to help fund such lawyers. Clark County Commissioners are taking advantage of the funding mechanism. Recorder fees for most real estate-related documents (deeds and foreclosures, for example) already funnel $3 to the Children's Attorneys Project, and the commission unanimously voted Sept. 5 to raise that by $2 starting Oct. 1. The change is expected to bring in an additional $1.4 million for the program. Some of those dollars will offset what is expected to be a halving of the appropriation given from the county's general fund budget next year, says Legal Aid Center Executive Director Barbara Buckley, a former assemblywoman. This fiscal year, the county provided $680,000 to the nonprofit for all of its services, which also include domestic violence, consumer rights and other common legal issues. Commissioners noted that the funding change provides the county with some wiggle room if more lawyers are needed than currently anticipated. The Children's Attorneys Project has a staff of 20 as well as 300 volunteer attorneys, most of whom specialize in fields other than family court but are trained and supported by the Legal Aid Center. It represents 85 percent of the kids within the county foster care system, approximately 3,000. And increased funding is expected to bring independent counsel to the remaining 15 percent. "Having an attorney means your case isn't forgotten, that you are not forgotten," Buckley said. "If anyone deserves that, it's these kids." "This is the highest priority," said Commissioner Jim Gibson, an attorney. "The difficulty is there will always be constraints on government. We need to step up. This is a time when we can." Sometimes lawyers just need to thoughtfully explain the legal process to a child. Other times, they must fight against adults who are knowingly acting against the child's best interests. Buckley cited a recent case in which a victim of sexual abuse was denied counseling by her mother because the mother did not want her to testify against the alleged abuser — her stepdad. The child's lawyer went to court to force the mother to take her daughter to a mental health provider. In another case, a teenager fought plans that would have uprooted her from her neighborhood. "She said, 'High school and ROTC are the only things I have,'" Buckley recalls. "So we insisted. ... She was able to stay nearby. She felt empowered. She was able to hold onto something that she really needed." Such positive outcomes would have been far less likely a few decades ago. Nevada is the 41st state to mandate lawyers for children in foster care. "Thirty years ago, kids weren't seen as having rights," said Buckley, who founded the Children's Attorneys Project in 1999 at the request of the county. "Before this project, sometimes children were an afterthought. ... People sometimes say, 'How do the kids know what they want?' They are incredibly smart and resilient. They are the ones living this life. They know. And they want to be heard." Not feeling heard was a familiar issue for Stephanie. The 15-year-old graphic design student at Advanced Technologies Academy said she grew up dealing with case workers who never seemed to care about what was best for her. "Nobody asked me what I wanted," she said. So, when she was appointed a lawyer through the Children's Attorneys Project, she expected more of the same. Instead, the lawyer fought for what Stephanie wanted, which was to remain under the care of her grandmother and not be forced to return to the mother who had years earlier left her with a stranger and then forgotten where the stranger lived. "It was weird to be around (my lawyer)," Stephanie said. "I'd never had anyone stand up and fight for my rights before." Stephanie won. Legal guardianship was granted to her grandmother. "It was my 14th birthday," she said. "I was so surprised. It was the best birthday present ever, a gift that will stay with me forever." 10 Comments 6Share Source: <https://lasvegassun.com/news/2017/sep/18/no-foster-child-will-be-forgotten-a-state-mandate/#>

Civil Suit Alleges Hanna Boys Center Female Employee Had Sex With Teen September 19, 2017 4:10 PM Filed Under: Civil Suit, Hanna Boys Center, Sonoma County, Sonoma Valley, unlawful sex act SONOMA COUNTY (CBS SF) — A civil suit was filed Tuesday that alleges a female staff member at the Hanna Boys Center had sexual intercourse on several occasions last year with an underage boy at the residential treatment center in Sonoma for at-risk youth. The complaint alleges staff counselor Angelica Malinski took advantage of "virtually non-existent staff supervision" to groom the 17-year-old boy from the East Bay, eventually having sex with him at least three times between September and October in her staff room. The Sonoma County District Attorney's Office charged Malinski, 22, with a misdemeanor charge of engaging in an unlawful sex act. A settlement conference is scheduled Thursday in Sonoma County Superior Court. ADVERTISING In the complaint filed in Sonoma County Superior Court, Oakland attorney Micha Star Liberty said the Hanna Boy's Center's motto is 'turning hurt into hope,' but the Hanna Boys Center's negligent conduct turned "hope into hurt." "He was fractured in some ways and it shattered him," Liberty said. The teen was having issues with impulsive/reactive behaviors and enrolled in the Hanna Boys Center on June 16, 2016, according to the complaint. The center has an on-campus high school and was founded by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Santa Rosa. An attorney for the diocese did not return a call for comment on the complaint. The complaint alleges the Hanna Boys Center ignored concerns about the care and safety of the children at the Center. The Center's former clinical director, Dr. Timothy Norman, filed a whistle-blower lawsuit in June that contained his, parents' and staff members' concerns, according to the complaint. Norman subsequently was fired. The Hanna Boys Center's Clinical Director Kevin Thorpe, 39, of Rohnert Park, who was the teen's caseworker, was arrested in June for alleged sexual abuse at the Center. He is charged with 15 counts of forced oral copulation of two minors between Jan. 2, 2007 and Aug. 7, 2010. He is being held under $1.5 million bail in the Sonoma County Jail and is scheduled to enter a plea Wednesday in Sonoma County Superior Court. The civil complaint filed by Liberty today seeks damages for negligence in hiring, training, retention and supervision of employees, infliction of emotional distress, intentional and negligent misrepresentation and breach of contract. Liberty also is demanding a jury trial on the allegations. Source:

<http://sanfrancisco.cbslocal.com/2017/09/19/civil-suit-alleges-hanna-boys-center-female-employee-had-sex-with-teen/>

Former Wordsworth staffer admits sexually assaulting 3 teen girls at W. Philly site Updated: September 22, 2017 — 3:47 PM EDT 4. by Joseph A. Slobodzian, Staff Writer @JoeSlobo | jslobodzian@phillynews.com Email @JoeSlobo Joseph A. Slobodzian Staff Writer Joseph A. Slobodzian has been a reporter for the Inquirer since 1982 and has covered a variety of beats, including the New Jersey Statehouse and state government, federal courts and agencies, and, since 2008, Philadelphia's criminal justice system. More by Joseph A. Slobodzian Former Wordsworth staffer admits sexually assaulting 3 teen girls at W. Philly site Sep 22 An ill-fated trip from the suburbs to the city to buy drugs Sep 21 Out for the season Sep 20 More from Joseph A. Slobodzian A former staffer at the shuttered Wordsworth residential youth-treatment center pleaded guilty Friday to sexually assaulting three teenage girls who had been placed at the West Philadelphia facility. More Coverage Wordsworth plaintiffs in deal to pursue insurance proceeds Death, rapes, and broken bones at Philly's only residential treatment center for troubled youth Re-think placing children in a facility like Wordsworth The assaults to which Isaac Outten, 38, admitted during a hearing before a Common Pleas Court judge took place in fall 2015, one year before state officials ordered Wordsworth closed after a 17-year-old boy died in a fight with staffers who had come to his room looking for a stolen iPod. The Oct. 13, 2016, suffocation death of David Hess, 17, of Lebanon, Pa., <http://bit.ly/2f9mwaz> has been ruled a homicide but no charges have been filed. His death capped a decade of allegations and charges of sexual and physical abuse at what was the city's only residential treatment center for troubled youth, as chronicled by the Inquirer and Daily News in April <http://bit.ly/2oCBvVF>. In July, facing numerous lawsuits alleging sexual or physical abuse by employees, Wordsworth officials filed for bankruptcy and announced that the company would be acquired by the Philadelphia-based Public Health Management Corp. Outten, who now lives in a Richmond, Va., suburb, pleaded guilty to one count each of statutory sexual assault, institutional sexual assault, and unlawful contact with a minor from an Oct. 19, 2015, incident involving a 15-year-old girl. Outten also pleaded guilty to two counts of institutional sexual assault and two counts of unlawful contact with a minor from an Oct. 26, 2015, incident with a 17-year-old and an Oct. 11, 2015, incident with another 17-year-old. Philadelphia Police Isaac Outten All three assaults occurred at Wordsworth's facility at 3905 Ford Rd. Judge Roger F. Gordon ordered a presentencing and mental-health evaluation and set sentencing for Dec. 21. Assistant District Attorney Kelly Harrell said Outten's plea agreement did not include a recommended prison term, although her office agreed to drop a series of related charges that would have increased his prison time. The most serious charge to which Outten pleaded guilty — statutory sexual assault — is a first-degree felony that carries a maximum of 10 to 20 years in prison. The state's sentencing guidelines, however, could yield a recommended prison term of one to two years, according to Harrell. Outten, who has no prior criminal record, was allowed to remain free on $10,000 bail until sentencing. Outten's attorney, David D. Wasson III, said after the hearing that Outten did not wish to comment. Wasson said Outten, the father of several young children, moved to Virginia in 2015 after Wordsworth officials learned of the sexual assaults and fired him. Harrell said judges had placed the three girls at the Ford Road facility as "juvenile dependents" because they were not able to live at home. Harrell said Outten lured the girls to the basement for sex and forced them to take naked photos of themselves with his iPhone. Outten promised the 15-year-old money for diapers and milk for her 1-year-old child in exchange for sex, Harrell said. He promised one of the 17-year-olds he would help with a criminal case. In addition to the criminal charges against him, Outten has been added as a defendant in a Common Pleas Court lawsuit filed against Wordsworth by his 15-year-old victim. Source: <http://www.philly.com/philly/news/crime/former-wordsworth-staffer-admits-sexually-assaulting-3-teen-girls-at-w-phila-site-20170922.html>

Children with disabilities abused at group home, complaints allege A state-funded group home that is supposed to help South Florida children with disabilities has racked up a history of complaints including child abuse and neglect, police and state records show. A state-funded group home that is supposed to help South Florida children with disabilities has racked up a history of complaints including child abuse and neglect, police and state records show. Ryan Van VelzerContact Reporter Privacy Policy A state-funded group home that is supposed to help South Florida children with disabilities has racked up a history of complaints including child abuse and neglect, police and state records show. The Tate Center Inc. is a nonprofit that runs group homes north of Palm Beach County as well as a destination for children with developmental disabilities and aggressive behavior. Its history is detailed in hundreds of pages of records the Sun Sentinel obtained from police, court cases and the Department of Children and Families. Among the cases: — Police held a teenager on charges he sexually assaulted an 11-year-old Boca Raton boy twice within a year while living at the Tate Center — once while staff watched a football game in another room. The assaults are alleged to have happened between 2015 and 2016. — A pending lawsuit alleges that a Tate Center employee left a 15-year-old Palm Beach County boy with scrapes and cuts on his head and an ear swollen with blood. — The Florida Attorney General's Office conducted a Medicaid fraud investigation in 2016 after a tip alleging that the Tate Center forged signatures on certificates for training that staff never received. In response to a Sun Sentinel investigation, the state agency that oversees the facility on Thursday decided to end its contract with the center, a spokeswoman said. The Tate Center declined to comment on how this will affect the facility. "We will begin working with families and waiver support coordinators to identify other providers around the state who may meet their needs," said Melanie Etters, spokeswoman for the Agency for Persons with Disabilities, which oversees the care of children with disabilities. The Department of Children and Families, which investigated the abuse allegations, declined to comment on specifics about the cases, citing confidentiality laws. Ivan Tate, 54, who started the company bearing his name back in 2008, has programs in three counties, including two homes that serve as a last resort for South Florida parents whose children have developmental disabilities: kids who can throw extreme temper tantrums, jump on desks, run away from school, yell at teachers and bite people. The center's Emerald House in Port St. Lucie and its Peridots program in Vero Beach are intensive-behavior group homes that house as many as five clients each. Often, they are children with severe autism, among other conditions. Last year, the Tate Center received about $1.3 million from the Agency for Persons with Disabilities, which refers parents to the center's services. Ryan Van Velzer, Sun Sentinel Shown is the Tate Center's Emerald House in Port St. Lucie. Shown is the Tate Center's Emerald House in Port St. Lucie. (Ryan Van Velzer, Sun Sentinel) Today, two of Tate's homes are among 19 intensive behavior homes in the surrounding region, which includes Palm Beach, Broward, St. Lucie and Indian River counties, according to the Agency for Persons with Disabilities. Tate said the children in his homes make "a lot of allegations" because they have severe behaviors and disabilities, but he said that doesn't make them factual. Nonetheless, Tate said that when child-protective investigators find proof of abuse or neglect, he fires the people involved. "We are providing services to children whose parents truly cannot maintain them in their homes," Tate said. "We do due diligence and really, really try to help these kids." "Inappropriately investigated" The first report of sexual abuse inside the Tate Center group home in Port St. Lucie happened months after a 13-year-old boy moved into the home in August 2015, according to a police report. On the night of Oct. 10 that year, the 13-year-old teen called an 11-year-old Boca Raton boy into his bedroom, according to a police report. Both boys have severe forms of autism, state records show. Once inside, the teen fondled the boy, records allege. Meanwhile, in the living room, two on-duty staff watched the third quarter of a college football game, according to a police report. Two weeks later, on Oct. 26, the Department of Children and Families received a complaint about that night. The teen "raped another kid living with us," the complaint read. A DCF investigator didn't find any evidence of abuse, according to the report. Police held a teenager on charges he sexually assaulted an 11-year-old Boca Raton boy twice within a year while living at the Tate Center — once while staff watched a football game in another room. Police held a teenager on charges he sexually assaulted an 11-year-old Boca Raton boy twice within a year while living at the Tate Center — once while staff watched a football game in another room. Chris Fulcher, a Port St. Lucie police detective who later investigated and detained the teen, said child-welfare investigators "inappropriately investigated" the October 2015 abuse. "That's my professional opinion as a former child-abuse investigator and a police officer," Fulcher said of the DCF investigation, court records show. After the assault allegation, Tate put the teen on supervision that required staff to be within arms' length at all times, he said. "Even though DCF didn't substantiate things, we put him on a safety plan," Tate said. "We monitor him differently." Still, a second allegation of abuse happened almost a year later between the same two kids in September 2016, according to the police report. Staff learned of the abuse allegation from another child in the home. When confronted, the teen admitted to molesting the boy from Boca Raton, police said. One staff member arranged for a female friend of his to pretend to be the victim's mother, put her on speakerphone and forced the teen to apologize to her for sexually abusing the boy, police said. "If you don't tell his mother right here and now that you touched [the boy] inappropriately, [staff members] will put you on the mat," a staff member told the teen, referring to a mat where they are trained to restrain clients, according to a police report. "We are providing services to children whose parents truly cannot maintain them in their homes," says Ivan Tate, 54, who started the company bearing his name back in 2008. "We do due diligence and really, really try to help these kids." "We are providing services to children whose parents truly cannot maintain them in their homes," says Ivan Tate, 54, who started the company bearing his name back in 2008. "We do due diligence and really, really try to help these kids.” When Fulcher told Tate of his findings, Tate replied that calling a client’s parents is a violation of the home’s procedures, police records state. Tate told the Sun Sentinel the teen made inappropriate comments but did not sexually assault anyone at the home, contrary to the police report. “There was no further incident of [the teen] doing anything,” Tate said. Other allegations Other families, too, have complained about the Tate Center. Tate Center staff improperly restrained a 15-year-old Lake Worth boy with severe autism, scraping his face on the ground leaving abrasions and bruises, according to a lawsuit pending against the center. The takedown was so hard it caused the boy’s ear to swell with blood, according to the lawsuit. The lawsuit, filed by the boy’s mother in Indian River County Circuit Court, alleges that the encounter happened inside a bedroom of the Peridots program house in Vero Beach in 2015. Staff violated protocol for restraining the boy, the lawsuit says. Ordinarily, staff are trained to take down children on a mat using special procedures emphasizing safety. The lawsuit argues that staff were inadequately trained and did not properly supervise the children. In another instance, staff neglected a West Palm Beach boy diagnosed with severe autism, the boy’s mother alleged in emails sent to the Tate Center and DCF. Once, his mother, Joanne Patsis, found him sitting in his own excrement, dried and crusted from sitting so long, Patsis told Tate in an email. On another visit, she found her son’s face painted with markers, she said in an email to Tate. The markers colored his mouth, face, neck and arms, and staff did not seem to have noticed, she said. Patsis pulled her son out of the home in June 2016 after a staff member allegedly grabbed his arm so hard he left a large bruise in the shape of a handprint, according to a DCF report. “I received at least four to five different versions of what staff at the home said about the bruise my son sustained, and the accident injury report was mismarked and showed a different area of the body,” Patsis wrote in a letter to Department of Children and Families Secretary Mike Carroll dated March 2017. Child-welfare investigators found no evidence of abuse, noting that the teen’s lack of communication skills made it difficult to learn how he was hurt, according to the Department of Children and Families report. Patsis said her son can answer questions if he is working with someone trained in speaking to children with autism. “[My son] had no voice in his injury,” she wrote to investigators. Earlier complaints Complaints against the center date to October 2013, when police arrested a staff member on charges of child abuse, according to a police report. Three children who lived next door to the Emerald House watched the staff member shove a boy with developmental disabilities twice, sending them both to the ground, the report said. The staff member then punched and choked the child from behind, causing him to bleed from the mouth, according to the police report. The worker, in an interview with police, called the strikes accidental. The St. Lucie County State Attorney’s Office concluded he was within his rights to use “corporal punishment” to moderately chastise for correction a child under his or her control and authority,” according to a memo from prosecutors explaining why they didn’t pursue charges. The office dropped the case but said The Tate Center could discipline the employee for violating the rules of his employment, according to the memo. Tate said he fired the employee after the incident. “If I have bad apples and bad employees, I get rid of those employees,” he said. The employee couldn’t be reached for comment. DCF inquiries DCF child-protective officials investigated 23 allegations, including abuse and neglect, at the Emerald House over a five-year span. Of those allegations, DCF determined there were two confirmed instances of the center providing inadequate supervision. DCF declined to release records of those two cases to the Sun Sentinel. The department doesn’t keep a total number of investigations for group homes, but it’s not unusual for group homes to have relatively frequent reports to the abuse hotline, said Jessica Sims, a spokeswoman for the Department of Children and Families. DCF “takes all allegations of abuse, neglect, and abandonment of children and vulnerable adults very seriously and thoroughly investigates all cases accepted by the Florida Abuse Hotline,” Sims wrote in a statement to the Sun Sentinel. The Agency for Persons with Disabilities found no indications of abuse during monthly inspections from December 2014 through the end of 2016, records show, even though police charged a teen with two counts of sexual molestation during that period. The agency said that’s because investigators write only what they observe while inside the homes in monthly inspection reports. Etters said the agency followed up on every complaint with unannounced visits and on-site reviews. The Agency for Persons with Disabilities has a zero-tolerance initiative in place “to combat sexual violence committed against persons with developmental disabilities.” The agency “holds our providers to the highest standards, and we place the safety and well-being of our clients above all else,” Etters said in a statement. The Agency for Persons with Disabilities canceled the contract without giving a reason, according to APD records. Etters didn’t explain why other than to say, “At this time, the agency feels it is in the best interest of all parties to terminate our relationship with the Tate Center.” State inquiry The Attorney General’s Office began investigating the Tate Center for Medicaid fraud last year when a subcontractor that worked with the Tate Center called in a tip. The caller alleged that the Tate Center failed to provide mandated training to staff and instead forged signatures on training certificates, attorney general’s records show. In the course of investigating, an attorney general’s investigator interviewed Elizabeth McDonald, a behavior analyst who worked with the Tate Center training staff, records show. The Florida Attorney General’s Office conducted a Medicaid fraud investigation after a tip alleging that the Tate Center forged signatures on certificates for training that staff never received. The Florida Attorney General’s Office conducted a Medicaid fraud investigation after a tip alleging that the Tate Center forged signatures on certificates for training that staff never received. McDonald told the Sun Sentinel that her signature was used to sign multiple documents certifying staff for training that she never provided. “I was furious,” she said. “That could possibly cost me my license. Because it was electronically done. It looked exactly like my signature.” When the attorney general’s investigator showed copies of forged certificates to the Tate Center, a staff administrator replied that she had never seen the documents before. In March 2016, a state investigator also interviewed Rita Castor, deputy regional operations manager with the Agency for Persons with Disabilities. Castor said she knew about “minor issues” with licensing the center and “significant problems” with how they cared for clients, but the attorney general’s report does not elaborate about what those problems were. The Sun Sentinel couldn’t reach Castor for comment. After the Florida Attorney General’s Office conducted its investigation, it referred the complaint to the Agency for Health Care Administration. That agency told the Sun Sentinel it could not provide information about the case “at this time.” It cited a state law that prohibits the agency from discussing pending investigations, even though it won’t say whether the case is open. Released from the center The day the boy from Boca Raton left the Tate Center last October, he was taken to the hospital with bruises across his body, records show. Port St. Lucie Police reported that the boy fought with staff over a DVD. Tate told the Sun Sentinel the boy was injured while trying to unscrew a light bulb. A protective investigator said he was jumping on the couch and fell off “hitting his face on [an employee’s] knee as he fell causing the black eye,” according to a DCF report. The boy had a 3-inch bruise around his eye; bruises on both arms, a knee and a leg; and a swollen ankle, according to photos taken after the incident. A child-welfare investigator said it was unclear how the boy was hurt and closed the case. A child-welfare advocate — Gordon Weekes, the chief assistant of the Broward County Public Defender’s Office, who has defended children charged as adults in Broward courts — said the boy’s bruises, and the discrepancies in how they happened, are enough to merit a second investigation by state officials. “Once this occurs very late in the game, you have to go back to all the previous stuff and look at it in a different light,” said Weekes, who is not involved in the Boca boy’s case. “Now you have to determine whether these issues are retaliation for coming forward.” Despite subsequent phone calls from the Sun Sentinel, Tate couldn’t be reached for comment about the lawsuit, the attorney general’s investigation and a state agency’s decision to end the center’s contract. The mother met her son at the hospital later that day, on Oct. 8. The Tate Center released him with only the clothes on his back — a filthy shirt and ill-fitting shorts, she said. “My son was entrusted in the care of other people after I swore I would never let anyone even baby-sit my son,” the boy’s mother said. “He was supposed to have gone there to get better, not worse.” The Tate Center’s contract with the Agency for Persons with Disabilities ends in December, Etters said. Rvanvelzer@sun-sentinel.com, 561-243-6544, or on Twitter @RyanVanVelzer Source: <http://www.sun-sentinel.com/news/florida/fl-reg-tate-center-investigation-20170817-story.html>

Documents: State, Centralia Home for Boys Didn’t Report Dozens of Claims of Abuse Sheriff’s Office Never Received Many Reports at Long-Shuttered Kiwanis Vocational Home By Natalie Johnson / njohnson@chronline.com Sep 22, 2017 4 Chronicle headlines in the 1980s and 1990s alluded to trouble at the Kiwanis Vocational Home, but nothing as explosive as claims included in a number of lawsuits filed in relation to alleged abuse, negligence and fraud at the facility, which closed in 1994. A number of allegations against state agencies and Centralia’s now-closed Kiwanis Vocational Home are being spoken aloud and taken seriously for the first time with the filing of four lawsuits by former residents since 2015. But they aren’t the first reports of child abuse, sexual misconduct and other crimes at the group foster home. “Amongst us, we always said, ‘Somebody will listen and somebody will understand,’” said former resident Bob Wallace. “It took 30 years.” The Chronicle has discovered about 40 instances in which KVH or the state Department of Social and Health Services staff investigated or received official reports of abuse and criminal activities that were never forwarded to the Lewis County Sheriff’s Office. In a number of cases, DSHS incident report forms indicate the case was referred to the Sheriff’s Office. However, no case number was ever generated, nor does the Sheriff’s Office have any record of receiving the reports. In other examples, DSHS conducted in-depth investigations into allegations of physical and sexual abuse without referring those reports to law enforcement — even when they confirmed instances of child abuse by top leadership at the facility. “It’s no surprise based on what we know of the Kiwanis Vocational Home operations that the Lewis County Sheriff’s Office was being kept in the dark,” said attorney Darrell Cochran, representing five former KVH residents in four lawsuits filed in 2015, 2016 and this year. “To have law enforcement looking in on what was happening in the Kiwanis Vocational Home would have resulted in the shutdown of that home," he added. Residents at Kiwanis Vocational Home, open from 1979 to 1994, learned early that reporting abuse often meant worse treatment in the future. "You learn to keep your mouth shut," said a resident during the 1980s who asked not to be identified due to his family ties to the area. Soon after moving into the facility, Wallace learned the same lesson. He saw a staff member hit one of the boys, so he told his mom. She reported it to KVH's administration. The next day, Wallace was beaten up by another resident. Wallace learned his lesson. Boys at the Kiwanis Vocational Home were aged 11 to 17, although some as young as 10 lived there at one point. The boys were wards of the state taken from their families and placed into foster care. Several former residents told The Chronicle that staff and administrators at KVH used bigger, older boys as enforcers when other residents tried to raise an alarm. In 1985, a concerned KVH staffer reported that boys were being used to "keep order" at the behest of the administration, just as Wallace remembers. "All it takes is one time," he said. "When you're 13 or 14 years old and some 18-year-old comes up and knocks you out, you're not going to do that too many times." Chris Calk, a resident from 1985 to 1989, said he witnessed that firsthand. He said boys earned points for being loyal to staff and for dishing out beatings to those considered "narcs." "You lived on a point system. You had positive points and negative points," he said. "It gives the kids the opportunity to earn the positive points in order to earn the chance to go to the movies or go rollerskating." The boys also earned allowances of pocket money to go to the movies or other outings, he said. Former KVH board member Henry Meister told The Chronicle in a recent interview he believes students would have reported incidents if they had happened. "These kids were smart. These kids had all been schooled on appropriate and inappropriate behavior," Meister said. "All of these kids knew to talk about it." The former residents' stories of retaliation for reporting abuse are borne out in at least one series of Sheriff's Office records dating to the last months of the Kiwanis home's existence, when it was called the Coffee Creek Center. On Feb. 21, 1994, the Sheriff's Office responded to a report that two staff members assaulted a boy at the home. The boy, 14, is described as small for his age. He told police a staff member assaulted him after he argued about taking away his cigarettes, which were not allowed at the facility, and his stereo. One man allegedly slammed the boy's head into a table. The other punched him in the ribs. When deputies returned the next day, the two suspects had already been suspended. A doctor reported the boy had three cracked ribs and a minor concussion. One of the staff members reportedly threatened to assault the boys if they talked to the police. Both men who were accused were charged. Days later, the boy with the cracked ribs and concussion shows up in another Sheriff's Office report — a victim of an assault by an older boy. He reported being assaulted again two months later, on April 27, according to Sheriff's Office reports, again by other boys. It happened again two days later, when he was assaulted again, this time by a 16-year-old boy wielding a pipe. On May 3, the boy was assaulted by other students. As he was reporting that assault to a counselor, the suspects broke through the locked office door and attacked him again. A month later, the home closed. Still, caring staff members, parents and determined students reported numerous allegations of abuse and criminal activity over the 15 years the home was open. However, records obtained by The Chronicle show dozens of instances in which KVH or DSHS staff knew about claims of abuse, sexual misconduct or other criminal activity but never forwarded them to the Sheriff's Office. The Chronicle focused on records between late 1985 and June 1994, when the home closed, because of the availability of records from the Sheriff's Office. Special Services Chief Deputy Dusty Breen, of the Lewis County Sheriff's Office, who supervises the office's records department as part of his duties, said cases filed with the office before 1985 are preserved on microfilm. While the Sheriff's Office has them, records are organized by names of involved parties, making it difficult for records to be located regarding a specific location, such as the Kiwanis Vocational Home. Timeline: Allegations and Investigations of Crimes With No Police Reports January 1986: A boy reported that another boy assaulted him and pulled his thumbs back, according to a report by KVH staff. December 1986: A boy reported another boy climbed into bed with him and grabbed his crotch. June 1987: A boy no longer at KVH reported sexual abuse at the facility. State reports indicated the case was referred to the Centralia Police Department. A records request turned up no case matching that description. The Lewis County Sheriff's Office had jurisdiction over the school. June 1987: A resident allegedly molested a staff member's daughter. September 1987: A resident reports a staff member kneed him in the stomach. December 1987: The Department of Children and Family Services, a division of DSHS, received complaints of "unreported assaults," including three instances of staff assaulting students and two cases of assaults between students. August 1988: Sexual assaults reported by staff among three boys. According to the report, one boy was punished by another boy for "not performing" with punches to the genitals. No police report exists. September 1988: Staff member accused of assault by three residents in DSHS report. December 1988: Staff member accused of assault on resident. DSHS recommended he be reprimanded. January 1989: Guy Cornwell, administrator at KVH, reprimanded an employee for corporal punishment and using sexual language with students. April 1989: Female KVH staff reported sexual harassment. June 1989: A boy reported sexual assault to a counselor. KVH documents show the report was forwarded to the Sheriff's Office, which has no record of the case. Summer 1989: Drunken KVH staffer reportedly assaulted boy. March 1990: Sexual intercourse reported among boys as young as 10. No police report exists. June 1990: Anonymous caller reported sexual, physical abuse. No corresponding police report exists. June 1990: Group home monitor at KVH reported suspected rapes. June 1990: DSHS initiated investigation into reports of sexual, physical abuse. Still no Sheriff's Office case number generated. October 1990: Improper touching reported. November 1990: "Fondling" among 12- and 13-year-olds reported. January 1991: Cornwell accused of child abuse. January 1991: Mother complained to DSHS that KVH staff gave students cigarettes. January 1991: KVH employee told DSHS of requests to falsify reports. February 1991: State Office of Special Investigations report revealed allegation marijuana given by staff to students. February 1991: Cornwell accused of child abuse by staff during DSHS investigation. February 1991: DSHS rules Cornwell's actions "inappropriate." February 1991: Boys aged 11 and 14 caught in sexual act. April 1991: Boy twice accused in separate reports of grabbing others, making "humping" motions. An internal investigation was conducted, but law enforcement was not notified. April 1991: Gropping reported. Dismissed by staff as boys "goofing off." April 1991: A second OSI investigation concluded Cornwell committed child abuse. June 1992: "Sexual truth or dare" reported among boys. DSHS classified incident in letter as "manipulation and grooming." February 1993: "Sexual acting-out" among residents reported as behavioral issue. April 1993: Resident reported staff was abusive. DSHS investigation confirmed abuse recommended termination of staff. No Sheriff's Office case number exists. August 1993: Staff accused of pushing resident off porch. March 1994: DSHS letter addressed unspecified abuse by staff members. According to DSHS, its employees, along with doctors, law enforcement officers, and many other professionals, are legally designated as "mandatory reporters," meaning they are required to report instances of suspected abuse to law enforcement or to Child Protective Services, an office within DSHS. None of the incidents listed below are associated with a Lewis County Sheriff's Office case number. In 1986, KVH and DSHS records show a report of two incidents — a physical assault between students and a report of a sexual assault, neither of which were forwarded to law enforcement. In 1987, there were eight incidents. A boy no longer at KVH reported abuse while he was there. The young child of a staff member was reportedly molested by a boy. There were four reports of assaults on boys by staff and two of assaults between boys. In 1988, one report of sexual activity among boys and two alleged assaults by staff never made it to the Sheriff's Office. Meister told The Chronicle that, as he understood it at the time, KVH staff weren't particularly concerned to find boys engaged in sexual behavior, and most often did not report it. "The fact of the matter is, people have sex," Meister said. "Do you think anybody who winds up in that situation is sexually inexperienced?" The boys at the facility were as young as 10 and as old as 17. The age of consent in Washington is 16. Meister, who never worked at the facility but said he got a good sense of the boys during his visits while a member of the board, characterized the teenaged and pre-teen residents as liars, manipulators and juvenile offenders. Some were offenders. Some had been identified as sexual predators. Others were already victims of violence — sexual or otherwise — and came from broken or abusive homes into state care. Some had been in foster care their entire lives after being surrendered by or seized from unfit parents. KVH took in developmentally disabled boys as well, and received extra funding from the state to do so. "These kids will sit there and tell you the most atrocious stories," Meister said. "You have to identify your customers." In 1989, KVH administrator Guy Cornwell wrote to another staffer reprimanding him for using inappropriately sexual language around the boys and for corporal punishment in at least one case which Cornwell called a "reportable offense" that was never reported to law enforcement. Also that year, a female staffer reported sexual harassment and a male staff member previously accused of assault faced another allegation. In June 1989, a boy reported to his counselor that another boy tried to grab his genitals. The KVH report indicates the Sheriff's Office was notified, but no corresponding case number exists. As the years wore on, more and more incidents of alleged rape and assault were reported to state agencies, but not investigated as crimes by law enforcement. In March 1990, sexual intercourse among boys aged 10 and 15 was reported. The incident was reportedly forwarded to the Sheriff's Office, but no case number exists. When asked about such cases, Breen said if the Sheriff's Office received a report after 1985 regarding the Kiwanis home, it would have showed up in their response to The Chronicle's records request. "If something came in after 1985 ... it would have generated a case number," Breen said. "If we would have initiated an investigation based on something we got, it would have been included in those records." Breen said he is not aware of any incident in which records were lost, damaged or purged. Investigations Showed Misuse of Funds, Violations and Obstruction at Centralia Kiwanis Home In June 1990, an anonymous man called the Governor's Office to make complaints of sexual and physical abuse. The Sheriff's Office has no record of being made aware of those alleged crimes. That same month, a group home monitor at KVH reported concerns regarding child sex offenders being housed with victims of sexual violence. "(T)here were periodic problems with these individuals and incidents of homosexual activity and even rape did occur," according to the report. The state Office of Special Investigations began investigating the allegations made by the anonymous caller to the Governor's Office on June 19. That month, administrators at KVH denied the allegations. Two more reports of improper sexual touching were reported by the end of the year but did not make it to the Sheriff's Office. Also in 1990, KVH director Charles McCarthy wrote a letter acknowledging that the home had come under scrutiny for not adequately reporting incidents to the state. In January 1991, Cornwell was accused of child abuse. Also that month, a mother reported to DSHS that KVH staff were giving boys cigarettes and medication without permission. An employee also reported being directed to falsify reports. In February 1991, the state Office of Special Investigations released its findings on the 1990 investigation, concluding that allegations of physical child abuse and "inappropriate touching" against McCarthy and other staff members were founded. The Sheriff's Office has no corresponding case numbers. Later that year, more reports came in to state agencies of students being "hogtied," of students being given marijuana by staff, and another accusation of abuse against Cornwell. DSHS ruled Cornwell's behavior was "inappropriate," at that time, but not strictly child abuse. DSHS also received several reports of groping and unwanted sexual advances among the boys, much of which was brushed off by KVH staff as "goofing off." In April 1991, a second OSI investigation concluded Cornwell committed child abuse. As in the previous year's investigation, in which McCarthy was confirmed to have assaulted boys, there is no record that the state's findings confirming child abuse were forwarded to local law enforcement. In mid-1992, a boy reported sexual abuse and exploitation described in a DSHS document as possible "manipulation and grooming." In 1993, reports of sexual activity among young residents continued, along with accusations of child abuse by staff. One staff member was fired after such accusations, then reinstated. In 1994, months before the facility closed, DSHS raised concerns about reports of unspecified child abuse with KVH. A handful of criminal allegations did make it to the Sheriff's Office. In 1982, a boy called 911 to report a staffer at KVH forced him to perform oral sex. KVH director Charles McCarthy intercepted the call and told police not to worry about the report, saying the boy just wanted to leave the home, according to a transcript of the call. "You never made a phone call without a staff member standing right there over your shoulder," Calk said. In a 2015 deposition in one of the lawsuits, McCarthy told attorneys he didn't remember the boy or the incident and said another staff member would have been responsible for reporting the incident. Attorneys showed McCarthy the transcript of the call. "Oh, I see it, yeah. But I mean, I'm not surprised," he said. "Because as a probation officer I would take statements and a lot of the times they were making them up and lying about it. So I had that training to know that (you) don't expect the, the truth the first time around." He then denied again being involved in the incident. He went on to deny any involvement with several documents signed with his name, according to the deposition transcript. The report was referred to the Thurston County Sheriff's Office after initial investigation in Lewis County, because the events reportedly happened north of the county line. In 1986, the Sheriff's Office received a report that a boy told counselors he was sexually assaulted by another boy at knifepoint. After investigation, police concluded the sexual contact was not unwanted after all, despite the alleged victim having a cut on his arm from the knife. Meister told The Chronicle the boys at the home were considered unreliable witnesses at the time and accused former residents coming forward now of lying in the hope of a payday from a lawsuit. "The issue I have, where these kids come from, I'm not being unsympathetic. I wouldn't trust any one of them as far as I can throw them," he said. "I don't care what the situation or the circumstances is. None of these kids is naive." In September 1988, the Sheriff's Office responded and made an arrest in the case of a sexual contact between boys. The next year, a student was arrested on suspicion of molesting a staff member's daughter. In 1990, deputies responded after a developmentally disabled 16-year-old boy, who had previously been a rape victim, reported another 16-year-old raped him and threatened him. A deputy wrote in an initial report that the suspect had been accused in the past and was at "a high risk to reoffend." The victim reported the suspect threatened him and his family if he told anyone about the incident. When a detective began investigating the case a month later, he reported the victim changed his story to say the sexual contact was all his idea. The detective concluded the incident was consensual. No charges were filed. Also in 1990, deputies received a report of a sexual assault involving a 12-year-old victim. The boy's mother told police school administrators asked her not to report the incident. A first-degree rape charge was filed against the 14-year-old suspect. That year a staff member was reported to have assaulted a boy, but was cleared after an investigation. Deputies responded in 1993 to a report of sexual contact involving a female teacher. No charges were filed. The same year, they responded to two reports of indecent exposure among students. In 1994, two staff members lost their jobs after allegations of abuse investigated by the Sheriff's Office. Not the First Time: Recalling the Olympia Kiwanis Boys Ranch By The Chronicle Founded in 1971, the Olympia Kiwanis Boys Home, or OKBR, was similar in many ways to Centralia's Kiwanis Vocational Home. Both homes housed troubled boys as young as 10 years old in the foster system. Both were accused of abuse and mismanagement throughout their lives, and both were shut down by the state in 1994. While Centralia's KVH stayed out of the news, boys who lived at the OKBR began filing lawsuits as early as 1995 against the state and the Kiwanis club. Like the allegations against KVH, OKBR allegedly hired unqualified staff and was a breeding ground for sexual and physical abuse among the residents as well as involving staff. According to law firm Pfau Cochran Vertetis Amala, representing plaintiffs in lawsuits for both the OKBR and the KVH, when the OKBR was shut down, reportable incidents of physical or sexual abuse were happening twice a week. Like KVH, OKBR started with a handful of boys and grew to about 70. Since it closed, the state has spent at least $50 million settling cases related to OKBR, according to the law firm. In contrast, school staff were diligent in reporting incidents to law enforcement in which the boys were to blame, including dozens of reported assaults ranging from the serious — boys throwing stolen kitchen knives at each other — to the questionable — for out of control food fights and throwing a volleyball at a teacher. Between late 1985 and December 1990, only 10 assaults either between boys or involving staff were reported to police. Two months after that, in February 1991, DSHS released its findings of a special investigation into claims of abuse and financial mismanagement, and the school came under new administrators. It also decreased from more than 70 students to roughly a dozen. In 1991, the home reported 16 assaults with teens listed as suspects. All but one was a misdemeanor assault, and all but one were between boys. In 1992, KVH reported 23 assaults, again all misdemeanors but one and all perpetrated by students. In 1993, KVH reported 37 assaults, all misdemeanors but one, all perpetrated by students. In 1994, in which the school was open only six months, police responded to 15 reports of assaults. Two of those incidents involved a student being assaulted by a staff member and the rest were incidents between students. In addition to assaults, boys were regularly reported for burglary and theft for stealing candy and other items. Police responded and issued citations to boys for punching each other and pushing each other down — incidents not referred to the Sheriff's Office when allegedly committed by a staff member. Several students were cited for hitting a staff member while flailing their arms in the course of being tackled by staff. Staff members throwing boys to the ground is commonly referenced in KVH documents as an acceptable way to subdue them when they got out of hand. However, some accused staff of going too far, then trying to cover it up. Wallace recounted an incident in which a staff member slammed him into a concrete slab at the shop building, tearing the ligaments in his knee. The next day, Wallace's leg was blue and swollen, and he was taken to the doctor. Staff told him to tell the doctor he tripped and fell, he said. "If you deviate from that story then there will be hell to pay... because then they'd just turn kids on you," he said. Wallace stuck to his story. He'd already learned his lesson. "If you were caught snitching you were deemed as a narc ... nine times out of 10 you could look forward to getting a good a— whooping," Calk said. Wallace said many residents, himself included, spent most of their lives still hiding what happened at the facility, thinking that no one would believe their stories. In the decades since he left, he said he's only opened up to a handful of people. "It's 35 years after the fact, but they can't kick our butts anymore," he said. ••• Source: http://www.chronline.com/news/documents-state-kiwanis-home-failed-to-report-dozens-of-allegations/article_dd84565c-a01b-11e7-9521-b33114381fc4.html

Utah County therapist arrested for alleged sexual abuse of underage girl Posted 2:17 pm, September 26, 2017, by Ashton Edwards. Updated at 09:32PM, September 26, 2017 Facebook 754 Twitter Reddit Pinterest LinkedIn Email UTAH COUNTY, Utah - A licensed marriage and family therapist has been arrested for allegedly sexually abusing an underage girl in Utah County. The Utah County Sheriff's Office said 41-year-old Jason Scott Calder, of Bountiful, is facing charges of rape, forcible sodomy and forcible sexual abuse. Until recently, Calder worked at a youth treatment center in Utah County. Officials would not confirm the specific treatment center. One of his former patients, a 16-year-old girl, told her new therapist Calder had sexually abused her multiple times from March 2017 through June 2017. "He's brought on to work in these facilities as a counselor and a therapist. He's in a position of trust," said Lt. Eric Knutzen with the Utah County Sheriff's Office. "He's there to help whatever issue it is the person is dealing with and to provide some sort of council, not to overstep and take advantage a victim." "We did a search warrant on his house up in Bountiful, found some evidence that kind of corroborated what was said by our victim," said Lt. Knutzen. The victim said the alleged abuse happened during scheduled therapy sessions with Calder when she was a resident in the inpatient youth treatment facility where Calder worked. Authorities arrested Calder and booked him into the Utah County Jail on the following charges: one count of rape, 10 counts of forcible sodomy and one count of forcible sexual abuse. Authorities set bail for Calder at $100,000, cash only. The Utah County Sheriff's Office said Calder had most recently been working at a residential treatment center in Salt Lake County. Officials did not confirm which facility but said his employment there was terminated. Detectives said they would like to hear from anyone who believes they may have been abused by Calder, or if anyone knows of someone who might have been victimized by Calder. You can contact the Utah County Sheriff's Office at (801) 851-4010. Calder's official provider information on the government website lists his primary practice address as 1135 Vine St. in Murray. However, the webpage states it has not been updated since 2007. Photo Gallery View Gallery \(4 images\) Inline According to what appears to be Calder's Facebook page, he attended Woods Cross High, Brigham Young University and Indiana State University. The page also states he is a program director at Live for Life Residential Treatment Center in West Jordan and started in June 2017. Other posts on the page indicate he stopped working at the New Haven Residential Treatment Center in Spanish Fork in June of 2017 Jason Calder - NewHavenrtc.com NewHavenrtc.com, which lists Calder as an employee, states it has locations in Spanish Fork and Saratoga Springs. According to its website: Jason is an award-winning psychotherapist who has been in the industry since 1999, working as a front-line staff, therapist or clinician. He has experience in both a residential and wilderness environment that makes it easy to relate to the students at New Haven. Jason chose to work at New Haven due to the program's long-standing reputation for clinical quality and restorative relationships. Jason gets satisfaction as he witnesses each student regain her sense of personal identity and value. Jason has given presentations around the country to mental health professionals, physicians and families on the neurological effects of process addictions, supportive treatments for Autism Spectrum Disorders and the experiential interventions to help adolescents find greater meaning and purpose in their lives. He has appeared on 20/20 \(post-production\), in The Atlantic, and his work has been featured on CNN and CBS News. Jason was raised in Bountiful, UT where he enjoyed spending time in nature. His hobbies include canyoneering, snowboarding, reading, whitewater kayaking, cooking, backpacking, caving and spending time with his wife and daughter. Jason Calder - allkindsoftherapy.com According to allkindsoftherapy.com, Jason Calder, LMFT, CMHC is a Licensed Marriage and Family Therapist and a Clinical Mental Health Counselor. He graduated from Brigham Young University (2000) with a BS in Marriage, Family and Human Development. Jason's MS is from Indiana State University (2003) in Marriage and Family Therapy. On Dec. 1, 2015, allkindsoftherapy.com reported Calder was the clinical director at Outback Therapeutic Expeditions in Lehi, Utah, and said he also ran its Unplugged program. Calder's Facebook page states he also worked at the Summit Preparatory School in Kalispell, Montana, as assistant clinical director from Aug. 2007 to July 2014. Jason Calder - Facebook Previous posts on his Facebook page from 2011-2012 show him on outdoor trips with what he says is his Boy Scouts of America Varsity Troop. He also indicates he worked as a therapist La Europa Academy in Murray, Utah, until Aug. 2007. Source: http://fox13now.com/2017/09/26/utah-county-therapist-arrested-for-alleged-sexual-abuse-of-underage-girl/

State shuts down Pueblo treatment center after complaints that children were underfed, abused El Pueblo Boys & Girls Ranch was shut down by the state this week. A mental health and substance abuse treatment center for children was shut down by state authorities this week following complaints that children were abused and underfed. El Pueblo Boys & Girls Ranch, with 12 cottages on 56 acres in Pueblo, was ordered to "immediately desist" caring for children by the Colorado Department of Human Services. The ranch, which treated children with severe behavioral or psychiatric needs, could lose its child care licence permanently. All 37 children living at the ranch had been moved by Tuesday night, some returning home to parents and others going to foster homes, group homes or other residential treatment centers, human services officials said. A child who ran away from El Pueblo last month and boarded a train alone later told authorities children bullied each other and stole each other's food because they were hungry, according to the state's suspension order. The child said they lacked medical attention and that staff did not intervene when children fought with each other. Related Articles May 24, 2017 Foster care shift: Colorado kids removed from homes now more likely to live with relatives than in group setting February 29, 2016 Denver County Human Services to close center for foster teens This month, child welfare authorities received complaints that a "high-needs child" did not receive prescribed medications while at the ranch and left with burns. And in another complaint, a staff member was accused of pulling a child's hair, scratching the child and hitting the child with an elbow and a knee, according to the suspension order. The child also was punched in the mouth, the document said. Also this month, a mentally low-functioning child escaped out of a bedroom window, was missing for more than hour and crossed two streets, according to another complaint. Other allegations involved a child who suffered severe weight loss after 10 months at the center and an administrator refusing to intervene for 25 minutes as a child pulled off their own skin "and was chewing and eating it." Staff repeatedly asked for permission to intervene and "the request was denied," the suspension order states. The privately run, non-profit ranch was licensed in 1995. It was authorized to care for up to 166 children ages 5 to 21. El Pueblo officials did not return a request for comment Thursday. Source: http://www.denverpost.com/2017/09/28/el-pueblo-boys-and-girls-ranch-closed/

Maryland school aide sentenced to 100 years in prison after sexually abusing at least a dozen boys | Fox News Maryland school aide sentenced to 100 years in prison after sexually abusing at least a dozen boys Fox News Facebook Twitter Print Email Deonte Carraway, 24, was sentenced Thursday to 100 years in prison after he confessed to sexually abusing at least 12 boys. (Prince George's County Police Department) A former Maryland school aide who confessed to sexually abusing children was sentenced Thursday to 100 years in prison. Deonte Carraway, 24, was indicted in 2016 on 270 charges of child abuse and porn, and in January pleaded guilty in federal court to recording at least a dozen boys engaging in sexual activities inside of Judge Sylvania Woods Elementary School, where he volunteered, Fox 5 DC reported, KINDERGARTEN TEACHER, 39, WHO HAD SEX WITH AT LEAST SIX TEENS AGREES TO JAIL TIME. Carraway pressured children ages 9 to 13 to send him inappropriate photos through social media, or the messenger app KIK. Authorities had said that Carraway, who also worked as director of a local youth choir group, used his position to take advantage of children. An investigation into the situation began when an uncle of one of the students involved discovered explicit messages and reported it to authorities. Carraway told children that he would give them cell phones -- but only if they joined a club he created and send him improper photos using the provided phones. He later threatened to call the police or their parents if they didn't continue to send him photos, The Washington Post reported. Carraway apologized last month, saying: "I wish I could go back and stop myself from doing it." At a previous court appearance, Carraway said that "kids have my heart... when I'm around kids, I feel like a child," according to The Post. MASSACHUSETTS REGISTRY LACKS INFO ON 1,700 SEX OFFENDERS His public defender reportedly argued that Carraway himself had been a victim of abuse, and also said his IQ was 60. In July, Carraway wrote a letter to the judge requesting all charges against him be dropped due to insufficient legal representation, alleging he hadn't heard from his lawyer in more than a year. The former aide agreed in January to a prison sentence of at least 60 years as part of a plea deal. The Prince George County Public School system that Carraway volunteered with has reportedly created a task force in the aftermath of the abuse as a way to change how it handles reports of that nature. Source: http://www.foxnews.com/us/2017/09/28/maryland-school-aide-sentenced-to-100-years-in-prison-after-sexually-abusing-at-least-dozen-boys.html

Federal inspectors criticize Oklahoma's oversight of group foster care homes by Randy Ellis Published: October 2, 2017 5:00 AM CDT Updated: October 2, 2017 5:00 AM CDT 0 shares facebook twitter pinterest email comments Advertisement Holes in the walls of Oklahoma group foster homes, including one with exposed wiring, were among the problems uncovered by federal inspectors [PHOTOS PROVIDED] Cracked windows, holes in walls and celery so old that it had turned brown and begun to liquefy were among dozens of health and safety violations federal inspectors found when they visited Oklahoma's group homes for foster children. Seventeen of Oklahoma's 22 foster group homes were in violation of at least one state health and safety requirement, according to a newly released report by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services Office of Inspector General. Several had multiple violations. There are currently a little more than 9,000 children in state custody and about 150 to 160 of them are typically in group homes at any given time, state officials said. Windows with cracked or broken glass, peeling paint on interior walls, hazardous cleaning materials within reach of children and numerous holes in walls — including one hole with exposed wiring — were among the problems found during group home inspections. Examples of other violations included: • Refrigerators in four homes that had not been maintained in sanitary conditions, including one refrigerator that contained "celery that had turned brown and partially liquefied." • Group home vehicles with trashed out interiors, missing gas caps, a broken seat belt tied to a door, a shattered window, low tire tread, a broken signal light, broken passenger side mirror and unbolted driver's side mirror. • An emergency exit at one home was blocked by a bed and trash and broken glass were found on the patio behind one of the facilities. • Expired fire extinguishers. • Mold, mildew and calcium buildup were found in multiple bathrooms used by children in one group home. "Although Oklahoma performed the required on-site monitoring at all 22 group homes, this on-site monitoring did not ensure that foster care group homes complied with state licensing and federal requirements related to the health and safety of children in foster care," the inspector general's office said. Federal inspectors acknowledged that some of the violations may have surfaced after the most recent state inspection, but said "other issues of noncompliance represent a prolonged period of noncompliance and should have been corrected if those issues had been documented and resolved during the state's monitoring." Kristi Simpson, statewide licensing coordinator for the Oklahoma Department of Human Services, said steps already have been taken to fix some of the problems noted by the inspector general. The department "has already provided training to licensing staff regarding the documentation of non-compliances and appropriate notices to comply," Simpson said in a letter to the inspector general's office that also was provided to The Oklahoman. "Licensing staff will monitor and document that all programs make the licensing requirements available to their staff and assure their knowledge of them," Simpson said. Simpson took issue with a recommendation that the state needs to revise its requirements for licensing and monitoring vehicles used by group homes to transport children, insisting that sufficient requirements were already in place. "Licensing staff have been trained to annually monitor each vehicle to determine compliance with requirements," she wrote. "The program's written maintenance logs are monitored at each monitoring visit." Source: <http://newsok.com/federal-inspectors-criticize-oklahomas-oversight-of-group-foster-care-homes/article/5566283>

They thought they were going to rehab. They ended up in chicken plants Issues Reveal Staff · Oct 5, 2017 Men sent to Christian Alcoholics & Addicts in Recovery, better known as CAAIR, work full time at chicken processing plants. The hours are long, the conditions are brutal and the program keeps all the wages. Gabriel Hongdsutit | Reveal By Amy Julia Harris and Shoshana Walter of Reveal from The Center for Investigative Reporting The worst day of Brad McGahey's life was the day a judge decided to spare him from prison. McGahey was 23 with dreams of making it big in rodeo, maybe starring in his own reality TV show. With a 1.5 GPA, he'd barely graduated from high school. He had two kids and mounting child support debt. Then he got busted for buying a stolen horse trailer, fell behind on court fines and blew off his probation officer. Standing in a tiny wood-paneled courtroom in rural Oklahoma in 2010, he faced one year in state prison. The judge had another plan. "You need to learn a work ethic," the judge told him. "I'm sending you to CAAIR." McGahey had heard of Christian Alcoholics & Addicts in Recovery. People called it "the Chicken Farm," a rural retreat where defendants stayed for a year, got addiction treatment and learned to live more productive lives. Most were sent there by courts from across Oklahoma and neighboring states, part of the nationwide push to keep nonviolent offenders out of prison. Aside from daily cans of Dr Pepper, McGahey wasn't addicted to anything. The judge knew that. But the Chicken Farm sounded better than prison. A few weeks later, McGahey stood in front of a speeding conveyor belt inside a frigid poultry plant, pulling guts and stray feathers from slaughtered chickens destined for major fast food restaurants and grocery stores. There wasn't much substance abuse treatment at CAAIR. It was mostly factory work for one of America's top poultry companies. If McGahey got hurt or worked too slowly, his bosses threatened him with prison. And he worked for free. CAAIR pocketed the pay. "It was a slave camp," McGahey said. "I can't believe the court sent me there." Soon, it would get worse.  Records show that courts send about 280 men to CAAIR each year, coming from throughout Oklahoma, along with some from Arkansas, Texas and Missouri. Shoshana Walter | Reveal Across the country, judges increasingly are sending defendants to rehab instead of prison or jail. These diversion courts have become the bedrock of criminal justice reform, aiming to transform lives and ease overcrowded prisons. But in the rush to spare people from prison, some judges are steering defendants into rehabs that are little more than lucrative work camps for private industry, an investigation by Reveal from The Center for Investigative Reporting has found. The programs promise freedom from addiction. Instead, they've turned thousands of men and women into indentured servants. The beneficiaries of these programs span the country, from Fortune 500 companies to factories and local businesses. The defendants work at a Coca-Cola bottling plant in Oklahoma, a construction firm in Alabama, a nursing home in North Carolina. Perhaps no rehab better exemplifies this allegiance to big business than CAAIR. It was started in 2007 by chicken company executives struggling to find workers. By forming a Christian rehab, they could supply plants with a cheap and captive labor force while helping men overcome their addictions. At CAAIR, about 200 men live on a sprawling, grassy compound in northeastern Oklahoma, and most work full time at Simmons Foods Inc., a company with annual revenue of $1.4 billion. They slaughter and process chickens for some of America's largest retailers and restaurants, including Walmart, KFC and Popeyes Louisiana Kitchen. They also make pet food for PetSmart and Rachael Ray's Nutrish brand. Simmons Foods now is so reliant on CAAIR for some shifts that the plants likely would shut down if the men didn't show up, according to former staff members and plant supervisors. Shane Bevel for Reveal Chicken processing plants are notoriously dangerous and understaffed. The hours are long, the pay is low and the conditions are brutal. Men in the CAAIR program said their hands became gnarled after days spent hanging thousands of chickens from metal shackles. One man said he was burned with acid while hosing down a trailer. Others were maimed by machines or contracted serious bacterial infections. Those who were hurt and could no longer work often were kicked out of CAAIR and sent to prison, court records show. Most men worked through the pain, fearing the same fate. "They work you to death. They work you every single day," said Nate Turner, who graduated from CAAIR in 2015. "It's a work camp. They know people are desperate to get out of jail, and they'll do whatever they can do to stay out of prison." To unearth this story, Reveal interviewed scores of former participants and employees, court officials and judges and reviewed hundreds of pages of court documents, tax filings and workers' compensation records. At some rehabs, defendants get to keep their pay. At CAAIR and many others, they do not. Legal experts said forcing defendants to work for free might violate their constitutional rights. The 13th Amendment bans slavery and involuntary servitude in the United States, except as punishment for convicts. That's why prison labor programs are legal. But many defendants sent to programs such as CAAIR have not yet been convicted of crimes, and some later have their cases dismissed. "You've got to be kidding me," Noah Zatz, a professor specializing in labor law at UCLA, said when presented with Reveal's findings. "That's a very strong 13th Amendment violation case." CAAIR has become indispensable to the criminal justice system, even though judges appear to be violating Oklahoma's drug court law by using it in some cases, according to the law's authors. Drug courts in Oklahoma are required to send defendants for treatment at certified programs with trained counselors and state oversight. CAAIR is uncertified. Only one of its three counselors is licensed, and no state agency regulates it. The program mainly relies on faith and work to treat addiction. Sharon Cain runs the drug court in rural Stephens County and decides where to send defendants for treatment. She said state regulators don't stop her from using CAAIR. "I do what I wanna do. They don't mess with me," she said. "And I'm not saying that in a cocky way. They just know I'm going to do drug court the way I've always done it." The American Civil Liberties Union of Oklahoma now is considering legal action in response to Reveal's reporting. About 280 men are sent to CAAIR each year by courts throughout Oklahoma, as well as Arkansas, Texas and Missouri. Instead of paychecks, the men get bunk beds, meals and Alcoholics and Narcotics Anonymous meetings. If there's time between work shifts, they can meet with a counselor or attend classes on anger management and parenting. Weekly Bible study is mandatory. For the first four months, so is church. Most days revolve around the work. "Money is an obstacle for so many of these men," said Janet Wilkerson, CAAIR's founder and CEO. "We're not going to charge them to come here, but they're going to have to work. That's a part of recovery, getting up like you and I do every day and going to a job." The program has become an invaluable labor source. Over the years, Simmons Foods repeatedly has laid off paid employees while expanding its use of CAAIR. Simmons now is so reliant on the program for some shifts that the plants likely would shut down if the men didn't show up, according to former staff members and plant supervisors. But Donny Epp, a spokesman for Simmons Foods, said the company does not depend on CAAIR to fill a labor shortage. "It's about building relationships with our community and supporting the opportunity to help people become productive citizens," he said. The arrangement also has paid off for CAAIR. In seven years, the program brought in more than $11 million in revenue, according to tax filings. "They came up with a hell of an idea," said Parker Grindstaff, who graduated earlier this year. "They're making a killing off of us."  Janet Wilkerson, CAAIR's founder and CEO, shows off the pantry that feeds the participants in her recovery program. Shoshana Walter | Reveal Janet Wilkerson had a problem. As vice president of human resources for Peterson Farms Inc., she was having trouble filling the overnight shift at her chicken processing plants. The hours were long. The pay was low. And there never seemed to be enough workers. Then a convicted meth dealer named Raymond Jones walked into her office in 2003 with a story and a proposal, according to a newspaper story at the time. After finding Jesus, Jones had overcome his addictions and decided to start a rehab. He asked Wilkerson to take a chance and hire his men. They were cheap, he promised, and they could work all hours. Their wages would fund his recovery program. Wilkerson eagerly agreed. She called the arrangement a "win, win, win" for the men, chicken plants and Jones. She was so taken with the idea that four years later, she created a nearly identical program of her own. Her brother had died from alcoholism, and her husband's drinking had nearly destroyed their marriage. She had long wanted to help others like them. The economics also made sense. The chicken plants needed workers, and Jones' program was bringing in revenue of more than \$2 million a year. Wilkerson had the connections to make it happen. In addition to working in human resources at Peterson Farms, she also moonlighted as a spokeswoman for Simmons Foods and other top poultry companies. Wilkerson enlisted her assistant and another poultry executive and brought Jones along as a $250,000-a-year consultant. Then she pitched the idea to her bosses. The companies wouldn't have to pay workers' compensation insurance, payroll taxes or medical care. They could replace the workers for any reason at any time. Like a temp agency, her program would pay for everything: the men just needed to work. Simmons signed on. Later, Crystal Lake Farms and Tyson Foods Inc. did, too. Jones agreed to introduce Wilkerson and her business partners to court officials. But his reputation was deteriorating. Plant supervisors said Jones' workers sometimes would show up high. Workers complained that Jones wasn't feeding them. Wilkerson vowed to make her program better. She and her partners hired away one of Jones' top managers and used men from his program to build their first dormitory. They worked for free, as community service. Then she stopped paying Jones and they parted ways. By 2010, hundreds of men poured into CAAIR from courts across Oklahoma. So did the money, allowing the Wilkersons - Janet as CEO and her husband, Don, as vice president of operations - to draw combined salaries of $168,000 a year, nearly four times the median household income in their area. That's when Brad McGahey arrived.  A county welcome sign stands near the Simmons Foods chicken processing plant in Southwest City, Mo. Shane Bevel for Reveal At Simmons Foods, McGahey first went to work in evisceration, suctioning guts and blood out of slaughtered chickens speeding past him on metal hooks. Then he became a grader, arranging raw breasts, thighs and legs into orderly piles as they moved up a conveyor belt to packaging. It was monotonous work. Growing up in the country, McGahey wasn't bothered by the sight of dead animals. He'd gutted catfish and skinned deer all his life. But the first time he stepped into the Simmons plant, the stench of chicken blood and feces was overpowering. "I almost threw up," he remembered. On May 27, 2010, three months into his time at CAAIR, something went wrong. A machine dumped a mountain of parts onto the conveyor belt, causing chicken to pile up faster than he and his co-worker could sort it. As they plunged their hands into the heap of cold parts, McGahey remembers hearing a scream. His co-worker's rubber glove was caught in the conveyor belt. McGahey grabbed the woman's arm, wrestling her hand free. But the machine snagged his own hand. In a matter of seconds, McGahey's wrist was jerked backward, lodged in the seams of the conveyor belt as it hurtled toward a narrow stainless steel chute overhead. Someone yanked the emergency kill cord, which should have stopped the machine, McGahey recalled. But it raced upward, dragging him along with it. He felt a flash of panic. Then an excruciating crunch. Medical notes later would say McGahey suffered a "severe crush injury." The machine smashed his hand, breaking several bones and nearly severing a tendon in his wrist. When he finally yanked his wrist free, his hand was bent completely backward. The pain was so bad that he nearly fainted. A nurse at the plant took one look at him and called CAAIR. "The kid's hand is mangled!" he recalled the nurse screaming into the phone. "He needs help!" McGahey expected an ambulance. Instead, one of CAAIR's top managers picked him up at the plant and drove him to the local hospital. Doctors took X-rays of McGahey's hand, gave him a splint and ordered him not to work. Back at CAAIR, he spent a sleepless night cradling his throbbing hand. He figured it would take months to heal and planned to rest. But CAAIR's administrators would have none of it. They called McGahey lazy and accused him of hurting himself on purpose to avoid working, former employees said. CAAIR told him that he had to go back to work - either at Simmons or around the campus until his hand healed, which wouldn't count toward his one-year sentence. Wilkerson said she doesn't remember the specifics of McGahey's case but acknowledged that CAAIR has given such ultimatums before. "You can either work or you can go to prison," McGahey remembered administrators telling him. "It's up to you." He already had made up his mind. "I'll take prison over this place," he said. "Anywhere is better than here."  Most men sent to CAAIR are addicted to alcohol, meth, heroin or pain pills. They are usually young, white and can't afford stays in private rehab programs. Inside CAAIR's dormitories, Bible verses and Simmons Foods posters line the walls. Participants usually sleep six to a room, crammed onto wooden bunk beds. They attend church services in a common room down the hall, decorated with quilts and wooden crosses. During the one-year program, the men can't have cellphones or money. If they relapse or break the rules, they can be kicked out or punished with extra time. In 2014, CAAIR reported that about 1 in 4 men completed the program. Former employees said work takes priority over everything. If counseling or classes interfered with the job, the decision was clear. "It's work," said Aaron Snyder, who participated in the program and later worked as a dorm manager. "You're going to work." The men also perform free labor for CAAIR's founders, family and friends. A group of men said they helped remodel the Wilkersons' master bedroom. Another said he helped one of their daughters pack boxes and move. Still others worked on an egg farm owned by the Wilkersons' other daughter. The program told the courts that it was community service, according to employees. The strict regimen has helped some men get clean. Those who arrive without a home, steady employment or food said they find their basic needs met at CAAIR. Those who complete the program without breaking any rules are eligible for a gift of $1,000 when they graduate. "I have to say CAAIR was the hardest thing to do in my life," said Bradley Schott, who graduated in 2014. "I went to basic training at 16. And (Army) Ranger school. And it wasn't as hard as CAAIR, mentally or physically. But it saved my life." Jim Lovell, CAAIR's vice president of program management, said there's dignity in work. "If working 40 hours a week is a slave camp, then all of America is a slave camp," he said. Men who were injured while at CAAIR rarely receive long-term help for their injuries. That's because the program requires all men to sign a form stating that they are clients, not employees, and therefore have no right to workers' comp. Reveal found that when men got hurt, CAAIR filed workers' comp claims and kept the payouts. Injured men and their families never saw a dime. Following Brandon Spurgin's chicken plant injury, CAAIR filed for workers' compensation on his behalf. CAAIR got $4,500 in insurance payments and Spurgin says he got nothing. Shane Bevel for Reveal Brandon Spurgin was working in the chicken plants one night in 2014 when a metal door crashed down on his head, damaging his spine and leaving him with chronic pain, according to medical records. CAAIR filed for workers' compensation on his behalf and took the \$4,500 in insurance payments. Spurgin said he got nothing. Janet Wilkerson acknowledged that's standard practice. "That's fraudulent behavior," said Eddie Walker, a former judge with the Arkansas Workers' Compensation Commission. He said workers' comp payments are required to go to the injured worker. "What's being done is clearly inappropriate." Three years later, Spurgin's still in pain and can no longer hold a full-time job. In addition to injuries, some men at CAAIR experience serious drug withdrawal, seizures and mental health crises, according to former employees. But the program doesn't employ trained medical staff and prohibits psychiatric medicine. A judge in Tulsa sent Donald Basford to CAAIR in 2014 despite a documented history of severe mental health problems. The 36-year-old quickly unraveled, repeatedly complaining to staffers that he was "losing it" without his medication, Snyder, the former employee, recalled. Basford ran away and was found dead inside a car in a church parking lot a few weeks later, according to an autopsy report. Medical examiners found no drugs in his badly decomposed body and weren't able to determine Basford's cause of death. Other CAAIR men who had mental breakdowns or manic episodes were kicked out, according to former employees, opening the door for them to be sent to prison. "You just don't do that to people who obviously need some kind of help," Snyder said. "It's not right."  CAAIR has a sprawling, grassy compound in northeastern Oklahoma. The one-year diversion program mainly relies on faith and work to treat addiction. Shane Bevel for Reveal When the Oklahoma Legislature created the state's drug court requirements 20 years ago, it was part of a growing realization nationwide of the costs - both financial and human - of handing down long prison sentences for drug-related charges. In drug court, judges are required to put defendants through treatment rather than prison. Follow the rules, and defendants can have their cases dismissed. Lawmakers wanted to ensure the quality of treatment, so they wrote an important provision into state law: Drug courts must use treatment providers inspected and certified by the state Department of Mental Health and Substance Abuse Services. But affordable treatment is in short supply. Drug court defendants have waited up to nine months for a bed in a residential treatment facility, meanwhile relapsing or languishing in jail. As a result, some courts turn to uncertified programs such as CAAIR, even though it might violate the law, according to the law's authors. "That is insanity gone to sea," former state Sen. Dick Wilkerson said when told of Reveal's findings. (He is not related to CAAIR's founder.) "That's illegal. They can't do that. That is the law, and it has to be followed." In Pontotoc County, Judge Thomas Landrith sometimes uses CAAIR in place of certified treatment. He said there's never a wait list, and it costs the courts and state nothing. "We tried to get residential treatment programs down here, but we never could really pull it off," he said. "So recovery programs kind of fit that niche." Other judges said they were unaware of the law or have found ways around it. Tulsa's drug court, which sends the most defendants to CAAIR, said the law permits judges to use uncertified programs, as long as it's not for treatment. "The referral is to assist the participants in developing good job skills, life skills, work ethics and personal care skills," said Vicki Cox, court administrator. "Participants are not sent to CAAIR for drug or alcohol treatment." But Reveal found that Tulsa's drug court staff repeatedly described CAAIR as treatment in court records. Cox dismissed that as a record-keeping error. Oklahoma's Department of Mental Health and Substance Abuse Services funds and monitors drug courts. The agency knows that judges are using uncertified providers such as CAAIR, but officials say there's little they can do. All they can do is cut some of the funding to drug courts that use those programs. But that's little disincentive to judges. No drug court judge has ever been disciplined for using uncertified programs, according to the Oklahoma Council on Judicial Complaints.  After Brad McGahey injured his hand and left CAAIR, a judge sentenced him to a year in state prison. He was released after two months due to overcrowding. Credit: Oklahoma Department of Corrections Brad McGahey went straight from CAAIR to a Marshall County jail cell. Because he failed to complete the program, he had violated the rules of his probation. The judge sentenced him to a year in state prison. McGahey was released after two months due to prison overcrowding. His injury had not improved. One minute, his hand throbbed with pain. The next, it tingled and went numb. Sometimes it turned blue. He found a lawyer and went to court for workers' compensation. The process was slow, and CAAIR fought him every step of the way. In court in 2012, the program's attorneys argued that McGahey's recurring symptoms weren't the result of the accident in the chicken plant. "If you want to get a lie detector test up here, I'll pay for it," McGahey blurted in the middle of his testimony. "I know what happened. ... I ain't no liar, and you're calling me one." The judge sided with McGahey. "Sounds like you've succeeded successfully in delaying the treatment for this person, counselor," the judge told CAAIR's attorney. Three years after the accident, McGahey finally got his surgery. But it didn't help. "I believe that we got to Bradley so late in his treatment ... that Bradley is going to have a permanent problem with his hand," the doctor wrote in a status update to the court in September 2013. McGahey grew depressed. He sold his four-wheeler to pay off his $500-per-month child support debt. He tried welding for two weeks, but his hand injury got in the way. He sought out other opportunities, such as trading and selling used cars, junk and metal. But something always went wrong, and he got into more trouble with the law. When

CAAIR's attorney offered a settlement, McGahey took it. In 2014, he got a lump sum of \$11,000. But today, the pain persists. All that seems to help, McGahey says, are pain pills. Every morning and throughout the day, McGahey chugs a can of Dr Pepper with hydrocodone pills. When his doctor cut him off from his various medications, McGahey found another doctor to write a prescription. Before CAAIR, McGahey had no interest in drugs. Now, he says he can't live without them "I'm addicted to them pills," McGahey said. "I have to take them." Brad McGahey had surgery on his left hand in 2013, but today, the pain persists. All that seems to help, he says, are pain pills. Olivia Merriam | Reveal As McGahey sat on a plastic chair in front of his mother's house, littered with items scavenged from garage sales, he remembered when he still had the use of two hands, when he was good at rodeo and could work on his family's farm. "When you can't do something you love and it's the only thing you ever known, then it's taking part of your life away from you," he said. "I've accepted it now and learned how to do with what I got. I just don't want to see it ruin somebody else's life." Courts still send defendants to CAAIR, and the program is expanding. Simmons Foods even donated funds for a third dormitory to house dozens more men. "I was walking in the parking lot of the Simmons plant, and (Chairman) Mark Simmons told me he needed more men," Wilkerson told a local reporter at the ribbon-cutting ceremony in 2015. "I told him to build me another dorm." CAAIR is now planning a fourth dormitory. It's supposed to be the biggest yet. Source: <https://www.mprnews.org/story/2017/10/05/reveal-they-thought-they-were-going-to-rehab-they-ended-up-in-chicken-plants> (HEAL Note: HEAL does not support modern slavery in any form. Stop this practice now!)

Former Group Home Manager Arrested Rhonda Keisler facing charges Ed Jensen October 05, 2017 - 12:47 pm AddThis Sharing Buttons Share to TwitterShare to FacebookShare to PrintShare to EmailShare to More Categories: Local News A former Upstate group home manager is accused of stealing from several disabled residents to shop for herself at Wal-Mart and other stores. Union Police Department has charged 51-year-old Rhonda Keisler of Buffalo with three counts of exploitation of a vulnerable adult and three counts of breach of trust of more than $10,000. Police documents accuse Keisler of stealing from the residents' bank accounts from 2012 through August, when a local disabilities official reported the potential missing money. Source: <http://www.1063word.com/articles/former-group-home-manager-arrested>

Head of boarding school, detained for child trafficking, suspected of torture 6 October 2017 Crime RU MD Home News Crime Head of boarding school, detained for child trafficking, suspected of torture The head of the boarding school No. 3 in Chisinau, Igor Sandler, arrested for child trafficking, is also accused of torturing several students of the institution he managed. The director of the boarding school, along with some employees, had allegedly abused several students for misbehavior. According to canal3.md, the information has been provided by law enforcers in the public hearings, organized by the Parliamentary Commission for Education Issues. Police say the students informed them of the tortures they had been subjected to. Deputy Head of the Center for Combating Trafficking in Persons, Sergiu Olanschi, says that the students were tortured because of their academic failures and disciplinary misconduct. Thus, Igor Sandler is guilty of "torture, inhuman and degrading treatment". The deputy head master of the boarding school, Aurelia Nedascovscaia, denies the allegations and says, "We have been working together for 24 years and I hear this for the first time. He was like a father for these children and they had a good attitude towards him, they even loved him. The word has always been our weapon, we explain, we talk to them, but we never apply physical force." Additionally, for the camera, the students said that the director is "very good" and that they have never been punished. The headmaster of the boarding school was arrested in late September. He is accused of contributing to a "friendly" relationship of a businessman from Chisinau with a 14-year-old student of the boarding school. Several months later, the boy announced of having been sexually abused by the man in a rented apartment in Chisinau. Both the headmaster and the abuser risk sentences of up to 25 years in prison, or life imprisonment. Source: <https://en.crimemoldova.com/news/crime/head-of-boarding-school-detained-for-child-trafficking-suspected-of-torture/>

Mint Hill group home supervisor accused of sexually assaulting juvenile Friday, October 6th 2017, 10:01 am PDTFriday, October 6th 2017, 10:09 am PDT By WBTV Web Staff Email Connect webteam@wbtv.com Jackson MINT HILL, NC (WBTV) - A house supervisor at New Place, Inc. in Mint Hill is accused of sexually assaulting a juvenile in July. According to the Mint Hill Police Department, Reginald Jackson was arrested Wednesday and charged with three counts of sexual activity by a substitute parent or custodian. Police say the incident reportedly took place at the group home located on Batten Court in Mint Hill on July 6. No other information was released. Source: <http://www.wbvtv.com/story/36538863/mint-hill-group-home-supervisor-accused-of-sexually-assaulting-juvenile#>

Plea deal ends Allendale Association Lake Villa death case Lake County Sheriff's Office James Davis, 37, of Round Lake. James Davis, 37, of Round Lake. (Lake County Sheriff's Office) Jim NewtonContact ReporterNews-Sun Privacy Policy The criminal case surrounding the death of a 16-year-old Allendale Association resident, who died last year while being restrained at the Lake Villa facility, has concluded with the primary defendant accepting a plea deal that will spare him prison time. James Davis, 38, pleaded guilty to one count of obstructing justice Friday. In exchange, charges of involuntary manslaughter were dismissed and Davis was sentenced by Lake County Circuit Judge Daniel Shanes to three years in prison. ADVERTISING With day-for-day credit, Davis, a former Allendale employee from Round Lake, has already served that time in the Lake County jail. Because Davis cannot be paroled from a prison sentence at a county jail, he will be transported to an Illinois Department of Corrections facility sometime this week, processed, and released, defense attorney Eric Rinehart said Tuesday. "He'll be in and out in a few hours, Rinehart said. Following his release, Davis will serve one year of probation. "I'm glad the state did the right thing," Rinehart said of the resolution to the case. "James was defending himself and Allendale staff." Allen family Shaquan Alle. Shaquan Alle. (Allen family) Shaquan Allen of Chicago, a resident of the Lake Villa facility, died after being placed in a chokehold by Allen during a struggle stemming from disciplinary problems, authorities said. Assistant State's Attorney Scott Hoffert said Tuesday he had no comment on the negotiated plea deal. The plea deal undercut epic preparations for a trial, with several attorneys for Allendale, which had been asked to provide various records, defense attorneys and prosecutors frequently crowding pretrial hearings to discuss evidence that could have been introduced. After his arrest, Davis had pleaded not guilty to charges of involuntary manslaughter and obstruction of justice in connection with the March 2016 death of Allen. A second defendant, Justin Serak of Grafton, Wis., had pleaded not guilty to charges of obstructing justice for allegedly providing false information to police about the incident. The state dismissed the charges against Serak earlier this year on the condition that he would testify in the case if Davis went to trial. Prosecutors said the Allen was having a behavioral episode on the evening of March 30, 2016, when Davis and Serak each took an arm and tried to escort him back to his bedroom. Allen became combative, officials said, prompting Serak to grab his legs while Davis took control of his upper body and put him in a chokehold. When Allen became unresponsive, authorities said that the two employees agreed to a story that Allen had knocked over a cup of water, slipped and fell. Serak's defense attorney, Robert Ritacca, had taken the position in pretrial motions that a pre-existing heart condition, not a chokehold, might have been the cause of Shaquan Allen's death. Ritacca's motion stated that a diagnosis of "mild cardiomegaly," an enlargement of the heart, is mentioned in the autopsy report. The autopsy, conducted at the Lake County Coroner's Office, and the autopsy report, completed by Dr. Nancy Jones, a former pathologist, concluded that the cause of Allen's death was "asphyxia due to restraint." Paramedics were summoned to the scene, but attempts to revive Allen were unsuccessful. jnewton@tribpub.com Twitter @jimnewton5 Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/suburbs/lake-county-news-sun/crime/>

Family sues boarding school over teen's suicide By Associated Press View author archive Get author RSS feed Contact The Author Name(required) Email (required) Comment(required) October 12, 2017 | 3:55pm Modal Trigger Google Maps More On: suicide Judge weighs trial for teen accused of taping girl's suicide Boyfriend suspected of killing teen leaves mysterious suicide note Girl whose prank led to 11-year-old's suicide won't face charges Climber who killed himself after girlfriend's death was haunted by sport's 'painful reality' PIERRE, S.D. — A wrongful death lawsuit has been filed against a federal American Indian boarding school by the family of a girl who committed suicide. Emerson Little Elk says the Pierre Indian Learning Center failed to adequately monitor his 14-year-old granddaughter, who had a history of depression and had made prior threats of suicide. The girl died at the school in October 2015. The Argus Leader says the family's lawsuit claims the school was negligent and is asking a jury to award compensation for pain and suffering, funeral expenses and attorneys' fees. The Pierre boarding school is overseen by the U.S. Department of Interior's Bureau of Indian Education and serves Native American students with behavioral, mental health and emotional needs in grades one through eight. Source: <http://nypost.com/2017/10/12/family-sues-boarding-school-over-teens-suicide/>

Restraint Death In Bristol Group Home Ruled Homicide Lisa King of Hartford speaks of her son Joseph's death at a Bristol group home. Lisa King of Hartford speaks of her son Joseph's death at a Bristol group home. Josh KovnerContact Reporter Losing her son was a hard enough. Finding out that Joey King died while under restraint at his Bristol group home and that his death has been ruled a homicide was more than Lisa King could take. Her resolve cracked Thursday as the grim picture of her son's last moments became clearer. He had Down syndrome. He was beloved, but he could become uncooperative and act out. On June 15, at dinner time, one or more staff members who work for the Vinfen Corp.'s group home at 35 Yale St. placed him in a restraint and took him to the floor of the kitchen. Then they apparently left him, because he was found a short time later by another employee who had entered the home and saw King lying on the floor. King said she has learned that CPR had not been attempted before the employee found him unresponsive and with no pulse. "He was found face down," said King, her face dissolving into anguish. "I think he was squeezed to death." A pathologist with the chief state medical examiner's office determined that the cause was "sudden death in the setting of physical restraint, in a patient with Down Syndrome and bicuspid aortic valve" — an inherited form of heart disease. The manner of death, Dr. Dollett T. White ruled, was homicide. Bristol police are investigating. Lt. Richard Guerrero, the police spokesman, has said he cannot comment on an active police case. In an earlier statement to The Courant, Vinfen executives said: "We are all devastated by the event. We offer our sympathy and prayers to the family. Vinfen is working to support all involved. We are cooperating fully with state and local authorities as they review this tragedy." The group home has a contract with the state Department of Developmental Services. A DDS spokeswoman, Kathryn Rock-Burns, has said the agency is unable to comment because of the police investigation. Joseph King was taken by ambulance to Bristol Hospital, where he was pronounced dead a short time later. Lisa King said her family wants to know why her son was left untended, why no CPR was performed immediately, and whether his treatment plan had placed any limits on the type or duration of restraint that could be used. At the hospital that night, King's cousin, Laceshia King, of New Britain, said she spoke briefly with two Vinfen managers. She said one of the managers told her that Joseph King had been restrained by staff members at the home for 10 minutes before losing consciousness. Records show that Vinfen received $12.3 million from DDS in the fiscal year ending in June 2016, and $3.5 million in a separate contract with the Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services. Vinfen is headquartered in Cambridge, Mass. Source: <http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-hartford-death-in-bristol-group-home-ruled-homicide-1013-story.html>

2 indicted in death of Webster group home resident Heather Roselli 2 women indicted in death of Webster group home resident Heather Roselli Will Cleveland and Victoria E. Freile, Democrat and Chronicle Published 3:04 p.m. ET Oct. 12, 2017 | Updated 8:29 p.m. ET Oct. 12, 2017 P Two women are facing felony charges in connection with the June 18 death of a resident of a Webster group home. Sandra Abdo and Sarah DiLallo both pleaded not guilty to second-degree manslaughter in Monroe County Court on Thursday afternoon after Judge Victoria Argento unsealed an indictment charging the women in the death of 35-year-old Heather Roselli. Roselli was found unresponsive inside 30 Pierce St. in the village of Webster around 1 p.m. June 18. She was taken to Rochester General Hospital, where she died later that night, according to Webster police. DiLallo, 25, and Abdo, 60, are also facing one count of first-degree endangering the welfare of the elderly or incompetent, a felony. Both women worked at the group home, which is operated by Finger Lakes Developmental Disabilities Services. The state Office for People with Developmental Disabilities oversees the group home. DiLallo worked at the home for a year. Authorities did not say how long Abdo worked at the group home. William Easton, attorney for Sarah DiLallo, on the manslaughter charge facing his client in death of Heather Roselli. #roc@dandepic.twitter.com/bf7Ob69INp — Will Cleveland (@WillCleveland13) October 12, 2017 Monroe County Assistant District Attorney Leslie Schildt said Abdo and DiLallo were arrested Tuesday and charged by sealed indictment. Schildt said the incident involved "three months of intensive investigation" into the "unauthorized, unjustified attack" on Roselli. During the arraignment, Schildt said DiLallo was the "initiator" in the incident, and added that the entire incident lasted about 45 minutes. Schildt said police were not called until Roselli was unconscious. Schildt alleged the defendants ignored their training and put Roselli face-down on the ground after she wanted to call her stepfather on Father's Day. Schildt said Roselli was "slammed" to the ground and called "derogatory" names. More: Death of Webster group home resident under investigation Roselli had a lacerated liver, which caused internal bleeding, as well as broken ribs and rug burns on her feet, Schildt said. Schildt added DiLallo admitted to receiving proper training and knowing it was incorrect to put a resident in that position. "I know they're dealing with a lot of complicated issues right now," Schildt said of Roselli's family. "I know they just want to see justice and that's what we want, too." Webster Police Chief Joseph Rieger added, "I just want to thank them for their patience as we worked through this case. A lot of investigative work went into it and it did take a couple of months, but I'm happy that they are appreciative of the work." In June, OPWDD said two employees of the group home were fired following Roselli's death and a third was placed on administrative leave pending the outcome of the investigation. @WebsterNYPolice Chief Joseph Rieger on the investigation and indictment. #roc@dandepic.twitter.com/kEvQ3TdokE — Will Cleveland (@WillCleveland13) October 12, 2017 "This is a case that I'm hoping will bring attention to group homes in general," Schildt said. "There are thousands of people who work in these group homes every day who are in it for the exact right reasons. ...They're in it because they care about people. "But one of the things with these homes is that you have a very vulnerable population." Schildt added that staff members at group homes have a "position of public trust. That type of situation also means that abuse can happen in these homes and go undetected." Both women are scheduled to return to court Nov. 30. Each woman was remanded to the Monroe County Jail in lieu of $15,000 cash bail or $30,000 bond. Abdo is being represented by James Vacca, while DiLallo is represented by William Easton. "We intend to defend this case," Easton said. "This case is charged as a non-intentional homicide, a reckless homicide, and an endangering case. My client has no record. She was faithfully employed there for nearly a year. We intend to contest this case, both on a legal basis and on a factual basis." Because it was a sealed indictment, "They did not commence with an arrest like most cases do," Easton said. "It started with a grand jury investigation we were not aware of." Schildt requested $75,000 bail or $100,000 cash bond for Abdo and $100,000 bail or $200,000 or cash bond for DiLallo. Both defense attorneys noted neither of their clients have a criminal record. "We have to start from scratch now and get up to speed and investigate the case," Easton said. "They've been investigating the case for three or four months. We're going to start, and I'm certain we're going to have a different version than was set forth at the district attorney's bail application." WCLEVELAND@Gannett.com VFREILE@Gannett.com Source: <http://www.democratandchronicle.com/story/news/2017/10/12/sandra-abdo-sarah-dilallo-death-webster-group-home-heather-roselli/758370001/>

Video shows confrontation between counselor, student at Mt. Juliet foster care facility By Najaha Sherman Published: October 12, 2017, 6:16 pm Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) 39Share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) 39Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) (Photo: WKRN) MT. JULIET, Tenn. (WKRN) — Shocking video of a confrontation between a counselor and a foster student at a facility in Mt. Juliet has surfaced. The foster care facility is part of Omni Care Services, a facility for girls 12 to 17-years-old with trauma-related experiences. They attend a school called Mount Juliet Academy. An employee at the facility sent News 2 the video and asked that we not reveal her identity. In the video, one of counselors and a foster student are seen getting into a verbal argument. The video didn't capture audio, so it's unknown what they are saying. The counselor appears to point and instruct the child to sit down. The girl walks over to her desk and then explodes. She appears to start knocking things over. The counselor then walks over to the girl and takes her down, dragging her out of the room. The video was captured inside Mt. Juliet Academy, which is part of Omni Visions foster care services. Omni Visions declined News 2's request for an on camera interview but sent a statement that said, "When the incident shown in the video occurred, we reported it to Child Protective Services for investigation. The employee shown in this video did not follow organizational protocol for responding to non-compliant youth and is no longer working for Omni Visions or Mt. Juliet Academy." News 2 has learned the girl's family is considering taking legal action. DCS confirmed to News 2 that it opened an investigation into this case. DCS added it cannot reveal the results of its investigation. Source: <http://wkrn.com/2017/10/12/video-shows-confrontation-between-counselor-student-at-mt-juliet-foster-care-facility/>

OnTrack Reaches Settlement Agreement, Closes Teen Residential Pr - KDRV News, Weather & Sports. OnTrack Reaches Settlement Agreement, Closes Teen Residential Program Friday, October 13th 2017, 6:53 pm PDT by Emma Balkenbush Close X Embed Video Code Link to Video buffering Replay OnTrack Reaches Settlement Agreement, Closes Teen Residential Program More Videos Caption OFF ON Track :Presets : Aa Aa Aa Font :Edge : Size :Scroll : Color : Background : Edge : Window : Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet.. Apply Cancel Default Show Advanced Settings Opacity : LIVE 00:00 / 02:18 GO LIVE CC MEDFORD, Ore. -- There is no longer a residential drug addiction program for teens in the Rogue Valley. Now, other treatment facilities in Southern Oregon are wondering where those teens in need of 24/7 care will go. OnTrack, The Department of Human Services and The Oregon Health Authority have come to what they call a "voluntary" agreement, which includes OnTrack surrendering its license to DHS. NewsWatch 12 requested the 10-page document from OHA. It said DHS and OHA found multiple deficiencies at the program's location at the corner of Holly and 5th streets. The agreement said OnTrack denied those findings and put corrective action plans in place. It also said all three agencies agree it does not mean OnTrack admits to certain allegations against it. The agreement said DHS and OHA conducted a series of inspections and reviews at the HOME and Teen Programs. During those inspections, DHS and OHA found multiple deficiencies in meeting certain requirements. Notices: Feb. 24, 2017 - OHA issued a notice of intent to revoke

Alcohol and Drug Residential Treatment License Feb. 24, 2017 - OHA issued a Notice Imposing License Conditions and Notice of Opportunity for a hearing April 7, 2017 - DHS issued a Notice of Intent to Revoke License of Child Caring Agency and Opportunity for a hearing The three organizations have agreed not to comment to members of the media, but to direct them to this statement: "OnTrack has agreed to relinquish its license to admit clients under the age of 18 into its residential programs, but will remain certified by OHA to provide care and services in the HOME Program. OnTrack denies the allegations in DHS' Notice of Intent to Revoke, OHA's Notice of Intent to Revoke, and OHA's Order Imposing Conditions, and the parties have agreed that OnTrack's surrender of its license is voluntary and without admission of wrongdoing on the part of OnTrack." The agreement said former Executive Director, Rita Sullivan, will no longer be involved with OnTrack in any capacity. OnTrack's application for a new certification at the W. Main location is still pending. Maslow Project Executive Director Mary Ferrell said the program closing will make it more difficult for some teens to get the treatment they need. "As a community member as well as running a program that works with youth, it concerns me that we don't have a residential teen program. I think it's really hard for kids who are dealing with substance abuse issues and addiction to leave their hometown and family and support network to get treatment," Ferrell said. OnTrack is still certified by OHA to give care and services through its HOME Program. It cannot admit more than seven women to that program. OHA will monitor the program and decide after a certain amount of time if more women can be admitted if certain requirements are met. Jackie Lien, Executive Director for the Phoenix Counseling Center, said the program closing is leaving a hole in the adolescent treatment in the entire Rogue Valley. "At this point, adolescents will need to travel out of the area in order to get that level of care," Lien said. Lien said she sees this change having an affect on her facility. "What I see happening is that those adolescents who are unable to go to residential will be coming into our outpatient program and then we will need to be deciding whether they can stay abstinent in our program or whether they'll need to be referred to a residential program," Lien said. Source: <http://www.kdrv.com/story/36595150/ontrack-reaches-settlement-agreement-closes-teen-residential-program>

Why the Miami Herald's Fight Club investigative series matters to all Miami Herald Editorial Board LinkedIn Google+ Pinterest Reddit Print Order Reprint of this Story October 13, 2017 10:12 PM The Editorial Board believes that a community is measured by the way it treats its most vulnerable members — and few are more vulnerable than the young and troubled. The Miami Herald's shocking Fight Club investigation and the atrocities it exposes in Florida's juvenile justice system should make us all wonder whether we're doing right by those in need. If the tragic death of 17-year-old Elord Revolte is any indication — and it is — the answer is clearly no. Elord, while in detention inside Module 9 of Miami's juvenile lockup, died of internal bleeding from a savage beating by at least 12 youths. The attack was captured on grainy security video. According to two detainees in the lockup that day, the attack was instigated by a detention officer. The brutality of that act is what makes the findings of investigative reporters Carol Marbin Miller and Audra D.S. Burch so infuriating. These are youths incarcerated due to poverty, drug use, street gangs, bad breaks, bad decisions, bad parenting. Florida's juvenile detention system is meant to reform them and get them back on track. Instead, Marbin Miller and Burch found, it can abuse them further. It can break their souls and spirits. It can even take their young lives. The story of Elord and the other youths, featured in the series published online this week and in a special section in Sunday's newspaper, offer irrefutable evidence that there is a dark side to juvenile justice in the form of incompetent detainee supervisors; questionable healthcare; willfully blind internal investigators; and staff members who make boys fight like pit bulls in exchange for something as trivial as a honey bun. Is this locker room behavior? Incarcerated boys being boys? Absolutely not. It's a horror. The Herald investigation reveals case after case where guards ordered teens to beat up other teens, children were sexually exploited, and sick young people were accused of feigning illnesses, sometimes with tragic consequences. Reporters found 12 young people — ages 12 to 18 — who died in the juvenile system under questionable circumstances since 2000. Even one would have been too many. The result of those deaths: Not one staffer served a day in prison. When a troubled teen dies in Florida's juvenile justice system, it has come to this: the Department of Juvenile Justice issues the required statement and conducts the perfunctory investigation; parents grieve, but can't do much more than that; kid is buried. End of story. The rest of us excuse it away. We think, he was a "bad kid" — that's why he was in the system. Elord was in the Miami detention center on armed robbery charges. So why should you care that a punk kid is beaten to death while in state custody? Or, if he survives the physical trauma, is emotionally battered and bruised? Because with your tax dollars, you finance this cruel system. In the end, it has to do with our humanity as a community. Elord Revolte was no angel. But this community owed him a chance at rehabilitation, not a death sentence. "They treated my child worse than a dog," Enoch Revolte, Elord's father, told the reporters. "My child wasn't a dog. My son deserves justice." Sadly, he's right. Read more here: <http://www.miamiherald.com/opinion/editorials/article178837336.html#storylink=cpy>

Minnesota spends $90 million on mental health costs for patients who don't need the treatment The rising toll is a largely hidden but stark sign of gaps in the state's mental health safety net. By Andy Mannix Star Tribune October 14, 2017 — 8:01pm Glen Stubbe, Star Tribune When hospital staff in Anoka turned away three patients from the Hennepin County jail, a judge ordered DHS Commissioner Emily Piper into court to explain why. Text size comment share tweet email Print more Share on: Share on LinkedIn Share on Google+ Share on Pinterest Copy shortlink: Purchase: Order Reprint Minnesota taxpayers have shelled out more than $92 million over the past six years to house patients who no longer require mental health treatment at a state hospital but have nowhere else to go. The cost per patient, according to Department of Human Services records, now tops $1,300 a day — enough to rent an apartment in Minneapolis for a month. The rising toll is a largely hidden but stark sign of gaps in the state's mental health safety net, particularly for Minnesotans accused of a crime but deemed mentally unfit to face the charges. Courts now send these patients primarily to a state hospital in Anoka. But once doctors there say the treatment is complete, there's often no place for them to transition back to society. They usually require more treatment or supervision after intensive inpatient care is finished, but places like adult foster care, residential treatment programs or group homes are often too full to let them in right away. As a result, the patients sit at state hospitals for weeks, months or even years longer than they are supposed to. One patient has been in Anoka for more than four years since being cleared for release. And those extended stays mean there are fewer beds available for vulnerable patients who do need the hospital-level care. The cost of housing residents who no longer require treatment mounts quickly. Hennepin and Ramsey counties, for example, were billed a combined $15 million-plus for the past two years for unnecessary services, according to DHS records requested by the Star Tribune. In light of these high costs, mental health advocates and lawmakers say it's time to rethink the system and create more community-based treatment that would cut down on bed shortages. Beyond that, the state needs to find ways to intervene earlier and reduce how many people come to the criminal justice system already in the throes of a mental health crisis, said Sen. Tony Lourey, DFL-Kerrick. "We can't just simply wait for the crisis and respond any longer," said Lourey. "That's never going to work for us." Source: <http://www.startribune.com/minnesota-spends-90-million-on-mental-health-costs-for-patients-who-don-t-need-the-treatment/450926783/>

Disturbing details revealed in case of counselor charged with felony rape of teen patient in Utah County By Gephardt Daily Staff - October 16, 2017 Share on Facebook Tweet on Twitter Jason Scott Calder. Photo Courtesy: UCSO UTAH COUNTY, Utah, Oct. 16, 2017 (Gephardt Daily) — More details have been released in the felony rape and sodomy case against a Davis County counselor who is charged with assaulting a 16-year-old patient assigned to him as part of his work at a Utah County facility for troubled teens. Jason Calder, 41, of Bountiful, who formerly worked at New Haven, a residential treatment facility in Springville, is charged with: One count of rape, a first-degree felony Five counts of object rape, a first-degree felony Five counts of forcible sodomy, a first-degree felony Five counts of forcible sexual abuse, a second-degree felony One count of obstructing justice, a second-degree felony The charges stem from a sexual relationship Calder is alleged to have had with the girl, a facility resident, between March 1 and June 30 of this year. "During this time frame, Defendant was Victim's counselor/therapist, and thereby occupied a position of special trust," the probable cause statement says. "Soon after meeting, a sexual relationship developed between Victim and defendant. On at least one occasion, Defendant and Victim engaged in sexual intercourse." The statement details instances of fondling, sodomy and sexual exchanges of various types, alleged to have taken place inside Calder's office or in a wooded area behind the facility. Calder also scheduled the 16-year-old patient for therapy at night, which he did not do with any other patients, the statement says. "Therapist Calder had access to the victim's medical and mental health file, which made her very much at risk and this relationship put him in a position of trust," the probable cause statement says. "The victim stated that during these 'counseling' sessions, therapist Calder became very friendly with her, and these sessions turned into personal conversations. The victim was able to provide investigators with a number of details about therapist Calder's private and personal life that typically a juvenile patient in counseling would not have knowledge (of) in regards to her therapist." According to the statement, the obstruction of justice charge is related to Calder's repeated requests that the teen tell no one about the sexual relationship, "... otherwise he could be arrested and charged," the probable cause statement says. "At one point, Defendant discovered Victim had written information in her journal that might incriminate him, and he directed her to block it out with a black Sharpie, which she did." Court documents also asked that bail be set high. "Therapist Calder has worked as therapist/counselor for trouble youth in the Utah county/Salt Lake area for a number of years," the statement says. "This has provided him with access to a number of girls who were in similar circumstances as the victim in this case. The potential for other victims in this case is extremely high. "In hopes that this arrest will encourage these other victims to come forward and due to the manner in which therapist Calder repeatedly sexually assaulted a 16-year-old girl to whom he was supposed to be providing help, counsel and support, it is requested that an extremely high cash-only bail be set in this case." Calder's bail was set at $100,000, cash only. Source: <http://gephardtaily.com/local/disturbing-details-revealed-in-case-of-counselor-charged-with-felony-rape-of-teen-patient-in-utah-county/>

How a convicted murderer (and others) slipped past group home background checks Posted on October 18, 2017 at 4:30 PM 0 shares By Susan K. Livio slivio@njadvancemedia.com, NJ Advance Media for NJ.com TRENTON -- Nearly eight percent of workers hired to take care of people with developmental disabilities have evaded a state law requiring they undergo a criminal background check, according to a report Tuesday by the Office of the State Auditor. Even some who complied and were flagged for having a criminal record sometimes got hired anyway, the audit found. State law leaves the hiring decisions up to the 570 group home and supervised housing providers in New Jersey, who could decide an individual "has affirmatively demonstrated clear and convincing evidence of...rehabilitation," the audit said. The practice allowed one unidentified housing provider to hire a paroled convicted murderer. When the auditors pointed out the worker's record, the employer called it "an oversight" and fired the employee immediately, the report said. That law ought to change, according to the report submitted by State Auditor Stephen M. Eells and Assistant Auditor John Termyna. 10 years after man's death, Christie signs law to make group homes safer The state will need to hire 200 employees at a cost of $24 million to comply with the law. "Allowing the provider to make criminal history determinations stands in contrast to the manner in which criminal background checks are handled by other state departments," such as Education and Children and Families, the audit said. People with autism and other developmental disabilities rely on direct care staff for help with everyday activities -- feeding, dressing and bathing, transporting them to jobs and social programs. The pay is relatively low, starting at $10.50 an hour, the work is demanding. Turnover is high. A review of 2,340 employee found 175, or 7.5 percent, did not have a record of a background check in their file, the audit said, urging the department to identify and close the loopholes. "The department should improve its monitoring of background checks by reviewing all employee files," according to the report. In a written response included in the audit, acting Human Services Commissioner Elizabeth Connolly said she would consider a change in the law giving her staff power "to make employment fitness determinations of all community residence provider employees." Connolly also noted that Stephen Komminos Law, Gov. Chris Christie signed earlier this month, "will enhance the review of employees' fitness for work," as it requires drug testing as a condition for employment and random tests for cause. The majority of people who work in the state's 2,300 licensed group homes, supervised apartments and community care residents submitted to state and federal background checks and fingerprinting before they were hired, according to the report. The state Central Fingerprinting Unit logged 47,700 records from 2013 to 2016, finding 4,087 had committed a state crime. When investigators randomly pulled the files on 147 active employees, it found 19 had "criminal histories that may be disqualifying, including drug and assault offenses," and another 40 whose records did not contain enough information to make a determination, according to the report. ADVERTISING A separate federal criminal background check found 72 people out of 53,200 screened had committed "disqualifying offenses" such as murder armed robbery and endangering the welfare of a child. Still, auditors found nine of the 72 were working, including the paroled murderer. Tom Baffuto, executive director of The Arc of New Jersey, a statewide advocacy group for families and private agencies that serve them, said his organization helped pass the law requiring criminal background checks some 20 years ago. he expressed concern there are gaps in the system, "We want the system to be as safe as possible. If there are problems with the background checks, we would look to make (the law) stronger," Baffuto said. "Our responsibility is to dig deeper." Baffuto said The Arc is trying to improve the quality of life inside group homes by making the jobs more enticing. The Arc and other provider agencies persuaded Christie and the state Legislature to include $20 million in the budget this year to boost the salaries of direct care staff by $1.25 an hour. The goal is to raise the starting wage to $16.25 an hour in the next five years, with continued state budget support, Baffuto said. "Then we will be able to attract and retain the workforce that we need," he said. Source: http://www.nj.com/politics/index.ssf/2017/10/audit_some_group_home_workers_skipped_or_slipped_p.html

Iowa Couple Arrested For Trafficking Teens October 18, 2017 5:56 PM Filed Under: human trafficking, Jim Gudas, Sex Trafficking, Waterloo CHICAGO (CBS) — An Iowa couple has pleaded guilty to luring two Chicago teens to Waterloo to work as prostitutes. Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim Duax says Lawrence Edward Campbell Jr. and his wife, Sade Desire Campbell, used social media to convince two 16-year-old Chicago girls to go to Waterloo to be taken care of. Prosecutors say the Campbell's sent the teens bus tickets, brought them to the couple's home, then took them to two hotels and a home to meet men for sex. Duax says troubled teens are often targeted in the same way on social media, adding, "The predators tend to look for kids who are having difficulties at home." Duax says the Campbell's kept all of the money men paid for the girls, and brought them to a shopping center to shoplift items they could sell to make additional money. Waterloo police say they caught the girls shoplifting at a Target, which led investigators to the Campbell's. Source: <http://chicago.cbslocal.com/2017/10/18/iowa-couple-arrested-for-trafficking-teens/>

Senate Report Slams Public Management of Private Foster Care Industry [chronicleofsocialchange.org] Alicia Doktor 13 hours ago On Wednesday, Senators Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) issued a report scrutinizing the management of private foster care providers, and skewering one especially notorious foster care agency. Stirred by news stories chronicling dozens of child deaths because of management of foster care services by The MENTOR Network, a national for-profit provider, Hatch and Wyden directed the Senate Finance Committee to study the matter. The ensuing report, entitled "An Examination of Foster Care in the United States and the Use of Privatization," found troubling oversight of private foster care providers by child welfare agencies, and higher-than-expected rates of abuse and neglect within foster homes. [For more on this story by John Kelly, go to <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/care-industry/28470/>] Source: <http://www.acesconnection.com/blog/senate-report-slams-public-management-of-private-foster-care-industry-chronicleofsocialchange.org>

7-year-old girl's head shaved in Massachusetts group home Posted on October 20, 2017 at 8:11 AM 191 shares By Michelle Williams Michelle.Williams@masslive.com A mother is demanding answers after her daughter's head was shaved. Denise Robinson's 7-year-old daughter Tru resides at Little Heroes Group Home in Dracut, a facility for children ages 5 through 11 who have suffered trauma, including abuse or neglect. Robinson said her daughter's curls were cut without her permission. When asked why, Robinson said she was told for hygienic purposes. The facility is run by Justice Resource Institute, funded by the state's Department of Children and Families. JRI said in a statement a review into the issue is underway. Source: http://www.masslive.com/news/index.ssf/2017/10/7-year-old_girls_head_shaved_i.html

Sex assault at group home Thursday, October 19, 2017 8:56 a.m. CDT Joel Nesler TOWN OF PACIFIC, WI (WSAU) - An employee is accused of sexually assaulting a client of a live-in facility for people with disabilities in Columbia County. 29-year-old Joel Nesler of Reedsburg was arrested Tuesday after the assault was reported the day before at the facility in the Town of Pacific. He's expected to appear in court this week. The Columbia County Sheriff's Department received a report Monday about an incident at the live-in care facility. The investigation suggested a sexual assault where the victim was a female client at the group home. Further details have not been released. Source: <http://wsau.com/news/articles/2017/oct/19/sex-assault-at-group-home/>

Parents slam charter boss for 'boot camp' discipline at Manhattan school Parents slam charter boss for 'boot camp' discipline at school BY Ben Chapman NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Sunday, October 22, 2017, 3:42 AM facebook Tweet email Parents waiting for their children outside the Success Academy Hudson Yards Middle School on West 41st St. in Manhattan on Friday. The 20-member Parents' Opposition Committee has claimed that the school's disciplinary measures are overly harsh. (Shawn Inglima/for New York Daily News) BY Ben Chapman NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Sunday, October 22, 2017, 3:42 AM Angry parents who claim their kids are being ruined by boot camp-style teaching are staging an uprising at Eva Moskowitz's flagship, $68 million Success Academy charter school that opened in September. Moskowitz's heavily hyped Success Academy Hudson Yards Middle School, which so far enrolls about 200 kids in grades five and six, is meant to be a model for her to share her education gospel with schools from around the world through a new Education Institute that was launched at the school in June. But already Moskowitz has encountered some difficulties. An anonymous group of parents at the school has sent scathing letters to Moskowitz and Hudson Yards Principal Malik Russell that decry what they call draconian disciplinary tactics. Teachers unions sue over charter's move to certify own educators The parents charge Russell gives detention for minor infractions such as failing to clasp their hands, failing to make eye contact and inadvertently breaking wind in class. "It's like a military-style boot camp," said one of the parents, who asked to remain anonymous for fear of retaliation. "The kids have two hours of homework a night," the parent added. "They don't have time for playdates, they have no time for a life." The insurgent families' group — which calls itself the Parents' Opposition Committee and has about 20 members, according to parents — already held one marathon meeting with Russell at the school on Oct. 5 to detail their concerns. Charter schools flood de Blasio with letters asking for space Then they followed up on the meeting with an angry letter to Moskowitz and the charter network's board on Oct. 10. "We are a large group of parents from Hudson Yards Middle School who are outraged by Principal Russell's policies and treatment of our children," the letter states. Moskowitz wrote the parents back and promised to meet with them at the school on Thursday. "I am sorry again that you are frustrated and concerned about the school design as well as the implementation," her letter says. "There seems to be some misunderstandings." Success Academy needs and deserves more public school space The controversial charter boss said she would ease their worries in person. "I look forward to seeing you there and further addressing your concerns," she wrote. "As always, appreciate your involvement and investment." Other parents said they had encountered glitches at the school, such as difficulties receiving homework assignments in time, but their overall experiences were positive. "It's been working for my daughter," said Omilania Buckine, 39, of Manhattan, whose daughter is in fifth grade at the school. Success Academy boss slams de Blasio over charter space requests "She has amazing teachers who are attentive and keep me abreast of everything going on with her." Russell admitted that the school had experienced some missteps but said staffers were working to negotiate solutions with parents. "Starting a new enterprise — especially one as ambitious as this — can have some challenges," Russell said. "But with the support of our great community that we have, we have been able to push ahead and build a wonderful school that focuses on joy as well as academic excellence." Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/education/parents-slam-charter-boss-boot-camp-discipline-school-article-1.3580283>

Mark of Honor group home closing by Friday Mark of Honor Youth Lodge closing doors by Friday
Closed Captions Share Video Copied Copied Rewind 10 Seconds Next Up 00:00 00:00 02:03 Closed Captions Share Video Settings Fullscreen By Carly Jensen | Posted: Mon 10:49 PM, Oct 23, 2017 | Updated: Tue 6:12 AM, Oct 24, 2017 LINCOLN, Neb. (KOLN) - A group home in Lincoln is closing its doors after only four years of helping troubled youth. The Mark of Honor Youth Lodge is in the same building as the Indian Center. The home said they've helped nearly 100 boys get back on their feet. 10/11 spoke to one of them who stayed at Mark of Honor Youth Lodge for a year. For him the home was a fresh start. "I really think it was a good positive thing in my life for me," said Jonathan. He was in a detention center in Hastings going through a chemical dependency program before coming to Lincoln. He found out today that they would be closing their doors. "It's honestly sad because I just I wouldn't really see where everyone would go and I'm not even sure how full the program is," said Jonathan. Staff said their census is the problem. Today they are only housing four boys but can hold 12. "We are funded by grants, and also we have contracts with the DHHS and the Probation system," said Devon Gall one of the youth caretakers. A lot of the money they get depends on how full they are. Documents from DHHS show the last contract expired on September 30th. It was for roughly $150,000. Without that money they can't operate. "Mostly this is a trust building exercise with them. Yeah these guys are going to make dumb mistakes or bad choices and they're going to have to be punished for that but for the most part they're learning to be a part of a community," said Gall. Jonathan said it really helped him and thinks it could have been a great place for other boys to come. "When I was there I got a lot of help and a lot of support. And I figured out how to do a lot of things. But now I do feel prepared being out in the outside world," said Jonathan. Part of what Jonathan did at Mark of Honor was practice interviews and career prep. He said programs like that helped him get the job he has today. Source: <http://www.1011now.com/content/news/Mark-of-Honor-group-home-closing-by-Friday-452646773.html>

What's Foster Care Like? Learn From the Youth Who Lived Through It. Audio Player Comments Download pARTicipate What's Foster Care Like? Learn From the Youth Who Lived Through It October 25, 2017 00:00 01:06 02:51 Use Up/Down Arrow keys to increase or decrease volume. By Rachael Myrow October 25, 2017 Share 532 Click to share on Facebook \(Opens in new window\) 532 Click to share on Twitter \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Pinterest \(Opens in new window\) Click to share on Google+ \(Opens in new window\) A San Francisco Bay Area museum is taking an unusual tack with an exhibition about foster youth in California. The Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History invited a team of former foster youth and advocates to help put the show together. Five months before the show Lost Childhoods went up, around a hundred former foster youth and advocates began meeting at the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History to talk about what the exhibition would look like. Community engagement director Stacey Garcia explains, "We are not experts in what foster youth have gone through, what they want to share. We know how to make an exhibition, but we don't know how to tell their story. They do." Jess Prudent works as an outreach assistant with Court Appointed Special Advocates of Santa Cruz County, which supports children in foster care. Prudent was skeptical at first that the museum wanted anything more than superficial advice from the Creative Community Committee \(C3\), but was soon won over by the hands-on curatorial process. "Sophia," (2014) by Ray Bussolari. It's no secret older foster children are less likely to be adopted. What may be less known is the fact siblings are split when a family decides to adopt one but not the other(s). (Photo: Courtesy of Ray Bussolari) "We were making every decision: like, the layout of this place, the art pieces that we included, the artists, even what the collaborating artists were going to focus on," Prudent says. At the core of the exhibition is a collection of photographic portraits by Ray Bussolari, as well as artifacts from Oakland's Foster Youth Museum. Garcia says the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History added works by former foster youth who are on the museum's advisory committee, as well as by local artists they got to choose. "We really chose artists based on how willing they were to collaborate, and how much they wanted the youths' voices to shine versus their own," Garcia says. Take "Interwoven Voices," by Santa Cruz artist Melody Overstreet. It's a tapestry of messages from committee members, written on paper strips. This is one written by Prudent: "We're not troubled kids. We're kids with troubles." "Interwoven Voices," by Santa Cruz artist Melody Overstreet is a tapestry of messages from Creative Community Committee members, written on paper strips. (Photo: Courtesy of Meghan Puich/Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History) Jamie Lee Evans is the founder of the Foster Youth Museum. "There is no other exhibit like this," Evans says. "This is the largest and probably only exhibition of artifacts, art and culture demonstrating the experience of foster care from a youth's perspective." That's something Lost Childhoods makes plain with personal mementos that highlight statistical truths. A college diploma and a photograph of a foster youth living in a dorm room at University of San Francisco is accompanied by a caption explaining that close to half of those who survive foster care will never graduate from high school, let alone university. A disproportionate number will instead become unemployed or even homeless when they "age out." "I've been told from plenty of people that I know that coming here, they relate to things that they couldn't before, whether or not they were in the foster care system," says Chad Platt, a transition age youth advocate at Encompass Community Services and a former foster youth himself. The local half of "Lost Childhoods" includes video interviews of former foster youth, paintings by them, and personal journals anyone can sit down and read. (Photo: Courtesy of Meghan Puich/Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History) Museum visitor Diane Lamott from Aptos was moved by the show. "Heart wrenching. Emotional," she said choking back tears. "Makes you wish you could have done something more to help." But the show's organizers want to do more than elicit sympathy from visitors. Right at the entrance of the gallery, there's a massive display of multi-colored "action cards." Each one suggests one way to help foster youth. Bake a cake. Donate a pair of pajamas. Teach a teen to write a resume. Or, if you're really inspired, volunteer as a court appointed special advocate. Pick a card, any card. (Photo: Rachael Myrow/KQED) Lost Childhoods is on view at the Santa Cruz Museum of Art & History through December 31, 2017. More info here. Source: <https://ww2.kqed.org/arts/2017/10/25/former-foster-youth-change-narrative/>

Repatriation Efforts Continue: Northern Arapaho advocate Yufna Soldier Wolf, boarding school healing coalition to host a roundtable on children buried at Carlisle School By Angelica Leicht on October 25, 2017 The work to return the Native American children buried at Carlisle Indian Industrial School to their rightful resting places continues. "Our efforts right now are to get everyone on the same page and to have a way to communicate to other tribes how we will go forward," Yufna Soldier Wolf, Northern Arapaho Tribal Historic Preservation Officer, advocate and tribe member, said. Soldier Wolf is working with the National Native American Boarding School Healing Coalition, a nonprofit focused on pursuing truth, healing, and reconciliation from the U.S. Indian Boarding School policy, to host a Tribal Roundtable Discussion for Carlisle Repatriations in November in Minneapolis, MN. The purpose of the roundtable is to discuss ways to move forward with petitioning the U.S. government for return of the Native children buried on the grounds of what was once Carlisle Indian Industrial School, the first off-reservation boarding school in the nation. The school enrolled an estimated 10,000 Native American children from tribes all over the nation, many of whom died and were buried on the Carlisle grounds during their time at the school. "Over those 39 years that the school operated, roughly 190 to 195 were buried in that cemetery including infants of the students; a number of infant burials," Jim Gerencser, College Archivist for Carlisle Indian School Digital Resource Center, said. Soldier Wolf has been a critical voice in the fight for the return of the Native American children who are buried at Carlisle Indian Industrial School, and spearheaded the fight for the return of Little Plume, Little Chief — Soldier Wolf's great uncle — and Horse. The Northern Arapaho's fight for their children was the subject of the Planet "Return to Wind River" feature story earlier this year. The fight for the children from Wind River, a reservation that stretches across western Wyoming, was the first of its kind. It took over a decade of letters, petitions and studies for the government to agree to exhumate the three Northern Arapahoe boys buried at Carlisle. The exhumation took place in early August, and only Little Horse and Little Chief returned to Wind River. Little Plume's grave contained the remains of two unidentified people, and Plume's true gravesite has not yet been identified. The number of unknown graves like Little Plume's has risen from 12 to 14 at the Carlisle cemetery—meaning there are 14 “unknown” children buried at a federal school that they were forced to attend, according to a press release from the NABSHC. That statistic shouldn't exist, according to the NABSHC, and is one that speaks to the ongoing impacts and historical trauma caused by the disastrous U.S. Indian Boarding School experiment. “It's extremely sad and disappointing for the family who is already grieving a loss that never should have taken place,” said Christine Diindiisi McCleave, executive officer of the National Native American Boarding School Healing Coalition. “It's showing that there's more that needs to be looked into about the boarding schools—the treatment and care and responsibility that they had to our children, in life and in death.” The Northern Arapaho are hopeful that the roundtable will help other tribes who have expressed interest in the Army War College repatriating their children's remains, and have been watching these events unfold with many questions about how the Army will proceed now that they can't find Little Plume. “Our goal is to reach all the 59 tribes who have children buried in the cemetery to present how the process went for the Arapaho and start a dialogue for other tribes who may want to repatriate or who would like for their children to stay in the Army's cemetery,” said Soldier Wolf. “We need people to know what's going on at Carlisle.” While Soldier Wolf celebrates the return of Horse and Little Chief who laid buried far from home for 134 years and now rest with their War Chief Families on the western Wyoming reservation, she said in the news release that she is committed to helping find Little Plume and helping other tribes navigate the repatriation process. Soldier Wolf is currently working as a consultant with the NABSHC to share information on the repatriation process, and will present a report at the roundtable in November. “The Boarding School Healing Coalition acknowledges the efforts of Mrs. Soldier Wolf in the repatriation of the Northern Arapaho children,” said McCleave. “We are eager for her to share her knowledge for others going through the repatriation process at Carlisle and we are excited about welcoming her onto our team.” Matthew L. Campbell, Staff Attorney at the Native American Rights Fund, will also speak at the Tribal Roundtable. Campbell is an enrolled member of the Native Village of Gambell on the Saint Lawrence Island in Alaska and has worked on repatriation issues in the past. The National Native American Boarding School Healing Coalition is sponsoring the Tribal Roundtable discussion in support of the other tribes requesting their children's remains as well as in support of the tribes who have requested that their children not be disturbed. All Tribal Leaders whose tribes have children buried at Carlisle Indian School Cemetery are invited or to designate a representative to attend. Tribes can apply for scholarship funds to assist with travel costs. The Tribal Roundtable Discussion for Carlisle Repatriations will be held on November 30 in Minneapolis, Minnesota. For more information about the Tribal Roundtable, please visit The National Native American Boarding School Healing Coalition at www.boardingschoolhealing.org/events. PJH Source: <http://planetjrh.com/2017/10/25/repatriation-efforts-continue-northern-arapaho-advocate-yufna-soldier-wolf-boarding-school-healing-coalition-to-host-a-roundtable-on-children-buried-at-carlisle-school/>

Foster Parents Facing Child Abuse Charges in Missouri A judge has found sufficient evidence for a southwest Missouri foster care couple to stand trial on charges that they abused a toddler in their care. Oct. 25, 2017, at 1:22 p.m. Foster Parents Facing Child Abuse Charges in Missouri Share × Share on Facebook Post on Twitter Post to Reddit Email Share in LinkedIn Share on StumbleUpon Share on Google Plus MOUNT VERNON, Mo. (AP) — A judge has found sufficient evidence for a southwest Missouri foster care couple to stand trial on charges that they abused a toddler in their care. The Joplin Globe reports that Shawn and Stefani Stovall were bound over for trial Monday on single felony counts of child abuse. The Stovalls, both 41, began caring for the 2-year-old boy in May in Mount Vernon. Police and state welfare officials began investigating in July after a call to the state's child abuse hotline. Court records say the child's biological mother noticed bruises on her son's forehead, neck, chin, upper torso, sides, buttocks, legs, ears and genitals during a supervised visit. The boy was taken for an examination. The couple's attorney didn't immediately respond to an email message from The Associated Press. Source: <https://www.usnews.com/news/best-states/missouri/articles/2017-10-25/foster-parents-facing-child-abuse-charges-in-missouri>

Woman accused of abusing, intimidating foster child Woman accused of abusing, intimidating foster child Joshua Kellogg, jkkellogg@daily-times.com Published 5:00 p.m. MT Oct. 28, 2017 Doctor found victim had multiple instances of bruising, black eyes Hope Graciano (Photo: Courtesy of San Juan County Adult Detention Center) Story Highlights Hope Graciano is accused of three felony counts of child abuse. One of the child abuse charges stems from an incident with an 8-year-old girl Graciano was fostering. Graciano's preliminary hearing is set for Nov. 29. CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN 1 COMMENT EMAIL MORE FARMINGTON — A former foster mother accused of four felony charges, including child abuse, allegedly struck the 11-year-old victim with a piece of a bed frame after he got a math problem incorrect on his homework. Hope Graciano, 53, was charged Monday with one first-degree felony count and two third-degree felony counts of child abuse and a third-degree felony count of intimidation of a witness, according to the criminal complaint. Arlon Stoker, Graciano's attorney, said his client adamantly denies the accusations and looks forward to proving her innocence in court. Graciano was licensed through La Familia-Namaste Foster Care. The Albuquerque-based nonprofit organization is licensed through the state of New Mexico to provide adoption and treatment foster care for children and families. Beverly Nomborg, president and CEO of La Familia-Namaste, said Graciano was licensed to provide treatment foster care for about two years and was no longer a foster parent as of Sept. 28. Citing state law, Nomborg declined to share information related to the foster children and the number of children in Graciano's care. Other children previously in Graciano's care have been interviewed by employees for the New Mexico Children, Youth and Families Department, according to a Farmington Police Department press release. Farmington Capt. Taft Tracy previously told The Daily Times the foster children had been removed from the home. More: Farmington woman faces child abuse charges The first-degree felony count of child abuse stems from the 11-year-old victim accusing Graciano of beating him in late September with part of his bed frame at Graciano's home in Farmington, according to San Juan County Chief Deputy District Attorney Dustin O'Brien. The victim told a child forensic investigator in early October he was doing his homework when Graciano told him he answered a math problem incorrectly, and she repeatedly struck him with a piece of the bed frame, according to the arrest warrant affidavit. An investigation into the alleged abuse started when Graciano took the victim to San Juan Regional Medical Center for treatment following the alleged incident. The doctor treating the victim told a Farmington police officer that he had a "great concern of physical abuse" for the victim, adding the report from Graciano about how the victim was injured did not match the boy's injuries. Graciano told police the victim was playing with a soccer ball in the front yard the day before and that he struck his face on a railroad tie while practicing dives for soccer. The affidavit states Graciano allegedly changed her report of how the victim was injured at least twice, including a report that the victim tripped over his shoelaces. A crime scene investigator photographed the victim's injuries at the hospital. Those injuries include multiple instances of brown and purple bruising on his head, forearms, chest, cheeks and shoulders, according to court documents. The victim also has two black eyes that were so swollen, the victim had trouble seeing, according to court documents. For the intimidation of the witness charge, O'Brien cited multiple instances in which Graciano is accused of telling the victim not to discuss the alleged abuse. While at the hospital, Graciano allegedly told the victim if he told anyone about the alleged abuse that she would hunt him down and kill him, according to court documents. Graciano is also accused of making an 8-year-old girl she was fostering perform a plank, a type of exercise move. The girl was unable to perform the exercise, and Graciano grabbed the girl by her hair and started dragging her by her hair, according to court documents. Graciano made her first appearance in Farmington Magistrate Court Tuesday morning and was released on a $25,000 unsecured appearance bond. An unsecured appearance bond is a written agreement signed by the defendant to appear in court. Her preliminary hearing is set for 8:30 a.m. Nov. 29. Joshua Kellogg covers crime, courts and social issues for The Daily Times. He can be reached at 505-564-4627. Source: <http://www.daily-times.com/story/news/crime/2017/10/28/woman-accused-abusing-intimidating-foster-child/808472001/>

Is Foster Care Safe Where You Live? mike tikkanen 1 day ago Abused and neglected State Ward children have already suffered enough when they enter *foster care. To be removed from a birth home by a judge means that the child's life has been in imminent danger of serious harm. Most of the children I've worked with as a volunteer CASA guardian ad Litem have stories that still make me shudder twenty years later. Brandon Stahl's article in today's Star Tribune is one of those stories. Many of you will disagree and some strongly, that Melissa Anne Sondrol is not the only reason this poor foster baby has 13 fractures that appear to be deliberately inflicted by a foster mother. I argue that that our community so undervalues children that way too many smart, trainable foster families stay away from what they see as a troubled and under-resourced system. Foster care of abused and traumatized children is really really hard. All Adults Are The Protectors of All Children Whether seven weeks, Seven years or seventeen years old, the habits and behaviors of traumatized children can be threatening and dangerous to themselves and those around them. Melissa did not have the skills to care for this “incredibly fussy, fussy baby” (her words) and was most likely one of few choices the system had to place the child. We should all be grateful to Brandon Stahl's investigative reporting for shining a light on the deep and dark problems of child abuse and foster care in our state. Without his efforts, and the efforts of other child friendly reporters, these children have no voice – in their homes, in the media or in the institutions that rule their lives. Keep in mind that of MN's 40,000 reports of abuse these last twelve months, maybe 1% have made it into the public eye. 80% of children aging out of foster care lead dysfunctional lives (the cost to our community is incredible). If we the public don't see a thing, it doesn't exist and no one steps forward to demand that foster parents receive the oversight and resources that insures traumatized State Ward children live with caregivers able to care for them. How many more children will suffer the fate of this 7 week old baby or that of Eric Dean or Kendrea Johnson before our community stands up for the kinds of care abused and traumatized children need to have to live a safe and normal life? Keep in mind that it is not the money (MN had a billion dollars for the stadium, a billion dollars for the 35W bridge disaster & a billion dollars for transportation funding) it is a lack of concern for other people's children. *Foster care has become a terrible problem in most states. Some states pay higher daily rates for boarding your dog than they pay foster parents for child care. Source: <http://www.acesconnection.com/blog/is-foster-care-safe-where-you-live>

Butler County youth removed from facility under investigation Two Butler County children have been removed from a residential treatment center in Perrysville, Ohio, and another will be soon, after Butler County Children Services was notified the facility was under state investigation for abuse. BUTLER COUNTY Two Butler County children have been removed from a residential treatment center in Perrysville, Ohio, after allegations of child abuse. Two Butler County children have been removed from Mohican Youth Academy — also known as Tri State Youth Authority — and another will be soon, after Butler County Children Services was notified the facility was under state investigation for abuse. MORE: 42 people indicted in Butler and Warren counties The mission of Mohican Youth Academy is "to create an opportunity for children to make positive changes in their attitudes and behaviors in order to become productive members of society," according to its website. Among its programs are anger management, behavioral and mental health services, drug and alcohol treatment, and juvenile sexual offender treatment. ADVERTISER CONTENT: Regence Not All Insurance Providers Are Created Equal. Here's What You Need to Know While the Butler County children did not have any complaints about the treatment center, they were moved to other facilities as a precaution, according to Bill Morrison, executive director of Butler County Job and Family Services. "We sent a worker up to it because we had a couple of kids in it to interview the kids, just to see if they had any complaints or concerns," Morrison said. "They didn't express anything but we decided to move them out anyway." Children placed at the facility in the past have had a lot of success with its program, but "we didn't want to take a chance," Morrison told this news outlet. Download the Dayton Daily News app Get the latest Dayton news you want, when you want, in this free app from the Dayton Daily News. Click a link below to get the app. MORE: "Death threats" drive 1-19 Middletown coach to resign The center is on notice its license may be revoked, according to documents obtained by this news outlet from the Ohio Department of Job and Family Services. A report details several instances when staff physically abused children at the center and on one occasion a child was taken to the emergency room. "On or about May 1, 2017, there was a physical interaction between Staff 4 and Child 2, which resulted in physical injury to Child 2. MYA staff transported Child 2 to the Emergency room where Child 2 received three stitches above his eye," the report reads. "Within 48 hours MYA staff took Child 2 back to the emergency room due to complaints of blood draining from his sinus cavity. Hospital staff identified a facial area fracture and tissue swelling. Lucas County substantiated physical abuse of Child 2 by Staff 4 on May 19, 2017." There are other incidents cited of physical and verbal abuse, invasion of privacy and other infractions. MORE: 3 things to know about Butler County Children Services levy renewal This news outlet has reached out to the facility for comment, but has not yet received a response. All agencies that have placed children at the center have been notified about the state's investigation into abuse allegations, according to Bret Crow, communications director for the Ohio Department of Job and Family Services. "We have notified our partners and placing agencies about the allegations of abuse and neglect," Crow said. "Under state law, Tri-State requested a hearing regarding our proposed adjudication order to revoke its license. That hearing is scheduled for Feb. 6." Source: <https://www.daytondailynews.com/news/butler-county-kids-removed-from-facility-under-investigation-for-abuse/t22l5tcC7l8ieCXKfUYA40/>

Pace of therapist probe angers boarding school abuse victims. Associated Press 12:52 p.m Wednesday, Nov. 1, 2017 This Thursday, Jan. 7, 2016, file photo shows the campus at St. George's School in Middletown, R.I. Nearly two years after receiving complaints that a former boarding school psychologist didn't do enough to help abused children, Rhode Island officials still have not decided whether to discipline him or let him continue to practice. (AP Photo/Steven Senne, File) PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Nearly two years after receiving complaints that a former psychologist at a prominent New England boarding school didn't do enough to help abused children, Rhode Island officials still have not decided whether to discipline him or let him continue to practice. Two former students at St. George's School in Middletown filed complaints with the state Department of Health in December 2015 against Peter Kosseff, a psychologist there for 35 years. Some of those abused at St. George's say Kosseff failed to protect them and say they're frustrated by the slow pace of the investigation. But at least one says Kosseff was the only adult who helped him. Both complaints were filed by women abused by athletic trainer Al Gibbs, who abused at least 31 girls at the school. One, Katie Wales Lovkay, told Kosseff about the abuse, but as far as she knows, he never reported it. "The fact that they still have not made a decision on this two years later is absurd. This is the welfare of children," she told The Associated Press. "If he had told authorities, or had believed me ... the whole outcome could have been different." The other woman has asked to speak to the Board of Psychology on Thursday to press them to revoke his license. "I don't know why it's taken two years," she said. The AP typically doesn't name people who have been sexually abused unless they come forward publicly, as Lovkay has. Joseph Wendelken, a spokesman for the Health Department, said in an email it is the department's longstanding policy not to comment on complaints or investigations. "Generally, cases take longer to adjudicate when they are more complicated and involve more witnesses, particularly when those cases are related to incidents that allegedly occurred decades ago," he wrote. Kosseff declined to comment on the complaints but said he acted ethically during his years as a part-time psychologist at St. George's from 1979 to 2014. He currently practices in South Kingstown and Newport. "I certainly have cooperated with the board fully and supplied them with everything that they've requested," he said. "I'm going to await the board's review." An independent report released in September 2016 found dozens of children were abused by staffers and fellow students from the 1970s to as recently as the early 2000s. The report found that Kosseff took action in some instances, such as helping fire a choirmaster in 1988 for inappropriate sexual contact with a student. But no one at the school ever notified authorities, and the choirmaster went to work at another school. One of the women who filed a complaint said she believes "you can't just assist one child. You can't just send this predator out. ... I don't think there's a lot of gray area here as to whether or not he conducted himself ethically." At other times, students came to Kosseff with reports about misconduct and he didn't move quickly to stop it, the investigation found. Felicia Johnson, a 1985 graduate, who is black, was stepping out of the shower her freshman year when a group of girls attacked her, using a vacuum cleaner and writing racist words on her body with permanent black marker. "I had been violated, I was held down, felt like I was being raped, and written all over," Johnson said. The headmaster sent her to Kosseff as a condition of remaining at the school. She said Kosseff then repeatedly violated her confidentiality during the following years. "I know full well that he would go right back to the headmaster and tell him anything I said, because the headmaster would turn around and tell me," she said. She called him a "minion" of the administration, and wants his license stripped. "He violated some of the oaths that he took as a doctor," she said. But one of the people abused by the choirmaster, who asked that his name not be used, said Kosseff took quick action when he learned of the abuse, and moved to get the choirmaster fired. Kosseff, he said, helped him when other adults at the school and his parents did not. "Peter Kosseff intervened in an extremely urgent, timely fashion as other boys were being groomed," he said. Source: <http://www.statesman.com/news/pace-therapist-probe-angers-boarding-school-abuse-victims/32Xetl1fw9GXSSBuLTovcM/>

Essex district attorney investigates group home after allegations of poor care E-Mail Share via e-mail To Add a message Your e-mail Facebook Twitter Google+ LinkedIn 11 Comments Print The Boston Globe Tweet Share 11 Comments Jessica Rinaldi/Globe Staff Ioannis Baglaneas and his mother, Anna Eves, at home in Rockport. The staff at the Peabody group home where he lived "risked my son's life for a Sunday off," Eves said. By Michael Levenson Globe Staff October 31, 2017 Ioannis Baglaneas was lonely after his four brothers and sisters moved away to start their lives. So when his mother showed him the Peabody group home where he would be living with other developmentally disabled adults, he showered her with hugs and kisses. But less than a year later, when Baglaneas, who is 29 and has Down syndrome, developed severe pneumonia, staff members at the home failed to give him proper care. Instead, they ignored his persistent cough and took him to a Special Olympics track meet because the group home planned to close for Easter, which was the following day. When his mother picked him up at the meet, Baglaneas was extremely lethargic, wheezing, and red in the face, an investigation later found. Source: <https://www.bostonglobe.com/metro/2017/10/31/essex-district-attorney-investigates-group-home-after-allegations-poor-care/ar3tdkggveBhqvQ3DTGoPJ/story.html>

Teen with 18 assault convictions says she'd rather be in jail than group home By: Erin Debooy Posted: 11/3/2017 3:00 AM Tweet 41 Post 558 Reddit ShareThis Print Email 1 This is 1 of 2 complimentary stories. A 16-year-old girl handed a jail sentence for assault on Tuesday told the court she keeps assaulting people because she'd rather be in jail than her group home. "I have been trying to assault people to get in jail," the girl said via video conference in Brandon provincial court. "I dislike being in (the group home) that much." The girl, who cannot be identified under the Youth Criminal Justice Act, pleaded guilty to assault and assaulting a peace officer. She already has a lengthy criminal record, said Crown attorney Kaley Tschetter, with 18 assault convictions to date. A 16-year-old girl handed a jail sentence for assault on Tuesday told the court she keeps assaulting people because she'd rather be in jail than her group home. "I have been trying to assault people to get in jail," the girl said via video conference in Brandon provincial court. "I dislike being in (the group home) that much." The girl, who cannot be identified under the Youth Criminal Justice Act, pleaded guilty to assault and assaulting a peace officer. She already has a lengthy criminal record, said Crown attorney Kaley Tschetter, with 18 assault convictions to date. "(The accused) has a history before this court and a complex history ... she often portrays herself as someone who is less intelligent than she is," Tschetter said. "She has successfully convinced people in the past that she has autism and other disorders where in fact she is actually quite an intelligent individual who does not suffer from these disorders ... she is very much someone who can learn from her mistakes, but is choosing not to ... This is very much a behavioural issue." In May, an employee of the group home reported to Brandon police the girl had assaulted her the day before while they were trying to get her into a vehicle, Tschetter said. The victim had to spend the night in the hospital after she was punched several times, bit on the arm and kneed in the ribs and the right shoulder. The girl also threatened to slit the employee's throat. Police arrived at the home to arrest the girl, who immediately became unco-operative and combative — trying to bite, kick and hit police as they placed her in handcuffs and chartered and cautioned her. In September, police were once again called to the home when an employee reported the girl was holding a knife to her own throat. She was eventually disarmed and taken to the Brandon Regional Health Centre for a mental health assessment. Police needed to call in a third officer after the girl became violent and kicked a psychiatric doctor. When she was told she was going home, the girl kicked one of the officers trying to restrain her in the side of the forehead, causing her glasses to fly off her face. As nurses tried to restrain her, she tried to grab the gun from the officer's belt, managing to unsnap her magazine pouch. "It's quite alarming that she's not only biting people ... but she reached for the officer's gun. But for the officers and nurses behaving appropriately, who knows what could have happened," Tschetter said. "She needs to be held accountable for her actions." Defence lawyer Philip Sieklicki said custodial sentences have not worked for the girl in previous situations, but improvements in her behaviour have been seen through specialized counselling and programming. "Custody has not formed the same sort of deterrence and denunciation in her mind that it has for other inmates," Sieklicki said. "On many occasions, it's been suggested that she has come into custody specifically because she wanted out of her group home and wanted more control over her circumstances." In addressing the court, the girl said she had been doing a lot better, but she didn't find the staff in the group home she had been placed helpful. "I have to hold you accountable for what you've done ... attacking a worker to get back into custody is a huge concern and something that is completely unacceptable," said Judge John Combs, adding she should be discussing her placement with her social worker rather than taking matters into her own hands. Combs noted the 43 days the girl has already spent in custody as time served, and sentenced her to 45 more days in custody followed by a year of probation. "Although you've been charged with two assaults, your record of assaults is improving," Combs said. "There needs to be no more assaults or violent behaviour." » edeboo@brandonsun.com » Twitter: @erindeboo Source: <https://www.brandonsun.com/local/teen-with-18-assault-convictions-says-shed-rather-be-in-jail-than-group-home-454857413.html> [HEAL Note: Group homes like this one engage in aversive behavior modification and it is a type of torture. It is no wonder she will do anything to escape, even if that means going to jail.]

Fracturing Families: The Sources of Segregation in New York's Foster Care Gabriel Zimmerman November 3, 2017 Share on Facebook Tweet Share Share Pin Morrisania is one of the most heavily policed neighborhoods in the Bronx. Despite living in a public housing complex there, Maria was surprised when police officers arrived at her home one March night in 2009, immediately searching the small, two-bedroom apartment where she lives with her children, Anthony, 17, and Ava, 12. Maria, who is in her early fifties and wheelchair-bound due to a disability, was not the target of the warrant. The cops had received a tip that Anthony, still in high school, had been selling marijuana out of his mother's apartment. Yet Maria and her husband were the ones zip tied and arrested in front of their children. Criminal charges against Maria and her husband were eventually dismissed. Despite this, New York City's Administration of Child Services (ACS), which investigates cases of child abuse and neglect, took Ava to a foster care facility on the East Side of Manhattan and opened a case against her parents. Ava would spend the next year shifting from group homes to foster families, only able to see her mother at ACS offices. Maria was forced to go to a drug treatment program in order to regain custody of her daughter, even though she did not test positive for any illicit substance. After a year of bureaucratic chaos, Maria was finally able to reunite with her daughter. That year was time neither of them would ever get back. Ava is not alone as a poor child of color wrestled from her family. New York City's child welfare system is arguably the most racially segregated in the country, with black and Latino children making up 92 percent of the foster care system. African-Americans, who represent only 25 percent of the population in New York City, account for 56 percent of the foster children in the city. Only 4 percent of children in foster care are white. America's child welfare system, originally set up by well-intentioned individuals trying to help children, is in reality destroying black and Latino families, especially those afflicted by poverty. A 2008 study revealed that an estimated 71 percent of the 3.3 million cases of child abuse recorded in the United States that year were cases of neglect, challenging the narrative that violent abuse is the most prevalent type. Child neglect is defined as "the failure to provide adequate health care, supervision, clothing, nutrition, housing as well as their physical, emotional, social, educational and safety needs." But economic resources are a fundamental factor in whether families can meet these needs: Those who lack the money to provide for their children are more likely to be charged with neglect, regardless of their intent. Simply put, what looks like neglect is often the result of constraints poverty places on families. The intimate relationship between poverty and charges of neglect means that families—and particularly families of color—are often punished and torn apart for even the smallest infractions. Families residing in marginalized communities, such as the South Bronx, are 22 times more likely than white families to interact with the ACS. Child welfare institutions are increasingly criminalizing mothers of color across the country for being poor. This fits into a larger trend of disproportionate increases in imprisonment of women. Since 1985, the number of women in the criminal justice system has increased at nearly double the rate for men, with many women being incarcerated for nonviolent drug offenses. A little-discussed side effect of locking up women is how the criminal justice system affects the more than 2.7 million children left behind when their mothers go to jail. In the United States, more than 60 percent of incarcerated mothers have children under the age of 18. Approximately half of those children are under the age of 10, and these young children may have an especially difficult time maintaining a relationship with a parent that's in prison. And the notorious Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 created incentives to construct prisons in rural areas, meaning imprisoned parents can be held more than 100 miles from their homes, making family visits difficult, if not impossible. While over-policing in urban neighborhoods—exemplified by the backlash and reversal of the NYPD's much lamented "stop and frisk" policy—is a well-documented disaster, the intrusive policies officials rely on to separate families remain under-covered. But for poor parents and children harmed by imprisonment, the disparities that these policies create are all too real. "When you walk into the court, you think 'white people must not deal with issues of mental health or substance abuse issues' because they simply are not present in family court, which we obviously know is not true" states Emma Ketteringham, the managing director of the Family Defense Practice at the Bronx Defenders. Even Gladys Carrion, former ACS commissioner under Mayor Bill de Blasio, acknowledged that along with racism, "over-surveillance of families in poor neighborhoods" plays an outsized role in creating these racial disparities. Families living in public housing or homeless shelters do not have much privacy. Spaces are staffed 24/7 by security guards and social workers who are legally obligated to report to ACS if they witness anything out of the ordinary, which can happen frequently and randomly in such cramped places. A system so powerful yet so capriciously applied leaves plenty of room for bureaucratic abuse. Across New York, the threat of an agency removing children has become a weapon landlords use to force out lower-paying tenants in gentrifying neighborhoods. Ketteringham explains that "we do see cases where neighbors or people who want to cause trouble call into ACS. Everyone knows it's the best way to blow up somebody's life." The combination of near-constant surveillance and extreme punishment for poverty-linked negligence frequently leads to the removal of children from their homes, spelling disaster for families. When children are taken away after a parent is charged with a crime, the family often becomes ensnared in a well-meaning but destructive system. "Parents can be kicked out of [public] housing for arrests, often leading them to resort to single-sex shelters. This then prevents them from getting their children back from ACS until they are in a family shelter—yet with no children, there is no access to family shelter," creating a vicious cycle, says Helene Barthelemy of The Nation. The kids face real harm, too: Research shows that children in foster care have worse outcomes on both short- and long-term measures. Placement in foster care has been linked to increases in behavioral, psychological, developmental, and academic problems. One in four foster children ends up behind bars two years after leaving the system. Only 3 percent of foster children graduate from college. Even short-term removals that are quickly reversed can have lasting effects on vulnerable children. If the goal of the child welfare system is genuinely to protect children from abuse and neglect, parents should be able to reach out and ask for support without risk of separation. But today, many families in the Bronx fear ACS social workers more than the police. When this is the understanding between the child welfare system and the community it serves, the system is failing. According to Ketteringham, in order to solve the problems deeply entrenched in the child welfare system, "we need to transform, not reform, it, starting with the idea that permanency is more important than reuniting families." As a nation, we must address how we look at poverty. On both sides of the aisle, social welfare has become increasingly associated with behavioral expectations. Until we stop thinking of child neglect and child welfare issues as results of deficient characteristics and start acknowledging their deep relationship to poverty, we will continue to turn a blind eye to the larger problem of child welfare and continue to do harm to the children that public policy is trying to protect. For all the Avas and Marias of the world, maintaining the status quo is simply unacceptable. Source: <http://www.brownpoliticalreview.org/2017/11/fracturing-families-sources-segregation-new-yorks-foster-care/>

Teen Liberty News Archive

This section of our site contains news articles in mostly chronological order from earliest to most recent. We have included a .pdf copy of the full articles at the end of each teaser paragraph where the articles were available at time of archiving. News reports regarding individual programs are now shared primarily on the background information/staff list pages of our website unless the program referenced was closed prior to creation of a staff/background information page or is located outside of the USA.

Bashing Youth--March/April--1994--"Unplanned pregnancies. HIV infection and AIDS, other sexually transmitted diseases. Cigarettes, alcohol and drug abuse. Eating disorders. Violence. Suicide. Car crashes." The 21-word lead-in to a Washington Post (12/22/92) report sums up today's media image of the teenager: 30 million 12- through 19-year-olds toward whom any sort of moralizing and punishment can be safely directed, by liberals and conservatives alike. Today's media portrayals of teens employ the same stereotypes once openly applied to unpopular racial and ethnic groups: violent, reckless, hypersexed, welfare-draining, obnoxious, ignorant. And like traditional stereotypes, the modern media teenager is a distorted image, derived from the dire fictions promoted by official agencies and interest groups. During the 1980s and 1990s, various public and private entrepreneurs realized that the news media will circulate practically anything negative about teens, no matter how spurious. A few examples among many: * In 1985, the National Association of Private Psychiatric Hospitals, defending the profitable mass commitment of teenagers to psychiatric treatment on vague diagnoses, invented the "fact" that a teenager commits suicide "every 90 minutes"--or 5,000 to 6,000 times every year. Countless media reports of all types, from the Associated Press (4/4/91) to Psychology Today (5/92), continue to report this phony figure, nearly three times the true teen suicide toll, which averaged 2,050 per year during the 1980s (Vital Statistics of the United States). * In a 1991 campaign to promote school-based clinics, the American Medical Association (AMA) and the National Association of State Boards of Education published a report that inflated the 280,000 annual births to unmarried teenaged mothers into "half a million," and claimed a "30-fold" increase in adolescent crime since 1950. In fact, 1950 youth crime statistics are too incomplete to compare, and later, more comprehensive national reports show no increase in juvenile crime rates in at least two decades. (Contrast, for example, the FBI Uniform Crime Reports for 1970 and 1992.) The facts notwithstanding, the national media (e.g., AP, 6/8/90) dutifully publicized the organizations' exaggerations. * In the early '80s, officials hyping the "war on drugs" orchestrated media hysteria about "skyrocketing" teenage drug abuse at a time when, in fact, teenage drug death rates were plummeting (down 70 percent from 1970 to 1982). In the late '80s, the same media outlets parroted official claims of a drug-war "success" when, in reality, youth drug death rates were skyrocketing (up 85 percent from 1983 to 1991--see In These Times, 5/20/92). Today, official and media distortions are one and the same. Who's to blame for poverty? Teenage mothers, declares Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala in uncritical news stories (see Los Angeles Times, 12/12/93) that fail to note that teenage mothers on welfare were poor before they became pregnant. Who's causing violence? "Kids and guns," asserts President Clinton, favorably quoted by reporters (AP, 11/14/93) who neglect to mention that six out of seven murders are committed by adults. Who's dying from drugs, spreading AIDS, committing suicide? Teenagers, teenagers, teenagers, the media proclaim at the behest of official sources, even though health reports show adults much more at risk from all of these perils than are adolescents. For complete story, click here.

Teens Claim Abuse at Prison--July 2nd, 1998--Eight boys formerly jailed at a privately run juvenile prison are claiming that employees assaulted them when they were hogtied. The boys claim in separate lawsuits that prison employees squeezed their crotches when the boys' hands and feet were bound behind their backs. The teenagers claim Corrections Corporation of America employees often choked and hogtied boys at the prison off Farrow Road near Interstate 20. The boys also allege workers improperly used pepper spray on them. "CCA's conduct in authorizing and condoning the practices... is extreme and outrageous and exceeds all possible bounds of decency in a civilized society," Gaston Fairey, the boys' attorney, wrote in the lawsuits. The lawsuits, filed in federal court in Columbia, don't identify the boys because they are juveniles. They are similar to one that another boy filed in February. James Cooper, a lawyer who represents CCA, said he couldn't discuss the lawsuits because he hasn't seen them. The firm denied any wrongdoing in response to the lawsuit that was filed in February. Five of the eight teenagers are home. Two are at state mental hospitals. One remains in prison. The youths and their parents declined to comment, Fairey said. After allegations of misconduct, Gov. David Beasley ended the state's contract with CCA. On July 1, 1997, the Department of Juvenile Justice started running the prison, now called the Northeast Center. Treatment has improved at the prison since the Juvenile Justice Department started running it, Fairey said. "I'm still struggling with the Juvenile Justice Department about programming and other issues," Fairey said. "But the agency doesn't authorize the techniques CCA taught its employees to control juveniles. It fires employees who are abusive." Several reports sent to Beasley showed CCA employees too frequently resorted to physical force to control juveniles. For complete story, click here.

Senator: Videotaped CYA Beating Warrants Charges--April 1st, 2004--SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- A videotape released Thursday that shows the beating of wards by California Youth Authority guards has prompted one senator to call for local prosecutors to reconsider filing charges in the case. The videotape, taken Jan. 20, 2004, shows a correctional officer punching one CYA ward 28 times even after the teen was already lying face down on the ground. The videotape, shot inside Stockton's N.A. Chaderjian Youth Correctional Facility, also shows a second correctional officer punching and kicking a second ward. The Stockton District Attorney's Office has declined to file criminal charges against the youth counselors involved in the beatings. The matter is currently under review by the California Attorney General's Office. For complete story, click here.

Pfizer Health Solutions Challenges Industry Leaders to Put Prevention and Wellness Models Into Practice at 2005 DMAA Leadership Forum: NEW YORK, Nov. 2 /PRNewswire/ -- Pfizer Health Solutions Inc (PHS) today announced it is donating $10,000 in scholarship money to Healthy Living Academies (HLA), a division of Aspen Education Group, which operates the first therapeutic residential boarding school for overweight children and young adults. (Webmaster's Note: This isn't the first time the drug companies have openly funded abusive behavior modification programs. Just more evidence that they do.) For complete story, click here.

9 Ways to Keep Tabs on Troubled Teens: November 1, 2005 -- One well-used specialty of Spy-Moms.com, two Moms Private Eyes, is taming out-of-control teens. Like them, you can find out exactly what is going on and where it is happening with the combination of these techno gadgets and Mom or Pop's intuition. We know that these methods can be distasteful and may seem over the top to some parents but desperate situations sometimes require extreme methods to secure the safety of our children. (Webmaster's note: Yes, instead of investing time, love, compassion, and earnestly listening to your children you can now be an ultra-spying police force to watch every move your child makes helping them get used to the police state we are slowly entering... Great!) For complete story, click here.

Panel to begin work regulating youth homes: Is solitary confinement in an isolated "hobbit hole" appropriate behavior-changing therapy for a troubled, defiant teenager? Are leg restraints appropriate when bringing such teens to Montana against their will (but at their parents' insistence) to live in a private boarding school? Who is responsible when an untrained youth "counselor" seduces teenagers half his age while they're in his care at a church-based residential facility? These are some of the questions facing - but unlikely to be quickly answered - by the state's newly formed Board of Private Alternative Adolescent Residential or Outdoor Programs. (Webmaster note: Sounds promising but for the fact that WWASPS facilitator is head of the Board set to regulate facilities... What a slap in the face to all of us who desire real regulation. It's not a battle that will be easily won. But, it must and will be won. Keep on working!) For complete story, click here.

Abuse of power: Recent coach, teacher misconduct no surprise to experts: Just two weeks before Giordano's Aug. 18 arrest, the director of a youth emergency response training program was charged with videotaping and having sexual relations with three teen-aged girls in separate incidents. He now faces up to 12 years in prison. In a third case, a highly-involved soccer coach and substitute teacher was convicted of giving alcohol to four 18-year-old women members of his private soccer club team. For complete story, click here.

Doctor had revealed secret role as mentor: For years, Dr. Bill Schnall was to many the perfect pediatrician: a hardworking man who rose to the top of his field while going out of his way to help teens in trouble... On Tuesday, the state medical disciplinary board suspended Schnall's medical license, saying that relationship and others with male patients crossed ethical boundaries, endangering the public. For complete story, click here.

Academy at Ivy Ridge Settles Over Diploma Issues: The Academy at Ivy Ridge has agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and offer restitution to some parents of its students as part of a negotiated settlement with the New York State Attorney General's Office over its accreditation and granting diplomas... The Attorney General had accused the school of issuing diplomas illegally because the association did not have a license to do business in New York State and misleading parents into thinking the school could issue diplomas that would be recognized by colleges. For complete story, click here.

New York Times Underplays Boot Camp Abuse, Lack of Success: The Times played down abuse allegations (and confirmed cases) which have long plagued the industry, quoting unnamed "officials at several companies" who blamed the incidents on "a handful of less reputable programs." That "handful," however, is made up of some of the biggest organizations in the industry. For complete story, click here.

These kids face harsh reality: Regarding "Brat Camp"... It was exactly what Andrea Watson had feared. Since the show launched, the founder of the local advocacy group Parents for Residential Reform has been railing at ABC for returning kids to their communities with continued troubles and newfound public profiles. She has helped to circulate a letter calling for a boycott of the show's sponsors, and asked local ABC affiliate WCVB (Channel 5) to pull the show. And in part, she blamed SageWalk -- whose officials did not return calls seeking comment -- for agreeing to take part. "The more I look, the sicker I am," Watson said. "Any responsible provider would never allow this to be." Shay Bilchik, president and CEO of the Child Welfare League of America, said he fears the show sends desperate parents a dangerous message: that all outdoor programs are effective and safe. Bilchik said he is penning a letter to Congress asking for a General Accounting Office inquiry into residential treatment programs. For complete story, click here.

Doctor sounds alarm over medicated juvenile inmates: January 9th, 2005-- Soon after taking over as chief psychiatrist at San Diego County's Juvenile Hall in 2000, Dr. Marjorie Shuer said she discovered many of the children were being given such heavy doses of psychotropic drugs that they couldn't function in school and didn't want to leave their cells. Shuer reported the problem to her superiors at the County Department of Health and Human Services. A few months later she was fired. In a wrongful termination lawsuit she filed in 2002, Shuer said she lost her job because she blew the whistle on staff psychiatrists she believed were endangering children in Juvenile Hall. For complete story, click here.

An uncomfortably close look at nine troubled teens: There is something creepy and unfair about "Brat Camp," which premieres with a two-hour episode tonight at 8 on Channel 5. It reminds me of a despicable A&E series called "Intervention," in which addicts of all kinds are fooled into an intervention and scooted off to rehab, all on camera. Not only have the addicts been filmed for our entertainment at their lowest of lows, but they're clearly in no condition to have given away their permission to be filmed in the first place. "Brat Camp" similarly captures its confused kids undergoing extremely personal psychological breakdowns on TV. And really, what 14-year-olds -- on the edge or not -- are able to judge whether they want to cry, yell, and reveal their darkest secrets in prime time? Do they realize this isn't "The Real World"? Are they truly equipped to decide that they want to spend their lives as TV's Lexie, "Hostile Outcast," or TV's Jada, "Compulsive Liar"? I think not... But the show about SageWalk makes me uncomfortable, not least of all because the title itself reduces some pretty deep-seated problems to mere brattiness. It may be hard to turn away while seeing footage of these kids smoking pot and drinking, or of their parents sobbing with despair. But Jada, the 15-year-old from Boston who has trouble being honest, deserves privacy when she falls apart hours into the camp experience. Words like "crying" understate what she goes through on-screen, rocking madly and ranting. For complete story, click here.

A Gay American Teen's 'Blog' Reveals the Hell Some Can be Put Through by Parents and Others: Excerpts from the story... "And perhaps describing his current mood as "worried" is a bit of an understatement. "My parents lied to me. ... [they said] that they didn't know what the rules were exactly. ... I see now why they "didn't know what the rules were". It's horrible.. they' posted below.. and I [am] so worried. It's like boot camp, but worse, I obviously was not supposed to see this, seeing the bottom say "Parental Rules (not to be given to client)," he writes... The next posting is June 3: "It's been a week of torture -- anger, and crying." For complete story, click here.

Youth prison officials have much to explain: Workers at the Hawaii Youth Correctional Facility reported abuse of inmates and other problems to a legislative committee. HEARINGS before a state House-Senate committee have verified continuing abuse at the Hawaii Youth Correctional Facility, despite efforts by the Lingle administration to deal with guards' mistreatment of inmates. Blaming the problems on the bureaucratic process will not satisfy complaints in lawsuits brought against the state or bring the facility into compliance with federal standards. For complete story, click here.

Kids As Young As 12 Are Being Put On The Kansas Sex Offender Website: Just playing doctor could put your child on the Kansas sex offender website. The sex offender website is filled with information about people who have committed horrible crimes against children. But KAKE News has learned kids not even old enough to drive are being called sex offenders. For complete story, click here.

Psychiatric Hospital CEO Target of Probe: Indiana authorities are investigating whether the top administrator of a troubled psychiatric program in Allegheny County violated state regulations in that state. An Indianapolis woman contends Southwood Psychiatric Hospital CEO Lisa Machado practiced counseling without a license at Resolute Treatment Facility in Indiana. The Indiana Attorney General's Office is investigating. Machado joined Southwood as CEO in September. Earlier this month, Pennsylvania welfare officials downgraded operating licenses for three Southwood facilities to provisional status. The Allegheny County Department of Children, Youth and Families responded by removing seven children who had been placed there for treatment. For complete story, click here.

At Some Youth 'Treatment' Facilities, 'Tough Love' Takes Brutal Forms: If this was therapy, it sure didn't feel like it. From September to January, Claire Kent spent her days digging up tree stumps from a barren field, her mind and body battered by the elements. The work was part of her "treatment" for the drinking and sex that had landed her at a boarding school for "troubled teens." In the Montana woods, Kent and a couple dozen other adolescent girls had been committed by their families to a disciplinary program that included chopping wood, exercising to the point of physical breakdown, and being regularly bullied and insulted by "counselors" -- all in the name of what the private treatment industry calls "emotional growth." "It was just based on, 'How badly can I scare you?'," said Kent, now in her late twenties and still suffering from anxiety that she attributes to her experience. During her two-year stay, she said, "they gave me the reality that life was just completely unfair and was going to keep being that way." For complete story, click here.

Behavior Modification Money Trail: The controversial world of youth behavior-modification facilities intersects with a web of intricate political connections. And where the treatment industry sees cooperation with government entities, activists warn, these links could cloud the prospects for public oversight of the "teen-help" market. The influence of the behavior-modification industry is felt on Capitol Hill. Four members of the House of Representatives and one senator serve as honorary board members of Kids Helping Kids, a company with corporate links to a now-defunct behavior-modification program for teen drug users known as Straight Incorporated. The various franchises of that program dissolved in the early 1990s following allegations of child abuse, as well as criticism for using cruel, prisoner-of-war-style brainwashing techniques on adolescents. For complete story, click here.

Mother, son found dead in apparent murder-suicide: OCALA - A woman whose 12-year-old son died in 2000 after being pinned down by a youth camp counselor was found dead in her garage with her 7-year-old son in an apparent murder-suicide, authorities said. Linda Ibarra, 36, was found late Tuesday lying outside the driver's side door of a sport utility vehicle. Her son Lorenzo was found dead in the passenger seat, Marion County Sheriff's investigators said. For complete story, click here.

Del. illegally jails child suspects: They show up in pairs in the middle of the night, a cop and a kid. Some of the kids are silent, unsure about what's happening to them. Most appear indifferent, trying to maintain a semblance of cool in a situation they can't control. Some were hanging out on street corners late at night. A few got into shoving matches with family members. Some said the wrong thing in anger. All of them wound up in one of Delaware's two juvenile detention centers. None of them should have. For complete story, click here.

Center for troubled U.S. teens shut down by Mexican officials: A center for troubled adolescents operating outside Ensenada has been shut down, and 13 American teenagers enrolled there have been returned to the United States, Mexican authorities announced yesterday. The U-Turn For Christ Youth Ranch, a behavioral modification center supported by the Perris-based Calvary Chapel, was closed Friday after Mexican inspectors said they found a range of violations. Four American adults at the center were expelled and have been banned from Mexico for at least five years. For complete story, click here.

Science tries to find secrets of teen brains: New brain research is shattering assumptions held for generations about the adolescent mind, fueling a battle over teen mental health, the rights of parents and the effectiveness of treatment. (scary...We've recently read articles on surgical behavior modification aka lobotomies. Watch closely...) For complete story, click here.

Boy Claims He Was Sexually Assaulted At Valpo Shelter: A 13-year-old boy claims in a lawsuit to have been sexually assaulted in May by a fellow resident of the Hanson House, an emergency shelter for troubled teens. For complete story, click here.

Troubled teen escapee injured in shooting: An early morning shooting in New London leaves a teenager in intensive care. Police say the victim is a 14-year-old and had escaped from a facility for troubled teens... Police say the 14-year-old victim is not cooperating and is not providing police with information. They say he was shot either in the back or side and remains in the intensive care unit at Lawrence and Memorial Hospital... Police say several days before the shooting the teenager had escaped from Mount Saint John 25-miles away here in Deep River. (At time of archiving we were unable to locate full story. Source: www.wtnh.com Date: December, 2005)

Lawmaker seeks probe of teen boot camps to root out possible fraud, abuse: WASHINGTON - California Rep. George Miller is asking for a congressional investigation of teen boot camps, citing alleged child abuse and fraud at the facilities in the United States and abroad. Miller sent a letter Wednesday to the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, asking for a report on the how the boot camps and boarding schools are regulated and financed, as well as a review at allegations of abuse and fraud. For complete story, click here.

Teen Mother Ruled a Sex Offender: SALT LAKE CITY The Utah Court of Appeals is upholding a judge's refusal to dismiss a sexual abuse allegation against a 13-year-old Ogden girl who became pregnant by her 12-year-old boyfriend. The appeals court on Friday ruled that the law's "rigorous protections" for younger minors include protecting them from each other. The decision leaves the teens in the position of each being both a victim and a perpetrator in the same offense. (At time of archiving, story was no longer available online. Source: www.kutv.com Date: December 31, 2005)

Bad Kids Inc.: What's to be done about out-of-control teenagers? The man who gave us Citi Habitats has a plan to turn a parental self-help group into a company as popular and profitable as Weight Watchers: According to the doctor, the symptoms are everywhere. The school shootings and the self-mutilation. The vulgar soaps in prime time. The designer drugs and the oral-sex orgies, which, the doctor is confident, are not a myth propagated to sell newsmagazines. "Twelve-year-old girls, in my office, I have them," he says. "They line up and give blow-job parties. No, it's for real. I did an MTV show about this." Ron Zodkevitch, a 47-year-old psychiatrist from Forest Hills who some twenty years ago migrated to Beverly Hills, is making these pronouncements in his office on Wilshire Boulevard. Seated in the sort of high-backed leather chair that gives one the look of being on a throne, he props up his feet on a grand wooden desk. He is wearing cowboy boots. Beat-up, knocked-around black leather cowboy boots that let you know he is not your typical child psychiatrist. For this reason, he prefers being called "Dr. Zod," although the talent agents who are grooming him for his as-yet-unconfirmed appearances on Oprah have informed him that Dr. Zod sounds a bit too out-there, kooky in an unmarketable sort of way. And so Dr. Zod was recently rebranded as Dr. Ron, which everyone is hoping is a more authoritatively casual persona to introduce to America. Dr. Ron is what you might call a psychological Renaissance man. His current professional duties can be described as follows: a therapist for the troubled children of entertainment executives; a paid confidant of pro athletes with confidence issues; a defender of insurance companies against workers'-comp hucksters; an associate clinical professor at UCLA; and a hand-holder to the diaspora of child actors who have grown up to be drug abusers, depressives, and serial divorcees. It is a living made in a shadow world of tormented egos and stunted maturity, though all of that, if Dr. Ron's plans come to pass, is about to change. A good deal of effort is currently being spent to turn Dr. Ron into the Dr. Spock of the teen pandemonium years. For complete story, click here.

Academy at Ivy Ridge Withdraws From World Wide Association of Specialty Programs & Schools: OGDENSBURG, N.Y., Jan. 6/PRNewswire/ -- The Academy at Ivy Ridge (AIR), a boarding school in upstate New York, today announced that it had concluded its relationship with the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs & Schools (WWASPS). "On November 29th we received word from WWASPS that it had accepted our letter of withdrawal," said Jason Finlinson, director of AIR, "therefore we are officially no longer a member of the organization." While WWASPS has faced significant scrutiny over the years, Finlinson cited his primary reason for leaving the organization as being one of "not needing" the affiliation any longer. "The Academy is now capable of providing educational programs and seminars with its own staff or by contract," said Finlinson. (Webmaster Note: It is speculated and in cases confirmed that WWASPS is slowly dismantling in order to continue business through franchises that are independently owned and operated to avoid legal difficulties and prosecution.) For complete story, click here.

Teen dies after admission to Panama City juvenile offenders camp: PENSACOLA, Fla. - A 14-year-old boy died Friday after officials said he had to be restrained by guards when he became uncooperative during the admission process at a boot camp for juvenile offenders. Florida's director of Juvenile Justice said the state will investigate procedures at Florida's six juvenile boot camps because of the death of Martin Lee Anderson of Bay County. (Unable to locate complete story for archive. Source: www.bradenton.com Date: January 6th, 2006)

Dateline's Disgrace: Soft on Tough-Love Teen's Manslaughter: Dateline NBC devoted an hour last Sunday to the appalling death of a 14-year-old boy in an Arizona boot camp for troubled youth and the recent trial and conviction of the man who ran the camp in that killing. Anthony Haynes died in the American Buffalo Soldiers Re-enactor's Association boot camp in July 2001 after being made to stand in 115-degree heat for hours and denied water and medical attention. Last year, the founder and operator of the camp, Charles Long, was convicted of reckless manslaughter in Haynes' death and of aggravated assault for menacing another teenager in the camp with a knife. But Dateline — like 48 Hours, which covered the case in a 2003 segment — failed to mention that there is absolutely no evidence that "tough love" programs like boot camps help kids. The Justice Department lists boot camps for youth under "What Doesn't Work," — and a meta-analysis of the research on youth boot camps that conducted for Congress in 1998 found that it was no more effective than juvenile prison. (Unable to locate complete story for archive. Source: www.stats.org Date: January 6th, 2006)

Details About Corrections Officer and Inmate: January 9, 2006 - Newly released court documents are revealing more about the alleged relationship between a former Fresno County corrections officer and an underage inmate. Adriana Rivera worked at the Elkhorn Boot Camp for troubled teens. That's where prosecutors say she met the then 17-year-old inmate. For complete story, click here.

Teen Collapses, Dies At Boot Camp: PANAMA CITY, Fla. -- The family of a teen who collapsed during his admission to a boot camp is suing the Bay County Sheriff's Office and the Florida Department of Juvenile Justice. The mother of Martin Lee Anderson says the 14-year-old was in good physical shape.

She says he had a broken nose, a cut lip and other bruises on his face when she saw his body. She was told her son "bled from the inside," but she says she doesn't know exactly how he died. For more on this visit: <http://www.workers.org/2006/us/boot-camp-0518> or click here.

Attachment Therapy on Trial: The Torture and Death of Candace Newmaker: Candace, endured painful physical stimulation, was dangerously restrained, and eventually suffocated to death. In the name of "curing her" with Attachment Therapy, Candace's therapists ignored her begging, screaming, and gasping; eventually they were convicted in criminal court. The extent to which some therapists embrace such unvalidated fringe treatments is one of the greatest scandals in today's mental health system. This damning indictment should stir a badly needed national debate about these practices, and aid in the fight against them. For complete story, click here.

SWAT Team Shoots Teen Carrying Pellet Gun: LONGWOOD, Fla. - It was in an instant, with a SWAT team surrounding him, that Christopher David Penley slipped into an alcove in a school bathroom and raised what officers believed was a black 9 mm Beretta handgun, authorities said. Moments later, a deputy shot him. For complete story, click here.

Govt open to teen work camp idea for vandals: South Australia Premier Mike Rann says he sees merit in a plan by state Independent MP Bob Such to force vandals into work camps. Dr Such says vandals should be made to attend camps where they would fix damaged bus shelters or train stations, or carry out environmental work and attend seminars. For complete story, click here.

Contraband communications: Children at Spring Creek Lodge Academy near Thompson Falls live highly supervised lives. They're sent to the secluded backwoods boarding school from all over the country for "behavior modification," isolated from the opposite sex and warned not to exchange phone numbers or e-mail addresses. Possession of a friend's contact info is considered a major infraction; punishable by extra months tacked on to the time it takes to graduate the program. "You come here alone, you leave here alone. That's what they always told us," recalls Scott Stewart, a 2001 graduate of Spring Creek. "They think if you meet up with these people outside of the program your 'non-working' lifestyles start coming back." Stewart says students used coded Bible passages and tiny notes stuffed into the tubes of Bic pens to exchange contraband information at Spring Creek. Now it's getting much easier for those same students to get in touch on the outside, thanks to the increasing popularity of Internet blog sites and forums. Online communities like MySpace.com and Fornits Home for Wayward Web Fora (www.fornits.com/wwf) now give former students of Spring Creek and other programs in the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools (WWASPS) a place to meet and share their thoughts and past experiences. For complete story, click here.

No More Nightmares at Tranquility Bay?: ...As a teen at Tranquility Bay, you can't call home and are escorted between rooms by Jamaican "chaperones." Talk out of turn and your punishment might be that a trio of guards wrestles you to the ground. "They start twisting and pulling your limbs, grinding your ankles," a student told the British newspaper The Guardian. Not knowing when you'll go home, you might take cold showers and watch "emotional growth" videos. The promise is that you will return a respectful, happy teen. But many WWASPS alumni who've banded together at online survivor websites like Tranquility Bay Fight and Fornits say their lives haven't been saved, they've been devastated. Several WWASPS schools have been shut down after abuse claims. Tranquility Bay's counterpart, High Impact, a WWASP affiliate in Mexico, closed in 2002 after dark stories emerged. Teens said they were kept in dog cages. Two parents, Chris Goodwin and Stephanie Hecker, told the Rocky Mountain News their children were made to lie in their underwear for three nights with fire ants roaming over them and were threatened with a cattle prod if they scratched. For complete story, click here.

Charter school lead fades in H.S.: Charter school students outperform conventional school students at the elementary level but not in high school, according to a state report released Monday. The report, based on state achievement tests, shows differences of only a few points between charters and conventional schools in reading, writing and elementary school math. But the gap is dramatic for high school math, with 10th graders in conventional schools scoring more than 12 points above charter school youngsters. The gap is more than eight points for ninth graders. The results come as no surprise, said Jim Griffin, the director of the Colorado League of Charter Schools. Many of the high school level charters are targeted at troubled teens who do not succeed in conventional schools. "Almost half of them are designed that way," Griffin said. For complete story, click here.

Saving Troubled Teens Through 'Safe Schools': At Arizona's Department of Juvenile Corrections, there are pat downs, cell doors and razor wire. The arrivals come in handcuffs, are photographed and go through a 21-day evaluation to determine their issues — like anger, sex crimes, mental health or substance abuse. But the 300 boys at the Adobe Mountain School, and the 80 girls across the yard at the Black Canyon School, aren't exactly in prison. Arizona's juvenile corrections system calls these facilities "safe schools" — they are part prison, part school. For complete story, click here.

The Trouble With Tough Love: ... Many anguished parents put their faith in strict residential rehab programs. At first glance, these programs, which are commonly based on a philosophy of "tough love," seem to offer a safe respite from the streets -- promising reform through confrontational therapy in an isolated environment where kids cannot escape the need to change their behavior. At the same time, during the '90s, it became increasingly common for courts to sentence young delinquents to military-style boot camps as an alternative to incarceration. But lack of government oversight and regulation makes it impossible for parents to thoroughly investigate services provided by such "behavior modification centers," "wilderness programs" and "emotional growth boarding schools." Moreover, the very notion of making kids who are already suffering go through more suffering is psychologically backwards. And there is little data to support these institutions' claims of success. Nonetheless, a billion-dollar industry now promotes such tough-love treatment. There are several hundred public and private facilities -- both in the United States and outside the country -- but serving almost exclusively American citizens. Although no one officially keeps track, my research suggests that some 10,000 to 20,000 teenagers are enrolled each year. A patchwork of lax and ineffective state regulations -- no federal rules apply -- is all that protects these young people from institutions that are regulated like ordinary boarding schools but that sometimes use more severe methods of restraint and isolation than psychiatric centers. There are no special qualifications required of the people who oversee such facilities. Nor is any diagnosis required before enrollment. If a parent thinks a child needs help and can pay the $3,000- to $5,000-a-month fees, any teenager can be held in a private program, with infrequent contact with the outside world, until he or she turns 18. For complete story, click here.

'Benign neglect' leaves youth inmates in squalor, review finds: SACRAMENTO (AP) - California's youngest inmates are living in squalid conditions that endanger guards and youths, while managers operate in daily crisis because of a lack of funding, according to reports obtained by The Associated Press. Shower doors at some youth prisons are so rusty that wards can break off pieces of metal to use as weapons. Two-way radios and personal alarms worn by employees only work intermittently. And there are holes in dorm walls and perimeter fences. "Benign neglect ... appears to permeate" the Division of Juvenile Justice, a special security team found after touring four of the state's eight youth facilities last summer. For complete story, click here.

Teen Opens Fire In Gay Bar: "He was shooting at everyone," said the bartender, who asked to be identified only by his first name, Phillip, because he was concerned about his safety. Police found the hatchet and a machete in the bar, he said. Robida graduated in 2001 from the city's Junior Police Academy, a "boot camp" that teaches discipline to 12- to 14-year-olds, Acting Police Chief David Provencher said. A family friend who answered at his home Thursday said his mother, Stephanie Oliver, had no comment. For complete story, click here.

Devils in the Outfield: ... Huffman's side story is another tale, with a Utah link. His girlfriend had him kidnapped and sent to the Provo Canyon School to try to get him cleaned up. "I looked out my window at the mountains and thought, 'how the hell do I get out of here?'" he remembers. "The Mormons seemed so fascistic. I had a friend who tried running away in winter and got hypothermia from hiding in a snowbank." For complete story, click here.

Boy, 6, hit with sex harass rap: An irate Brockton mother is refusing to let her 6-year-old son return to school after he was suspended for alleged sexual harassment, a term deemed "preposterous" for a first-grader by a leading sexual harassment expert. For complete story, click here.

Two South Florida lawmakers who saw a video of a teen's final hours say he was abused at a juvenile boot camp. The boy died later that day: A 14-year-old boy was "brutally" beaten by guards and "flung around like a rag doll" at a boot camp for juvenile delinquents in Panama City hours before he died at a Panhandle hospital, according to two lawmakers who on Wednesday saw a videotape of the incident. The video, which recorded the last 20 to 30 minutes of the teen's stay at the Bay County Sheriff's Office Boot Camp, shows officers at times kicking, punching and choking Martin Lee Anderson after he refused, or was unable, to comply with officers' orders to run or do other exercises, the legislators said. To view video footage of the attack visit: <http://news.tbo.com/news/metro/MGBN7T3WSJE.html> and/or <http://www.wpbnews.com/news/7158290/detail.html>. For complete story, click here.

Juvenile center study notes staff violence: Cook County's study of its Juvenile Temporary Detention Center, delivered Friday to commissioners, finds a pattern of violence by staff members toward the teenagers in their care. The report, compiled by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, cites "multiple instances of battery or assault by staff on residents." One staff member shoved a youth and threw him to the floor, the report recounts. Others used chokeholds. The 40-page study mirrors episodes previously reported in the Tribune and cited by the American Civil Liberties Union in its court action against the county. (Unable to locate complete story for archiving. Source: www.chicagotribune.com Date: February 11th, 2006)

Teen arrested in rape, slaying-Victim was employee at home for troubled youths: CLEARFIELD — Police arrested a 17-year-old boy accused of raping and stabbing a woman to death late Wednesday in a group home for troubled teens. Police were called at 10:45 p.m. to 286 Marilyn Drive where officers found a car that had crashed into the side of a small red-brick home. A pair of tire tracks extended from the street through the fresh snow, over the curb and through some bushes to where they abruptly stopped outside Doug Mahlsted's home. "I heard a loud pop like someone dropped something huge and heavy, and the house shook like it was an earthquake," Mahlsted said. Outside he found a Honda Accord against his house. A young man was in the driver's side of the car, barefoot but wearing a bloody shirt and jeans. Mahlsted reported the young man said he had committed a crime, "he was a bad person, and he should die," Mahlsted said. "He tried to kill himself by driving into the side of my house." (Webmaster Note: Whether it's rape, homicide, or suicide...the cause is the same. When children are abandoned in every way by their parents and sold down the river to be enslaved, brainwashed, and tortured instead of receiving actual help through patience, understanding, compassion, and love, things like this are bound to occur. The adults are to blame. The adults who refuse to take responsibility for the welfare of children in our care. Apathy and resentment are the two main characteristics of parents who end up subjecting their children to institutionalization. Our advice, help your kids get emancipated if you find the transition from child to adult too inconvenient for you. It's much more effective and loving than paying to have them enslaved and tortured by frauds. Thank you.) For complete story, click here.

Teen crime, adult time: Laws converge to put teens away forever: A teenager serves life in prison because authorities found his fingerprints at the scene of a murder. But jurors doubted he killed the victim, and police failed to fully investigate other key suspects. "I'm just a ghost now," writes Sam Mandez, who was 14 at the time of the crime in 1992 and had no previous violent offenses. "I'm the living dead." Another teen faces life behind bars for killing his mother. Jurors didn't hear his story of parental abuse because his attorney never investigated. Testimony in the trial of 16-year-old Nathan Ybanez lasted only a day. A third teen with a history of alcohol problems is serving a life sentence for a fatal hit-and-run incident after a day of heavy drinking. Prosecutors cast the circumstances as a gang killing - a theory even the victim's mother discounted. At 17, Dietrick Mitchell became a "throwaway" into the prison system. For complete story, click here.

Mother Of Teen At Boot Camp Says Guards Routinely Abused Juveniles: TALLAHASSEE, FL (AP) -- The mother of a teenager who was at the same bootcamp where a 14-year-old boy died after an encounter with guards says the guards routinely abused juveniles at the boot camp. Shauna Manning also accuses the Bay County camp's nurse of dismissing juveniles' medical issues because she believed the boys were faking to try to get out of the program. Martin Anderson died hours after a confrontation with camp guards. A medical examiner says an autopsy shows the teenager died as a result of complication with sickle cell anemia, a usually nonfatal disorder of the blood. Medical experts are casting doubt on that conclusion. For complete story, click here.

Father seeks answers for Kern River crash: BAKERSFIELD - A 14-year-old teen on the run from Camp Owens died Sunday when he crashed a stolen truck into the wall of the Kern River Canyon. The boy's father wants answers in his death. According to California Highway Patrol, Curtis Eugene Vaughan escaped from Camp Owen, a minimum-security facility that serves as a boot camp for troubled teens, around 4 p.m. Sunday afternoon. The boy was on the run from the camp when he crashed the truck he was driving into the canyon's wall. His grieving father, Curtis Vaughan Senior, is questioning if more could have been done to keep his kid safe. He explains, "I was there an hour before and he was fine." "They said he'd be safe up there, and he's not safe he's dead," said Vaughan Senior. "If he'd had been with me, he'd be safe," he adds. Now Vaughan Senior says, "I'm not ever going to be able to see or hold my boy again." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kget.com Date: February 21st, 2006)

Superintendent fired over state juvenile prison problems: The Indiana Department of Correction responded to a spate of problems including excessive force at the Pendleton Juvenile Correctional Facility by firing the prison's superintendent and replacing her for up to six months with a team of senior agency officials. Correction Commissioner J. David Donahue fired Superintendent Jane Burns from the agency for what he termed "unacceptable practices" and "missteps of management at the facility," including not following department policies. Three guards currently face criminal charges over their actions at the juvenile center about 20 miles northeast of Indianapolis. The actions Thursday follow a settlement with the U.S. Justice Department this month in which the state agreed to correct civil rights violations at three state juvenile facilities dating to 2003. The violations included physical abuse by guards, physical and sexual abuse by other inmates, and mental health and special education problems. The department no longer operates one of the cited facilities as a juvenile prison. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.indystar.com Date: February 24, 2006)

Tough-love industry too rough on rebellious teens: When teenagers defy authority, as most do, their behavior might be seen as admirable, a stage in their path to adulthood. But admirable defiant behavior, like physical beauty, is located in the eye of the beholder. As a result, defiant behavior might be labeled as pathological by parents, schoolteachers, clergy, police officers and other authority figures. At that point, discipline behind a time-out or grounding might kick in. The forms of discipline constitute what journalist Maia Szalavitz has labeled the "troubled-teen industry." It might involve a boarding school far away from home. It might involve a 12-step program to deal with the abuse of alcohol and other drugs, or with sexual promiscuity, or with gambling. It might involve a psychiatric ward. It might involve a juvenile detention center if the police become involved. Or it might involve the specific sector of the troubled-teen industry that most troubles Szalavitz, a tough-love approach that often includes expensive fees that pay for teens to experience physical hardship in life-threatening wilderness areas such as mountains, forests or deserts. Szalavitz focuses on four specific tough-love programs that she considers especially greedy financially, often ineffective despite advertising claims and sometimes physically dangerous — so dangerous that parents enrolling their teenagers need to worry about sudden death. They go by the names of Straight Incorporated, North Star, KIDS and World Wide Association of Specialty Programs. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.desmoinesregister.com Date: February 26, 2006)

Highfields: Change must come at youth home: Upon allegations of abuse of children in the public charge, there is a natural revulsion - a desire to sever ties with those who would betray such a sensitive responsibility. But when it comes to the scandal at Highfields Inc., severing ties is at best a short-term strategy. What Ingham County and the state need is a properly managed, safe Highfields to continue its work with troubled teens. When abuse reports surfaced at Highfields, Ingham County judges pulled 18 boys they had sent there. Ingham County commissioners halted payments on a $2 million contract with Highfields, and the state withdrew 15 teens under its supervision. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.lsi.com Date: February 27, 2006)

Judge to let DNA tests on youths start Federal database won't get access pending a final ruling: FRANKFORT, Ky. -- Kentucky can begin taking DNA samples from juveniles who have committed felony sex offenses or burglary under a temporary court ruling yesterday. But the state cannot share the results with federal authorities -- as it does with DNA from adult offenders -- until the judge rules on whether state law permits expanding DNA testing to juveniles. The data, which could go into a state databank, would be removed if the judge rules against the DNA collection. The state wants to collect the DNA samples to help solve crimes. State Juvenile Justice Commissioner Bridget Skaggs Brown said her department would start drawing blood from youths for the DNA samples within a few days. "We intend to take steps to protect the public, and we intend to start testing," she said after the ruling. But public defenders representing juveniles, who filed suit last month to block the procedure, said they will press to bar the Juvenile Justice Department permanently from testing. The plans have created a lot of concern, said Gail Robinson, a lawyer representing the youths. "The kids are scared, and their parents are calling," she said. State officials contend a 2002 change in the law gives them the right to carry out the DNA testing but it was never enforced. Lawyers for the youths say the change does not allow the Juvenile Justice Department to collect DNA from anybody. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.courier-journal.com Date: March 2, 2006)

Teens removed from troubled drug rehab center: Deputy Chief Probation Officer Michael Stauffer declined to comment on exactly why, on Feb. 2, he pulled the four probationers from Daytop Village Inc., the 43-bed residential rehab center with properties in Belmont and Redwood City. Four youth placed in rehab through the Human Services Agency remain at Daytop, HSA Director of Substance Abuse and Shelter Services Director Stephen Kaplan said... "It could be that we're going to stop using Daytop, it could be that Daytop will have to reform some things ... there will be an examination as to whether Daytop is providing appropriate services for us at the moment," Gordon said. "This is absolutely the right course of action for the county to take." (Unable to locate full story at time of archiving. Source: www.examiner.com Date: March, 2006)

Florida empties boot camp where teen was beaten by guards: Dallas Morning News (subscription) - TX, USA TALLAHASSEE, Fla. - All juvenile offenders have been removed from a Panama City boot camp where a 14-year-old boy was hit and kicked by guards before he died... (Webmaster Note: They mean the boy that was killed by guards at the boot camp, not physically tortured until he died of "natural causes", right?) More on this story...: Prosecutors confirm boot camp teen didn't die of natural causes. Bradenton Herald - FL, United States TAMPA, Fla. - The mother of a 14-year-old boy who was beaten and kicked in a Panama City juvenile boot camp said Tuesday she wants justice now that a second ... Allegations Of Cover-up In Teen's Boot Camp Death All Headline News - USA Tampa, FL (AHN)-A forensic pathologist observes a second autopsy on the teen who died at a juvenile boot camp and says results seem to show his death was ... Teen in youth camp did not die of natural causes, 2nd autopsy ... Myrtle Beach Sun News - Myrtle Beach, SC, USA... The teen entered the Bay County Sheriff's Office Boot Camp Jan. 5 after being convicted of going joyriding in his grandmother's jeep. ... For complete story, click here.

Australia Does Expose' On WWASPS: To find out more, visit: <http://www.smh.com.au/news/tv-reviews/the-cutting-edge-tranquility-bay/2006/03/13/1142098386255.html> More on this story: The Cutting Edge: Tranquility Bay Sydney Morning Herald - Sydney, New South Wales, Australia... Here's a disturbing look at the murky world of the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP), America's leading provider of so-called behaviour... For complete story, click here.

Youths can use hot lines to report prison problems: The Indiana Department of Correction has installed hot lines at its seven juvenile prisons so offenders can confidentially report abuse and other problems by staff or other offenders. The hot lines will operate 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and all "serious allegations" will be checked out by the DOC's internal affairs investigators, the agency said in a news release Monday. Among the incidents the hot lines are intended for are physical, verbal or sexual abuse by other offenders or staff or major breaches of security, the department said. The announcement followed a settlement last month with the U.S. Justice Department in which the state agency agreed to correct civil-rights violations at state juvenile facilities dating to 2003. The violations covered by the settlement included physical abuse by guards and physical and sexual abuse by other inmates. (Webmaster Note: If phones are not readily available to call these hotlines and a youth must ask permission to use the phone and the person that must grant permission is the person they wish to report, how likely is it that these so-called hotlines will do a damn bit of good? Not bloody likely!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.indystar.com Date: March 14, 2006)

From Foster Homes to the White House: It wasn't until Mickey Ibarra moved with his younger brother from Utah to California at age 15 that he routinely heard his name pronounced correctly... "It was tough," Ibarra said, yet he would grow up and out of those humble and difficult beginnings to work in the West Wing of the White House and to open a boutique lobbying shop specializing in Hispanic outreach... Ibarra had settled into a comfortable life in Utah, where he was a member of the freshman football team and was reluctant to leave. Still, Sacramento proved a good move and Ibarra now considers it a crossroads, especially for his brother, who grew up to be a successful businessman... At his foster parents' request, he returned to Utah to enroll at Brigham Young University. But out of money after one year, Ibarra joined the military, like his father before him, for the benefits of the GI bill, a risky move in the midst of the Vietnam War. Initial orders to go to Saigon were changed at the last minute, and he spent two years in Frankfurt, Germany, before returning to Utah to graduate, cum laude, from BYU with a bachelor's degree in political science. Ibarra then spent five years teaching, including at an alternative school for troubled teens in Spanish Fork, Utah. He went back to school at the University of Utah for a master's degree in behavioral disorders. "Both degrees have served me well in our nation's capital," he jokes. While a teacher, Ibarra volunteered with the local branch of Utah Education Association, an outgrowth of the powerhouse political lobby, the National Education Association. From there he made a jump in 1984 to a permanent spot in Washington as a "political education specialist." He helped organize local chapters of NEA. (Webmaster Note: Most (likely all) alternative programs in Utah are abusive. BYU is the leader in brainwashing and using "trauma-based" behavior modification. Anyone with a degree such as this and experience working for an abusive teen facility deserves to be jailed, not celebrated and promoted to powerful positions in the US.) For complete story, click here.

Former juvenile prison guard convicted of assaulting inmate: DELAWARE, Ohio (AP) — A former guard at Ohio's only youth prison for girls, who was one of 12 corrections officers accused of a range of crimes including assault and sexual battery, has been convicted of assaulting an inmate. Stanley Gates, 38, of Columbus, could face up to a year in jail when he is sentenced in April in Delaware County Common Pleas Court. He entered an Alford plea Wednesday to charges of assault and falsification, which means he denied guilt but acknowledged prosecutors had enough evidence to convict him. Gates was fired from his job at the Scioto Juvenile Correctional Facility, located about 15 miles north of Columbus, in May 2004 and was indicted in December of that year. Assistant Prosecutor Paul Scarsella said Gates struck an inmate, puncturing her eardrum, in December 2003 and then gave false information to State Highway Patrol investigators questioning him. For complete story, click here.

Boot Camp Death Leads to Questions in the Use of Force: Orlando, Florida (PRWEB) March 16, 2006 — The second autopsy of Martin Lee Anderson, the teen who died at a Bay County Sheriff's Office boot camp, indicates his death was caused by a beating and not a sickle cell trait. A videotape of the incident shows officers kicking and striking Anderson, after he stopped his exercises. For complete story, click here.

More Kids Are Getting Anti-Psychotic Drugs: CHICAGO (AP) - Soaring numbers of American children are being prescribed anti-psychotic drugs - in many cases, for attention deficit disorder or other behavioral problems for which these medications have not been proven to work, a study found. The annual number of children prescribed anti-psychotic drugs jumped fivefold between 1995 and 2002, to an estimated 2.5 million, the study said. That is an increase from 8.6 out of every 1,000 children in the mid-1990s to nearly 40 out of 1,000. But more than half of the prescriptions were for attention deficit and other non-psychotic conditions, the researchers said. The findings are worrisome "because it looks like these medications are being used for large numbers of children in a setting where we don't know if they work," said lead author Dr. William Cooper, a pediatrician at Vanderbilt Children's Hospital. (Webmaster Note: Many physicians and psychiatrists believe in drugs over dietary and environmental improvements and psychotherapy. Many parents don't care about their child's welfare and are glad when drugs work to sedate their children. If you do not wish to sedate your child, but, wish to have a healthy family, please do not place your child on drugs. Thank you.) For complete story, click here.

State agency has cited youth camp. Highfields board members say: The state Department of Human Services has cited Highfields, Inc., for a number of violations, according to board members of the Youth Opportunity Camp for troubled teens. The sanctions are contained in an investigative report sent Friday to the Onondaga-based social services agency. "I understand there are citations issued pertaining to incidents here," said Highfields board member Brian Cavanaugh of the residential treatment program for youth. "And it's our sincere desire to do whatever we have to in order to satisfy the state." The citations, which the members declined to detail, give Highfields a set amount of time to remedy, said Highfields Board Chairman Charles Corley. For complete story, click here.

'Sky is falling' headlines a disservice to teens: Regarding "More teenagers engaging in risky behaviors" (Republic, Sunday): Nowhere in the article is a single fact that clearly supports the headline. It doesn't inform, but merely alarms already jittery parents. I know: I'm the mother of a teen. In reality, our kids are doing better than ever. U.S. government statistics show: *Murders of teens are down 47 percent since their peak in 1995. *Violent crime in schools dropped 50 percent between 1992 and 2002. *Teen drug use, drunken-driving deaths among 16- and 17-year-olds, teen pregnancy, the number of teens with more than four sexual partners, and teen abortion rates - all have dropped in recent years, in percentages ranging from 23 percent to 60 percent. Fueled by misinformation, the fears of parents, and urging "pre-emptive action" against kids, a billion-dollar-a-year "troubled-teen" industry has grown in the United States. Let's get the straight facts about how (and what) teenagers are doing so we can respond in loving and effective ways to our kids' real problems: physical, mental or spiritual. Let's skip the "sky is falling" headlines and marvel at how well our kids (and we parents) are doing in a complicated world - and then resolve to do even better. - Cynthia Clark Harvey, Phoenix (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.azcentral.com Date: March 18, 2006)

More Miami-Dade students face detention for misdemeanors: Tonia Green's sobs pierced the tiny courtroom, causing everyone to stare at her 13-year-old son who stood with cuffs gripping his wrists and ankles. "Judge, please ... the school didn't even notify me!" Green wailed. "They just carted my son away like some criminal." The charge -- kicking another student during a school fight. Miami-Dade Juvenile Court Judge Lester Langer glanced at the boy's paperwork, set a trial date and ordered the teen released into the mother's custody. "Oh Lord Jesus, thank you," Green sighed. Minutes later the scene replayed itself, this time with an anguished Hailaine Jerome rocking in joy after Lester agreed to release her teenage son, who also got into a fight. Langer says his and other courtrooms in the Juvenile Detention Center are packed with more and more cases of kids arrested for minor offenses, as school officials strictly enforce a zero-tolerance policy in an effort to deter violent crimes on campus. "The juvenile judges are seeing a lot of school-related cases that could have been handled at the school, such as schoolyard fights and kids acting out in class," said Langer, who has been on the bench since 1992 and in juvenile court since 1997. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.miami.com Date: March, 2006)

We Are A Torture Nation: Simply put under the "leadership" of the Bush family the United States has become a torture nation. We have allowed ourselves to be reduced to reactionary violence blindly lashing out in disregard of all that makes us good people. The evidence of this is overwhelming ... going light years beyond a reasonable doubt into the galaxy of absolute proof. During Attorney General Gonzales Senate confirmation hearing Senator Leahy asked "Do you think that other world leaders would have authority to authorize the torture of U.S. citizens if they deemed it necessary for their national security?" And Gonzales reply? "Senator, I don't know what laws other world leaders would be bound by. And I think it would -- I'm not in a position to answer that question." (Text: Gonzales Nomination Hearing, Washington Post) Bush administration legal adviser John Yoo on 12/01/05 was asked in a debate "If the president deems that he's got to torture somebody, including by crushing the testicles of the person's child, there is no law that can stop him?" To which Yoo replied "No treaty." This was immediately followed by the this question/answer exchange: Doug Cassel: "Also no law by Congress -- that is what you wrote in the August 2002 memo..." John Yoo: "I think it depends on why the President thinks he needs to do that." (full audio available here) In a previous posting on this web site I asked "Have you ever wondered what it takes to get someone to masturbate in the dark dank halls of one of Iraq's most notorious prisons, Abu Ghraib, while guards took photos?" As shown in that article the answer is simple: the Bush doctrine of torture. (We are a torture state, 10/21/05) In Iraq the Bush led military has taken over not only Saddam Hussein's prisons and torture chambers, but under the Bush doctrine we've also assumed responsibility for carrying on the treatment we've so long associated with despicable tyrants: "In the windowless, jet-black garage-size room, some soldiers beat prisoners with rifle butts, yelled and spit in their faces and, in a nearby area, used detainees for target practice in a game of jailer paintball." (Before and After Abu Ghraib, a U.S. Unit Abused Detainees, New York Times, 03/19/06) Down in brother Jeb Bush's Florida this doctrine is given domestic illustration. "A teen who died after guards punched and kicked him at a boot camp likely was suffocated during the confrontation and was brain dead when he was brought to a hospital, a pathologist told lawmakers Friday." (Update 4: Doctor: Boot Camp Teen Likely Suffocated, AP, 03/17/06) Governor Bush passed on the torture apologists' line the death was result of illness, and in response called it "one tragic incident". (Parents want charges in boot camp death, MSNBC, 02/18/06) A fellow human being murdered by a deliberate Bush family doctrine of torture and beatings for those deemed unworthy. For complete story, click here.

Gunned down: the teenager who dared to walk across his neighbor's prized lawn: "I just killed a kid," Charles Martin told the emergency services operator. "I shot him with a goddamn 410 shotgun twice." He had gunned down Larry Mugrage, his neighbors' 15-year-old son. The teenager's crime: walking across Mr. Martin's lawn on his way home. Mr. Martin opened fire from his house and then, according to the police, walked up to the wounded boy and pulled the trigger again at close range, killing him. Even in a country with a long history of gun violence, the killing of Larry Mugrage in a quiet Cincinnati suburb on Monday stands out as particularly senseless. Mr. Martin seems to have been liked well enough in the neat bungalow-lined streets of Union Township, but he appears to have been obsessed with the territorial integrity of his patchy lawn. Neighbors said he would work himself into a rage if they mowed a foot over the invisible dividing line separating their gardens. "He was really warped on that stuff," one local resident said. Even after killing a young boy, who was apparently running home to fetch a video game, Mr. Martin, 66, seemed indignant. "I've been being harassed by him and his parents for five years. Today just blew it up," he told the operator. "Kid's just been giving me a bunch of shit, making the other kids harass me and my place, tearing things up." For complete story, click here.

Sex tourism thriving in Bible Belt: ATLANTA (Reuters)--In a sleazy hotel room, "Brittany", then aged 16 and drugged into oblivion, waited for the men to arrive. Her pimps sent as many as 17 clients an evening through the door. A "john" could even pre-book the pretty young blonde for $1,000 a night, sometimes flying in and out from a nearby airport. None of this happened in Bangkok or Costa Rica, places that have become synonymous with sex tourism and underage sex. It took place in Atlanta, the buckle of the U.S. Bible Belt, where the world's busiest passenger airport provides a cheaper, more convenient, and safer underage sex destination for men seeking girls as young as 10. "Men fly in, are met by pimps, have sex with a 14-year-old for lunch, and get home in time for dinner with the family," said Sanford Jones, the chief juvenile judge of Fulton County, Georgia. A new federal law passed in 2003 ensures that American sex tourists landing on foreign soil and hiring prostitutes under the age of 18 can get 30 years in prison. But in Georgia, punishment for pimping or soliciting sex with a girl under 18 is only five to 20 years, according to Deborah Espy, the Deputy District Attorney of Fulton County. "Men are coming to Atlanta to have sex with a child," said LaKendra Baker, project manager for the Center to End Adolescent Sexual Exploitation (CEASE). Half of the street-level prostitutes in Atlanta are believed to be under 18, according to experts. For complete story, click here.

Too much boot: Florida boot camps have long needed a thorough evaluation of their effectiveness in rehabilitating juvenile offenders. It's too bad it took the death of a Bay County teen to put the boot camp concept under the microscope. That is, however, the catalyst for a review by law enforcement and legislative officials into whether boot camps do more harm than good in motivating juveniles to turn around their lives before becoming hardened criminals. The videotape of Martin Lee Anderson's manhandling by burly guards before being pronounced dead hours after being admitted to the Panama City boot camp was a shocking example of the boot camp philosophy run amok. Boot camps were a product of a 1980s juvenile crime wave that threatened the state's tourism industry. After a series of violent attacks on tourists by young hoodlums that made sensational headlines, a boot camp program for adults was adapted to include younger offenders. It combined the "scared straight" approach of exposing delinquent youths to real jail conditions with the "tough love" approach then seen as an effective form of drug rehabilitation. It was thought that the harsh conditions of military-style boot camps would instill discipline and respect in youths to whom such principles were foreign. Angry, in-your-face confrontations with trained drill instructors, especially in the intake phase, were intended to break down the rebellious attitudes that got teens in trouble with the law and to establish a foundation for positive change. But many juvenile advocates dispute the effectiveness of the angry confrontations. Young brains still developing don't always connect consequences with actions, they say. And while the harsh discipline may bring about compliance after a time, it also builds anger - anger which the youths may suppress while there but which erupts when they are released. (Unable to locate full story at time of archiving. Source: www.bradenton.com Date: April, 2006)

Teen gets 30 years in fatal shooting: A teenage boy was sentenced to 30 years in prison this morning for fatally shooting a 34-year-old man last year. The first dozen years of 16-year-old Kevin A. Roy's sentence are minimum mandatory, meaning he will not receive time off for good behavior during those years. After his release, Superior Court Judge Charles H. Toliver IV ordered that Roy spend a year in a halfway house, followed by 18 months probation. "I think it was an appropriate sentence," prosecutor Cari Ann Van Dyke said, adding that Roy had been given opportunities in the past, such as boot camp, to straighten himself up, but didn't. (Webmaster Note: How anyone can call "boot camps" or "residential treatment programs" an opportunity to straighten up, is beyond me. These programs are not effective, do more harm than good, create anger and post traumatic stress, and likely directly contributed to this tragedy. That's the reality of it!) (Unable to locate full story at time of archiving. Source: www.delawareonline.com Date: April 5, 2006)

Police Searching For Missing Girl, 16: BOSTON -- Police are searching for a Pembroke, Mass., girl who left a school for troubled teens nearly a week ago and hasn't been seen since. Family members said Brenda Santos, 16, doesn't have her medication with her, so they're desperate to find her. NewsCenter 5's Mary Saladna reported that Santos' family is distraught. "We love her and we miss her and you know, she needs to know that if she has control of this situation, you know, we're not mad. We just want her home," her mother Amy said, breaking into tears. Amy and Bob Santos have not seen their daughter for six days. The couple adopted Brenda at age 5 to rescue the girl from a childhood of physical, sexual and emotional abuse. The teen attends Pelham Academy in Lexington, a school and residential treatment program where she receives medication, counseling and support for her special emotional needs. But last Friday morning, Brenda, who is supposed to be closely supervised, was allowed to walk out of the school with another student. "They have acknowledged the fact that the staff were not trained appropriately," Amy said. (Webmaster Note: If you know anything about Pelham Academy, please report to us so we can add them to the list. Thanks.) For complete story, click here.

Update: First Death by Suicide = Anthony Soltero, 14 Year-Old Son Terrorized by Vice-Principal: 04-09-2006: 14 year old Chicano who killed himself after his principle told him he was going to send him to jail for 3 years for organizing immigrant rights walkouts at his school, didn't let him take part in graduation activities, and told him he was going to fine his mother. (Webmaster Note: Public Schools are supposed to protect Constitutional Freedoms of students, not act as a police state using threats and abuse to insure conformity. Our hearts break for Anthony and his surviving family. What a sorrowful state of affairs. Ideas for actions on this? Let us know!) For complete story, click here.

2 youth camp counselors sued in abuse case: Two counselors who shoved broomsticks, a cane, a flashlight and a mop handle into the rectums of 18 boys at a youth camp were sued this week in Maricopa County Superior Court. Two victims accuse Clifton Bennett, 18, and Kyle Wheeler, 19, of committing physical and sexual assaults on boys who were attending a leadership camp in Prescott. Bennett's father, state Senate President Ken Bennett, is also named in the suit. Bennett and Wheeler were initially charged with 36 counts of kidnapping and assault. But the Yavapai County Attorney's Office last week offered Bennett and Wheeler a plea deal that could result in probation and conviction on misdemeanor charges. (Webmaster Note: This is unfortunately what happens when uneducated, unqualified, and unsupervised people are allowed charge over children. Parents beware.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.azcentral.com Date: April 12, 2006)

Man who ran program for teens in Michigan charged in Minnesota: MINNEAPOLIS The former executive director of a Minneapolis agency that works with children and families who ran a program for troubled teens in Michigan has been charged with sexually assaulting a teenager. Police say the abuse began in 2002 and the teenager was known to Richard Pahl Junior -- but NOT through his work with the Minneapolis human services organization Freeport West. Pahl has been fired. Forty-four-year-old Pahl was a director of the Link Crisis Intervention Center in Saint Joseph (Michigan) before he moved to Minnesota in December. A criminal complaint says a search of Pahl's Eden Prairie (Minnesota) house yielded 18 binders with pictures of naked boys from ages five to 16. Many of them were engaged in sexual activity with other children. (Webmaster Note: Facilities for troubled teens are not regulated by any third party or gov't agencies. This is what happens when free enterprise runs amok. We must regulate these facilities. Tell your representatives to support HR 1738, the "End Institutionalized Abuse of Children Act" now!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.wlns.com Date: April, 2006)

Students cited for truancy at immigrant-rights rally: Sabado, 04-15-2006: Truancy citations were handed out Friday to 28 Chaparral High students who were at an immigrant-rights rally along Rancho California Road during school hours. "We are setting the tone that in Temecula the Police Department is not going to tolerate planned truancy," Capt. Mitch Alm said. School resource officers heard Thursday about the possibility of a march and notified the school district, he said. For complete story, click here.

Military-style camps get boot after teen's death in Florida: TALLAHASSEE, Fla. (AP) -- Putting juvenile delinquents into a military-style boot camp would seem to be a logical means of transforming rough-and-tumble kids into young ladies and gentlemen. Many camps were opened in the early and mid-1990s when corrections officials were convinced it was the best method to help troubled teens mature and stay away from further problems. But that idea has fallen out of favor nationwide in the wake of research by criminologists that indicates the programs simply don't work any better than normal juvenile detention facilities. The programs faced increased criticism after 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson died in January after he was kicked and hit by guards at a Florida Panhandle camp -- an altercation that was videotaped by camp surveillance cameras and broadcast nationally. That camp, run by the Bay County Sheriff's Office, was closed last month, but Florida still has four open, housing about 130 teens -- down from a peak of nine camps and 364 inmates about eight years ago. At the concept's peak in the mid-1990s, about 4,500 teens were housed nationally in juvenile boot camps. Some expect that downward trend to continue. "As we know boot camps today, they're not going to exist," said Florida state Rep. Gus Barreiro, chairman of the House Criminal Justice Appropriations Committee. "Intimidation- based programming ultimately has very short-term results, and what we want is long-term results." But the boot camps still have powerful supporters who say the programs work, including Gov. Jeb Bush, who said he has no intention of closing any more camps or changing their methods. (Webmaster Note: If you expect the Bush family to do anything to protect human rights or children's welfare, you are an idiot! They are in partnerships and social relationships with the most notorious child torturers in the US. They will never side with justice. They must be impeached and removed from office now!) For complete story, click here.

Students in governor's office protest boot camp death: TALLAHASSEE, Fla. A group of protesters is demanding arrests in the boot camp death of a 14-year-old -- and the protesters want to take that demand straight to Florida Governor Jeb Bush. About 30 college students took over the foyer of the governor's office in Tallahassee today. Students from Florida State University, Florida A-and-M University and Tallahassee Community College also want Bush to apologize to the boy's family. (For more on growing protests, visit: <http://www.bradenton.com/mld/bradenton/14399173.htm> and <http://www.wftv.com/news/8887440/detail.html>) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.wlns.com Date: April, 2006)

Child Abuse for Profit is Occurring in America: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."-- Article 5, U.N. Declaration of Universal Human Rights... "You wouldn't believe the terrible things that were done to me," says Alexia Parks' niece in An American Gulag. [1] But she continues: "I know now it was for my own good." Thus ends Parks' account of her struggle to help her niece after she was enrolled in several behavior modification schools. The similarity to the end of 1984 is striking: a previously headstrong individual returns from months of torture as merely a shell of their former self, having learned to love their tormentors. The difference is that Parks' story is true. Usual definitions of torture include the use of practices such as solitary confinement, non-medical application of psychiatric drugs, unprovoked beatings, starvation, and verbal abuse as means to change a person's behavior. Many Americans are reluctant to support the use these techniques even on criminals, much less teenagers with behavioral problems. Unfortunately, this is exactly what is being done on a large-scale basis as "tough-love" programs have become a booming industry. These programs come in several varieties, including boot camps, "therapeutic" boarding schools or academies, and wilderness programs. At the cost of several thousand dollars per month (up to $40,000/year), these schools supposedly provide a climate where troubled teens can continue their regular education while receiving treatments designed to improve their behavior. In the philosophy of these schools, reform involves two goals: to break kids down through strict discipline and routine, then to build them back up through self-examination and therapy of various sorts. Usually, only the former is accomplished. So successful is the breaking down process that former inmates of these institutions often suffer symptoms of post-traumatic stress syndrome, even years after being freed. Ex-students call themselves, with good cause, "survivors". For complete story, click here.

License To Harm: To be a manicurist in the state of Washington, you must take 600 hours of training and pass both a written exam and a skills demonstration. To cut hair, you need 1,000 hours of training and the two tests. But to be a registered counselor, someone who will help guide troubled clients through some of their most difficult life challenges, you need take only a four-hour AIDS-awareness class. That's it -- that and a $40 registration fee. You don't even need a high-school diploma. That sounds like an invitation for trouble -- and it is. In the past decade, the state has sanctioned 104 registered counselors for sexual misconduct. That's more than for any other health profession, and more than the cases involving doctors, dentists and registered nurses combined. It's just a fraction of the actual incidents of abuse, since, experts say, most go unreported. "It's kind of scary," said David Kaplan, chief professional officer of the American Counseling Association, based in Virginia. "If someone who has an eighth-grade education can walk in and be a counselor, how in the world is Washington protecting the public?" For complete story, click here.

Lives Lost: Brittani Head was set to graduate from Crossroads Christian Academy in May. Shortly before Brittani died, her mom just finished paying for her senior trip to Cancun, where Brittani planned to go with some local friends, and some friends from Florida. She loved sports: soccer, softball and cheerleading, and was a big LSU tiger fan, said her dad, Glynn Head. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.theadvertiser.com Date: May 7, 2006)

Tough love: Juvenile offenders say some discipline goes too far: ...Unlike most government-regulated industries, Michigan has no clear outline of what is and is not accepted when restraining out-of-control kids in youth institutions. A state administrative rule simply prohibits "cruel and severe discipline" and "excessive chemical, mechanical or physical restraint." Nowhere does it detail what that entails. "It leaves too much open for interpretation, and when you have a lack of policy, there is more room for error," said Fred Woelmer, director of the Genesee Valley Regional Center and vice president of the Michigan Juvenile Detention Association. "It makes a difficult job even more difficult." But for the first time in more than 30 years, that rule is up for review this summer by state officials. Those in the juvenile justice field hope to see significant changes made. Adding weight to their plea are recent problems at the beleaguered Camp Highfields in rural Ingham County where the three above scenarios played out earlier this year. Counselors' reactions in two of those cases and another led to the suspension of the residential program in February and uncertainty about whether the program will continue. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.lsi.com Date: May 7, 2006)

Commentary: Behavior Modification Facilities Are Not Safe: The nation was recently shocked by the beating death of 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson in a Florida boot camp. Sadly, this is not the first case of a death occurring in a "behavior modification" facility; in fact, there have been three deaths in such facilities throughout the country since December 2005. Although the camp that Anderson attended has recently been shut down, many similar ones are still in operation throughout the country. You've probably seen people from these programs on daytime TV. They're the "drill sergeants" that yell at kids until they break down (at least that's all they do on live TV). They say that their version of "tough love" is completely safe, and effectively treats problems such as defiance and drug use. The evidence shows otherwise. One hundred and nineteen deaths have been reported due to treatment received in these facilities. Many are caused by asphyxiation due to the use of restraints. These are not typical handcuff restraints, as you may be thinking. Some of these cases have involved arms being twisted behind the back to the point of breaking and staff members lying or sitting on top of the child for upwards of 30 minutes. Restraints are commonly used to punish such horrendous offenses as talking out of turn and making eye contact with another student. It should be noted that restraints have caused at least 30 of the 119 deaths. First-hand accounts from students and former staff members of these facilities are equally disturbing. Their statements and experiences make these facilities seem less like boot camps and more like Abu Ghraib. Stress positions, beatings, hog-tying, humiliation (including making students soil themselves), and sexual abuse are among the charges. Fox News ran a three-part expose last year on one of the main groups of facilities that operates under the name of WWASPS, or World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools. The former president of WWASPS admitted under oath, in WWASPS v. PURE, that abuse "probably" happens. In the same court case the current president of WWASPS, Ken Kay, stated that most allegations of abuse are not investigated. He further explained that because these children are not the typical "college prep type," sexual relations between staff members and students may not constitute abuse. For those who doubt this, the court transcripts are available at www.isacorp.org. Much of the other information given above can also be verified at that site. (Webmaster Notes: You can also learn more at www.heal-online.org/childtortureusa.htm.) For complete story, click here.

More Revealed About Teen Suspect Shot by Las Vegas Police: Metro is investigating the connection between a body found in the desert over the weekend and the deadly officer involved shooting that claimed the life of a teenager. (Webmaster Note: Swuave Lopez was handcuffed and not a threat to police at the time of his death by police gunshots. Lopez was a survivor of Summit View, a "program" for troubled teens. How many kids have to suffer before something is done to stop this torture industry?) For complete story, click here.

Hope Youth Ranch Responds To Allegations of Negligence: "Our entire staff is heart broken and full of grief." Those are the words from the ministry administrator at the Hope Youth Ranch in Webster Parish. Eight former and current ranch employees were indicted Monday on charges surrounding the death a thirteen year old boy their care. The death is reminding people of recent national tragedy's involving young children sent to youth camps. In this case, the charge does not imply intent. In other words the accused did not intend to kill the boy, but they did nothing to stop it. The charge against the eight accused is negligent homicide. The allegation is denying a young boy a drink of water after making him run for bad behavior. For complete story, click here.

Families: Boot camp medical examiner covered up other deaths: TALLAHASSEE, Fla. Some Florida families are accusing a medical examiner of botched work and cover-ups. Doctor Charles Siebert is currently at the center of controversy for ruling that a teenager kicked and struck by boot camp guards died of a blood disorder. A second autopsy concluded the teen died of suffocation from having ammonia pills forced up his nose while his mouth was covered. Another family accuses Siebert of covering up the 1977 death of a suspect allegedly beaten by police. At a news conference in Tallahassee, the families called for Siebert's license to be revoked. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kxan.com Date: May or June, 2006)

Do you know your teen?: Navigating the teenage years isn't easy for parents or their children. Adolescence brings major physical and emotional changes. Today's world has grown more connected, competitive and complex in the past generation, only adding to the challenges. But two counselors at Quincy Junior High School say that's all part of growing up. Janice Pillay and Jackie Martin conducted independent research and came up with a snapshot of what life is like for a Quincy teen. Inspired by an article in the Aug. 8, 2005, issue of Time magazine, the two counselors surveyed 1,344 students at QJHS, then compared the results with those from the magazine's online survey of 501 13-year-olds. They asked about home life, school, dating and whether they think their life is tougher than their parents' was. The exercise was aimed at improving communication between the generations by asking parents: How well do you know your teen? (Webmaster Note: How dare any parent think of institutionalizing their child instead of communicating with him/her. If you are so far removed from reality that you no longer see your child as an individual human being, you are the one who needs help. Learn basic communications skills and take a parenting class!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.whig.com Date: May or June, 2006)

Prozac Found In System Of CYA Teen Found Dead: SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- An autopsy report on two teens who committed suicide in a California Youth Authority facility showed something that came as a big surprise to one of teen's parents. Deon Whitfield, 18, and former Stockton resident Durrell Feaster, 17, were found hanged inside a Preston youth facility dorm room in mid-January. Officials believe the acts were suicides. The autopsy report shows that at the time Feaster died, he had significant amounts of Prozac in his system. Feaster's mother, Gloria Feaster, said neither she nor her husband ever gave the California Youth Authority permission to administer such a drug. California Youth Authority officials did not comment specifically about the case Thursday, but they did explain their psychotropic drug policy for minors. The CYA says it always sends out a consent form to parents. If the parents don't respond within 21 days, a parole agent visits their home to try and gain consent. If that proves unsuccessful, the CYA can and does ask a judge to grant permission to administer drugs --like Prozac -- without the parents ever being notified. For complete story, click here.

Woman distraught: denied visit with sister at Ivy Ridge Academy: A Michigan woman drove nine hours to Ogdensburg to visit her 18 year old sister at Ivy Ridge Academy. But Rachel Stachowicz says she was turned away at the door and told to leave the grounds. "She was out of bounds," said Ivy Ridge Executive Jason Finlinson. The Academy At Ivy Ridge calls itself "a boarding school for the future." Its website says "We are a passageway to assist in the forgiveness, healing and reconciliation of families." Parents pay $30,000 per year to enroll their teenagers in the program, according to the Watertown Daily Times in a 2003 story. Stachowicz said she wanted to visit her sister Lindsey for Lindsey's 18th birthday and thought that as an adult, Lindsey would be free to receive any visitor she wanted, especially a sister. She also wanted to ask her sister whether she wanted to leave the facility. "I'm her sister," she said, her voice trembling. "Why couldn't I see my sister? She's 18; she has the right to choose to see me or not and they're saying she can't." (Webmaster Note: Apparently, you can take Ivy Ridge out of WWASPS, but you can't take WWASPS out of Ivy Ridge.) For complete story, click here.

Psychologist's trial to begin on Tuesday--Group home operator accused of practicing medicine without license; PLYMOUTH --Associates in Clinical Psychology was supposed to be a safe place, where troubled teens could receive treatment for mental illness. But prosecutors allege that the group home was the scene of improper physical examinations performed on patients, by a man who was not licensed to perform them. On Tuesday, a jury in Marshall Superior Court will begin hearing the case leveled against psychologist Marc A. Zackheim, who is facing one Class C felony count of practicing medicine without a license and three Class B misdemeanor counts of battery for a series of incidents that reportedly took place at the home in 2004. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.southbendtribune.com Date: June 10, 2006)

Juvenile center restrictions draw fire: CHICAGO (AP) - When the school day ends at Cook County's temporary juvenile detention center, hundreds of students must leave essential education tools behind: their textbooks. Such centers commonly prohibit the unsupervised use of hardcover books and basic school supplies like pencils out of concern the youths could use the items for violence. Child welfare advocates, however, say the rules can create a prison-like atmosphere that discourages rehabilitation. "Any facility ought to be safe and secure enough for kids to have books," said Betsy Clarke, president of the Juvenile Justice Initiative. This month, a judge appointed a former state corrections official to oversee changes at the detention center, stemming from a 2002 settlement of a lawsuit that claimed the facility was mismanaged. Juvenile advocates say some of the problems cited in the lawsuit extended into the center's classrooms. "Teachers consistently said they do not assign homework because staff do not allow the youths to bring books or even pages to come back up the unit," the Juvenile Detention Alternatives Initiative concluded after reviewing practices at the facility in December. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.fresnobee.com Date: June 21, 2006)

Rough Love: Shannon Levy-Rowley is 21 years old and five feet seven inches tall. She weighs 108 pounds. During the past five and a half years, she has endured three major surgeries and diets ranging from fourteen weeks of consuming only liquids to sipping blended meals through a straw. But the brunet's meager weight has nothing to do with a tummy tuck or an eating disorder. In December 2000, Shannon's parents, Jayne Levy and James Rowley of Coral Springs, enrolled their only child in Tranquility Bay (TB), a boarding school in Jamaica for troubled teens. "I was smoking pot, I was popping pills, drinking, doing acid, just experimenting with everything 'cause I was just really unhappy with my life," Shannon says. Tuition would cost almost $40,000 annually, but after attending a support meeting in South Miami and speaking with families who claimed the school had done a lot for their children, Jayne signed an enrollment agreement granting TB custodial rights. "It got very good reviews, and Shannon needed to go somewhere," Jayne laments. "I was fearing for her life." On a mild winter day about two weeks after the Rowleys signed up, three people Shannon had never met arrived at the family's home. "A lady and two big men came into my house and sat me down on the sofa," Shannon recalls. "They handcuffed me and said I could cooperate or they were gonna throw me over their shoulder." The group drove to the airport and boarded a plane. The journey ended in Treasure Beach, a remote hamlet on Jamaica's southern coast, where Shannon spent the next thirteen months. She describes it as an unforgettable nightmare and recalls being severely depressed, crying constantly, and within one week of arrival, trying to throw herself off a second-story balcony. Shortly after her failed suicide attempt in early 2001, Shannon alleges staff aggressively restrained her when she took a swing at one of them. "One staff held my arms behind my back when I was standing up so I couldn't grab onto anything," she says. "Another staff ripped my feet out from underneath me so I fell with all my weight right onto my chin. I immediately started gushing blood everywhere, but that didn't stop them. They still continued restraining me." Jayne Levy contends she wasn't told of the severity of Shannon's problems until school officials telephoned on Christmas eve 2001 to say, "You have to come and pick up your daughter; she can't open her mouth to eat." Shannon could barely open her mouth wide enough to insert a toothbrush, mother and daughter agree. They claim the injuries were largely untreated and consequently Shannon's condition deteriorated. (She has lost about 40 pounds since sustaining the injury.) (Webmaster Note: WWASP tortures children and should be closed down immediately!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.miaminewtimes.com Date: June 22, 2006)

State wards denied parole rights given to adult inmates, suit alleges: SACRAMENTO (AP) - About 4,000 juvenile offenders are routinely denied the parole rights granted to adult convicts accused of violating their parole, lawyers said in a class-action lawsuit filed Wednesday in federal district court in Sacramento. An earlier court settlement requires the state Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation and parole board to supply adult parolees with legal representation and probable cause hearings. The settlement also requires officials to consider alternatives to sending adult parolees back to prison if they are found to have violated conditions of their parole. But young parole violators can be sent back to youth prisons without those protections, the suit alleges. Nearly half of all young parolees are reincarcerated within two years, the inmate rights attorneys said. "Youth can be warehoused at one of the terrible juvenile detention facilities for months before they receive any hearing, even for technical violations of parole such as drinking alcohol," Michael Bien, one of the attorneys, said in announcing the suit. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.fresnobee.com Date: June 22, 2006)

Youth facility faked records-Detention center workers missed required training, monitor reports: Officials at a state-run juvenile detention center in Prince George's County falsified records for more than a year to make it look as if workers were getting training, required by law, on how to deal with the troubled youths housed there, an independent monitor has found. In response to the findings by the state Juvenile Justice Monitoring Unit, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services said the training coordinator at the Cheltenham Youth Facility was dismissed last week and officials are reviewing training practices elsewhere to see whether similar problems exist at other juvenile jails and youth treatment centers. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.baltimoresun.com Date: June 29, 2006)

WWASP Slammed by Federal Court: SALT LAKE CITY, Utah (July 9, 2006) – The World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP), a highly controversial and monster-size corporation, with a reputation for crushing everyday moms and dads, lost yet again--this time in the U.S. Court of Appeals. Jeff Berryman, a Pennsylvania advocate for children, was vindicated in his efforts to blow the whistle on WWASP for child abuse, neglect, and fraud. Robert Browning Lichfield, the founder and self-described consultant to WWASP, met those claims of abuse by dragging Mr. Berryman into Utah with a lawsuit designed to silence him once and for all. Mr. Berryman, however, prevailed. The Federal Court of Appeals gave examples of news media description of child abuse and neglect at World Wide schools: "[T]he news magazine 48 Hours reported a child's allegation that he had been handcuffed for two consecutive days and had his mouth covered in duct tape. The Miami Herald ran an article describing a mother's report that her teenager came home from a World Wide school with ringworm scars and chemical burns. Forbes Magazine reported that children were punched, kicked, thrown, and forced to sit on cement floors for twelve hours at a time. The teenager quoted in the article also claimed that students who tried to flee from such punishment were locked in a small cell for days." For complete story, click here.

Update: Highfields Reopens Doors: Four months after closing its doors, Highfields is open for business. The residential treatment center finally re-opened. In February, claims of abuse forced Highfields to temporarily shut the facility down. The first new tenants are arriving. (Webmaster Note: This is the main problem. Even when programs are proven to be abusive, after a slap on the wrist, they get to re-open and continue harming kids. This has to stop. Real criminal and civil penalties should be imposed on these greedy child abusers.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.wlms.com Date: July 11, 2006)

Comment: Bad discipline hits too many students: Texas may be known for its oil and gas pipelines, but the newest Texas pipeline funnels children from schools to prison, by way of alternative education programs and juvenile detention centers. While students who present a danger to classmates must be segregated, too many students are falling into this pipeline. The Legislature must stem the tide of schoolchildren who are being unnecessarily written up and written off. For complete story, click here.

Man defied order, saw Youth Ranch girl: A 20-year-old Nashville man accused of having sex with a female minor at the Youth Ranch in Lebanon had been ordered to stay away from her, court records show. Christopher Carver is mentioned by name as the person barred from any contact with the 15-year-old girl during her stay at the privately run facility for troubled teens, according to court documents. Carver was arrested Thursday on a charge of statutory rape, Lebanon Police Chief Scott Bowen said. Two other adults wanted in the case are: Amy Morrison-King, 40, a former Youth Ranch worker accused of bringing men to the workplace to have sex with teens; and Geary Jackson, 24, accused of having sex with a juvenile at the ranch. "Apparently, there was some kind of involvement between the two before," Bowen said referring to Carver and one of the girls. Youth Ranch is a nonprofit program that the state Department of Children's Services has used for several years to work with and house children and teens who were neglected or convicted of minor crimes. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.fairviewobserver.com Date: July 14, 2006)

Controversy surrounds Tranquility Bay: Since 2002 the Cayman Islands Government has quietly been sending troubled youth to a high security privately run educational institution in Jamaica called Tranquility Bay. The facility treats special cases as an alternative to juvenile detention on Grand Cayman. The first young Caymanian was sent at the family's request in 2001. The Cayman Islands Government has since sent five young people; three boys and two girls over the past five years. The last government-funded student left in July 2005. Health and Family Services Minister Anthony Eden has confirmed that despite the fact that no students are currently at the facility, the Ministry has no intention of eliminating the just-in-case Tranquility Bay funding of $30,000 allocated in this year's budget...Billed to have a positive effect on troubled young people aged 13 to 18 going through problems associated with the difficult teen years, the Tranquility Bay website states it is a "specialty boarding school and therapeutic behavioural modification facility, with an excellent academic program and therapy for kids who have been very defiant and hard to manage..." The site describes how its program opens up new ways to help young people build character in order to achieve family peace and harmony. The facility opened in 1997 and is in a remote area of Treasure Beach near St. Elizabeth, west of Kingston, on the premises of a former oceanfront hotel. It is owned and operated by the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools, a 19-year old organization that holds about 2,400 children and youth ranging from seven to 18 in facilities in the United States, Jamaica and Mexico. The benign name masks a different reality: In the past four years, five WWASP facilities, Casa by the Sea, Sunrise Beach and High Impact, all in Mexico, Dundee Ranch in Costa Rica, Morava in Czech Republic, and Paradise Cove in Western Samoa, have all been shut down for child abuse and neglect. The High Impact Mexico operation was shut down when investigators discovered children being held in dog cages in the desert, reported John Gorenfeld of AlterNet. Chris Goodwin of San Francisco said his son was forced to stay outside in his underpants for three nights at the Mexico facility, lying on his stomach with his chin on the ground. If he moved to try to brush off fire ants that roamed over him, he was threatened with a cattle prod, said Goodwin. The punishment left scars on his son's chin, he said in a news story in the Rocky Mountain (Colorado) News in January 2002. For complete story, click here.

Rep. Matheson holds big money edge: ...Christensen received $12,000 from the Lichfield family of southern Utah, owners of several treatment facilities for troubled teens. The Campaign for America's Future donated $5,000 to his campaign. And the two-term state legislator collected donations from several of his GOP legislative colleagues, including Draper Rep. Greg Hughes, Spanish Fork Rep. Mike Morley, St. George Rep. Brad Last and Kanab Rep. Mike Noel. (Webmaster Note: With the GOP in the back pocket of child torturers, it's no wonder why more isn't done to stop this evil industry.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sltrib.com Date: July 15, 2006)

Police search for missing teens, 14 and 19: NEWPORT, N.H. --Newport Police are looking for a 14-year-old boy and 19-year-old woman believed to have left the state together. Chief David Hoyt said police are seeking leads on the whereabouts of Randy Gentner of Salem, who ran away from a group home in Newport on Wednesday. Hoyt believes Gentner met up last week with Jennifer Newcomb of Croydon, a teacher's aide at his middle school. Police have issued an arrest warrant for Newcomb on a charge of interference of parental custody, taking a minor over state lines without permission. Newcomb's car was found on Saturday night in Lime Rock, Conn. The two are believed to have traveled through New York City and on their way to Florida or Mexico, said Rodney Forey of New Hampshire Juvenile Justice Services. Police in Ocala, Fla., were asked to check the bus and train stations for the pair. Gentner's parents said they're worried about their son. The teenager had been receiving court-ordered drug and depression counseling at the Orion House in Newport, WMUR-TV reported. Letters written by Gentner were found in Newcomb's bedroom, but authorities aren't sure what the nature of their relationship is. "There's nothing we've uncovered that says they're involved in an intimate relationship," Hoyt said. "In fact, we have just the opposite -- that it's more a mother-son-type relationship." For complete story, click here.

WWASPS Back in Court: SYRACUSE, NY (July 28, 2006) Attorney Christopher Todd of Hancock & Estabrook, LLP, confirmed their firm filed a class-action lawsuit Tuesday on behalf of 25 plaintiffs and against Academy of Ivy Ridge, WWASPS, Robert Lichfield, Lifeline Family Services, Premier Educational Systems, Jason Finlinson, among others (see link to Complaint below.) Plaintiffs alleged in their Complaint that defendants fraudulently advertised Academy of Ivy Ridge (AIR) as an accredited boarding school licensed to issue credits and diplomas to its students. AIR allegedly falsely and fraudulently certified to educational lending institutions, including Sallie Mae and Key Bank, that they were a licensed and accredited private boarding high school authorized by the State of New York to issue diplomas in order that parents could qualify for restricted educational loans to pay their monthly tuition of about $2,800 to $4,000. Jason Finlinson, Alyn Mitchell, and Joseph Mitchell, allegedly failed to operate under the laws of the State of NY. Robert Lichfield allegedly purchased the property for AIR and used his personal connections with Ivy Ridge's accreditation agency, Northwest Assoc. of Schools, to blindly allow WWASP to claim accreditation though they did not meet Northwest's own standards. For complete story, click here.

Christian Military Academy's Training and Leadership Corps campout. The students, who are around ages 9 to 15, had been camping since Wednesday, Lynda Browne, the school's principal and owner, told the South Florida Sun-Sentinel for Sunday's edition. The boy got out of bed in the middle of the night to tell a drill sergeant he didn't feel well, Browne said. He boy collapsed on the way to the restroom. For complete story, click here.

Teen Boot Camp Cadet Dies During Orientation in Florida: NORTH MIAMI, Florida — A 13-year-old cadet at a private military academy died during an orientation camping trip, the school's principal said. Authorities rushed the child from Oleta State Park to a hospital, where he was pronounced dead Saturday, North Miami police said. The cause of death was undetermined, pending a medical examiner's report, police said. No additional information was released. The boy was one of 33 cadets attending the Back to Basics. For complete story, click here.

For parents and kids: Summary: How does a parent deal with a child who has behavior, alcohol or drug problems? Boot camp-style programs have tried to deal with these issues through participant isolation, hard labor, restraints, name-calling, humiliation, sleep and food deprivation and hiking into the wilderness or desert. These programs often hire kids off the street to be counselors working for minimum wage. Some workers, she discovered, had criminal records or little training, education and experience with troubled children. She says it was rare if there was even a psychologist on the grounds. Among the programs she tackles are Synanon, Tough Love, The Seed, Straight Incorporated, the Challenger Camp, Elan School, KIDS and World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP). Public officials including Nancy Reagan promoted these programs in the 1980s as the solution to drug abuse. Talk shows used them to teach ungrateful rich kids how to behave, and other media outlets publicized boot camps as a miraculous cure. Some children were sent because they admitted to being gay. Parents thought the camps could "straighten their children out" and make them heterosexual. Szalavitz examines these programs through the eyes of the children who endured them. She also speaks to parents of children who died horrific deaths in these programs. There were about 30 kids who died, many of them because counselors had little training to deal with desert conditions and lack of water. Szalavitz investigates the lack of education provided to these kids during camp. She also looks at the way panic-stricken parents are manipulated into sending their children. For complete story, click here.

Foster Boy's Death Ruled Homicide: Foster Boy's Death Ruled Homicide The Wayne County Medical Examiner has ruled the death of a 2-year-old boy at a Detroit foster home was a homicide, Local 4 reported. Isaac Lethbridge suffered bruises to his face and burn marks to his chest, according to police. Police said there was also evidence that he was sexually assaulted. The child was dead on arrival at Children's Hospital Wednesday, according to police. Emergency crews said the toddler stopped breathing. he child was living at the foster home for more than a month along with his 4-year-old sister, according to police. Child Protective Services removed the sister and several other children from the home, Local 4 reported. No arrests have been made in connection with the boy's death. For complete story, click here.

Rights group sues youth hall-Suit claims abuse and neglect, asks for reforms: A lawsuit filed Monday by a prisoners rights group claims that Sacramento County juvenile hall is filthy and overcrowded and that its staff members routinely douse teens with pepper spray and grind their faces into the floor. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sacbee.com Date: August 30, 2006)

Troubling Times for Troubled Teens: A jury will likely decide whether a counselor at the Ella J. Baker House raped a 17-year-old in one of the center's bathrooms, as she alleges. But do we really need any more evidence to prove the Rev. Eugene Rivers has lost control of the ex-cons working at the Baker House under his supervision and serving as "role models" for troubled kids who come to the center for help? (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://news.bostonherald.com> Date: August or September, 2006)

Behavior Modification Money Trail: The controversial world of youth behavior-modification facilities intersects with a web of intricate political connections. And where the treatment industry sees cooperation with government entities, activists warn, these links could cloud the prospects for public oversight of the "teen-help" market. The influence of the behavior-modification industry is felt on Capitol Hill. Four members of the House of Representatives and one senator serve as honorary board members of Kids Helping Kids, a company with corporate links to a now-defunct behavior-modification program for teen drug users known as Straight Incorporated. The various franchises of that program dissolved in the early 1990s following allegations of child abuse, as well as criticism for using cruel, prisoner-of-war-style brainwashing techniques on adolescents. For complete story, click here.

The Franklin Scandal Tried in Civil Court: U.S. government mind control programs, like MK-Ultra and Monarch, directed against helpless victims--human guinea pigs--have been virtually ignored by the Big Media Cartel. On Feb. 27, 1999, however, U.S. District Court Judge Warren Urbom found former Franklin S&L manager Lawrence E. King guilty of numerous crimes committed against mind control victim Paul A. Bonacci. King, serving a 15-year sentence for his role in the theft of $40 million from Franklin, an Omaha, Neb., credit union, was ordered by Judge Urbom to pay Bonacci $800,000 in compensatory damages and an additional $200,000 in punitive damages. This legal judgement against a notorious perpetrator of satanic-ritual child abuse is unprecedented. In the Memorandum of Decision, Judge Urbom wrote, "King continually subjected the plaintiff [Bonacci] to repeated sexual assaults, false imprisonment, infliction of extreme emotional distress, organized and directed satanic rituals, forced the plaintiff to 'scavenge' for children to be a part of the defendant King's sexual abuse and pornography ring, forced the plaintiff to engage in numerous sexual contacts with the defendant King and others and participate in deviate sexual games and masochistic orgies with other minor children. "He [Bonacci] has suffered burns, broken fingers, beatings of the head and face and other indignities by the wrongful actions of the defendant King," the judge declared. "In addition to the misery of going through the experiences just related over a period of eight years [1980-1988], the plaintiff has suffered the lingering results to the present time. "He [Bonacci] is a victim of multiple personality disorder, involving as many as 14 distinct personalities aside from his primary personality," wrote the judge. "He has given up a desired military career and received threats on his life. He suffers from sleeplessness, has bad dreams, has difficulty holding a job, is fearful that others are following him, fears getting killed, has depressing flashbacks, and is verbally violent on occasion, all in connection with the multiple personality disorder and caused by the wrongful activities of the defendant King." Franklin Cover-up--Bonacci's lawyer, John DeCamp, has waged a long, lonely and expensive legal campaign in exposing crimes involving an international pedophile-pornography ring. In 1991, DeCamp filed a 12-count suit in federal court, charging 16 prominent individuals and institutions, including Lawrence E. King, Omaha World Herald Publisher Harold Andersen and the Omaha Police Department with conspiracy to deprive Paul Bonacci of his civil rights. DeCamp's suit detailed slander, false imprisonment, child abuse, assault, battery and infliction of emotional distress suffered by Bonacci. The complex case also involved high-level politicians, business leaders, judges and police officials with connections to the drug distribution/money laundering operations known as "Iran" -Contra which goes back to then Vice-President George Bush. DeCamp, a former Nebraska State Senator, even wrote a groundbreaking book about the sordid history of the case called The Franklin Cover-Up: Child Abuse, Satanism and Murder in Nebraska. Monarch Project--The horrendous Monarch Project "refers to young people in America who were victims of mind control experiments run either by U.S. government agencies such as the Central Intelligence Agency or military intelligence agencies," writes DeCamp. "The story told by Monarch victims--one of whom was Paul Bonacci--is that they were tortured for the purpose of creating 'multiple personalities' within them," DeCamp continues from his book. "These multiple personalities could then be programmed--as spies, 'drug mules,' prostitutes or assassins." An article by Anton Chaitkin, quoted in the book, states that "professionals probing the child victims of 'Monarch' say there are clearly two responsible elements at work: the government/military, and cooperating satanic cults. These are multi-generation groups, whose parents donate their own children--who are proudly called 'bloodline' or simply 'blood' cultists--to be smashed with drugs and electric shock and shaped. Other children are kidnapped and sold into this hell, or are brought in gradually through day care situations. For complete story, click here.

Congress Considering Strip Searching Students --Congress to vote on HR 5295 Tuesday or Wednesday 18 Sep 2006 (drugpolicy.org) The Student Teacher Safety Act of 2006 (HR 5295) is a sloppily written bill that would require any school receiving federal funding (essentially every public school) to adopt policies allowing teachers and school officials to conduct random, warrantless searches of every student, at any time, for essentially any reason they want. These searches could be pat-downs, bag searches, or strip searches depending on how far school administrators wanted to go. For complete story, click here.

Guard accused of sex with juvenile girl is fired State Police will conduct criminal investigation of case at former Girls School: A state prison guard was fired Wednesday after he was accused of having sexual contact with a girl at the Indianapolis Juvenile Correctional Facility on the city's Far Westside. Octavius Tyler, 25, was terminated after an internal affairs investigation at the state-run facility, formerly called the Indiana Girls School. The case has been handed over to the Indiana State Police for a criminal investigation, as well as Child Protective Services. The Department of Correction did not disclose when the contact occurred, whether it happened more than once or any details about the girl involved, including her age. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.indystar.com Date: September 22, 2006)

Governor planning a frugal campaign: Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr...Since the last disclosure deadline, the special projects fund reported raising $40,000 from Utah's dietary supplement industry, $10,000 from Robert Lichfield, founder of a controversial chain of schools for troubled teens, and $25,000 each from Ian Cumming's Leucadia National Corporation and venture capitalist James Swartz. Huntsman used the money to cover much of his out-of-state travel, the cost of holiday receptions at the Governor's Mansion, a state dinner for outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox and for china plates and coasters emblazoned with the Utah State seal for Asian ambassadors. After paying more than $8,000 in accounting fees, another $6,100 for a business summit at the Davis Convention Center and $15,300 to Huntsman for Governor, the special initiatives fund has $101,000 in cash on hand. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sltrib.com Date: September, 2006)

Teens Killed By Train Identified As Azleway Runaways: Officials confirm two teens, killed by a train in Hawkins, were runaways from Azleway Boys' Ranch, a facility for troubled boys in Chapel Hill. Officials say they were Harry Rutledge, 15, of Bestrop and Chris Hill, 17, of Dallas. Officials say the teens had been living at Azleway for the past few weeks, but ran away last Saturday, hiding out behind Hawkins High School in a pine thicket. For complete story, click here.

Report: Girls Are Abused in Jail: A new report says girls at New York's two detention facilities for juvenile females are sexually and physically abused by staff members. They are also denied mental health, educational and other rehabilitative services. Human Rights Watch and the American Civil Liberties Union released the report. The inmates, ages 13 to 17, are in for offenses ranging from shoplifting to assault. For complete story, click here.

Finding The "Straight Edge" In Fiji: The $14 million psychological thriller "Straight Edge" starts shooting October 2nd in Fiji with Peter Stormare, Mila Kunis and Gregory Smith headlining reports Variety. Story's about a group of troubled teens sent to a rehabilitation program housed in a remote camp on the island of Fiji. What their parents believe is a state-of-the-art deluxe institution in a beautiful natural environment turns out to be a prison- like boot camp where they are abused and brainwashed. (Webmaster Note: Art imitates life. This film's name was changed to "Boot Camp") For complete story, click here.

State Supreme Court says no right of jury trial for juveniles: The Tennessee Supreme Court has overturned a 36-year-old ruling by a state appellate court that said juveniles can appeal their convictions to an adult court system and have the case decided by a jury. The appellate court first issued the ruling in 1970. A year later, however, the U.S. Supreme Court opined that the U.S. Constitution did not guarantee a jury trial for appealing juveniles. Despite that decision, Tennessee's courts continued to uphold a juvenile's right to a jury trial. (Unable to locate complete story at time of archiving. Source: www.tennessean.com Date: September 28, 2006)

Supporters rally for teen who killed grandparents: A woman who says Christopher Pittman changed her life held a vigil on the steps of the South Carolina Supreme Court on Wednesday night, the eve of the teen's appeal of his murder conviction for killing his grandparents when he was 12 years old. "We're going to show support to Chris, and his family and the attorneys," said Janet Sisk, director of the North Carolina-based Juvenile Justice Foundation. "It's kinda like it's coming full circle." Pittman was convicted last year of murder in the 2001 shooting deaths of his grandparents in their Chester County home and sentenced to 30 years in prison. Defense attorneys argued that Pittman, who was 12 at the time of the slayings, was involuntarily intoxicated by the antidepressant Zoloft and did not know right from wrong. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.thestate.com Date: April 9, 2007)

School Says Police, Social Services Will Snatch Kids Of Late Parents Indiana junior high threatens prison custody if child not picked up on time from mandatory homework class: A junior high school in Indiana threatens parents with police and child protective service involvement if they fail to pick up their child on time after mandatory Friday classes for missed homework. Outraged parents forwarded us a letter from the Tell City Junior High School in Indiana in which they were given a days notice that their child had to attend a Friday class to catch up on missed homework. The letter stated in bold that if a parent didn't arrive at the agreed time to pick up their child, "arrangements have been made with the Tell City Police Department to have them housed at the police station." The letter then states that intervention by the police will also necessitate involvement of the Perry County Office of Family and Children. For complete story, click here.

New claims of abuse at boys camp: GREENVILLE - Three separate state agencies are investigating whether caretakers used banned, excessive and harmful restraints at a camp for delinquent boys, some of whom are mentally retarded or have other special needs. At least one youth might have suffered a broken collarbone at the Greenville Hills Academy in Greenville just last week, according to records obtained by The Miami Herald. One 16-year-old claimed he was "choked." And in another episode, guards also reported using a technique called a wrist lock that was banned two years ago by Anthony Schembri, secretary of the state Department of Juvenile Justice, an agency still reeling from the death of a 14-year-old at another Panhandle facility earlier this year. For complete story, click here.

Parents of child-sex suspect ran youth home: TORONTO -- Michael Stratton knew how to identify with troubled kids -- he'd spent a lot of time around them. The Globe and Mail has learned that the man now facing almost 300 charges in connection with alleged sexual abuse of children spent several months living in a home for troubled children in Richmond Hill. Mr. Stratton, in his early 20s at the time, wasn't there because he was sent by an aid agency or because he was employed there, but because his parents ran the home and he needed a place to stay. Police now fear the 39-year-old may have learned how to build trust with troubled children from his time at the home in the 1980s. His mother and stepfather, who ran the Richmond Hill home for 14 years until 2000, were described by those who knew them as exemplary foster parents to children over the years. And those who met Mr. Stratton during his time at the home had no suspicions he may have been involved in anything criminal. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.theglobeandmail.com Date: October 26, 2006)

Teen referred to ex-officer as his girlfriend: The former Elkhorn boot camp officer accused of having a relationship with a teenage cadet had a reputation for being intimate with cadets at the juvenile facility, the boy told police in reports issued Tuesday. Adriana Rivera pleaded no contest in August to a felony charge of accessory after the fact and a misdemeanor charge of obstructing police. She was sentenced to three years of probation and four months in a work-furlough program. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.fresnobee.com Date: November 1, 2006)

Teen Accused In Counselor's Death Finishes Testing: SALT LAKE CITY A teen accused in the rape and slaying of a youth counselor has completed his psychological testing. However, 17-year-old Robert Cameron Houston's lawyer says he needs two more weeks to work out a trial schedule with prosecutors. Houston is charged with capital murder in connection with the February killing of 22-year-old Raechale Elton. She worked for an agency that housed and counseled troubled teens. The teen also faces rape and aggravated sexual assault. His next court appearance is set for November 14th. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kutv.com Date: November, 2006)

Foster parent pleads guilty to sex assault: Kenneth Charles "Ken!" Puhler, a Durango resident who trained adults who worked with troubled teens and took in at least 130 foster children, has pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child in a position of trust. Puhler, 50, formerly sheriff of Dolores County, pleaded guilty to one of 10 counts and was sentenced Nov. 1 to 10 years to life in prison, according to court documents. If he is released, he will be placed on parole for 20 years to life. As part of the plea agreement, District Attorney Craig Westberg dropped the other nine counts, which alleged abuse of children younger than 15 as far back as 1993. In return, Puhler stipulated that he sexually abused a 14-year-old boy who was in his care as a foster child in February 2004, and that "there were various times, both previous and subsequent to this event, when the defendant had sexual contact" with the boy. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://durangoherald.com> Date: November 7, 2006)

Sexual exploitation trial begins for ex-youth worker: A lawyer defending a former Batshaw youth worker charged with abusing his authority by having sex with troubled teens tried Wednesday to stop the media from publishing details of the trial, including her client's name. But Quebec Court Judge Gilles Cadieux rejected the request, saying the argument that publication could damage Evon Smith's future career prospects could apply to anyone accused of a crime. Smith faces charges of sexual exploitation, sexual interference and invitation to sexual touching involving two teens from a Batshaw group home. For complete story, click here.

Just Listen: ... "You know," Elaine Roberts told Denton, "as parents we're so used to staying positive. Instead stop and say, 'What do you mean by that?' How does that make you feel?" They might not answer you because teens are very private. But just maybe they will." In the flash of that remark, I saw my own shortcomings. I realized how guilty I have been at times of not really listening to people -- my children in particular -- but instead of simply jumping in with proposed solutions to their problems, or stock reassurances. In this, I know, I am not alone: Roberts is right -- parents want to stay positive and want to fix things. But there's a lot to be said for simply listening, asking gently probing questions, and listening some more. Unfortunately, many of us are not very good at it. And as a rule, we seem to be getting worse with each passing year. I'm not just talking about listening to troubled teens or depressed friends. I'm talking about our capacity to listen in all spheres of life... (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.portfolioweekly.com Date: November, 2006)

Guidance counselor charged with molesting teen: A guidance counselor who, investigators say, molested a 16-year-old girl at a Hollywood center for troubled teens is now facing jail time. Felman Reddick, 41, abused the girl at the Starting Point, the non-profit agency where he worked at the time, said Capt. Tony Rode, a Hollywood police spokesman. The center provides rehabilitation and counseling services for local youth. Reddick is charged with six counts of unlawful sexual acts with a minor, Rode said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.miami.com Date: 2006)

Eight Charged With Manslaughter In Florida Boot Camp Death: PANAMA CITY, FLA---Seven former guards at a now closed Bay County juvenile boot camp and a nurse have been charged with aggravated manslaughter in the death of Martin Lee Anderson, the teenager who died in January while in custody at the camp. For complete story, click here.

Ivy Ridge Academy accreditation rejected: The Academy at Ivy Ridge will not be allowed to resume issuing high school diplomas. The State Education Department has rejected the Academy's application, according to stories Friday in St. Lawrence County newspapers and The Watertown Times. A letter from the State Education Department to Ivy Ridge quoted in the Watertown Times says, "The Department's review revealed that AIR is principally a behavior modification program and not a school..." For complete story, click here.

Second suit hits juvenile facility: As one major lawsuit against the Sacramento County juvenile hall nears an end, with millions of dollars promised to teens who were strip-searched, another suit is gaining momentum that claims a culture of abuse and neglect prevails at the hall. Together, the suits highlight a history of problems at the crowded, understaffed and aging facility on Kiefer Boulevard, say the civil rights lawyers who filed the complaints. So far, nearly one-third of the 8,000 juveniles who were strip-searched have applied for payments under a $6.28 million court settlement, a response rate that Sacramento attorney Mark Merin, who filed the suit, said is unusually high. The deadline for applying is Jan. 8. Search practices have been changed, but Merin said serious problems persist at juvenile hall. "They're overwhelmed, and they don't have a good, productive method of dealing with the kids who are incarcerated," Merin said. "Instead they're just sort of warehousing them, and it doesn't lead to positive results." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sacbee.com Date: Uncertain--Likely Late 2006)

Woman kidnapped teenager by seducing him, prosecutor says: NASHUA, New Hampshire: A woman who ran off to Florida with her teenage lover entrapped the 16-year-old with sex, a prosecutor said as her trial on kidnapping charges opened Tuesday. A national search for the couple ended in June when a worker at a bus depot saw them "making out." "This case is about a 32-year-old woman enticing, befriending and seducing a 16-year-old boy," Assistant Hillsborough County Attorney Justin Shepherd said. Jennifer Malone is charged with kidnapping Christopher Cole, whom she met while working as a teacher's assistant at a residential school for troubled teens. For complete story, click here.

The Trouble with Troubled Teen Programs--How the "boot camp" industry tortures and kills kids: ...Every time a child dies in a tough love program, politicians say—as Florida Gov. Jeb Bush initially did on hearing of Anderson's death—that it is "one tragic incident" that should not be used to justify shutting such programs down. But there have now been nearly three dozen such deaths and thousands of reports of severe abuse in programs that use corporal punishment, brutal emotional attacks, isolation, and physical restraint in an attempt to reform troubled teenagers. Tough love has become a billion-dollar industry. Several hundred programs, both public and private, use the approach. Somewhere between 10,000 and 100,000 teenagers are currently held in treatment programs based on the belief that adolescents must be broken (mentally, and often physically as well) before they can be fixed. Exact numbers are impossible to determine, because no one keeps track of the kids in these programs, most of which are privately run. The typical way to end up in a government-run program, such as the camp where Martin Lee Anderson was killed, is for a court to give you the option of going there instead of prison. The typical way to end up in a private program is to be sent there by your parents, though judges and public schools have been known to send kids to private boot camps as well. Since they offer "treatment," some of the private centers are covered by health insurance. For complete story, click here.

Police ponder arrests of teens: ..."That's why it's important for parents to listen to their children. Be involved with them. Watch them. Watch their friends. Be respected as a parent. Give them a deadline, and make them stick to it." About 21 percent of the more than 2 million juvenile arrests in 2003 were for burglary or larceny-theft, according to the 2006 National Report of Juvenile Offenders and Victims, published by the U.S. Department of Justice. The study defines juveniles as ages 10 through 17. Smith said troubled teens could benefit from parental attention... (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.myrtlebeachonline.com Date: January 8th, 2007)

Troubled times at youth facility: The Berkshire Farm residential center for troubled teens is under investigation by the attorney general's office as former staffers and at least one former resident claim the institution continues to be plagued by sporadic violence and, some say, poor supervision of the residents there. Among the problems: One youngster's parents went days before they were told he had tried to commit suicide. In another instance, a grandmother didn't learn for months that her grandson had run away from the facility. "I was worried sick. I thought maybe he was dead," said Elaine Fiske. Located in rural Canaan, Columbia County, Berkshire Farm has long been known as a progressive facility for young men aged 12 to 17 who have been sent there by family courts across the state. The farm includes residential and educational programs. Some of the clients are juvenile delinquents; some suffer emotional disturbances or were chronically truant. Others may come from unstable families. Approximately 150 youngsters live there, although there have been as many as 250. The farm made headlines in 2005 when the board of directors said it had hired a former federal prosecutor, Zachary Carter, to investigate allegations of drug dealing and sexual abuse at the center. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://timesunion.com> Date: January 21, 2007)

Pregnant Girls Attack Group Home Director. Escape: Three pregnant teens living in a group home in Utah whacked the director in the head with a frying pan, tied her up and fled in a minivan, police said. According to a report by CBS affiliate KUTV-TV in Salt Lake City, the girls, two 15-year-olds and a 16-year-old, are from California, Texas and Illinois. Police believe they left the state after restraining the director with power cords Tuesday and tying up another pregnant teen. The director "was able to break free and then she went up and untied the 17-year-old female and then they contacted the police," American Fork police Sgt. Shauna Greening said. New Hope, a privately owned maternity home in Utah County, is a place for struggling pregnant teens, 30 miles south of Salt Lake City. Girls attend school in the area and are taught prenatal care, child birth, adoption and parenting skills. A call to a phone number listed for New Hope went unanswered Thursday. But the owner, Spencer Moody, tearfully told a Salt Lake City TV station that he would close the rural home. He said about two dozen girls had given birth after living at New Hope. (Webmaster Note: Rumor has it that the directors of New Hope are affiliated with WWASP. WWASP is notorious for torturing children. No wonder these girls felt desperate to escape.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.topix.net Date: January 19th, 2007)

The REAL School?: Brian was so doped up on something that he could not keep his head up. He slumped over the desktop. The bottom line was that he had taken too many Valium before coming to the REAL School. "REAL" equals "Regional Educational Alternative Learning" and the building is located in South Windham, ME. That's where I tried to teach. The school's director phoned Brian's mother at her work. That meant she had to take time off, drive to the school, and somehow get her son to slosh himself into her car for a ride home. Was this the first time she had been called at her work about her son? No. Of course if Brian had been in his clear head, I had no teaching materials by which to see through another day at this alternative learning school. It was alternative learning all right. It was so alternative that it fell off the charts. As teaching staff, we had a shared stapler, some chalk, erasers, no textbooks, no teachers' manuals, no supportive supplies, a meager stash of lined paper, pencils and pens. There were a few cast off computers that tried to work. No wonder the Superintendent of Schools praised the director for being the most outstanding alternative learning head in the state. That was even printed in the local newspaper. After all, he kept below budget. There was rarely a visit from anyone close to the Superintendent's office. We basically were left to warehouse these troubled teens on our own. If one of the bureaucrats came into the school, it was a swift in and out. I would see the car drive up to the building, a well-dressed individual disembark, and then climb the stumps for stairs. (The school was a very old brick building buried in a residential neighborhood). Then that educator would click heels down the hallway, disappear into the director's office, and in short order reappear for exiting. When I was hired at that school, I actually felt that I could make a difference in teen lives. So I gave it my all. It takes some time for naivete to strip away until there is nothing left but bald, needling facts. With that, I trudged on. Because there were no teaching supplies, I went to the shopping mall where homeschoolers bought their materials. I purchased the paperback math, English and spelling texts. Then I duplicated the pages on the school's copy machine to use as handouts to pupils. That's how I managed to get through lessons. When I presented the receipt for the purchases to the director's secretary, she looked up with a scowl to ask if I really needed to spend that much. The amount was less than fifteen dollars. The director was an Australian. He sported quite the charming accent as well as packaged his own brand of vulgarity. Somehow his potty mouth did not seem to turn off the Superintendent's office. With such charisma, he managed to hoodwink the officialdom, slip far below budget, and thereby hoist the teaching burden sans materials onto frazzled teachers. When I asked him one day how I could teach with nothing to teach with, director responded by saying that that was what made the alternative learning school so marvelously different from other schools. We were left with our own unique creative skills, our sparkly imaginations by which we could manufacture our own curricula. So it was that teachers daily bent their brain cells in attempts to create something from nothing. Most of the time it did not work. That's why the police cruisers drove up to the school several times a week. When desks flew across rooms, doors were punched through and teachers were told to go to hell, there were occasions when the cops had to be called in. Yet this was the REAL School. There was no other school quite like it. We were the example for other schools to follow. The director reminded us that we were a model showcase. That's when I drove out to Pineland estates to investigate their Collaborate School, another term for alternative learning. The director took me on a tour. There I noted rooms laden with supplies, teachers smiling as they went about their daily routines, nary a sound from the students, and well-lighted rooms, carpeted floors and a staff kitchen. The student population was composed of the same troubled sorts as those enrolled at the REAL School. We had a kitchen at the REAL School. The problem was that its sink was crudded over with mold. Dirty trays lined the counter tops. Pots and pans were left to clean themselves. Fill in the blanks. After three-plus years on the job, I appealed to the teachers' union. I was told that my union representative would go to bat for me. In short, she did nothing of the sort. Nothing but stall. I provided her with copious detail as to what was actually going on at the school. She rarely responded to my appeals. Keeping hope alive, I believed that when it came down to the final push, she would be there to hold me up. Not. As finally the message was coming through loudly and clearly that I was standing alone in the middle of a dark warehouse for messed up adolescents, I prepared my voluminous copy for the governor's desk. Then I mailed it to his office, telling no one. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.theconservativevoice.com Date: January, 2007)

Staff Thought Teen Was Faking In Prep School Death: WJZ/AP) KEYMAR, Md. Staff at a private residential school for juvenile offenders where a 17-year-old Baltimore youth lost consciousness and died after being restrained, initially believed he was pretending to be asleep, according to the school's report to the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services. As WJZ's Mike Hellgren reports, Isaiah Simmons was pronounced dead at Carroll Hospital Center last week after staff at Bowling Brook Preparatory School, about 40 miles northwest of Baltimore, placed him in prolonged physical restraint confrontation with staff. The death is being investigated by the Carroll County's sheriff's department amid allegations from some witnesses that staff restrained Simmons inappropriately. (Webmaster Note: Just one of hundreds of deaths in this industry. When will the excuse "we thought he was faking" be revealed for what it is? A rationalization for killing.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://wjz.com> Date: January 23, 2007)

Youth restraint challenged: The head of a Maryland association of juvenile programs said yesterday it would be "indefensible" for staff to sit on a struggling youth for three hours to restrain him - something at least four youths have told their lawyers happened last week in the death of a teenage boy at Bowling Brook Preparatory School. But Jim McComb, executive director of the Maryland Association of Resources for Family and Youth, said it isn't clear that such behavior by staff at Bowling Brook - a private residential program for juvenile offenders - would have violated state law. "We have regulations that prescribe what is doable and not doable in every private and public school, and in treatment centers for children with mental and emotional problems. But we don't have anything comparable for children's residential programs," McComb said. The death of Isaiah Simmons, 17, after being restrained by staff at Bowling Brook has raised questions about state law governing privately run facilities, the training required of their staff and the way the state monitors and regulates such programs. The Carroll County Sheriff's Office is investigating the death. For complete story, click here.

Sex Allegations Prompt Methodist Youth Home to Move Teens: VERSAILLES, Ky. (AP) - Officials said a central Kentucky church-affiliated home for troubled youth has moved more than 30 teenagers to other facilities after accusations that a worker had sex with a girl in the home's care. The Rev. Alex Carmichel said the incident between a male employee and the teenage girl led to the firing of that employee as well as another employee who did not immediately report "indicators" that something had happened. Carmichel is the president of the Kentucky United Methodist Homes for Children & Youth in Versailles. Janis Stewart, spokesman for the state Cabinet for Health and Family Services, confirmed that the state Inspector General is investigating the home. For complete story, click here.

Troubled indeed: In his State of the State speech, Gov. Martin O'Malley reserved just two words for Maryland's juvenile justice system - "deeply troubled" - and the governor isn't usually a man of few words. The juvenile offenders in state custody deserve more than a mention, especially after the questionable death Jan. 23 of a 17-year-old boy at the private facility in which the state had placed him. The state's juvenile services system isn't only deeply troubled, it's dysfunctional, understaffed, overwhelmed, inefficient, poorly funded, ill-equipped and, most alarming, impervious to change. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.baltimoresun.com February 4, 2004)

Davenport boot camp scrutinized for resident treatment: DAVENPORT, Iowa (AP) -- A boot camp for delinquent boys is under scrutiny after a state investigation showed its juveniles often went hungry, were subjected to corporal punishment and were sometimes denied timely access to the bathroom. SUMMIT's troubles come five years after former director John Bolsinger was charged with molesting teenage boys under his watch. He was convicted and is serving a prison sentence scheduled to end in 2012. The camp's latest problems were documented in a state report based on interviews and an onsite inspection last month. For complete story, click here.

Chinese clinic treats teen internet addicts with hypnosis, shock therapy: According to the Post, one clinic in the Beijing suburb of Daxing keeps some of its 12 to 17-year-old patients locked in rooms with barred windows for most of the day, treating them with a combination of counseling, medication, and military-style discipline. While some residents clearly have no need for such a facility -- one young man who only surfed four to five hours a week said he came to Daxing to "get away from my parents" -- there do seem to be more hardcore cases of lonely individuals spending all their free time online at the expense of their careers and social lives. At the Daxing clinic, these troubled teens whose "souls are gone to the online world" are housed together on the third floor of the building, where they are subjected to hypnosis and even mild shock therapy in an attempt to rid them of their love of surfing. It's not really clear from the article what the success rate is for veterans of the clinic, but we imagine many of them find the conditions so distasteful that they swear off technology altogether simply for fear of being sent back. (Webmaster Note: It's happening in the U.S. too! Manchurian Candidate, try Manchurian World!) For complete story, click here.

Committee looks into sex abuse claims at youth prison: AUSTIN — Allegations that troubled youths at a West Texas juvenile prison were sexually preyed on by staff members despite repeated warnings to supervisors are "the tip of the iceberg" in a system where "wrongdoing is becoming the norm," a state senator said Monday. Sen. Juan "Chuy" Hinojosa, D-McAllen, said his office has received 90 allegations of Texas Youth Commission staff members sexually assaulting juvenile offenders since 2000, with only a few instances of disciplinary action taken. "This is a problem all over the state," said Hinojosa, vice chairman of the Senate Criminal Justice Committee, which today will hear testimony on the sex abuse allegations in the state-run facilities. For complete story, click here.

Three Teens Arrested for Rape at School for Troubled Kids: MOUNT PLEASANT, N.Y. (AP) -- Staffers at a school for the emotionally disturbed conducted their own investigation of a 13-year-old girl's rape and even tried to collect evidence before reporting the attack, a police chief said Tuesday. "I'm not certain it's criminal but it's certainly not advisable," said Mount Pleasant police Chief Louis Alagno. "They should be calling, notifying the police and calling in the professionals." He said the school delayed calling police for nearly four hours after the Monday night attack at the Hawthorne-Cedar Knolls School in Hawthorne, about 25 miles north of New York City. Three teenage boys were arrested and charged as adults. For complete story, click here.

O'Malley criticizes juvenile officials: Gov. Martin O'Malley sharply criticized juvenile authorities yesterday for failing to respond to a school nurse's formal complaint last year about mistreatment of youths at the Bowling Brook Preparatory School, where a Baltimore teenager later died. "It's just unacceptable that a health professional would notify authorities there were problems and they didn't follow up," O'Malley said. The Sun reported yesterday that Bowling Brook's nurse notified the state Department of Juvenile Services in August that a youth had been badly bruised and scraped while being restrained by staff members. Five months later, 17-year-old Isaiah Simmons of East Baltimore died after being similarly restrained at the privately run residential program for juvenile offenders. Bowling Brook officials responded to the publication of nurse Janis Miller's complaint by imposing a gag order on the school's employees, threatening to fire any who speak to the press. Nancy Forster, the state's chief public defender, urged Bowling Brook employees to speak candidly to police and investigators, even if workers choose to abide by the gag order. "Whether or not employees of Bowling Brook speak to the press is inconsequential," Forster said. "What is important is that those employees feel free to ... cooperate fully with those investigating Isaiah's death and the reported mistreatment of other children there." For complete story, click here.

Claims about 'orphans' key in shady adoptions: ...Federal authorities say the FOC scam involved more than 80 children - eight to 10 of whom were placed in Utah - and began no later than March 2002 and operated until June 2005. The birth parents believed the youngsters were being temporarily placed in U.S. homes and would return when they reached adulthood, according to the indictment. Instead, FOC placed the children permanently with U.S. parents, the indictment says. Facing federal charges are Scott and Karen Banks, of Wellsville; Dan Wakefield, of Utah; Tagaloa Ieti, of Samoa; Julie Tuiletufuga, of Samoa; Coleen Bartlett of Evanston, Wyo.; and Karalee Thornock, of Tooele. The defendants are charged with conspiracy, immigration violations - including visa fraud - and money laundering. The maximum prison terms for the offenses range from five years to 20 years. Wakefield, who for years lived in Samoa, will have an initial appearance Monday at 9:30 a.m. in U.S. Magistrate Judge Sam Alba's courtroom. FOC charged adoption fees of $13,000 for one child and $20,000 for two. In addition, adoptive parents had to pay other expenses, including the cost of traveling to New Zealand to file immigration forms at the U.S. consulate there. The agency reportedly persuaded Samoan parents to turn over their children to FOC, offering money, food and other "humanitarian assistance" and promises the children would be educated abroad and later returned home. The agency also allegedly claimed to be affiliated with the U.S. government or The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the indictment said. At least one of those charged has ties to another troubled venture. Wakefield was a partner in New Hope Academy, a residential treatment facility set up in Apia, Samoa, in mid-1998. It closed just months later, stranding five teens. Wakefield blamed the failure of New Hope Academy on a consultant it hired, Steve Cartisano, who left Utah after a teen died in a wilderness therapy program he founded. The indictment alleges Wakefield lied to Samoans and adoptive parents about the circumstances surrounding the adoptions, the conditions in which the children lived and why their birth parents would relinquish them. Allegedly, he and other recruiters also actively solicited and pressured Samoan parents to give their children up for adoption. (Unable to locate complete story at time of archiving. Source: www.sltrib.com Date: March 3, 2007)

Police investigate claims of sexual abuse at 22 Texas youth prisons: AUSTIN, Texas — Police were sent to 22 Texas Youth Commission facilities and the agency headquarters Tuesday to investigate claims that young inmates were sexually abused and that agency officials covered it up. Jay Kimbrough, appointed by the governor to look into the allegations at a West Texas youth prison, said the officers would conduct interviews at the prisons and halfway houses, secure equipment and collect documents if necessary. He also issued a warning to agency employees. "If you are part of this gig, you need to move on or we're going to find you and prosecute you," Kimbrough said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.usatoday.com Date: March 6, 2007)

ACLU lawsuits seek release of kids from immigrant detention center: The American Civil Liberties Union said today that it has filed lawsuits on behalf of 10 immigrant children, challenging their detention at the T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility, an immigrant detention center in Taylor. The lawsuits filed in federal district court in Austin charge that the children are being held under inhumane and prison-like conditions while their parents await immigration decisions. They name U.S. Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and five officials with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "There is simply no justification for imprisoning innocent children who pose no threat to anyone," Vanita Gupta, ACLU lawyer, said at a press conference in Austin. "This is an affront to our core values as a nation. We need practical, realistic immigration policy, not draconian methods that are harming vulnerable kids." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.statesman.com Date: March 7, 2007)

High-powered therapy targets troubled teens, families: ...Unlike detention centers, boot camps or some other youth programs, multi-systemic therapy doesn't isolate the teens. Rather, it deals with them in their own environment. Therapists visit the juvenile's family, relatives, neighborhood and school several times a week, keeping the youths away from undesirable peers and making sure they stay in school. The therapists also help the parents set rules. It's a tough job that puts them on call 24 hours a day. Sometimes they respond in the middle of the night, often in unsafe neighborhoods. In about 60 percent of cases, officials say, a single parent is raising several children while overburdened with two or three jobs, leaving little time or energy to deal with a difficult teen. "A lot of these children do not have good relationships with their parents," said Linda Baker, who supervises the four therapists in the Bergen County programs... (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.northjersey.com Date: March 14, 2007)

Area teen learns tough lesson through door-to-door sales: Pope spent six months in an industry under growing scrutiny for allegations that its young sales people are encouraged to spin stories to meet quotas and are either induced or coerced to stay on the job by easy access to drugs, limited access to their paychecks and mental and even physical abuse from managers. Earlene Williams, whose organization Parent Watch Inc. filed a racketeering lawsuit against the door-to-door magazine sales industry in 1982, says she has been trying for 25 years to get Congress to end the industry's exemption from labor practices laws. For complete story, click here.

Ex-employees question safety for troubled teens at rehab facility: PHOENIX A lockdown rehabilitation facility for troubled teens in north Chandler is under fire from former employees who claim the place is plagued by violence, poor management and lax care. Several say they are in talks with child advocates at the Arizona Center for Disability Law and are seeking legal action against the facility. Also named is the facility's operator, Austin, Texas-based Youth and Family Centered Services. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://kvoa.com> Date: March 17, 2007)

Ivy Ridge students run away: Police went door to door, even buggy to buggy, looking for the missing boys. "If you see them, let someone know," a trooper said. Early Monday morning, four students ran free from the Academy at Ivy Ridge, a school for troubled teens. Tom Nichols, Academy at Ivy Ridge Spokesperson, said, "These individuals forced their way out of the building and the dorm parents tried to stop them and there were just a few individuals who managed to get outside the building." (Webmaster Note: Run boys run!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://news10now.com> Date: March 19, 2007)

Abuse trial ends deadlocked: A Charlottesville jury deadlocked Monday on the question of whether a former mental health specialist at Whisper Ridge sexually abused two girls receiving treatment at the facility for troubled teens. After three and a half hours of deliberation, the 10-woman, two-man panel revealed it was hopelessly deadlocked in the case of Bryan Antwann Vaughan, one of five former Whisper Ridge employees charged with misconduct. Vaughan, 32, faces 10 years in prison if he's convicted on two counts of custodial sex abuse in December 2005 and January 2006. Prosecutors will seek to try Vaughan again for the charges, according to Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney Elizabeth Killeen. Vaughan's was the first of five cases stemming from allegations of abuse at Whisper Ridge, a facility that had previously changed names but remains plagued by allegations of misconduct in recent years. Formerly known as the Brown Schools, Whisper Ridge is a 60-bed facility on Arlington Boulevard that provides psychiatric care for 13- to 17-year-olds suffering from mental health or drug abuse problems. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.dailyprogress.com Date: March, 2007)

Teen terror? British society confronts its fear of the young: ...The government has its own lexicon for dealing with troubled teens, from NEETS - young people "not in employment, education or training" - to ASBOs, or "anti-social behavior orders," used to control the wayward... With such an attitude, children's advocates say, it's no surprise Britain placed last in a recent UNICEF survey of children's well-being in 21 developed countries. A British think tank has a catchy term for it: pedophobia. "There has always been a culture in Britain that's a bit anti- children," said Julia Margo, one of the authors of a report on British youth for the Institute for Public Policy Research, a center-left think tank. "In the newspaper letters pages, you see constant debates about noisy children on trains." "There are (also) a great number of children on the streets without anything to do," she said. "This is what's contributing to pedophobia." The institute's research found that British adults, more than those in other European countries, view teenagers as a menace. Britons were much less likely to intervene than those in other countries if they saw teens vandalizing a bus shelter - 34 percent said they would try to stop it, compared with 65 percent of Germans and 52 percent of Spaniards. Surprisingly, many kids share that view. It turns out that they're afraid of each other. The group of hoodie-wearing skateboarders honing their skills on the concrete steps and sidewalks of London's financial district may appear just the type to annoy their elders... The UNICEF report, released in February, said Britain's young people were the unhappiest in the developed world. While Britain sat in the middle of the table for health and safety, it came second from bottom - just above the United States - for child poverty, and last in "family and peer relationships," which measured indicators such as single-parent families and time spent with friends and family. In the UNICEF study, only 40 percent of British respondents said they found their peers "kind and helpful," compared with more than 80 percent in Switzerland. British youth scored on top for risky behavior such as drinking, drug use and sex. Almost a third of 11- to 15-year-olds reported having been drunk twice or more, the highest level of any country surveyed. The report claimed a country's wealth was not a sufficient guarantee of happy children, saying there is "no strong or consistent relationship between per capita GDP and child well-being." Britain's poor performance may be one of the downsides of the country's embrace of American-style free-market competition - a move that has unleashed enormous economic energy since the 1980s, but widened inequalities and left many without a safety net. The countries that scored highest - the Netherlands and the Nordic countries of Sweden, Denmark and Finland - displayed relatively low poverty rates with supportive networks of family and friends and low levels of risky behavior by teens. (Webmaster Note: So, basically, a sick over-capitalistic society that puts profit over people creates unhappy, unhealthy, and therefore "troubled" children and families. Let's keep that in mind and stop the "pedophobia" and scapegoating of society's ills onto those most powerless to change things, our children. See "Reclaiming Our Children" by Dr. Peter Breggin for solutions.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.azcentral.com Date: March 20, 2007)

ADHD drug use for youth obesity raises ethical questions: ...Several pediatricians contacted by CNN say they suspect other pediatricians are prescribing ADHD medications off label for weight loss. "No one admits it," says Dr. John Lantos, professor of pediatrics at the University of Chicago. "It's morally and medically questionable, so I don't think anyone's proud of doing this." The Food and Drug Administration warns that some patients on ADHD drugs with pre-existing heart problems have suffered sudden death. The agency also warns that some on Adderall develop psychiatric problems, such as hearing voices and becoming manic. Pediatricians like Lantos say it's wrong to prescribe Adderall for weight loss when risks are known and the benefits are questionable. The drug has never been studied for weight loss, so they suggest that Ziai's success stories may be anecdotal. "Doctors who prescribe this could end up killing kids by giving them a medication that doesn't work for the reason they're prescribing," Lantos says. (Webmaster Note: Parents and pediatricians put kids on amphetamines as "treatment" for quack diseases of ADD/ADHD (see www.ablechild.org), yet, punish their children for using amphetamines recreationally... Hmmmm... Hypocrisy? Are parents and doctors creating lifelong addictions through pharmaceuticals as opposed to environmental/social/psychological/nutritional solutions? Let's stop introducing kids to addictive substances and creating confusion... Okay?) For complete story, click here.

Girl's Overdose Death Raises Questions: HULL, Mass. (AP) - In the final months of Rebecca Riley's life, a school nurse said the little girl was so weak she was like a "floppy doll." The preschool principal had to help Rebecca off the bus because the 4-year-old was shaking so badly. And a pharmacist complained that Rebecca's mother kept coming up with excuses for why her daughter needed more and more medication. None of their concerns was enough to save Rebecca. Rebecca - who had been diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity and bipolar disorder, or what used to be called manic depression - died Dec. 13 of an overdose of prescribed drugs, and her parents have been arrested on murder charges, accused of intentionally overmedicating their daughter to keep her quiet and out of their hair. (Webmaster Note: See www.ablechild.org for alternatives and opposition to ADD/ADHD/ODD diagnoses and medications.) For complete story, click here.

TYC Abuse Scandal Continues To Unravel: The Texas Youth Commission abuse scandal could have been going on for years in secrecy. Dr. Ben Raimor heads UTMB's program to provide medical care to kids in the TYC and brought attention to unusual fractures in TYC inmates three years ago. "We saw a trend and were told corrective action was being taken." The UTMB's findings have been published in a medical journal and turned over to the Inspector General investigating the case. The first top official to be arrested is Jerome Parsee, Superintendent of the intake facility in Marlin. He is accused of lying to a Texas Ranger about activity in his facility. There are more than 1000 active investigations underway into abuses of TYC kids by prison guards, including over 200 cases of sexual abuse. For complete story, click here.

The great ADHD myth: The psychiatrist who identified attention deficit disorder - the condition blamed for the bad behaviour of hundreds of thousands of children - has admitted that many may not really be ill. Dr Robert Spitzer said that up to 30 per cent of youngsters classified as suffering from disruptive and hyperactive conditions could have been misdiagnosed. They may simply be showing perfectly normal signs of being happy or sad, he said. 'Many of these conditions might be normal reactions which are not really disorders,' he continued. Dr Spitzer developed the bible of mental disorder classification in the 1970s and 1980s, which identified dozens of new conditions including ADD and obsessive-compulsive disorder. Since then hundreds of thousands of children have been diagnosed with ADD, a behavioural disorder linked to poor attention span, and ADHD, which adds an element of hyperactivity. The disorders describe disruptive and restless behaviour that results in children having difficulty focusing their attention on specific tasks. ADHD is most commonly noticed at the age of five, and as many as one in 30 British children is said to have it. It is often treated with drugs, with Ritalin being the most commonly prescribed. Some scientists say ADHD is a genetic disorder that does not disappear with adulthood. But sceptics believe the diagnosis is a 'biobabble' label, which has evolved from a soundbite culture that is too prepared to medicalise anti-social human traits. Dr Spitzer, professor of psychiatry at Columbia University in New York, now says the classification led to many people being diagnosed as medically disordered when their mood swings and behaviour were simply normal feelings of happiness and sadness. For complete story, click here.

Every child to be screened for risk of turning criminal under Blair justice plan: A new-style "11-plus" to assess the risk every child in Britain runs of turning to crime was among a battery of proposals unveiled in Tony Blair's crime plan yesterday. The children of prisoners, problem drug users and others at high risk of offending will also face being "actively managed" by social services and youth justice workers.* New technologies are to be used to boost police detection rates while DNA samples are to be taken from any crime suspect who comes into contact with the police. The "early intervention" approach is part of a package of proposals on security, crime and justice produced by Downing Street which underline the scale of criminal justice reform Mr Blair believes is still needed despite passing 53 law and order bills since he came to power in 1997. The shadow home secretary, David Davis, focused his criticism on the extension of the DNA database to any crime suspect and the early intervention plans for children. He described the proposal to assess every child for risk of offending as the "nanny state gone mad" while he said the Conservatives would have "great and grave concerns" about any extension of the DNA database. For complete story, click here.

At Some Youth 'Treatment' Facilities, 'Tough Love' Takes Brutal Forms: If this was therapy, it sure didn't feel like it. From September to January, Claire Kent spent her days digging up tree stumps from a barren field, her mind and body battered by the elements. The work was part of her "treatment" for the drinking and sex that had landed her at a boarding school for "troubled teens." In the Montana woods, Kent and a couple dozen other adolescent girls had been committed by their families to a disciplinary program that included chopping wood, exercising to the point of physical breakdown, and being regularly bullied and insulted by "counselors" all in the name of what the private treatment industry calls "emotional growth." "It was just based on, 'How badly can I scare you?'," said Kent, now in her late twenties and still suffering from anxiety that she attributes to her experience. During her two-year stay, she said, "they gave me the reality that life was just completely unfair and was going to keep being that way." The facility where Kent was held, the Mission Mountain School, is still in business today. Though staff declined repeated requests for comment, the recent explosion of hundreds of other so-called "private residential treatment facilities" speaks to the growing popularity of the "tough love" approach to "reforming" youth. Behavioral health experts estimate that the industry deals with roughly 10,000 to 14,000 children and teens, charging typical tuition rates of tens of thousands of dollars per year. The patrons are anxious parents hoping for a solution to issues ranging from attention deficit disorder to drug abuse. Worth approximately $1 billion, emotional growth programs thrive on the promise of turning "bad" kids "good." ALSO see: Behavior Modification Money Trail: Government connections enable "teen help" industry to thwart regulation...Growing alongside the teen "help" industry is the political and legal backlash against tactics that some view as cruel and bizarre. In recent years, several facilities have closed following abuse investigations. Activists are also promoting the End Institutionalized Abuse Against Children Act, which would fund state and local monitoring of treatment facilities, along with the Keeping Families Together Act, which would enhance access to community-based behavioral healthcare. Yet youth advocates and former program participants caution that legislative action would merely dent the complex culture surrounding institutions that aim to "fix" youth...Advocates calling for tighter regulation of residential facilities say that some programs bank on desperation and lure parents with deceptive advertising. Critics of the industry say consultants and recruiters market programs to families by rapidly "diagnosing" serious emotional problems in children and sometimes offering help in securing a fast tuition loan. Meanwhile, parents are left unaware that the program is not clinically licensed, or lacks an adequate trained staff. Nicki Bush, a psychology graduate student who interned at a rural residential treatment facility, said administrators convinced parents to sink their savings into behavioral treatment that their children supposedly needed. While many children did have serious psychological disorders, she observed it was not uncommon for kids to end up at the facility "because they were having sex with some 20-year-old guy, and [the parents] found a joint, or something like that." Cristine Gomez, one of the plaintiffs in the WWASPS lawsuit, said aggressive marketing persuaded her to send her son, who was having trouble in school and suffering from attention deficit disorder, first to Spring Creek Lodge and eventually to Tranquility Bay. She told TNS, "I took for granted that they were licensed and regulated. I assumed that somebody was keeping track of basic indications of the safety of the children." In the end, troubling letters describing the conditions in the Jamaica facility compelled her to bring her son home. Four years later, she said he suffers from deep psychological trauma and refuses to speak openly about the experience. Calling the decision to send her son away "the biggest mistake I ever made in my life," Gomez said, "It's just the opposite of what our intent was, what we were sold."...Mental health advocacy groups say that in order to prevent mistreatment, the government must hold private treatment facilities to some clinically based standard of care. As an initial step, they are pushing the End Institutionalized Abuse Against Children bill, which would provide seed money to develop state-level regulations. While some service providers, including WWASPS, have publicly supported moderate state-based regulation, the industry group National Association of Therapeutic Schools and Programs has contended that bureaucratic monitoring could hinder innovation, and that the government should defer to the industry's own internally developed guidelines. But Robert Friedman, chair of the Department of Child and Family Studies at the University of South Florida, warned that given the evidence of mistreatment, "there's a danger that if left to self-regulate there may be the illusion that there's adequate accountability. And that, in some cases, could be worse than at least not having any illusion."...But enhancing treatment options is only part of the picture, according to Shelby Earnshaw, who underwent a behavior modification program as a teen and now directs the advocacy association International Survivors Action Committee. What fuels the private treatment industry, she argued, is a societal willingness to stigmatize youth with behavioral problems. For complete story, click here.

Child Psychiatrist Accused of Molesting: SAN MATEO, Calif. -- A child psychiatrist who once headed the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry was arrested amid allegations he had molested male patients dating back to the 1960s. Dr. William Ayres, 75, was taken into custody Thursday at his San Mateo home and charged with 14 felony counts of lewd and lascivious acts with a child under 14. The charges involve multiple victims, but authorities declined to say how many. The arrest followed a four-year investigation. Ayres, a prominent psychiatrist who retired last year, had been honored in 2002 by the San Mateo board of supervisors with a lifetime achievement award for "his tireless effort to improve the lives of children and adolescents." He also served as president of the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry from 1993 to 1995. "The real tragedy here is that parents entrusted their children to this doctor for help, and they were victimized while in his care," San Mateo police Capt. Mike Callagy said. "That's so tragic." (Webmaster Note: And, tragically, NOT uncommon) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chicagotribune.com Date: April 6, 2007)

2 Juvenile Justice Employees Fired After Teen Is Choked, Thrown: TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- Two Department of Juvenile Justice employees will be fired after an ongoing investigation revealed the use of inappropriate force that knocked an 18-year-old resident unconscious at a Marianna facility, department Secretary Walt McNeil said Friday. The investigation into the incident has made it clear that the Arthur G. Dozier School for Boys has widespread deficiencies, McNeil said. The department has made management changes and hired an independent consulting firm to oversee the facility, which is a high-risk residence currently housing 162 boys from 14 to 21 years of age. "We recognize that there are systemic operational problems at our Dozier facility that span the chain of command from top to bottom," McNeil said. "It is clear that we have to act decisively to change the culture of our Dozier facility." On Feb. 11, resident Justin Caldwell was choked and thrown to the floor by Alvin Speights, a residential officer at the Dozier school, McNeil said. On the way down, Caldwell hit his head on a table and was knocked unconscious. For complete story, click here.

SON OF A BITCH: THE grandfather of Cho Seung-Hui said yesterday: "Son of a bitch. It serves him right he died with his victims." Kim Hyang-Sik, 82, said he had a doom-laden dream of Cho's parents the night of his murderous rampage - and woke to hear the news of the massacre and his grandson's death. He watched Cho's sick video of himself holding a gun to his head. His sister Kim Yang-Sun, 85, who also saw it, told the Mirror that afterwards her brother was so distraught he had "gone away for a few days to calm himself down and avoid more questions". She too repeatedly referred to the killer as "son of a bitch" or "ahole" and said his mother Kim Hyang-Yim had problems with him from infancy. (Webmaster Note: See how cruel, demeaning, and hateful families create disturbed children. See how they take no responsibility for their hateful and cruel ways and blame the innocent child. See how they send him to involuntary behavior modification treatment. See how cruel families and institutionalization creates a mass murderer. Now, how many are responsible for the massacre?) For complete story, click here.

How Free is Free Speech?: ...Over the course of time, I discovered (Sue) Scheff referred families to the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP) before becoming their competitor. I learned Sue Scheff was also responsible for placing kids into unregulated and risky programs. I discovered Sue Scheff does not have the education or professional credentials that qualify her to determine if a program is safe and meets the necessary requirements to treat at-risk teens. When I learned of Sue Scheff's prior affiliation with WWASP and realized Scheff was doing the same things she accused WWASP of doing, I shared that publicly on internet bulletin boards, specifically www.fornits.com. Sue Scheff sued me for defamation of character. She claims that the words I used to describe her business and business associates caused her harm. What she shares with the public is the names and terms I used when describing her and the industry as a whole. I used terms such as "ed con", "fraud" etc. What she doesn't share with the public is why I used these terms. And the why is what this case is all about... (Webmaster Note: Anyone or any organization that works with PURE or CAICA, or works under the guise of helping families while fraudulently making money off the illegal incarceration, false imprisonment, and torture of children is a shill for the "troubled teen" industry and should not be trusted by the survivor community or the public.) For complete story, click here.

HISD claims charter 'falsified records': APRIL 28th, 2007-- An HISD charter school for at-risk teenagers inflated its attendance by more than 200 students last year and must now repay the extra $358,000 in state funding that it pocketed for those students, Houston school district officials said Friday. ALTA Academy "falsified records either by intention, improperly trained staff or by failure to perform its due diligence," according to a report by the HISD inspector general's office. Allegations levied last year by a former ALTA employee led to the investigation. Though leaders of the southeast Houston campus admit to some recordkeeping mistakes, they said they plan to appeal the $358,000 repayment figure to the school board. "I am deeply troubled and embarrassed about the allegations and subsequent findings," said Roberto Gonzalez, manager of Houston-based School House Management, a for-profit company that runs the school. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: April 28, 2007)

PAC donations from Utah raise doubts in Maine: May 6th, 2007--At $250,000, it was the largest private contribution of the 2006 Maine governor's race, helping to pay for TV commercials supporting Republican Chandler Woodcock in his bid to unseat Democratic Gov. John Baldacci. But the money didn't come from a donor in Portland, Lewiston or Bangor. State records show that it came from a small city near Zion National Park in southwestern Utah, from a contributor listed as RECAF Inc. What is RECAF Inc.? And why did it donate $250,000 to a political action committee established in Maine by the national Republican Governors Association? There is no sign of any such company at the firm's listed address. But the paper trail links RECAF to a controversial network of treatment centers for troubled teenagers affiliated with Robert B. Lichfield, a fundraiser for Republican Mitt Romney's presidential campaign. Among Maine political contributions, the RECAF payment stands out. It raises questions about the effectiveness of both Maine's Clean Elections law, which is designed to reduce the influence of money in politics, and of disclosure requirements, which are meant to identify donors to the public. And it illustrates how the stream of unregulated money through the U.S. electoral system allows out-of-state donors with no apparent stake to have the potential to shape the outcome of Maine elections. (Webmaster Note: The "teen help" industry is enmeshed in politics and works to undermine democracy at every turn. From violating the civil and human rights of families and children...And, using brainwashing techniques to convert children and families to their political/social/religious beliefs...To "buying" our representatives, using wealth to quash regulatory laws, and shutting down any attempt to effectively regulate their abusive, torturous, and deadly industry. Bush Administration liaisons recently applauded the abusive and torturous methods used at Provo Canyon School and other programs affiliated with NATSAP, a shill "accreditation" agency founded and regulated by "teen help" industry leaders. Andrea Barthwell, associate of George W. Bush, spoke at this event stating, "While H.R. 1738 is a bill to 'End Institutionalized Abuse Against Children' and intends to improve the quality of care in therapeutic settings serving our young people, its most recent iteration could have caused a collapse of the system of care that your clients depend upon." As you can see, regulation of this industry will cause its collapse because it is nothing more than an industry of fraud, abuse, torture, and death. Just say "NO" to behavior modification!) For complete story, click here.

Electroshock Children: The estimated 1 in 155 children in the U.S. said to be autistic, represent an untapped and apparently growing market waiting to be exploited by the electroshock (ECT) industry. And now a first move has been made. At least two electroshock proponents are promoting the notion that ECT may be an effective treatment for children diagnosed as autistic. Psychiatrists D.M. Dhossche and S. Stanfill (Department of Psychiatry and Human Behavior, University of Mississippi Medical Center, Jackson) have recommended that "All child specialists -- psychiatrists, neurologists, psychologists, and developmental pediatricians -- should independently review the feasibility, potential, and risk of using ECT in autism." To back their recommendation, the psychiatrists wrote, "ECT is considered as a safe, effective, and life-saving treatment in people of all ages who suffer from affective disorder, acute psychosis, and, in particular, catatonia. There are recent speculations that certain types of autism may be the earliest expression of catatonia and that both disorders have identical risk factors. Therefore, ECT may improve autism and, if started early enough, may prevent further development of autistic symptoms in some children. The use of ECT in autism has never been systematically assessed. There have been two large ECT studies in children in the 1940s. Autism was not assessed in these studies because the autistic syndrome was just then being recognized as a separate entity. Findings from these studies add little to the hypothesis that ECT may be effective in autistic children, but attest to the safety and feasibility of ECT in children.... Unless anti-ECT prejudice can be overcome, it is unlikely that any ECT trial in autism is forthcoming. Research areas that may support the hypothesis that ECT is effective in autism should be pursued." ("Could ECT Be Effective in Autism?" Medical Hypotheses, 63(3):371-6, January 2004) Dhossche and Stanfill have falsified and omitted certain key facts about ECT. Not only is electroshock unhelpful, it is also a memory-destroying, intelligence-lowering brain-damaging, and life-threatening procedure that has worsened the lives of millions of people since its introduction almost 70 years ago. For complete story, click here.

Psychiatrists, Children and Drug Industry's Role: When Anya Bailey developed an eating disorder after her 12th birthday, her mother took her to a psychiatrist at the University of Minnesota who prescribed a powerful antipsychotic drug called Risperdal. Created for schizophrenia, Risperdal is not approved to treat eating disorders, but increased appetite is a common side effect and doctors may prescribe drugs as they see fit. Anya gained weight but within two years developed a crippling knot in her back. She now receives regular injections of Botox to unclench her back muscles. She often awakens crying in pain. Isabella Bailey, Anya's mother, said she had no idea that children might be especially susceptible to Risperdal's side effects. Nor did she know that Risperdal and similar medicines were not approved at the time to treat children, or that medical trials often cited to justify the use of such drugs had as few as eight children taking the drug by the end. Just as surprising, Ms. Bailey said, was learning that the university psychiatrist who supervised Anya's care received more than $7,000 from 2003 to 2004 from Johnson & Johnson, Risperdal's maker, in return for lectures about one of the company's drugs. Doctors, including Anya Bailey's maintain that payments from drug companies do not influence what they prescribe for patients. But the intersection of money and medicine, and its effect on the well-being of patients, has become one of the most contentious issues in health care. Nowhere is that more true than in psychiatry, where increasing payments to doctors have coincided with the growing use in children of a relatively new class of drugs known as atypical antipsychotics. These best-selling drugs, including Risperdal, Seroquel, Zyprexa, Abilify and Geodon, are now being prescribed to more than half a million children in the United States to help parents deal with behavior problems despite profound risks and almost no approved uses for minors. For complete story, click here.

Fat camp 'horribly damaging': May 20th, 2007--OBESE teenagers taking part in a new weight-loss show could be left psychologically scarred, health experts warn. Channel 10's Teen Fit Camp will follow the journey of six obese Australian teenagers at an American boot camp, where food is controlled and exercise is unavoidable. The show was titled Teen Fat Camp, but was changed to avoid controversy. Dieticians and psychologists say the show is exploiting overweight youngsters for the sake of entertainment. For complete story, click here.

Question troubled teens' treatment: June 1st, 2007--...Dr. Derele Miller, a leading child and adolescent psychiatrist at Northwestern University, said: "The truth is that too many people are making money and not enough concern about the effects on children. Many parents have forgotten to be parents." Everybody wants two Volvos and a suburban home. The narcissism of the '60s has led America to abandon limits for their children and disregard the concept of self-sacrifice. Americans are now searching out experts for every kind of thing, how to manage their children. In 1989 research at the University of Michigan found that as many as 75 percent of adolescent psychiatric hospitalizations are inappropriate during a long-term stay in a hospital...In any case, there should be a lot of investigating before a child is placed with the services of many of the burgeoning clinics. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://news.galvestondailynews.com> Date: June 1, 2007)

Teacher, Aide Accused Of Sex With Troubled Teens: June 4th, 2007--ORANGE COUNTY—A teacher and teacher's aide at a New York school for troubled children have been charged with performing sexual acts on two 16-year-old boys during a Memorial Day weekend of sex capades at a house in New Windsor. Rebecca Becker (left), 28, of Walden and teacher's aide Maria E. Zurita (right), 28, of New Windsor who worked at McQuade Children's Services, are facing charges of third degree rape and endangering the welfare of a child. They have been terminated by the school which serves children who have been referred by family court, social service agencies and school districts from Westchester, Rockland, Putnam, Orange, Dutchess, Ulster and Sullivan Counties. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.northcountrygazette.org Date: June 4, 2007)

Site recruits summer-camp predators: June 6th, 2007--Now, get ready for this mom and dad. Make sure you prepare Jane and Jimmy with mace and a sawed off shotgun when they leave for summer camp. Several months ago, I received an email from retired Lt. Col. Dave Grossman, U.S. Army, one of the nation's leading law enforcement trainers. Lt. Col. Grossman stumbled on a massive cache of children and "teens" enslaved by the business of prostitution we now dub Internet pornography. He then started looking for the government justice agency that would clean out the vipers nests and help these youngsters. "The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children line doesn't seem to be set up for anything but reporting a single URL," he said. "The matter is a little more complex than that." He discovered that one site links to another (feeder) site and another to another until finally staring up at you, here in the USA, are thousands of very young brutally violated girls – modern sexual slavery. I checked out Grossman's "first-level feeders" several times and landed at an "incest" site. The pimping incest site, however, also advertised a list of bona fide "teenage camps." How could that be? The incest feeder site claims to have "3,056,886 listings" of pedophiles and pederasts who enjoy sadosexual violence, degradation, child sexual abuse and such activities. How many of those 3 million-plus deviants will visit or apply for work in those "teen camps"? On the "incest" site, predators can link to a teenage science camp and then to a teenage wilderness camp. The "incest" site links their "community" of sexual deviants to a camp for "troubled children" and another for "struggling teens." Professorial pedophiles might apply to "academic camps" or become advisers and counselors at "teen adventure" camps on the site. Some might try the "boot camps" or "travel camps," etc. Clerical predators could volunteer at the Christian teen camps that are advertised. The link is there, phone numbers, all the information any sexual psychopath needs. For complete story, click here.

Cook County chaos: June 6th, 2007--The Cook County Juvenile Temporary Detention Center is out of control. Children languish there like warehoused animals, while millions of dollars are wasted on do-nothing jobs filled by unqualified workers and patronage stooges. ... Kids live in filthy surroundings, with little guidance, under the supervision of workers whose behaviors cheat the residents even more than they cheat Cook County taxpayers. That's how this page described Cook County's juvenile center in August 2005. Nothing has changed since then. In the last two years a slew of experts has detailed that the facility, which houses children ages 10 to 17 who are accused of crimes, remains plagued by filth, professional incompetence and dangerous conditions. Children at the center face "an alarming risk of suicide and inadequate mental health services" and "a climate of fear and violence," say attorneys who represent them. Kids are beaten by staff members and other kids. Attorneys point to "a culture of chaos and incompetence" and "a persistent failure to provide basic necessities." More than four years ago, the federal court mandated a step-by-step plan to rescue the juvenile center. Cook County leaders agreed to that plan, but they have utterly failed to honor the agreement. And now things have reached a perilous state. For complete story, click here.

FDA grants priority to test antipsychotic drug for use by teens: June 6th, 2007--Bristol-Myers Squibb yesterday announced its application to market Abilify for schizophrenia to teenagers was granted priority review by the Food and Drug Administration. If approved, it would keep Bristol-Myers in step with its competitors and expand the market for Abilify, whose sales last year surged 41 percent to $1.3 billion. Eli Lilly announced last month it received conditional approval to market its schizophrenia drug, Zyprexa, to adolescents. Johnson and Johnson's application has been pending since December to sell Risperdal, its schizophrenia and bipolar disorder therapy, to teens. While no drugs are currently approved in the U.S. to treat schizophrenia in adolescents, all three medicines awaiting FDA approval, known as atypical antipsychotics, are widely prescribed off label for teenagers, despite concerns about side effects, including weight gain and involuntary movement syndromes. Antipsychotics rang up $18.2 billion in sales last year, with Risperdal accounting for $4.6 billion of the total, according to IMS Health, a pharmaceutical information clearinghouse in the United Kingdom. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.nj.com Date: June 6, 2007)

DCFS pulls teens from school: June 12th, 2007--ROCKFORD, Ill. -- The Illinois Department of Children and Family Services is pulling 22 teenagers out of a Rockford residential school called The Mill as it investigates recent incidents there -- a move that may threaten the nonprofit facility's future. Officials at the treatment facility for emotionally and mentally troubled youth recently reported an allegation by one female resident that another female resident had been having sex with a male staff member. The staff member also allegedly gave both girls marijuana. "Less than 24 hours later, I got a call from DCFS saying they were going to begin to remove all of their youth from The Mill," said Jim Spruyt, president of facility. "It shocked me. I was stunned." Spruyt said the state's action would force the center's closure, putting 110 staff members out of work. For complete story, click here.

Taking Time to Save Our Teens: June 15th, 2007 (July, 2007 Issue)--...What is the cause of messed-up teens? We could point the finger at many things: our failing school systems, the entertainment industry, the music industry, drug pushers, pornography, violent video games or any other modern malady. But the stark truth is that the main cause for troubled teens is troubled parents. Too many parents are so self-absorbed and caught up in their own personal crises that they can't focus on the right rearing of teens. To save our teens, parents must take on their God-given responsibility to nurture, love, lead, teach and discipline their children. Let's face it: We have become the generation that has abandoned our teens. Mr. Armstrong warned about the damaging effects of parental neglect. He wrote over 20 years ago, "Family life has undergone a radical revolution! Teens have sex games at home in bed while Dad and Mom are at work. Children do not eat with parents. They seldom go to movies with parents. Parents have their lives, associates and friends apart from the children. Parents never think of teaching children, being with children, maintaining a family relationship! Parental responsibility is totally neglected. In due time parents are going to be brought to account for this neglect of basic responsibility" (The Missing Dimension in Sex). Admitting responsibility for teen neglect is difficult for any parent. Yet it is the only means to an effective solution for our teen crisis... For complete story, click here.

MGH psychiatrist's work stirs debate: June 17th, 2007--...Part of the criticism of Biederman speaks to a deeper issue in psychiatry: the extensive financial ties between the drug industry and researchers. Biederman has received research funding from 15 drug companies and serves as a paid speaker or adviser to seven of them, including Eli Lilly & Co. and Janssen Pharmaceuticals, which make the multi billion-dollar antipsychotic drugs Zyprexa and Risperdal, respectively. Though not much money was earmarked for bipolar research, critics say the resources help him advance his aggressive drug treatment philosophy. Numerous psychiatrists say Riley's overdose suggests that bipolar disorder is becoming a psychiatric fad, leaving thousands of children on risky medications based on symptoms such as chronic irritability and aggressiveness that could have other causes. Riley's father, for example, had only recently returned to the home after being accused of child abuse, according to police. Since the girl's death, state officials have stepped up a review of the 8,343 children taking the latest antipsychotic medications under the Medicaid program for conditions including bipolar disorder, to be sure the treatment is appropriate. Psychiatrists too often prescribe these medications, which carry side effects such as weight gain and heart disease risk, without addressing problems in the children's lives, said Dr. Gordon Harper, director of child and adolescent services at the state Department of Mental Health. He likened the approach to "tuning the piano while the subway is going by."... For complete story, click here.

Lawsuits hit a Romney money man: June 20th, 2007--Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) has collected hundreds of thousands of dollars through the fundraising efforts of a supporter targeted by several lawsuits alleging child abuse. In a lawsuit filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Utah, 133 plaintiffs have alleged that Robert Lichfield, co-chairman of Romney's Utah finance committee owned or operated residential boarding schools for troubled teenagers where students were "subjected to physical abuse, emotional abuse and sexual abuse." (George W. Bush also received much of his financing from Lichfield and other teen torture facility leaders. And you wonder why these programs remain unregulated and protected? Think about it.) For complete story, click here.

Justice Department: Abuse remains at Ohio youth prisons: June 20th, 2007--COLUMBUS, Ohio - A crisis atmosphere continues to exist at a state girls' prison where a dozen guards were indicted in 2005 on charges of sexual assault and inmate abuse, and boys at a second prison remain at risk of excessive force, abuse and trauma, a federal investigation concluded. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.ohio.com Date: June 20, 2007)

Teen ranch evades law: Case shines light on child programs that go unlicensed in Utah: Call it the "problem child" of Utah's teen-help industry. Majestic Ranch in Randolph - one of four Utah boarding schools that cater to troubled teens - has, until recently, failed to become licensed as required by law. It is the only school to fall short of health and safety benchmarks imposed in October 2005. The hang-up: minor changes to an employee handbook, say regulators, who permitted the school to operate without a license for the past 18 months. Regulators say no harm was done; because Majestic is in good standing, they granted the school a probationary license on June 25. But the school's slow road to compliance points to a larger problem with Utah's oversight of adoption agencies, wilderness camps, schools and other programs for vulnerable children: a loophole in state law. Operating these businesses without a license is a class A misdemeanor - but only if someone is harmed, said Ken Stettler, Human Services licensing director. "Usually if it's a new program just coming on, then they simply don't begin operation until they're licensed," said Stettler. "What was uncommon in [Majestic's] case was that we had an existing program that was already operating when the laws went into effect. In this case we don't close them down." But at least one new business venture - an adoption agency - slipped through the loophole. Focus on Children, now defunct and facing federal charges of running a baby smuggling operation in Samoa, did business in Utah for 2 1/2 years without a license. The agency's owners applied in March 2001, but did not submit all the paperwork. After nudging from regulators, they were licensed on August 1, 2003. No one, to Stettler's knowledge, is lobbying to give regulators stronger powers to insist on licensing. Utah's Republican-dominated Legislature has traditionally opposed government meddling in the private sector. "Therapeutic" boarding schools, including 21-year-old Majestic Ranch, went unregulated until 2005. The law defines "therapeutic schools" as serving students "who have a history of failing to function at home or public school" and that offer room and board. Majestic initially fought regulation through its partner World Wide Association of Speciality Programs, a Utah-based chain of get-tough treatment programs. Later, after it came to light that Majestic had been investigated three times for abuse, the boarding school became a proponent of regulation. Only one probe ended in a criminal charge and conviction when a staffer - who was eventually fired - pleaded guilty to misdemeanor assault. Child welfare caseworkers received another complaint of abuse in 2005, but dismissed it as having no merit, said Carol Sisco, Human Services spokeswoman. Tammy Johnson, Majestic Ranch director, said the licensing process has helped foster better relations with the state, but it hasn't changed the school's curricula or practices. "The only thing that changed is we have to file more paperwork; quite a bit more paperwork," said Johnson. Johnson blames some of the licensing delays on regulators who took a year to review Majestic's policies, but stressed, "they've been wonderful to work with." Bad press, stemming from "frivolous" complaints from disgruntled employees, have hurt Majestic, said Johnson. Over the past two years enrollment has dropped from about 60 students to 32, Johnson said. The school caters to 7-to-14-year-olds; annual tuition costs about $42,000. "We lose on average of five kids a month to negative publicity on the Internet. It's unfortunate," said Johnson. "I wouldn't be able to come to work every day if I didn't feel I was making a difference in these families' and students' lives. It's not an easy job." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sltrib.com Date: July 16, 2007)

Mississippi Sued Over Alleged Abuse at Girls Detention Center: July 12th, 2007--JACKSON, Miss. — Girls at a Mississippi detention center were sometimes shackled for 12 hours a day and subjected to "horrendous physical and sexual abuse," a youth advocacy group claims in a federal lawsuit. The Mississippi Youth Justice Project sued the state Wednesday on behalf of six girls, ages 13 to 17, and called for the shutdown of the troubled Columbia Training School. For complete story, click here.

The Police State Takeover Of Schools-Conditioning the kids for their future on the global plantation: July 24th, 2007--Schools have become hi-tech prisons. Children all across America and the UK are being conditioned to accept that they are not free and that they must submit to draconian laws and measures for their own safety. Soon enough children will not even know what it is like to act as a private individual within society. Don't believe this? Read on. All over the United States and Britain children are increasingly being subjected to measures that wouldn't look out of place in maximum security prisons. Everyday we post reports from mainstream news sources documenting this disturbing trend. Today The Philadelphia Inquirer reports that schools across America are banning backpacks that are made of non see-through materials. If students walking between classes want to use a backpack, it must be made of clear plastic or mesh so its contents can be seen at a glance. Cloth backpacks can be carried into the school in the morning but must be stored in lockers. So the students should all now feel much safer due to the fact that they can all see each other's personal items right? Wrong. The move has unleashed a torrent of protest from some Wissahickon students, who say high schools are coming to resemble "prisons or police states," in the words of one. Brandon Hemmen, a senior, said the clear bags will make it easy for thieves who already rip off students every day. And "bags will get mixed up; we'll have to use name tags," he added. "This is wrong. They can't take all our freedoms away." A second item today comes from Security tech website Security Park which reports that Slippery Rock University of Pennsylvania is to deliver the convenience and security of contactless payments by cell phone to students and the faculty. Beginning in July, Slippery Rock University's 8,500 students, faculty and staff will receive a new official campus ID card and a separate contactless token designed for use with their mobile phones. Using either the card or the phone, they will be able to make payments at on-campus locations as well as participating merchants in the surrounding community.... The new mobile phone tokens incorporate the same standards-based contactless technology (ISO 14443) used worldwide by MasterCard, Visa and leading card issuers in the payment and identity sectors. Good, prepare the kids first and then bring in the cashless society nationwide, with an ID card of course, which you will need to be able to buy and sell. We have long warned of the dangers of a cashless society putting total control into the hands of state regulated and private corporations and the break down of basic freedoms that it encompasses. Still don't feel there is anything to worry about in schools? Do a prisonplanet.com google search on the word "school", you will be confronted with literally hundreds and hundreds of news articles from the past few years that detail the police state takeover of schools all over the US and throughout the UK. For complete story, click here.

Friends Talk About Teen Accused Of Capital Murder: July 23rd, 2007--News of 17-year-old Joshua Lofton's alleged involvement as the gunman in the murder of 40-year-old Dean Worden Sunday afternoon spread quickly through the Argenta District of North Little Rock. "That's my homeboy and everything. I can't believe he did this," said Lamar Tenner. "I never thought he'd commit a crime like that or anything," said Lashara Bryant. But police believe Lofton was capable of pulling the trigger outside the Wal-Mart on East McCain, killing Worden in cold blood. They arrested the teenager Monday around 3 a.m. which is something his neighbor, who wishes to be known only as "Pamela," says she couldn't believe. "I was in shock, like I am now," she said. "He was a nice, respectable, caring young man." But "Pamela" says that kind, caring side of Lofton wasn't always so easy to see. "He was heading down the wrong path," she said. "He went to boot camp for a couple of months." She says he'd been back home for about two months, showing a considerably different attitude. "He was more mature, more grown, more stable and not rowdy." She says that change in behavior makes news of his alleged involvement as both purse snatcher and fatal gunman so difficult to understand. "I don't know. Something clicked," she said. "He's not that type of person, out to hurt anyone." (Or, at least, he wasn't, until he survived a "troubled teen" boot camp.) For complete story, click here.

SkYROCKETING numbers of kids are prescribed powerful antipsychotic drugs. Is it safe? Nobody knows: July 29th, 2007--More and more, parents at wit's end are begging doctors to help them calm their aggressive children or control their kids with ADHD. More and more, doctors are prescribing powerful antipsychotic drugs. In the past seven years, the number of Florida children prescribed such drugs has increased some 250 percent. Last year, more than 18,000 state kids on Medicaid were given prescriptions for antipsychotic drugs. Even children as young as 3 years old. Last year, 1,100 Medicaid children under 6 were prescribed antipsychotics, a practice so risky that state regulators say it should be used only in extreme cases. These numbers are just for children on fee-for-service Medicaid, generally the poor and disabled. Thousands more kids on private insurance are also on antipsychotics. Almost entirely driving this spiraling trend is the rise of a class of antipsychotic drugs called atypicals. These drugs emerged in the 1990s and replaced the older, "typical" antipsychotics like Haldol or Thorazine, which are often associated with Parkinson-like shakes. The atypicals were developed to treat schizophrenia and bipolar disorder in adults. But once on the market, doctors are free to prescribe them to children, and for uses not approved by the Food and Drug Administration. There is almost no research on the long-term effects of such powerful medications on the developing brains of children. The more that researchers learn, the less comfortable many are becoming with atypicals. Initially billed as wonder drugs with few significant side effects, evidence is mounting that they can cause rapid weight gain, diabetes, even death. (Webmaster Note: Please see www.ablechild.org for alternatives and support for parents and kids dealing with ADD/ADHD/ODD/etc. diagnosis. Thanks!) For complete story, click here.

Ex-TYC guard indicted in sexual assault case--August 8th, 2007--ABILENE — A former guard in the Texas youth prison system has been indicted on charges of sexual assault and indecency with a child for allegedly having sex with a female inmate younger than 17, officials said. Jaime Segura, 30, of Brownwood, was suspended without pay Friday as the Texas Youth Commission began the process of firing him, said Jim Hurley, a commission spokesman. Segura had been on paid suspension since Feb. 24 from his job at the Ron Jackson State Juvenile Correctional Complex in Brownwood, 120 miles southwest of Fort Worth. Segura is the fifth former guard at the Brownwood facility to face felony charges since Texas officials launched investigations and sweeping reforms to the state-run youth prisons in response to a sex scandal and a possible cover-up by agency officials. A Brown County grand jury indicted Segura on felony charges including one count of sexual assault, three counts of indecency with a child and four counts of improper sexual activity with a person in custody. He was also indicted on four misdemeanor counts of official oppression. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: August 8, 2007)

Local Minister, Helper Charged With Assault--August 10th, 2007--SAN ANTONIO -- A local minister and one of his assistants Friday were charged with aggravated assault in connection with a Nueces County dragging incident. The accuser is a 15-year-old girl who attended their summer boot camp for troubled teens. KSAT's Johanne Lochard reported that Rev. Charles Flowers is the minister at San Antonio's Faith Outreach Center. On Friday, he had to answer to a higher authority -- a magistrate judge. Flowers was charged with aggravated assault along with Stephanie Bassitt, 20. "These are the specific people she says caused her injuries," said Nueces County Lt. Mike Lowrance. The injuries that the victim's mother had photos of were suffered while attending the boot camp, police said, where Flowers served as the self-proclaimed "commandant" and Bassett acted as training assistant. The teen said Bassett held her down while Flowers tied her to the back of a vehicle, Lochard said. She was dragged after being forced to run behind a moving van. Bobbi Greer said she witnessed the dragging. She worked as a cook at the Nueces County Ranch, where the alleged assault happened in early June. "Every time she would fall, they would drag her," Greer said. For complete story, click here.

The Cult That Spawned the Tough-Love Teen Industry--August 20th, 2007--The idea that punishment can be therapeutic is not unique to the Rotenberg Center. In fact, this notion is widespread among the hundreds of "emotional growth boarding schools," wilderness camps, and "tough love" antidrug programs that make up the billion-dollar teen residential treatment industry. This harsh approach to helping troubled teens has a long and disturbing history. No fewer than 50 programs (though not the Rotenberg Center) can trace their treatment philosophy, directly or indirectly, to an antidrug cult called Synanon. Founded in 1958, Synanon sold itself as a cure for hardcore heroin addicts who could help each other by "breaking" new initiates with isolation, humiliation, hard labor, and sleep deprivation. Today, troubled-teen programs use Synanon-like tactics, advertising themselves to parents as solutions for everything from poor study habits to substance misuse. However, there is little evidence that harsh behavior-modification techniques can solve these problems. Studies found that Synanon's "encounter groups" could produce lasting psychological harm and that only 10 to 15 percent of the addicts who participated in them recovered. And as the classic 1971 Stanford prison experiment demonstrated, creating situations in which the severe treatment of powerless people is rewarded inevitably yields abuse. This is especially true when punishment is viewed as a healing process. Synanon was discredited in the late 1970s and 1980s as its violent record was exposed. (The group is now remembered for an incident in which a member placed a live rattlesnake—rattle removed—in the mailbox of a lawyer who'd successfully sued it.) Yet by the time Synanon shut down in 1991, its model had already been widely copied. In 1971, the federal government gave a grant to a Florida organization called The Seed, which applied Synanon's methods to teenagers, even those only suspected of trying drugs. In 1974, Congress opened an investigation into such behavior-modification programs, finding that The Seed had used methods "similar to the highly refined brainwashing techniques employed by the North Koreans." The bad publicity led some supporters of The Seed to create a copycat organization under a different name. Straight Inc. was cofounded by Mel Sembler, a Bush family friend who would become the GOP's 2000 finance chair and who heads Lewis "Scooter" Libby's legal defense fund. By the mid-'80s, Straight was operating in seven states. First lady Nancy Reagan declared it her favorite antidrug program. As with The Seed, abuse was omnipresent—including beatings and kidnapping of adult participants. Facing seven-figure legal judgments, it closed in 1993. But loopholes in state laws and a lack of federal oversight allowed shuttered programs to simply change their names and reopen, often with the same staff, in the same state—even in the same building. Straight spin-offs like the Pathway Family Center are still in business. Confrontation and humiliation are also used by religious programs such as Escuela Caribe in the Dominican Republic and myriad "emotional growth boarding schools" affiliated with the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (wwasp), such as Tranquility Bay in Jamaica. wwasp's president told me that the organization "took a little bit of what Synanon [did]." Lobbying by well-connected supporters such as wwasp founder Robert Lichfield (who, like Sembler, is a fundraiser for Republican presidential aspirant Mitt Romney) has kept state regulators at bay and blocked federal regulation entirely. By the '90s, tough love had spawned military-style boot camps and wilderness programs that thrust kids into extreme survival scenarios. At least three dozen teens have died in these programs, often because staff see medical complaints as malingering. This May, a 15-year-old boy died from a staph infection at a Colorado wilderness program. His family claims his pleas for help were ignored. In his final letter to his mother, he wrote, "They found my weakness and I want to go home." For complete story, click here.

Young people say family, friends make them most happy--August 20th, 2007--NEW YORK — So you're between the ages of 13 and 24. What makes you happy? A worried, weary parent might imagine the answer to sound something like this: Sex, drugs, a little rock 'n' roll. Maybe some cash, or at least the car keys. Turns out the real answer is quite different. Spending time with family was the top answer to that open-ended question, according to an extensive survey — more than 100 questions asked of 1,280 people ages 13-24 — conducted by The Associated Press and MTV on the nature of happiness among America's young people. Next was spending time with friends, followed by time with a significant other. And even better for parents: Nearly three-quarters of young people say their relationship with their parents makes them happy. "They're my foundation," says Kristiana St. John, 17, a high-school student from Queens in New York. "My mom tells me that even if I do something stupid, she's still going to love me no matter what. Just knowing that makes me feel very happy and blessed." Other results are more disconcerting. While most young people are happy overall with the way their lives are going, there are racial differences: The poll shows whites to be happier, across economic categories, than blacks and Hispanics. A lot of young people feel stress, particularly those from the middle class, and females more than males. You might think money would be clearly tied to a general sense of happiness. But almost no one said "money" when asked what makes them happy, though people with the highest family incomes are generally happier with life. Having highly educated parents is a stronger predictor of happiness than income. (Webmaster Note: Love, respect, and spend time with your children!) For complete story, click here.

In the shadow of sexual abuse--August 20th, 2007--Vera has learned to walk softly through the emotional minefield left behind by the man who sexually abused her husband three to four times a week for 11 years. "He can flip back and forth so much and so quickly," says Vera, who asked that we not reveal her last name. She lives south of Seattle with her husband, Mark. "The toughest thing is to constantly remind myself that there's something bigger here than us." Vera represents an often-forgotten population — the partners of childhood sexual-abuse victims. For these couples, ordinary relationship struggles are often compounded by the legacies of abuse. Adult survivors often experience depression, anxiety, substance abuse, career problems, inability to achieve physical or emotional intimacy and shame about sexuality. Janice Palm, a therapist and executive director of Shepherd's Counseling Services on Capitol Hill, recites the oft-quoted stats — one in three girls will be molested by the time they're 18; one in five boys. Unwanted sexual experience affects different people differently. As Palm notes, not all such experiences cause lifelong trauma. As in Mark's case, the effects were significant. As he and other survivors of abuse mature and move into adult relationships, they take with them all the baggage of their abuse. (Webmaster Note: If your child is exhibiting behavioral or emotional problems, they are likely dealing with a trauma such as sexual abuse, humiliation, or other abuse. Even if you've never abused your child, they may have been abused by another trusted adult. If you find yourself too busy to actively engage in a relationship with your child, you may be guilty of neglect which is abusive and can result in behavioral and emotional issues. Please take inventory on your own action/inaction and areas for improvement prior to and/or instead of scapegoating or blaming your child for your own errors.) For complete story, click here.

What Works for Troubled Teens?--August 20th, 2007--The most effective treatments for troubled teenagers have these things in common: They use family-based therapies; they treat adolescents with empathy, dignity, and respect; and, except for very short periods of emergency stabilization, they keep teens at home. Research has proven the effectiveness of a number of methods for treating youth with behavioral and other problems— including functional family therapy, cognitive-behavioral family therapy, and multisystemic family therapy (the latter, ironically, is available almost exclusively to kids in the juvenile justice system). All of them focus on improving communication between children and parents, setting clear boundaries, and ensuring that teenagers' developmental needs for increased freedom, social connection, and responsibility are recognized and met in safe and healthy ways. Inpatient treatment happens only on a short-term basis when a child is a threat to himself or others. For complete story, click here.

How Faith Based Initiatives help unlicensed reform schools thrive--2007--When George W. Bush became president, he created the White House Office of Faith-Based Initiatives (www.whitehouse.gov/government/fbci/mission.html). Mr. Bush created Centers for Faith-Based Initiatives in seven cabinet departments: the United States Agency for International Development, and the Departments of Housing and Urban Development, Health and Human Services, Justice, Agriculture, Labor, and Education. The purpose of the Centers was to eliminate regulatory and contracting obstacles for faith-based and other community organizations. This act has made it possible for religious boarding schools to avoid becoming licensed and regulated leaving those inside no protection. It began when Mr. Bush was Governor of Texas. Texas' legislature passed the Faith Based program there in 1997 allowing deregulation for faith based boarding schools. The legislature then passed a bill allowing the creation of alternative accreditation programs in which faith-based child-care centers could forego state licensing and instead receive accreditation from one of these newly created private agencies. Deregulation was an essential component of the faith-based initiative because it ensured that more faith-based providers would be eligible for government funds (see Texas Freedom Education Fund at www.tfn.org/aboutus). This plan created new licensing laws for religious facilities; self-regulation that substantially reduced health and safety requirements and oversight. The state of Texas approved the Texas Association of Christian Child-Care Agencies (TACCCA). The board of TACCCA was comprised of eight pastors, three of whom also operated homes accredited by TACCCA. Upon TACCCA's creation, the Texas Department of Protective and Regulatory Services (TDPRS) no longer held jurisdiction over these programs. Therefore, TDPRS could not investigate complaints of abuse. Also upon creation of TACCCA, then-Governor Bush invited the Roloff Homes to return to Texas, even though the State of Texas closed down the Roloff Homes in 1985 after numerous allegations of abuse. The State's position was that the Roloff Homes should either comply with licensing requirements or close its doors. The Texas Supreme Court agreed and the United States Supreme Court dismissed the appeal from this decision (State v. Corpus Christi People's Baptist Church, Inc., 683 S.W.2d 692 (1984) and Corpus Christi People's Baptist Church, Inc. v. Texas, 474 U.S. 801 (1985)). TACCCA was supposed to uphold the same standards as TDPRS. TACCCA, however, never conducted a single legally required surprise-inspection at any of its facilities (see letter from Texas Department of Protective and Regulatory Services to Rev. Davis Blaser, Texas Association of Christian Child-Care Agencies (Mar. 8, 2001) (on file with the Texas Department of Protective and Regulatory Services)). In 1999, the state of Texas found evidence of physical abuse and neglect at the Roloff Homes' Rebekah Home for girls. Charges were filed against Faye Cameron, the home's supervisor (and wife of Pastor Wiley Cameron). As a result of the charges, Faye Cameron was convicted and banned from ever working with children in Texas again. Nonetheless, TACCCA reaccredited the home. Pastor Cameron served on the board of TACCCA at the time of reaccreditation. Sadly, this would not be the first case of conflict of interest we would see with these faith based self-appointed organizations. The rate of confirmed abuse and neglect at alternatively accredited facilities was 25 times higher than that of state-licensed facilities. This can be confirmed by the Texas Department of Protective and Regulatory Services. Because of the problems incurred, the Texas legislature had to discontinue its alternative accreditation program in 2001. Luckily someone was watching and paying attention: because of past problems with these facilities, the Texas Freedom Network was created by concerned citizens. This is a watchdog group that was founded in 1995 and is a nonpartisan, grassroots organization of more than 23,000 religious and community leaders - www.tfn.org/aboutus - it monitors far-right issues, organizations, money and leaders. FACCCA - Florida is the new safe haven for unregulated religious schools. Although Texas was forced to abandon its alternative accreditation program, those who wished to avoid state interference were not left without options. The Florida Association of Christian Child Caring Agencies (FACCCA) was created to do the same thing TACCCA did in Texas. When Faye Cameron was banned forever from working with children in Texas and TACCCA was discontinued, FACCCA and the State of Florida welcomed the Camerons. FACCCA also welcomed the Palmers after the State of California shut down their facility in Ramona, California; the school I was in. There have been numerous complaints of abuse against FACCCA facility employees. Rebecca Ramirez's sexual assault allegation against VCA's Palmer (Secrets in the Schoolhouse by reporter Mollye Barrows) is not an isolated allegation. In 2003, a former student of FACCCA's Camp Tracey filed a lawsuit against the facility alleging that he was forced to perform sex acts with two camp counselors (Paul Pinkam, Man Sues Church, Alleges Abuse - Harvest Baptist's Camp Tracey Cited, THE FLORIDA TIMES-UNION, May 10, 2003, available at <http://www.nospank.net/n-k92r.htm>). A grand jury investigated Camp Tracey in 1987 after years of physical abuse allegations by children and parents. Allegations leading to the investigation included excessive corporal punishment and the use of ropes and handcuffs to restrain children. The grand jury criticized the absence of procedures allowing residents of Camp Tracey to contact authorities in the event of abuse (www.isaccorp.org/faccca/camptracey1.pdf). In 2004, John Burt was convicted of molesting a fifteen-year-old girl at another FACCCA-accredited facility, Our Father's House (Activist Gets 18 Years for Molesting Teen, AP, May 12, 2004, www.isaccorp.org/faccca/ourfathershouseconviction.pdf). Shockingly, FACCCA allowed Burt to open the home, even though he had served jail time in the eighties for his anti-abortion activities. In May 1993, Burt was present at the fatal shooting of a Pensacola Medical Services doctor (Associated Press, Troopers Nab Anti-Abortion Figure Sought in Sex Case, ST. PETERSBURG TIMES, June 11, 2003, www.isaccorp.org/faccca/johnburtarrested.pdf). He led a demonstration on one side of the clinic, while his follower, Michael Griffin, shot Dr. David Gunn on the other side of the clinic. When Burt was arrested on the molestation charges, FACCCA President Ed MacClellan said the charges were "out of character with his public persona." (Associated Press, Preaching Life While Preying on Their Fears, ST. PETERSBURG TIMES, June 12, 2003, www.isaccorp.org/faccca/ourfathershouse1.pdf). In 2003, authorities shut down Teen Transformation Ministries, another FACCCA-accredited school, after a former resident made an abuse complaint against the facility (Associated Press, Boys' Home Closes after Abuse Reports, ST. PETERSBURG TIMES, June 11, 2003, www.isaccorp.org/faccca/teentransformation.pdf). The thirteen-year-old boy was denied medical attention for a broken shoulder. He also alleged that he was thrown into a septic tank and made to stay there for ten minutes. He further alleged that he was forced to pull down his pants and sit on a fire-ant mound. Each of these complaints show what program participants may be subjected to in the absence of state regulation. There have been other allegations made against FACCCA's facilities, but because FACCCA seems not to require the facilities to allow participants access to victims' services, it is impossible to provide statistical data about the actual occurrence of abuse. The allegations that have been made, however, indicate the absence of any real regulation by FACCCA. Deregulation systems such as those in Texas and Florida are unconstitutional. Deregulation violates the program participants' Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection rights by placing them in a less protected class than children in state-regulated programs. Deregulation also violates the First Amendment Establishment Clause by allowing special treatment for religious groups. In a state regulated program, it would be rare to find staff members who are child molesters or abusers because in order to work in a state run facility, you must pass a criminal background check to work with minors. Anyone with a questionable background would be immediately disqualified. But at these unregulated FACCCA run schools, a staff member's background goes unchecked and they rarely have anything but a high school diploma making them unsuitable candidates to work with kids who have mental health issues. All they have to say is that they are a "Christian" and they are deemed suitable to work in the facility with your kids. This is horrifying at best. This paper written and researched by Candice Aiston, and edited by Michele Ulriksen. Contact Michele Ulriksen at: www.westhillscommunications.com For complete story, click here.

DHS asks U.S. judge to dismiss abuse suit lawsuit--August 23rd, 2007--The state Department of Human Services asked a federal judge this week to throw out a lawsuit alleging eight girls were abused at Columbia Training School in May. DHS Executive Director Don Taylor said he could not comment on Monday's request to dismiss the case before U.S. District Judge Dan Jordan. In court documents, officials argue the girls, who allege they were shackled for 12 hours a day, have no basis to ask for a financial payment. One girl also alleges she was sexually abused. "It's so unfortunate that the state's going to use its resources to defend the indefensible instead of using its resources to resolve this matter in the best interest of the children," said the girls' attorney, Sheila Bedi of the Mississippi Protection and Advocacy System. Bedi states in court documents the state should have provided mental health treatment to the girls, some of whom were suicidal while in custody. Assistant Attorney General Shawn Shurden argues in court documents that legal mandates to provide mental health or rehabilitative treatments applies only to the mentally ill, not teens. He does not address whether the treatment would be mandatory for teens if they were suicidal and might have been mentally ill. Since several of the teens have been released or soon will be released from the campus, their claims are moot, he states. The school houses teenage girls who committed crimes, including drug possession and assault. They typically stay six weeks to a few months, depending on the sentence. After allegations surfaced that girls were shackled for longer than a week, the investigation widened when state representatives learned male guards asked one girl for sexual favors and guards gave the teens cigarettes. Taylor said his agency's investigation is ongoing. One employee has been fired and five have been suspended with pay. In 2006, the state agreed to end a lawsuit federal officials filed two years earlier over allegations of abuse. A federal monitor visits both Columbia and Oakley Training School for boys and recommends improvements. (Webmaster Note: It is very common that the government agencies charged with child welfare are complicit in the abuse of children. Often, abuses are covered up by the very people who should be investigating and taking action.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.clarionledger.com Date: August 23, 2007)

'Kid Nation' Parents Gave Show Free Rein--August 23rd, 2007--LOS ANGELES (Aug. 23) - Children who participated in "Kid Nation," a CBS reality show that has come under fire over questions of whether it violated child safety and labor laws, were required to do whatever they were told by the show's producers, 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, or risk expulsion from the show, according to a copy of the contract signed by the children and their parents. The contract also specifies that while the children could be paid for their participation, those payments or the agreement to be fully under the producers' direction did not constitute employment under the producers' interpretation and therefore was not subject to any state or federal labor laws. The agreement, which was provided to The New York Times by the New Mexico attorney general's office under an open records act request, appears to anticipate the arguments that were later made by New Mexico state authorities that the show's producers might have violated state labor laws and licensing requirements for child housing. "Kid Nation," which is scheduled to have its premiere on CBS on Sept. 19, took 40 children, ages 8 to 15, and placed them in a New Mexico desert "ghost town" near Santa Fe for 40 days, during which they had little to no contact with their parents. The program has been criticized by New Mexico state authorities who have said that they were not notified in advance of the conditions, which they said appeared to violate state laws. The parent of at least one participant has complained to New Mexico authorities that the conditions were abusive and that several children were harmed during the production. The 22-page agreement leaves little room for parents to argue that they did not know what their children might encounter. As is standard in such agreements, the parents and the children agreed not to hold the producers and CBS responsible if their children died or were injured, if they received inadequate medical care, or if their housing was unsafe and caused injury. But while such agreements might be standard for adult participants in a reality show, it also takes on a different tone when the minor and the parent are being held solely responsible for any "emotional distress, illness, sexually transmitted diseases, H.I.V. and pregnancy" that might occur if the child "chooses to enter into an intimate relationship of any nature with another participant or any other person." The agreement also imposes extensive confidentiality requirements on the parents and the children, including that any interviews they grant must be approved by CBS. Those confidentiality conditions extend for three years beyond the end of the show, not the individual 13-episode cycle in which a child participates but the entire series, however many cycles it includes. The producers of "Kid Nation" have already begun interviewing children to take part in the second installment. Violating the confidentiality agreement carries a $5 million penalty. CBS and the production companies, Good TV Inc. and Magic Molehill Productions, retained the rights to the children's life stories "in perpetuity and throughout the universe." And that right includes the right to portray the children either accurately or with fictionalization "to achieve a humorous or satirical effect." To ensure that parents and the children abide by the agreement, the payment of the $5,000 stipend promised to the children who complete the series and the $20,000 that some of them received for being voted the best participant in each of the 13 episodes can be withheld, according to the contract, until after the broadcast of the entire series. The contract also specifies that the children are able to leave the production at any time, but that in doing so they will lose their right to receive payment and will still be bound by confidentiality provisions. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://news.aol.com> Date: August 23, 2007)

Zyprexa blamed for son's death, parents sue--August 22nd, 2007--Valedictorian of his high school class and honor graduate from Rice University, Scott Sexton's future promised greatness. However, sometime between graduating from Rice with a masters in business administration and working at the accounting firm Deloitte Touche, Sexton was diagnosed with a mental disorder and prescribed Zyprexa. He died of pancreatitis on Dec. 7, 2006. Sexton's grieving parents, Charles and Kaye, believe Zyprexa was at the root of their son's untimely death and are suing the drug's maker, Eli Lilly & Company - filing suit on Aug. 20 with the Jefferson County District Court. For complete story, click here.

Tough Love and Free Speech--August 24th, 2007--...At some point, Sue Scheff became aware of online bulletin boards where teens who had been in WWASP programs were telling horrific stories of sexual, physical, and emotional abuse. Users also posted media accounts detailing how nine WWASP-affiliated programs were closed following police investigations, regulatory infractions and/or allegations of child abuse. Scheff later wrote on her website that she had become uncomfortable with some of the organization's methods. She removed her daughter from the program, and began posting her own allegations against WWASP on online forums, under several different names. She also set up her own consultant business, called Parents Universal Resource Experts (PURE), and began taking referral payments for placing teens, just as WWASP does. While this sort of practice isn't illegal, it's widely considered unethical. Conflicts of interest arise when consultants get higher referral fees from some programs than they get from others. The temptation arises to place kids in the programs that pay more, even though these may not be the programs best suited to a particular child. Once you're being regularly paid by a program, it's hard to be objective about its quality. This is why codes of ethics in psychology and psychiatry typically bar such "dual relationships." Under the Lanham Act, which bans business competitors from making false and inflammatory claims about rivals, WWASP sued Scheff over her critical online posts. Because the court was able to substantiate Scheff's claims with vivid testimony from victims, WWASP lost. Soon, however, the online boards buzzed again with yet more reports of abuse at new programs, and this time they included programs where Sue Scheff was referring children. It was around this time that Scheff launched her own lawsuit against Bock. Scheff had helped Bock remove her two sons from a WWASP program, but Bock eventually became outraged by what she considered to be Scheff's unethical referrals. The $11 million judgment resulted only after Bock didn't show up in court to defend herself. Meanwhile, child welfare investigators substantiated charges of abuse in 2005 at the Whitmore Academy in Utah, a program to which Scheff made referrals. Regulators shut the program down. Just last month, another complaint was filed against Scheff and another program where she places teens, the Focal Point Academy in Nevada. In that filing, a Florida couple alleges that Scheff failed to disclose that she was being paid by Focal Point, nor did she tell them that the business was licensed only as a foster home, not for residential treatment. The complaint describes these failures to disclose as "fraudulent misrepresentations" and "kickbacks." For complete story, click here.

Trial for Royal Gorge Academy official begins Monday--August 25th, 2007--A week-long trial is scheduled to begin Monday for the Royal Gorge Academy co-founder who faces allegations that he assaulted several teenagers who once attended the private boarding school. Randall Hinton, 32, is set to defend himself against seven counts of third-degree assault and two counts of false imprisonment. All charges Hinton faces are misdemeanors that carry potential jail time, if convicted. The trial is the culmination of an investigation that began in January and was carried out by the Cañon City Police Department. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.canoncitydailyrecord.com Date: August 25, 2007)

3 Arrested In Connection With Drugs-For-Cash Ring--August 27th, 2007--(CBS) MURRIETA, Calif. Three more arrests were made in connection with an alleged drug-prescription-for-cash ring that authorities say was run by a Murrieta psychiatrist. James Dylan Hall, 21, Saeger Hall, 18, and Janine Hall, 45, all of Temecula, were taken into custody Friday by deputies serving a search warrant in the 29700 block of Calle Pantano, said Murrieta Sgt. Tony Conrad. Psychiatrist Joel Dreyer, arrested July 24 at his Murrieta home, was charged with five counts of issuing a false prescription. He remains behind bars on $50,000 bail, awaiting a preliminary hearing...Dreyer, 69, worked with troubled teens in group homes, as well as in private practice. None of the teens was suspected of involvement in the alleged scheme, Vrooman said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://cbs2.com> Date: August 27, 2007)

Breaking: Larry Craig quits Romney campaign as news of lewd-conduct allegation spreads 27 Aug 2007 U.S. Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho) pleaded guilty to disorderly conduct this month after his arrest in a Minneapolis airport men's room by an undercover officer who said Craig was sending signals that he wanted to have sex. Craig agreed today to resign as the U.S. Senate co-chairman of Mitt Romney's presidential campaign. Craig served as co-chair with Robert Bennett of Utah. For complete story, click here.

Graduate of a school for troubled teens describes therapy: Click here for audio clip. (Provided by www.nospank.net)

Controversy Surrounds Tranquility Bay: Click here for article. Or, click here.

Why girl was sent to child-rape suspect Adhahn--July 21st, 2007--A Kansas woman said she let her daughter move to Pierce County with child-rape suspect Terapon Adhahn six years ago because she thought it was the best option for the then-rebellious 12-year-old girl. The girl and her family met Adhahn when he moved to Texas in 2001 after he was laid off from Boeing's plant in Auburn. Adhahn and the girl moved to Tacoma a short time later and lived at two different Spanaway addresses. According to charges filed earlier this week, Adhahn repeatedly raped the girl over the four years they lived together, at least once at gunpoint. Charging papers say the girl went to live with Adhahn with her mother's blessing, because the woman was having difficulty with the girl's behavior. The girl's mother said Adhahn, the cousin of a man she was dating at the time, offered to take the child off her hands. "I never thought he'd do anything to hurt my daughter," said the woman. "I asked her all the time. She said nothing happened." On Thursday, Pierce County prosecutors charged Adhahn, 42, with one count of first-degree rape, three counts of second-degree rape and three counts of child rape in connection with the repeated assaults on the woman's daughter. He also faces several rape charges and a kidnapping charge in connection with the abduction and sexual assault of an 11-year-old Tacoma girl in 2000. Pierce County prosecutors said they plan to charge Adhahn Monday with one count of aggravated-first-degree murder in connection with the slaying of 12-year-old Zina Linnik, who was abducted from outside her Tacoma home on July 4 and whose body was found July 12 in eastern Pierce County. Prosecutors haven't said whether they intend to seek the death penalty. (Webmaster Note: There is no excuse for irresponsible parenting.) For complete story, click here.

Romney Fires One Teen-Abuse Linked Financier, Keeps Big One--September 6th, 2007--Radar has the news that Mitt Romney has kicked troubled-teen titan Robert Lichfield to the curb. Lichfield's organization, the World Wide Association of Specialty Schools and Programs (WWASPS, previously WWASP), is being sued in a class action suit by over 100 plaintiffs, alleging serious sexual, emotional and physical abuse. In the worst cases, teens were beaten, kept in stress positions, sleep deprived, made to walk thousands of laps on a hot desert track, forced to eat their own vomit and held in dog cages. Mexican police shot footage of the dog cages and the track, which was aired on Inside Edition. Another lawsuit alleges educational fraud by one facility--that facility was already made to pay parents back over $1 million for falsely claiming to provide legitimate New York state high school diplomas, in one of the largest educational fraud judgments in New York history. Lichfield was Romney's Utah co-chair for finance--and he has been relieved of that position "until the lawsuit is resolved in the positive, which we are confident will happen," WWASPS spokesperson Ken Kay told Radar. This is the same Ken Kay who said under oath in another civil suit that he did not know whether sex between staff and teens in WWASPS programs was necessarily abusive. But Romney's national finance co-chair, Mel Sembler, remains. While Sembler has not been linked with any abuse personally, the organization he co-founded, Straight Inc., paid out millions of dollars in similar suits during the 1980's and 1990's. The abuse included kidnapping, false imprisonment, beatings, sexual humiliation (boys were called "fags," girls, "whores"), punitive use of isolation and restraint and bizarre incidents like teens being gagged with Kotex and held on the floor for hours until they wet or even soiled themselves. In every state where Straight had a facility, regulators and/or lawsuits eventually documented serious abuse. For complete story, click here.

Texas Juvenile Detention Centers Cope With Charges of Rape, Abuse--April 16th, 2007--"You need to get both hands on the wheel," Genger Galloway urges her son, as he steers her mini-van down a side road near Crockett, Texas. She shakes her head from side to side. "I need a Xanax is what I need." At 19 years old, Joseph Galloway seems too old for driving lessons. But Joseph's teenage years have been tumultuous ones. Arrested at 15 for inappropriate sexual contact with a sibling, he expected to spend nine months in one of the 13 secure facilities or nine halfway houses run by the Texas Youth Commission (TYC); instead, he remained incarcerated for four years. During that period, he claims that guards deliberately placed him in a cell with a larger boy who raped him and encouraged gang members to break his jaw. He also said he was molested by a female staff member. As his mother protested -- interviewing 150 parents of other TYC inmates and petitioning legislators for changes in the system -- Joseph said he was singled out. "If your parents complain, you get your sentence extended," Genger insists. The TYC's official spokesman tends to agree with her. "We have no confidence that these extensions have been used uniformly," said Jim Hurley, the agency's interim communications director. "We have suspicions that some of these may have been done to punish kids." Now, in the wake of a scandal that has rocked the state of Texas, 1,100 extensions are being reviewed. On April 5, Joseph became one of 473 inmates released amid pressure from the Texas state legislature and Gov. Rick Perry. During his first week home, Joseph savored his new freedom, catching catfish and perch at a nearby lake, even participating in an Easter egg hunt. For complete story, click here.

Statesville Man Who Worked With Troubled Children Faces Sex Charges--September 12th, 2007--STATESVILLE, N.C. -- A man who worked with troubled children in Iredell County faces sex assault charges. James Fredrick Frank, 38, of Statesville faces three counts of first-degree rape, three counts of first-degree sex offense and one count of indecent liberties. Detectives said the charges stem from more than six years of rape of a young female relative, but Det. Cheryl Hilderbrand said the fact that Frank worked on a daily basis with children is alarming. "If I had to give a rating on a scale one to 10, for the severity and the length of time my victim has had to endure, it's going to be a 10," said Hilderbrand, who has worked in the Special Victims Unit for 15 years. "It's the worst I've personally worked on." Frank had been helping students deal with their behavior in the classroom at Barium Springs Home for Children for about three years. The president of the home said authorities informed him of the charges early Wednesday and Frank has been suspended without pay. For complete story, click here.

Counselor accused of abusing teenager--September 13th, 2007--A mental-health counselor is under investigation for alleged sexual misconduct with a teenage inmate at the King County Juvenile Detention Center. According to authorities, a then-17-year-old boy was serving time at the detention center for assault when he was allegedly abused by the female counselor, who reportedly gave the teen extra privileges and gifts, such as additional phone time and snacks. Seattle police said the allegations are being investigated by an officer with the Special Assault Unit. The alleged misconduct was discovered when jail officials intercepted communications between the two, according to a spokesman for the King County correctional facilities. The counselor, a contract employee through the University of Washington, has been banned from the detention center, said Maj. Willie Hayes of the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention. Hayes said the allegation is also being investigated internally. "It's a big deal any time somebody is alleged to have committed sexual misconduct with a juvenile," Hayes said. "We're taking this very seriously." The current investigation follows the prosecution of four King County corrections officers who were charged with sexual misconduct with inmates. For complete story, click here.

Experts Question Study on Youth Suicide Rates--September 14th, 2007--Last week, leading psychiatric researchers linked a 2004 increase in the suicide <http://health.nytimes.com/health/guides/disease/suicide-and-suicidal-behavior/overview.html> rate for children and adolescents to a warning by the Food and Drug Administration about the use of antidepressants in minors. The F.D.A. warning, the researchers suggested, might have resulted in severely depressed teenagers going without needed treatment. But the data in the study, which was published in The American Journal of Psychiatry and received widespread publicity, do not support that explanation, outside experts say. While suicide rates for Americans ages 19 and under rose 14 percent in 2004, the number of prescriptions for antidepressants in that group was basically unchanged and did not drop substantially, according to data from the study. Prescription rates for minors did fall sharply a year later, but the suicide rates for 2005 are not yet available from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention "There doesn't seem to be any evidence of a statistically significant association between suicide rates and prescription rates provided in the paper" for the years after the F.D.A. warnings, said Thomas R. Ten Have, a professor of biostatistics at the University of Pennsylvania. In the report published last week, the authors analyzed data on suicides and antidepressant use over several years in the United States and the Netherlands. They argued that drug regulators may have created a larger problem by requiring pharmaceutical companies to place warnings on antidepressants, scaring away patients and doctors. The F.D.A. warning label says that a potential side effect in young people is an increase in suicidal thoughts and behavior. "The most plausible explanation is a cause and effect relationship: prescription rates change, therefore suicides change," said Dr. J. John Mann, a psychiatrist at Columbia University and a co-author of the study. But Dr. Ten Have and other experts, while noting that it may still turn out that a reduction in prescriptions is leading to increased suicides among young people, said that the new study neither proved nor disproved this. Instead, some experts say, the study illustrates why suicide trends are so difficult to understand - and why this debate has been so polarizing and confusing. In an interview, Robert D. Gibbons, a professor of biostatistics and psychiatry at the University of Illinois at Chicago and the lead author of the journal article, acknowledged that the data from the United States that he and his colleagues analyzed did not support a causal link between prescription rates and suicide in 2004. "We really need to see the 2005 numbers on suicide to see what happened," he said. But Dr.

Gibbons defended the paper, saying that when taken in the context of previous studies that linked falling antidepressant use to increased suicide rates, "this study was suggestive, that's what we're saying." Other experts, however, said that the problem with such studies is precisely that they are suggestive rather than conclusive and are open to interpretation. Suicides are rare and uniquely personal events that can be driven by many factors: worsening depression or other mental illnesses, breakups or job loss, lack of drug or psychiatric treatment, even easy access to guns. In calling for the labeling change on antidepressants, F.D.A. scientists based their decision on data from drug makers' clinical trials, considered the gold standard in medical research. Those trials have shown that young patients who took antidepressants were about twice as likely than those on placebos to report suicidal thoughts or attempts, though the numbers in both groups were small. Yet none of the youngsters in the trials, most of which ran for no more than a month or two, actually committed suicide. And most psychiatrists with long experience using antidepressants in children say the benefits far outweigh any risk. In studies of data collected before 2004, Dr. Gibbons, Dr. Mann and others found clear associations between prescription patterns and suicide rates. For instance, prescription rates for patients from ages 10 to 24 rose steadily in the 1990s, while the suicide rate in that age group fell 28 percent from 1990 to 2003, according to a government report released last week. In another study, researchers at Columbia University, analyzing data from 1990 to 2000, found that for every 20 percent increase in the use of antidepressants among adolescents, there were five fewer suicides per 100,000 people each year. Psychiatric researchers have found similar patterns among some age groups in other countries, including Sweden, Japan and Finland. But many uncertainties remain. While the suicide rate for adolescents has fallen over the last decade, it has remained largely unchanged for the overall population, though prescriptions for psychiatric medicines have risen sharply in all age groups. Adjusted for the demographic changes, about 11 Americans per 100,000 killed themselves in 2004, the same as in 1994. Demographics can play a role: White people kill themselves about twice as frequently as African-Americans and Hispanics, so as the population becomes more diverse, the suicide rate ought to drop, all else being equal. And suicide rates also appear to be negatively correlated with economic growth, which was exceptionally strong from 1994 to 2000. Advances in medicine also mean more lives can be saved now. With so many potentially confounding factors at play, interpreting the relationship between prescription rates and suicides is difficult, said Andrew Leon, a professor of biostatistics at Weill Cornell Medical College who has served on F.D.A. panels studying suicide risk and antidepressants. "These kinds of studies are very important in giving us a sense of the rates of disease and death in a population and how those may correspond to other things," Dr. Leon said. "But what they don't do is tell us whether the two trends are directly related." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://topics.nytimes.com> Date: September 14, 2008)

Federal Prosecutor Arrested In Child Sex Sting--September 17th, 2007--DETROIT -- A U.S. Justice Department official has been arrested on suspicion of traveling to Detroit over the weekend to have sex with a minor. John David R. Atchison, 53, an assistant U.S. attorney from the northern district of Florida, was arraigned in U.S. District Court in Detroit Monday afternoon. An undercover officer posed as a mother offering her child to Atchison for sex, according to police. Prosecutors said Atchison flew from Pensacola, Fla., to Detroit on Sunday intending to have sex with the 5-year-old girl. He was arrested at Detroit Metropolitan Airport. He is charged with enticement of a minor to engage in sexual activity. According to authorities, Atchison made contact with a detective working undercover for the Macomb County Sheriff's department's. The detective, acting as the child's mother, allegedly arranged a sexual encounter between Atchison and her 5-year-old daughter, police said. In deposition, detectives said Atchison suggested the mother tell her daughter that "you found her a sweet boyfriend who will bring her presents." The undercover detective expressed concern about physical injury to the 5-year-old girl as a result of the sexual activity. Detectives said Atchison responded, "I am always gentle and loving; not to worry, no damage ever, no rough stuff ever. I only like it soft and nice." For complete story, click here.

Should teachers be able to bring guns to school?--September 18th, 2007--ASHLAND, Ore. — In court documents, she's known as "Jane Doe." Innocuous enough, but the woman behind that pseudonym pushes one of the nation's hottest political buttons: guns and school safety. What Ms. Doe wants to do is take her Glock 9-mm pistol to the high school in Medford, Ore., where she teaches. She's licensed to carry a concealed weapon, and she has what many supporters say is a legitimate reason for being armed: a restraining order against her ex-husband based on threats he's allegedly made against her and her children. But district policy prohibits anyone except a law-enforcement officer from bringing a weapon onto campus. When word got out that she had a concealed-carry permit, administrators reminded her of that policy... "Jane Doe," who agreed to be interviewed by phone on condition of anonymity, says she does not want to be viewed as an "Annie Oakley." Trying to extricate herself from an abusive relationship led her to buy her first gun just a few years ago, she says. Before that, she had not been a gun-rights activist... According to the National Conference of State Legislatures, 37 states have laws specifically banning guns at schools. In Washington state, the law prohibits teachers from carrying firearms on school property. In general, administrators, teachers organizations and law-enforcement agencies favor such laws. In the confusion of a school shooting, police officials have said, adding guns to the situation just makes it more dangerous. The state panel investigating the April 16 shootings by a mentally disturbed student who killed 33 people at Virginia Tech University, the nation's deadliest school shooting, agreed. "If numerous people had been rushing around with handguns, the possibility of accidental or mistaken shootings would have increased significantly," the panel wrote... In Michigan last week, 16 state lawmakers sponsored legislation allowing teachers, administrators and other school employees to carry concealed weapons on school property. Ohio has a similar bill pending. South Carolina, Alabama and Virginia are among several other states that have considered lifting school-campus gun bans this year, according to Stateline.org, which tracks state issues... So far, just one state — Utah — allows concealed weapons on campus. Utah's law applies to public colleges and universities. The University of Utah opposed the 2004 legislation that allows weapons on campus, but lost in the state supreme court. For complete story, click here.

U.S. military uses moderate clerics to try to change radical minds--September 19th, 2007--WASHINGTON — The U.S. military has introduced "religious enlightenment" and other education programs for Iraqi detainees, some of whom are as young as 11, Marine Maj. Gen. Douglas Stone, the commander of U.S. detention facilities in Iraq, said Tuesday. Stone said such efforts, aimed mainly at Iraqis who have been held for more than a year, are intended to "bend them back to our will" and are part of waging war in what he called "the battlefield of the mind." The religious courses are led by Muslim clerics who "teach out of a moderate doctrine," Stone said, according to the transcript of a conference call he held from Baghdad with a group of defense bloggers. As a result of the increased U.S. troop presence in Iraq this year, the number of Iraqis in U.S. detention has swelled from about 10,000 last year to more than 25,000. That includes more than 820 juvenile detainees, most of whom are held in a facility that the military calls the "House of Wisdom." The schooling there "tears apart" the arguments of al-Qaida, such as "Let's kill innocents," and helps to "bring some of the edge off" the detainees, Stone said. The effort to reshape attitudes among the growing detainee population is aimed at addressing a problem that has vexed U.S. troops in Iraq for the past four years: Military detention facilities have served as breeding grounds for extremist views, transforming some prisoners into hard-core insurgents, according to military analysts. Stone said he wants to identify "irreconcilables" — those detainees whose views cannot be moderated — and "put them away" in permanent detention facilities. Psychiatrists, psychologists, counselors and interrogators help distinguish the extremists from others, he said. (Webmaster Note: Now it all makes sense, doesn't it? See: www.beyondbusiness.net/openletter.htm and www.heal-online.org/root.htm) For complete story, click here.

Award reduced in Mormon church abuse case--September 19th, 2007--The state Court of Appeals has overturned a portion of a 2005 civil court verdict that found The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints financially liable after a church member sexually abused his two stepdaughters. The appellate court ruled on Tuesday that while the Mormon church still owed the two stepdaughters a little more than $1.2 million because a bishop kept one from reporting the abuse, the church was not financially responsible for the stepfather's liability in the case. That decision will reduce the amount that was awarded to the girls in 2005, although attorneys were not immediately sure by how much. The two sisters, Jessica and Ashley Cavaliere, had originally won a $4.2 million award in a King County civil trial that held the stepfather, Peter N. Taylor, and the church liable for the years of abuse. (Webmaster Note: Don't send your child to Utah!) For complete story, click here.

Witness in polygamist trial: Sex awkward but not forced--September 20th, 2007--ST. GEORGE, Utah — A member of a polygamous sect who entered into an arranged marriage with his 14-year-old cousin testified Wednesday that he never forced himself on his wife. Allen Steed took the stand in defense of Warren Jeffs, 51, the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Latter Day Saints (FLDS) who is facing two counts of being an accomplice to rape. Prosecutors claim Jeffs used his iron-fisted influence to force the marriage, and later sex, in 2001. The alleged victim, now 21, testified last week that Jeffs forced her to marry Steed and that her husband ordered her to have sex. When she complained to Jeffs that Steed was "touching her" in ways she did not like and asked that the marriage be dissolved, she said, the self-styled prophet refused... Steed, 19 when church leaders told him to marry his cousin, acknowledged Wednesday that he had been a clumsy suitor. Socializing between the sexes before marriage is prohibited in FLDS society. "I'm sure it wasn't easy ... knowing now how I was then," Steed said softly. Visibly uncomfortable, Steed had to stand to be heard and occasionally dabbed at tears. "I've never been really good at communication," he said. Steed acknowledged that his cousin was standoffish to him and had made clear at times that she didn't desire the marriage. But other times she was affectionate, he said... The two remained married until 2004, when the accuser left Steed for another FLDS member and fled the church. Jeffs then dissolved the marriage. Steed said he understood his testimony could be used against him if he were to be charged but was willing to speak anyway. Under cross-examination, Steed said he did not believe the government's laws apply to him. Steed said, however, that he would never lie for Jeffs. "It'd be against God's law," he said. The defense ended its case after Steed's testimony, and prosecutors called a sole rebuttal witness. Jane Blackmoore is a midwife who attended to the accuser when she had a miscarriage in 2002. Blackmoore testified that the accuser said her husband was abusive. "She felt like she had been forced," Blackmoore said. "She didn't use the word 'sex' but said, 'My husband doesn't take no for an answer.'" (Webmaster Note: Please don't send your child to Utah or a program founded by or headquartered in Utah. Keep your children safe. Keep your children at home.) For complete story, click here.

Seattle counselor fired after being caught in online sex sting--September 20th, 2007--A Seattle-area counselor surrendered his health-care credentials last week after he told the Department of Health he engaged in a sexually explicit online chat with an adult posing as a teen three years ago. Malcolm McKay was a counselor in private practice and also counseled troubled youths at the Ruth Dykeman Children's Center when the activities came to light. The Internet site for the Seattle Institute for Sex Therapy, Education and Research also lists him as one of its "educators." The Dykeman Center immediately "terminated his employment," according to Tom Rembiesa, president and CEO. The center reported him to police, Child Protective Services and the DOH. The investigations did not turn up any evidence of inappropriate behavior with his clients. McKay was never charged with a crime. DOH documents say that over two days in September 2004, McKay chatted online with an adult posing as a 14-year-old boy. The adult worked with Perverted-Justice.com, a group that targets online child predators. McKay transmitted "naked, graphic photos" of himself and appeared "to be grooming his chat-mate for a sexual relationship," the DOH statement of charges said. For complete story, click here.

Honored Utah teacher admits sex crimes--September 21st, 2007--A man honored as among the best teachers in Utah pleaded guilty Thursday to felony sex charges involving 11 students in his suburban classroom. Frank Laine Hall, 37, who taught first grade at Rosamond Elementary School in the Salt Lake City suburb of Riverton until his arrest in March, could get up to 30 years to life in prison, prosecutor Rodwicke Ybarra said. Hall remains free on $500,000 bond until his sentencing Nov. 14. Hall received a Huntsman Award for Excellence in Education in 2006, for being one of the best teachers in Utah. (Webmaster Note: Again, please don't send your children to Utah!!!) For complete story, click here.

Wanted: good foster parents--September 21st, 2007--To Joey Charlton, a supervisor at the Children's Administration office that handles the placement of abused and neglected children from King County, Wednesday was a good day — only seven crises for his team to handle. That's seven kids who were pulled from their parents' homes and were in need of immediate placement — immediate, as in right this minute, today. On any given day, Charlton's five placement coordinators also juggle dozens of other cases they consider long-term, where there is perhaps an extra day or two before the youth gets out of juvenile detention, or a week before a foster parent calls it quits. Last week, Charlton said, it took nine straight hours of phone calls before they could find a temporary home for a 3-year-old boy. Not long before that, they had to find a home for six siblings whose parents had been arrested — and who spoke only Cambodian. It is a difficult job under the best of circumstances. But it's made even tougher because Washington has a shortage of foster parents. State workers first try to find relatives; next, they look for a nearby licensed foster home that will accept the child. When that doesn't work, they're sometimes forced to go across the state to find space. Statewide, only three in 10 of these children stay in the same city. For those who wind up far from home, their trauma is magnified. Not only do these kids lose their parents, but they lose most everything else they know: their teachers, their friends, their local park. "The common denominator is they're all scared and they're all loyal to their families," Charlton said. Now, DSHS has launched an agency wide focus on foster parenting, recruiting foster parents in places and in ways they never have before, reaching out to everyone from struggling migrant workers to well-paid Microsofties. In addition, they're urging people in the community to get involved with abused children's lives in other ways. And they're turning to unusual tools, such as marketing campaigns and demographic studies, to improve the statistics. (Webmaster Note: Many pre-teens and teens in the foster system are placed in abusive behavior modification programs such as Provo Canyon School when no other placement is available. If you have the room, the time, and the love, please become a foster parent.) For complete story, click here.

ITV under fire for attack on teens--September 23rd, 2007--ITV's flagship current affairs series, Tonight With Trevor McDonald, has been accused of deliberate misrepresentation in one of its programmes, 'Ann Widdecombe v The Hoodies'. Sir Trevor McDonald has promised to investigate the complaints personally, after community leaders and a cross-party alliance of politicians in the north London borough of Islington said Widdecombe falsely depicted the Andover estate there as a 'dump' terrorised by gangs of out-of-control youngsters. 'Ann Widdecombe was basically out to get a specific story and, by hanging around at night time and shoving her camera into the faces of young people, demanding that they account for themselves, she made sure she got it,' said Terry Stacy, deputy leader of Islington council. 'It was a cheap way to demonise young people.' For complete story, click here.

Ex-Teacher Charged With Teen Sex in S.C.--September 24th, 2007--COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) - A former teacher was charged with having sex with a teenage boy, the third teacher in the same county accused of such crimes in the past year and a half, authorities said Monday. Karen Robbins, 49, was arrested over the weekend and charged with three counts each of criminal sexual conduct with a minor and committing a lewd act on a child. The sex occurred with a 15-year-old in her car and twice at her home between September and November 2005, according to arrest warrants. Robbins was a private school teacher at the time, and officials said the accusations did not involve one of her students. For complete story, click here.

Teacher jailed on stalking charges--September 25th, 2007--A teacher and reserve police officer has been jailed on charges of stalking a 15-year-old girl, one of his former students, while awaiting trial on charges that he raped her. Vernon Heizer, 50, of Nespelem, a teacher at Grand Coulee Dam Middle School, remained in jail Monday with bail set at $100,000. He has been dismissed as a Grand Coulee reserve police officer and placed on leave from his school job, Okanogan County Sheriff Frank T. Rogers and school-district officials said. Heizer came under scrutiny after his estranged wife found a cellular telephone marked "broken" with other items in a box after he moved out of their home in June, according to documents filed by prosecutors. Sheriff's detectives determined that the phone had been used to exchange numerous calls and text messages with a girl who told authorities they had also exchanged nude photographs of each other, sheriff's Sgt. Michael Lee Worden wrote. Heizer said he formed a close relationship with the girl when she was in a sixth grade but denied her account that they had been having sex since October or November, when she was 14. Heizer was arrested and charged in July with two counts of third-degree child rape and one each of third-degree child molesting and communicating with a minor for immoral purposes. Heizer was released on bail. Several witnesses reported that Heizer began driving by the girl's home and school in mid-August and that he had been seen in a vehicle parked near her home, Rogers said. Heizer was arrested Sept. 14 on charges of stalking a witness in violation of a protection order. For complete story, click here.

Federal Way woman pleads guilty in foster-child abuse--September 25th, 2007--A woman who burned her foster daughter's tongue with a heated fork, beat her feet with dumbbells and stuck a needle into the girl's eye several times pleaded guilty Monday to three counts of assault. Chornice Y. Kabbelliyaa, who also goes by the last name of Lewis, pleaded guilty in King County Superior Court to one count of first-degree assault and two counts of second-degree assault for her treatment of her foster daughter, who is also her cousin. Kabbelliyaa, 34, of Federal Way, had been the girl's licensed foster mother since the girl was 5 years old. The woman was arrested last year after Child Protective Services was called by a neighbor who reported seeing Kabbelliyaa punch the girl, hit her with an umbrella and lock her in an outside storage unit for hours. Physicians examining the girl found serious damage to the girl's right eye, scarring, bruising and a severely burned tongue. The girl, who was then 14, told police and CPS investigators that her foster mother had become angry on one occasion and plunged an insulin needle into the pupil of her right eye, holding it in her eye for several minutes and telling the girl not to move or she'd be blinded. A medical examination showed similar puncture wounds to the pupil of the girl's left eye. In addition, police and prosecutors said in charging papers, Kabbelliyaa beat the girl with crutches, an umbrella, canned goods and keys. Charging documents also state that Kabbelliyaa would turn on the stove's burner until it was red-hot before pressing the girl's palm onto the burner. Kabbelliyaa, who is scheduled to be sentenced on Nov. 16 at the Regional Justice Center in Kent, will face a standard sentencing range of 10 years to a little more than 14 years. Prosecutors said they will seek a top-end sentence. For complete story, click here.

CBS, you've got to be kidding me--September 28th, 2007--WASHINGTON — When they write the cultural history of childhood in 21st-century America, I hope they leave room for a few unkind words about "Kid Nation." CBS' latest new reality show is about 40 kids from 8 to 15 years old who are dropped into a ghost town in New Mexico with only a production crew to call their own. The kids' task, we are told, is to "try to fix their forefathers' mistakes and build a new town that works." Their real job, of course, is to attract viewers who want to see what happens to the "first ever kid nation." Will kids left to their own devices create a democratic idyll or a savage anarchy? There is nothing particularly new about the conflicting images of children as innocents and children as beasts. It's as old as mythology. It lives on in the heart of every parent who's seen her child turn from a screaming sociopath at the supermarket checkout to a philosopher king at the beach: "Who painted the sky blue?" But the real founding fathers of "Kid Nation" leave little to chance or choice. It's the producers, not the so-called "pioneers," who determine the structure of the town called Bonanza. It's the adults who lay the cultural grid down the main street. And this makes "Kid Nation" an entry into the annals of childhood as it's now lived and argued about in America. You see, this is what the adults brought with them from Hollywood to Bonanza: competition, class and consumerism. In the very first episode, the children were directed to form four armies for color war. They were told that victory would determine their class status. And it did. In a scenario Karl Marx couldn't have made up, the winners of the war were dubbed "upper class," the runners-up were labeled "merchants," then "cooks," and finally "laborers." The little capitalists were allowed to use their very unequal paychecks for very unequal chores to pay for goodies at the town store. The producers did everything but deny the lower-income children their health coverage. Cutthroat competition, class divisions, unrelenting consumerism. Maybe it is reality programming after all. Aren't these the basic three C's of the culture in which we are all raising children? Parent bashing is the favorite indoor sport these days. It's behind the voyeurism that makes "Supernanny" popular and Britney Spears unpopular. It's why we cheered the judge assigning the sinking celebrity a parenting coach. Ordinary parents are held responsible for protecting their children from every imaginable danger. They are fed a high-anxiety diet of horror stories about lead paint in toys, Crocs on escalators and killer cribs. If you Google "danger" and "children," you get 21 million hits of everything from online predators to junk food. Yet, even the most watchful parents are not immune to criticism. The latest villains are the helicopter parents. See them hover over their children's lives! Watch them pull the invisible apron strings of a cellphone, book their children's playdates and write their college entrance essays while squashing their sense of imagination. Parents even have to protect kids from overprotection. The back story is that America has privatized child-raising. We regard children as the wholly owned subsidiary and responsibility of their families. Parents, in turn, can become so absorbed in worrying about the side rails on cribs that we lose focus on the cultural environment that encases all of us. And there is no bike helmet that can protect our children's brains from the three C's. Before it premiered, "Kid Nation" itself was charged with endangering the children by violating child-labor laws and even child-abuse laws. Indeed, the consent form that the parents signed is as creepy as the ones you don't read before you go into surgery. Even creepier was the scene when two homesick children cried and not one adult had the impulse to drop a camera and offer comfort. Nevertheless, the real trouble in Bonanza is not that the cast of mini-survivors was exposed to "serious bodily injury, illness or death." It's that the children urged to build a better town (read "world") than their forefathers were manipulated into the copycat media culture. The reward is a gold star literally worth its weight in gold: $20,000. The only hero so far is 8-year-old Jimmy, the New Hampshire boy who had the good sense to go home. As for the rest? The children of Bonanza didn't make the rules. They inherited them. It's not a kid nation. It's our nation. (Webmaster Note: Sometimes it pays to write a letter to the editor. Tell CBS "Shame on You". Also see: <http://www.cbskidnation.blogspot.com/>) For complete story, click here.

TYC investigates how prison's 'deplorable conditions' escaped detection--October 2nd, 2007--The Texas Youth Commission is investigating why juvenile inmates endured squalor and deprivation at a privately run West Texas prison that was repeatedly praised by TYC's own quality-assurance monitors. The agency began busling the 197 male inmates from the Coke County Juvenile Justice Center before dawn Tuesday. Officials also canceled an $8-million annual contract with operators of the state's largest private juvenile prison, citing "deplorable conditions." For complete story, click here.

Missouri boot camp part of national investigation--October 3rd, 2007--A Missouri boot camp where a student died nearly three years ago is part of a federal investigation into the nation's facilities for troubled teens. Three former employees of Thayer Learning Center in Kidder, Mo., told The Kansas City Star this week that government investigators told them Thayer was a key focus of that investigation. Greg Spies, a Kansas City attorney for Thayer, said Thayer officials have "fully cooperated" with investigators for the U.S. Government Accountability Office who recently visited the facility and interviewed students. The GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, is conducting the nationwide investigation into residential treatment programs for children at the behest of U.S. Rep. George Miller, a California Democrat. A hearing is scheduled for Oct. 10 in Washington, D.C., before the House Education and Labor Committee, of which Miller is the chairman. Ultimately, Miller's office hopes to convince Congress that boot camp-type facilities should be more stringently regulated. Thayer — which is exempt from state oversight under Missouri law — houses more than 100 troubled teens about 50 miles north of Kansas City. It has been the subject of numerous child abuse allegations, most of which came to light after the November 2004 death of student Roberto Reyes. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kansascity.com Date: October 3, 2007)

Ammonia was 'tipping point' in teen's boot camp death, doctor says--October 4th, 2007--PANAMA CITY, Fla. — A Florida teen who collapsed during a confrontation with boot camp guards died of organ failure after they repeatedly used ammonia capsules to try to revive him, a doctor testified Thursday...Drill instructors Henry Dickens, Charles Enfinger, Patrick Garrett, Raymond Hauck, Charles Helms Jr., Henry McFadden Jr., Joseph Walsh and nurse Kristin Schmidt each face up to 30 years in prison if convicted of aggravated manslaughter of a person under 18. A 25-minute surveillance video of the altercation, which the jury viewed Thursday, shows the guards covering the teen's mouth and waving ammonia capsules in his face on three separate occasions, once for as long as five minutes, while Anderson appears to pass in and out of consciousness. For complete story, click here.

Congressional Hearing: Tough Love or Teen Torment: Will the Industry Finally Be Regulated?--October 8th, 2007--Congress is finally looking into the "troubled teen" industry and the deaths, human rights abuses and other problems that have occurred in teen "boot camps" "wilderness programs" and other "tough love" residential settings. In many states, these institutions are less regulated than dog kennels and nail salons. On Wednesday, Rep. George Miller (D-CA), Chair of the House Education and Labor Committee, will hold a full committee investigative hearing and present results from a Government Accountability Office report that he commissioned. The investigation promises to be revealing-- and may be highly unfavorable to industry claims that it can regulate itself. My book, Help at Any Cost: How the Troubled-Teen Industry Cons Parents and Hurts Kids (Riverhead, 2006), was the first to expose systematic problems in the industry and the complete lack of regulatory oversight on programs that are essentially private jails for kids. The book helped spur Miller's push for legislation. As it stands now, there is more federal regulation protecting mule deer than there is preserving the rights of children in these institutions. Anyone can open one-- there are no qualifications required, nor criminal background checks. Some owners have even made deals with prosecutors and regulators to stay away from their facilities, due to accusations of sexual and other kinds of child abuse. But they were not made to leave the industry! And no legal authority is required to inspect these facilities or see to it that kids are well-treated in them. Teens placed in these settings do not have any right to appeal their confinement: they may be held without contact with the outside world until they turn 18. Moreover, in the programs, they are often subject to "therapies" that many consider torturous: food deprivation, sleep deprivation, total isolation, punitive restraint and constant emotional and even sexual humiliation. When such tactics are used on suspected terrorists, there is a human rights outcry-- but these programs have done everything short of waterboarding kids with impunity for decades. (Webmaster Note: Waterboarding has been done at various teen programs in Mississippi and Georgia, perhaps others as well, if waterboarding is the practice of drowning/reviving/drowning, it's done at teen programs in the U.S.) For complete story, click here.

Tough-Love Teen Camps A "Nightmare"--October 10th, 2007--For years, people have complained about abuses at so-called boot camps and other wilderness programs where frustrated parents send their troubled teens to get straightened out. Today, USA Today gets a sneak peak at the findings from the first federal inquiry into the programs, and the results reveal a lot of tough love -- minus the love. The Government Accountability Office cataloged 1,619 incidents of abuse in 33 states in 2005, according to a study to be released later today. It also looked at a sample of 10 deaths since 1990 and found untrained staff, inadequate food or reckless operations were factors. In half of those cases, the teens died of dehydration or heat exhaustion. "This nightmare has remained an open secret for years," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif, who has designed a bill to encourage states to enact regulations. "Congress must act, and it must act swiftly." Investigators counted thousands of cases of abuse, using Web sites and news reports. Five of the 10 programs where teens died are still operating. The GAO didn't release names, but USA Today pieced together a few of the cases from news reports. For complete story, click here.

Congress Probes Teen Boot Camps--October 10th, 2007--WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal investigator and parents whose children died at youth boot camps urged other families Wednesday to avoid enrolling teens in such programs until there is more oversight of them. "Buyer beware," said Greg Kutz, who led a congressional investigation into the camps. "You really don't know what you're getting." The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, found thousands of allegations of abuse, some of which involved death, at boot camps, also referred to as residential treatment programs, since the early 1990s. Kutz, who led the investigation, said the GAO closely examined 10 closed cases where a teenager died while enrolled in one of these programs. "Ineffective program management played a key role in most of these deaths," Kutz testified before the House Education and Labor Committee. He said the staff at the facilities was often poorly trained, and kids weren't properly fed and were exposed to dangerous conditions. He said teenagers' cries for medical assistance or help were ignored. Kutz said in only one of the 10 cases studied closely was anyone found criminally liable and sentenced to serve prison time. Residential treatment programs are slickly marketed to parents who are at a loss as to how to help an emotionally troubled teen, Kutz said. In the cases he studied, "The parents were pretty much told what they wanted to hear," Kutz said. Bob Bacon, of Phoenix, Ariz., whose son Aaron died while enrolled in a wilderness program in Utah, said he was fooled by the owners of that facility into believing his son would be well cared for. "We were conned by their fraudulent claims and will go to our graves regretting our gullibility," he said. Bacon said his son was forced to hike eight to 10 miles a day with inadequate nutrition and was not given protective gear to withstand freezing temperatures. When Aaron complained of severe stomach pains and asked for a doctor, his pleas were ignored even though he had dramatically lost weight and suffered from other serious symptoms, his father testified. Aaron died of an acute infection related to a perforated ulcer. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://ap.google.com> Date: October 10, 2007)

Troubled US teens suffer abuse, neglect at 'boot camps'--October 11th, 2007--WASHINGTON (AFP) — Troubled American teens have been abused and neglected at the high-discipline, "tough love" programs which are supposed to help them, and have sometimes paid with their lives, according to a report by the US Congress. The report presented to a committee of US lawmakers Wednesday spoke of "thousands of allegations of abuse, some of which involved death, at residential treatment programs across the country and in American-owned and operated facilities abroad between 1990 and 2007. "Today we will hear stories of children denied access to bathrooms and forced to defecate on themselves; children forced to eat dirt or their own vomit; children paired with so-called buddies whose job was to abuse them," Democratic lawmaker George Miller said at the presentation of the report on residential treatment centers, which are designed to help troubled youths. The report, drawn up by the Government Accountability Office (GAO), was released as a Florida court began hearing the case of the beating death -- caught on video tape -- of 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson at a program for young offenders. "During 2005 alone, 33 states reported 1,619 staff members involved in incidents of abuse in residential programs," it said. For complete story, click here.

Teen 'boot camps' get congressional scrutiny--October 10th, 2007--WASHINGTON | The death of 15-year-old Roberto Reyes at a "boot camp" for troubled teenagers in rural Missouri three years ago drew the attention of Congress on Wednesday. Thousands of teenagers have possibly been abused and many have died as a result at similar residential disciplinary treatment programs, a federal investigation has found. The report by the Government Accountability Office addressed problems at several disciplinary programs across the country. Concerns included withholding food, drink and medical care, as well as reckless practices by untrained staff. Its findings, that more than 1,600 employees at treatment centers in 33 states had been linked to incidents of abuse in 2005 alone, were the subject of a House hearing Wednesday. The GAO echoed some of the findings of a 2005 Kansas City Star investigation, which uncovered several alleged instances of abuse at the Thayer Learning Center in Kidder, Mo., north of Kansas City. The owners have denied any wrongdoing. The focus of the hearing was also on parents, forever haunted by choices they'd give anything to take back. "His mother and I will never escape our decision to send our gifted 16-year-old son to his death," testified Bob Bacon of Arizona, whose son, Aaron, died at a Utah wilderness therapy camp. "We were conned by their fraudulent claims and will go to our graves regretting our gullibility." The GAO said that during three weeks in 1994 when Aaron was constantly forced to hike, he complained of severe abdominal pain, lost 20 percent of his body weight and lost control of his bodily functions. He received no medical care. It also found little oversight. Some states license the centers. Others, such as Missouri, don't. "These allegations range from neglect to torture, a word that I don't use lightly," said Democratic Rep. George Miller of California, chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kansascity.com Date: October 10, 2007)

Sexual misconduct plagues US schools--October 21st 2007--An Associated Press investigation found more than 2,500 cases over five years in which educators were punished for actions from bizarre to sadistic. There are 3 million public school teachers nationwide, most devoted to their work. Yet the number of abusive educators — nearly three for every school day — speaks to a much larger problem in a system that is stacked against victims. Most of the abuse never gets reported. Those cases reported often end with no action. Cases investigated sometimes can't be proven, and many abusers have several victims... The findings draw obvious comparisons to sex abuse scandals in other institutions, among them the Roman Catholic Church. A review by America's Catholic bishops found that about 4,400 of 110,000 priests were accused of molesting minors from 1950 through 2002... For complete story, click here.

Deputy indicted, accused of battery at teen academy--October 26th, 2007--A Palm Beach County grand jury has indicted a sheriff's deputy on charges of official misconduct and battery in an incident with a teen at a Belle Glade military-style academy. Deputy Jason Rosen, 36, was booked and released from the Palm Beach County Jail on Thursday evening, after the grand jury handed down the indictment, which has not yet been unsealed. Besides official misconduct, which is a third-degree felony, and misdemeanor battery, he also is charged with falsifying an official document. Rosen has been on paid administrative leave since March 4, when he got into the altercation with the teen at the Eagle Academy. The sheriff's office internal affairs department is also investigating the incident but has not issued its report. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.palmbeachpost.com Date: October 26, 2007)

It's a crime what courts do to kids just being kids--October 27th, 2007--You want your jaw to drop into your lap, your eyes to well up? You should take a peek at my e-mail inbox or listen to the voice mail that arrived on Friday. There was Sheldon Page, who hadn't slept the night before and picked up the paper the moment they threw it on his doorstep. He read in this space on Friday of the elementary school boy now facing criminal charges for allegedly slapping a female classmate on the buttocks. He called. His 14-year-old grandson was due in court Friday afternoon for sentencing. His anguish had kept him awake. A 13-year-old girl had told her mother the boy touched her bottom during a game of tag in May. The boy ultimately pleaded guilty to sexual assault and was placed in a juvenile facility Tuesday. "It is the most outrageous thing I've ever heard of," Sheldon Page, 51, said. "He is a kid, a teenager playing a kid's game, and now they've made him a criminal." There was the lawyer who wrote to tell of his client, a fourth-grader charged with sexual assault for putting his hand in the pants of a female fourth-grader. The police picked him up at school. "Common sense has left the building," he writes. There was Catherine - who, like almost all who called or wrote, asked that I not use a last name. "Tell that boy's parents to leave the country because it will be hell on earth from now on," she said. Her grandson was 11 years old when an 11-year-old girl told her parents they were on the playground swing together and she could feel his genitals. "He was convicted of sexual harassment, and life has been hell ever since," Catherine said. Now 13 years old, he has registered as a sex offender, sees a probation officer once a month and must undergo lie-detector tests. He cannot go more than four blocks from home without his parents, she said. At school, he is not allowed to touch anyone and must use a private restroom. "Tell those parents I feel sorry for their son and them," she said. And then there was Mel. His story is typical of the more than a dozen I've heard since Friday's column appeared. Mel is 63. He has a 12-year-old boy. It was late in the last school year when a shoving match broke out at the boy's school. About eight kids were involved. One kid suffered a cracked lip and a few bruises. The cops came for only Mel's kid and one other. Assault and intent to commit injury were the charges. Mel hired an attorney, took his boy out of the school after he served a one-day suspension and got him a tutor to help him finish the school year. He also put the boy in counseling. "With that many witnesses, there was no way we could win. Our lawyer told us," Mel said, "that the best thing we could do is take a deal or spend $20,000- plus for a trial." So his boy took the deal, which wasn't much of one. Forty-five days in jail, deferred, the judge ordered, plus two years of supervised probation, 75 hours community service, anger-management classes, court costs, $600 restitution, a two-year restraining order and a written apology to the victim. "It was a schoolyard fight, and not much of one at that," Mel said in an interview. "You just don't know what such a little thing can lead to until you get tangled up in it." (Webmaster Note: Stop the war on youth!!!) For complete story, click here.

DENNIS TOWNSHIP, N.J.: 2nd-grader is suspended for making picture of gun--October 21st, 2007--A second-grader's drawing of a stick figure shooting a gun earned him a one-day school suspension. Kyle Walker, 7, was suspended last week for violating Dennis Township Primary School's zero-tolerance policy on guns, the boy's mother, Shirley McDevitt, told The Press of Atlantic City. Kyle gave the picture to another child on the school bus, and that child's parents complained about it to school officials, McDevitt said. Her son told her the drawing was of a water gun, she said. (Webmaster Note: Stop the war on children!!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.siltdaily.com Date: October 21, 2007)

Parents take caution--November 5th, 2007--When an unruly child is too much to handle, parents become desperate for a solution. Some will even resort to enrolling their children into residential treatment programs or wilderness therapy camps. The controversial "tough love" strategies to turn troubled teens around is further being looked at under a microscope with a newly released study by the Government Accountability Office that says the programs place children in potentially life-threatening conditions. Some opponents to these rehabilitation programs call them an industry for "teen torture," while parents with children who have been straightened out profess them to be miracles. The GAO, however, found that majority of programs and camps to do more harm than good. In its study, revealed in October at Congressional hearings, thousands of allegations of abuse and neglect over nearly two decades were gathered with primary focus on the deaths of 10 teenagers - five of which occurred in Utah. (Webmaster Note: The article further inaccurately proclaims that UT effectively regulates and licenses programs for teens. The State of Utah covers up abuses and other violations at teen programs in their state. Do not send your child to Utah.. Keep them at home! Take responsibility for your own family!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.thespectrum.com Date: November 5, 2007)

Are we too quick to medicate children?--November 5th, 2007--KATIE'S middle child "has always had a lot going on in her head," says her mother. And much of it has been a mystery to Katie, who has coped with her daughter's escalating tantrums, combative behavior, bouts of fearfulness and just-plain-oddy since the 11-year-old was a toddler. Katie, left, worries whether medication is the right solution for her temperamental 11-year-old daughter. "No one wants to feel that their child is a guinea pig," she says. A month ago, Katie, a 38-year-old L.A.-area mother of three, brought the child to a psychiatrist. The child's behavior and performance in school were exemplary, but an ill-tempered outburst had gotten the preteen kicked out of a Girl Scout troop she had joined at age 5. The girl was confused and heartbroken over her ejection. The daughter came away from the appointment with a diagnosis of bipolar disorder. Katie, who asked that her full name be withheld to protect her daughter's privacy, came away with a list of 10 powerful psychiatric medicines and a momentous decision to make. Some combination of these mood-stabilizing, anticonvulsive and antipsychotic drugs, Katie was told, would probably control her daughter's problematic behaviors, that a psychiatrist termed, "symptoms of a disease." Now it's Katie who has the racing thoughts and the alternating bouts of fear, anxiety, relief and anger. As she ponders whether her daughter's strange behavior really amounts to mental illness -- and whether medication is the answer -- she says, "I feel like I'm flying blind." And she's not reassured by the suspicion that the psychiatric profession is as confused about diagnosing and treating mental illness in children as she is. All these psychiatric labels and pills may keep many kids on track and even save lives, Katie says. But both seem to be dispensed with little certainty as to what they mean and how they work -- and even less debate over their long-term consequences for children. In 2005, the latest year for which statistics are available, at least 2.2 million American children over the age of 4 were being treated for serious difficulties with emotion, concentration, behavior or ability to get along with others. It's a figure mental-health professionals say has exploded in the last decade and a half, along with sales of a wide range of psychiatric medications for use by children. A welter of studies has shown that kids are being diagnosed at younger ages, with a wider range of disorders and with more severe disorders than ever before. And in growing numbers, they are being medicated with drugs whose safety, effectiveness and long-range effects on children have not been demonstrated by extensive research. A study published in September found that the diagnosis among children of bipolar disorder, a mental illness long thought not to exist in kids, grew 40-fold over the last decade. The prescribing to kids of antipsychotic drugs typically used to treat the symptoms of bipolar illness have soared as well, despite continuing concerns over side effects such as weight gain, metabolic changes that can lead to diabetes, and tremors. Psychiatrists admit they haven't drawn clear lines between problem behaviors and mental illness, especially in kids, and they are debating future fixes. But until those fixes are made, parents -- with their kids' futures on the line -- are left with little to guide them when a child is tagged with a psychiatric label. Protection from what? Katie's maternal instincts tell her she must protect her child. But from what, she asks -- a disease that threatens health, happiness and future? A bogus label applied to an admittedly challenging kid? Or drugs with potentially harmful and little-studied side effects? And protect her exactly how -- by resisting or by medicating? "I don't want to face her as an adult and say I didn't do everything I could to make her well. I feel like I'm answering to her future self," Katie says. "But so much of this is a crapshoot. No one wants to feel that their child is a guinea pig." Mental-health professionals have long warned that the stigma of mental illness and the cost of its treatment have left millions of Americans with psychiatric disorders to suffer untreated. But as childhood diagnoses of mental illness have surged, some in the profession charge the field of child psychiatry with the opposite problem. A scourge of over-diagnosis, says a growing body of critics, has come to child psychiatry. The trend, say these critics, threatens to turn kids like Katie's daughter -- a preteen whose behavior is certainly odd but whose school life remains on track -- into potentially lifelong patients. And, they add, it has changed the way Americans think about children. Critics warn that as psychiatric diagnosis and medication of children becomes more widespread, teachers, well-meaning neighbors and relatives, and parents themselves are becoming less willing to accept youthful misfits for who they are and to help them adapt without prescribing drugs or attaching labels. (Webmaster Note: See the HEAL Parenting Guide) For complete story, click here.

The U.S. Psycho-Pharmaceutical-Industrial Complex--Z Magazine--November, 2007--In Eugene Jarecki's documentary film Why We Fight, about the U.S. military-industrial complex, U.S. foreign policy critic Chalmers Johnson states: "I guarantee you when war becomes that profitable, you are going to see more of it." Similarly, as mental illness has become extremely profitable, we are seeing more of it. On September 4, 2007, the New York Times reported, "The number of American children and adolescents treated for bipolar disorder increased 40-fold from 1994 to 2003. . . . Drug makers and company-sponsored psychiatrists have been encouraging doctors to look for the disorder" ("Bipolar Illness Soars as a Diagnosis for the Young"). Not too long ago, a child who was irritable, moody, and distractible and who at times sounded grandiose or acted without regard for consequences was considered a "handful." In the U.S. by the 1980s, that child was labeled with a "behavioral disorder" and today that child is being diagnosed as "bipolar" and "psychotic"--and prescribed expensive antipsychotic drugs. Bloomberg News, also on September 4, 2007, reported, "The expanded use of bipolar as a pediatric diagnosis has made children the fastest-growing part of the $11.5 billion U.S. market for antipsychotic drugs." Psychopathologizing young people is not the only reason for the dramatic rise in sales of such antipsychotics as Eli Lilly's Zyprexa and Johnson & Johnson's Risperdal (each, in recent years, grossing annually from $3 to $4 billion). Much of Big Pharma's antipsychotic boon is attributable to generous U.S. government agencies, especially Medicaid. The Medicaid gravy train has been fueled by Big Pharma corruption so over-the-top that it has been the subject of recent media exposures. The Associated Press, on August 21, 2007, reported, "A groundbreaking Minnesota law is shining a rare light into the big money that drug companies spend on members of state advisory panels who help select which drugs are used in Medicaid programs for the poor and disabled." Those advisory panels--dominated by physicians-- have great influence over the $28 billion spent by Medicaid on drugs, but only Minnesota, Vermont, and Maine require drug companies to report monies paid to physicians. The AP article focused on John E. Simon, a psychiatrist on the Minnesota advisory panel since 2004, who received $489,000 from Eli Lilly between 1998 and 2006. The top drugs paid for by Minnesota Medicaid, according to the AP article, have been antipsychotic drugs, especially Eli Lilly's Zyprexa. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://zmagsite.zmag.org> (Z Magazine) Date: November, 2007)

Child held without mom at Texas detention center--DALLAS — An 8-year-old girl was separated from her pregnant mother and left behind for four days at a detention center set up to hold immigrant families together while they await outcomes to their cases. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials say they had to transfer the Honduran woman because she twice resisted attempts to deport her and was potentially disruptive. ICE spokesman Carl Rusnok said guards and ICE staff watched the child after her mother was removed from the T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility. But others are critical of the agency's handling of the case, saying it put the girl at risk and is another example of why the facility should be closed. "Here, it's the government itself that has the custody of this child and then leaves her without proper supervision," said Denise Gilman, who oversees the Immigration Clinic at the University of Texas School of Law, which provides legal services to Hutto detainees. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: November, 2007)

Suit says TYC breaks pepper-spray rules--November 19th, 2007--AUSTIN — Texas Youth Commission staffers continue to use pepper spray against inmates for offenses no more serious than speaking out of turn or refusing to follow rules, two Texas advocacy groups argued in court Monday. Attorneys for Texas Applesseed and Advocacy Inc. have accused the agency of violating its own guidelines by allowing staff members to use pepper spray on inmates in "passive-resistance situations" when they pose no serious threat to anyone. The attorneys say the use of pepper spray inside TYC units has skyrocketed this year —

1,221 incidents to date, compared with 196 incidents in all of 2006. In early October, a 17-year-old male youth on suicide watch at the Evins Regional Juvenile Center in Edinburg was apparently sprayed for refusing orders to keep his hands out of the tray slot in his cell door. Other youths have apparently been sprayed for refusing to get out of bed; talking during lunch or refusing to follow the dress code, the suit contends. "Pepper spray is the high-tech equivalent of old-fashioned corporal punishment," Steve Martin, a longtime expert on corrections who has been hired by the advocacy groups, said outside the Travis County courtroom. He said it was ludicrous for the agency to suggest that pepper spray did not cause injuries. "It causes intense burning and pain and panic," he said. The advocacy groups are suing TYC, accusing it of failing to follow an agreement reached by the two sides in September that was supposed to limit the instances in which pepper spray could be used. After three hours of testimony, state District Judge Gisela Triana urged both sides to attempt to reach an agreement by Wednesday on specific instances in which the use of pepper spray would be appropriate. TYC's critics claim the agency is seeking authority to broaden, not limit, the use of pepper spray at its units. Proposed use-of-force guidelines would allow pepper spray to be authorized by a unit's administrator "on a case-by-case basis" not just to protect against loss of life or the threat of serious bodily harm. "It hugely expands it," said Deborah Fowler, legal director for Applesseed No one at TYC or the Texas Attorney General's office would comment on the proposed rule changes. But earlier, attorneys for TYC argued that pepper spray is often apt to cause fewer injuries to staff and offenders than manual restraint. "Juvenile correctional officers had a history of laying hands on these kids to try to control them and as a result, some of the staff and kids were injured," said Terry Thompson, of the Attorney General's office. Pepper spray was listed in the agency's manual as a last-resort means of controlling out-of-control youth. But the acting executive director, Dimitria Pope, tried to change that policy in early August by ordering staff to use pepper spray before resorting to physical restraint. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: November 19, 2007)

Report gives state's Youth Court system scathing review--November 28th, 2007--Mississippi's Youth Court system compromises public safety and violates the constitutional rights of children because of overwhelming caseloads and inadequate resources, according to a report. The two-year study by the Mississippi Youth Justice Project of the Southern Poverty Law Center and the National Juvenile Defender Center also outlined other problems plaguing the system, including: Untimely appointment of attorneys to represent youths. Inadequate representation of youths. An overflow of referrals from schools. Youth courts are overrun with referrals from local schools where children are routinely arrested for minor, school-related offenses that drain resources, clog dockets and fill detention-center beds, according to the study. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.clarionledger.com Date: November 28, 2007)

Juvenile inmates' suit alleges abuse by guard--December 6th, 2007--DALLAS — Seven inmates who were held at the Coke County Juvenile Justice Center have sued the private firm that operated the lockup, claiming they were abused by a guard who was a registered sex offender. The inmates allege they were mentally, physically and sexually abused in 2006 and early 2007 by David Andrew Lewis, 24, who worked the night shift until he was fired in March. The federal civil rights lawsuit, which was filed Friday in San Antonio, names GEO Group Inc. The Florida-based company ran the facility in Bronte, 30 miles northeast of San Angelo, until the state removed all inmates and canceled GEO's contract in October citing unsanitary and unsafe conditions. Lewis was not named as a defendant. GEO spokesman Pablo Paez said the company had no comment about the lawsuit. Lewis couldn't be reached. The Texas Youth Commission also declined to comment. GEO fired Lewis when it learned about his sex offender status as a result of an investigation stemming from the overhaul of the TYC, which has been racked by claims of sexual abuse and mismanagement. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: December 6, 2007)

Young girl arrested for bringing steak knife to school--December 18th, 2007--A 10-year-old girl faces a felony weapons charge after she brought a kitchen knife to school to cut up her lunch. The Sunrise Elementary 5th grader was brown-bagging it. Her mom packed her a piece of steak for lunch, so she put a knife in the brown bag so she could cut the steak. Teachers saw her cutting the steak and immediately took the knife and called deputies. But a couple of teachers took the utensil and called the sheriff. When deputies arrived, they were unable to get the child's parents on the phone, so they arrested her and took her to the county's juvenile assessment center. Police say they didn't handcuff the child, but they did make her undergo a complete assessment. The girl's uncle says his niece is devastated over the arrest and has been crying her eyes out. School officials say it doesn't matter what the knife was being used for. They said they had no choice. The student now faces a felony charge for the possession of a weapon on school property and the principal suspended her for ten days. The sheriff's office has turned the case over to the State Attorney's Office. (Webmaster Note: Stop oppressing and demonizing children. Where's your common sense?) For complete story, click here.

German teen sent to cope in Siberia--January 18th, 2008--German authorities exasperated at the antisocial behaviour of a 16-year-old boy have sent him to a remote Siberian village for an "intensive educational experience", it emerged yesterday. The unusual measure by youth welfare officers in the central state of Hesse raised fresh questions about how to deal with delinquents who have been blamed for a series of ugly crimes. The boy, who has not been identified, was dispatched east after behaving violently in school and at home and attacking his mother. He is being forced to fend for himself in boot camp-style conditions in the forlorn village of Sedelnikovo, several hours drive from the city of Omsk, in the western Siberian interior. He has had to cope by collecting and chopping firewood to make his own fires, digging his own toilet and pumping water supplies from a well. He will stay there for nine months, separated from family and friends, the internet and television, under a programme designed specifically for him. Under the supervision of a Russian-speaking German assistant, the boy is also attending school. Once he returns to Germany, he will be monitored for a further two years. "We deliberately sought a region that was particularly lacking in allure," said Stefan Becker, the head of the youth and social department in Giessen, calling it "the ultima ratio" in the attempt to re-educate the boy, for whom all other measures had failed. "[The youth] spends most of his time trying to cope with his day to day existence, living in conditions like we had 30 or 40 years ago," he added. "If he doesn't chop the wood, his room is cold. If he doesn't fetch water, he can't wash." The Hesse authorities have defended the move as an "educational adventure" and say an inspector who visited the boy believed the "treatment" was working. Hundreds of other youths have been sent on similar programmes to countries as diverse as Greece and Kyrgyzstan. The details have emerged in the midst of one of the most heated state election campaigns that Germany has known for years, in which youth crime has featured prominently. The Christian Democratic state president of Hesse, Roland Koch, has called for boot camps and "warning-shot" arrests to be applied to young criminals, and his election speeches have particularly focused on clamping down on immigrants, said to be responsible for half of all crimes committed by the under-21s. The chancellor, Angela Merkel, has backed Koch's campaign, saying that the discussion was long overdue. Koch's stance on crime and immigration has won national resonance and the Hesse vote on January 27 - as well as one in the state of Lower Saxony on the same day - is an early test for Merkel ahead of next year's federal election. But the decision to send the teenager to Siberia is a step too far for some, particularly as equally bleak, though not as cold, regions are to be found in Germany. One commentator called it "more akin to a reality TV show than a social welfare programme". Some have described it as a cost-cutting measure, which, at €150 a day (£111), is about a third of the price of a similar scheme in Germany. For complete story, click here.

Texas Youth Commission shake-up fails to eliminate punitive and inhumane measures against juveniles-- January 20th, 2008--On the same day last November that the Chronicle published an editorial calling for speedy rebuilding of the scandal-scarred Texas Youth Commission, the agency ombudsman sent an alarming memo to TYC acting director Dimitria Pope. A year after revelations of sexual abuse of inmates by reform school guards and wardens led to ouster of the TYC board and management, it seems the agency is slipping back into its bad habits. In the memo, chief ombudsman Will Harrell alerted Pope to evidence that agency employees were putting more young people in solitary confinement in violation of TYC's policies and procedures. Under the TYC's Behavior Management Program and its "Stop the Violence" campaign, TYC supervisors have become increasingly reliant on sending teens with behavioral problems to isolation cells without required due process hearings or psychological evaluations. Even worse, according to Harrell, some of the inmates at a correctional facility in Mart, east of Waco, have been left in solitary for days and even weeks with scant access to therapy, sanitary conditions and outside exercise. The ombudsman cited a case in which a youth had been locked down for eight days. He was allowed on only two occasions to go to classes and was given outdoor recreation only once. "Conditions in security are inadequate and unsanitary," Harrell wrote. "One cell has no light or bed, yet a kid has been in the cell for over 24 hours." Records obtained by the Chronicle indicate that since August, the number of young people placed in isolation across the state rose from 52 to 82. As Harrell reminded Pope, the settlement of a 1983 lawsuit brought against the TYC bans the use of isolation as a mode of retaliation or as a first-resort punishment against youth offenders. With only a few exceptions, the agreement allows placement in solitary only as a last resort and for a period not to exceed 24 hours. It also calls for the student to be released from isolation as soon as he is under control and not posing a danger to himself or others. Harrell recommended that a TYC team audit the transfers of youths to solitary and release those who do not meet the criteria or did not receive due process and psychological exams. Until that happens, a moratorium on isolation should go into effect. A thorough evaluation of agency use of solitary confinement should be accompanied by implementation of positive rather than punitive behavior mod programs. In the two months since Harrell sent his memo, nothing has been done to address the issues he raised. While Pope was unavailable for comment, newly appointed TYC conservator Richard Nedelkoff indicated he had not been told of Harrell's concerns and would analyze the situation and come up with recommendations in 35 to 40 days. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: January 20, 2008)

Family worry over child's welfare--The inadequacy of juvenile detention and rehabilitation facilities in the Cayman Islands, which has resulted in the use of the Tranquillity Bay youth rehabilitation facility in Jamaica, has once again raised questions about the level of treatment given to Caymanian youth. Jan Scott of Cayman Brac has expressed concerns over possible violations of a relative's human rights after the juvenile was allegedly swiftly moved from the Frances Bodden Girls Home in Grand Cayman to Tranquillity Bay without the family's approval. Ms Scott said the minor was not properly assessed before being dispatched to Jamaica for rehabilitation. She feels the decision and the handling of the matter was unjust and may worsen the child's condition. Over the past week, Cayman Net News has been contacting the Department of Children and Family Services, CAYS Foundation and the Human Rights Committee for comments through phone calls and emails, but all remained tight-lipped on the matter. Numerous numbers dialled for Tranquillity Bay in Jamaica went unanswered for several days. Maureen Brooks, Frances Bodden Girls Home Manager, said that, as the matter relates to a juvenile, she would prefer that media inquiries be addressed to the CAYS Foundation. The CAYS Foundation, a government entity, oversees both the girls' and boys' homes in Grand Cayman. Following the death of one parent, the minor moved in with the other parent but that relationship soured, resulting in the child being sent to Frances Bodden Girls Home. According to Ms Scott, the relative is still mourning the death of her parent and is apparently "acting out" or "seeking attention" -- a cry for help, as she described it. The child's troubles began, Ms Scott alleges, when the juvenile was taken to court for an incident at school for which the court advised that she be sent to Tranquillity Bay. This decision, coupled with "other issues," drove her over the edge, Ms Scott believes. Ms Scott further alleged that the child was "pulled from her bed" at Frances Bodden and "locked up" by police before sending her to the Tranquillity Bay facility for rehabilitation. There are outstanding questions about the handling, treatment, possible violation of human rights and care of this child, Ms Scott said. She contacted the Civil Service who, she said, had "insufficient information on this serious matter". The situation has had an even more devastating effect because no family member was able to see the child before she was flown off the Island, she said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.caymanetnews.com Date: January, 2008)

How Teenage Rebellion Has Become a Mental Illness--January 28th, 2008--For a generation now, disruptive young Americans who rebel against authority figures have been increasingly diagnosed with mental illnesses and medicated with psychiatric (psychotropic) drugs. Disruptive young people who are medicated with Ritalin, Adderall and other amphetamines routinely report that these drugs make them "care less" about their boredom, resentments and other negative emotions, thus making them more compliant and manageable. And so-called atypical antipsychotics such as Risperdal and Zyprexa -- powerful tranquilizing drugs -- are increasingly prescribed to disruptive young Americans, even though in most cases they are not displaying any psychotic symptoms. Many talk show hosts think I'm kidding when I mention oppositional defiant disorder (ODD). After I assure them that ODD is in fact an official mental illness -- an increasingly popular diagnosis for children and teenagers -- they often guess that ODD is simply a new term for juvenile delinquency. But that is not the case. Young people diagnosed with ODD, by definition, are doing nothing illegal (illegal behaviors are a symptom of another mental illness called conduct disorder). In 1980, the American Psychiatric Association (APA) created oppositional defiant disorder, defining it as "a pattern of negativistic, hostile and defiant behavior." The official symptoms of ODD include "often actively defies or refuses to comply with adult requests or rules" and "often argues with adults." While ODD-diagnosed young people are obnoxious with adults they don't respect, these kids can be a delight with adults they do respect; yet many of them are medicated with psychotropic drugs. An even more common reaction to oppressive authorities than overt defiance is some type of passive defiance. John Holt, the late school critic, described passive-aggressive strategies employed by prisoners in concentration camps and slaves on plantations, as well as some children in classrooms. Holt pointed out that subjects may attempt to appease their rulers while still satisfying some part of their own desire for dignity "by putting on a mask, by acting much more stupid and incompetent than they really are, by denying their rulers the full use of their intelligence and ability, by declaring their minds and spirits free of their enslaved bodies." Holt observed that by "going stupid" in a classroom, children frustrate authorities through withdrawing the most intelligent and creative parts of their minds from the scene, thus achieving some sense of potency. Going stupid -- or passive aggression -- is one of many nondisease explanations for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD). Studies show that virtually all ADHD-diagnosed children will pay attention to activities that they enjoy or that they have chosen. In other words, when ADHD-labeled kids are having a good time and in control, the "disease" goes away. There are other passive rebellions against authority that have been medicalized by mental health authorities. I have talked to many people who earlier in their lives had been diagnosed with substance abuse, depression and even schizophrenia but believe that their "symptoms" had in fact been a kind of resistance to the demands of an oppressive environment. Some of these people now call themselves psychiatric survivors. For complete story, click here.

Reform school failure--February 12th, 2008--A year after the sexual and physical abuse of young inmates by Texas Youth Commission wardens was disclosed, little has improved and the agency's leadership continues to founder. Entrusted with the custody of thousands of Texas teenagers with behavioral problems, the agency remains a ship adrift in need of a strong captain rather than another deck chair shuffle. The forced resignation Monday of Acting Director Dimitria Pope by Conservator Richard Nedelkoff has key state legislators wondering what measures are necessary to get the TYC out of crisis. Last week Nedelkoff, a gubernatorial appointee and the third person to hold the position in the last 12 months, repeatedly told lawmakers at a hearing that he had not decided who would be named full-time director. He was then embarrassed when Pope testified that he had already ruled her out. Nedelkoff later demanded that Pope resign or be fired, and she stepped down. Pope was brought in from the adult prison program to manage TYC after the previous director and board of trustees resigned. She was criticized for expanding the use of pepper spray to subdue juvenile inmates, ignoring a report on excessive use of solitary confinement and approving the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars for office furnishings. Nedelkoff's own decisions have come under fire. He receives a $160,000 annual salary for his state position, but he also kept his CEO position at Eckerd Youth Alternatives, a Florida company that is in the juvenile corrections business. After becoming TYC conservator, he brought in several consultants with links to Eckerd. After being called on the issue last week, he resigned from the firm, a hollow gesture, as he will likely return to it after the temporary conservator position expires. State Sen. John Whitmire, D-Houston, the chair of the Senate Criminal Justice Committee, is an admirer of Pope's performance in the state prison system and said she was in an impossible position at TYC without the resources or administrative support to do the job. Whitmire said a top priority should be relocating isolated youth facilities to more urban settings, where most of the inmates come from and where medical resources and prospective employers are more readily available. Unfortunately, legislators where the institutions are located resist moving them and, by making the issue a hot potato, have delayed much-needed restructuring of the system. Whitmire said Nedelkoff's lack of candor in dealing with legislators last week has damaged his credibility. "To be honest, I'm not sure what we've got in this guy, and I'm going to obviously work with him, because the stakes are too high," Whitmire said. "This agency needs some stability, and he's going to have to prove to me he can provide it." It's shocking and unacceptable that after a year of attempted reform of the TYC by the governor and the Legislature, so little has been accomplished and so much remains to be done. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: February 12, 2008)

SPLC Campaign Closes Mississippi Girl's Prison!--Seven months after the Southern Poverty Law Center sued Mississippi to stop the physical and sexual abuse of teenage girls confined at the notorious Columbia Training School, the state has decided to close the facility. For complete story, click here.

How growing woes doomed a Hollywood drug clinic--February 21st, 2008--There were the big things: the constant escapes, the fistfights and the sex abuse allegations, and the former financial officer accused of stealing $2 million. And the little ones: the filthy floors, the missing toilet paper, and the mattresses that were old and wafer-thin. Eventually, the problems plaguing The Starting Place's residential drug treatment program in Hollywood simply became too much to ignore. For years, administrators at Florida's Department of Children & Families and a local advocacy group that routinely inspected the program for troubled teens, nudged and coaxed and cajoled. Managers of the program -- which had maintained a very good reputation since opening in 1969 -- promised to do better. Hundreds of pages of DCF records, obtained by The Miami Herald on Wednesday, show they seldom did. Last week, DCF shuttered the residential treatment program, 2057 Coolidge St., revoked its licenses and moved about 45 youths into alternative programs. The treatment center in Plantation also run by

The Starting Place, has not had such problems and remains in operation. The chairwoman of the program's board, Lynn Strauss, could not be reached for comment Wednesday. The actions come amid a host of recent troubles: Hollywood police, along with the Broward Sheriff's Office's child abuse investigations unit, are looking into allegations that some youths were sexually abused by staff, said Jack Moss, DCF's top administrator in Broward County. The investigations remain ongoing. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.miamiherald.com Date: February 21, 2008)

Teen accuses Evins staff of abuse--February 22nd, 2008--EDINBURG — More allegations of abuse have surfaced at the Evins Regional Juvenile Facility, less than a month after administrators there pledged to reform policies on restraining inmates. A former teenage resident claims a staff member at the troubled detention center threw him to the ground and violently attacked him after a raucous group therapy session in July 2007. The incident left 15-year-old Robert Romero Jr. with a dislocated hip, fractured pelvis and a ruptured artery in his thigh, according to a federal lawsuit filed this week against Evins and the Texas Youth Commission, the state agency that oversees the detention center. "It takes quite a lot to make a grown man cry," his father, Robert Romero Sr., said. "But after I saw my son, I broke down in tears." The accusations come within three weeks of a proposed settlement agreement between the U.S. Department of Justice and the Texas Youth Commission that would end a civil rights lawsuit filed on behalf of Evins inmates. The facility has come under intense scrutiny in the past two years after several inmates accused guards of using overly violent means to restrain them. Romero's attorney, Christopher J. Gale, sees his client's cases as proof that Evins' troubles are far from over. "There has been a lot of concern there about the use of force," he said. "We have to remember that these are just kids." For complete story, click here.

Tarnished View of Wonder Drugs--February 17th, 2008--When they were first introduced in the early 1990s, new antipsychotic medications for severe mental illness were seen as wonder drugs that were safer and more effective than their predecessors. Sales soared as doctors tried them on new conditions, including dementia, aggression and other behavioral problems. Children and the elderly were among the biggest users. But now, several studies questioning some of the drugs' benefits have led many doctors to talk of using them for shorter periods and with tighter monitoring, because of side effects that include sedation, obesity and diabetes. "You can't just pop someone on it and see them in a year," said Jason Karlawish, a geriatric psychiatrist at the University of Pennsylvania. These drugs, known as atypical antipsychotics, offer a contentious case study of a common pattern in pharmaceuticals. New drugs are typically approved for narrow uses and get tried off-label on conditions that are difficult to treat. Companies' sales efforts stoke up overall use until the research catches up years later, dulling the early enthusiasm. While some patients are helped, lawsuits are also a common legacy. The atypicals were originally approved for severe mental illness - schizophrenia and bipolar disorder - which had limited markets. But under a determined marketing effort portraying them as safer and more effective than their predecessors, the atypicals came to be tried beyond their approved uses for nursing-home residents, prisoners, and children younger than 6 years old. Total U.S. sales for the class reached $13 billion in 2007, doubling sales of 2002, according to IMS Health Inc., a pharmaceutical-information firm. Atypicals carry such names as Risperdal, made by Janssen Pharmaceutica, part of Johnson & Johnson; Zyprexa from Eli Lilly & Co.; Seroquel by AstraZeneca P.L.C.; Geodon by Pfizer Inc.; and Abilify by Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. All over the country, state officials are discovering that atypicals have become the largest drug class in Medicaid, the health program for the poor. And many state officials question whether that reflects overzealous marketing or real need. Several states, including Pennsylvania, are suing some drugmakers for allegedly promoting the drugs beyond approved uses and commissioning "ghost-written" articles to stoke use of the drugs. The drugmakers reject the suits' claims and are obtaining new approvals from the Food and Drug Administration to treat more conditions. In the last two years, Janssen's Risperdal got approval to treat schizophrenia in adolescents and the irritability of autism in ages 5 to 16. Atypicals remain a cornerstone of care for serious mental illness. Ellen Sholevar, director of child and adolescent psychiatry at the Temple University School of Medicine, said atypicals could help children even though they had not been well-studied. Antipsychotics are used when young children appear to be out of control and represent a danger to themselves or others, or have "very severe disorders where there is no other viable treatment option," she said. Naas Siddiqui, 25, of West Philadelphia, said that antipsychotics eased her manic symptoms and helped her graduate from Yale University in 2007. While Zyprexa made her lethargic and gain weight, she said, Abilify calmed her. She gets her blood tested every six months and sees a physician more frequently. "I don't want to stay on it permanently. But I think it's helped me significantly," she said. A different view of the drugs came from Nicola Huff of Pleasantville, N.J., whose son, John Aaron, took Risperdal for seven years to resolve his behavioral problems. But at age 14, he developed a well-known drug side effect: female-size breasts that had to be surgically removed. "He would ask me 'Am I a girl?'" And I would tell him 'no,'" Nicola Huff said. Tammy Wandling, whose son Austin has autism, said a psychiatrist put him on Risperdal at age 4. In less than nine months, Austin developed a baseball-size growth in his right breast. "I couldn't believe how big it was," said his mother, who lives near Charleston, W.Va. Research suggests Risperdal, like the older antipsychotics, can cause an increase in the hormone prolactin, which directs breasts to enlarge and make milk. Risperdal's label warns about the possibility. The experience helped drive both women to hire Steve Sheller and James J. Pepper, both Philadelphia lawyers. "They're being given an easy out with a pill. But the easy out may create a much more serious problem," Sheller said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.philly.com Date: February 17, 2008)

TYC to close Sheffield Boot Camp--February 28th, 2008--Texas Youth Commission officials plan to close the Sheffield Boot Camp in remote West Texas, a facility that has been plagued for months by staff shortages and a dwindling count of incarcerated youths. Located in a remote part of West Texas, the camp that once housed 128 boys held just 17 today, officials said. Fifty-nine staff members were on duty Wednesday. The closure, confirmed this morning in a letter to legislative leaders, is the first for the troubled agency after months of rumors that Sheffield and other lockups were targeted. "It is apparent that the agency will continue to experience staffing difficulties that make the long-term viability of the Sheffield facility tenuous," Youth Commission Conservator Richard Nedelkoff said in a letter to the legislative leaders. "We are putting together a plan to transition all youth and employees at Sheffield to other TYC facilities by the end of March 2008. ... I do not believe there are any remaining options for this facility." At a time when several Youth Commission lockups still do not meet the 12:1 staffing ratio mandated by law, Sheffield had about 1:3. Oddly, the youth population was drastically cut in October because there was not enough staff to properly guard them. The agency is 528 correctional officers short of a budgeted staff of 2,776. In his letter, Nedelkoff said while a review continues of possibly closing other youth lockups, "I anticipate we will need to utilize the remaining facilities" through August 2009. Nedelkoff was not immediately available for comment. Legislative leaders had said they expected as many as three lockups might be closed in coming months because of a declining population of incarcerated teenagers and a continuing shortage of staff. In addition to Sheffield, the Victory Field boot camp in Vernon and the West Texas State School in remote Pyote have been listed as up for possible closure. The West Texas State School is where allegations that incarcerated teenage boys were being sexually assaulted by officials while top Youth Commission officials looked the other way, triggering a headline-grabbing scandal a year ago that resulted in the firing of top management and the agency being placed in conservatorship. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.statesman.com Date: February 28, 2008)

Police: Worker Assaulted Teen In Marietta Treatment Center--February 28th, 2008--MARIETTA, Ga. -- Police say a worker at an adolescent treatment center slipped into a patient's room in the middle of the night and sexually assaulted her. It happened at the Hartmann Center in Marietta. A teenaged girl complained Robert Lee Jones snuck into her room while she was sleeping and fondled her. Marietta Police arrested Jones and charged him with sexual assault. He is still in the Cobb County Jail tonight. The courts send troubled teens to the Hartmann Center for treatment for substance abuse problems. For complete story, click here.

Youth pleads to get out of rehab--February 29th, 2008--A 16-year-old girl, who was forcibly sent to Tranquility Bay in Jamaica for rehabilitation, has made a "heart-wrenching" plea to her mother to remove her from the youth facility. A letter, which was given to Cayman Net News by the minor's mother, Latchmin "Charlene" Scott, is dated 27 January and was given to Mrs Scott by her daughter's former Social Worker, Carol Robinson, during the week beginning 17 February. "I really need you at this time; please I am begging you to get me out of here. Please it was bad enough in girls home but now it's worse," writes the minor. The issue was first reported in this publication earlier this month after the juvenile was allegedly swiftly moved from the Frances Bodden Girls Home in Grand Cayman to Tranquility Bay without the family's approval. The young person's aunt, Jan Scott of Cayman Brac, expressed concerns over possible violations of her niece's human rights and said the minor was not properly assessed before being dispatched to Jamaica for rehabilitation. Jan Scott also stated that she felt the decision and handling of the matter was unjust and may worsen her niece's condition. Latchmin Scott is very concerned with the way in which her daughter has been treated by the authorities. "She needed help but it could have happened in a different way," she said. The mother explained that her daughter, who went to the Frances Bodden Girls Home in September 2007 after being made a ward of the court, was not happy at that facility. According to

Latchmin Scott, her daughter's dissatisfaction was not helped by the Department of Children and Family Services' decision to prevent her from visiting or maintaining contact with her mother. Latchmin Scott said that she had always sought to maintain communication with her daughter, an issue that is now exacerbated by her removal to Tranquility Bay. She believes that Ms Robinson, who was the social worker in the case prior to the minor's removal to Tranquility Bay, misled her about the action that would be taken by the Department of Children and Family Services following a third suicide attempt by her daughter. Rather than sending the teenager to the Jamaican facility, "she (Ms Robinson) told me the judge was re-considering the decision to go to Tranquility Bay," and would withdraw the order pending further investigations, said Latchmin Scott. However, Latchmin Scott later found out that her daughter was sent to the facility in Jamaica the very day she and Ms Robinson had that conversation. In her letter, the minor describes how she feels about being at the rehabilitation centre. "I am so depressed and frustrated; this place is much worse than you think and heard." She continues, "Yesterday a supervisor came and told me that the court order was for two years but Mommy ... I know I won't last here two months or more!" Speaking of her future, the teenager states, "But my future has pure grey clouds and overcast skies from my point of view. Me coming here made my intentions of becoming a lawyer or something in life (go) down the drain." "Mom, you know me inside out and when I tell you that I'm not happy and comfortable you know what I mean, how I feel and what I'm capable of doing." While Latchmin Scott was pleased to hear from her daughter, she was equally upset by its content and felt that the system had failed her daughter. Ms Robinson was asked to comment on the case. She said it was no longer on her caseload and that queries should be directed to Deanna Lookoy, Director of Children and Family Services. Efforts to get comments from Mrs Lookoy by email and telephone before press deadline were unsuccessful. (See Follow-up letter to editor by Maia Szalavitz.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://caymannetnews.com> Date February 29, 2008)

Survey: 13,000 Claims of Abuse Reported in U.S. Juvenile Centers 2004 through 2007-- March 2nd, 2008--COLUMBIA, Miss. — The Columbia Training School — pleasant on the outside, austere on the inside — has been home to 37 of the most troubled young women in Mississippi. These are harsh and disturbing charges — and, in the end, they were among the reasons why state officials announced in February that they will close Columbia. But they aren't uncommon. Across the country, in state after state, child advocates have deplored the conditions under which young offenders are housed — conditions that include sexual and physical abuse and even deaths in restraints. The U.S. Justice Department has filed lawsuits against facilities in 11 states for supervision that is either abusive or harmfully lax and shoddy. Still, a lack of oversight and nationally accepted standards of tracking abuse make it difficult to know exactly how many youngsters have been assaulted or neglected. The Associated Press contacted each state agency that oversees juvenile correction centers and asked for information on the number of deaths as well as the number of allegations and confirmed cases of physical, sexual and emotional abuse by staff members since Jan. 1, 2004. According to the survey, more than 13,000 claims of abuse were identified in juvenile correction centers around the country from 2004 through 2007 — a remarkable total, given that the total population of detainees was about 46,000 at the time the states were surveyed in 2007. For complete story, click here.

The Age of Consent: When Young Love Is a Sex Crime--March 7th, 2008--Share Twelve years ago, Frank Rodriguez pleaded guilty to sexually assaulting a child. Faced with two to 20 years in prison on the charge, he signed a plea bargain that gave him seven years probation. He was told he must never be near children. That meant he couldn't be any place where children gather, like playgrounds or parks, which made it tough to find work. Age of Consent: What Should It Be?"They literally just break you down to nothing," Rodriguez said. "They tell me I can't do this, I can't do this, you know. It gets real bad." Rodriguez completed his seven years' probation without another violation, but he will forever be on the Texas sex offender registry. And what was the nature of the sex crime he committed? Well, when he was 19, Frank had sex with his 15 year-old girlfriend, Nikki Prescott, at her suggestion. "It was my idea," she said. "I would say I pushed it more." Watch the story tonight on "20/20" at 10 p.m. ET and watch John Stossel's special "The Age of Consent" next Friday, March 14 at 10 p.m. ET Nikki, now 27, was a freshman in high school at the time. Frank, now 30, was a senior. She says the relationship was not at all unusual at their high school. "All my friends were having sex, all of them," Nikki said. "All my friends, you know, were dating older guys." Sexually Active Teens: Right or Wrong? 'I Was Not Raped' Nikki's mom, Melissa Wiederhald, knew her daughter was intimate with Rodriguez, and at one point even took Nikki to Planned Parenthood to get her birth control pills. She didn't like what the couple were doing, though, and she thought their relationship was getting too serious. One night, after an especially bad fight with Nikki, in a fit of anger, Nikki's mom made a fateful decision. "I said, 'This is it,'" Wiederhald recalled. "I said, 'We're going to the police station.' I said, 'I've had it.'" Wiederhald went to the police station because she knew that it was illegal for Rodriguez and her daughter to be having sex. The age of consent in Texas is 17, and Nikki wasn't quite 16. Wiederhald didn't think that Rodriguez was violating Nikki, but she felt she had no other way to make a point to her teenage daughter. For complete story, click here.

Tranquility Bay is 'private jail', author says--Reports on the use of Tranquility Bay in Jamaica, as a rehabilitation facility for troubled youth in the Cayman Islands has come under fierce criticism from American journalist and author Maia Szalavitz. Speaking to Cayman Net News in a telephone interview on Monday, 10 March, she said: "No other government has ever sent a child there." Ms Szalavitz, who contacted Net News after reading a previous article with family members raising concerns about a young Caymanian at the facility, is author of the book "Help at Any Cost: How the Troubled Teen Industry Cons Parents and Hurts Kids" (Riverhead Books, 2006). She said that whilst researching for her book she "spoke to dozens of parents and teens who report horrifying abuses at Tranquility Bay." According to Ms Szalavitz, she spent three years "looking at troubled teen programmes" when researching her book, and estimates that about 20 per cent of that time was spent on Tranquility Bay. Her research took her to Jamaica in an attempt to get inside the facility, but she was refused entry. "It looks like a South American prison," Ms Szalavitz said of what she observed from the outside. She related seeing bars on windows which were blacked out, preventing anyone from looking in and keeping those inside from looking out. "Basically, it is an unregulated, private jail," she said. "They are complete amateurs; I don't understand why any government agency would send children there." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://caymannetnews.com> Date: March 10, 2008)

Judge orders California to enforce county juvenile hall standards--March 12th, 2008--A judge has ordered California authorities to set strict deadlines for bringing county juvenile halls up to state standards if they fail inspections. San Francisco Superior Court Judge Patrick Mahoney ruled the Corrections Standards Authority has been giving counties too much time to correct problems that include overcrowding and excessive use of force. The authority inspects juvenile halls every two years. The judge says counties must submit an improvement plan within two months. They then must make changes within three months or risk having their juvenile jails shut. Legal advocates sued the authority in 2006. They say as many as half the detention halls were allowed to operate despite failing to meet minimum state guidelines. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sacbee.com Date: March 12, 2008)

"Baby ASBOs" for children as young as 10--March 18th, 2008--LONDON (Reuters) - Troubled teenagers and children as young as 10 would be hit with anti-social behaviour orders (ASBOs) under a government plan unveiled on Tuesday to fight youth crime. About 1,000 of the country's "most challenging" children will be forced to sign good behaviour contracts under the 218-million pound programme, Children's Secretary Ed Balls said. Under the expansion of the Family Intervention Projects, the troublemakers would be supported by "non-negotiable" workers. But failure to abide by the contract will lead to a criminal record, and a behaviour order dubbed a "baby ASBO". "The support is non-negotiable -- if young people don't take the help, or refuse to mend their ways they will face the consequences," Balls said in a statement. "For example (they will face) an Anti-Social Behaviour Order to stop bad behaviour and an Individual Support Order to compel them to co-operate with support. These are court orders with criminal records and sanctions for those who breach them." For complete story, click here.

Sins against kids--March 20th, 2008--The General Assembly does not legislate based on facts, relying instead on perceptions, personal experiences and political pandering. And nowhere is that more apparent than in the way the state responds to juvenile crime. Despite the fact that only 5 percent of youth arrests owe to serious offenses, legislators have toughened the juvenile system over the years in response to the myth of the teenage "superpredator." At the same time that lawmakers don't believe 17-year-olds are mature enough to buy cigarettes or drive past midnight, they maintain that teens are old enough to be viewed as adults when they break the law. In Georgia, a teen as young as 13 can face life in prison for some offenses. Now, JUSTGeorgia — a coalition of Voices for Georgia's Children, the Georgia Appleseed Center for Law and Justice, and Emory's Barton Child Law & Policy Clinic — is offering up a new code. The comprehensive rewrite is based on four years of work by the State Bar of Georgia's Young Lawyers Division and interviews with hundreds of people across the state, including advocates, victims of juvenile crimes, foster children and law enforcement. Despite their varying perspectives, all those interviewed agreed that the Georgia statutes dealing with young people who violate the law or who are victims of abuse and neglect are not in the best interests of children. Since its introduction in 1971, the Georgia juvenile code has wandered far afield from its founding principle that when a young person errs, the law should rehabilitate, not punish. For complete story, click here.

Jewish family sues Jamaican reform school for troubled teens--March 25th, 2008--A battle has erupted in the Orthodox Jewish community over a Brooklyn teenager sent by his prominent family to a behavior boot camp accused of terrifying abuse. Isaac Hersh, 16, has been trapped since last summer at Tranquility Bay, a reform school on the island of Jamaica with a soothing name - and harsh discipline, according to the lawyer hired to try to get him out. "It's a modern-day concentration camp," said Maryland lawyer Joshua Ambush. Isaac's estranged parents sent him to the boot camp last year after luring him back to Brooklyn from his new home in Texas, court papers claim. Isaac's twin brother, Sol, is panicked he's next to go. "He's very worried about his brother. He's very worried about himself, too," said a friend of the family who asked to remain anonymous. Tranquility Bay offers the promise of turning bad boys into focused achievers, but the walled-off camp with barred windows has been called a nightmare. Children have been beaten, forced to eat their vomit and made to stand in painful contortions for hours, according to a separate suit filed in Utah by former students against private boot camps, including Tranquility Bay. The case has so riled up members of the normally insular Orthodox community that several are taking the rare step of publicizing Isaac's situation. For complete story, click here.

Schools embrace fingerprint scanning--By Pauline Vu, Stateline.org Staff Writer-- The lunch lines in West Virginia's Wood County schools move much faster than they used to. After students fill their trays with food, they approach a small machine, push their thumbs against a touch pad — and with that small movement, they've paid for their meal. For half the state's school districts, as well as hundreds more across the country, the days of dealing with lost lunch cards or forgotten identification numbers are over. "A student cannot forget their finger," said Beverly Blough, the director of food service in Wood County School District, which in 2003 became the first district in West Virginia to use finger scanners. But the emergence of finger scanning has also sparked a backlash from parents and civil libertarians worried about identity theft and violation of children's privacy rights. In several cases when parents have objected, school districts have backed down, and some states have outlawed or limited the technology. A growing number of schools are using biometrics, or the science of identification based on physiological or behavioral features like facial or voice recognition, to have students pay for meals, log their attendance, board buses, check out books and visit the nurse's office. Administrators cite many benefits, chief among them efficiency. Fingerprints are scanned, but the prints themselves are not saved; instead, a finger's ridges and arcs are turned into "data points," which are converted into a numerical identifier assigned to each student. Pennsylvania-based identiMetrics, which offers biometric identification products, has sold fingerprint scanners to about 1,000 school districts in about half the states, mostly in the Northeast and South, said Anne Marie Dunphy, the company's chief financial officer. By the end of the fiscal year, she expects the business will triple or quadruple over the previous year. Dunphy said rural districts seem to be taking the lead on implementing the technology. "You would think that it would be the technology-rich, wealthy districts along the Northwest corridor, and it's the complete opposite. We have installations in very rural areas in Indiana, where the backyard's a cornfield and there's an Amish lady working the cash register," she said. But the technology's emergence has raised concerns for parents about whether their children's information is safe. "It just opens a huge database out there that's just easy for identity theft," said Joy Robinson-Van Gilder, an Illinois mother who rallied legislators last year to place limits on the technology in her state. "I think it's against their civil rights, without a doubt, and it is an invasion of privacy." Illinois is the only state that requires schools to get parental permission before scanning students' fingerprints. Iowa banned biometrics outright in schools, and Michigan doesn't allow fingerprinting because of a 2000 attorney general opinion that it would violate state law. Arizona could join this group. Last month, a Senate committee passed a bill to ban the use of biometrics in schools. Scanning opponents argue that districts don't have policies in place for what information to collect, how long to keep it, how to delete it when it's no longer needed and who should have access to the information. They also say that schools, unlike banks or major government agencies that also collect biometric data, don't have the financial resources to ensure that it is secure. "The benefits certainly do not justify the privacy violations that we're seeing," said Alessandra Meetze, executive director of the Arizona chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union. "I don't think collecting fingerprints from very little kids sends the right message... They're essentially treating (students) like criminals for the sake of efficiency." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.stateline.org Date: March/April, 2008)

Doctor is sued in death of girl, 4 Her psychiatrist treated her with powerful drugs--April 4th, 2008--The parents of 4-year-old Rebecca Riley are awaiting trial on charges that they killed her in December 2006 with an overdose of psychiatric drugs. A medical malpractice suit filed yesterday asserts that a Tufts Medical Center psychiatrist who diagnosed the girl as bipolar when she was 28 months old and then treated her for two years with a regimen of powerful drugs is to blame for her death. "This child was subject to mostly telephone prescriptions and a slipshod diagnosis," said Boston lawyer Andrew C. Meyer Jr., who represents Rebecca Riley's estate and filed the suit against Dr. Kayoko Kifuji in Suffolk Superior Court. Six weeks before Rebecca Riley was found dead on Dec. 13, 2006, in a Hull house shared by her parents and other relatives, a nurse at her Weymouth preschool warned Kifuji that she suspected the child was overmedicated because she was often too tired to participate in school activities and appeared like a "floppy doll," according to Meyer. Kifuji did not reduce her medication after examining the child, he said. "They made her a 4-year-old zombie," said Meyer, whose Boston law firm Lubin & Meyer specializes in medical malpractice cases. "We don't believe that she did suffer from bipolar or that this was the appropriate medication." The suit was filed on behalf of a court-appointed guardian who is serving as administrator of Rebecca Riley's estate and is protecting the interests of the girl's 13-year-old brother and 7-year-old sister. It seeks unspecified damages for the wrongful death and pain and suffering endured by Rebecca, as well as the loss suffered by her brother and sister, who are in foster care and have been named the beneficiaries of her estate. Kifuji could not be reached for comment yesterday. Since the child's death, Kifuji remains on staff at Tufts Medical Center, but no longer treats patients. She has voluntarily agreed not to practice medicine, pending an investigation by the state Board of Registration in Medicine. Tufts Medical Center released a statement yesterday saying: "We have not received any official notification of a lawsuit. We remain in support of Dr. Kifuji and the care she provided." Kifuji diagnosed Rebecca Riley with bipolar disorder and attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder and prescribed clonidine, a blood pressure medication that is sometimes used to calm aggressive children, Seroquel, an antipsychotic drug, and Depakote, an antiseizure drug, according to court records. The child died from an overdose of the prescription drugs, and, by itself, the amount of clonidine in her system was fatal, court records indicate. Clonidine and Depakote are approved by the FDA for adults only. A trial date has yet to be set for Michael and Carolyn Riley, who were initially charged with first-degree murder in intentionally overmedicating their daughter and knowing that it would be fatal. For complete story, click here.

Authorities remove children from polygamists' West Texas compound--April 4th, 2008--ELDORADO, Texas — Child welfare officials Friday took custody of 18 girls who lived at a secretive West Texas religious retreat built by polygamist leader Warren Jeffs following an abuse complaint to state authorities. A total of 52 girls, ages 6 months to 17 years, were bused away on Friday to be interviewed, but only 18 were immediately taken into state custody, said Texas Child Protective Services spokeswoman Marleigh Meisner. No arrests had been made. Meisner said CPS was looking for foster homes for the girls, most of whom have rarely been outside the insular world of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. They were temporarily being housed at a local civic center, she said. "We're dealing with children that aren't accustomed to the outside world so we're trying to be very sensitive to their needs," said Meisner. Authorities had interviewed about half the girls since arriving at the remote compound with law enforcement on Thursday evening, she said. Interviews were expected to continue over the weekend. The investigation began with a call alleging physical abuse of a 16-year-old girl living there, Meisner said. On Friday afternoon, Department of Public Safety officials began executing a search warrant at the compound. The warrant is for records dealing with the birth of children to a 16-year-old and any records listing a marriage between Dale Barlow, 50, and the girl, according to the San Angelo Standard-Times, which cited court records released late Friday in Tom Green County. Prosecutors in Tom Green, a larger county north of Eldorado, were handling the case. An arrest warrant was issued, but the individual DPS is looking for had not been located by Friday evening, said spokeswoman Tela Mange. She said she could not reveal whose name was on the warrant. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.chron.com Date: April 4, 2008)

Sex abuse, violence alleged at teen jails across U.S.--April 4th, 2008--JACKSON, Mississippi (CNN) -- Girls as young as 13 say they were shackled for weeks at a time in Mississippi. Erica was 16 when she was forced to wear leg shackles at a Mississippi detention center, she said. A Texas teen was allegedly offered birthday cake in exchange for sex. A guard drove his knee into the neck of a frail suicidal Ohio boy after the youth was wrestled to the ground and held down by other guards who stripped him and covered his face with a smock, a state report said. More than two dozen girls at an Indiana lock-up describe "networking"

-- their term for sneaking into each other's cells to have sex, with no interference from guards. This is a glimpse into what America's juvenile jails look like, according to lawsuits, criminal cases and experts who have spent years delving into what they call a broken system. "It's a nationwide crisis that has been going on for years, one the public has never been told the extent of," said psychiatric social worker Jerome Miller, the co-founder of the National Center on Institutions and Alternatives, who has evaluated and helped reform juvenile jails for more than three decades. This summer, Mississippi plans to close Columbia Training School, a juvenile facility that houses mostly minor offenders. They are often runaways from abusive homes. Erica was 16 when she was sentenced to Columbia after running away, a probation violation of an earlier marijuana conviction. She admits she was a girl quick to sass her parents, full of anger about the death of a relative that happened around the same time Katrina wrecked her family's Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, home. Nervously touching a sparkly barrette in her red hair, she cries as she describes how guards forced her legs into tight metal shackles. She said she was cuffed and chained when she ate and used the bathroom -- and was even forced to play soccer that way against other girls. Guards called her "Chain Gang," she said. "I will always remember them things around my ankles, the way they cut into me," she said, pulling up her pant leg to show slash-mark scars on her ankles and heels. "They made you feel like you were nothing." Watch teen explain suicide attempt was cry for help » Represented by attorneys with the Southern Poverty Law Center, Erica and nine other girls housed at Columbia are suing the state, claiming they endured a range of sexual and physical abuse, including shackling. Don Desper, a licensed therapist and former employee at Columbia who opposed the practice, told CNN it was used to prevent the teens from escaping. In a handwritten affidavit, a 15-year-old girl described a male guard molesting her. She wrote: "He came inside my cell half way half of his body and he started touching me and he tried (sic) to kiss me and then he left he came back with my snack in his hand and he opened my cell again and he started grabbing me around my waist and he tried (sic) to stick his hands in my pants and I started crying." When the lawsuit was filed in 2007, a U.S. Justice Department monitor was making periodic inspections at Columbia as part of a 2005 settlement with Mississippi in a previous case. The Justice investigation that led to that settlement found Columbia youths were hog-tied, forced to strip and eat their own vomit and were held in isolation in what was called the "Dark Room," a windowless room with a hole in the floor used as a toilet. Read the Justice Department report that describes girls being shackled to poles Hundreds of youths have allegedly suffered similar abuse at juvenile detention centers across the United States, according to experts interviewed by CNN and court records checked for this story. The U.S. Justice Department has sued nine states and two territories alleging abuse, inadequate mental and medical care and potentially dangerous methods like the use of restraints. The department doesn't have the power to shut down facilities -- states do -- but through litigation it can force a state to improve its detention centers and protect the civil rights of jailed youths. Another facility under Justice scrutiny is Oakley Training School near Jackson, Mississippi, which was sued by the department at the same time as Columbia. Gov. Haley Barbour recently announced Columbia's inmates would be transferred this summer to Oakley when Columbia is closed. But the Justice Department said Oakley has satisfied barely a fraction of requirements the department set for it years ago. According to a March 2008 Justice report, there is an "enormous amount of work" needed to make Oakley a safe and productive place to rehabilitate troubled teens. Barbour would not respond to questions for this report. The Mississippi Department of Human Services, which runs Columbia and Oakley, refused to answer most of a CNN public records request citing pending litigation and also declined to be interviewed. The U.S. Justice Department could not talk specifically about ongoing cases, but Lisa Krigsten, civil rights division principal deputy assistant attorney general, noted the department is going after double the number of juvenile jails for civil rights violations during the Bush administration than in any previous administration. "We take this seriously and are committed to protecting the vulnerable children who are in these places," she said. A CNN check of other juvenile facilities shows that, despite years of court wrangling, serious problems persist. In Ohio, a dozen employees at the Scioto Juvenile Correctional Facility have been indicted since 2003 on charges relating to physical and sexual abuse of youth, according to a May 2007 Justice report. Five were convicted of various charges, including sexual battery and assault; six cases were dismissed and a jury found one employee not guilty. In January, a state-hired consultant blamed a "culture of violence" in Ohio's juvenile jails for numerous abuses. The expert's report details examples of "egregious use of force" by guards and included a video he viewed of a 2007 incident in which a "frail" boy who was threatening to harm himself was restrained by guards. The boy was wrestled to the ground, cuffed and stripped, with one guard seen putting his full body weight on the boy's back while driving his knee into the boy's neck. A so-called "Suicide Smock" was placed "over his airways," the report said. "The youth actually screams that he can't breathe." For complete story, click here.

Nearly 200 taken from sect's West Texas ranch--April 6th, 2008--ELDORADO -- After several anxious hours late Saturday, tensions appeared to be easing at the YFZ Ranch in West Texas as state troopers streamed past checkpoints and escorted another busload of girls from the secretive polygamist sect's compound. Around 11 p.m., police scanner traffic indicated that authorities had "cleared" the church's temple and were moving to the compound's annex. There was no indication that authorities' search for children on the ranch was coming to a close. Earlier in the evening, some of the sect's members refused to allow authorities to enter the church's massive white temple. Allison Palmer, assistant district attorney for the 51st District, which includes Schleicher and Coke counties and part of Tom Green County, said that authorities "were preparing for all possibilities" and that ambulances and other equipment were on standby. "This is a very sensitive area, and members of this church feel very strongly about nonmembers entering that area," Palmer said. "This is a very important to them. It is proving to be difficult to obtain their permission to enter that building." Palmer credited Schleicher County Sheriff David Doran with obtaining the cooperation of the sect to allow the search to continue. She wouldn't say whether investigators had searched all the other buildings. 183 removed Earlier Saturday, officials said they had removed 137 children and 46 women from the ranch. Investigators said they planned to keep searching until every child was accounted for at the YFZ (Year For Zion) Ranch. The second full day of searching at the property had investigators going building to building in the hunt for more children. State officials have blocked access to the ranch since Thursday in response to a report of physical abuse of a 16-year-old girl, law enforcement officials said Friday. Child Protective Services spokeswoman Marleigh Meisner said Saturday that authorities have removed 137 children from the ranch, which is an outpost of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, based in Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah. Of the 137 children, about 40 were boys. Meisner said she didn't know whether investigators had found the 16-year-girl whose complaint of abuse reached CPS officials Monday. "I can't confirm that we have even found that girl," Meisner said. Eighteen of the girls have been legally removed from the ranch, and foster homes have been located for them, Meisner said. The other 119 children remain under the care of CPS caseworkers at Eldorado's First Baptist Church, the Eldorado Civic Center and a local elementary school. All the children have been interviewed, and some of the 46 women who had been removed from the ranch are mothers of the children being questioned, Meisner said at a news conference Saturday. "We need to know if they are safe, if they have been abused, neglected or are at high risk of abuse," Meisner said. She said CPS investigators' presence in Eldorado could continue indefinitely. Meisner said that she planned to be in Eldorado "for a while." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.star-telegram.com Date: April 6, 2008)

Kids in trouble for sexual harassment--April 3rd, 2008--WASHINGTON, Apr 3, 2008 (UPI via COMTEX) -- A "zero-tolerance" approach to sexual harassment has led to increasing numbers of complaints in elementary schools and even in nursery schools. In one Texas case, a 4-year-old received an in-school suspension for pressing against an aide's breasts while he was hugging her, The Washington Post reports. A kindergarten student in Hagerstown, Md., was accused of harassment for allegedly pinching a little girl's rear end. Virginia reported that 255 students were suspended from elementary schools last year for sexually offensive conduct and in Maryland, there were 166 suspensions, including three from pre-schools and 16 from kindergarten, the Post said. Ted Feinberg, assistant director of the National Association of School Psychologists in Bethesda, Md., said that accusing 6-year-olds of sexual harassment "doesn't make sense to me." He said that he worked for 30 years in the schools without a real case of sexual harassment in elementary school. "Kids can be exploratory in behavior, they can mimic what they see on TV," he told the Post. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: http://portal.tds.net Date: April 3, 2008)

Development, Testing, and Findings of a Pediatric-Focused Trigger Tool to Identify Medication-Related Harm in US Children's Hospitals--April 1st, 2008--Glenn S. Takata, MDa,b, Wilbert Mason, MD, MPHc,d, Carol Taketomo, PharmDe, Tina Logsdon, MSf and Paul J. Sharek, MD, MPHg OBJECTIVES. The purposes of this study were to develop a pediatric-focused tool for adverse drug event detection and describe the incidence and characteristics of adverse drug events in children's hospitals identified by this tool. METHODS. A pediatric-specific trigger tool for adverse drug event detection was developed and tested. Eighty patients from each site were randomly selected for retrospective chart review. All adverse drug events identified using the trigger tool were evaluated for severity, preventability, ability to mitigate, ability to identify the event earlier, and presence of associated occurrence report. Each trigger and the entire tool were evaluated for positive predictive value. RESULTS. Review of 960 randomly selected charts from 12 children's hospitals revealed 2388 triggers (2.49 per patient) and 107 unique adverse drug events. Mean adverse drug event rates were 11.1 per 100 patients, 15.7 per 1000 patient-days, and 1.23 per 1000

medication doses. The positive predictive value of the trigger tool was 3.7%. Twenty-two percent of all adverse drug events were deemed preventable, 17.8% could have been identified earlier, and 16.8% could have been mitigated more effectively. Ninety-seven percent of the identified adverse drug events resulted in mild, temporary harm. Only 3.7% of adverse drug events were identified in existing hospital-based occurrence reports. The most common adverse drug events identified were pruritis and nausea, the most common medication classes causing adverse drug events were opioid analgesics and antibiotics, and the most common stages of the medication management process associated with preventable adverse drug events were monitoring and prescribing/ordering. CONCLUSIONS. Adverse drug event rates in hospitalized children are substantially higher than previously described. Most adverse drug events resulted in temporary harm, and 22% were classified as preventable. Only 3.7% were identified by using traditional voluntary reporting methods. Our pediatric-focused trigger tool is effective at identifying adverse drug events in inpatient pediatric populations. For complete story, click here.

8-year-old suspended for sniffing marker--April 3rd, 2008--WESTMINSTER -- Adams School District 50 is defending its decision to punish a third grader for sniffing a Sharpie marker. Eight-year-old Eathan Harris was originally suspended from Harris Park Elementary School for three days. Principal Chris Benisch reduced the suspension to one day after complaints from Harris' parents. Harris used a black Sharpie marker to color a small area on the sleeve of his sweatshirt. A teacher sent him to the principal when she noticed him smelling the marker and his clothing. "It smelled good," Harris said. "They told me that's wrong." Eathan's father, John Harris, says the school overreacted for treating Eathan as if he was huffing, or inhaling, marker fumes. "I think it's outlandish," John Harris said. "It's ridiculous." Eathan shyly shook his head "no" when a reporter asked if he knew about "huffing." Benisch stands by his decision to suspend Harris, saying it sends a clear message about substance abuse. "This is really, really, seriously dangerous," Benisch said. In his letter suspending the child, Benisch wrote that smelling the marker fumes could cause the boy to "become intoxicated." A toxicologist with the Rocky Mountain Poison Control Center says that claim is nearly impossible. Dr. Eric Lavonas says non-toxic markers like Sharpies, while pungent-smelling, cannot be used to get high. "I don't know whether it would be possible for a real overachiever to figure out a way to get high off them," Lavonas said. "But in regular use, it's just not something that's going to happen." "If you went to Costco and bought 50 bags of Sharpies and did something to them, maybe there's a way to get creative and make it happen," Lavonas said. Adams County School District 50 leaders were unfazed by the poison control center's medical opinion. "Principals make hundreds of decisions everyday based on our best judgment. And in that time, smelling that marker, I felt like, 'Wow, that's a very serious marker,'" Benisch said. Despite the medical evidence, Benisch promised to draw an even clearer line on markers. "We've purged every permanent marker there is in this building," he said. Eathan Harris says he's happy to be back in school after his suspension, but he did confide he worried the school's disciplinary action might hurt his dream of one day becoming a professional football player. (Webmaster Note: For more commentary on this story, see: <http://onlinelunchpail.blogspot.com/2008/04/8-year-old-suspended-for-sniffing.html>) For complete story, click here.

Parents of Killed Intruder: Wrong People, Wrong Time--April 9th, 2008--DURAND - A fourteen year old Durand boy is killed after a home invasion turned deadly Sunday. Today his family speaks out and Travis Castle's parents must have a lot of unanswered questions. At the top of that list is how could their child, their fourteen year old son, who does not have a criminal record could ever be mixed up in this deadly mess. Kimberly Britton & Clyde Castle Travis Castle's Parents A love for horses and a passion for riding, it's the legacy Travis leaves behind. "There wasn't nothing he couldn't do. He could do anything," says his father Clyde Castle. "He could drive a truck and trailer at fourteen years old and probably better than I can." In just two and half weeks, Travis would have turned fifteen, but his life was cut short Sunday. Ogle County Sheriff's police say Travis and two other boys broke into a home just outside Stillman Valley to steal guns. "One of them told him, 'Get out of the car, Travis. You're going in with us,'" Clyde remembers. "He didn't want to go in," adds the boy's mother, Kimberly Britton. But Travis did go in, and before he got out, the young teen was met by house guest in the hallway. Police say that man fatally shot Travis after the boy pointed a gun at him. "I talked to him at 9:30," Kimberly tells 13 News. "He was staying the night at his friends. He said, 'Mom, I'll be home in the morning. Love you and everything's going to be alright.' But the next morning Travis never showed up. "We looked and we looked and we couldn't find him," Kimberly says. His family admits Travis shouldn't have been involved, but they say it was peer pressure. The boy recently started attending a school for troubled teens. That's where his parents say he got mixed up with the wrong crowd. "The two things I told him growing up, 'I hate a thief and liar.' And Travis wasn't either one," says Clyde. And he has message for the other suspects. "The boys who influenced him, I hope you have to live with this the rest of your life, the rest of your life that you killed my son." Those boys still have not been caught. Detectives believe they may be in Winnebago County. (Webmaster Note: "Troubled teen" programs are not worth the trouble!) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.wrex.com Date: April 9, 2008)

San Jose center for troubled teens closing abruptly--April 10th, 2008--The region's center for emotionally disturbed children is abruptly shutting its doors, following scathing reports of unsafe conditions and multiple violations of state law governing locked treatment facilities. Although owners of the Starlight Adolescent Center in San Jose said its closing was not connected to recent complaints, records show the facility was cited by state officials in recent months for 14 violations that placed children in "immediate risk" and 12 others that posed potential harm. State records show one youth had his arm broken in January while being restrained; a bulimic teenager lost 15 pounds at the facility, and staff complained to state investigators of inadequate training. In addition, in February, an outside agency charged the Starlight facility with "unlawful and irresponsible" behavior for its use of physical restraint and seclusion to subdue the teenage mentally ill patients, including 518 violations of state law. "Starlight must be sanctioned for its failure to protect vulnerable children," said the second critical audit of the facility in two years by the Mental Health Advocacy Project, which the county funds to monitor the rights of mentally ill patients. The decision to close the facility in June comes amid a growing concern among experts about the wisdom of keeping mentally ill youth in locked facilities on a long-term basis. The average stay at Starlight is one year. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.mercurynews.com Date: April 10, 2008)

Foster care home faces probe--April 19th, 2008--A Broward judge Friday ordered an investigation into a shelter for troubled foster children after court-appointed guardians for the teens complained the group home was unsanitary, beset by violence and failing to properly document incidents in which children ran away or were harmed. Attorneys for the Broward Guardian-ad-Litem Program, which provides volunteers to represent the best interests of children who were abused or neglected, told Circuit Judge David Krathen they had uncovered about 140 Lauderdale police reports, including incidents of children running away, using drugs or harming each other. "We are very, very concerned about the safety of all the children at the facility," said Howard Talenfeld, a Fort Lauderdale attorney representing the guardian program. "What we need is a complete and thorough investigation to see that each and every child is safe." At the center of the dispute is a Lauderdale shelter, called Impact Community Services, that houses about 12 teenagers under the supervision of ChildNet, a private foster care agency that is licensed and funded by the Department of Children & Families. Talenfeld said guardians had seen reports of children having sex with each other, including an incident involving a disabled teen who would not have been capable of consenting to sexual activity. Talenfeld said he also had seen reports of assault and battery, and more than 125 cases of children running away. At the guardian program's request, Krathen appointed an attorney with Legal Aid Service of Broward County, Walter Honaman, to investigate the shelter and report back to the court. "We must make sure none of these kids are in harm's way," the judge said. Melissa Zelniker-Presser, a Broward attorney, said she represents a 17-year-old boy with mental retardation who lived at the shelter until recently. According to a report, he "was forced to have sex" with another boy who already had shown signs of aggression. "I am concerned for the safety of . . . other children who live there," Zelniker-Presser said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.miamiherald.com Date: April 19, 2008)

Teen 'Boot Camps' Again in Spotlight--April 23rd, 2008--Residential programs for troubled teens will be getting more scrutiny from Congress this week, where investigators will reveal the results of an undercover investigation. Some of the outfits, which purport to help troubled children, have generated hundreds of allegations of death and physical, sexual and emotional abuse, ABC News reported last October. "Kids being forced to eat their own vomit, to eat dirt, to not be allowed to go to the bathroom...all in the idea that somehow this is building character," is how Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., described what congressional investigators found when they probed some of the programs. Related PHOTOS: Inside Tough Love Teen Camps Tough Love Teen Camps: Lots of Tough, Little Love WATCH: Boot Camp: Tough Love or Abuse? At a hearing before Miller's House Education and Labor Committee Thursday, investigators are expected to reveal alarming new details showing how deceptive marketing and conflicts of interest could lead good parents to send their children to bad programs, Hill sources say. Miller is also expected to introduce legislation aimed at strengthening oversight of the programs. At a hearing last fall, investigators told Congress that "boot camp"-style programs tend to be loosely regulated and are sometimes found to have untrained staff using reckless or negligent operating practices. For complete story, click here.

Children Abused in Unregulated 'Boot Camps,' Critic Charges--April 24th, 2008--"Your dog has more protection than your children," says Maia Szalavitz, a journalist who has investigated so-called "tough love" camps and residential programs supposedly aimed at helping troubled teens. Congress will hold a second round of hearings Thursday on problems highlighted by Szalavitz and others. Rep. George Miller (D-CA), chair of the House Education and Labor Committee, is chairing the probe of widespread abuse in the programs. There have been at least 10 deaths of children held in teen "wilderness programs," "boot camps," "emotional growth boarding schools," and other residential facilities. The first round of hearings last October prompted bipartisan outrage at industry abuses that committee members compared to "human right abuses in third world countries." Several victims portrayed in Szalavitz' book, "Help at Any Cost," are scheduled to testify at the hearing. She has called the "tough love" programs "an industry out of control and answerable to no one." "Most parents are unaware that in many states, dog kennels and nail salons are more highly regulated than the health and safety of children in so called 'tough love teen boot camp' institutions. Anyone, including ex-convicts, can open a program. No qualification or certification is required," Szalavitz said. Szalavitz is a fellow of the Statistical Assessment Service (STATS), a not-for-profit Washington, DC, group that highlights the use and abuse of science and statistics in the media. For complete story, click here.

Fed study says troubled teens abused in some residential treatment centers--April 25th, 2008--WASHINGTON -- Troubled teens have been repeatedly abused, neglected and even subjected to clear cases of torture in residential treatment centers, such as the wilderness therapy programs that flourish in Utah, according to a two-pronged federal study that also uncovered misleading marketing practices used to sell these program to parents. A House committee received the findings of this General Accountability Office study on Thursday, hearing about one program where teens had bags placed over their heads and nooses tightened around their necks, similar to what U.S. soldiers did to prisoners in the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. In another case, a teen was forced to lay on a red ant hill and was not allowed to remove the ants from his face or body. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://origin.slttrib.com> Date: April 25, 2008)

Stop Child Abuse in Programs that Supposedly "Help"--April 23rd, 2008--Rep. George Miller (D-CA) will introduce legislation tomorrow, aimed at reining in the billion dollar "troubled teen" industry, which, according to the New York Times, detained about 100,000 children and adolescents as of 2005-- a number which had quadrupled in 10 years. Right now, many states regulate dog kennels and nail salons more assiduously than they monitor these "tough love" programs, which are essentially private prisons; the teens cannot leave or contact the outside world. And there is no federal regulation at all: in fact, the feds don't even know how many teens are incarcerated in these programs or how many programs exist. That question may begin to be answered tomorrow, in a new Government Accountability Office report. At the last hearing, a GAO report finding thousands of allegations of abuse and ten deaths at these "boot camps" "emotional growth" or "therapeutic" boarding schools, harsh "wilderness programs and "academies," was presented to the house Education and Labor Committee. After hearing accounts of teens "forced to eat vomit, lie in urine and feces, forced to use toothbrushes to clean toilets and then on their teeth," the ranking Republican on the committee said that he generally opposes increased federal regulation, but "there are some times when it has to happen." For complete story, click here.

GAO cites concerns over wilderness therapy programs--April 25th, 2008--WASHINGTON (AP) - A new government report says some companies use deceptive marketing practices to convince parents to enroll their troubled teens into boot camp-style therapy programs where they can end up abused and neglected. The Government Accountability Office looked at eight cases of abuse and death at the camps, including at the Whitmore Academy in Utah in 2004. The agency's managing director told members of Congress on Thursday the review found ineffective management and untrained staff contributed to dangerous conditions at the camps. He told stories of teens being forced to lie on red-ant hills and being bitten by pit bulls. The chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee has introduced a bill to create federal oversight of wilderness therapy programs. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.localnews8.com Date: April 25, 2008)

Cook saw dragging at boot camp--April 26th, 2008--A witness testified on Friday that she saw two Christian boot camp officials abuse a 15-year-old girl last summer at a Banquete ranch, including dragging her behind a van. Charles Flowers, 47, and Stephanie Bassitt, 21, of Love Demonstrated Ministries boot camp, are on trial for aggravated assault. They are accused of using a rope to tie trainee Siobahn McClintock to a van on June 12 and then dragging her behind it. Barbara "Bobby" Greer said she was working as a cook on the ranch during a portion of the boot camp held on the property. After witnessing the dragging she wanted to call 911 but felt like she was under the control of the ranch owners. "Every time she would fall they would drag her through the gravel," Greer said. The day before, Greer said she saw a man pin Siobahn down with his boot on her neck while he sprayed water in her face. The Floresville teen, who now is 16, has said she was pinned to the ground several times by Bassitt and Flowers at the camp when she could no longer exercise. For complete story, click here.

Teen boot camps under scrutiny--April 25th, 2008--Washington - Lawmakers are calling for federal regulation of so-called "boot camps" for kids. They are all across the country, but alleged abuses at the camps were described as "sickening." One case, caught on tape, got national attention. Martin Lee Anderson, 14, died after being roughed up by staff at a youth boot camp in Florida. Now congressional investigators say they have found thousands of other cases they say turned their stomachs. "The abuses included staff members forcing children to remain in so-called stress positions for hours at a time, to undergo extreme physical exertion without food, water, or rest; and to eat their own vomit," said Rep. George Miller (D-CA). Often modeled after military boot camps, the camps exist to straighten up troubled teens, but investigators said they were reminded of the abuses inmates suffered at the Abu Graib prison in Iraq. "A 16-year-old boy having trouble breathing and walking was tortured and humiliated for days. One staff member told the boy he deserved an Academy Award for faking it," said Gregory Kutz, Government Accountability Office. Kutz said the sales pitches often misled. Camp officials were recorded telling an investigator posing as a teen's father what not to tell his wife. "I want you to tell her it's a college prep boarding school," the official said. One who was abused himself as a 13-year-old said he is still scarred by it. "I have nightmares today of being back in that place and being told that I'm never gonna leave that things are gonna never change," said Jon Martin-Crawford of Hancock, New York. Investigators said they found more than 1,500 cases of reported child abuse at residential facilities including boot camps, more than 100 of those were in Indiana. Lawmakers are calling for federal standards for youth boot camps with periodic inspections. For complete story, click here.

Feds eye 'boot-camp therapy'--April 25th, 2008--WASHINGTON — Boot camp therapy companies use deceptive practices in getting parents to enroll troubled teens in programs where they can end up abused and neglected, the Government Accountability Office has found. The findings come at the same time House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller introduced the "Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act of 2008," designed to create federal oversight of wilderness therapy programs, also known as therapeutic boarding schools, boot camps and behavior modification facilities. At a committee hearing Thursday, Gregory Kutz, GAO's managing director of Forensic Audits and Special Investigations, said the most recent investigation looked at eight closed cases of abuse or death, including abuse at the Whitmore Academy in Utah in November 2004. GAO found that "ineffective management and operating practices, in addition to untrained staff, contributed to the death and abuse of youth enrolled in selected programs." Kutz told stories of teenagers being forced to lie face down on red-ant hills, being bitten by pit bulls, being forced to endure extreme physical endurance tests in 120-degree heat and other abuse. Kutz also said the GAO found "examples of deceptive marketing and questionable practices in certain industry programs and services" after calling 14 programs with fictitious parents looking for information for fictitious children. He played audio tapes of phone calls made to certain wilderness programs. One excerpt included a woman at a referral service telling the GAO caller to tell his wife that this was a "college prep boarding school," because she might "freak out" if she thought the caller wanted to send his daughter to a place "where there are drug addicts and people that are all screwed up." Another example had a referral agent recommend a particular program to GAO because "the bipolar, the depression, those kinds of things, they just go away after a while" when the participants follow a special whole-grain diet and exercise program. There were other examples of conflicts of interest, as one referral service kept directing participants to a Missouri boot camp that it owned. Other examples showed misleading information on health insurance reimbursement or encouraging tax fraud through charitable donations. Thursday's hearing was a follow-up to one the committee held in October at which GAO released a report outlining 10 cases where teenagers died in such programs, including five deaths in Utah. For complete story, click here.

Teen boot camp hearing targets Missouri agency--April 24th, 2008--WASHINGTON | In a hearing designed to expose deceptive marketing practices in the residential treatment industry for troubled teens, a northwest Missouri referral agency was singled out Thursday on Capitol Hill. The hearing, held before a

House committee, included testimony of examples of cruelty and neglect used by officials at boot camps and residential treatment centers. It highlighted what Greg Kutz called "deceptive and other questionable" marketing tactics by some referral agencies. Kutz, who is leading an investigation into youth residential programs for the federal Government Accountability Office, specifically named Parent Help of Gallatin, Mo., as one of them. For example: Despite online descriptions that say Parent Help workers will "look at your special situation and help you select the best school for your teen," all three GAO investigators who called Parent Help with fictitious stories about their children were referred to Thayer Learning Center. Parent Help is owned by John Bundy, while Thayer is owned by his wife, Willa Bundy. "They didn't disclose that to us as parents," Kutz testified. Thayer Learning Center, where Roberto Reyes of California died at age 15 in November 2004 after his parents were referred to the school through Parent Help, is located about 50 miles northeast of Kansas City in Kidder. Parent Help is less than 15 miles from there. Officials at Thayer and attorneys for Thayer didn't return calls from The Star on Thursday. The GAO found that among the more questionable practices were false promises of tax incentives and insurance reimbursements. Monthly charges ranged from $2,800 to $13,000, Kutz said. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kansascity.com Date: April 24, 2008)

Marketing of boot camps comes under congressional scrutiny--April 24th, 2008--CAPITOL HILL (AP) - Emotions ran high during a hearing in the House on youth boot camps. Lawmakers and witnesses compared the treatment of teens in the camps to the kind of torture faced by prisoners at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison. Greg Kutz has led an investigation into youth residential programs for the Government Accountability Office. He says the programs use deceptive marketing practices when trying to persuade parents of troubled youngsters to enter the programs. Kutz testified that investigators uncovered cases in which a pit bull was trained to bite students and where teens had bags placed over their heads and nooses slipped around their necks. A visibly angry Congressman George Miller says "it's hard to believe that people would do this to somebody else's child." He has introduced legislation to prevent such abuses and boost oversight of boot camps. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.krdc.com Date: April 24, 2008)

Breaking: 'They're just laying down, waiting to hear something. They're on high risk.' Several Students Arrested At Locked-Down High School 28 Apr 2008 (WA) Several students have been arrested at Mount Tahoma High School after officials put the campus under a "high risk" lockdown on Monday. Earlier, KIRO 7 reporter Kevin McCarty said students off campus heard from students in classrooms who were told the lockdown was a "high risk" one, requiring students to lie down on the floor behind closed doors until the school is 'clear.' Officials said a student who had been suspended was found on campus Monday with a loaded handgun. For complete story, click here.

Hung Jury Declares Mistrial In Van Dragging Of 15-Year-Old Girl--May 3rd, 2008--Almost a year after 15-year-old Siobhan McClintock was allegedly dragged behind a van at a church bootcamp for troubled youth, her named abusers are set free due to hung jury despite witness testimony, medical treatment and photos of multiple injuries. On Friday, May 2, 2008, the Judge in the case of Charles Flowers, 47, and a bootcamp worker, Stephanie Bassitt, 21, declared a mistrial, as the jury could not reach a decision as to where the young girl sustained her injuries. Last summer, Siobhan was entered into Love Demonstrated Ministries, International's 32-day Boot Camp for "at risk" youth. The program, founded in 1995: "...for teen boys through the Faith Outreach Center. The camp's aim is to "instill discipline, respect for authority, integrity, unity and morality," according to the camp's Web site. In 1997, he began to accept girls to the program. While at the camp, Siobhan was said to have fallen behind in morning drill exercises and when she did, she was tied to a van and dragged along. An eye-witness account of the incident was provided during court. Two days after the incident, the troubled teen returned home, much to the shock of her mother. The mom took pictures of the injuries to Siobhan's legs, shins, chin, stomach, back, hands and feet. Her mom also had her treated as well as removed her from the program. Flowers and the worker were indicted on felony assault charges less than two months later. Their trial began at the end of April. Just a few days into the trial, the Judge reduced the charge of felony assault to a Class A misdemeanor, stating that a rope and van were in no way considered "Deadly Weapons". In a hung jury decision of 9-3, in favor of a "not guilty" verdict for Flowers and an 11-1 vote in favor of a "not guilty" verdict for Bassitt, the Judge declared a mistrial in the case. The main reason cited for their weighted decision towards not guilty was that their was no clear proof of where the evidence of the teen's injuries originated. Although due process is every American's right, where does eye-witness account, injuries consistent with dragging and medical treatment not provide evidence? The teen was obviously troubled and many such teens placed in these types of programs are pathological liars. Moreover, there are often so many situations involving the parents that are not known to the public and these parents have a history of allowing such behaviours to occur and then in desperation, place their "troubled" children in programs like this one. The children will do anything to escape and the parents will do anything to enable their children. The whole case is "hung" as this young girl has probably skirted her own problems, the alleged abusers got away with it and the court system failed. For complete story, click here.

When Is "Tough Love" Torture?--May 4th, 2008--"Last time this country witnessed somebody with a bag over his head and a noose around his neck, the world was horrified and the nation was embarrassed," thundered Rep. George Miller, on hearing testimony this April regarding abusive treatment of troubled teens in unregulated residential programs. "To be told [by these witnesses] that this is considered a valid therapy by someone in the care of someone else's child...It's hard to believe." Miller—who chairs the House Education and Labor Committee—had called for the congressional hearings to introduce legislation to regulate the programs, which use such "tough love" methods in an attempt to discipline difficult adolescents. He'd also requested a Government Accountability Office (GAO) investigation. At the first round of hearings last October, the GAO had released its initial report, finding "thousands" of allegations of child abuse, medical neglect and "reckless and negligent operating practices," in "boot camps," "wilderness programs" and "academies," which currently hold tens of thousands of American youth. Two additional GAO reports were introduced at the April hearings—with investigators describing the treatment of some of the youth as "torture." One youth was beaten for weeks and denied medical attention after a suicide attempt left him with an exposed bone from a broken arm; others were taunted, then ignored as they lay dying; some were even hooded and had nooses placed around their necks. For complete story, click here.

Lincoln Man Accused of Binding, Gagging Teen Boys--May 19th, 2008--LANCASTER (KPTM) - A Lancaster County man is under arrest for binding, gagging, blindfolding and hanging teenaged boys from the rafters of a detached garage. Police say 57-year-old Sanford Kaplan victimized the teens starting in 2000 at his home at 14647 Country Lane. After serving a search warrant, investigators seized items used to bind the boys, a home computer and a camera. Kaplan was booked on several counts of false imprisonment and 3rd degree sexual assault of a child and child abuse on Wednesday. For complete story, click here.

'Individuals will be expected to report to the centre every day for an intensive training programme.' Tories plan boot camps for jobless youths --Automatic referrals if out of work for three months --Companies and voluntary groups to run centres 26 May 2008 A future Conservative government will bring in "boot camps" for unemployed young people aged between 18 and 21 who refuse to take a job, Chris Grayling, the party's welfare spokesman, will say tomorrow. Grayling plans to ask private sector companies and voluntary organisations to run the intensive training centres. Individuals will be expected to report to the centre every day for an intensive training programme. Grayling will say: "We plan to introduce much tougher rules for young people under the age of 21 claiming jobseeker's allowance. For this group, the welfare to work process will start much earlier. There will be employment 'boot camps' and community work programmes for those who don't find a job. Staying at home doing nothing will be a thing of the past." [Work camps - so corpora-terrorists get free slave labor?] For complete story, click here.

Lawsuit threatened over teen foster care center--May 31st, 2008--Two days after a court appointed consultant blasted a Lauderhill youth shelter, citing "insurmountable safety concerns" for troubled teens, Florida's top child advocacy group threatened to sue private child welfare bosses if they do not improve care. In a lengthy, tartly worded letter sent Thursday to the top administrators of ChildNet, Broward County's privately run foster care agency, the head of Florida's Children First is demanding that the agency halt all admissions to the Quest Group Home and significantly improve its system of care for adolescent foster kids. "It is shocking to me," FCF executive director Andrea Moore wrote, "that the lead agency in Broward County charged with protecting the state's dependent children is not just willing to tolerate, but actually facilitate, the continued existence of a blatantly dangerous and substandard facility." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.miamiherald.com Date: May 31, 2008)

Let kids talk and be kids--June 1st, 2008--A 12-year-old stands facing the wall, lunch tray jammed between his stomach and wall so that he can eat. It's not lunch at a juvenile detention center or boot camp, but lunch at Lee Middle School. According to the school, this punishment is the "consequence administered by teachers" for students in the silent lunch area who don't remain silent and are disruptive. Punishment? Or abuse? As parent of a Lee student, someone who's regularly been a parent volunteer and an East Coweta High resource teacher, and as a long-time educator, I was shocked to learn students are regularly treated this way by educational professionals who should be able to manage behavior more appropriately. Silent lunch? You're kidding. What offense is so heinous a student has to be silent during one of the rare times in the school day when social interaction is possible? What crime does standing against a wall fit? Silent lunch? When did the noise of a lunchroom filled with happy kids interacting with one another become offensive? Having lunch with my kids was always the highlight of the week. Kids are spontaneous, animated, outgoing social beings. I loved to listen to them, talk with them. I learned the most interesting things. Was enthralled by the constantly changing tapestry of evolving personalities. Saw the world through eyes that hadn't become jaded. Students against the wall? This is middle school, not the Marine Corps. When did teachers forget children are children? Look up the latest teen suicide and drop-out rates. Middle schoolers are dealing with some of the most dramatic life-altering transitions they'll face in life. Lunch should be a time-out from the day's activities and pressures, a neutral zone where kids can socialize and be kids. Nick De Bonis Sharpburg For complete story, click here.

When Is "Tough Love" Torture?--May 4th, 2008--"Last time this country witnessed somebody with a bag over his head and a noose around his neck, the world was horrified and the nation was embarrassed," thundered Rep. George Miller, on hearing testimony this April regarding abusive treatment of troubled teens in unregulated residential programs. "To be told [by these witnesses] that this is considered a valid therapy by someone in the care of someone else's child...It's hard to believe." Miller—who chairs the House Education and Labor Committee—had called for the congressional hearings to introduce legislation to regulate the programs, which use such "tough love" methods in an attempt to discipline difficult adolescents. He'd also requested a Government Accountability Office (GAO) investigation. At the first round of hearings last October, the GAO had released its initial report, finding "thousands" of allegations of child abuse, medical neglect and "reckless and negligent operating practices," in "boot camps," "wilderness programs" and "academies," which currently hold tens of thousands of American youth. Two additional GAO reports were introduced at the April hearings—with investigators describing the treatment of some of the youth as "torture." One youth was beaten for weeks and denied medical attention after a suicide attempt left him with an exposed bone from a broken arm; others were taunted, then ignored as they lay dying; some were even hooded and had nooses placed around their necks. Sitting in the audience—and well aware of how difficult it can be to get people to comprehend the extent and severity of the abuse taking place in these programs—was Phil Elberg, a New Jersey medical malpractice attorney. His cases against the industry helped bring the issue to congressional attention and his work, mentioned in two of the three GAO reports, helped guide investigators in understanding the issues and key players. Elberg has probably done more than anyone else to hold the billion-dollar teen treatment business accountable. If the legislation passes, he may soon have many more cases—and perhaps, finally, some competition from other lawyers for them. For complete story, click here.

US Teen Students Having Less Sex And Doing Less Drugs--June 5th, 2008--US teens are engaging in fewer risky behaviors than in years past according to the results of a new federal survey conducted by the CDC. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.dogflu.ca Date: June 5, 2008)

Mat Anderson: Teens aren't as bad as most depictions--June 4th, 2008--As a teenager, I remember reading innumerable news stories about how crazy my peers and I were and how teens were a troubled group of sexually promiscuous, drug-addicted party animals that cared about nothing but themselves. I always found this to be a little off-putting because I knew that I wasn't crazy, sexually promiscuous or drug-addicted, and I was pretty sure that the majority of my peers weren't either. But I still wondered if I was an abnormal teen who was just out of the loop about what was cool. This bothered me, because like most teenagers, I desired to fit in and be normal. I wondered, "Am I expected to experiment with drugs and have sex? Am I uncool if I don't?" Now that I'm older, I've realized that it's probably unlikely that those behaviors are the norm for most teens. However, it's often the negative behaviors of the minority that make headlines and shape the way society views all teens. Experts say that the way teens are portrayed in the media is often far from what is true about their age group. They say false impressions are negatively affecting how parents parent and teachers teach, and how young people think about themselves. If young people grow up hearing the stereotype that it's normal for them to get drunk or high, have sex, get pregnant or vandalize property, then that may be what they'll end up doing. Experts say this is because during adolescence, teens are trying to find their identity, and a big part of that is fitting in and being part of the crowd. But according to the Centers for Disease Control, the majority of the crowd hasn't had an alcoholic beverage in the past 30 days, has never tried marijuana, and only 50 percent have had sex. This reality can be leveraged to promote healthy choices through "social norming." Social norming operates on the notion that if the general impression is that most kids don't drink alcohol, then those who do drink will drink less, and fewer will start drinking in the first place. Several colleges, high schools and middle schools have found this to be highly effective in limiting risky behaviors among young people, and parents can incorporate this same strategy into their parenting style. Here are some tips: * Keep the lines of communication open. It's important to have regular conversations with teens that provide them with accurate information about the issues that they face. Remind them that the norm for most teens isn't to go out partying and drinking. * Be mindful of the messages you're sending. During prom and graduation season, many parents say things like, "I know everyone else may be drinking but..." It's important for parents to be aware that the majority of teens won't be drinking and that parents may be subtly sending the message to teens that those behaviors are the norm. * Communicate values and morals. It's important for teens to know what the norm is for your family. If teens understand that they are expected to live up to certain shared morals and values regarding behaviors like sex and drinking, then that will affect how they act when outside of the home as well. * Be an example. The most important influence on teens is parents, so it's important to demonstrate appropriate behaviors. Your teen will often "do as you do," so it's vital that your actions mirror the behaviors you desire from your teen. Teens aren't crazy, they're merely trying to find their identity as they transition from childhood to adulthood. While we should be mindful that they will make some mistakes along the way, parents shouldn't sit by and accept a harmful and destructive lifestyle as the norm from anyone they love, especially their children and the future of our society. For complete story, click here.

Guilty verdict in bus killing--June 10th, 2008--A Baltimore man with two previous murder convictions and almost two decades of documented psychiatric illnesses was found guilty but not criminally responsible yesterday in the killing of a fellow inmate aboard a prison bus - and state officials aren't sure what to do with him. Kevin G. Johns Jr., who had faced a possible death penalty, suffered from mental disorders that prevented him from being able to obey the law when he strangled another prisoner, a judge ruled. After a prosecutor said Johns, 25, might be too dangerous for the state's maximum-security psychiatric hospital, Harford Circuit Judge Emory A. Plitt Jr. gave attorneys for the state prison system and health department two weeks to sort out where he should be sent. The verdict came after a two-hour commentary from Plitt on what he called "a preventable tragedy." The judge placed some of the blame for the Feb. 2, 2005, murder of Philip E. Parker Jr. on a prison system that had "ample warnings" about Johns' deteriorating mental health and his propensity for violence. The judge questioned why prison doctors had stopped giving Johns medication and why correctional officers did not more closely guard him during the nighttime bus ride from Hagerstown to Supermax in Baltimore. After Parker's murder, three correctional officers on the bus were fired, and the prison system revamped its transportation policy, eliminating all nighttime bus trips. "Based on the undisputed evidence presented to me during the trial," Plitt said, "it seems to me that the death of Mr. Parker could have been avoided." The judge gave an exhaustive recitation of Johns' history of mental illness, which began at age 9, spanned 5,000 pages of evaluations and included a dozen diagnoses over the years, including fetal alcohol syndrome, lead poisoning, and schizo-affective disorder. In 2002, Johns killed an uncle in Baltimore whom he had accused of physically and sexually abusing him. And in January 2004, while serving his 35-year sentence at a prison in Hagerstown, Johns strangled his 16-year-old cellmate. As he was being sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole in that killing, Johns said that he would "do it again." A day later, he strangled Parker. Plitt punctuated many of his remarks with the phrase "another cloud in the gathering storm," borrowing from defense attorney Harry J. Trainor Jr.'s description of Parker's murder as "a perfect storm." The case was moved from Baltimore County and heard by a judge rather than a jury at the request of defense attorneys. The eight-day trial ended May 20, and Plitt, a former attorney for the prison system, said he had been poring over evidence and researching legal issues ever since. As Plitt reached the end of his comments and announced his finding that Johns was not criminally responsible, Parker's family, dressed all in black, stood and left the courtroom. Parker, 20, was serving a 3 1/2 year sentence for a robbery with a pellet gun. Years earlier, Parker and Johns had lived together in a residential treatment center for troubled teens. (Webmaster Note: Behavior modification programs/residential treatment centers/ programs contribute to the destruction of our society. So much so that not only the above case, but Columbine (both boys had been through an anger "management" program and were on prescription psychotropic medication), Virginia Tech (shooter was a survivor of a behavioral "health" residential "treatment" center), and DeKalb in IL (shooter was a survivor of a behavior modification program and on prescription psychotropic medication). Who's taking responsibility? Not the Frankenstein, cultish, behavior modification industry? Well, they should be held responsible, whether they wish to be or not. This has to stop!) For complete story, click here.

Ex-employees sue boot camp accused of abuse--June 3rd, 2008--Five former employees of a northwest Missouri boot camp where a child died in 2004 have sued for alleged malicious prosecution. The workers had been sued by Thayer Learning Center in a case that eventually was dropped. In that lawsuit, Thayer alleged that the ex-employees made false statements and false allegations to law-enforcement officials and others about activities at the camp. In the lawsuit filed Monday, the former employees allege that Thayer sued them to keep them and others quiet, describing the lawsuit against them as an attempt "to keep the truth about their facility secret." The workers' lawsuit also accuses Thayer of suing them "to hide from the appropriate authorities and parents the fact that ... the usual methods used by (Thayer) did indeed and actually constitute child abuse." The case filed in Caldwell County Circuit Court names Thayer Learning Center and the facility's owner, Willa Bundy, as defendants. Bundy and an attorney for the center did not return phone calls Monday and Tuesday. Allegations of child abuse at Thayer — about 50 miles northeast of Kansas City in Kidder — came to light after Roberto Reyes, 15, died in November 2004, less than two weeks after enrolling. No charges were filed in connection with Roberto's death, but the FBI recently conducted a preliminary investigation and sent its findings to the U.S. Department of Justice. Officials there are reviewing the case. Thayer officials have said that allegations of abuse were "ludicrous and false." In its 2003 lawsuit, Thayer alleged that the workers made false statements to third parties about the center "physically abusing and harming its students" and accused them of violating written contracts by contacting parents, government agencies and law-enforcement officials to discuss specific students and school operations. Those contacts, Thayer alleged, forced the school to "have to continually ... deny these false allegations" and caused the loss of potential students. Thayer dropped its lawsuit last month. In their lawsuit, the ex-employees said contractual agreements could not be used to prevent individuals from reporting abuse. They accuse Thayer of "covering up the fact that they had an unqualified and unsupervised staff engaging in child abuse." Phil Elberg, a New Jersey attorney representing the plaintiffs, alleged by phone that Thayer's 2003 lawsuit "was clearly intended to scare people into shutting up." The plaintiffs did not specify a dollar amount but alleged that the center's "outrageous" behavior "showed an evil motive" and therefore entitles them to exemplary damages in addition to actual damages, attorneys' fees and "such other relief as the court deems just and proper." Elberg said the plaintiffs — Nanette Burge and Candessa Williams of Gallatin, Mo.; Linda Glenn and Janet Traylor of Hamilton, Mo., and Regina Burge of Jamesport, Mo. — would not comment. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kansascity.com Date: June 3, 2008)

Facing huge hurdles, The Starting Place starts over--June 12th, 2008--Nancy Merolla began her new job on April 7, but her hiring wasn't officially announced until May 29. "I guess they wanted to see if I'd stick around," Merolla joked the other day. At least I think she was joking. Merolla has her hands full as the new CEO of the Starting Place, a teen drug abuse and mental health treatment center that hit bottom earlier this year. A Hollywood police investigation into possible sexual abuse by former staff against teen clients continues. (Webmaster Note: Kids should be given second chances, not sexual predators.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sun-sentinel.com Date: June 12, 2008)

ACLU sues Texas youth prison system--June 12th, 2008--AUSTIN (AP) - The American Civil Liberties Union has filed a lawsuit against the Texas youth prison system over use of solitary confinement, strip searches and other practices at a lockup for girls in Brownwood. The lawsuit was filed Thursday in federal court in Austin on behalf of 5 girls held at Brownwood. The suit claims the Texas Youth Commission is violating inmates' constitutional rights and international standards on protecting children from abuse and cruel treatment. TYC spokesman Jim Hurley, who had not seen the lawsuit, said the agency is taking steps to improve how it deals with female inmates. He also noted the agency recently ended a long-term isolation program that had been used at a different facility. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.kdbc.com Date: June 12, 2008)

Teen treatment center looks for area land--GRANTS- The Grants City Council will hear a detailed proposal on Tuesday night from Frank Sipan on the possibility of opening a Boys Town in Grants. Boys Town, which also accepts girls, is a national organization that helps troubled teens. Sipan said Boys Town would help those young people throughout the area become stable and productive citizens. The organization has an 80 percent recovery rate. This is a self-contained community, and members have their own mayor, post office and other amenities. The next regular City Council meeting will be on June 24 at 6 p.m. at City Hall. For more information call the city clerk at 287-7927. For complete story, click here. (Webmaster Note: Boys Town is confirmedly abusive. Please speak out against this and any other grants!)

Boy suffocated during school punishment Coroner's Report--June 20th, 2008--MONTREAL - After nine-year-old Gabriel Poirier was discovered lifeless in his classroom last April 17, his parents were told their autistic son had stopped breathing after hiding under a heavy therapeutic blanket. Now a coroner has revealed that Gabriel's teachers had tightly wrapped him in the buckwheat-stuffed blanket, leaving only the tips of his ears sticking out, as punishment when he became disruptive. They left him unsupervised in a corner for 20 minutes, returning when a timer sounded. Gabriel was unconscious and blue in the face. He was rushed to hospital, where he died the following night surrounded by his family. In a report published yesterday, Coroner Catherine Rudel-Tessier concluded the child suffocated. She said the teachers at the special-needs school in Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que., failed to follow guidelines for the blankets, which are used commonly to calm autistic children. "He was only 53 pounds, he was so small," Gilles Poirier, the boy's father said at a news conference yesterday. "How can they wrap him up like that in a 40-pound blanket? How can this treatment be tolerated?" Ms. Rudel-Tessier said proper use of the blanket called for a child to be rolled at most once and for his head to be left uncovered. The blanket was to be used as a relaxation therapy, not as a punishment, and teachers were supposed to keep an eye on children using the blankets. "A child rolled 'at least four times' in such a heavy blanket is under restraint," the coroner wrote. For complete story, click here.

ACLU sues Texas youth prison system claiming abuse--June 11th, 2008--AUSTIN, Texas (AP) — The American Civil Liberties Union sued the Texas youth prison system on Thursday, claiming girl inmates have been traumatized by practices such as solitary confinement and strip searches. The lawsuit filed in Austin on behalf of five girls held at the Brownwood facility claims the Texas Youth Commission is violating inmates' constitutional rights and international standards on protecting children from abuse and cruel treatment. For complete story, click here.

Teen safe house to open in Kalaeloa--June 24th, 2008--O'ahu's first state-sponsored Ke Kama Pono structured group home for troubled, nonviolent teens is expected to open in Kalaeloa sometime next year. (Webmaster Note: This is a "Federally Funded Program" and needs to be monitored closely as it may be the new "face" of re-education.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.honoluluadvertiser.com Date: June 24, 2008)

Breaking News: House Passes Legislation to Stop Child Abuse in Teen Boot Camps and other Residential Programs--June 25th, 2008--The House Wednesday overwhelmingly passed HR 6358 (formerly HR 5876) by a vote of 318-103, with provisions to ban degrading and humiliating treatment, set national standards, create a national hotline that must be accessible to teens in program to report maltreatment and $15 million in funding for enforcement and regulation. (Webmaster Note: NOT GOOD ENOUGH!!!! Children are being tortured, brainwashed, and killed at these facilities. The entire industry needs to be shut down. No program should be in operation unless and until strict guidelines and competent, effective objective and impartial third-party oversight is in full force. Our children deserve better!) For complete story, click here.

Rescued man has change of heart about teens--July 7th, 2008--HE broke down and wept when he learnt that two teens had risked their lives to save him from drowning. It was almost a week later, when The New Paper on Sunday visited him in hospital on Friday, that Mr Seow Swee Lin, 66, found out about how he was rescued. An interview with the amputee had appeared in The New Paper on 27 Jun, after he was found living at the void deck of a block on Yishun Avenue 5. He was supposed to have moved to a shelter the Chong Pang Zone 2 Residents' Committee had found for him, but he had refused. When we visited Mr Seow at the Singapore General Hospital where he had been warded since last Saturday night, he had no recollection of what had happened. 'I woke up and found myself in hospital. I don't remember falling into the water,' he said in Mandarin. All he remembered was that he had gone to the Merlion Park around 8pm. 'I was very troubled as I didn't want to stay in the shelter, and I wanted to sit somewhere to think about what to do and where to go,' he said. He said only the night before, he had been sleeping at a Toa Payoh void deck when four youths had tried to rob him. When told what the two boys had done to save his life, Mr Seow covered his face with his hands and wept. 'I feel that I learnt something today. Before this, I thought badly of teenagers because of those four who tried to rob me,' he said when he had recovered sufficiently to talk. 'Now that I know I was saved by two youths, I realise that I cannot think that all teenagers are punks because of a few black sheep.' He was very grateful to the teens who had saved his life. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: <http://newpaper.asia1.com.sg> Date: July 7, 2008)

FTC Urges Caution When Considering 'Boot Camps' --July 9th, 2008--When parents or guardians are considering finding a residential treatment program for a troubled teenager, the decision is often a difficult one. While residential treatment programs may appeal to families, some of whom are looking for a less-restrictive alternative to incarceration or hospitalization, no standard definition exists for these programs. Such programs are not regulated by the federal government, and many are not subject to state licensing or monitoring. In an effort to help parents and guardians with these decisions, the Federal Trade Commission has written a new publication with 15 questions to ask representatives of residential treatment programs. To learn more go to <http://www.ftc.gov/bcp/edu/pubs/consumer/products/pro27.shtm>. The Federal Trade Commission works for consumers to prevent fraudulent, deceptive, and unfair business practices and to provide information to help spot, stop, and avoid them. To file a complaint in English or Spanish, visit the FTC's online Complaint Assistant or call 1-877-FTC-HELP (1-877-382-4357). The FTC enters complaints into Consumer Sentinel, a secure, online database available to more than 1,500 civil and criminal law enforcement agencies in the U.S. and abroad. The FTC's Web site provides free information on a variety of consumer topics. For complete story, click here.

Beatings Claimed At High-End Juvie Camp: Staff at Rancho Valmora Accused of Abusing Students-- May 11th, 2008--May 11, 2008 (Albuquerque Journal - McClatchy-Tribune Information Services via COMTEX) -- -- When his son started dabbling in drugs and alcohol, Corey Manning sent the 14-year-old to Rancho Valmora, hoping the $6,000-a-month program would help straighten him out. Instead, the boy was beaten every night for his first two months in the Mora County residential treatment center, according to Manning. On April 24, a staffer there, Clarence Padilla, was arrested and charged with three counts of child abuse and six counts of contributing to the delinquency of a minor. He was released on bond from the San Miguel County Detention Center and has a preliminary hearing scheduled for May 28 in Mora County Magistrate Court. The statement of probable cause quoted Dale Parker, Rancho Valmora administrator, as claiming Padilla physically assaulted three students and "also influenced and enforced many more incidents of physical abuse." It names six victims. Parker informed the New Mexico State Police after residents of Padilla's nine-boy dorm complained of beatings. At times, Padilla allegedly organized some of the bigger residents to attack other boys during the night, often using a sock stuffed with a bar of soap to prevent bruises, according to parents and a treatment center official. Flora Gallegos, court-appointed attorney for Padilla, did not return a call from the Journal for comment. The Children, Youth and Families Department, which licenses Rancho Valmora, sent a team last week to investigate health and safety there, spokeswoman Romaine Serna said. Their report is not complete yet, she added. The more recent alleged incidents, which arrest records indicate occurred over a 10-month period, have left some parents plagued with anger, shock and guilt, asking how a place where they sent their children for help ended up hurting them. "The guilt that hits you is indescribable," said Manning, a resident of Santa Clara, Calif. "We entrusted our child to them to provide a safe environment," said George Dombrovski, a Fairfax, Calif., resident. "It's inexcusable to have physical abuse like this ..." For complete story, click here.

Memories of Casa by the Sea--July 10th, 2008--I'm not sure if your organization publishes e-mails, but you have my permission to publish mine. Yes, my name is Ramey Smith. I read some of the articles on your web site and found a few about a place called Casa by the Sea in Ensenada, Mexico. I spent almost one year there, from January to November in 1999. On my first day at Casa, I was pulled off my bed, which was the top bunk, and fell to the concrete floor busting my face and nose. As I lay there bleeding, I thought these people are going to kill me. I was in fear for my life at Casa, so I played along with the program the best I could. I made it to level four in the Bold Family. That is how they identified us. They put us in a group, gave it a name, and called it a "family." Anyway, I finally got out of there when my mother's terminal cancer got so bad my father pulled me from Casa by the Sea. I spent the last 2 1/2 months of my mother's life at her bed side. In my opinion, WWASP are a bunch of criminals who manipulate parents. But they did teach me one valuable lesson which I can pass on to troubled youth. Watch out. Your parents can send you to a foreign prison over night and there is nothing you can do about it. You have two choices. You can resist and get beat up, or you can play along until you get out. I'm glad they finally closed down Casa by the Sea. That place was crazy. Sometimes I actually started to think I was going crazy. WWASP does have a wonderful program for brain washing or pain washing children to make them behave. But I'll tell you what. It doesn't last. I ran in to one of the upper level kids that graduated from the program. We were at a Taco Cabana at like 2:30 am and he and some other kids came stumbling in drunk. He didn't change. Not for long, at least. Like in Mexico, where Room Restriction (R&R) consisted of lying on your face, chin pressed on the hard tile floor, and your hands behind your back. They might as well have hog tied us because if you didn't hold that position on your own for 4 to 6 to 12 hours, they had plenty of un-educated idiots to make you wish you had. I heard so many times kids screaming for help, screaming to their parents, screaming for mommy or daddy, screaming out to God to help them. What could we do? If we tried to help, we would be in the same boat. We'd lose our few privileges, get demoted to Level One and spend 2 to 4 weeks in R&R with our chins on the floor. I wish we had been strong enough and organized enough to take that place over by force. I remember thinking about it all the time when I began my captivity there. We out-numbered the staff by at least 20 or 30 of us to 1 staff member. I would have enjoyed hog tying those bastards up and letting them enjoy some Room Restriction, and feed them rotten fish and other horrible things like they fed us. I won't even go into how bad the food was. Well, that's why they wouldn't let us talk without permission, or speak English. They knew if we had gotten organized, we would have overrun the place. I had dreams about it after I left that godforsaken crap hole. I would wake up in the middle of the night and run into the hallway of my house for formation. I learned a lot of Spanish while I was in Mexico because I had no choice. But I still can't stand it. I had a dream of going back there one day and liberating all the children whose parents are paying top dollar to have them victimized. For complete story, click here.

US school rebuked for ibuprofen strip search--July 12th, 2008--A divided US appeals court has ruled an Arizona school violated the constitutional rights of a 13-year-old student by conducting a strip search for ibuprofen. Suspecting that a student had violated a policy against prescription or over-the-counter drugs without permission, public school officials in Safford, Arizona, ordered a search of Savana Redding. A school nurse had her remove her clothes, including her bra, and shake her underwear to see if Ms Redding was hiding anything. The 2003 search, prompted by a tip from another girl, did not find ibuprofen, which is found in common medications like Advil and Motrin to treat pain like cramps and headaches. Higher doses require a prescription. Previous court decisions ruled the school did not violate the US Constitution's Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures because officials have a legitimate interest in protecting students from prescription drugs. The 6-5 ruling by a panel of the 9th US Circuit Court of Appeals on Friday overturned an earlier decision, setting out its reasoning in an extensive 75-page ruling with many details on the complications of eighth grade life. "Directing a 13-year-old girl to remove her clothes, partially revealing her breasts and pelvic area, for allegedly possessing ibuprofen, an infraction that poses an imminent danger to no one, and which could be handled by keeping her in the principal's office until a parent arrived or simply sending her home, was excessively intrusive," Justice Kim McLane Wardlaw wrote for the majority. For complete story, click here.

Charges filed in teen's death at boot camp--July 15th, 2008--A Montrose County grand jury Tuesday handed up a raft of charges against operators and staff of a youth-rehabilitation camp in connection with the death of a 15-year-old Utah boy who died in their care. Caleb Jensen died in May 2007 from an untreated staph infection at a court-ordered wilderness camp run by Alternative Youth Adventures in Montrose. The program was shuttered after his death and surrendered its state license. The grand jury filed various charges of negligent homicide, child abuse resulting in death and manslaughter against the staff and management, as well as Keith Hooker, the camp's medical director. For complete story, click here.

Teen Screen Lawsuit Advances: Federal Court Affirms Family's Right to Sue School for Subjecting Teen to Mental Health Test Without Parental Consent--August 6th, 2008--SOUTH BEND, Ind. A federal court has given the green light to a civil rights lawsuit filed by Rutherford Institute attorneys in defense of a 15-year-old Indiana student who was subjected by school officials to a controversial mental health examination without the knowledge or consent of her parents. In ruling that the lawsuit filed on behalf of Chelsea Rhoades and her parents, Michael and Teresa Rhoades, may proceed to trial, the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Indiana upheld the claims that the local school district deprived the Rhoades family of their federal constitutional rights to family integrity and privacy when it subjected Chelsea to the "TeenScreen" examination. A copy of the lawsuit is available here: http://www.rutherford.org/PDF/Filed_Complaint.pdf. For complete story, click here.

State Senator Wants Juvenile Prison Shut Down--August 7th, 2008--SPRINGDALE - If Sen. Sue Madison had her way, the Arkansas Juvenile Assessment and Treatment Center in Alexander would be closed and bulldozed. She called the juvenile prison in southwest Pulaski County a "grim" place while discussing child welfare issues during a meeting of the Arkansas Kids Count Coalition on Thursday. It's a place where the state is "warehousing juveniles because someone is mad at them, either the juvenile judge or school officials," Madison said. The state's challenge is finding the money to replace the treatment programs with community-based programs that are more effective, she said. Reform of Arkansas' juvenile justice system is one of a laundry list of issues the Coalition supports to improve the welfare of children across the state, said Paul Kelly, a senior policy analyst with Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families. The juvenile justice system relies too heavily on confined incarceration of children who may have family or mental health issues rather than criminal behavior. The Kids Count Coalition recommends greater attention on preventive measures, placing children in smaller therapeutic environments and expanded community services to better serve children rather than shipping them off to secure confinement, away from their schools or families. For complete story, click here.

Federal agency: Shoreline schools excluded children with disabilities--August 7th, 2008--The Shoreline School District discriminated against students with disabilities, a federal civil-rights investigation has found. The 15-month investigation centered on the district's February 2007 decision to exclude from its classrooms children newly placed at the Fircrest School, a state residential facility in Shoreline for people with disabilities. As a result of that decision, the investigation found, 11 Fircrest youths didn't go to school at all, some for as long as three months. Others received an inadequate education. The records of 23 youths at Fircrest were reviewed by the U.S. Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights (OCR). All but one had attended public school before going to Fircrest. "I think what the investigation confirms is that public schools are for every child," said Stacy Gillett, who filed the complaint as a board member of the Arc of Washington, an advocacy organization for people with disabilities. Shoreline officials didn't return repeated calls seeking comment. While it did not admit wrongdoing, the district entered into a settlement agreement with OCR that requires it to revise its policies and practices. Kids with disabilities will not be excluded from public school and will have opportunities to participate with other children. An independent team of professionals, along with OCR, will oversee Shoreline's progress. For complete story, click here.

Police Say Cult Starved Toddler--August 12th, 2008--A toddler whose remains were found inside a suitcase in Philadelphia this spring was starved to death by members of a religious cult, including his mother, in part because he refused to say "amen" after meals, police said. Ria Ramkissoon, 21, the mother of Javon Thompson, was charged Sunday with first-degree murder in the boy's death, and Baltimore police said Monday that three other members of a group called 1 Mind Ministries have also been charged with first-degree murder. Members did not seek medical care for Javon when he stopped breathing, and the boy died in his mother's arms, according to court documents that described police interviews with a confidential informant and two children. He would have been about 19 months old when police say adults stopped feeding him in December 2006. For complete story, click here.

Sentencing Children to Die in Prison--August 18th, 2008--Ian Manuel was 13-years-old when he participated in a robbery attempt in Florida, leaving the victim with a nonfatal gunshot injury. Ian turned himself in to police, and his attorney told him he would receive a 15-year sentence if he pled guilty. Instead, he was sentenced to life in prison without parole. Ian's is one of several stories told in the Equal Justice Initiative's (EJI) new report, Cruel and Unusual: Sentencing 13- and 14-Year-Old Children to Die in Prison (pdf). The Equal Justice Initiative of Alabama is a private, nonprofit organization that provides legal representation to indigent defendants and prisoners. The EJI study found 73 cases in the United States where 13- and 14- year-olds have been sentenced to life without parole--in other words, sentenced to die in prison. EJI argues that giving this harsh sentence to young teenagers violates the U.S. Constitution's Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment and is also counter to international conventions. The United States is almost alone in the world in imposing life sentences without parole for crimes committed by children at such a young age. EJI notes that giving such sentences to juveniles has been condemned in a number of international agreements, including the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. This appalling pattern of injustice has prompted a nationwide litigation campaign to challenge these harsh penalties and have the children considered for parole-eligible sentences as soon as possible. For complete story, click here.

Children as Big Pharma Guinea Pigs: 98 Percent of Drug Trials on Children Have no Safety Checks-- August 18th, 2008--(NaturalNews) Fewer than 2 percent of drug trials conducted on children have independent safety advisory boards, a review published in the journal Acta Paediatrica has found. Researchers from Nottingham University reviewed reports on 739 international drug trials that had been published between 1996 and 2002. They found that although 74 percent of studies described their safety monitoring procedures, less than 2 percent included an independent safety review committee. Such committees are composed of independent health experts who can review the study data as it comes out and warn if the drug appears to be placing study participants at risk. "It is invaluable to have an independent monitor who can swiftly question any adverse drug reactions or differences in illness and death rates between groups taking part in the clinical trials," said lead researcher Helen Sammons. "Parents also need to be made aware of the risks of adverse drug reactions when a child takes any medicine so that they can make informed decisions that balance those risks against the possible benefits the drug may provide their child." The Nottingham University review also suggests that independent committees lead to more rigorous safety standards. Of the 13 studies with independent review committees, six were halted early due to highly toxic drug effects. None of the studies without independent committees were stopped early. Although the researchers looked only at studies conducted on children, they said the statistics for adult trials are probably similar. For complete story, click here.

Miss. man accused in Medicaid scam--August 1st, 2008--COLUMBUS, Miss. (AP) - The founder of an organization dedicated to helping troubled teens stay out of jail is himself behind bars, facing felony charges stemming from an alleged Medicaid scam. Aaron Ray Pulsifer of Columbus is former executive director of the Youth Challenge Program. He was being held Thursday at the Lowndes County Adult Detention Center. Prosecutors accuse the 31-year-old Pulsifer of using the organization to aid in a nearly 3-year scheme in which he illegally received more than $1.1 million. Court documents say Pulsifer stole the identity of a woman, then made false reports to the state Division of Medicaid claiming she had provided diagnostic and counseling services for dozens of program Youth Challenge participants. For complete story, click here.

New Report Calls to End Beating of Children in Public Schools--Read the report, A Violent Education: Corporal Punishment of Children in U.S. Public Schools. A shocking report illuminates the state of disturbing forms of discipline in U.S. schools. Released last week by the ACLU and Human Rights Watch, the report finds that more than 200,000 public school students in the U.S. were punished by beatings during the 2006-2007 school year. Further, minorities and students with mental and physical disabilities are punished at disproportionately higher rates in the 13 states that corporally punished more than 1,000 students per year -- despite no evidence that these students commit disciplinary infraction at such disproportionate rates. The report, A Violent Education: Corporal Punishment of Children in U.S. Public Schools, found that children ranging in age from 3 to 19 years old in Texas and Mississippi are routinely physically punished for minor infractions such as chewing gum, talking back to a teacher, or violating the dress code, as well as for more serious transgressions such as fighting. Corporal punishment, legal in 21 states, typically takes the form of "paddling," during which an administrator or teacher hits a child repeatedly on the buttocks with a long wooden board. The report shows that, as a result of paddling, many children are left injured, degraded, and disengaged from school. "Every public school needs effective methods of discipline, but beating kids teaches violence and it doesn't stop bad behavior," said Alice Farmer, Aryeh Neier Fellow at Human Rights Watch and the ACLU, and author of the report. "Corporal punishment discourages learning, fails to deter future misbehavior and at times even provokes it." The ACLU and Human Rights Watch call upon the U.S. government to prohibit corporal punishment in all public schools and urge state governments, school boards, superintendents, and administrators to eliminate physical punishment in their schools. >>> Learn more, and read the report. For complete story, click here.

Audit: Hempstead nonprofit used money for beer--Sept. 5th, 2008--A Hempstead agency that housed troubled teens allegedly used public money to buy beer and violent video games, and to pay $47,865 in bonuses to its workers in violation of its contract with the county, according to a Nassau County audit released yesterday. It also billed other counties for the use of beds that Nassau County had already paid for, in what amounted to $834,000 in overcharges, Nassau County Comptroller Howard Weitzman said in the audit. The audit sketched out a broad pattern of wasteful and inappropriate spending by the Leadership Training Institute that Weitzman said was the worst case of fiscal abuse he had ever seen by a nonprofit agency. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.newsday.com Date: September 5, 2008)

Former federal prosecutor on trial for allegedly molesting six teens--Sept. 5th, 2008--Clayton — Onetime federal prosecutor Eric Tolen lured under-age boys by offering small jobs at his home and then traded gifts such as dirt bikes, liquor or cigarettes for sexual favors, a St. Louis County jury was told Thursday. Prosecutor Kathi Alizadeh said the six victims — ages 11 to 15 at the time — had to perform sex acts on Tolen, or allow him to perform acts on them, to get what they wanted. Tolen, 47, is charged with 38 counts of criminal conduct. He steadfastly has denied any wrongdoing. He is a former assistant U.S. attorney who more recently had a general law practice in Overland. His past clients included a mayor of Overland and St. Charles city councilmen. He lived in Town and Country, where officials allege that many of the crimes occurred. For complete story, click here.

Utah doctor indicted in therapy camp death--Sept. 6th, 2008--A prominent Utah County physician stands accused of negligent homicide in connection with the death of a Salt Lake City teen in a southwest Colorado wilderness therapy program. But Keith R. Hooker, who has worked in the emergency department at Utah Valley Regional Medical Center since 1970, says he is innocent. And the indictment, which also accuses him of child abuse, contains no allegations about what he is alleged to have done or failed to do. Caleb Jensen, 15, died May 2, 2007, from a staphylococcus infection, which Colorado prosecutors contend went untreated despite glaring symptoms. The boy spent the last week of his life lying in his own urine and feces, in a remote field camp operated by Alternative Youth Adventures in Montrose County, Colo., court documents allege. Jensen had been sent to the camp by Utah juvenile justice officials. Colorado authorities shut AYA down two months after Jensen's death. Hooker, who served as the program's medical adviser, was indicted in July and related documents were unsealed Aug. 25. He was arraigned in a Montrose, Colo., court last week and pleaded not guilty. His next hearing is scheduled for Oct. 6. Reached at his Mapleton residence Friday, Hooker declined comment. His Provo lawyer, Mike Esplin, said he has not seen testimony given before the grand jury, but he believes there is insufficient evidence to support the charges. "Doctor Hooker never examined Caleb. His role is an adviser to the program. We think it's an overshot," Esplin said. "He didn't give [AYA] any advice concerning this incident. We are in the dark. [Investigators] never talked to him." Montrose County District Attorney Myrl Serra did not return phone calls. Also charged are camp emergency medical technician Ben Askins, who faces a more serious charge of manslaughter; program director Jim Omer and the businesses, Alternative Youth Adventures of Colorado and its corporate parent, Community Education Centers Inc. The New Jersey-based company provides treatment to 6,000 juvenile and adult offenders a year, in seven states. A corporate spokesman said the company was in the process of closing AYA at the time of Jensen's death, but declined to comment further. No charges were filed against field counselors who tended to Jensen and later spoke to investigators. Jensen was admitted to AYA's 60-day program on March 28, 2007. He had undergone an initial medical exam in Utah, but the exam did not reveal any illness, court documents said. His symptoms began April 23 when "it was noted that Caleb had a small blister located on his right ankle," the indictment said. The teen wrote in his journal the next day that he was "burning up, vomiting and having trouble hiking." Suspecting Jensen of "faking" his illness, camp staff separated him from the group until he died eight days later, the charges allege. Staff ordered him to wear diapers and put him on suicide watch, but allegedly did nothing to treat the fatal infection. For complete story, click here.

Youth worker charged with dealing crack--September 9th, 2008--Federal agents have arrested an employee of the Knox County schools and a home for troubled teens on charges of dealing crack cocaine, but their methods are drawing criticism from the agency that runs the group home. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency arrested Fred Bennett outside Cooper House, a group home for teen boys in the Fourth and Gill neighborhood. Bennett is under a federal indictment with two other men for distributing and possessing with intent to distribute crack. For complete story, click here.

Area native's book details broken system--September 14th, 2008-- Brownsville native Ron Howard pursued a degree in psychology and started working in residential treatment to help troubled teens; what he found was a system even more troubled than the children it was meant to help. Howard has documented some of the problems he has observed in a novel, "Children on Layaway, It's All About the Money $$$," a fictional account of life in a residential treatment facility based on real stories. Howard noted the recent passage of a bill in the U.S. House of Representatives designed to prevent abuse in residential treatment facilities as an indication that the problem is systemic, not limited to a single facility. "The picture is pretty grim, in my opinion," Howard said. "The majority of the time these kids spend with staff is with people who have a high school diploma. They are paying these people to be security guards." Howard said 70 percent of the children placed in residential treatment enter the system with mental health problems the staff is unqualified to handle. Howard said he would like to see a requirement for the youth counselors to have at least a bachelor's degree in psychology or sociology or a related field. "If you talk to any child who has been in a residential treatment program, I'd bet they'd say they've been subject to emotional or physical abuse," Howard said. "The kids may report the child abuse, but it's easier to sweep the case under the rug than it is to replace the staff because this is a high-turnover field. Something simply has to be done about it because these companies are literally making millions." Howard writes about children being beaten or having fingers and wrists broken by staff members supposedly restraining the children in dangerous situations in his fictional account. "Even my editor said these stories couldn't be 100 percent true. I'm sure there are even worse stories," Howard said. The nonfiction accounts of abuse can be found in the testimony attached to H.R. 6358, which in June was referred to the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. Testimony from the director for Education, Workforce, and Income Security Issues paints a bleak picture in which physical and sexual abuse occur without management intervention. "Abuse, neglect and civil rights violations documented in all types of residential facilities -government and private, licensed and unlicensed - show that the current federal-state oversight structure is inadequate to protect youth from maltreatment," GAO Director Kay E. Brown wrote in her concluding remarks. A former resident of a residential treatment facility in New York describes restraints using blankets and duct tape, as well as other abuses. "While I had been fortunate enough to miss out on most of the horrors personally, I unfortunately gave many tours to prospective parents, always omitting the details of restraints, punishments and lack of any sort of communication or safeguards against the abuses that took place," Jon Martin-Crawford testified. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.heraldstandard.com Date: September 14, 2008)

Risks Found for Youths in New Antipsychotics--Sept. 15th, 2008--A new government study published Monday has found that the medicines most often prescribed for schizophrenia in children and adolescents are no more effective than older, less expensive drugs and are more likely to cause some harmful side effects. The standards for treating the disorder should be changed to include some older medications that have fallen out of use, the study's authors said. The results, being published online by The American Journal of Psychiatry, are likely to alter treatment for an estimated one million children and teenagers with schizophrenia and to intensify a broader controversy in child psychiatry over the newer medications, experts said. Prescription rates for the newer drugs, called atypical antipsychotics, have increased more than fivefold for children over the past decades and a half, and doctors now use them to settle outbursts and aggression in children with a wide variety of diagnoses, despite serious side effects. For complete story, click here.

Two camp employees arrested--Sept. 12th, 2008--CHARLOTTE COUNTY, Fla. - Two camp employees were arrested after one of them is accused of sitting on a teen for hours. Police arrested Director Arthur Dagg for child neglect and Counselor Carl Hochstetler for child cruelty. A police report says Hochstetler sat on a 15-year-old boy for three hours to discipline him. The alleged crime happened at the Gator's Wilderness Boy's Camp in Punta Gorda in August. It's a camp for troubled boys. Police say the boy's arm was swollen and he started throwing up and that he wasn't taken to the hospital for days. The two men are out of jail. They're due back in court in October. For complete story, click here.

Mother Claims Son Was Abused At S. Fla. School--Sept. 12th, 2008--FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- A South Florida mother is outraged, saying her son was abused at an elite school in Fort Lauderdale at the hands of his drill sergeant. Marilyn Johnson-Smith said she is haunted by her decision to send her son, Donald Hutchinson, to a school she thought was a private institution, a place where he would learn and be safe from altercations with other students. "I was looking for a school with a small setting to help him," Hutchinson said. "But it's not a private school. It's an abuse school with boot camp." Johnson-Smith said her son, a fifth-grader, was abused at the hands of a drill sergeant at Fort Lauderdale's Elite Leadership Academy. "My son told me they forced him to the ground -- he forced him to the ground -- which gave him this scar on his face," Johnson-Smith said. Hutchinson said the drill sergeant assaulted him after an altercation over a canteen, tossing him to the ground and digging his knee into the child's back. Is this a case of abuse or simply standard procedure? Elite's executive director, Veronica Ruiz-Ashwal, said the school makes no pretense of its purpose, billing itself as a "behavior modification" program for students who have had problems in other schools. "Whenever a drill instructor takes a child down, it's simply because the child is a safety threat to themselves or to someone else," Ruiz-Ashwal said. It is not just the physical aspects of the academy that Johnson-Smith said she wants investigated. She said she did not know that the academy took a tough-love approach with students. She is angry that her son did not wear a uniform but instead a green jumpsuit issued upon arrival. Ruiz-Ashwal said all students wear the jumpsuit for the first two weeks of the program. Johnson-Smith has hired an attorney. Her lawyer said his client had no idea that Elite was designed for troubled students and is demanding that the school and the drill sergeant be investigated. For complete story, click here.

Five teens have (reportedly) died in programs since 1990--Sept. 12th, 2008--Since 1990, five teens have died while in the care of Utah-based wilderness therapy programs. Michelle Sutton, 15, of California, died May 9, 1990, from altitude sickness, dehydration and heat exhaustion while hiking with Summit Quest of St. George. No charges were filed. Her parents sued the program, physicians and a psychologist. Summit Quest settled in 1992 for its remaining insurance policy funds -- $345,000 -- and a judge dismissed claims against the others. Kristen Chase, 16, of Florida, died June 27, 1990, of heatstroke on a hike in Kane County with the Challenger Foundation program of Escalante. Owner Stephen Cartisano was charged with negligent homicide and child abuse related to other students in the program. A jury acquitted him, but state officials banned him from working with child-treatment programs in Utah. Chase's parents sued Challenger and Cartisano, settling in 1994 for $260,000 in insurance funds. Aaron Bacon, 16, of Arizona, died March 31, 1994, of peritonitis and a perforated ulcer, while on a wilderness trek in Garfield County with North Star Expeditions of Escalante. Staff members were charged with felony neglect and abuse of a disabled child. A jury convicted supervising counselor Craig Fisher, who was sentenced to a year in jail. Others pleaded guilty to reduced charges. The program closed before a licensing hearing was held. Katie Lank, 16, of Virginia, died Jan. 13, 2002, after she was injured while hiking with Redrock Ranch Academy of St. George. She fell about 70 feet into a crevasse and died in a hospital three weeks later. No charges were filed. Her parents sued the program and two staff members and settled for a confidential amount. The program closed. Ian August, 14, of Texas, died July 13, 2002, of the hyperthermia (heat illness) while hiking with Skyline Journey of Nephi. Program supervisor Mark Wardle and a counselor were charged with child abuse homicide. The charges against the counselor were dropped after she testified for prosecutors and a judge found there was not enough evidence against Wardle to take the case to trial. Later, an administrative law judge found evidence of licensing violations. The program was closed in 2003. Wardle and his father have since opened another wilderness camp: Distant Drums Beginnings in Nephi. (Webmaster Note: More children have been killed in programs since 1990 than listed here. This is an incomplete account of death at behavior modification programs in the US.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sltrib.com Date: September 12, 2008)

Parents Warned: Don't Use Ritalin--Sept. 24th, 2008--The drug should not be prescribed to children under five and used for older children only when they have severe ADHD or as a last resort, the guidance says. Instead, parents should be taught psychological techniques for changing the behaviour of unruly youngsters diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. The guidelines were issued by the National Institute for health and Clinical Excellence (Nice) and the National Collaborating Centre for Mental Health. The directive says parent training and education programmes should be offered as a first-line treatment for ADHD, both for pre-school and school-age children. The programmes show parents how to create a structured home environment, encourage attentiveness and concentration, and better manage misbehaviour. Research has shown they can be highly effective, helping children do better at school and lead more normal lives. Teachers should also be involved in the management of school age children, says the guidance. For complete story, click here.

Visions for Youth program probed--September 29th, 2008-- Springfield, Ohio — Authorities are investigating a Clark County program for troubled teens after a video showing what appears to be abuse by a staff member was leaked to the media last month. The boot-camp-style program called Visions for Youth operates four facilities in the county and at one time served as many as ten counties, housing teens ages 13 to 18. Following allegations of abuse and the release of the video, most counties have pulled their kids from the program. In the video, reportedly footage taken by a hidden security surveillance camera at the Inside-Out Community Center on August 2, a Visions for Youth staff member is seen body-slaming a 16-year-old boy in a hallway and then holding him down. William Stout, a pastor with the Community Christian Church, one of three churches that meet in the building, said the counselor -- later identified as Dante Smith -- had found the teen sleeping during a Saturday night church service. The teen is seen in the hallway holding his neck because Smith woke him up by striking him in the throat, Stout said. "We have hidden cameras in there for security purposes, and I guess their staff didn't realize they were on camera," Stout said. "The kid didn't do anything." As of Sept. 11, the Clark County Children services, along with law enforcement and the Ohio Department of Jobs and Family Services, has been investigating the program, which faces possible the revocation of its license and criminal prosecution of its employees. (Webmaster Note: Let's film all such programs 24/7 with independent third-party oversight!) For complete story, click here.

Parents use abandonment law to shed teens--October 2nd, 2008-- OMAHA — The abandonments began on Sept. 1, when a mother left her 14-year-old son in a police station here. By Sept. 23, two more boys and one girl, ages 11 to 14, had been abandoned in hospitals in Omaha and Lincoln. Then a 15-year-old boy and an 11-year-old girl were left. The biggest shock to public officials came last week, when a single father walked into an Omaha hospital and surrendered nine of his 10 children, ages 1 to 17, saying that his wife had died and he could no longer cope with the burden of raising them. In total last month, 15 older children in Nebraska were dropped off by a beleaguered parent or custodial aunt or grandmother who said the children were unmanageable. Officials have called the abandonments a misuse of a new law that was mainly intended to prevent so-called Dumpster babies — the abandonment of newborns by young, terrified mothers — but instead has been used to hand off out-of-control teenagers or, in the case of the father of 10, to escape financial and personal despair. The spate of abandonments has prompted an outcry about parental irresponsibility and pledges to change the state law. But it has also cast a spotlight on the hidden extent of family turmoil around the country and what many experts say is a shortage of respite care, counseling and especially psychiatric services to help parents in dire need. Some who work with troubled children add that economic conditions, like stagnant low-end wages and the epidemic of foreclosures, may make the situation worse, adding layers of worry and conflict. For complete story, click here.

Putnam mental-health company sues to stay open, keep licenses--October 3rd, 2008-- CARMEL - A private, for-profit mental health company in jeopardy of losing its state operating licenses for alleged violations of patients' rights and state mental-health laws has filed a lawsuit in state Supreme Court to reverse the revocation ruling. SLS Residential Inc., which treats teens and young adults with psychological and behavioral problems, filed the action in Putnam County last week, asking the court to intervene in the state's decision, which would shut its residential treatment facilities in Southeast.SLS argues that the state Office of Mental Health acted arbitrarily when it revoked SLS' operating permits in late August. The revocations came after OMH fined SLS $110,000 in November 2006 involving 11 specific violations of health laws. Dr. Joseph Santoro, co-owner and chief operating officer of SLS, said in a statement that the company had to appeal. "We cannot allow OMH to disregard the interests of hundreds of satisfied patients and those to come," he said. "We are compelled by principle to challenge this arbitrary and capricious bureaucratic failure to understand our time-tested and effective treatment methodologies." Among the allegations were that SLS used illegal restraints on patients long after being told not to, that it administered sedatives to patients when they refused to take their medications and that it failed to report troubling incidents to the state, including patients behaving suicidal and complaining of abuse by staff. In the statement, SLS accused state officials of not helping the company correct the alleged violations. "Rather than working with SLS in a transparent manner to resolve any question or regulation infraction, OMH has been harassing the facility - and now threatening to put them out of business," the statement reads. "It is vindictive and contrary to the best interest of the community." SLS said the state acted on "unfounded conclusions" and "flawed and arbitrary procedures." OMH spokeswoman Jill Daniels said the agency has worked repeatedly with SLS in an effort to correct the violations. "It is well documented that the Office of Mental Health worked with SLS for more than two years to help bring its programs into compliance with regulations before deciding to revoke its operating licenses," Daniels said. "The revocation decision was motivated by the need to ensure that the people being served by SLS received safe and appropriate care and treatment." Daniels said that OMH is reviewing the SLS lawsuit and that it has "every confidence that OMH will prevail." The litigation to keep its operating licenses is the latest effort by SLS to fight the state's negative findings. After being fined for the alleged violations in November 2006, SLS hired one of the nation's largest law firms, Proskauer Rose, to represent it at a hearing that began in July 2007 and lasted more than 20 days through September 2007. Most such hearings conclude in a week or less. When state OMH Commissioner Michael F. Hogan in July of this year adopted the hearing officer's decision to uphold the fines, SLS appealed in Putnam County Court. That case is pending the outcome of the most recent court action. SLS has yet to pay any fines or cease operating. Among the reasons OMH cited for revoking SLS' licenses is that it continues to use physical restraints on patients and that SLS officials either misled or lied to state officials. The state said that Santoro and Dr. Shawn Pritchard, SLS' clinical director, testified falsely in several instances at the administrative hearing. Santoro testified that an SLS patient, Evan Marshall, was not receiving services from SLS in August 2006 while on a weekend pass to his mother's Long Island home. During that visit, Marshall killed one of his mother's neighbors and drove around with the woman's severed head. Marshall, 32, is serving 29 years to life. Documents showed that Marshall was under SLS' care at the time of the murder. In a recent interview, Santoro said the state never provided a clear definition of an illegal restraint, and that neither patients' insurance companies nor their families would tolerate the actions of which SLS stands accused. He likened his company's fight against the OMH to the biblical battle of David and Goliath. SLS is also a defendant in a multimillion-dollar federal class-action lawsuit brought on behalf of several former patients who claim they were mistreated. Last week, a federal judge in that case fined SLS $35,000 for trying to scare former patients away from participating in the lawsuit. Glen Feinberg, a Pleasantville lawyer who went to court to win the right to protest outside SLS sites over the poor treatment he felt his son got there in 2001 and 2002, defended OMH. He said that the SLS appeal is based on three premises: that the OMH has a vendetta against it, that SLS does not have to follow rules that similar companies do, and that the evidence was not sufficient to revoke the licenses. "The first two arguments are absurd," Feinberg said. "As for the third, there are hundreds of pages of testimony, much of it from SLS employees and documents, that support the finding of truth. SLS has no credibility at all." (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.lohud.com Date: October 3, 2008)

Proposed eastern Idaho haven for troubled teens loses grant--October 4th, 2008--IDAHO FALLS, Idaho (AP) - The Idaho Department of Commerce has pulled a $500,000 grant that would have helped pay for the construction of a group home for troubled teens after losing confidence in the project. Ammon city officials were awarded the federal community development block grant in 2006, and intended to pass the money on to Family Care Center to use in the construction of the proposed $7.5 million Pearl House. The Department of Commerce was holding the money in trust until construction began. But construction on the project has been delayed for years because Family Care Center hasn't been able to sell $5 million in bonds. Commerce department spokeswoman Bibiana Nertney says the department decided it would not be in the state's interest to be a financing partner in the project. Family Care Center Board Chairman Ron Carlson says the loss of the grant means the group will have to try to make up the $500,000 in bonds. (Webmaster Note: Good, projects like these should be canceled, not funded.) For complete story, click here.

Teenage boys violently attack youth facility members--October 6th, 2008--(10/06/2008) By Jeniffer Berry - Two teenagers were behind bars as of Monday night accused of attacking 3 people at a youth treatment facility in Kearney. Among the injured are 2 employees and a Kearney Police Officer. It was a violent attack. Authorities said 2 teenage boys took a ball from a pool table and put it in sock. It was a makeshift weapon used to beat 2 staff members. It happened just after 11:00 Sunday night at the Youth Rehabilitation Treatment Center in Kearney. It is a place for troubled boys - many with criminal backgrounds. The State Patrol said 2 of them, both 16 year olds, tried escaping. They lured a 72 year old staffer into a common area where authorities said they used the pool ball in the sock to beat him in the face. "Causing some fractured bones in the face and he called out for help," said State Patrol Lt. Dennis Leonard. Another staffer responded - a 64 year old man. He was also attacked. At some point, somebody managed to call police. When they arrived they too were ambushed. One police officer was punched in the head multiple times, before the boys were eventually arrested. "The degree of the injuries and the force that they used an object to inflict these injuries is technically a felony in itself," said Leonard. The teens were in the Buffalo County Jail Monday night facing charges of second degree assault, use of a weapon to commit a felony and attempted assault on a police officer. All are felonies. The officer punched in the head did not have to be taken to the hospital. The two staff members did. One has a fractured eye socket and the other needed stitches on his head. The State Patrol said it has responded to problems here before, but nothing like this. For complete story, click here.

Detectives seek additional victims in sex-crimes case--October 8th, 2008-- Detectives are looking for additional victims of a former Marine accused of having sex with a 15-year-old in 2007 and of committing lewd acts on a 13-year-old in 2006. Authorities said Ross Jay Curtis, 23, met the older girl at the now-defunct JROTC program at Pioneer High in Whittier while the younger teen was in an at-risk boot camp program at a Hawaiian Gardens middle school, which they wouldn't name. Curtis also volunteered at camps attended by Bellflower students, according to Detective Rudy Acevedo of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Special Victims Bureau. "He would put himself in a position to be around kids and in that type of environment," Acevedo said. He said Curtis used his military background to befriend the people running the programs. He said Curtis would also talk to the students about the Marines and the benefits of a career in the military. A flier looking for additional victims was distributed in Sacramento and San Diego, where Curtis lived. "He may have volunteered in schools in San Diego," Acevedo said. Prosecutors charged Curtis with lewd acts upon a child, sending by electronic mail harmful matter with the intent of seducing a minor, sexual penetration by a foreign object and oral copulation of a minor. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.whittierdailynews.com Date: October 8, 2008)

Martin Lee Anniversary--October 10th, 2008--Sunday is the one year anniversary of the not guilty verdict in the boot camp death of 14 year-old Martin Lee Anderson. The teen was kicked and kneed by guards as a nurse watched during the first hour of his stay in the Panama City boot camp. The state later settled for 5 million dollars with his parents. Mother Gina Jones said her life hasn't been the same since the death, and nothing has changed her or her attorney's mind that that guards got away with murder. The NAACP asked for a federal investigation into whether the guards violated Martin's civil rights. There has been no inquiry or investigation. The family is hoping a new administration may reopen the case. (Webmaster Note: Martin Lee Anderson's death should be a large wake-up call to America that we need to begin protecting our children.) For complete story, click here.

Youth treatment center to close--October 9th, 2008--A 43-bed youth treatment center in Marriottsville will be closing next month as the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services transitions more youths away from residential facilities to community-based treatment programs. The Thomas O'Farrell Youth Center is scheduled to close Nov. 30, said Tammy Brown, a spokeswoman for the Department of Juvenile Services. Of the close to 30 nonviolent youth offenders now at the center, 10 will be transferred to other residential facilities and the rest will be sent home to continue treatment in their communities, she said. "There's a big push for kids to be treated in the community and in their homes with their families," Brown said. Brown said department staff had been discussing the transition with North American Family Institute, the organization that runs the O'Farrell center, since May. NAFI, which runs several treatment programs throughout the Northeast, will also be transitioning to offer community-based treatment in Baltimore and Baltimore County. NAFI will be offering a new MultiSystemic Therapies Program starting in January, according to a press release by the Department of Juvenile Services. This approach works with youths in their homes and family environments to look at all factors that influence the youth's behavior, and addresses some of the systemic problems, Brown said. For example, if a youth referred to the department is living with parents with a drug abuse problem, that is something the therapy program would address to help both the youth and the entire family, she said. The closing of the O'Farrell center comes a year and a half after Bowling Brook Preparatory School in Middleburg closed in March of 2007, following the death of a student at the school. Nevada-based company Rite of Passage has submitted a proposal to the Governor's Office of Children to restart a youth treatment program at the school, Brown said, but so far the application has not been forwarded to the Department of Juvenile Services. The closing of the O'Farrell center has nothing to do with recent developments on the future of Bowling Brook, Brown said. (Webmaster Note: We are also pleased to announce that Excel Academy in Conroe, TX is closed/closing as of this month!) For complete story, click here.

Despite state acquittals, federal charges possible in death of teen at Florida boot camp--October 13th, 2008-- PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) _ A looming federal investigation and possible trial is making it difficult for seven juvenile Florida boot camp guards and a nurse acquitted last year of state charges in the death of a 14-year-old boy to move on with their lives, their attorneys said. The eight left a Panama City courthouse with their jubilant families one year ago on Oct. 12, 2007, after jurors found them not guilty in the beating death of Martin Lee Anderson. The death and verdict prompted protests and Florida's juvenile boot camps were abolished. The eight employees were fired from the Bay County Juvenile Boot Camp. "All of their lives have changed. They are no longer doing what was their first choice in life to do," said Hoot Crawford, attorney for former camp guard Henry Dickens, who is now a hotel security guard. Dickens had wanted to dedicate his life to reforming juvenile offenders but "now he is doing something very different," Crawford said. The federal inquiry remains open, said Karen Rhew, a Tallahassee-based assistant U.S. attorney. She declined to give other details or a timeframe for a decision on whether or not there will be a second trial. Attorneys for the eight said their clients did not want to talk publicly about the verdict because of the federal investigation. Anderson died Jan. 6, 2006, a day after being hit and kicked by the guards as the nurse watched. He had just been assigned to the camp. He was caught trespassing at a school, which violated his probation imposed after he was convicted of helping his cousins steal their grandmother's car. A video of the 30-minute altercation showed the seven men punching him and using knee strikes against him, pushing ammonia capsules into his nose and dragging his limp body around the yard. The video also showed the nurse doing nothing to help Anderson or stop the men. A coroner initially determined Anderson fatally hemorrhaged because he had an undiagnosed sickle cell trait, a condition which can cause red cells to change shape and not carry oxygen when the body is under extreme stress. A second autopsy, completed when then-Gov. Jeb Bush ordered an independent prosecutor take over the case, determined the guards killed Anderson by depriving him of oxygen when they pushed the ammonia tablets into his nose, covered his mouth and didn't give him time to recover his breath. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.amny.com Date: October 13, 2008)

School founder kills self instead of going to prison--January 17th, 2008 (Just received on October 15th 2008) The founder of a Christian school for troubled boys who had pleaded guilty to financial fraud and deception in its operation appears to have fatally shot himself days after he was supposed to report to prison. Robert Serge Gluhareff pleaded guilty in April to two counts of bank fraud, one count of tax fraud, and one count of mail fraud in connection with the Wellspring Academy outside South Boston, Va. The school had many students from Raleigh when it was open. A federal judge sentenced Gluhareff to 30 months, and Gluhareff was to begin the sentence Jan. 8, but he didn't appear. Person County Sheriff Dewey Jones said that on Friday, Gluhareff left his home in South Boston and said he was going to meet a client. When he didn't return, family members started a search. On Sunday, Jones said, a Person County deputy came across Gluhareff's truck on the side of a rural road. Witnesses told deputies the truck had been there since at least 8 p.m. Friday. Deputies searched nearby woods and found Gluhareff's body and a .38-caliber handgun. Gluhareff started the Wellspring Academy in the 1980s, first recruiting students from the Triangle and later enrolling students from across the country. It began as a coeducational facility but was converted to a boys school. Parents whose sons had behavioral and other problems paid tuitions of more than $40,000 per year for the residential program. Gluhareff promised a structured setting with academics, religion and individual counseling on a 510-acre farm. For complete story, click here.

Michigan, Iowa teens left by families in Nebraska--October 14th, 2008-- Imagine being a teenager, taken by your family to another state and dropped off at a hospital -- so someone else would take responsibility for you. It's happened twice over the last week in Nebraska. In one case, a 13 year old Michigan boy got in a car with his mom, who drove over 700 miles to Omaha to leave him at a medical center in the middle of the night. In another case, a 14 year old Iowa girl was deposited by her grandparents at Omaha's Creighton University Medical Center. Both families were relinquishing responsibility for the teens under Nebraska's controversial safe haven law, the only in the U.S. that allows families to leave children of any age at a hospital. No one expected the outcome: most of the 19 kids dropped off at hospitals to date have been teens or pre-teens. Certainly, no one expected that distraught parents or grandparents from other states would come to Nebraska to hand over their kids -- the newest development. Much has been written about the problems that can lead families to relinquish children, whether in Nebraska or elsewhere. In particular, the lack of supports for families dealing with extremely troubled kids -- especially, insufficient mental health services -- can be devastating. Many readers of this blog have applauded Nebraska for offering an alternative for children who might otherwise be subjected to abuse from overwhelmed parents. If the only alternative is giving children up, it's better than seeing kids neglected or subject to violence, you've said. But think of the children, especially teenagers who face the reality of abandonment. "You could imagine being a child and your parent asks you to go to a hospital and they just drive away, what feelings that would create for the children," said Gene Klein, executive director of Project Harmony in Omaha, quoted by KPTM 42 News. State officials are concerned that the spirit of Nebraska's safe haven law is being violated. "I certainly recognize and can commiserate and empathize with families across our state and across the country who are obviously struggling with parenting issues, but this is not the appropriate way of dealing with them," said Todd Landry, head of Nebraska's Department of Health and Human Services, quoted in a report by BBC News. (Webmaster Note: Todd Landry is right. Abandoning your child to institutionalization is not appropriate.) For complete story, click here.

Federal officials looking into San Jose's EHC LifeBuilders--October 16th, 2008--A routine inquiry begun a year ago at a youth shelter run by Santa Clara County's most prominent homeless-services agency has now progressed into an investigation of possible fraud. Concerns first arose in October 2007, when a federal official monitoring millions of dollars in government spending on shelters for runaway youths paid a visit to EHC LifeBuilders in downtown San Jose. Alarmed that children and teens fleeing the streets were being cared for in an unlicensed facility, she alerted the state's community care division, and the shelter known as Our House was forced to shut its doors the next day. Now the agency is receiving more unexpected federal scrutiny -- this time, from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Office of the Inspector General, which is responsible for digging out fraud, waste and abuse of public funds. The new investigation comes as EHC has abandoned long-held plans to reopen the 14-year-old shelter; the group announced last week that it is shifting its youth shelter program to serve young adults, for whom licensing is not required. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.mercurynews.com Date: October 16, 2008)

Center's Troubled Teens 'Assaulted With Needles,' Officials Say--October 18th, 2008--Teens being treated for drug abuse and mental illness at Stonington Institute have been involuntarily injected with medication to restrain them in what the state attorney general and child advocate Friday called another example of poor supervision by the Department of Children and Families. At least five boys aged about 16 received such involuntary injections, while aides held them immobile, at the DCF-licensed private residential facility in North Stonington during a two-month period this past spring, state Child Advocate Jeanne Milstein said Friday after she and Attorney General Richard Blumenthal sent a letter filled with criticism to DCF. Milstein said the youths were considered "out of control" at the time that they were injected. If DCF had been properly overseeing what goes on at Stonington, "the practice of involuntary intramuscular medication would have been discovered sooner and fewer children assaulted with needles," Milstein and Blumenthal wrote to DCF Commissioner Susan Hamilton. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.courant.com Date: October 18, 2008)

Certain antipsychotics are leaving legions of children and elderly in chemical straightjackets for treatment of conditions they didn't even have.--October 19th, 2008-- Some state legislators are mad as hell and not going to take it anymore. They've seen state outlays for controversial antipsychotics like Zyprexa grow as much as twelvefold since 2000, with a corresponding growth in side effects like weight gain, blood sugar changes and cholesterol problems. In March, Alaska won a $15 million settlement from Eli Lilly in a suit to recoup medical costs generated by Medicaid patients who developed diabetes while taking Zyprexa. Last year Bristol-Myers Squibb settled a federal suit for $515 million charging that it illegally hawked the antipsychotic Abilify to children and the elderly, bilking taxpayers. Now Idaho, Washington, Montana, Connecticut, California, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Utah, West Virginia, Arkansas and Texas are taking pharma to court over its antipsychotic prescrib-athon that has left the poor and mentally ill in even worse health and legions of children and elderly in chemical straightjackets for treatment of conditions they didn't even have. The atypical antipsychotics Zyprexa, Risperdal, Seroquel, Abilify and Geodon can be thought of as the credit swaps of the pharmaceutical world. New with no track record, risky, barely understood and capable of making a lot of money before their long-term effects are apparent, atypical antipsychotics, like credit swaps, could only be sold with friends in high regulatory places and the help of the U.S. taxpayer. Though atypical antipsychotics were developed to treat schizophrenia and later approved for bipolar disorder (Risperdal is also approved for autism-related irritability in children), pharma lost no time in marketing them for non-FDA-approved uses like ADHD and conduct disorders, dementia, sleep disorders, depression and simple mood swings, netting $8,000 a year per person, usually from state coffers. When the second-generation atypical antipsychotics debuted in the 1990s, they seemed to lack the "typical" side effects of first-generation antipsychotics like Thorazine and Haldol, such as the movement disorder tardive dyskinesia. But soon further "clinical testing," known as selling it to the public while the patent is hot, revealed that atypicals cause the same side effects as first-generation antipsychotics and more: increased mortality in elderly patients, suicide risk, hyperglycemia, diabetes mellitus and the hematological disorders leukopenia, neutropenia and agranulocytosis. In fact, Seroquel and Abilify have not one black box warning but two. Nor do the atypical antipsychotics work better than predecessors. A National Institute of Mental Health study of 119 children ages 8 to 19 with psychotic symptoms published in September found Risperdal and Zyprexa were no more effective than the older antipsychotic Molar -- but caused such obesity that a safety panel ordered the children off the drugs. In just eight weeks, children on Risperdal gained 9 pounds while those on Zyprexa gained 13; children on Molar gained less than a pound. "Kids at school were making fun of me," study participant Brandon Constantineau, 18, of Wilmington, N.C., told the New York Times. Constantineau put on 35 pounds on Risperdal. Other studies -- like one on Risperdal in the Jan. 4, 2008, issue of Lancet and one on Zyprexa, Seroquel and Risperdal in Alzheimer's patients in the Oct. 12, 2006, issue of the New England Journal of Medicine -- find that atypicals work no better than a placebo. But it gets worse. A study of Seroquel in the Feb. 19, 2005, issue of the British Medical Journal found the drug ineffective in relieving agitation in Alzheimer's patients -- a non-FDA-approved use that JP Morgan analysts say constitutes 29 percent of all Seroquel sales (hello? regulators?) -- but "was associated with significantly greater cognitive decline" than a placebo. Oops. Whatever happened to first no harm? But it was Eli Lilly's own discovery of elevated stroke and death numbers in five of its Zyprexa clinical trials and subsequent letter to doctors in 2004 that led the FDA to impose a black-box warning of "increased mortality in elderly patients with dementia" on atypical antipsychotics in 2005 after reviewing 17 clinical studies with four different drugs. "The problem with these drugs are that we know that they are being used extensively off-label in nursing homes to sedate elderly patients with dementia and other types of disorders," testified FDA safety expert Dr. David "Vioxx" Graham last year at a congressional hearing. "But the fact is, is that it increases mortality perhaps by 100 percent. It doubles mortality. So I did a back-of-the-envelope calculation on this, and you have probably got 15,000 elderly people in nursing homes dying each year from the off-label use of antipsychotic medications. ... With every pill that gets dispensed in a nursing home, the drug company is laughing all the way to the bank." No kidding. A third of the nation's estimated 2.5 million nursing home patients have taken atypical antipsychotics, estimates the New York Times, and the overall atypical antipsychotic tab for Medicare and Medicaid -- including children -- in the United States is $2 billion a year. In 12 states, the pharmaceutical industry has actually written the guidelines that specify atypicals for schizophrenia and discourage older drugs. And two dozen states have hired the Lilly-backed Comprehensive Neuroscience to show them how to, not a joke, lower their drug costs. That sounds like Wall Street too. For complete story, click here.

Oppositional and Defiant or Critical Thinker?--September 12th, 2008--I'm working on a piece about undergraduate academic freedom that relates changes in campus culture to changes in the culture of schools. One area of particular interest is the medicalization of youth relations with authority. AlterNet's Bruce Levine, a clinical psychologist, argues that "teenage rebellion has become a medical illness" with the 1980 introduction to the DSM IV of "Oppositional Defiant Disorder" (ODD): Many talk-show hosts think I'm kidding when I mention oppositional defiant disorder. After I assure them that ODD is in fact an official mental illness—an increasingly popular diagnosis for children and teenagers—they often guess that ODD is simply a new term for juvenile delinquency. But that is not the case. Young people diagnosed with ODD, by definition, are doing nothing illegal (illegal behaviors are a symptom of another mental illness called conduct disorder). In 1980, the American Psychiatric Association (APA) created oppositional defiant disorder, defining it as "a pattern of negativistic, hostile and defiant behavior." The official symptoms of ODD include "often actively defies or refuses to comply with adult requests or rules" and "often argues with adults." A diagnosis of ODD can result in medication with powerful tranquilizers like Risperdal and Zyprexa. Numerous experts have worried about overdiagnosis and overmedication of young people, and critical educators frequently worry that the problem is not lack of compliance by American youth but its precise opposite, an epidemic of compliance. Norm Diamond, for instance, argues that many of the so-called defiant "symptoms" are in many cases "part of establishing independence and developing critical thinking. Equipping children to argue back is part of good parenting and good teaching." Nonetheless a massive therapeutic industry of behavior modification, including pharmaceutical companies, now targets parents, promising cures for "defiant children." One of the most pervasive ad campaigns draws on the rhetoric of homeland security to label youth defiance "The War at Home," urging a corrections mentality on the family: "The focus of treatment should be on compliance and coping skills, not on self-esteem or personality. ODD is not a self-esteem issue; it's a problem-solving issue." Responding to Big Pharma ads for ODD medications targeting parents in his Portland media market, Diamond created a parody description of what he argues is the real social malaise, "Compliance Acquiscent Disorder," which played locally in both radio and print versions. (An unexpected result of the parody was that outlets publishing them received calls from readers and listeners seeking treatment for their compliance disorder!) Noting that "ODD-diagnosed young people are obnoxious with adults they don't respect [but] can be a delight with adults they do respect," Levine suggests that in many cases the symptoms of ODD are rational resistance to authoritarian abuses and "rebellion against an oppressive environment," explanations rarely considered by educators or mental health professionals. Levine speculates that the willingness to medicate rebellion and nonconformity emerges in the social psychology of medical professionals, including a sense of shame for "their own excessive compliance": It is my experience that many mental-health professionals are unaware of how extremely obedient they are to authorities. Acceptance into medical school and graduate school and achieving a Ph.D. or M.D. means jumping through many meaningless hoops, all of which require much behavioral, attentional, and emotional compliance to authorities—even disrespected ones. When compliant M.D.'s and Ph.D.'s begin seeing noncompliant patients, many of these doctors become anxious, sometimes even ashamed of their own excessive compliance, and this anxiety and shame can be fuel for diseasing normal human reactions. Of course, Levine's observations would seem to hold for educators as well, many of whom welcome the diagnosis of ODD and other conduct-related disorders as "classroom management tools." (On the other hand, the vast majority of teachers discussing "defiant" students on fora like ProTeacher.com are exchanging non-medical tips, often involving massive extra-curricular, non-instructional effort and expense on their part, voluntarily taking on the role of therapist and parent as well as instructor.) "Finally, a cure for the class struggle," wryly observed one of the Alternet discussion threads in response to Levine's piece. "Is there a pill for megalomania and warmongering?" wondered another. For complete story, click here.

Teacher ordered to stand trial over charges he abused teen--October 29th, 2008--Is she a troubled teen who fabricated a story about sexual encounters with a teacher, or the victim of a predator who coerced her into a sexual relationship? Both sides of that question were argued during a Tuesday preliminary hearing for a West High School teacher accused of sexually abusing a 16-year-old student. Jose Fanjul, 45, is charged in 3rd District Court with five counts of first-degree forcible sodomy and five counts of second-degree felony forcible sexual abuse in connection with allegedly having sex with the girl inside his classroom and at other locations. After listening to testimony, Judge Ann Boyden ordered Fanjul to stand trial on the abuse allegations, saying prosecutors presented sufficient evidence to advance the case. She set a Nov. 10 arraignment. (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.sltrib.com Date: October 29, 2008)

Be calm, be controlled -- and listen--November 2nd, 2008-- QWe have a 15-year-old son who has zero respect for us and is constantly getting into trouble. Is there any hope? AThere is always hope. But you can't address his behaviour until you improve your relationship with him. Keeping in mind you have to give respect to get it, go through the following steps in a calm and controlled manner: n Tell him you are sorry for making mistakes in the past but you want to improve. n Ask him for suggestions on how you can become a better parent. He'll probably give you a huge list of everything you've done wrong. That's OK; let him get it out of his system. n Repeat what he's told you -- but you don't have to agree. This is all about listening. Now it's time to validate and negotiate. You may say, "I agree that I nag you about cleaning up your room but if I promise to stop doing that, will you stop calling me foul names?" Work your way up to the bigger issues over time. Thank him for his help. This process takes patience and understanding but it's a great start. Focus on the positives Parenting troubled teens isn't about taking blame; it's about taking responsibility for the solution. Rather than focusing on your teen's bad behaviour, start focusing on the positives. Praise him or her for keeping a clean bedroom, putting dishes in the dishwasher or getting an A in math. OK, OK, your teen is doing none of those things. You may have to dig deep to find the positives, but they're there. Focusing on the positives opens the door to discussing and working on the negatives. For complete story, click here.

Residential Children's Programs Target Of Legislation--November 4th, 2008--Oct. 17, a group of former students of a local boarding school for girls stood outside the Kosciuszko County Courthouse demonstrating against physical, emotional and mental abuse they allege they suffered. With them stood several members of a local task force formed to pursue a change in state law to require more accountability for residential programs for children. The local task force members are not the only ones looking for such a law change. Congress also is eyeing a bill aimed at preventing child abuse in residential programs, public or private, nationwide. The bill is called HR 6358. It passed the House of Representatives June 25 and is currently in the Senate. HR 6358 calls for more public accountability. If the bill is passed in its current form, the school that former students were demonstrating against, Hephzibah House, and similar organizations may fall under its jurisdiction. Hephzibah House is a "private Christian boarding school for teenage girls," according to the school's Web site. According to the bill, covered programs would include public or private organizations, which operate residential environments including boot camps, therapeutic boarding schools and behavior modification programs, which operate with a focus on serving children with emotional, behavioral or mental problems or disorders or problems with alcohol or substance abuse. The bill would not cover hospitals licensed by the state or foster family homes which are licensed and regulated by the state and in which children are placed by the state. The bill would prohibit disciplinary techniques or other practices that involve the withholding of essential food, water, clothing, shelter or medical care necessary to maintain physical health, mental health and general safety; physical and mechanical restraints and seclusion. The bill also would prohibit acts designed to humiliate, degrade or undermine a child's self-respect. Residential facilities covered by the bill would be required to provide "reasonable access for making and receiving phone calls with as much privacy as possible and shall have access to the appropriate state or local child abuse reporting hotline number and the national hotline number." The bill would establish penalties for facilities cited with violations, including fines. Enforcement measures would be established including unannounced inspections, licensing requirements and new databases. HR 6358 passed through the House with a vote of 318 ayes to 103 nays, with 13 present not voting. Of the nine Indiana Representatives who voted on the bill, six voted for it and three against it. Local Dist. 3 Representative Mark Souder voted against the bill. "I believe these things should be worked through at the state and local level," said Souder. "I voted for the Republican alternative both in committee and elsewhere that would increase state regulation." Souder said the alternative proposal did not include increased federal oversight. "Obviously, I believe there needs to be some additional controls, particularly for those who abuse kids, it's a terrible tragedy," he said. "We need also better enforcement. But, I do not favor the federal government taking over something I believe can be regulated at the state and local level." Souder said he could get behind increasing federal oversight if state regulations could not be stiffened or in cases dealing with multiple states, but he said increasing federal regulations is a last resort. "I don't think we're there yet," Souder said. Becky Moreno, victim's assistance advocate with the Warsaw Police Department, organized the local task force seeking change in Indiana law. Moreno said she supports HR 6358. "I think this bill is an excellent step toward preventing child abuse and bringing about some accountability that is otherwise lacking," Moreno said. "Child abuse is a national problem. Anything that could be done to prevent this problem everywhere would be the best-case scenario." The bill is currently under review in the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions. For information on HR 6358, visit www.govtrack.us/congress/bill.xpd?bill=h110-6358 (Webmaster Note: See HEAL's Position Statement Calling for Revision of HR 6358) For complete story, click here.

Troubled Teens: Advice About Teen Boot Camps--November 6th, 2008-- Hi Vanessa, My son has been acting out and I have read about parents sending their kids away to boot camps and wilderness adventure camps. Do you think this is a good idea? Are they safe? --Worried Mom, Austin, TX Hi Worried Mom, Parents often choose boot camps as an absolute last resort and are at the end of their rope by the time they need to contact a wilderness facility. If you have a troubled teen or your teen is acting out, try these solutions before thinking about camp: • Consistency and Routine: Often times, teens rebel because of hormones or undesired change. Therefore, the more habits, systems and routines you have in the house the more consistency the teen will have in his/her life and the more likely they will find comfort in 'normalcy.' • Family and Community Involvement: Family time and involving your teen or child in community activities with religious groups, community service or at YMCA's can help a teen find other outlets for anger or fear. • Break from bad friends: Certain teens have 'bad' behavior because of negative influence from friends. Try to encourage activities in the community rather than hanging out with negative enablers. Or take a family trip to get away from these kids. Often times, sending teens to grandparents, aunt's or uncle's houses can be a sufficient break away from influencers. • Empowerment, love and support: Some teens thrive off of any kind of attention, this means that punishments and arguments simply feed their need. So make sure to give them positive attention, tell them you have faith in them, that they are smart, and have a good future, show them you are there for them no matter what. Even if this does work immediately, as seen with my friend above, they will remember that you were there for them after this hard stage. If you reach the end of your rope: • Family camps are better than boot camps: There are many camps, especially church and temple camps that are for entire families. This is where all family members have activities together and separate and can be a good break and a time where you can bond away from the home, bad friends and trigger points. • Send them to a relative: As mentioned above, sending teens to a relative's house for the summer or for a school break can help keep them out of trouble when there is no school and give them a chance to connect in a different community. • Do your research: If you must, there are some good 'correction' camps out there. Steer away from 'tough love' camps and make sure there are therapists working at the facility. Get referrals and do plenty of research and surprise visits, remember what camps want to show you, they will, and what they do not want to show you, they won't. If you are having a hard time with your teen remember that the relationship comes in cycles and do not be afraid to get outside help with a therapist, counselor or at their schools. For complete story, click here.

Teen compacted in Wis. garbage truck survives--November 5th, 2008-- MILWAUKEE — Police in Milwaukee say a teenage boy has survived after being accidentally dumped into the back of a recycling truck and compacted. Police say the 14-year-old ran away from a boot camp-style school for teens Monday and hid in a recycling bin filled with cardboard. The bin was picked up by a Waste Management truck and dumped into the vehicle's rear compactor. Waste Management spokeswoman Lynn Morgan says the truck continued on its collection route, compacting cardboard several times. The boy wasn't discovered until the truck dumped its load at a recycling processing center. He was semiconscious and was taken to a hospital, but police say his injuries aren't life-threatening. (Webmaster Note: This is a tragedy. Please don't subject children to programs that by their very nature cause a flight or fight response and put children at risk.) For complete story, click here.

Dozen juveniles held at Guantanamo Bay --Pentagon revises upward number of children imprisoned at Guantanamo 16 Nov 2008 The number of juveniles held at Guantanamo Bay was revised upwards by US military officials. Twelve juvenile prisoners have been held at the US camp on Cuba, up from eight reported in May to a United Nations committee on child rights, the Pentagon said. For complete story, click here.

Ex-school owners OK $450,000 settlement--November 19th, 2008--The former operators of a Nephi school for troubled youths agreed to a $450,000 settlement to eight former students who alleged they were abused and hazed while there. Mark and Cheryl Sudweeks, the former owners and operators of the now failed Whitmore Academy, came under fire in 2005 when several students accused them of various types of abuse that led to criminal charges being filed against Cheryl Sudweeks. A 4th District Court civil suit seeking damages in the case was settled Monday. "We are happy to get it behind us," said Susan Schacherer, a plaintiff whose granddaughter attended Whitmore. "Does it undo the damage that caused us to bring the lawsuit to begin with? No. The window of opportunity to help these kids was lost. The money can't replace that." The complaint filed in Juab County said that the Whitmore Academy, which was advertised as a facility for "teens looking to accelerate their education intellectually, emotionally and spiritually," was actually nothing of the sort. The complaint alleges that some students enrolled at the Whitmore Academy were physically bound with plastic handcuffs for several hours, others were forced to spend periods of time outside without any clothing on, and some were forced to sleep in a space referred to as the "shelf room." The shelf room was a small, enclosed area where students could neither sit up, fully stretch out, and was located 10 feet off the ground, according to the complaint. The Sudweeks were also accused of recruiting students and encouraging the students to use violence against other youths to enforce the rules. There were also accusations of "environmental abuse" due to problems with the sewage system. Students were asked to not flush used toilet paper down the toilet, and the complaint states that "soiled toilet paper was stored in open trash bags that were left in the bathrooms." There was also an apparent problem with mouse feces and rodents, among other accusations. Schacherer said that when she and her daughter visited the Whitmore Academy, they had no idea that these types of things were happening and that apparently they were duped. Schacherer's granddaughter now lives in Texas with her mother and still harbors animosity toward the people she believes mistreated her. "I don't think that she feels like the settlement was justified for what she went through," Schacherer said. "She realized this was the best we could do and that is the way it is. She still has bitter feelings." In September of 2006, Cheryl Sudweeks pleaded no contest to four class C misdemeanor counts of hazing and agreed to meet all court-ordered requirements and pay a fee. For complete story, click here.

I-Team: Lawyers Question Medical Tests on Foster Kids--November 15th, 2008--This is a story about an eight-year-old boy in foster care. A boy we've never met. He exists for us only as a name on a letter questioning his mental health treatment. But his lawyer Janice Wolf wants us to remember Nathaniel is real. "Some of the things our kids have gone through, you and I could only imagine in our dreams, or nightmares." Nathaniel described vivid nightmares according to psychiatric records obtained by the I-Team. During his first of two hospitalizations at Montevista, Dr. Mark Collins ordered a procedure called a brain spect. It requires the injection of radioactive material to illuminate blood flow in the brain. Read the legal complaint In a report to the family court, Collins writes the scan confirms Nathaniel has "severe bipolar disorder." "I think my concern is that our foster kids are getting not just the best psychiatric care, but proper psychiatric care -- that they're not being mistreated, or experimented on, or used as investigational tools," said Wolf. The American Psychiatric Association does not accept the use of brain imaging for the clinical diagnosis of children, in part, according to its literature, because of children's sensitivity to radiation and to risk of radiation-induced cancer. Read a statement from the county about the procedures Dr. Collins likens the exposure to a common CT scan, "To not look at a child's brain who's had multiple treatments and is not getting better, it would be like if you had a heart attack and I'm saying, 'you know what, you've had a heart attack before. We know you have a bad heart. I'm not going to do an electrocardiogram on you.'" Collins argues the scans are a valuable tool to aid in the diagnosis of his sickest patients and insists not everybody gets a spec scan. A recent Medicaid review by the Nevada State Department of Health and Human Services identified 96 Montevista patients who underwent brain imaging. The majority, according to the state, were kids in the juvenile justice or child welfare systems. "I've been doing enough of them I see the utility in this. I see how important it is to take a look at these kid's brains. If I was not seeing the benefit, I would not continue to do it," said Dr. Collins. Wolf however questions the benefit and again points to Nathaniel. A court-ordered psychiatric evaluation of the eight-year-old challenged Collins' diagnosis and noted, "Spect scanning is not yet an accepted diagnostic method. Although it is interesting, it is not yet reliable." Read a statement from Nevada Medicaid "We are hoping that at least by raising the concern and raising the issue that others will look also, that people responsible for our kids will take a look at what it is and hopefully support us," said Wolf. And support kids like Nathaniel whose stories come to life from the pages of a foster care case file. Only a caseworker stands between a child and a controversial procedure. Collins insists he receives no payment related to the scans. He insists brain imaging will soon be accepted by the psychiatric community. There is certainly evidence he may be right but for now, it remains investigational. Medicaid does not cover investigational procedures, like brain specs. However these claims slipped through to the tune of more than $33,000. The state has not yet decided whether to seek repayment and has issued a memo reiterating its policy. For complete story, click here.

Someone else's sacrifice--November 19th, 2008--...America is heading ever deeper into a dire financial situation. With every passing week, more institutions seem to get dragged into the mess. A recent victim is the Hampton Roads Youth Center, a worthy organization focused on turning around the troubled lives of troubled youth and their families. In five years of service, the nonprofit agency served more than 75 families throughout Hampton Roads by providing residential, educational and counseling services from its location on Kenyon Road. Less than a week ago, the organization announced via a letter on its Web site that it is closing its residential program. Members of its governing board wrote that the group had been a victim of factors ranging from changing regulations and licensing standards to a trend against using residential facilities to treat troubled teens... (Webmaster Note: At least the financial crisis is good for something! Shut them all down!) For complete story, click here.

Medication Nation--November 20th, 2008--Video on how bad it is to drug your children. See: http://www.foxnews.com/video-search/m/21485444/medication_nation.htm?q=douglas+kennedy

Boot Camp Nurse Criticized - Gives Up State License--November 6th, 2008--Kristen Schmidt, the former Bay County Juvenile Boot Camp nurse at the center of the Martin Lee Anderson case, will no longer be able to practice in the state of Florida. She's voluntarily relinquished her nursing license to State Board of Nursing. The board filed the final order with the Florida Department of Health Tuesday afternoon. Schmidt was a central figure in the death of 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson at the Bay County Juvenile Boot Camp on January 5th, 2006. Schmidt was the nurse on-duty that day, which was Anderson's first day at the facility. Anderson collapsed during a physical assessment run in the recreation yard. At first drill instructors believed Anderson was faking illness to get out of running. For 20-minutes they tried to get him back on his feet. But during the process, the drill instructors used some arm strikes and take-downs, as well as ammonia capsules to revive the teenager. You can see Schmidt hovering over Anderson and the drill instructors the entire time, but not doing much more than observing. Paramedics eventually took Anderson to a local hospital, then he was transferred to a Pensacola hospital where he died about 12-hours later. The cause of his death is still a controversy. Former Medical Examiner Dr. Charles Siebert ruled it accidental due to Sickle Cell Trait. A second autopsy found death by suffocation, due to the ammonia capsules held under Anderson's nose. Schmidt and 7-drill instructors were later acquitted at trial on aggravated manslaughter charges. The State Board of Nursing, in its investigation of Kristen Schmidt, cited Schmidt's conduct as unprofessional and negligent that day. * The board found Schmidt failed to adequately assess Anderson's condition. * She improperly distributed ammonia capsules to the drill instructors, without them having the proper knowledge about how to use the capsules. * She failed to provide the paramedics with the complete information about what had transpired on the exercise field. * Schmidt failed to perform any emergency treatment on Anderson at any time during the incident. * And she failed to accurately record the incident in her nursing notes. Schmidt agreed to voluntarily surrender her license, and never reapply in Florida in exchange for an end to the case against her. . And it is possible we could see more activity in the Anderson case, from the U-S Attorney's office. The Department of Justice is investigating whether or not the drill instructors and Schmidt violated Anderson's civil rights. Once Barack Obama takes office, the U-S Attorneys typically hand-in their resignation letters for the new president to accept or reject. If Obama selects a new U-S Attorney for this region, that person could push the Anderson case to the top of the priority list. For complete story, click here.

Changing times close children's home--November 1st, 2008--GROSSE POINTE WOODS -- A Grosse Pointe Woods children's home that has provided treatment for troubled children for 172 years will be shuttered at the end of November, a result of the state's shifting priorities for residential treatment of children and the economy. The board of trustees of the Children's Home of Detroit voted Thursday to shutter the facility, which houses 5-to-17-year-olds in cottages on a 13-acre country-like campus. The home can house about 90 children; it has 28 children in residence, said Executive Director William Steele. The state is placing fewer children in residential treatment settings partly because of the settlement of a lawsuit brought by the New York City-based child advocacy group Children's Rights. The group sued Michigan over poor treatment of children in foster care that resulted in several deaths. "It's no different than the stories you're hearing about businesses that have to downsize or go out of business," Steele said. "The economy has certainly drained some of those resources we had available for operations." That, coupled with the low occupancy and the uncertainty about the direction of care for children, has combined to make it necessary for us to close." Under terms of the lawsuit settlement, which took effect Oct. 24, the state Department of Human Services agreed to place children in the least restrictive setting possible, said Jack Kresnak, president of the nonprofit advocacy group Michigan's Children. (Webmaster Note: Good. Hopefully this is a growing trend.) For complete story, click here.

Pendleton Academies may face closure--November 19th, 2008--The Oregon Department of Human Services- Addictions and Mental Health Division (AMH) on Tuesday notified the Pendleton Academies' board of directors of their intention to revoke the treatment facility's certificate of approval to operate as a provider of psychiatric residential treatment services and psychiatric day treatment services for children. On Aug. 20, AMH placed conditions on Pendleton Academies' certificate of approval to operate. At that time, the board appointed Interim Executive Director Terry Edvalson, who has been working with Pendleton Academies' staff to meet the standards required by AMH. Since then, Pendleton Academies has continued to care for clients, but has not been permitted to admit new clients to the program. As recently as late October, AMH indicated they would lift the restrictions on Pendleton Academies and allow the admission of new clients, according to a statement released by the Pendleton Academies board Tuesday afternoon. Given Pendleton Academies' efforts and progress in meeting AMH requirements, said the news release, Edvalson and the board were surprised by AMH's most recent action, the statement said. The board plans to investigate its appeal rights and will be meeting again this Friday when more information is available, according to the statement. (Webmaster Note: Just shut it down.) (Unable to locate story at time of archiving. Source: www.eastoregonian.info Date: November 19, 2008)

Ex-Supervisor at Teen Rehab Center Allegedly Raped Patient--November 21st, 2008--JOPLIN, Mo. — A woman who briefly supervised teens at a southwest Missouri drug and alcohol treatment center is charged with statutory rape for allegedly having sex with a 16-year-old boy at the center. Police say they're investigating similar allegations concerning Jana Carter, 45, and three other teens who lived at the male-only dormitory at Scott Greening Dependency Center in Joplin. Two of the boys are 16 and the third is 14. No charges had been filed in those allegations as of Friday. A probable cause statement filed in Jasper County Circuit Court alleges that Carter had consensual sexual contact with the 16-year-old at least twice last month at the center. Their alleged encounters occurred while Carter, a residential supervisor at the time, was working her shift. Joplin police spokesman Cpl. Chuck Niess told The Associated Press on Friday that Carter is now in custody. Niess said she turned herself in Thursday in McDonald County, south of Jasper County, and was to be transferred to a jail in Jasper County. Larry Black, director of the Scott Greening Dependency Center, was out of the office Friday and could not be reached by the AP. But he told The Joplin Globe that Carter was hired about a month before the alleged incidents happened. According to court records, she had sexual contact with the 16-year-old from Oct. 10 to Oct. 19. For complete story, click here.

Greenacres teen minister charged with having sex with girl, 16--November 24th, 2008--The president of a Greenacres Christian teen center had a sexual relationship for more than a year with a 16-year-old he was counseling, authorities say. A judge Sunday ordered Brent Gabriel Edwards, 33, held in lieu of $100,000 bond, charged with unlawful sexual activity with a minor, a jail clerk said. Edwards posted the bond Sunday and will be on house arrest. He was booked early Saturday. According to its Web page, Edwards is president of Extreme Revolution Youth Ministries, which operates the Oasis Teen Center. His wife Christy is listed as vice president. The ministry, founded in 2005, is listed as a federally-approved "501(c)(3)" non-profit charity. The center lists among its missions "to provide a safe environment where teens can have fun." A call to the center at midday today went to a recording. The telephone listed for Edwards' home was disconnected. The Oasis operates at the Community Life Center, 3812 Jog Road. A clerk at Church of the Palms said it owns the center and rents it out to various organizations, including Oasis, but is not affiliated with it or Extreme Revolution. According to a Palm Beach County sheriff's report, Edwards had sex with the girl two to three times a week, before or after school or after youth group functions, from July 2007 until the end of August of this year. The girl and her family, who knew Edwards from various church and youth groups, had gone to Edwards and his wife for counseling for emotional issues because the girl had been cutting herself, the report said. The girl said that soon after the sessions got under way, her relationship with Edwards became physical. For complete story, click here.

Teen's troubled life--December 3rd, 2008-- TRACY - "Nothing resembles normalcy or sanity" in the case of the 17-year-old boy who told authorities he was shackled and held captive in a Tracy home for a year, city spokesman Matt Robinson said. Police began searching Tuesday for a third suspect - possibly the boy's aunt - who lived in the home that was his alleged prison, Robinson announced at a morning news conference. The terrified teen was not attending school and had not been in contact with any other family members in more than a year, Robinson said. Yet the married couple - the wife a Girl Scout leader - and their four children also lived in the home. Neighbors reported what seemed to be a normal family and recalled purchasing Girl Scout cookies from the oldest daughter. And one neighbor said she frequently saw the teen outside the family home. But "nothing resembles normalcy or sanity in this case," Robinson said. A woman who might be the boy's aunt, Caren Ramirez, 43, took custody of the teen in early 2007 after he was removed from his parents' home, Robinson said.

Not long after she took custody, however, Ramirez was arrested on and still carries a felony warrant for child abuse charges. The boy was returned to the care of Child Protective Services, which put him in a Sacramento group home. "At some point after that, the teen and Ramirez reunited," Robinson said. "We're not sure when." Investigators said Tuesday that Ramirez may have been headed to the East Bay on BART. Ramirez is described as black, 5 feet tall with short brown hair and brown eyes. She often wears a bandanna on her head. When captured, Ramirez will face the same five charges as the couple who were arrested: torture, kidnapping, child endangerment, corporal injury to a child and false imprisonment, officials said. The case came to light Monday afternoon when the terrified and bloodied boy ran into a fitness center wearing nothing but boxer shorts and a heavy chain wrapped tightly around his ankle. Covered in soot and blood, he told gym staffers that he had been held captive in a home on Tracy's Tennis Lane for a year. He begged them to help him hide. "It wasn't something I thought was real," said Raelynn Lagadon, 24, a personal trainer at In-Shape Sport who gave the boy some food and water. "It was like something you'd see in a horror film or 'CSI.' Who would do that to somebody?" (Webmaster Note: Most, if not all, behavior modification programs would and likely have done this to many. Shut them down!) Police arrested the adults who lived in the nearby home - Michael Schumacher, 34, and Kelly Schumacher, 30, who also might have gone by the name of Kelly Layne Lau. The Schumachers are each being held in lieu of $1.2million bail. A subsequent search of their home found further evidence implicating them, said Robinson, who would not describe what officers found. For complete story, click here.

Worker faces rap in Manhattan Family Court building sex attacks--December 2nd, 2008-- A city worker who supervised troubled teens raped and sexually abused underage girls inside the Manhattan Family Court building, prosecutors said Tuesday. Tony Simmons, 45, of the Bronx, pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges Tuesday after four victims picked him out of a lineup. "It's outrageous," said Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau. "Here somebody who was supposed to be protecting them - helping them - is sexually abusing them. It's as bad as it gets." City Investigation Commissioner Rose Gill Hearn, whose office referred the case to Manhattan prosecutors, called the case a "shocking abuse of the public trust." Prosecutors said Simmons raped a 15-year-old in a courthouse elevator in September 2005 and sexually assaulted a 16-year-old girl two months later in a courthouse pantry. Simmons, who was being held on $250,000 bail, was nabbed after authorities found out about an assault in July of a 15-year-old girl behind a locker in a waiting area. "Who the heck was supervising him?" Morgenthau wondered. Assistant Manhattan District Attorney Amir Vonsover said the three girls involved in Tuesday's criminal complaint are "just the tip of the iceberg." He said a fourth victim told detectives that Simmons sexually abused her in 2000, but he was not charged in that case because it happened more than five years ago. Hearn said Simmons, who has worked for the city Department of Juvenile Justice for 16 years, was suspended without pay from his $37,391-a-year job for one month this summer before being put on desk duty away from children. Because prosecutors fear there could be more victims, they set up a hotline. Anyone with information relevant to the case should call (212) 335-9373. For complete story, click here.

Lack of skills creates problems with teens--December 7th, 2008--It's much easier for kids to get into trouble today than it was when he was a child, said Dr. Henry Petree. "It is very difficult out there to be a kid, and it is very difficult out there to be the parent of a kid," Petree said. A lot of those kids in trouble have parents who don't have the basic skills needed to deal with the problems their children have, he said. Petree is one of two counselors trying to intervene with troubled teens coming through the Community Intervention Center at the Muskegee County/City Detention Facility. He's asked the parents to come in for free counseling sessions. "A lot of them don't have any parenting skills, they didn't inherit any," Petree said. "They're short on 'What do I do,' and they are so frustrated that it's unreal." What he sees has led Petree to write a yet unpublished book on parenting, "In Perspective." It is a series of columns giving parents advice. He is offering it to newspapers and churches to publish one article at a time. He said he compiled the articles after seeing parents asking, "What can I do? We're completely over our heads here." "Muskegee County has got some really good parents, and I've met some of those, but I've met an awful lot of them who just don't have the skills," he said. "Is it their fault? No. Nobody taught them. Their parents didn't have very good parenting skills." He said he sees two particular skills lacking: Communication and conflict resolution. "Oftentimes, they have difficulty communicating with not only teenagers, but with spouses and the community in general," Petree said. "Now we have a teenager and a parent yelling at each other — not a good way to communicate — and now that we've started this yelling, it just cycles," he said. Conflict resolution skills come in at a close second, Petree said. "If we can't communicate, we can't resolve the conflict once we get it," he said. "That's when we call the police, and the young person ends up in jail or in counseling with me. It's not something people plan to do, it's just something that happens." He would like to teach both skills to parents and teens, Petree said. "Having those skills goes a long way in having a home that's not so full of turmoil and chaos and screaming and cussing and everything that goes on there," he said. "Unfortunately, they don't teach us those skills in school. We might graduate at the top of our class and not know how to communicate and when we have conflict, not know how to resolve it. So folks get divorces over that, and kids go to jail." For complete story, click here.

Human rights violations in our own backyard--December 10th, 2008--Dec. 10 marks the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. As we call on our global leaders to renew our commitments to universal justice and dignity, Californians must examine how we treat our youth. For complete story, click here.

Appeals court blasts juvenile judge--December 11th, 2008--An appeals court has ruled that a Miami-Dade juvenile judge improperly sent a youth to jail for missing his court dates. On Wednesday, the Third District Court of Appeal in Miami reversed Miami-Dade Circuit Judge Lester Langer for ordering "an uncooperative juvenile" into Miami's juvenile lockup without the authority to do so. This was the 12th case the court has reversed for the veteran judge, who has presided in juvenile court since 1999. The previous 11 cases all occurred within the last three years. Langer declined to discuss the appeals court ruling. Miami-Dade courts spokeswoman Eunice Sigler said Langer had read the opinion "and he will comply with it." For complete story, click here.

Facility to end Conn. contract for troubled youth--December 11, 2008--NORTH STONINGTON, Conn. - A North Stonington facility is ending its contract to treat adolescents in state custody who have drug problems or mental illness. Stonington Institute cited a lack of demand for the inpatient programs, resulting from the state's increasing preference to send those youths to community-based programs. This week's decision comes two months after reports that employees forcibly injected medications into out-of-control teen boys last spring to restrain them. That news prompted criticism over whether the state Department of Children and Families adequately monitors facilities that care for adolescents in state custody. For complete story, click here.

Judge Orders Nun to Serve Full Sentence--MILWAUKEE - A judge in Milwaukee County today ordered an elderly nun to serve out her jail sentence. Sister Norma Giannini has serve eight months of a year long sentence for a conviction on charges that she sexually assaulted boys while attending St. Patrick's School in Milwaukee during the 1960s. For complete story, click here.

'White House Boys' win inquiry of reform school graves--December 10, 2008--MARIANNA, Florida (CNN) -- Four men, now in their 60s, met over the Internet, shared stories about the darkest days of their pasts and spurred an investigation into 32 graves at a reform school. Roger Kiser, Michael McCarthy, Bryant Middleton and Dick Colon talked about whippings and beatings and other boys who disappeared. They discussed the 32 crosses marking the graves of persons unknown on the grounds of the former Florida Industrial School for Boys. They called their group the White House Boys, taking the name from the single story concrete building where, they say, boys were beaten and tortured decades ago. For complete story, click here.

Boys school probe stirs painful memories--December 15, 2008--MARIANNA, Florida (CNN) -- Leaning against his cane, Bryant Middleton shuffled toward the makeshift cemetery. Tears welled in his eyes as he leaned down to touch one of the crosses. "This shouldn't be," he said. "This shouldn't be." Thirty-one crosses made of tubular steel and painted white line up unevenly in the grass and weeds of what used to be the grounds of a reform school in Marianna, Florida. The anonymous crosses are rusting away but their secrets may soon be exposed. When boys disappeared from the school, administrators explained it away, said former student Roger Kiser. They'd say, "Well, he ran away and the swamp got him," Kiser recalled. Or, "The gators got him." Or, "Water moccasins got him." Kiser and other former students believe authorities will soon find the remains of children and teens sent to the Florida School for Boys half a century ago. (Webmaster Note: Many programs in existence today use the same excuses to cover up "disappearances" of children in their care.) For complete story, click here.

Children forced into cell-like school seclusion rooms--December 17, 2008--MURRAYVILLE, Georgia (CNN) -- A few weeks before 13-year-old Jonathan King killed himself, he told his parents that his teachers had put him in "time-out." "We thought that meant go sit in the corner and be quiet for a few minutes," Tina King said, tears washing her face as she remembered the child she called "our baby ... a good kid." But time-out in the boy's north Georgia special education school was spent in something akin to a prison cell -- a concrete room latched from the outside, its tiny window obscured by a piece of paper. Called a seclusion room, it's where in November 2004, Jonathan hanged himself with a cord a teacher gave him to hold up his pants. Watch Jonathan's parents on their son's death » An attorney representing the school has denied any wrongdoing. Seclusion rooms, sometimes called time-out rooms, are used across the nation, generally for special needs children. Critics say that along with the death of Jonathan, many mentally disabled and autistic children have been injured or traumatized. Few states have laws on using seclusion rooms, though 24 states have written guidelines, according to a 2007 study conducted by a Clemson University researcher. Texas, which was included in that study, has stopped using seclusion and restraint. Georgia has just begun to draft guidelines, four years after Jonathan's death. For complete story, click here.

Georgia 8th-grader's suicide spurs lawsuit--August 15, 2008 (Received 12/19/08)--Jonathan King told teachers at his north Georgia alternate public school that he couldn't stand being locked within the four concrete walls of a small seclusion room. In 2004, just weeks after threatening suicide, the 13-year-old eighth-grader hanged himself in the room, using a cord a teacher provided him to hold up his pants, court records show. Now, four years later, as the Alpine Program in Gainesville starts its new school year, Jonathan's parents are suing the program and the agency that oversees it. Don and Tina King of Murrayville, just outside Gainesville, say the treatment their son received at the school was unconstitutional and the school failed to protect him from self-harm. A north Georgia judge is expected to decide soon whether the King's case should be dismissed or sent to a jury trial. For complete story, click here.

DSHS settles case of boy's death; lawyer asks how state lost track--December 17, 2008--This is a story that's been told countless times on these pages. Sadly, it needs to be told again. It's about the death of a boy who spent most of his life in foster care. Robley Carr Jr., according to his lawyer, was a victim of the state Department of Social and Health Services' (DSHS) mistakes. He was a victim not once, but twice. In 2003, state and federal authorities paid $5 million to settle claims that Robley and three siblings were horribly abused in foster care. Now, the state has agreed to pay an additional $320,000 to settle a claim that it failed to protect Robley even after that. He died at age 15. "How did they lose track of him again?" asks Tim Tesh, the Seattle lawyer who filed both legal claims. "It's a hard question to answer." The state said only this: "All I can tell you is that DSHS regrets the unfortunate death of this young man," said agency spokesman Steve Williams. "We believe the $320,000 award is a fair and just settlement." One might say that Robley began life well short of the starting gate. His parents were troubled. According to an official review of Robley's 2006 death, Child Protective Services (CPS) in Alaska investigated abuse and neglect complaints involving the family in the early 1990s. The children were removed from the home, but Robley's mother later fled with them to Washington state, after she "left a treatment program against medical advice," the review said. It didn't take long for CPS here to get involved. Robley had some 15 or 20 placements by the time he was 9, according to the recent legal claim. His two sisters and one brother had similar experiences, bouncing from home to home. Robley, whose parents are Native American, was recognized by the Nooksack and the Hoonah tribes. That put his case under jurisdiction of tribal authorities and DSHS — or, as his lawsuit alleged, neither. The children were repeatedly beaten in one foster home on the Nooksack reservation, according to the lawsuit Tesh filed. Even when the state heard the children were being abused, it didn't investigate, the suit said. The youngest almost died from a ruptured bowel and suffered a broken shoulder, Tesh said in a 2003 interview. The foster mother's teenage son beat him, sometimes jumping on the younger child's stomach. Then he beat the child again when he vomited blood or cried. Another sibling, Tesh said, was admitted to a psychiatric hospital. For complete story, click here.

See the Trailer for "Aaron Bacon"--A new film to be released in 2009 is the dramatic telling of the true story of the death of Aaron Bacon at the hands of the teen torture industry. See the trailer at: http://jonfordham.com/aaron_bacon_teaser_f23_acv-235.html

Father pleads guilty to rape charges--December 18, 2008--SPOKANE — A man who raped his daughter and posted videos of the abuse online before fleeing the country pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court and likely faces the rest of his life in prison. Kenneth John Freeman, 46 — described by law-enforcement officers as "one of the most heinous" pedophiles — pleaded guilty to production of child pornography and interstate transportation of a minor for the purpose of unlawful sexual activity. His agreement with federal prosecutors calls for a sentence of 50 years in prison, plus three years of probation, when Freeman is sentenced March 25. "A 50-year sentence is going to be a life sentence," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephanie Lister, who prosecuted the case. Freeman would serve some 42 years before he could be considered for parole. He also pleaded guilty to three Benton County charges of child rape during an appearance in Spokane County Superior Court, in exchange for an expected sentence of 20 years, to run concurrently with the federal time. He will be held in a federal prison. For complete story, click here.

Oregon slow to deal with troubled facilities for troubled kids--December 20, 2008--SALEM -- Authorities knew of problems at two institutions that house Oregon's most troubled children: Kids getting the wrong medication; workers with criminal records; a teen with a broken collarbone after a fight with staff; and unsupervised mentally ill youths. But instead of closing the institutions, state licensing officials spent several months warning the Kirkland Institute near Burns and the Pendleton Academies in eastern Oregon. It was only after authorities feared that children were in danger that they cracked down and blocked new admissions. At Kirkland, for instance, another teen in state protective custody was taken to the emergency room after a run-in with staff. At Pendleton, a 17-year-old was charged with raping a 13-year-old girl. For complete story, click here.

Alldredge Academy Closing!--December 16, 2008--Alldredge Academy is closing as of December 31, 2008! Another one down! Keep the pressure on! For complete story, click here.

Report Reveals Unwarranted Detention Of Massachusetts Youth--December 18, 2008--BOSTON – Massachusetts police and probation officers are unnecessarily incarcerating youth who are arrested when juvenile court is typically closed, according to a report released today by the American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU of Massachusetts and the Children's Law Center of Massachusetts. Many have been arrested for minor infractions and pose no obvious risk of flight or danger to the community. The report, "A Looming Crisis: The Secure Detention of Youth After Arrest and Before Arraignment in Facilities Administered by the Massachusetts Executive Office of Public Safety and Security," reveals that youth securely detained after being arrested in the late afternoons, evenings or over a weekend are frequently denied access to bail and subjected to conditions that do not meet state regulations. "Far too many kids are being locked up and detained in substandard conditions for no good reason," said Robin Dahlberg, senior staff attorney with the ACLU Racial Justice Program and the primary author of the report. "Unnecessary detention has a dramatic and negative impact on our children by pushing them deeper into the criminal justice system." For complete story, click here.

More Programs Closing--Abusive programs are losing funding and many juvenile courts are choosing to revert back to conventional juvenile detention. Whether it is due to lack of money or new regulations, this is good news. For more details, click here.

Troubled children centers closing--December 27, 2008--Adrian Training Center will be shuttered Jan. 24 to help close a $540 million shortfall in Michigan's budget -- but the plan also signals the end of an era in how troubled children are treated in the state. The institution was in operation for nearly 130 years and cost taxpayers $7.8 million annually for the treatment of 31 wayward girls. But in Michigan and nationwide, experts are moving away from institutionalizing children -- a trend that affects not only juvenile delinquents but other children with severe emotional or behavioral problems placed in long-term residential treatment centers, where they often remain for years. Instead, the state is shifting resources to keep children at home or in foster homes, reflecting today's belief among child welfare experts that institutions are outmoded, expensive and ineffective. But some child advocates say severely ill children cared for in the community often aren't getting the services they need to be successful. And many in law enforcement complain delinquents can be a danger to their communities. For complete story, click here.

Removing boys from that Blount County program where abuse is alleged was the right move at the right time--December 1, 2008--THE ISSUE: Removing boys from that Blount County program after allegations of abuse was the right move at the right time. Torture. Beatings. Severe abuse. These are serious accusations, to be sure. They are the kind we have made against our enemies during war. The kind of accusations made against us, where Abu Ghraib and Gitmo are concerned. For complete story, click here.

Teen's death in Parma is ruled homicide-- January 6th, 2009--The death of a Barberton teenager at a Parma treatment facility last month has been ruled a homicide, the Cuyahoga County coroner said Monday. Faith Finley, 17, suffocated and choked to death on her own vomit while being restrained by staff members, the coroner determined. Finley died Dec. 13 at Parmadale Family Services, a Catholic Charities-run facility that treats youths with severe behavioral health and developmental problems. She was in the custody of Summit County Children Services at the time and had been placed there by the agency. "For this kind of an outcome to occur is deeply, deeply concerning and frankly painful," Children Services Executive Director John Saros said after learning about the ruling. "This was a beautiful young woman who was sent there to receive treatment services. For complete story, click here. Click here for more info.

Some Civil Rights Groups Mark Today as 3rd Anniversary in Teen Bootcamp Death--January 6th, 2009-- Three years ago Monday marks the death of Martin Lee Anderson. The 14-year-old Bay County Teenager was admitted to Bay Medical Center, and then transferred to the ICU in Pensacola Hospital where he died. That death set off a chain of events that in no way has come to an end. Some civil rights groups will mark the third anniversary of Martin Lee Anderson's death Monday, in a graveside ceremony. The case is still a divisive issue in the community and the nation. If you remember-- the teen collapsed during a physical assessment in his first day at the old Bay County Juvenile Boot Camp. Drill instructors initially believe Anderson was faking an illness and used what some considered to be physical abuse to make him complete the work-out. In the first autopsy, then-medical examiner Dr. Charles Siebert found Anderson died as a result of sickle cell trait. A second autopsy found the drill instructors suffocated the teen. Two state entities settled with Anderson's family for a combined 7-million dollars. But when the 7-drill instructors and the camp nurse were acquitted of aggravated manslaughter during the criminal trial, Anderson supporters called for a u-s justice department investigation. More than a year later that investigation is still underway. For complete story, click here.

Ruling expands legal rights of truant students--January 13th, 2009--Juveniles accused of chronically cutting class in public schools are entitled to a lawyer in their first court hearing, a unanimous three-judge panel of the Washington Court of Appeals has ruled. Reversing a King County Superior Court ruling and an earlier Court of Appeals finding on different issues, the panel found Monday that denying a juvenile the right to a lawyer from the outset violated constitutional requirements. In her opinion, Judge Anne Ellington wrote the decision was the first to consider due-process rights of juveniles in initial proceedings under the truancy law enacted in 1995. For complete story, click here.

Gay kids' health: Family role cited--December 29th, 2008--SAN FRANCISCO — Young gay people whose parents or guardians responded negatively when they revealed their sexual orientation were more likely to attempt suicide, experience severe depression and use drugs than those whose families accepted the news, according to a new study. The way in which parents or guardians respond to a youth's sexual orientation profoundly influences the child's mental health as an adult, say researchers at San Francisco State University, whose findings appear in today's journal of the American Academy of Pediatrics. "Parents love their children and want the best for them," said lead researcher Caitlin Ryan, a social worker who directs the university's Family Acceptance Project. "Now that we have measured all these behaviors, we can see that some of them put youth at extremely high risk and others are wellness-promoting." Among other findings, the study showed that teens who experienced negative feedback were more than eight times as likely to have attempted suicide, nearly six times as vulnerable to severe depression and more than three times at risk of drug use. More significantly, Ryan said, ongoing work at San Francisco State suggests parents who take even baby steps to respond with equanimity instead of rejection can dramatically improve a gay youth's mental-health outlook. One of the most startling findings was that being forbidden to associate with gay peers was as damaging as being physically beaten or verbally abused by their parents in terms of negative feedback, Ryan said. For complete story, click here.

Eugene, Ore., high-school students' good intentions misunderstood--December 20th, 2008--EUGENE, Ore. — All they wanted to do was change the world, one random act of kindness at a time. Instead, they were met with furrowed brows, questioned by Eugene police and ousted by Valley River Center security officers. "People can't accept the fact that there are other people who just want to be nice," says Sheldon High School senior Kelsey Hertel, who founded the school's new Random Acts of Kindness Club. "People don't trust each other. They think everyone's out to get them." Ironically, that's exactly why Hertel founded the club in the first place. "Our community isn't giving enough," she says. "So we thought by doing random acts of kindness, we could totally change someone's day or life. And they could pay it forward to someone else. And one person at a time, we could make the world better." For complete story, click here.

Senator Chris Dodd Reports on Restraint and Seclusion , See Video:

Report Reveals Severe Cases of Abuse and Neglect of Schoolchildren--January 13th, 2009-- WASHINGTON, D.C. – Schoolchildren around the country have been subject to abusive – and in some cases fatal – uses of seclusion and restraint by school administrators, teachers and staff, according to a new report released today by the National Disability Rights Network. The report, the first national effort to examine these practices in both public and private schools identified hundreds of cases where the abusive and negligent use of seclusion and restraint injured or traumatized students, many of whom were disabled. In several cases, students died. In light of this report, U.S. Rep. George Miller, the chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, announced the committee will hold a hearing on these abuses. "These abuses are a shocking and disturbing betrayal of the trust that families and communities place in our schools. School administrators and teachers are tasked with providing not just productive and encouraging learning environments for students, but with keeping them safe. It is wholly unacceptable for children to be locked up in closets or for any staff member to use overwhelming – and in some cases deadly – force against their students. "This report raises serious questions about the treatment of schoolchildren, the qualifications and training of staff, and what actions have been taken to address these unconscionable practices. No child should be at risk or in danger while at school, no matter what the circumstances. Our committee will hold a hearing to look at how we can address and hopefully end these horrific acts." The report, "School is not supposed to hurt: An investigative report on abusive seclusion and restraint in schools," provides an unprecedented look at the tactics used to isolate or restrain students. In one case, a seven-year old girl was killed in a special day program when four adult staff pinned her small body face down. The student had been blowing bubbles in her milk and would not follow directions to sit still. In another example, a thirteen year old boy committed suicide in a locked concrete seclusion room, hanging himself with a cord provided by staff to hold up his pants, after pleading with his teachers that he could not withstand the isolation in the small room for hours at a time. For complete story, click here.

Teachers in Martinique sentenced for abusing teens--January 22nd, 2009--A judge in Martinique has prohibited seven teachers from working with minors again after they were found guilty of physically abusing juvenile delinquents. The teachers also have received suspended sentences ranging from 14 to 24 months. Prosecutors had alleged that eight teachers made 16- and 17-year-old students kneel on rocks and hold cinder blocks in outstretched arms during work trips to Haiti and Brazil. The juveniles were part of a program funded by the Paris-based Groupe SOS that works with troubled teens, drug addicts and homeless people. The nine victims will receive between $2,000 to $9,000 in damages, along with $1,300 each for attorney fees. The teachers were sentenced late Wednesday. For complete story, click here.

Trainer charged with abusing teen girls--January 23rd, 2009--A Colorado horse trainer has been charged with sexually abusing teenage girls, including one that he took to Alabama for marriage. Donald Lane Betts, 33, was arrested in December when he returned to Kiowa with his 16-year-old bride, the Rocky Mountain News reported. Investigators say he lied about her age in Alabama because minors must have parental permission to marry. Mark Wilson, an investigator with the Elbert County Sheriff's Office, said Betts may have victimized other teens. Wilson charged that Betts targeted troubled girls, including three runaways. We have a strong belief that there are other victims out there, Wilson said. We stand ready to get them the help that they need. Betts faces a long list of charges, including second-degree kidnapping, sexual assault on a child, harboring a minor and contributing to the delinquency of a minor. He is also charged with obstruction of a peace officer for locking himself in his house when police arrived to arrest him. For complete story, click here.

Civil suit filed in camp death--January 23rd, 2009--SALT LAKE CITY — The mother of Utah teen Caleb Jensen filed suit Thursday against those she believes were responsible for his untimely death at 15. Caleb was attending an Alternative Youth Adventures outing for at-risk youth in rural Montrose County in 2007. He died of a staph infection May 2 of that year. The state acted quickly, suspending AYA's license for residential and therapeutic childcare. AYA later surrendered the license, which it had originally hoped to renew. In July 2007 came the indictments against AYA, its former parent company Community Education Centers of New Jersey; camp director James Omer; camp EMT Ben Askins and Utah physician Keith Hooker. The criminal complaints alleged the infection that claimed Jensen's life produced visible signs, which the defendants failed to act on. Charges included manslaughter and child abuse resulting in death, but by last December, only CEC remained as a criminal defendant. For complete story, click here. For more info, click here.

Troubled Miami-Dade reform school may be forced to close main campus--January 24th, 2009--A Miami-Dade reform school for troubled teens, once considered a national model, could be forced to shut its 16-year-old main campus. State administrators have yanked the school's contract, citing escapes, allegations of abuse and neglect, and other chronic problems. In a letter dated Jan. 7, the Department of Juvenile Justice's South Florida chief said Bay Point Schools in South Dade will lose state funding March 1, and that admissions to the 157-bed campus have been frozen. Youths already are being transferred to similar programs or being released. Budget problems triggered the decision -- the department has to cut $5 million this year and will save $2 million by closing Bay Point's Kennedy campus -- but the school has been beset by critical lapses, said agency Assistant Secretary Darryl Olson. "They have consistently failed to comply with DJJ standards," Olson said. "We haven't been getting the kind of return on investment we would like." Added DJJ spokesman Frank Penela: "In the budget times we're in, we can't afford to do that anymore." For complete story, click here.

Dyller eyes potential lawsuits--January 28th, 2009--WILKES-BARRE — A local attorney who specializes in civil rights cases said he believes some of the juveniles who were incarcerated under juvenile Judge Mark Ciavarella's tenure have a strong basis to file a lawsuit seeking compensation for emotional and financial harm. I'm looking at this and see so many civil claims based on so many potential civil rights violations, it's shocking," said Barry Dyller of Wilkes-Barre. For complete story, click here.

Connecticut Junior Republic to close campus for troubled teens--January 31, 2009--LITCHFIELD — Connecticut Junior Republic will end a 105-year tradition of sheltering and educating troubled teens here in April. On Friday, 107 teachers, counselors, and support staff were told they will not have a job when the campus, except for the administration building, shuts down April 2. The nonprofit organization, founded with a 1904 bequest from landowner Mary Buel but funded primarily by taxpayers, has suffered in recent years from changes in how the state treats juveniles in trouble. Over the past decade, CJR expanded and updated its campus, with a $5 million education center in 1997 and a $1.4 million family and student services center that opened in 2003. But in 2008, CJR's number of beds was cut from 84 to 60 in response to shrinking demand; only 38 teenage boys, most referred from the court system, live on campus today. "That does provide a sense of how quickly things have changed," said Director of Development Hedy L. Barton. Increasingly, the state refers troubled teens to community and home-based programs rather than residential facilities now reserved only for those teens who demonstrate the highest risk behavior. For complete story, click here.

Three Rivers Montana to close--January 31st, 2009--Three Rivers Montana, a Belgrade-based wilderness program for troubled teens, plans to close Feb. 28, laying off its 37 employees, executive director Marylis Filipovich said Thursday. "Normally, January is a very big admissions month for us and we didn't get any admissions," she said. Three Rivers opened five years ago and has served more than 400 kids from across the nation. Teens experiencing difficulties at home or school could stay at the mental-health facility for a few weeks or months, earning high-school credits and receive treatment. The nonprofit depended on admission fees, often funded by health-insurance reimbursements, donations and fundraising. Discounts were offered for low-income families. "In this economy, many of our potential families cannot afford the cost of outdoor behavioral healthcare," Mark Parlett, director of programs and development for Three Rivers, wrote in an e-mail to the Chronicle. Families often took out loans to send their kids to Three Rivers and the tightened credit market has hurt enrollment, Filipovich said. "Our families tended to be middle-class, and with the economy like it is, they can't get loans," she said. For complete story, click here.

Good News: Bad Economy Killing Abusive Teen Programs--January 30th, 2009-- There is a silver lining to this bleak economy: Abusive and ineffective "tough love" programs for teens are failing right and left. In just the last few weeks, the notorious Tranquility Bay program in Jamaica, Spring Creek Lodge in Montana, and Pathway Family Center in Detroit and Ohio have all been shuttered. Tranquility Bay was known for making kids kneel on concrete for days and using "restraint" so harsh that it broke bones. Both Tranquility Bay and Spring Creek Lodge were part of a network called the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools (WWASP or WWASPS)--and the group's philosophy involves constant use of emotional attacks and humiliation in a rigid, structured day in order to break teens' spirits. Spring Creek was notorious for a frigid, small isolation room called "the Hobbit"--sometimes teens were left there for months. From Pathway--which was descended from the infamously abusive Straight Inc.--I received two separate accounts of suicide attempts by girls which were not reported to their parents, and many stories of the usual attack therapy and humiliation. Unfortunately, neither WWASP nor Pathway is completely dead yet: WWASP still has centers operating in the US and abroad, and Pathway has sites in Indiana: Porter and Indianapolis. The media tends to present these closures as sad examples of needed services being cut--but in fact, teens are better off with no treatment than with treatment that often divides families and has characteristics known to produce post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). Family support tends to be crucial to long term recovery--and PTSD doubles the odds that a drug problem will become a lasting addiction. Troubled teen programs were yet another sign of the bubble economy. Many were financed by mortgage and home equity loans because they cost thousands of dollars a month and because insurers, quite correctly, don't usually pay for programs that aren't proven to help. Since there are proven alternatives for teens with drug and other problems that do not carry the risks of "tough love," we should greet the closings of these centers with glee. For complete story, click here.

Juvenile Cases May Get New Look Following Kickback Charges Against Former Judges--February 3rd, 2009-- The Pennsylvania Supreme Court appears ready to reconsider a request to review hundreds of Luzerne County juvenile court cases in the wake of charges that two former judges accepted kickbacks from the owners of a private juvenile detention center. The court, on Jan. 8, denied a petition by the Philadelphia-based Juvenile Law Center to look at more than 250 cases in which juvenile offenders were allegedly adjudicated and sent to detention centers without lawyers. On Monday, the justices issued a one-line order vacating their previous denial of that petition, pending further action by the court. "We see this as a very positive sign that the court is going to take a fresh look at our application for relief," said Bob Schwartz, JLC's executive director. "Beyond that, it's hard to read into this. It's pretty clear that they want to go deeper. There's no reason to do this if they're not going to grant relief down the line or at least figure out a way to provide relief to the kids of Luzerne County." The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Pennsylvania announced Jan. 22 that former President Judge Mark A. Ciavarella and Senior Judge Michael T. Conahan had conditionally agreed to plead guilty to honest service wire fraud charges. For complete story, click here.

Covenant House folding its operation here--February 5th, 2009--STATEN ISLAND, N.Y. -- Covenant House thrived from humble beginnings and later rose from the ashes of scandal, but it's no match for the putrid economy. The charity that specifically serves at-risk youth and had been scouting new quarters after it was priced out of its longtime home at 70 Bay St. in St. George, has elected to abandon the borough altogether amid a decrease in donations and worries about future revenue, a spokesman confirmed yesterday. For complete story, click here.

NICK GAGLIA STANDS UP FOR TROUBLED TEENS--February 5th, 2009--Independent filmmaker Nick Gaglia is a man on a mission: using the power of cinema to expose those who prey on troubled young adults. His critically- acclaimed 2007 feature film debut, "Over the GW," was based on his own experiences as a drug-addicted teen who underwent physical and psychological abuse at a cult-like, tough love rehab center. His next film, currently in post-production, is the biopic "Aaron Bacon," which details the tragic 1994 death of a troubled 16-year-old who died as a result of blatant malpractice in a tough love drug rehab camp. Film Threat caught up with Gaglia at his New York office to talk about his cinematic crusade to expose the exploiters of troubled teenagers. For complete story, click here.

3 fired from Parmadale in teen's death--February 7th, 2009--Tom Mullen, the president of the Catholic Charities of the Diocese of Cleveland, says the three were fired Friday following the release of a state agency report that said the workers didn't follow the center's own policies on how to restrain unruly youngsters. Faith Finley, 17, of Barberton, died Dec. 13 at Parmadale Family Services in suburban Cleveland while being restrained in a face-down position. The Cuyahoga County coroner's office ruled Finley's death a homicide last month, saying she choked on vomit and suffocated. For complete story, click here.

Juvenile Justice System Failing Ohio's Children, Investigation Finds--February 10th, 2009--COLUMBUS, OH -- The Ohio juvenile justice system is failing the state's children by permitting children to be routinely shackled, mandating that children accused of certain crimes be charged as adults and by not ensuring that all children accused of crimes get lawyers. The findings, detailed in a report card released today, are the result of an investigation by the American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU of Ohio, the Children's Law Center, Inc. and the Office of the Ohio Public Defender. The investigation has also revealed that Ohio detains and incarcerates a greater percentage of its children than most other states in the nation and that a disproportionate number of those incarcerated are children of color. "Rushing to criminalize and unnecessarily incarcerate kids is just bad policy," said Robin Dahlberg, a senior staff attorney with the ACLU Racial Justice Program. "It has a scarring impact on our children and only serves to push them deeper into the criminal justice system and inhibit their ability to become healthy, productive adults." For complete story, click here.

SJC: Juvenile offenders cannot be held beyond 18--February 10th, 2009--The state's highest court today struck down a law that allowed the state to keep juvenile offenders in custody for three years after they turned 18, if officials believed they would be "physically dangerous to the public." The Supreme Judicial Court ruled that the law, which was challenged by three juvenile offenders who had been ordered held until they were 21, "does not comport with substantive due process requirements and is constitutionally infirm." For complete story, click here.

Pa. judges accused of jailing kids for cash--February 11th, 2009--WILKES-BARRE, Pa. -- For years, the juvenile court system in Wilkes-Barre operated like a conveyor belt: Youngsters were brought before judges without a lawyer, given hearings that lasted only a minute or two, and then sent off to juvenile prison for months for minor offenses. The explanation, prosecutors say, was corruption on the bench. In one of the most shocking cases of courtroom graft on record, two Pennsylvania judges have been charged with taking millions of dollars in kickbacks to send teenagers to two privately run youth detention centers. For complete story, click here.

Report: Abuse Found At Chicago Public Schools, www.wbbm780.com, February 10, 2009--For complete story, click here.

House panel wants to crack down on wilderness camps--February 11th, 2009--Washington » A House panel approved a bill Wednesday that would boost federal regulations on residential programs for troubled teens, including the wilderness therapy camps that have thrived in Utah's deserts. The bill is in reaction to a two-year federal audit that found thousands of cases of abuse in residential treatment programs nationwide since the early 1990s, along with misleading marketing practices and uneven state oversight. "It is past time to bring these programs to a level of basic safety," said Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y., one of the sponsors of the legislation. The House Education and Labor Committee approved the bill on a vote of 32 to 10. The proposal is almost identical to a bill pushed last year. That version passed the full House by a wide margin, but did not come up for a vote in the Senate. With a new Congress, the legislation had to be reintroduced. Rep. Rob Bishop, R-Utah, a member of the committee, opposed it last year and opposed it again Wednesday. For complete story, click here. (The problems with HR 911 are the same as with HR 6358, learn more.)

Vision for Youth had multiple problems, managed teen felons--February 15th, 2009--Springfield, Ohio — Vision for Youth, Inc. maintained four facilities in Springfield and at one time had teens from the foster care system and juvenile felons, ages 13 to 18, from as many as ten counties enrolled in its boot-camp-style program. Vision had a history of problems, according to state records, but by all accounts the home's child-care staff managed a difficult population — children that were hard to place anywhere else because of criminal records and emotional problems, said Brian Harter, a spokesman for Ohio's Department of Job and Family Services. "You look at these kids' backgrounds...(they) have a lot of issues, and they have situations that require special attention," Harter said. "It's not an easy situation for the staff to deal with on a day-to-day basis. But that's not to condone anything." Harter said that while state law allows staff at group homes to physically restrain minors, staff are prohibited from administering physical discipline. Punching a juvenile, for instance — which happened at a Vision facility — is grounds for revocation of the home's license. On at least three occasions, licensing specialists investigating complaints about Vision recommended its license be revoked, but the home was allowed to continue operating. For complete story, click here.

NYPD okays Velcro handcuffs for use on unruly children 14 Feb 2009 Cops trying to restrain children will have a softer alternative than metal handcuffs under a new program the NYPD is testing in nearly two dozen schools. Starting next month, officers will use Velcro handcuffs instead of the tougher steel model to subdue disturbed or unruly children in 22 schools in northern Queens, according to a draft NYPD operations order obtained by the Daily News. For complete story, click here.

Kansas shuts down center for troubled teens--February 20th, 2009--ESBON, Kan. | The state is shutting down a northern Kansas treatment center for troubled adolescents after inspectors found emergency exit doors locked on three occasions. The White Rock Academy in Esbon on Thursday was ordered closed after state officials twice told operators to remove the locks, which violate the state fire and safety code. The academy has until Monday to make other arrangements for its 24 residents. The state suspended the center's license, citing a need to protect youths at the facility from physical abuse or threats to their safety. For complete story, click here.

Pennsylvania rocked by 'jailing kids for cash' scandal--February 23rd, 2009--CNN -- At a friend's sleepover more than a year ago, 14-year-old Phillip Swartley pocketed change from unlocked vehicles in the neighborhood to buy chips and soft drinks. The cops caught him. There was no need for an attorney, said Phillip's mother, Amy Swartley, who thought at most, the judge would slap her son with a fine or community service. But she was shocked to find her eighth-grader handcuffed and shackled in the courtroom and sentenced to a youth detention center. Then, he was shipped to a boarding school for troubled teens for nine months. "Yes, my son made a mistake, but I didn't think he was going to be taken away from me," said Swartley, a 41-year-old single mother raising two boys in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania. CNN does not usually identify minors accused of crimes. But Swartley and others agreed to be named to bring public attention to the issue. As scandals from Wall Street to Washington roil the public trust, the justice system in Luzerne County, in the heart of Pennsylvania's struggling coal country, has also fallen prey to corruption. The county has been rocked by a kickback scandal involving two elected judges who essentially jailed kids for cash. Many of the children had appeared before judges without a lawyer. The nonprofit Juvenile Law Center in Philadelphia said Phillip is one of at least 5,000 children over the past five years who appeared before former Luzerne County President Judge Mark Ciavarella. Ciavarella pleaded guilty earlier this month to federal criminal charges of fraud and other tax charges, according to the U.S. attorney's office. Former Luzerne County Senior Judge Michael Conahan also pleaded guilty to the same charges. The two secretly received more than $2.6 million, prosecutors said. For complete story, click here.

'Boot camp' closed--February 22nd, 2009--TREASURE BEACH, St Elizabeth - Tranquility Bay, the controversial offshore reform school for rebellious children, mostly from the United States, closed its doors last month as a result of a fallout in business. The last 'inmate' reportedly left the island on January 5. For complete story, click here.

U.S. House passes wilderness camp restrictions--February 24th, 2009--Washington » The U.S. House signed off on legislation Monday that seeks to end abuse in programs for troubled teens, such as the wilderness camps operating throughout Utah. The bill passed on a vote of 295 to 102. Utah Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson voted for the bill. Republican Reps. Rob Bishop and Jason Chaffetz voted against it. Proponents of the legislation say it will help keep kids safe as they participate in boot-camp style activities. The bill prohibits any punishment that denies food, water, clothing, shelter or medical care. It would limit forcible restraints and allow the children access to a telephone. The legislation also would set up a Web site allowing parents to see which programs have faced substantiated abuse claims. The bill follows a government audit that found more than 1,000 cases of abuse in such programs since the early 1990s, including cases where a child has died in Utah. For complete story, click here.

Crime of punishment?--March 1st, 2009-- At age 14, the Wilkes-Barre youth had been declared a juvenile delinquent and sent away for treatment, first to a wilderness-style juvenile detention camp and later to a reformatory school. His crime? He and a friend entered several open cars in Ashley and stole some change, a pre-paid cell phone and a portable music player, he and his mother, Amy, said. Suddenly the once carefree, basketball-playing teen found himself locked up for 10 months. Each day he struggled to control the rage that was building inside as he worked to earn his release. What he could not control, he and his mother said, is the sense of helplessness and anger that still haunts him today as he tries to comprehend why he was put away for a misdemeanor crime that, if committed by an adult, likely would have resulted in probation and a fine. It's a question thousands of other juveniles and their parents asked during the 12 years now-disgraced Judge Mark A. Ciavarella Jr. presided over Luzerne County's juvenile court. People such as Kimberly Bryk of Exeter Township and her daughter, Jamie, who spent more than a year lodged in juvenile detention facilities for a fist fight with another girl, and Sandy Fonzo of Wilkes-Barre and her son, Ed, who bounced in and out of several detention facilities after he violated probation on an initial charge of possession of drug paraphernalia. Today those parents and their children think they may have an answer: Ciavarella and Judge Michael Conahan pleaded guilty on Feb. 12 to accepting more than $2.6 million in kickbacks in exchange for rulings that favored the PA Child Care and Western PA Child Care juvenile detention centers formerly co-owned by Butler Township attorney Robert Powell. For complete story, click here.

What We Lost When We Lost Rocky -- Paper First Exposed Teen Torture--March 3rd, 2009--When people talk in the abstract about what we lose when we lose newspapers, it's often hard to drum up much concern. Yeah, people are losing their jobs--that's what happened to the buggy makers when the car took over. Yeah, news is important--but hey, we've got the web now. And the MSM blew it on Iraq, so who needs them anyway? We've got twitter. Just last week, Denver lost the Rocky Mountain News and before its website disappears, I wanted to share an example of just how much newspapers matter. This series--Desperate Measures--was the first to comprehensively take on the multi-million teen abuse empire variously known as WWASP, WWASPS and Teen Help. Please take the time to read it--once you start, it's hard to turn away. (And sadly, though WWASP has lost a few rounds lately, it's still operating). Expensive to conduct, extensive, well-written and well-reported, this journalism helped inspire a generation of activists, as well as my book, Help at Any Cost: How the Troubled-Teen Industry Cons Parents and Hurts Kids, which is the first book length investigation of the billion dollar business. In the series, Pulitzer-prize winner Lou Kilzer and photographer Dennis Schroeder make abundantly clear that the programs affiliated with WWASP are harsh, abusive and wildly popular--and they get a top WWASP official to admit that their staff is untrained and its methods completely untested: "These people are basically a bunch of untrained people who work for this organization," Ken Kay told the Denver Rocky Mountain News in an interview before he rejoined Teen Help as a vice president. "So they don't have credentials of any kind. ... "We could be leading these kids to long-term problems that we don't have a clue about because we're not going about it in the proper way. ... "How in the hell can you call yourself a behavior modification program -- and that's one of the ways it's marketed -- when nobody has the expertise to determine: Is this good, is this bad?" Kilzer shows that WWASP's contract with parents allows the programs to "use handcuffs, mechanical restraints, electrical disabler, Mace or pepper spray in order to restrain the student." Parents could not sue the program for "liability or damages resulting from restraint procedures." for complete story, click here.

Youth boot camps proven to fail--March 3rd, 2009--Clinical psychologists have joined the chorus of disapproval of the Government's planned 'boot camps', saying punishment as a deterrent does not work. The Government is planning to widen the powers of the Youth Court with a range of new sentencing options including sending the worst repeat offenders to military-style camps run by the army. Principal Youth Court Judge Andrew Becroft has already put the boot in to boot camps for young offenders. He said last week that sentencing youthful offenders to boot camp was "arguably the least successful sentence in the Western world". For complete story, click here.

Luzerne County Courthouse Corruption Probe Expands--March 2nd, 2009--WILKES-BARRE, LUZERNE COUNTY- The federal probe into corruption at the Luzerne County courthouse is widening. The I-Team has learned that federal investigators are expanding their investigation. Sources close to the case tell the I-Team that "target letters" have been sent to several lawyers in Luzerne and Lackawanna Counties. Those letters reportedly say they will be questioned about information they may have about corruption within the Luzerne County legal system. The I-Team has also learned that at least one district justice from Luzerne County has been questioned by federal agents. All of this comes in the aftermath of the arrest of four high ranking Luzerne County officials. Suspended Judges Mark Ciavarella and Michael Conahan pled guilty to taking millions in kickbacks in connection with a juvenile detention center in Pittston Township. Also busted was former Court Administrator William Sharkey, Sr. He admits to stealing $70,000 in seized gambling money. And Sandy Brulo, a Probation Supervisor, is accused of tampering with public records. The U.S. Attorney's Office will not comment on our information. For complete story, click here.

70 Youths Sue Former Judges in Detention Kickback Case--February 27th, 2009--More than 70 juveniles and their families filed a class-action lawsuit Thursday against two former judges who pleaded guilty this month in a scheme that involved their taking kickbacks to put young offenders in privately run detention centers. For complete story, click here.

Troubled teen beaten down by system--March 9th, 2009-- Most people are scared to die. It can't be any worse than living a life like mine. Being dead I think would just suit me fine ... People say there's nothing wrong with me. Honestly, I think they need to f--- off because they don't know what goes on in my head. When I used to try to hang myself I was just messing around trying to make them care and pay attention. Now it's different ... I went to court yesterday and I thought he was going to send me to adult! Time is running out. My chances are getting fewer and fewer. F---, I give up! I'm done trying. -- Excerpt from Ashley Smith's journal, Sept. 4, 2006 A month later, the 18-year-old was indeed transferred to an adult closed security facility. That's prison, in plain language, despite her youth status. She would be repeatedly Tasered (seven times in 26 days), pepper sprayed, locked down in solitary for 23 hours a day, forcibly medicated and placed in the hideous WRAP restraint: bound head to toe, unable to budge, hockey helmet jammed over her head lest she topple over or try to bite. New Brunswick's Ombudsman and Child and Youth Advocate would later write: "I challenge anyone with a sane mind to live in conditions similar to the ones described ... for half the time Ashley had to endure ..." And: "Surely, there is a better way." If so, not in time to save Ashley Smith, who committed suicide -- whether she actually meant to die or not -- before the review of custodial conditions in N.B., and her own specific case, was completed. On Oct. 18, 2007 -- having been transferred 17 times in the previous 11 1/2 months between three federal penitentiaries, two treatment facilities, two external hospitals and one provincial correctional facility -- the teenager tied a ligature around her neck while on suicide watch at Grand Valley Institution for Women, near Kitchener. Correctional staff, who had been watching, did not intervene for nearly 30 minutes -- and "this failure cost Ms. Smith her life," as stated in a report released last week, "A Preventable Death," by the Correctional Investigator of Canada. In the days after the report was publicized, attention and misgivings were focused on systemic problems, the lack of mental health services for youth -- Ashley was never sent for a formal psychological evaluation while in federal custody -- and poor co-ordination among correctional authorities. But a closer reading of the file, the reviews of her early custodial years in N.B., suggest strongly that, while Ashley was an angry young girl from the age of 12, it was the rigid and punitive correctional system that made her nuts -- despairing, endlessly confrontational and ultimately self-destructive, even as she clearly called out for help with acts of self-harm. In page after page of analysis, she is described as defiant, combative, unyielding to rules, refusing to conform; an obstinate and powerful personality, the proverbial square peg being forced to fit into a round hole, a juvenile iconoclast who fought tooth and nail in hanging on to a personality others deemed "oppositional" and "narcissistic" and "disrespectful." Ashley would probably have been better off if all those who did intervene, who sought to alter her behaviour, so often in cruel ways, had just left the girl alone, said: Go. Fend for yourself. You've heard of "black while driving" or "Muslim while flying" -- externally imposed perceptions that pre-emptively stigmatize, even criminalize, behaviour. Ashley was incorrigible while incarcerated. For complete story, click here.

Group Home Operates Without License--March 10th, 2009--LaVERGNE, Tenn. -- A group home for foster children in LaVergne is known around town as a hot spot for trouble, and the home has been operating for almost a year without a business license...Police said 43 percent of the trouble calls from LaVergne High School was associated with kids at the Rock of Refuge. "We did have some pretty rough kids over at LaVergne High," said Usinger. The LaVergne Records Department said the home's business license expired in June 2008. Usinger denies the home is trying to expand, but issues with the business branching out have been raised. "A lot of questions have been raised," said Boyd. In the large neighborhood, it's hard to tell which houses the Rock of Refuge call home, but neighbors have complained since almost the start of the business... For complete story, click here.

Academy at Ivy Ridge to close this weekend--March 12th, 2009-- The troubled Academy at Ivy Ridge is reportedly closing its doors for good this weekend. The Ogdensburg private academy, which was geared toward troubled teens will close this weekend and transfer the remaining students to a facility in South Carolina, according to the Daily Courier-Observer this morning. For complete story, click here.

Darrington closes doors--March 2nd, 2009--Darrington Academy, a private school for troubled teens in Blue Ridge, closed its doors Friday, a move that owner and headmaster Richard Darrington says is due to the current state of the economy. For complete story, click here.

Hawthorne Cedar Knolls teen accused of sexually abusing another boy on campus--March 16th, 2009-- HAWTHORNE - A 17-year-old boy at Hawthorne Cedar Knolls was accused of sexually abusing a 15-year-boy in his residence Saturday night, three days after five teens there were accused of assaulting a fellow resident, police said. Efrain Castillo, who lives at the residential treatment center for troubled youngsters, was charged with sexual misconduct, unlawful imprisonment and endangering the welfare of a child, misdemeanors, Mount Pleasant Police Chief Louis Alagno said. He is being held on $10,000 bail at the Westchester County jail in Valhalla. The victim was treated at the Westchester Medical Center. For complete story, click here.

Michigan 15-year-old dies after police Taser him--March 22nd, 2009-- BAY CITY, Mich. -- Police in Michigan say a 15-year-old boy has died after being Tasered by officers who were trying to break up a fight. Police didn't release his name and say state police are investigating. A Bay City police news release says officers answered a report of an early morning fight on Sunday. The statement says two males were arguing in an apartment, and one of them "attempted to fight the officers." Police say officers Tasered him, and his reaction led them to immediately call for emergency medical help. He was pronounced dead at Bay Regional Medical Center. Deputy Chief Thomas Pletzke tells WNEM-TV police placed one officer on administrative leave. For complete story, click here.

Clean Slates for Youths Sentenced Fraudulently--March 26th, 2009--The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on Thursday ordered the slate cleaned for hundreds of youths who had been sentenced by a corrupt judge. For complete story, click here.

2 Teens Arrested, County Juvenile Program Under Investigation--March 27th, 2009--PENN HILLS, Pa. -- The arrest of two teens charged with harassment prompts an investigation at the Allegheny County juvenile probation division. Two 17-year-old boys were arrested and charged with harassment after allegedly showing up at a Penn Hills house and threatening another 17-year-old boy. The mother of the threatened boy said she believes that her son was threatened because he blew the whistle on alleged extortion going on in the Homewood Community Intervention Supervision Program. The boy and his mother were not being identified by police with an ongoing investigation into the program. For complete story, click here.

Discerning the difference between sadness and depression and then getting your teen help quickly is key-- April 5th, 2009--Parents of teenagers get accustomed to riding the teeter-totter of their offsprings' emotional highs and lows, but sometimes the moodiness signals a deeper problem. Barbara Deiotte, a social worker at Munster's Wilbur Wright Middle School, has seen an uptick in teenage depression. "My personal thoughts are that today's lifestyle is more stressful -- everything is kind of fast," Deiotte said, referring to possible reasons for the increase. "Or maybe we're more aware (of depression)." With teens, "depression can be a very temporary response" to stress associated with hormones or conflict with parents, she said. "That will come and go. It's normal adolescent angst. Please read complete story, click here.

Do Lap Dances and Humiliation Treat ADHD -- and Should Public Schools Pay?--April 17th, 2009--... Mount Bachelor is part of Aspen Education -- believed to be the largest chain of teen residential programs in the U.S. Aspen, as part of CRC Health, which is owned by Bain Capital, was seen by advocates as much more sedate and less given to wacky practices than clearly "out there" programs like those associated with the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools (WWASP or WWASPS). At one WWASP school, for example, teens were kept in outdoor dog cages. The stories of psychological abuse coming out of Mount Bachelor -- a few of which are included in my Time piece -- are every bit as bad as I have heard from teens and parents at chains of programs that have far worse reputations. For complete story, click here.

Suit claims abuse, filth at juvenile detention center--April 20th, 2009-- CNN) -- Juveniles held in a Mississippi detention center are subject to "horrific physical and mental abuse" at an insect-ridden, filthy facility, alleges a federal lawsuit filed Monday. The suit, filed by the Mississippi Youth Justice Project and Mississippi Protection and Advocacy Inc., accuses staff at the privately-managed Harrison County Juvenile Detention Center of "punitive shacking, staff-on-youth assaults, 23-hour-a-day lock-down in filthy jail cells, unsanitary conditions resulting in widespread contraction of scabies and staph infections, dangerous overcrowding that forces many youth to sleep on the concrete floor, and inadequate mental health care." The facility is operated by Mississippi Security Police, a private security corporation based in Pascagoula, Mississippi. The company is paid $1.6 million yearly by Harrison County to manage the juvenile center, according to the lawsuit, which names the county as a defendant. For complete story, click here.

Broward child's suicide raises questions about medication--April 21st, 2009-- Weeks before his death, Gabriel Myers, the 7-year-old Broward boy who hanged himself in the shower of his foster home, had been prescribed a powerful mind-altering drug linked by federal regulators to an increased risk of suicide in children. In all, Gabriel had been prescribed four psychiatric drugs, two or three of which he was taking at the time of his death, said Jack Moss, Broward chief of the state Department of Children & Families. Moss said he is not sure which medications the boy was taking because Margate police took the foster home's medication log as part of an investigation into Gabriel's death last week. Three of the psychotropic drugs carry U.S. Food and Drug Administration "black box" label warnings for children's safety, the strongest advisory the federal agency issues. Three of the medications are not approved for use with young children, though they are widely prescribed to youngsters "off label" -- meaning doctors can prescribe the drug even if not formally approved for that use. In 2005 -- reacting to a series of stories in The Miami Herald that as many as one in four foster children were prescribed potentially dangerous mind-altering drugs -- state lawmakers approved a law aimed at curbing their use. Children's advocates now question whether the law is being ignored. For complete story, click here.

America's Tough Love Habit--May, 2009--We are, famously, blasé about our acts of torture overseas. But why? The laser-like focus on fixing the economy, wanting to avoid more political divisiveness, the diminishment of watchdog journalism—are all part of the explanation. But there's another overlooked reason as well. Americans tend to valorize tough love—at times, even tough love that verges on torture—in prisons, mental hospitals, drug rehabs, and teen boot camps. We aren't squeamish about the psychological aspects of torture. We might even admire them. Thousands of troubled children, for instance, now attend tough "wilderness programs" "emotional growth boarding schools" and other "tough love" camps where they face conditions like total isolation, sleep deprivation, food deprivation, and daily emotional attacks. For complete story, click here.

Gardasil Linked to Nerve Disorder --Cervical Cancer Vaccine May Raise Risk of Guillain-Barre Syndrome 30 Apr 2009 Girls and women who receive the Gardasil [Gardakill] vaccine to prevent cervical cancer may be at increased risk of a rare but serious disorder of the nervous system [Guillain-Barre syndrome (GBS)] in the first few weeks after getting their shots, researchers report. For complete story, click here.

Government wants the military to run state schools -- Right then, fall into line you 'orrible little pupils! 08 May 2009 The Armed Forces will be drafted in to run state schools under plans to drive up discipline and respect in classrooms. Ministers are in talks with defence chiefs about taking over a handful of schools and turning them into military academies. Alongside daily lessons, pupils would be expected to take part in activities such as drills, uniformed parades, weapons handling and adventure training. For complete story, click here.

Group Home Employee Accused Of Molesting Teens--May 8th, 2009--A Sacramento man who helped troubled teens at a group home is under arrest and accused of molesting girls while on the job. In a place where people are watching your every move, Sacramento County authorities say Jeffrey Caldwell was able to make major inappropriate moves this past February while working at the Sacramento County Assessment Center. For complete story, click here.

State investigating ab slapping of teen boys--May 12th, 2009--A controversial video appears to show a juvenile justice official in Seminole County striking adolescent detainees in their abdomens. But although physical contact between officials and detainees is mostly prohibited, the state Department of Juvenile Justice says the boys may have volunteered for the military-style treatment at the Seminole County Juvenile Detention Center. "There has been speculation that it was used for training purposes," said Frank Penela, a spokesman for the department, who has not yet seen the video. Nonetheless, the department, which has been stung in recent years by the death of one detainee at a boot-camp-style facility and as well as the discovery of a graveyard containing unidentified graves near another, is investigating the incident. For complete story, click here.

Feds end 11-year oversight of Ga. juvenile facilities--May 18th, 2009--Georgia's juvenile justice system has been released from federal oversight, 11 years after the U.S. Justice Department investigated reports of overcrowding and abuse at the state's youth detention facilities, the governor said Monday. For complete story, click here.

Thousands beaten, raped in Irish reform schools--May 20th, 2009--DUBLIN -- A fiercely debated, long-delayed investigation into Ireland's Roman Catholic-run institutions says priests and nuns terrorized thousands of boys and girls in workhouse-style schools for decades — and government inspectors failed to stop the chronic beatings, rapes and humiliation. Nine years in the making, Wednesday's 2,600-page report sides almost completely with the horrific reports of abuse from former students sent to more than 250 church-run, mostly residential institutions. But victims' leaders said it didn't go far enough — particularly because none of their abusers were identified by name. The report concluded that church officials always shielded their orders' pedophiles from arrest to protect their own reputations and, according to documents uncovered in the Vatican, knew that many pedophiles were serial attackers. The investigators said overwhelming, consistent testimony from still-traumatized men and women, now in their 50s to 80s, had demonstrated beyond a doubt that the entire system treated children more like prison inmates and slaves than people with legal rights and human potential. For complete story, click here. (Webmaster note: Switch out Irish for American and you will understand America's teen "help" industry.)

Teacher's aide in Maryland Heights convicted in sex case--May 21st, 2009--A teacher's aide at a school for troubled teens in Maryland Heights was convicted late Wednesday of having sexual contact with two students. Bruce Germany, 55, was convicted on 14 felony counts of sexual contact with a student by a teacher between September 2006 and April 2007. The charges involve two 15-year-old girls who attended Lakeside Center for Troubled Youth at 13044 Marine Drive. For complete story, click here.

Congressional Hearing on Death/Abuse in Schools and Programs Using Physical Restraint--May 19th, 2009-- Click here for the online video from C-Span.

Brianna Turnbull Pleads No Contest--June 1st, 2009--A North Platte woman pled no contest to charges she helped a teenage boy escape from state custody and hide for three months. Two felonies were reduced to misdemeanors against Brianna Turnbull. The 23-year-old pled no contest to charges of attempted violation of custody order; attempted juvenile escape, and contributing to the delinquency of a child. Turnbull is the daughter of a Lincoln County Judge. The case is behind handled by a special prosecutor Charles Brewster of...Turnbull worked at the Salvation Army's Quinn Wilcox house in North Platte when she met Kaden Clark-Guthrie of Trenton. For complete story, click here. For an update on this story, click here.

Juvenile safety feared--June 2nd, 2009--Seven juveniles have attempted suicide at Hinds County's youth detention center since January, according to a report obtained by The Clarion-Ledger. For complete story, click here.

Police recruits to be trained at Tranquility Bay--June 4th, 2009--The Tranquility Bay facility at Treasure Beach which was previously used as an offshore reform school for rebellious children, mostly from the United States, will now be used to train police recruits for at least the next two years. At a meeting Tuesday with Treasure Beach residents and in subsequent response to journalists' questions, Deputy Commissioner of Police in charge of administration, Jevone Bent said training "operations" would begin "somewhere in the middle of the month". The complex sited on two and a half acres of beach front land, referred to by locals as Old Whard, was controversially used for 12 years by the United States group, World Wide Association of Speciality Programmes and Schools (WWASP) as a 'boot camp' for teenagers. It was closed in January. The Jamaica Constabulary Force's two-year lease on the privately-owned facility begun on June 1. For complete story, click here.

'Orwellian language' in schools turns pupils into 'customers', finds damning report 09 Jun 2009 Schools using the 'Orwellian language of performance management' are undermining teenagers' education by turning them into 'customers' rather than students, a landmark report says today. Teachers who are forced to use phrases such as 'performance indicator' and 'curriculum delivery' lack enthusiasm for the job, the six-year investigation found. For complete story, click here.

Former teen counselor gets jail time--June 9th, 2009--A former counselor for troubled teens who was accused of having sex with one of her students has accepted a plea negotiation with prosecutors after turning down a similar deal last year. Cathleen Crowley, 30, of Rye was sent to the Cheshire County jail in Westmoreland for a month as part of the deal that was finalized last week. Crowley withdrew her first guilty plea connected to the student's accusations during a hearing last November in Cheshire County Superior Court. The plea Crowley and her attorney, Gary S. Lenehan of Manchester, first negotiated with prosecutors would have kept her out of jail. Judge Brian T. Tucker was expected to hand down suspended, one-year jail sentences on misdemeanor charges of sexual assault and giving alcohol to a minor. But after hearing the case against Crowley — she was accused of giving the student alcohol and engaging in sex acts with him in her van and a hotel in Keene in 2007 — Tucker said he would reject the deal she made with prosecutors and hand down a six-month jail sentence....The state Division for Children, Youth and Families has substantiated an abuse finding tied to the student's allegations against Crowley, Assistant Cheshire County Attorney John S. Webb said. The finding appears on Crowley's permanent state record and should [but, probably won't] prevent her from working again as a youth counselor or in a similar position, he said. For complete story, click here.

Special Report from VERACARE: How the Pharmaceutical (DRUG) Industry and US Government Promote Chemical Assault of American Children!--June 12th, 2009--This has been a grim week for anyone who cares about the precautionary principle guiding civilized medicine and the welfare of children. If anything, the Obama administration seems to be pushing the radical pharmacological envelope even further than the Bush administration---at the very least, nothing has changed for the better in the government-assisted determined push to control / engineer America's children. On Wednesday, an FDA advisory committee gave the FDA a green light to expand the marketing license of three toxic antipsychotic drugs--Seroquel, Geodon, and Zyprexa--for use in children. Such approval gives manufacturers a shield from liability--for illegally promoting the drugs for off-label use. And such approval ensures increased use of these drugs. Manufacturers and mental health providers will profit while children's physical and mental health will be sacrificed. These drugs pose severely disabling, potentially lethal hazards--including diabetes, metabolic syndrome, cardiovascular disease. The body of evidence showing these drugs to be harmful is irrefutable: it is documented in FDA's postmarketing database, and in secret internal company documents uncovered during litigation. Did the FDA provide the advisory panel members with the evidence? And if not, why not? See, Evelyn Pringle's report, "FDA Throws Lifeline to Antipsychotic Pushers"

<http://www.counterpunch.org/pringle06122009.html> An article in TIME magazine

http://www.time.com/time/specials/packages/article/0,28804,1903873_1903871_1_903857,00.html gives credence to a not yet released report commissioned under the Bush Administration by a panel convened by the National Academies of Science. The report, "Preventing Mental, Emotional, and Behavioral Disorders Among Young People: Progress and Possibilities" (2009) re-iterates the earlier national mental health policy directive under President Bush: The President's New Freedom Commission on Mental Health (2002)--which promoted universal mental screening and the expanded use of patented psychoactive drugs (those listed in industry-initiated, TMAP algorithm prescription guides). See the report brief to policymakers issued, March 2009: http://www.bocvf.org/prevention_policymakers_brief.pdf The NAS report also recommends aggressive screening and pharmacologic intervention with toxic psychoactive drugs for children. The provocative, unsubstantiated premise is that mental illness can be detected through genetic screening--a la eugenics rationale--and that they can be prevented. "Hundreds of studies that have appeared in just the past decade collectively suggest that the brain isn't so different from, say, the arm: it doesn't simply break on its own. In fact, many mental illnesses - even those like schizophrenia that have demonstrable genetic origins - can be stopped or at least contained before they start." "This isn't wishful thinking but hard science." If the consequences of psychiatry's delusions weren't so serious, that statement is laughable. As every real medical scientist knows, psychiatry lacks even the rudimentary objective, scientifically verifiable tools of science, much less, "hard science." The TIME reporter is impressed with NAS report weight in pagination: "a 500-page report, nearly two years in the making, on how to prevent mental, emotional and behavioral disorders." "The [NAS] report concludes that pre-empting such disorders requires two kinds of interventions: first, because genes play so important a role in mental illness, we need to ensure that close relatives (particularly children) of those with mental disorders have access to rigorous screening programs. Second, we must offer treatment to people who have already shown symptoms of illness (say, a tendency to brood and see the world without optimism) but don't meet the diagnostic criteria for a full-scale mental illness (in this case, depression)....." According to TIME, the authors of the NAS report recognize but rationalize the reality that mental screens will mislabel healthy individuals as mentally ill: "Early-detection programs will identify as candidates for mental illness some people who are merely persnickety or shy or eccentric." Indeed, a responsible reason NOT to screen is the high false-positive rate of mental screens. For example, the false-positive rate of TeenScreen, the mental health dragnet of school children, is as high as 84%. TIME reports that the invalid screening tools did not deter the NAS authors from recommending mental screening—even acknowledging that those mislabeled may be prescribed toxic antidepressants and/or antipsychotics: "Some prevention programs even prescribe psychiatric medications, including antipsychotics and antidepressants, to people who aren't technically psychotic or depressed....But those who contributed to the National Academies report say preventing the suffering of people with mental illness is worth the risk of some false positives, partly because of the enormous cost of treating mental illness after it's struck." The NAS report is available online in its unedited version—it has not yet been released. http://www.nap.edu/catalog.php?record_id=12480

ADHD Drugs Linked to Sudden Death--June 15th, 2009--On that morning, the 54-year-old mother of two living in McAllen, Texas, was preparing to take her eldest son to school. She had an early appointment, so her husband, Rick Hohmann, would be dropping off younger son, 14-year-old Matthew, at his school that day. About a month earlier, Matthew had been diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, or ADHD. And like an estimated 2.5 million other children in the United States, he was taking medication for the condition. It was Ann Hohmann who gave Matthew his Adderall XR pill that morning with a glass of water. But it was her husband who later found him after he had collapsed on the bathroom floor. "To me, he seemed fine," she recalled. "My husband had seen him walking around, brushing his teeth. Then he walked in and found him flat down on the floor in the bathroom. "When he turned him over, his lips were blue," Hohmann said. She said that her husband called her first, and then he called 911. He performed CPR until the ambulance arrived. But it was too late. "They worked on him for a while, but he was dead," she said. For complete story, click here.

Are Troubled Teens Tortured?--June 23rd, 2009--Yesterday, we brought you the story of Matthew Meyer, a troubled teen who died at a wilderness camp. Today, we bring you the story of Nick Gaglia. Gina Kaysen Fernandes: Imagine a world where your child is locked away for years, spending days at a time in a windowless room. Communication is shut off and you have no way of knowing about their treatment, which may include being physically restrained for hours on end. This horrifying scenario isn't prison -- it's a voluntary program aimed at treating troubled teenagers. It's a place where Nick Gaglia spent two and a half years, because "my life was spinning out of control." The residential treatment program known as "Kids of North Jersey" in Secaucus, New Jersey, "seemed like a great fit," says Nick, who was abusing drugs and alcohol at the age of 13. Nick's parents saw advertisements for the program on television and soon enrolled their son. They hoped professionals would get Nick clean and sober so he could put his life back on track. But instead of giving Nick the coping skills he'd need in the outside world, he became a prisoner subjected to verbal abuse, psychological torment, and physical restraint. "I would call it torture and abuse," says Nick, who shared his harrowing ordeal with momlogie. For complete story, click here.

Can Wilderness Camps Kill Your Kid?--June 22nd, 2009--It's an industry that preys on desperation. If your teenager has emotional issues, abuses drugs, or is promiscuous, help is just a phone call away. Wilderness intervention programs promise to "fix" bad behavior by teaching your child life skills and building self-esteem. These facilities offer a beacon of hope for parents like Crystal Manganaro, who sent her son, Matthew, to a wilderness camp outside of Houston. But what Crystal didn't realize was that the camp she entrusted with her son's life would so carelessly take it away. For complete story, click here.

Supreme Court Says Child's Rights Violated by Strip Search--But if the student had been suspected of having illegal drugs that could have posed a far greater danger to herself and other students, the strip search might have been justified, the majority said. 26 Jun 2009 In a ruling of interest to educators, parents and students across the country, the Supreme Court ruled, 8 to 1, on Thursday that the strip search of a 13-year-old Arizona girl by school officials who were looking for prescription-strength drugs violated her constitutional rights. The officials in Safford, Ariz., would have been justified in 2003 had they limited their search to the backpack and outer clothing of Savana Redding, who was in the eighth grade at the time, the court ruled. For complete story, click here.

Miss. juvenile detention case near end--June 26th, 2009--A preliminary agreement has been reached in a federal lawsuit that claims youth were abused at a south Mississippi juvenile detention center and forced to live in squalid conditions. For complete story, click here.

One teen runaway found, two missing--July 9th, 2009--Update on three runaways who escaped abusive wilderness program...A national organization is pleading for information about a 15-year-old girl missing from McDowell for more than a year. In separate cases, sheriff's deputies have located one of two teenage runaways for whom they've been searching. The other one hasn't been spotted. As part of its ongoing search, the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children is again asking for the public's help in locating Diana Hernandez Yanez, 15, of Yancey Street in Marion. She was 14 when she left her home on July 21, 2008. Neighbors told police that they saw her get into a red pickup truck that morning. Friends say the truck, a red 2000 Chevrolet S-10 low-rider pickup, belonged to 19-year-old Andres Velasquez Tinoco of Coxes Creek Road, whom Diana reportedly met just a couple of weeks prior to her disappearance. For complete story, click here.

LDS seminary principal in court, hands over evidence--July 13th, 2009--PROVO — Officers came to court Monday morning prepared to re-arrest a former LDS seminary principal accused of sexual misconduct with a 16-year-old student. Michael J. Pratt, 37, the former principal at Lone Peak High School's LDS seminary program, was arrested Thursday on numerous allegations, but was bailed out on $20,000 cash-only bail at 3:37 a.m. Saturday. "Look," an emotional Pratt told the media upon exiting the courtroom. "I am hopeful that the truth will be fully presented at the appropriate time." Officers from the Utah County Special Victims Task Force came to 4th District Court Monday for Pratt's review of bail hearing to express concern that Pratt may have been tampering with evidence on his laptop computer. Prosecutor Guy Probert told Judge Steven Hansen that there were some "evidentiary questions" relating to the laptop, which had been sent out of the area with Pratt's family after the allegations surfaced. It is believed that the computer belongs to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, but Probert could not officially confirm that. "The laptop is being returned by mail. A copy of the hard drive is being produced today," Probert said. For complete story, click here. For story update, click here. (Webmaster note: Don't send your kid to Utah!)

Detroit Public Schools moves closer to bankruptcy and privatization By Walter Gilberti 16 July 2009 Detroit teachers and schools employees are in danger of having their jobs, wages and benefits sacrificed in the interest of an anti-public schools agenda driven by Emergency Financial Manager Robert Bobb and the Obama administration. In a two-pronged attack on the continued existence of public schools in Detroit, Bobb has hired four private professional education management firms to oversee instruction at 17 Detroit high schools, while, at the same time, ratcheting up his earlier threat to institute bankruptcy proceedings. For complete story, click here.

The APA's Nuremberg Defense By Scott Horton 20 Jul 2009 ...[T]he disclosures surrounding the waterboarding of Abu Zubaida give further proof that beginning in 2002, healthcare professionals, specifically psychologists, played an essential role at every stage in the development and application of torture techniques. The failure of professional organizations, and specifically the American Psychological Association, to acknowledge this and take appropriate countermeasures is disturbing...Professional oversight bodies have engaged in consistent evasion, and now the APA is focused on the relaxation of its ethics standards to provide defenses for psychologists who joined in the Bush Administration's torture program. For complete story, click here. (Webmaster Note: Behavior Modification Programs for Teens Are Experiments In Torture.)

Court: Keep cleared juveniles' files--July 23rd, 2009--ALLENTOWN - The Pennsylvania Supreme Court yesterday ordered the preservation of court records of juveniles who are suing a corrupt Luzerne County Court judge. Previously, when it overturned the convictions of youths who appeared in former Judge Mark Ciavarella's courtroom, the court said the records should be destroyed, prompting complaints from attorneys for the juveniles. The attorneys said loss of the records could imperil the youths' ability to recover damages from the judge and others implicated in the corruption scandal. For complete story, click here. (For an update on this story, click here, here or here.)

Report alleges multiple problems at Hinds juvenile facility--July 24th, 2009--Unreported suicide attempts, poor staff relations and failure to provide timely mental health evaluations continue at Hinds County's Henley- Young Juvenile Detention Center, according to a state inspection report. The state Juvenile Facilities Monitoring Unit inspected the detention center on June 23 and gave its report to the county July 22. Juvenile Facilities Monitoring Unit Director Donald Beard and Henley- Young's detention director Darren Farr did not return calls. The report, obtained by The Clarion-Ledger, makes 14

recommendations. It's unclear what could happen to the center if it doesn't follow them, but county officials say they plan to. "A crucial step in recognizing problems associated with a juvenile's behavior is a mental health evaluation," the report states. The inspection came after Hinds supervisors learned that seven juveniles have attempted suicide at the center since January. In one case, a girl was found with several socks tied around her neck. In another, a boy repeatedly hit his head on the door of his cell. Detention center staff never reported the cases to the county or state, which must be done immediately, according to the most recent report. For complete story, click here. (Webmaster note: This is what happens at a "regulated" and state-run facility that has safeguards in place to prevent violations and harm to youth. Now, take away the "regulation" and government oversight and what kind of abuses and violations do you think are probable? The unimaginable happens to youth every day in behavior modification programs throughout the United States. Keep your children at home.)

ADHD Drugs Linked to Sudden Death in Kids--Received July 25th, 2009 (Article: June 15th, 2009)--MONDAY, June 15 (HealthDay News) -- Stimulant medications commonly prescribed to treat attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) are associated with an increased risk of sudden death, but those deaths are still rare, new research finds. For complete story, click here.

Deadly Restraint & Seclusion--SILENT VICTIMS--July 21st, 2009

Click here for complete article from www.ktnv.com.

Chinese Youth Beaten to Death at "net addiction" "boot camp"--August 4th, 2009-- China's anti-internet addiction industry has claimed another victim, after supervisors at a rehabilitation camp allegedly beat a 16 year old inmate to death. Deng Senshan had been sent to Guangxi Qihuang Survival Training Camp to "cure" him of his internet addiction, the AFP reports. His parents were paying $1000 for the treatment. However, the youth ended up in solitary confinement shortly after arriving at the establishment, and was subsequently beaten to death by supervisors for "running too slowly", according to the news agency. For complete story, click here.

Teen sent to PEC home--August 10th, 2009--The grandmother of a teenaged boy being housed at a youth residential treatment facility in Prince Edward County, wants to know why he can't be treated closer to home. The 14-year-old Cole Harbour boy, who was the subject of a recent Supreme Court of Nova Scotia case regarding his care, suffers from attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, and related behavioural problems. He was recently enrolled at the Bayfield Treatment Centre in Consecon by the Nova Scotia Department of Community Services. His grandmother -- who cannot be named in order to protect the boy's identity -- told The Intelligencer she wanted the boy to get help, but did not expect him to be moved out of the province. "All we did was ask for help, not for him to be shipped away," she said. She said she and her husband asked Community Services for help with the boy, whom she admits suffers from considerable behavioural issues, last year. As reported by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, Community Services originally made arrangements for the boy's treatment at a facility in Utah after the Nova Scotia Supreme Court ruled it was permissible to send him there for treatment unavailable in his home province. However, after arrangements at both Cinnamon Hills Youth Crisis Centre and Provo Canyon School fell through, the boy was moved to Bayfield - a decision Patrick Eagan, the family's lawyer, says shows a definite motive. "It's just somewhere to shove this kid," he said. For complete story, click here.

DNA database has 300 children added a day 11 Aug 2009 More than 300 children a day are being put on to the DNA database fuelling fresh fears over the growth of the "Big Brother" state. Almost 1.1 million youngsters aged between ten and 17 have had their profiles recorded by the police since 2000, with a large proportion aged under 15, the Daily Telegraph can disclose. And around one in six are likely to have never been convicted of any crime. For complete story, click here.

One third of all children in jails are 'wrongly imprisoned' 13 Aug 2009 More than a third of children sent to prison last year were wrongly jailed, a report into child custody rates says. The study by Barnardo's found that the Government had breached its own guidance on child custody by allowing so many 12-, 13- and 14-year-olds to be imprisoned for a non-serious offences. For complete story, click here.

Woman sues state over sexual assault--August 18th, 2009--A 19-year-old who was sexually assaulted by a guard at a state juvenile-detention center last year has filed a lawsuit claiming the state failed to properly supervise the guard or protect her from his advances. In a lawsuit filed in King County Superior Court last month, the young woman's attorneys claim the state failed to properly train and supervise the on-call temporary guard at Echo Glen Children's Center or to fully investigate previous complaints about him. The guard, 39-year-old Robert H. Fox, pleaded guilty in February to first-degree custodial sexual misconduct in connection with the assault, according to court documents. He now is serving an eight-month sentence in the King County Jail. For complete story, click here.

NEA Attacks Administration's Education Reform Plan 21 Aug 2009 The nation's largest teachers union sharply attacked President Obama's most significant school improvement initiative on Friday evening, saying that it puts too much emphasis on a "narrow agenda" centered on charter schools and echoes the Bush administration's "top-down approach" to reform. The National Education Association's criticism of Obama's $4.35 billion "Race to the Top" initiative came nearly a month after the president unveiled the competitive grant program... For complete story, click here. (No charter schools. Improve Public Education!!!)

Payout over teen's boot camp tragedy--August 24th, 2009--The parents of a teenager beaten to death by staff at a boot camp in Hubei Province this month have been awarded 350,000 yuan (US$51,000) in compensation. The money, which will be paid by a local education bureau, comes less than three weeks after Yao Jian, 14, died on an outward-bound training program intended to boost his confidence. "The money will not ease the agony of losing our son," his father Yao Jun, 37, told China Daily yesterday. "We can only hope this tragedy will ring alarm for parents and the government to avoid such incidents." For complete story, click here. (Webmaster Note: Really? China is better at swift action than the US? What's up with that?! Strengthen and Pass HR 911 already.)

NY detention system faulted in juveniles' injuries--August 24th, 2009--ALBANY, N.Y. — Workers at four youth detention centers in New York caused dozens of serious injuries, including broken bones and teeth, when they routinely used force as a primary way to restrain juveniles and not just as a last resort, according to federal investigators. The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division also reported that youths in the state system failed to get needed counseling and mental health treatment, though most have psychological problems. The findings released Monday were the result of a nearly two-year probe. Gladys

Carrión, commissioner of the state Office of Children and Family Services, said they have begun overhauling the troubled system she took over 18 months ago, including a new restraint policy and hiring more mental health workers. "Much more still needs to be done," she said. Investigators said conditions they found last year at the Lansing and Louis Gossett Jr. residential centers outside Ithaca and the Tryon residential centers for boys and girls in Johnstown violated the teens' constitutional rights as well as department policy. For complete story, click here.

'All God's Children': Exposing the abuses of children of missionaries--August 25th, 2009--Marilyn Shellrude Christman of Seattle was only 7 years old when she was sent to a boarding school for children of missionaries in Guinea, West Africa, in 1961. For eight years, in the remote, isolated school, she says, she was emotionally and spiritually abused. At times, she was also physically and sexually abused — in some cases by a man who served as a dorm parent there, she said. It wasn't until decades later that she realized she hadn't been the only abused child at Mamou Alliance Academy, a now-closed boarding school run by the Christian and Missionary Alliance (C&MA), an evangelical Protestant denomination. For complete story, click here.

Zoning board votes against home for troubled teens--August 26th, 2009-- Jeff Deerr does not want a group home for troubled teens in his neighborhood. "I am definitely opposed to the idea," he said. "I go to work and I come home after working an eight-hour day and I have a peaceful neighborhood. I don't believe that doing something like this is right." Deerr was among more than 25 residents from the Vinton Heights subdivision who sat in an Area Board of Zoning Appeals meeting Wednesday night for nearly four hours to speak out against proposed home. The group home, proposed by Seeds of Hope Community Ministries, was slated to operate out of a residence at 2012 Valdez Drive in Lafayette if approved. But the Board of Zoning Appeals voted 6-1 against the proposal, which led to a sea of cheers from residents in attendance. For complete story, click here.

Caging Children--August 28th, 2009--Children under the age of 18 can't vote, serve as jurors, or join Blockbuster, but in the U.S. — the only developed nation with such a policy — they can be tried in adult courts and imprisoned in facilities designed for adults. A groundbreaking study from the University of Texas' LBJ School of Public Affairs could kick-start a national discussion about the foolishness of that policy. The report, "From Time Out to Hard Time: Young Children in the Adult Criminal Justice System," was compiled by Michele Deitch, an adjunct professor at the LBJ School, and her students. Its roots were tragic: Deitch and her group worked with the UT Law School Supreme Court Clinic on the case of Christopher Pittman, who, at age 12, was charged with killing his grandparents. He received a 30-year sentence — the mandatory minimum in South Carolina. After the Supreme Court rejected his appeal, Deitch explained, "we were sitting on a ton of research that we had done, so we thought it was vital to get it out there." For complete story, click here.

Gay reparative therapy isn't advisable, says APA--August 31, 2009--The American Psychological Association has finally confirmed what MySpace Zach and his supporters knew back in 2005 — gay reparative therapies don't work. In an update to a 1997 resolution "Appropriate Therapeutic Responses to Sexual Orientation," the APA now advises that mental health professionals should avoid telling clients that they can change their sexual orientation through therapy or other treatments. "Contrary to claims of sexual orientation change advocates and practitioners, there is insufficient evidence to support the use of psychological interventions to change sexual orientation," said Judith M. Glassgold, PsyD, chair of the task force which examined the efficacy of so-called reparative therapy. APA appointed the six-member Task Force on Appropriate Therapeutic Responses to Sexual Orientation in 2007 to review and update APA's 1997 resolution, "Appropriate Therapeutic Responses to Sexual Orientation," and to generate a report. APA was concerned about ongoing efforts to promote the notion that sexual orientation can be changed through psychotherapy or approaches that mischaracterize homosexuality as a mental disorder. The task force examined the peer-reviewed journal articles in English from 1960 to 2007, which included 83 studies. Most of the studies were conducted before 1978, and only a few had been conducted in the last 10 years. The group also reviewed the recent literature on the psychology of sexual orientation. "Unfortunately, much of the research in the area of sexual orientation change contains serious design flaws," Glassgold said. "Few studies could be considered methodologically sound and none systematically evaluated potential harms." Looking back at Zach Stark was for many the face of the vulnerable, oppressed gay teen. Stark, then 16 and living in Bartlett, Tenn., chronicled his coming-out story in his MySpace blog. He detailed his parents' unfavorable reaction and wrote, "Today, my mother, father and I had a very long 'talk' in my room, where they let me know I am to apply for a fundamentalist Christian program for gays." It would take place at Refuge, a youth program of Love in Action International, a Memphis group that runs a religion-based program intended to change the sexual orientation of gay men and women. As mandated by Refuge, Stark's blog posts stopped the day he entered the facility, but debate and outrage over such programs did not. A New York Times story published July 17, 2005, shortly after Stark entered Refuge, brought the matter to the forefront of the mainstream media with the headline "Gay Teenager Stirs a Storm." In that story, former teacher and GLSEN Executive Director Kevin Jennings told the New York Times, "All reputable health and education professional organizations have clearly and unequivocally denounced this 'treatment' as quackery." Closer to home, young people from the area organized a protest outside the Love In Action facility soon after the Stark was admitted to the program. As days passed, the group's numbers swelled as the teens were joined by a wide range of people from the community forming what they called the Queer Action Coalition (QAC), concerned about Stark's mental health after reading his ominous blog posts. "It's like boot camp," Stark wrote before entering the facility. "If I do come out straight, I'll be so mentally unstable and depressed it won't matter." For complete story, click here.

3 charged in Ohio in teen's restraint death--September 2nd, 2009--COLUMBUS, Ohio — Three former employees of a Cleveland residential center for troubled teenagers were indicted Wednesday in the death of a 17-year-old girl who choked on vomit and suffocated after she was restrained face down, a control technique the governor has since banned. Cynthia King, 32, of Warrensville Heights, Lazarita Menendez, 28, of Bedford Heights and Ebony Ray, 33, of Broadview Heights were indicted in Cuyahoga County on involuntary manslaughter and child-endangering charges in the death of Faith Finley at the Parmadale Family Services center in Parma. For complete story, click here.

Real life horrors revealed in Boot Camp--September 5th, 2009--The most disturbing aspect of Christian Duguay's Boot Camp is the fact that places such as that depicted actually exist. Places that promise rehabilitation for troubled youths that are nothing more than entities of torture that do more damage than good. For complete story, click here.

I'm OK, but you're not--September 16th, 2009--So you have a troubled or problem teen. Let me guess, they come home from school and virtually lock themselves away in their bedroom. If they do come and join the family, they are plugged into their MP3 player or PSP. You actually have to demand putting the electronics away when at the dinner table; that is if they even join you for dinner. It's a pretty common problem; I'd venture to say across Western society. Let's think back — when I was a teen, I'd plug into the cassette player with earphones on (I'm old enough that CD's were not around). Once I was driving, I'd not even come home — I'd go driving. I was usually busy enough after school with work and theatre that there were some weeks I'd barely see my parents. Was I a problem or troubled child? My parents probably thought so, but guess who I thought had the problem? It's not any different today. Oh, the script may have changed some, the technology and access to information has drastically changed, but how we communicate (or lack of communication) remains the same. I'm curious though, have you ever asked your teen why they stay away from the family so much? Some of this is natural child development for certain, but choosing to stay home to study instead of joining the family for a 'night out bowling' is something else. Yes, our teen can be defiant; sometimes it's what they do best. But every now and then, we must remember to turn that magnifying glass away from them and onto ourselves. What are we doing to drive wedges into that gap? If we don't know then we need to ask. So many teens feel they cannot talk to their parents, when in reality that is what everyone, both teens and parents, really want! For complete story, click here.

Don't forget detainees at home--September 21st, 2009--Torture is wrong. Our nation believes this, and we are concerned about torture tactics used on detainees, as we should be. Shouldn't we also be concerned about abusive tactics used on our own population, particularly our children? The Aug. 25 Ithaca Journal article headlined, "Staff severely injured youths," describes a U.S. Justice Department report that found staff at two juvenile-detention facilities in Tompkins County used excessive force in controlling some of their residents. Some might argue that the staff behavior is not torture, but if the results are injuries and even death, what name should we give it? We put them in detention centers in the hopes that they will reform themselves and become positive, productive citizens. How can they learn to behave in a peaceful manner when they are treated with violence? Get-tough, boot-camp programs purport to help troubled teens, but they don't work. A review of the scientific evidence by the National Institutes of Health found that programs using fear and tough treatment are ineffective and may make teen criminal behavior even worse. For complete story, click here.

Former Boys Ranch resident sues Sedgwick County--September 23rd, 2009--A former Boys Ranch resident has sued Sedgwick County, alleging it failed to protect him from being raped while he lived at the home for troubled teens in late 2004. The plaintiff — who is 19 now and was 14 at the time he says he was raped — filed a lawsuit in June in state district court that has been moved to federal court in Wichita. For complete story, click here.

Community meeting tonight on youth home in Craney Island Farms--September 24th, 2009-- Residents in a Hanover County neighborhood are concerned about a home for troubled teens in their subdivision. A community meeting is scheduled for tonight to address issues raised by those who live near Healthy Solutions, a foster home for four at-risk males ages 12 to 17 that opened this summer on Cudlipp Avenue in the Craney Island Farms community off U.S. 301. The meeting will start at 7 p.m. at Cool Spring Baptist Church. Craney Island Farms resident David Liggan, who lives off Cudlipp Avenue, said he's concerned about a business operating in a residential area. "We were never notified . . . or asked our opinion about the facility going into our area," Liggan said, referring to the home that provides 24-hour adult supervision and counseling services to teens who have behavioral issues. Peggy Nicholls, who lives on Cudlipp Avenue, said the county should have alerted homeowners if a business was going in on their street. "I feel like the wool was pulled over our eyes," she said. For complete story, click here.

Troubled teens playing it for laughs in comedy class--September 26th, 2009--NATIONAL CITY — Drugs, violence, teen pregnancy and incarceration — not exactly the stuff of punch lines and laugh tracks. Unless it's the teens telling the jokes. And the material is coming from their own experiences. San Diego County high school students who struggle to cope with these issues are confronting them head-on in an unlikely stand-up-comedy class that also serves as therapy of sorts. Paid for with $6,500 in federal stimulus money, this new course was designed for students who are interested in the entertainment industry. But it has also helped teenagers face their demons and relate to classmates at the county Office of Education community school in National City. For complete story, click here.

"Out of the Mouths of Babes: False Confessions and the Wrongful Convictions of Youth"--Also see: <http://progressillinois.com/node/7229>

Teen tamers need to get real--October 4th, 2009-- TELEVISION programs claiming to tame toddlers and troubled teens may do more harm than good, parenting experts have warned. The families of Australian teenagers who appeared in World's Strictest Parents on Channel Seven — in which the teens were sent overseas for a week to learn discipline from strict parents — said the program helped turn their lives around. But the methods used have been questioned since the final episode, aired last week, revealed how the teens have fared since going home. Serial runaway Jono Denny, 16, was sent to South Africa to live with Portia Bethe and her family. After returning to his home at Ballina on the North Coast he re-enrolled in high school and behaved himself for six weeks. Then he was arrested after a night of heavy drinking. He was released after being cautioned. Psychologist Michael Carr-Gregg said World's Strictest Parents, Brat Camp and Supernanny offered unrealistic solutions to behavioural problems. "I would prefer to see programs which are more instructive," he said. "Obviously, no one is going to send their teenager off to a different country for a week to teach them a few life lessons. It's just not practical or realistic." Mr Carr-Gregg said his research showed 80 per cent of parents lack confidence in their ability to raise their children. World's Strictest Parents drew more than 1 million viewers a week. He said most child psychologists would not recommend the strict discipline promoted on the show. "What I would like to see from these shows is a focus on authoritative parenting rather than authoritarian parenting," he said. "The problem is that authoritative parenting — which teaches parents about creating boundaries, negotiating skills and so on — does not make very exciting television. "Authoritarian parenting, with a focus on strict discipline and punishment, is more likely to create fireworks." A parenting guide author and chairwoman of Early Childhood Australia's publications committee, Pam Linke, said the programs provided a simplistic view of managing behavioural problems. "The families being filmed would have to be influenced by the fact that there is a camera on them." "It's not a realistic approach to solving behavioural problems with children. There is no instruction about how these parenting models would work in real life." For complete story, click here. (Webmaster Note: Abusive programs have regularly been featured and promoted by US television programs. Including the deadly SageWalk, an Aspen Education Group program that recently voluntarily relinquished their license to Oregon authorities after another death at the program, was used as a setting for "Brat Camp" on ABC. Dr. Phil McGraw has repeatedly placed children in Aspen Education Group programs as well as Provo Canyon School. Other talk show icons have placed children in the notoriously abusive and internationally criminalized WWASPS programs. Turn off your TV and think for yourself, please.)

Teenage girl left brain-damaged after receiving cervical cancer jab 05 Oct 2009 A teenage girl has been left brain-damaged after suffering epileptic seizures just days after being given the controversial cervical cancer jab. Stacey Jones, 18, suffered her first seizure in March when she was 17, days after she had the Cervarix injection. In the following weeks she had several more fits, causing such severe brain injury that she had to be admitted to a rehabilitation unit, where she is relearning simple tasks. For complete story, click here.

Six-year-old Suspended for Bringing Cub Scout Tool to School--October 13th, 2009-- Our authorities may not be able to track down Osama bin laden, but never fear, they're keeping us safe from budding little terrorists such as first grader Zachary Christie. Caught red-handed, the Newark, Delaware, six-year-old was suspended from his school and may face 45 days in reform school for violating the Christina School District's "zero tolerance" policy on weapons. His offense? Bringing a camping utensil set to school. The "weapon" in question is a "hobo tool" the first grader had received after recently joining the Cub Scouts; it contains a fork, spoon, and knife. Zachary was so excited about his new acquisition — as any normal boy would be — that he brought it to school to use during lunch period. School officials then suspended him, saying they have no choice because the district's code of conduct prohibits the possession of knives "regardless of the possessor's intent." Unfortunately, little Zachary's story is a common one today, with well-meaning students being subjected to disproportionate punishment across the nation in the name of zero tolerance. Writing about Zachary's case in the New York Times, Ian Urbina provides one of these other examples, that of a third-grade girl who "was expelled for a year because her grandmother had sent a birthday cake to school, along with a knife to cut it. The teacher called the principal — but not before using the knife to cut and serve the cake." For complete story, click here.

Roswell teacher charged in teen contact--October 14th, 2009--[Roswell, NM Youth ChalleNGe Academy] ROSWELL, N.M. (KRQE/KBIM) - A Roswell teacher accused of making sexual advances to a teen he was mentoring is out of jail but not back at work. James Ogas, 38, faced a judge for the first time Wednesday charged with two counts of criminal sexual contact of a minor. The charges are 3rd-degree felonies. Investigators say the alleged contact happened inside the automotive shop at Eastern New Mexico University- Roswell where Ogas is a part-time automotive-technician teacher. According to court documents, twice last month Ogas inappropriately touched the 17-year-old who was part of a program for troubled teens sponsored by the New Mexico National Guard. Investigators said along with the touching, Ogas frequently wrote the teen letters, which were described as sexually suggestive. For complete story, click here.

Troubled teens buckle under weight of jibes--October 20th, 2009--Teenagers who are told they are too thin or too fat by their parents - even if the comments are well- intentioned - suffer headaches, feel stress or get depressed more than those who are not, a study has found. For complete story, click here.

Teen's parents settle abuse case--October 26th, 2009--GONZALES — The parents of a Prairieville teenager who allege he suffered abuse and related temporary kidney failure at a Louisiana National Guard Youth Challenge facility last year have reached a $95,000 out-of-court settlement with the state of Louisiana, the teen's attorney said. For complete story, click here.

Troubled teens on powerful drugs--October 28th, 2009--Has your teen's best friend just transformed from Taylor Swift to Rosie O'Donnell overnight? She might just have ADHD. A study published today in the Journal of the American Medical Association says second-generation anti-psychotics like Risperdal, Abilify, Zyprexa and Seroquel are being given to teens with common conditions like ADHD, leading to obesity in just 11 weeks. The side-effects common to these drugs may be worse in kids and teens than adults, the study concludes. For complete story, click here.

Group sues Idaho county over teen treatment center--BOISE, Idaho (AP) - A company that pushed to build a residential treatment center for troubled teens in rural western Idaho is suing Boise County in federal court, saying commissioners violated the Fair Housing Act when they scuttled the center's proposal amid staunch local opposition. Development firm Oaas-Laney sought approval in 2007 to build Alamar Ranch, a 72-bed facility that would have treated teens with behavioral problems or addictions. But neighbors fought to keep the ranch from being built, citing traffic, fire and safety concerns and even holding a fundraising event featuring a local folk singer, according to the lawsuit. Boise County eventually approved the project, but under conditions that Alamar Ranch officials said were arbitrary, discriminatory and made the project financially impossible. Boise County maintains the decision was based on legitimate government interests. For complete story, click here.

Superjail for youth raises troubling questions--November 9th, 2009--Troubled teens promised cutting-edge treatment at Ontario's new $93 million superjail for youth have instead been deprived of food, denied programming and subjected to questionable body cavity searches, according to a review by a senior provincial official. Irwin Elman, Ontario's advocate for children and youth, is investigating cases of excessive force used by some staff at Roy McMurtry Youth Centre in Brampton, which holds 102 male and female youths, 90 of whom are still awaiting trial. Police are looking into at least one of these incidents, he said. What's more, despite the centre's much-publicized commitment to "state-of-the-art" programming – a proven tool in preventing young people from becoming repeat offenders – it simply doesn't exist, he said. For complete story, click here.

DEATH ROW SERIAL MOLESTER CONNECTED TO CEDU--November 12th, 2009--California Department of Justice (DOJ) investigators are researching the possibility that serial child molester and child murderer, James Lee Crummel, 65 of San Quentin State Prison, had years of free, unsupervised access to the students at the now defunct CEDU School in Running Springs. The CEDU schools in Running Springs were founded by Mel Wasserman in 1967 and promoted itself as an emotional growth-boarding school for troubled youths. Monthly costs to board a student reportedly ran as high as $3,500 dollar a month. The school closed its doors in 2005 amidst allegations of financial improprieties, allegations of sexual and physical abuse of the students, by other students and staff members and citations issued by the State of California for various violations. At a non-compliance conference, CEDU officials reportedly admitted that the rights of students under their care were systematically violated. For complete story, click here.

American Youth in the 21st Century: Pathologized, Criminalized and Disposable--November 16th, 2009-- Punishment and fear have replaced compassion and social responsibility as the most important modalities mediating the relationship of youth to the larger social order. Youth within the last two decades have come to be seen as a source of trouble rather than as a resource for investing in the future, and in the case of poor black and Hispanic youth are increasingly treated as either a disposable population, cannon fodder for barbaric wars abroad, or the source of most of society's problems. Hence, young people now constitute a crisis that has less to do with improving the future than with denying it. As Larry Grossberg points out, "It has become common to think of kids as a threat to the existing social order and for kids to be blamed for the problems they experience. We slide from kids in trouble, kids have problems, and kids are threatened, to kids as trouble, kids as problems, and kids as threatening." This was exemplified when the columnist Bob Herbert reported in the New York Times that "parts of New York City are like a police state for young men, women, and children who happen to be black or Hispanic. They are routinely stopped, searched, harassed, intimidated, humiliated and, in many cases, arrested for no good reason." No longer "viewed as a privileged sign and embodiment of the future," youth are now increasingly demonized by the popular media and derided by politicians looking for quick-fix solutions to crime and other social ills. While youth have always had to bear the misplaced fear and distrust of adults, how youth are represented, talked about, and treated has changed dramatically in the last two decades. For complete story, click here.

Court upholds ruling against home for troubled teens--November 21st, 2009--YOUNGSTOWN — The 7th District Court of Appeals has upheld a township zoning appeals board ruling that a group home for emotionally and behaviorally troubled teenage boys doesn't belong in a single-family residential neighborhood. A three-judge panel of the appeals court unanimously ruled Friday in support of the Ellsworth Township board's decision that the Redemption House group home, 11780 W. Western Reserve Road, does not constitute a single-family housekeeping unit as defined in the township zoning code. In making its ruling, the appeals court backed an August 2008 ruling by Judge Timothy E. Franken of Mahoning County Common Pleas Court that affirmed the December 2006 ruling of the Ellsworth Township board. "This is not the proper location for them to do this type of activity," said Atty. Scott Cochran, who represented neighbors opposed to the group home's location. "There was nothing to indicate to us that this was, in any way, a family environment," he added. For complete story, click here.

Lawsuits raise more questions about troubled youth program in Hastings--November 25th, 2009--Lawsuits against Hastings Youth Academy, a 165-bed facility for troubled teens in St. Johns County, accuse staff members of repeatedly using excessive force and conspiring to cover it up. G4S Youth Services, which contracts with the Florida Department of Juvenile Justice to run the boys program, is accused in one of the suits of negligence on behalf of a teen whose shoulder was shattered by an employee in February 2008. That suit, filed this month, claims G4S and the department ignored past problems and didn't properly protect Anthony Vessels, 16. The boy's attorney said surveillance video shows the employee throwing the youth to the ground, then sitting on him as he writhed in pain. Vessels, now 18, lives in Orlando and is pursuing his GED, his attorney said, but continues to suffer physically and psychologically from the injury. For complete story, click here.

Truancy Officer Preyed on Girls--November 27th, 2009--A Hamilton truancy officer convicted of sexually abusing four female students used a school pilot scheme to identify and groom troubled teens, a court has been told. Mark Pene, 54, was sentenced yesterday in the Hamilton District Court to six years and three months' jail after pleading guilty to indecent assault, having sexual connection with a girl under 16, doing an indecent act with a girl under 16 and doing an indecent act on a girl under 12. The charges related to offending against four girls, aged 11 to 17, between 2005 and 2008. At the time, Pene was employed as a truancy officer in Hamilton, working with troubled teenagers and their families. Pene gained access to two of his victims by inviting them to take part in a school pilot scheme. The programme included such benefits as free lunches, payment of school fees and money for clothing. Pene yesterday sat impassively in the dock as details of his offending were revealed, moving only to shield his face from a Waikato Times photographer. For complete story, click here.

Kin sue Harvard over son's suicide--December 4th, 2009--Harvard sophomore John Edwards was studying to become a doctor and training for the Boston Marathon in June 2007 when he sought help at the university's Health Services because he could not study for as many hours as some of his friends. A nurse practitioner prescribed a drug to treat attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, a condition the overachieving Edwards had never been diagnosed with. Later, she prescribed two powerful antidepressants, Prozac and Wellbutrin, when he began complaining of anxiety, depression, and other side effects. Meanwhile, he was taking a fourth drug for acne, Accutane, that has been linked to suicidal thoughts. "The Wellbutrin is having the effect that we were seeking . . . but unfortunately I feel like it has canceled out the anxiety-reducing effects of the fluoxetine [Prozac], as recently I've been pretty nervous," Edwards wrote in a Nov. 27, 2007, e-mail to the nurse practitioner, Marianne Cannon. "Let me know if I should schedule to come in and meet with you soon, or if I should change the med plan." Cannon replied that she was concerned and told Edwards to schedule an appointment with her. Two days later, Edwards, 19, of Wellesley committed suicide in a bathroom at Harvard Medical School by suffocating himself with a plastic bag. His father, John B. Edwards II of Wellesley, filed a suit Wednesday in Middlesex Superior Court alleging gross negligence by Cannon; Dr. Georgia Ede, who was the doctor who supervised her; and Harvard College, for causing his son's wrongful death. For complete story, click here.

14-Year-Old Accuses Officer Of Assault--December 9th, 2009--MURFREESBORO, Tenn. -- A school resource officer in Rutherford County who helps keep at-risk youth on the right track is accused of assaulting one of the troubled teens. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Governor Pat Quinn Refusing to Shine Light on Juvenile Prisons--December 10th, 2009--Illinois Governor Pat Quinn is not allowing WBEZ to examine the state's juvenile prisons. For four months WBEZ has been trying to negotiate some access to the prisons. Last week, Quinn's staff told us there would be none. We said we would report that denial. Later that day, we were offered a single tour of one of the better facilities, an offer WBEZ accepted, but an offer which would not allow the public meaningful insight into the hundred million dollar department that has care of some of the most troubled and troubling kids in Illinois. Bob Reed is the governor's spokesman. He says they're working on their own review of the facilities. For complete story, click here.

Saving Troubled Teens: A Greedy Industry?--December 10th, 2009--..."If you're going to do it right, it's going to be costly," said Behar. The biggest expense for these programs is staffing well-trained, qualified people who can make good decisions in an emergency situation. In Behar's 32 years of experience overseeing state-run facilities, she knows it's very difficult to turn a profit. Yet many of these private facilities are making money, hand over fist. "In order to make a profit, they have to cut in some way, and since manpower is the biggest expense, that's where the cuts come," Behar said. The companies are saving money by hiring younger, less experienced people and are providing less expert supervision. Critics argue this cost-cutting measure puts the children at risk. Dana Blum believes the staff's negligence is to blame for her son's death. "They killed my child when they didn't attend to him. I feel like he was murdered." The Salt Lake City District Attorney took Aspen to court. But ruling there was no "intent" to kill Brendan, a Utah judge dropped the criminal charges filed against the two employees. The state put Youth Care on probation, requiring it to retool its employee training. The facility never faced any fines, and remained open for business. Devastated and distraught, Dana began looking online into Aspen's public financial statements. She learned that the Cupertino-based company is actually owned by a health care corporate giant, CRC Health. And Bain Capital, a multibillion dollar private equity firm, owns CRC. Dana has filed a civil suit against the financial goliath, which could settle out of court. Critics believe this is why so few stories of abuse, neglect, and death at these facilities are made public. Aspen has enough money in its war chest to make these allegations go away. "If you look at their daily profit numbers compared to what they charge, it's obscene," Dana said. "It made me very angry that they couldn't provide better emergency services for my son."... For complete story, click here.

Poor Children Likelier to Get Antipsychotics--December 12th, 2009--New federally financed drug research reveals a stark disparity: children covered by Medicaid are given powerful antipsychotic medicines at a rate four times higher than children whose parents have private insurance. And the Medicaid children are more likely to receive the drugs for less severe conditions than their middle-class counterparts, the data shows. For complete story, click here.

ACLU says youth tortured at state prison--December 17th, 2009--A 17-year-old boy suffering from mental illnesses was so traumatized by his deplorable treatment in the Montana State Prison that he twice attempted to kill himself by biting through the skin on his wrist to puncture a vein, a lawsuit filed Wednesday by the American Civil Liberties Union of Montana alleges. The lawsuit filed in Lewis and Clark County District Court claims that the boy, "Robert Doe," has been treated illegally and inhumanely and has been detained for about 10 months in solitary confinement. Doe was Tasered as part of a "behavior modification plan," pepper-sprayed and stripped naked in view of other inmates, the complaint states. For complete story, click here.

Md. official would like to 'blow up' girls' detention center--December 28th, 2009--LAUREL — As you approach Thomas J.S. Waxter Children's Center, a sign cautions that you are under camera surveillance. Notices warn against bringing in contraband - glass bottles, cigarettes, weapons. A metal detector sits in the front hall. You pass through a locked metal door to reach the residential wings. Down the hallway, the staff supervision room is separated from the children by a thick metal cage. On a Wednesday in September, a girl stands shackled in the hall, the cuffs around her hands and ankles connected by a metal chain. This is Waxter, the only long-term, secure treatment facility for female juvenile offenders run by the state. "Nothing's worse than Waxter, dead serious, nothing's worse," said Britney McCoy, 19, who has been in and out of Waxter and other facilities since she was 12. She was most recently in Waxter in 2008. McCoy is not Waxter's only critic. The Juvenile Justice Monitoring Unit of the attorney general's office has noted a litany of problems at Waxter, including: allegations by girls that they are physically abused by staff members; mingling of girls convicted of serious crimes with girls held for minor offenses; inadequate physical facilities; and overcrowding and understaffing, which lead to violence. "No one should have to live there. No one should have to work there," said Claudia Wright, who monitors the facility for the Juvenile Justice Monitoring Unit. For complete story, click here.

Treatment of Youths in New York Prisons Spurs Suit--December 30th, 2009--Youths detained in some of New York's juvenile prisons have suffered bruises, cuts and a host of other injuries from aggressive physical restraining practices that violate their legal and constitutional rights, according to a federal lawsuit filed on Wednesday. The class-action suit, filed in federal court in Manhattan on behalf of roughly 500 youths in 10 of the prisons, also accuses the Office of Children and Family Services, the state agency that runs the facilities, of failing to provide adequate mental health services. The legal claim follows two withering reports from the United States Department of Justice and a state task force that portrayed the state's juvenile justice system as so riddled with problems that it needed a complete overhaul. The suit seeks an injunction that would sharply limit the use of force by youth counselors and require the state to provide the youths with more treatment for mental health problems, which affect a vast majority of those in custody. For complete story, click here.

Former Whittell dean indicted in Georgia--December 6th, 2009 (Rec'd January 2nd, 2010)--A grand jury in Georgia has indicted a former Whittell High School administrator on felony charges of aggravated battery, invasion of privacy, and four counts of first degree cruelty to children. Richard Darrington, 37, was hired as Whittell's dean of students at the beginning of the school year, but lost the position when the Nevada Department of Education revoked his substitute teaching license after learning of outstanding battery charges facing him in Georgia. The charges stem from Darrington's time in the southern state, where he operated a private school for teens called Darrington Academy for five years. The bill of indictment, which lists 23 grand jurors of the Superior Court of Fannin County, alleges that Darrington "did maliciously cause bodily harm" to one of his students "by seriously disfiguring his tooth," resulting in the aggravated battery charge. The invasion of privacy charge alleges that Darrington placed a recording device in a girls' room and observed and recorded their activities without consent. The four counts of cruelty to children allege that Darrington forced students to stand outside in freezing weather with no shirts, shoes or socks on two separate occasions, that he slammed a girl's head into a wall, and that he stood on a boy's ankles while in a "tripod" position and also slammed his head into a wall. In addition to Darrington, three other teachers at the school were included in the indictment; one for invasion of privacy and six counts of cruelty to children, and the other two for two counts each of cruelty to children. (For complete story, click here.)

NY Accused of Abusing Troubled Teens--January 6th, 2010--(CN) - The New York State Office of Children and Family Services subjected 500 troubled youths in state detention to violent physical restraint, and routinely denied them legally required mental health care services, nine children and their parents claim in a federal class action. Among other wanton acts, state employees regularly employ a dangerous form of control known as prone restraint - having two adults hold the youth face-down on the floor while his hands are held or cuffed behind him. Prone restraint exposes the victim to risk of cardiac and respiratory arrest, back, arm and neck injuries, abrasions, strained muscles and head injuries, according to the complaint. Such treatment led to the 2006 death of a Bronx teen at the Tryon Boys' Residential Center in Johnston, and serious mental and physical injuries to scores of others, the complaint states. The families claim that OCFS Commissioner Gladys Carrión allowed the behavior to continue despite red flags raised by the U.S. Justice Department and a blue-ribbon panel appointed by Gov. David Patterson. The nine named plaintiffs, all of whom are identified by only their initials, said their treatment violated the 14th Amendment, Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act, and Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act. For complete story, click here.

Schools face accreditation issues--January 5th, 2010--...Smith said the school is applying for accreditation from another body, the Pacific Northwest Association of Independent Schools. And if that body accredits the school, it will satisfy the state's accreditation requirement. Several other private schools also face advised or warned status. Utah Helicopter Inc., a postsecondary school in Spanish Fork, is being recommended for advised status; Cross Creek Academy, a private residential school in La Verkin for troubled teens, for advised status; Top Flight Academy, also a private residential school in Mt. Pleasant, for warned status; private school Dorius Academy in Layton for warned status. Attempts to reach Utah Helicopter, Dorius and Top Flight Academy this week for comment were unsuccessful. Karr Farnsworth, administrator at Cross Creek, said he was unaware of the school's recommended advised status and said he doesn't know how it got that status. For complete story, click here. For more information on Utah, click here.

U.S. says sex abuse high at 13 juvenile centers--January 7th, 2010--WASHINGTON (AP) — A government study issued Thursday finds 13 juvenile detention facilities around the country have high rates of sex abuse and victimization, where nearly 1 out of every 3 inmates reported some type of victimization. A Justice Department study has found that nationwide, about 12% of youths held in state-run, privately-run, or local facilities reported some type of sexual victimization — but those rates varied widely from place to place. For complete story, click here.

Four Years Later: Martin Lee Anderson Boot Camp Death--January 6th, 2010--By now, the story of Martin Lee Anderson's death has been well-documented. During his first day at the Bay County Juvenile Boot Camp, Anderson collapsed during a fitness run. Boot camp drill instructors thought he was faking to get out of the exercise, so they pushed Anderson to complete the run. The camp's cameras recorded an agonizing twenty-minute confrontation, which thrust the case into the worldwide spotlight. Once the guards realized Anderson was truly in distress, they called for help. But, it was too late. The teen died early the next morning, January 6, 2006, in a Pensacola hospital. The Medical Examiner's initial autopsy found Anderson died as a result of complications from sickle cell trait. Those results, and the results of a second autopsy conducted several months later, became the central evidence in the criminal trial of seven of the drill instructors and the camp nurse. A year and a half after Anderson's death, they were all acquitted of aggravated manslaughter charges. Since the trial, Anderson family supporters, including the local NAACP chapter, have continued to push for federal civil rights violation charges against the defendants. Bay County NAACP president Rev. Rufus Wood said, "I want it to be clear that this is not as much about black and white as it is about right and wrong. This is about right and wrong, and it's about wrong. What happened to Martin was wrong." For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Landmark Federal Class-Action Lawsuit Charges Los Angeles County With Failure To Educate Youth In Probation Camps--January 12th, 2010-- LOS ANGELES – An alliance of legal groups including the American Civil Liberties Union and the ACLU of Southern California today filed a ground-breaking class-action lawsuit against the Los Angeles County Probation Department and top county education officials for their total failure to provide youth in the county's largest juvenile probation facility with basic and appropriate education. The failure has resulted in children not being adequately prepared to re-enter society and the workforce. For complete story, click here.

School For Troubled Teens Faces Closure--January 18th, 2010--Clarksville's Genesis Learning Center May Close Due To Funding Shortage... For complete story, click here.

Trial Under Way For Childcare Workers In Teen's Death--January 25th, 2010--PARMA, Ohio -- The trial for three former childcare workers accused of causing the death of a teenager is getting under way Monday. The three women worked at Parmadale, a local treatment center for troubled teens in Parma. Prosecutors said they caused the death of 17-year-old Faith Finley, who suffocated while being restrained on the floor at the facility. For complete story, click here.

Troubled Teen Hospital Closing--January 26th, 2010--Tuesday, Newschannel 9 confirmed that Cumberland Hall is shutting its doors at the end of this month. For complete story, click here.

Home for troubled teens slated to close--February 2nd, 2010--BENNINGTON -- A local long-term residential educational facility for at-risk youth, 204 Depot Street, will be closing this week and leaving 10 people without jobs, according to William Bryan, president of the Board of Directors of SEALL Inc. "The decision was made to cease making referrals. Statewide (the Department of Children and Families,) told us, they have to cut between 12 and 18 beds. We were only filling roughly 10 of those beds so that their other programs will have to feel our pain as well," Bryan said. 204 Depot Street, which will close on Feb. 6, serves older adolescent boys, between the ages of 15 and 17, through a residential educational program that lasts at least a year. It is run by SEALL Inc., a local nonprofit organization with a board of eight people. For complete story, click here.

Lake investigates sex abuse allegations at children's ranch--February 4th, 2010--Lake County officials are investigating a complaint that a juvenile living at the Green Isle Children's Ranch abused another as many as five other kids living at the facility, the Lake County Sheriff's Office said. For complete story, click here.

Foster father charged--Man allegedly offered money to teens in exchange for sex--February 5th, 2010--Sex charges have been laid against a former Foster Family of the Year award winner who has cared for up to 55 children over the past two decades. In June 2009, police received information that Garry Prokopishin, a director for the Calgary and District Foster Parents Association, was allegedly offering troubled teens in his care money for sexual acts. This has prompted an immediate review by Alberta Children and Youth Services. For complete story, click here.

Sex Abuse Allegations At Home For Troubled Teens--February 6th, 2010--CLERMONT -- A children's home for at-risk teens released a statement Friday to News 13 about allegations that a boy sexually abused five others. The alleged victims came forward back in November and told Executive Director Steve Zepp at Green Isle Children's Ranch. In a statement, the children's ranch said, "The resident accused in the incident was removed from the program at Green Isle Ranch during the summer for reasons not associated with the allegations, and the executive director was replaced in mid-December." For complete story, click here.

Downriver minister charged in child sex case--February 9th, 2010--River Rouge --A minister who police say has a reputation for reaching out to troubled teens was charged Monday with six counts of third-degree criminal sexual conduct for allegedly having sex with an under-aged boy. The Rev. Russell Schaller, 35, of River Rouge, senior pastor at Greater St. Johns Missionary Baptist Church on Detroit's east side, was arraigned in 26th District Court and ordered held in the Wayne County Jail in lieu of $100,000 bond. For complete story, click here.

For Detained Youths, No Mental Health Overseer--February 10th, 2010--Edwina G. Richardson-Mendelson has been the administrative judge of the New York City Family Courts for nine months, in charge of the judges responsible for the detention of dozens of young people charged with crimes, the vast majority of whom suffer from some form of mental illness. But it was not until last September that she was informed of what struck her as a startling fact: The State of New York does not have a single full-time staff psychiatrist charged with overseeing treatment of the 800 or so young people who are detained in state facilities at any given time. "There wasn't one human being on-site overseeing all the mental health needs of the population," Judge Richardson-Mendelson said in an interview. "When we place these children in these facilities, we expect their needs to be met, especially their mental health needs." Yet all 17 psychiatrists at the detention facilities in the state's deeply troubled juvenile justice system work on contract and part time. Weeks often pass between their visits with each troubled youth, and officials say their turnover rate is extremely high. For complete story, click here.

6-Year-Old Student Handcuffed, Committed by School--A little girl was sent to an adult mental institution for being unruly--February 11th, 2010--The same school district that allowed an autistic boy to be voted out of kindergarten class for being a bit unruly has a far worse penalty for 6-year-old little girls. Handcuffs and straight jackets. A Parkway Elementary School student was cuffed and sent to an adult mental institution earlier this month after she through a temper tantrum in the middle of class, reports TCPalm.com. The little girl was handcuffed by a Sheriff's Office deputy "for her safety and the safety of others," a police report said. The incident report said the girl was hitting school officials and screaming, although it's unclear what brought on the tantrum. The handcuffs worked because the little girl calmed down after an hour in the tight silver bracelets, but her troubles were just beginning. A few days later, the girl had another fit, allegedly hitting the school's principal in the stomach. The principal, who was eight months pregnant, called the same deputy, who then tossed the little girl in the back of his patrol car and transported her to the local adult mental institution. For complete story, click here.

Editorial: Where's the justice?--February 15th, 2010--Another day, another $10 million legal settlement for high-powered plaintiffs' attorney Thomas R. Kline. Kline has won a number of eight-figure awards for clients injured or killed due to negligence or incompetence by businesses, government agencies, and nonprofit health-care providers. The latest settlement ends a lawsuit brought on behalf of Omega Leach, a 17-year-old boy who died while in the care of the city's Department of Human Services. The settlement provides Leach's family with a financial reward, but no justice. The Inquirer broke the story. Leach was one of dozens of troubled teens DHS sent to a private mental health facility in Tennessee owned by Universal Health Services Inc., a hospital chain based in King of Prussia. A family court judge sent Leach there after he violated probation by missing a court hearing and testing positive for marijuana. At the facility, Leach got into a scuffle with a worker. A surveillance camera showed the worker strangling Leach. Witnesses said the boy was slammed to the ground and banged into a wall. Leach died the next day. Tennessee authorities ruled his death a homicide. Yet, no criminal charges have been filed. Instead, DHS stopped sending kids there. The facility changed names, and the worker left. An attorney for Universal Health Services says "no one admits fault." A fat check has been written in place of the dead boy. Accountability still awaits. For complete story, click here. (Universal Health Services also owns notoriously abusive Provo Canyon School and many CEDU-cult programs.)

Teen raises funds to support prison visits--February 18th, 2010-- St. Joseph High School senior Ciara Main and her classmates sell bowls of rice at lunchtime as a fundraiser for the program "Get on the Bus." The program unites inmates at the California Mens Colony and their families on Father's Day. //Len Wood/Staff Each year, thousands of children visit parents incarcerated in the California penal system. Ciara Main, a senior at St. Joseph High School, can sympathize with them, and on Wednesday she helped organize a "Get on the Bus" fundraiser to make those visits a little more comfortable. Main and her fellow club members sold bowls of rice at the school -- in an Ash Wednesday "Rice Bowl Day of Fasting" -- to help raise money and awareness for their cause. The students are putting together "Stay In Touch Bags" for the children who participate in the program. The bags include note cards, pens and stamps, which allow them to write letters to their parents, along with a disposable camera and a photo frame. Each child also receives a teddy bear for the journey home. Children from Santa Rosa to San Diego participate in the program, which covers seven prisons throughout the state, including California Men's Colony outside San Luis Obispo. When she was very young, Main visited her father, who was in jail at the time. That experience inspired her to become president of the school's Get on the Bus Club, a small portion of a statewide effort to unite families. For complete story, click here.

Bridgeport 'inspirational speaker' charged with masterminding area robberies--February 22nd, 2010-- A Bridgeport man who billed himself as an "inspiration speaker" to inner-city youths was arrested by Greenwich police Monday and charged as the mastermind behind string of robberies throughout the region. Gregory Jetter, 48, of 182 Wheeler Ave., Bridgeport, was taken into custody at a federal courthouse in New Haven where he was appearing on an unrelated violation of probation charge. He was charged with first-degree robbery, first-degree conspiracy at robbery and first-degree larceny, police said. Jetter's arrest comes after several months of a multijurisdictional armed-robbery investigation into incidents in Fairfield and New Haven counties, police said. Greenwich police were the first to identify Jetter as being involved in the string of robberies, when they said he was the getaway driver in a July 2009 robbery of Estate Treasures in Riverside. During the incident, Lakeem Jetter, 19, and Moses McCree, 20, were charged with stealing more than $250,000 worth of jewelry at gunpoint. Although initial reports indicated that McCree was the mastermind to the robberies, Detective Pasquale Iorfino said further investigation revealed Gregory Jetter, a convicted felon with an extensive arrest history, was the brain behind the operation. Jetter used "being an inspiration speaker for inner-city children to draw in troubled teens," said Iorfino. Iorfino said once teens and young men became part of his group, called the McCree Foundation Inc., he led them down a dangerous path. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Ohio youth prisons ordered to ensure inmates fed--February 26th, 2010--COLUMBUS, Ohio — A federal judge has ordered Ohio youth detention facilities to alter a practice of withholding food from inmates who don't report for meals in the cafeteria. U.S. District Judge Algenon Marbley says in the order filed Friday in Columbus that a meal refusal policy used at the Circleville Juvenile Correctional Facility and others did not put a priority on inmates' health and safety. For complete story, click here.

Group homes for troubled teens closing after 18 years--February 26th, 2010--St. Paul, Minn. — Hearthstone of Minnesota, a Twin Cities nonprofit that ran small group homes for deeply troubled teens, closed its doors Friday. For complete story, click here.

Disciplinary policy brings incarceration--March 14th, 2010--One of the most alarming trends affecting our children today is what has become known as the "school to prison pipeline," a term used to describe an all too common reality for poor-performing students. First they are academically unsuccessful, then their misbehavior results in school disciplinary action, then their misbehavior puts them into the juvenile justice system, then they leave school prematurely and eventually end up as incarcerated adults. For complete story, click here.

Psychiatrist gets warning from FDA--March 16th, 2010--A South Florida psychiatrist who was treating a 7-year-old foster child before the boy committed suicide last year has received a warning from federal drug regulators who say he failed "to protect the rights, safety and welfare" of children enrolled in clinical drug trials. In a strongly worded letter dated Feb. 4, regulators at the U.S. Food and Drug Administration said Dr. Sohail Punjwani over-medicated children who were enrolled in clinical trials for undisclosed drugs. One girl, the letter said, slashed her wrists while hallucinating. Another, a 13-year-old, "experienced sedation and dizziness during the study," the letter said. The warning letter, a harsh and rare form of discipline by the agency, says Punjwani failed to "adhere to the applicable statutory requirements and FDA regulations governing the conduct of clinical investigations." For complete story, click here.

People power blocks controversial children's home--March 17th, 2010--RELIEVED neighbours were today celebrating "people power" after plans to build a controversial children's home were dramatically thrown out. Delighted cheers raised the roof of Blackpool Town Hall as around 100 protesters, who battled against the home for troubled teens being built on Preston New Road, Marton, rejoiced at the sensational council U-turn. For complete story, click here.

"Head Case: Can Psychiatry Be a Science?"--March 1st, 2010--For complete story, click here.

Offenders referred to Pa. school--March 21st, 2010--Deep in rural Pennsylvania, some 300 miles from Providence, The Glen Mills Schools appears to offer much to troubled teenaged boys. The school's glossy brochure depicts a lush, green campus with neat athletic fields, a football stadium and an Olympic-sized swimming pool. Vocational programs range from auto body repair and landscaping to dentistry and golf course management. Glen Mills has so impressed Chief Family Court Judge Jeremiah S. Jeremiah Jr. that he recently referred a dozen delinquent boys there. But state child welfare officials say no matter how good the school may be, troubled teens generally do better when they stay close to their families and communities. More than a decade ago, officials at the state Department of Children, Youth and Families concluded that juveniles with behavioral or emotional problems could be helped more cheaply, and with better results, closer to home. For complete story, click here.

Goodman woman pleads guilty in teen center sex-abuse case--March 22nd, 2010--A former night supervisor at a residential center for troubled teens has pleaded guilty to one of five sex-abuse charges she was facing with respect to three boys in the program. Jana E. Carter, 46, of Goodman, changed her plea to guilty in Jasper County Circuit Court on a single count of second-degree statutory sodomy. She has been facing three counts of second-degree statutory sodomy and two counts of second-degree statutory rape concerning alleged acts with boys who were staying at the Scott Greening Dependency Center at 818 W. Fourth St. in Joplin, when she worked there in 2008. For complete story, click here.

We thought we were helping troubled teens--March 26th, 2010--When I tell people that I am a lawyer working on juvenile delinquency cases, they usually commend me for choosing a socially useful career. But ever since the release of reports detailing the horrid treatment of teenagers at four New York juvenile detention facilities, I have been wary of talking about my job. For 20 years I have worked in New York Family Court, doing legal research for judges who hear juvenile delinquency cases. I take pride in helping judges conduct fair proceedings, which hopefully encourage youths to respect the justice system. When sentencing a teenager who has broken the law, one of the goals is to provide them with the services they need to change their behavior and better their prospects. This is difficult, as many of the teens have mental illnesses, and come from impoverished, broken homes, where they have been exposed to drugs and violence. Most juveniles convicted in Family Court receive services while living in their home communities, while others are sent away to detention centers for a year or more. Before a youth is sentenced, social workers and psychologists produce extensive reports aimed at formulating a service plan. Court hearings are held to determine the best course of action. I assumed that the people working in our juvenile facilities were as committed as we were in Family Court to giving detainees a chance at redemption. But recent federal and state investigations have revealed a far different story. Instead of the well-intentioned treatment I thought they were getting, juveniles in detention facilities repeatedly face physical abuse, which has resulted in concussions, broken bones and lost teeth. Staff members regularly handcuff detainees behind their backs, and force them to lie face down on the floor, for infractions such as sneaking an extra cookie or slamming a door. And teens suffering from bi-polar disorder, posttraumatic stress syndrome and drug addiction receive infrequent or no treatment. For complete story, click here.

Ala. commune head has new project despite past--April 9th, 2010--EMELLE, Ala. — Pentecostal preacher Luke Edwards is the shepherd of a forlorn flock: For years his disciples have traveled the nation begging amid allegations of abuse and ruinous mismanagement. Five youngsters have died in fires at his west Alabama commune, the Holyland, where parents and youngsters are separated for weeks at a time. The state has described the education provided at the commune's church-based school as substandard; Edwards' one-time followers tell of beatings and sexual misconduct by male elders. Edwards, 84, has outlasted all the criticism and troubles, and an Associated Press review found he is involved in a new multimillion-dollar plan that could bring even more young people into his fold — a prospect that worries one-time followers now living on their own. Edwards preaches self-sufficiency, yet former members say his disciples bring in thousands of dollars daily panhandling outside stores in the name of abused children. Those under his care get free rent yet little of the money. If they leave, they depart virtually penniless. Now he is part of a project to build a residential school for troubled high-schoolers on hundreds of acres of cow pasture and forest in Sumter County just east of the Mississippi line. The goal is to bring prison-bound youth from churches and cities all over the nation to Edwards' corner of west Alabama. Edwards is among the founders of Greentown-USA, envisioned as a sprawling complex that is supposed to open in 2012. Plans include a private school with dormitories, a gym, an Olympic-size swimming pool, a recording studio, laboratories and a chapel for worship. For complete story, click here.

Feds: No civil right charges in teen's boot camp death--April 16th, 2010--More than four years after the death of 14-year-old Florida boot camp inmate Martin Lee Anderson, the U.S. Department of Justice has announced no federal criminal civil rights charges will be filed against eight staff members. The announcement effectively closes the case. "After a careful and thorough review, a team of experienced federal prosecutors and FBI agents determined that the evidence was insufficient to pursue federal criminal civil rights charges. Accordingly, the investigation into this incident has been closed," the Justice Department said in a news release. In 2007, a Florida jury found seven guards and a nurse not guilty of manslaughter and related charges in Anderson's death. Anderson was African-American, and the guards were white and African-American. (Webmaster Note: This is outrageous. Martin Lee Anderson was beaten and kicked mercilessly and died as a result. That is HEAL's opinion. For more on this story, click here, here, and here.)

Florida to Punish Kids for Crimes They Haven't Committed Yet--April 21, 2010--I knew it was easy to get locked up in Florida. Apparently, you can get punished in the state before committing a crime, too. An extremely troubling new partnership between the Florida Department of Corrections and IBM wants to use software to predict which juveniles will commit crimes in the future, so "the best course of treatment" can be chosen. Hey, why wait for juveniles to commit crimes, if we can start their "rehabilitation" now? The Florida DOC says that by using predictive analytics software, it can "analyze key predictors such as past offense history, home life environment, gang affiliation and peer associations to better understand and predict which youths have a higher likelihood to reoffend." What about talking to the kids to determine the best course of action? People are unpredictable and complex; they aren't data points. Juveniles should be taught that the world is open to them, and that they are the agents of their own destiny — not that they fit into the bottom half of a spreadsheet, and therefore need extra mandatory counseling or placement in a group home. For complete story, click here.

Investigators: Starved to Death in State Care--April 30, 2010--(WXYZ) - For several months, the Action News Investigators dug deep into Michigan's tragically-flawed foster care system. During our investigation, we uncovered the heartbreaking story of a 10-year-old boy who starved to death while a facility banked cash to care for him. We began telling Johnny's story over the last two days here on WXYZ.com. In that time, the response has been overwhelming and your comments confirm that Michigan's children need a better foster care system. Johnny's mother, Elena Andron, dedicated her life to caring for her wheelchair-bound son. All she wanted was a little help. The state's answer was to put him in a foster care facility. One year later, Johnny starved to death. For complete story, click here.

"The age of American children being medicated with prescription psychiatric drugs is getting younger and more widespread every year."--May 3, 2010--The age of children being medicated with prescription psychiatric drugs is getting younger and more widespread every year. According to a 2010 study of data on more than a million children reported by American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry's journal, the use of powerful anti-psychotics with privately insured U.S. children, ages 2 through 5, doubled between 1999 and 2007. In the 2007 study, the most common diagnoses of anti-psychotic treated children were pervasive developmental disorder or mental retardation (28.2 percent), attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (23.7 percent) and disruptive behavior disorder (12.9 percent). Fewer than half of drug-treated children received a mental health assessment, a psychotherapy visit, or a visit with a psychiatrist, during the year of anti-psychotic drug use. "Anti-psychotics, which are being widely and irresponsibly prescribed for American children -- mostly as chemical restraints -- are shown to be causing irreparable harm." Vera Hassner Sharav, president of the Alliance for Human Research Protection, warns. She further asserts that long-term use of these drugs can have hazardous effects on cardiovascular and metabolic systems. For complete story, click here.

Scathing Report Details Abuse At Juvenile Prison--May 17th, 2010--INDIANAPOLIS -- Federal authorities are calling on Indiana to address abuses within its juvenile correction facilities after reports of young inmates sexually assaulted by guards and living in filth. A Jan. 29 letter and report from U.S. Assistant Attorney General Thomas Perez to Gov. Mitch Daniels details troubles within the former Indianapolis Juvenile Correctional Facility, including a mentally ill inmate left dirty and pulling out her hair and male guards having sex with and performing strip searches on young female inmates, 6News' Joanna Massee reported. "The sexualized environment at the facility appears rampant," the letter read. The letter follows a civil rights investigation launched by the U.S. Department of Justice in 2008 that documented inadequate abuse investigations, excessive use of force and isolation, inadequate mental health care and inadequate special education services. For complete story, click here.

Dallas jail instructor gets 10 years for molesting youths in custody--May 27th, 2010--An instructor who taught juveniles at the Dallas County jail was sentenced this morning to 10 years in prison for molesting youths in his classes. The sentence was handed down by State District Judge Gracie Lewis shortly after a jury found Luis Enrique Santos guilty of two counts of sexual assault of a child. The judge sentenced de los Santos to 10 years on each count, with the sentences to run concurrently. De Los Santos, who testified in his own defense, claimed he was innocent and that his accusers were liars. When the guilty verdicts were read, he shook his head. Jurors returned to the court after finishing their deliberations so they could watch the judge sentence de los Santos. The jurors declined to comment afterward. During closing arguments Wednesday, prosecutor James Bagnall showed jurors a Kit Kat bar, a 20-ounce Coca-Cola and a McDonald's bag. He said the items were representative of the gifts de los Santos used to lure incarcerated boys into sex. The prosecutor said de los Santos developed "a sexual molester relationship" with the youths, who were 14 to 16. Calvin Johnson, de los Santos' attorney, said in his closing argument that the youths accusing his client were "not regular kids" and could not be trusted. The youths were in jail after being ordered to stand trial as adults for crimes including aggravated assault of a police officer and capital murder. Testifying in his own defense Wednesday, de los Santos said of his accusers, "They lied about everything." He was accused of performing oral sex on at least two boys in a jail bathroom near the classroom in 2008. Prosecutors said de los Santos, an instructor who worked for the Dallas Independent School District, wrote sexually explicit notes to students and promised them marijuana and pornographic photos. De los Santos testified that he used bad judgment in writing the notes. In bringing them candy and other foods from the outside world, he said, he was trying to reward the students. Two youths testified that de los Santos threatened to influence their criminal cases to make their punishments worse if they did not cooperate with his advances. For complete story, click here.

New Charges Pending For Boot Camp Dragging Case--May 28th, 2010--CORPUS CHRISTI - Nueces County district attorney plans to re-file charges against two boot camp instructors accused of dragging a teen back in 2007. Charles Flowers and Stephanie Bassitt are accused of tying a 15-year old girl to the back of a van and dragging her down a road in Banquete. Officials say these are pictures the girl's injuries. Back in 2008 felony charges were dismissed after a mistrial was declared because the jury could not agree on verdict. Prosecutors say Flowers and Bassitt will be charged with misdemeanor assault. If convicted they face up to a year in the county jail and/or a $4,000 fine. We're told teenager is expected to testify in the new trial. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Federal panel hears of sexual abuse TN juvenile detention facility--June 4th, 2010--WASHINGTON — Tennessee officials who were "flabbergasted" at the level of sexual abuse reported at Woodland Hills Youth Development Center told a federal panel Friday the steps they've taken to reduce staff misconduct. But Steven Hornsby, deputy commissioner of the Department of Children's Services, also questioned the survey results that found one in four youths at Woodland reported sexual abuse by staffers, which ranked the facility among the worst in the country. Hornsby, a former trial lawyer and judge, said Woodland Hills routinely gets top grades from outside auditors. He questioned the lack of corroboration for children anonymously reporting abuse when counselors, teachers and guards hadn't reported anything. "I don't want to sound defensive," he told the Justice Department's Review Panel on Prison Rape, which held a hearing on the survey results. "There were no students -- zero reports -- of student sexual victimization during the time period that information was requested" during the survey. The January results of the National Survey of Youth in Custody surprised Hornsby because a national accreditation panel gave Woodland Hills a nearly perfect score -- penalizing only the ventilation system and the size of cells -- and state-level investigators found no widespread abuse. Another accreditation review is scheduled in August. "We were shocked," Hornsby said. "I think my word was just flabbergasted." For complete story, click here.

Federal Panel Questions Sex Abuse At Juvenile Prison--June 4th, 2010--WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Indiana Department of Correction officials told a federal panel they are working to correct a pattern of sexual victimization of young inmates at a state juvenile correctional facility. Department of Correction Commissioner Edwin Buss and his staff testified Thursday before a three-member Department of Justice review panel on prison rape, 6News' Joanna Massee reported. It comes after a report by the Bureau of Justice Statistics found that 36 percent of inmates at the Pendleton Juvenile Correctional Facility reported being sexually abused, about three times higher than the national average. Pendleton Superintendent Linda Commons said she was aware of sexual abuse at the facility, but was shocked by the report. For complete story, click here.

Arrests Made in Child Abuse Allegations--June 6th, 2010-- Four people are arrested on allegations of child abuse at a Bay County boarding school. 48-year-old Clayton Maynard, 40-year-old Robert Unger, and 20-year-old Russell Maynard were all arrested. They are all charged with one count of aggravated child abuse and five counts each, of child abuse. 22- year-old Marcus Kurbatoff was arrested and charged with resisting an officer during the course of arrest of Maynard and Unger. The men were responsible for running the Heritage Boys Academy. The academy is an all boys' boarding school in Bay County, right behind the asphalt plant, on Highway 231. For complete story, click here.

Juvenile dies in detention in East Tennessee--July 2nd, 2010--CHATTANOOGA — Police are investigating after a juvenile died at a detention center in East Tennessee. Hamilton County Sheriff's Department spokeswoman Janice Atkinson said investigators are not yet saying what caused the juvenile's death at the center in Chattanooga. She says the death was reported to her about 6:30 p.m. Thursday, but further information on the youth wasn't yet available. For complete story, click here.

City, police grapple with problems at Benchmark--July 9th, 2010--WOODS CROSS —Woods Cross officials are worried that Benchmark Regional Hospital is struggling with ongoing violence, escapes and even a riot by patients, including sex offenders and troubled teens. But getting detailed information from the hospital itself is proving problematic. And that's frustrating city officials who say hospital administrators are stonewalling the release of information to the city. "We don't know what they are going to do," Woods Cross City Administrator Gary Uresk said. We're just looking at all our options. The city feels that it needs to take a pro-active stance. I think there are other issues there that need to be looked into," he recently told the Clipper. He said he and council members are also concerned that the hospital is hiding behind federal privacy laws to keep city officials from finding out. For complete story, click here.

Family Says Nephew of Justice Clarence Thomas Was Beaten and Tased at West Jeff Hospital: July 10th, 2010

Rampant sexual abuse puts teens in danger at juvenile prisons--July 13th, 2010--Juvenile prisons are supposed to rehabilitate troubled teens, but thousands of Indiana's inmates, some as young as 13, have been placed at risk of rampant sexual violence and harassment -- often from the men and women paid to watch over them. Sex crimes inside juvenile prisons have long escaped public scrutiny in Indiana. Although incidents of rape and other sexual assault have broken into news headlines on occasion, the frequency with which state workers -- on the job and paid with tax dollars -- have had sex with young inmates was hidden behind a curtain of denial, unspoken acceptance and complacency. For complete story, click here.

Federal Oversight for Troubled N.Y. Youth Prisons--July 14th, 2010--Four of New York's most dangerous and troubled youth prisons will be placed under federal oversight, strict new limits will be imposed on the use of physical force by guards, and dozens of psychiatrists, counselors and investigators will be hired under a sweeping agreement finalized on Wednesday between state and federal officials. The agreement will usher in the most significant expansion of mental health services in years for youths in custody, the vast majority of whom suffer from drug or alcohol problems, developmental disabilities or mental health problems. Currently, the state does not have a single full-time psychiatrist on staff to treat young offenders. Guards at the youth prisons, known as youth counselors, will be barred from physically restraining youths except when a person's physical safety is threatened or a youth is trying to escape from the institution. Guards will be allowed to use the most controversial method -- in which a youth is forced to the ground and held face-down -- for at most three minutes, with evaluation by a doctor to follow within four hours. The accord comes almost a year after the Justice Department threatened to take over New York's juvenile justice system unless the state took significant steps to rectify problems at the four prisons, where physical abuse was rampant and mental health counseling was scant or nonexistent. "It is New York's fundamental responsibility to protect juveniles in its custody from harm and to uphold their constitutional rights," Thomas E. Perez, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said in a statement. "We have worked cooperatively with New York officials to craft an agreement to ensure that the constitutional rights of juveniles at the four facilities are protected, and we commend New York and the New York State Office of Children and Families for their willingness to work aggressively to remedy these problems." Federal investigators found that staff members at the four institutions -- the Lansing Residential Center and the Louis Gossett Jr. Residential Center, in Lansing, and two residences, one for boys and one for girls, at Tryon Residential Center in Johnstown -- routinely used physical force to discipline the youths, resulting in broken bones, shattered teeth, concussions and dozens of other serious injuries in a period of less than two years. Gov. David A. Paterson said in a statement, "With this historic settlement agreement, New York takes another step towards achieving true transformation of our juvenile justice system." Mr. Paterson, who has been trying to address problems plaguing the juvenile system, introduced legislation in June to let judges sentence youths to juvenile prisons only if they had been found guilty of a violent crime or a sex crime or were deemed to be a serious threat to themselves or others. Juvenile prisons house those convicted of criminal acts, from truancy to murder, who are too young to serve in adult jails and prisons. The federal inquiry began in 2007 after a spate of episodes, including the 2006 death of a disturbed 15-year-old after two employees at the Tryon center pinned him down on the ground. For complete story, click here.

Southern Poverty Law Center Files Suit After 6-year old Hand-Cuffed and Shackled for "Acting Up" in First Grade Class--July 16th, 2010--It's not right for a 6-year-old boy to be handcuffed and shackled to a chair by an armed security officer because he "acted up" in school. But that's exactly what happened at the Sarah T. Reed Elementary School in New Orleans. In keeping with our work to reform the abusive juvenile justice system in the Deep South, we've filed a lawsuit against the school district to stop the brutal and unconstitutional policy of chaining students who break minor school rules. Our client, J.W., is a typical first-grader. He's just four feet tall and weighs 60 pounds. He enjoys playing basketball, being read to by his parents, coloring and playing outside with friends. But his school treated him like an animal. Within one week, he was twice forcibly arrested, handcuffed and shackled to a chair for talking back to a teacher and later arguing with a classmate over a seat. The amount of force used on J.W. was simply ridiculous and, predictably, inflicted severe emotional distress. Shockingly, this level of punishment is official school policy. We're not just fighting for the rights of J.W., but for all the students at Reed Elementary. For complete story, click here.

Ex-US judge pleads guilty to child prison scam--July 23rd, 2010--Conahan received bribes from a for-profit juvenile detention centre after closing a county-run facility. Former Pennsylvania judge Michael Conahan has pleaded guilty to a racketeering conspiracy charge for helping put juvenile defendants behind bars in exchange for bribes. He is accused along with former judge Mark Ciavarella of taking $2.8m (£1.8m) from a profit-making detention centres. Mr Ciavarella denies wrongdoing. The two pleaded guilty last year but a federal judge tossed out part of the plea agreement for being too lenient. Conahan faces up to 20 years in jail. US District Judge Edwin Kosik rejected the 87-month jail term set out last year in Conahan's agreement. Under that deal, the former judge would have been able to back out if he was dissatisfied with his sentence. Judge Kosik has accepted Conahan's current plea agreement with prosecutors, which has no such get-out clause. Cash for kids Prosecutors in a federal court in Scranton, Pennsylvania, said Conahan had closed a county-owned juvenile detention centre in 2002, just before signing an agreement to use a for-profit centre. Prosecutors say Mr Ciavarella, a former juvenile court judge, then allegedly worked with Mr Conahan to ensure a constant flow of detainees. The two men were originally charged in early 2009 with accepting money from the builder and owner of a for-profit detention centre that housed county juveniles in exchange for giving children longer, harsher sentences. For complete story, click here.

Youth mentor arrested on charge of raping girl--July 24th, 2010--MOBILE, Ala. -- A mentor in a program that works with Strickland Youth Center to help troubled teens was arrested Friday and charged with raping a young girl, prosecutors said. Sherman Fitzgerald Tate, 33, was being held in Mobile County Metro Jail on charges of second-degree rape and second-degree sodomy. For complete story, click here.

N.S. teen abused at facility, say advocates--By MICHAEL MacDonald The Canadian Press Tue, Jul 20 - 4:52 AM An advocacy group is calling for an investigation into allegations that a Nova Scotia youth struggling with a conduct disorder was physically abused on the weekend by staff at a treatment facility in eastern Ontario. Roch Longuepee, founder of Restoring Dignity, a non-profit group that seeks justice for victims of institutional child abuse, said Monday that the 15-year-old should be removed from the Bayfield facility in Consecon until a specialized treatment program can be set up for him in Nova Scotia. Longuepee said the youth, who can't be named, told his aunt that two male staff members refused his request to go to the washroom on Sunday, then threw him to the floor, punched him in the ribs and kneed him in the throat. The aunt issued a statement saying he was left with a black eye, cuts to his head and scratches on his body. "We have to react and respond to this boy's cry for help," Longuepee told a news conference. "We are concerned that the situation is out of control . . . I am concerned that this boy is in danger." The accusations have not been proven. Sharlene Weitzman, chief operating officer for the privately run facility, declined comment citing privacy concerns. However, Longuepee released a copy of a Justice Department document that shows the province received a call from Bayfield on Sunday at 4:25 a.m., stating that the youth had been allegedly inciting others to attack staff before punching and kicking at some of them. The document, produced by the Provincial Emergency Duty Program, says the boy was "placed in a position of control." No other details were provided. Court documents show the boy has been receiving government help since he was four years old, having been in the care of foster homes, group homes and other programs for years. He has been in the care of Nova Scotia's Community Services Department since November 2008, when it was deemed he required intensive, long-term care because he was a risk to himself and the community. Longuepee said the boy is a sexual abuse victim who was abandoned by his parents before he was five. As well, he said the boy has "cognitive issues," but none of the diagnoses he has received are conclusive. Last summer, the Nova Scotia Supreme Court approved the department's plan to send him to the Bayfield facility near Trenton, Ont., because the province had exhausted its options. "It was evident that none of those services had achieved the goal of preventing the situation then faced by the minister and the adolescent's grandparents," Nova Scotia Supreme Court Justice Beryl MacDonald wrote in a decision released in April. MacDonald said the adolescent was "totally out of control," would not obey instruction and "presented as a risk to himself and to his community." The judge also noted that the province had to send the boy outside the province because it does not have a secure, residential facility that can provide long-term, intensive treatment. At first, the court agreed to send the youth to a facility in Utah, but that fell through and Bayfield was recommended. Vicki Wood, the department's director of child welfare, also declined to comment on the allegations. "I have no knowledge that a child was punched in the ribs or kneed in the throat," she said. Wood said the department would investigate any allegations of abuse, noting that under an interprovincial protocol, the Ontario facility is expected to follow Nova Scotia rules pertaining to the use of physical restraint of youths who put themselves or others in danger. "They would never restrain a child for punitive reasons," she said. "It's to intervene in a situation of danger." Wood confirmed that the department and the boy's family can't agree on the treatment he should receive. "There's a forum for the family to bring forward their concerns — that would be the court, not a press conference," Wood said. "The judge is going to make a decision based on information presented to the court, not a third-party organization such as Mr. Longuepee's, which has no real knowledge of the case." Longuepee later took exception to Wood's comments, saying it's "false, absolutely false" that he has no knowledge of the case. "I have the entire collection of files from the courts," he said, adding he's also interviewed the boy. The boy's grandparents, who have been caring for him for most of his life, approached the advocacy group in March after they learned of the boy's complaints at Bayfield. Longuepee said his organization has received complaints of abuse from former residents of Bayfield and their families. He said the problem is that provinces like Ontario and Nova Scotia continue to cling to the belief that the best place for troubled teens is in an institution. "These institutions can't be the parents for these children," he said. His group is proposing a specialized foster care program that would cost the province about $175,000 to set up in the first year. The plan has been submitted to the provincial government, but it has yet to respond, he said. (Complete Story Provided Above.)

Youth lock-ups blasted--Star investigation Hearings order release of children found not to have mental disorders--July 7th, 2010 Canada seems to be seeing the light. When will the US? We're waiting. For more on the story, click here.

Snoop Dogg taking youth football league to Chicago--July 27th, 2010--According to RivalsHigh, Calvin Broadus, a.k.a Snoop Dogg, will be bringing his youth football league to Chicago next year. Broadus started the league back in 2005 in Los Angeles, featuring kids from all over the area with criminal, weapons and drug charges. Not only has the league taught these kids the correct way of life, but has connected them with role models, and some, even their fathers. Broadus is planning on holding a clinic with about 200 kids in Chicago's Housing Authority next year. According to the article, Broadus, who founded the league with $1 million of his own money, started it since there were no inner city football programs for the youngsters in Los Angeles. His league in the West Coast has helped troubled teens become great players, some even recruited by top colleges. One can only imagine what this league can do with the talent in Chicago. (Complete Article Shown--source examiner.com) Webmaster Note: We applaud Snoop Dogg for giving this opportunity to children.

Girl, 16, dies during restraint at an already-troubled hospital--August 1st, 2010--The charge nurse found Alexis Evette Richie alone in a small room at SSM DePaul Health Center, motionless and sprawled facedown on a bean bag chair. Minutes earlier, the 16-year-old foster child had tried to hit, scratch and bite staff members in the adolescent psychiatric ward. Two aides grabbed her arms and took her down a hall and into a small room called the "quiet room." They held her facedown in the chair while a nurse injected a sedative into her hip. Alexis continued to struggle and then went limp. The nurse and the two aides left without checking her pulse or making sure she was breathing. Charge nurse Iris Blanks checked on her minutes later and didn't think Alexis looked right. An aide helped Blanks roll the girl over. Alexis wasn't breathing. Her pulse was faint. It was 12 minutes after she stopped moving before anyone tried to revive Alexis. By then it was too late. "Why did they leave her like that?" Blanks wailed over the phone to her daughter that night, according to a police report. The "little girl," she said, "didn't have to die." The medical examiner agreed, concluding that Alexis had suffocated on the bean bag chair. Her death on Oct. 26 was ruled a homicide. For complete story, click here.

TIME-OUT OR TORTURE? Sex offender put kids 'through hell' in time-out room, By Clio Francis, Sunday Star Times, August, 8, 2010 For complete story, click here.

Criticism over delayed TYC sexual abuse trial--August 12th, 2010--The advocacy group Texas Civil Rights Project on Wednesday called for a former Texas Youth Commission official to be brought to trial quickly, almost six years after he was accused of molesting at least four teenage boys in what became a statewide abuse scandal. Scott Medlock, an Austin attorney who represents one of the four victims in separate pending civil litigation, said at a news conference that it is unbelievable and outrageous that former West Texas State School Principal John Paul Hernandez is still awaiting trial. "More than three years after the public learned about these disgusting assaults, Hernandez's victims are still waiting for justice," said Medlock, director of the organization's Prisoners' Rights Program. "Prosecuting these men shows that if you abuse kids in TYC, you will be held accountable. Further delay undermines creating a culture of accountability." In a statement, the victim — now 25 — said he wants to "stop what happened to me from being covered up." "I need to move on with my life, and I can't do that until the man who violated me faces justice," the victim said in the statement. "I'm still struggling and I need some closure." For complete story, click here.

State orders Putnam mental-health company SLS to give up permits--August 12th, 2010--The state has ordered a private Putnam County-based mental-health provider that treats teens and young adults to surrender its operating certificates after the mental-health commissioner upheld charges that the for-profit facility violated patients' rights and ignored state regulations. For complete story, click here.

Teen who collapsed at residential treatment facility dies--August 18th, 2010-- By TERRI LANGFORD Copyright 2010 Houston Chronicle Aug. 18, 2010, 10:49PM The state's foster care agency revealed Wednesday that a 17-year-old girl who collapsed about a month ago at a residential treatment facility has died. The Texas Department of Family and Protective Services is investigating the death of Shanice Nibbs, who collapsed July 16 while on a nature walk at the Five Oaks Achievement Center in New Ulm, about 72 miles west of Houston. On Wednesday, agency spokesman Patrick Crimmins issued a news release notifying the media that the teen died Friday. Reporters for the Houston Chronicle and Texas Tribune first contacted DFPS officials two weeks ago about the girl's collapse. At the time, the girl was alive in the intensive care unit at Texas Children's Hospital, and the agency offered no other details, citing the investigation. An official with the governor's office confirmed that the agency notified it immediately of the incident and that it was aware that the agency had suspended all placements at the facility until an investigation was completed. An official with the Harris County Institute of Forensic Sciences, which conducted an autopsy, said the girl died of complications of hypothermia. It is not known how long the girl had been at the facility, how long she had been in foster care, or if she had a pre-existing health condition. Two months ago, the Chronicle and Tribune detailed how more than 250 confirmed incidents of abuse or neglect had occurred since 2008 at residential treatment facilities, where the state's most troubled foster care children are placed. terri.langford@chron.com (note: was actually hyperthermia and complete story above.) Also: <http://abclocal.go.com/ktrk/story?section=news/local&id=7617296&rss=rss-ktrk-article-7617296>

Teenager found dead at Rock Hill psychiatric center--Rec'd August 19th, 2010 (Article: June 12th, 2010)-- By Cleve R. Wootson Jr. cwootson@charlotteobserver.com Posted: Saturday, Jun. 12, 2010 A 17-year-old who complained of chest congestion was found dead at a residential psychiatric treatment facility in Rock Hill on Saturday morning. Rock Hill police identified the teen as Levi Snyder, of Lenoir. He was a resident at the New Hope Carolinas treatment center, which treats emotionally disturbed adolescents, near Piedmont Medical Center, said Detective Kathy Harveston. She said initial reports didn't point to foul play. "It looks like (the death is) going to be medical in nature," Harveston said. "There's no appearance of any foul play, of neglect, of improper treatment, anything like that." Harveston said Snyder had been to the hospital for chest congestion three or four days ago and was on antibiotics. Police haven't released a narrative of what happened in the hours before he died, but Harveston said he'd been complaining of chest congestion Friday night. It's unclear how employees at the facility responded to the complaints. No one answered the phone at the facility's listed number Saturday. The York County coroner is expected to conduct an autopsy this week. New Hope operates out of the former York General Hospital off Ebenezer Road, near Rock Hill's Fewell Park neighborhood. The center has faced heavy scrutiny from neighborhood and city leaders since it began operating in the mid-1990s. City officials and residents of the nearby Fewell Park neighborhood contend a facility that includes sex offenders among the patients doesn't belong in a residential neighborhood. The opposition culminated in 2002 when Rock Hill and York County officials sought to have New Hope moved. The facility is licensed by the S.C. Department of Social Services. Between 1995 and 2002, Rock Hill police responded to more than 200 calls at the New Hope address. More recent figures were not available. New Hope officials contend many of the calls proved to be unfounded. Since 1997, there have been at least 39 reports of criminal sexual conduct, assault and battery, and missing persons at New Hope, police records show. Of those, however, 25 were dismissed for a lack of evidence. Rock Hill Herald writer Matt Garfield contributed. Cleve R. Wootson Jr.: 704-358-5046 Read more: http://www.charlotteobserver.com/2010/06/12/1496598/teenager-found-dead-at-rock-hill.html#ixzz0x2_eD4uti

Sports grill owner admits setting fire--Rec'd August 19th, 2010 (Article: Feb 13th, 2001)--Randy Stewman now works in the kidnap-for-hire "teen transport/escort" service company, [US Transport Service, Inc. located in St. George, UT] ST. GEORGE — The owner of the Gridiron Sports Grill has pleaded guilty to arson in the Jan. 15 fire at the Promenade Shopping Center, where his business was located. Randall David Stewman, 30, pleaded guilty to the second-degree felony Wednesday and faces a maximum sentence of one to 15 years in prison and an $18,500 fine. Prosecutor Paul Dame said the fire was started on the roof of the Promenade. He said investigators found a hole had been cut in the roof of the Gridiron Sports Grill and a fuse was inserted through the hole and connected to gas-filled containers in surrounding businesses' air conditioning ducts. He said Stewman admitted setting up the fuse with intent to burn part of the shopping center, including his own business. For complete story, click here.

Groups say abuse remains in Texas juvenile prisons--August 24th, 2010--AUSTIN, Texas — Four juvenile inmate advocacy groups have alleged that widespread abuse continues in the Texas juvenile prison system, almost four years after a sex abuse and cover-up scandal forced sweeping reforms. The groups submitted a formal complaint asking the U.S. Justice Department to investigate conditions in the Texas Youth Commission, the Austin American-Statesman reported in its online edition Tuesday. The complaint filed by Texas Appleseed, Advocacy Inc., the Center for Public Representation and the National Center for Youth Law accused the commission of failing to protect the 1,700 juvenile inmates in its system because of short staffing and the use of improper restraints and excessive force. A commission statement issued Tuesday said it has worked with two of the groups for three years to address the issues "and will work to fully investigate any allegations" in the complaint. According to the newspaper, the complaint also alleged that juveniles are not provided adequate medical and mental health care and educational programs. Also, it contends the number of youth-on-youth assaults in commission facilities in Beaumont and Corsicana remain high. Those centers had the second-highest rate of sexual assault among the nation's juvenile prisons last year, according to a federal report. For complete story, click here.

Guards allegedly beat inmate in Sangamon Juvenile Center--August 26th, 2010--On July 6, 16-year-old Dalton McDermott of Springfield was allegedly beaten by two guards while an inmate at the Sangamon Juvenile Center, 2201 South Dirksen Parkway, according to his parents, Barb Howell of Springfield and Jeff McDermott of Champaign. The detention center holds young prisoners in custody while the county court system decides what to do with them. Dalton was incarcerated at the juvenile center while awaiting sentencing for a spray-painting incident, Howell says. Jeff McDermott says the beating apparently resulted from a misunderstanding about a commonly-used slang term in the Juvenile Center. Dalton apparently said he and his classmates in the detention center were going to "gun," or make fun of, a teacher, and he was given the equivalent of a time-out. He then "mouthed off" to the guards who were to escort him to his cell, McDermott says. "They grabbed him by the back of his neck while he was walking out of the classroom and slammed him into the wall," McDermott says. "He was handcuffed, and they kneeed him while he was on the ground. He had marks on both ankles and his throat." As a result of the beating, Dalton received a concussion, a fractured neck and internal bleeding, according to medical records and photographs provided by his parents. He is now in the state detention center in St. Charles, awaiting assignment to another state detention center. For complete story, click here.

Child's Ordeal Shows Risks of Psychosis Drugs for Young--September 1st, 2010-- OPELOUSAS, La. — At 18 months, Kyle Warren started taking a daily antipsychotic drug on the orders of a pediatrician trying to quell the boy's severe temper tantrums. Thus began a troubled toddler's journey from one doctor to another, from one diagnosis to another, involving even more drugs. Autism, bipolar disorder, hyperactivity, insomnia, oppositional defiant disorder. The boy's daily pill regimen multiplied: the antipsychotic Risperdal, the antidepressant Prozac, two sleeping medicines and one for attention-deficit disorder. All by the time he was 3. He was sedated, drooling and overweight from the side effects of the antipsychotic medicine. Although his mother, Brandy Warren, had been at her "wit's end" when she resorted to the drug treatment, she began to worry about Kyle's altered personality. "All I had was a medicated little boy," Ms. Warren said. "I didn't have my son. It's like, you'd look into his eyes and you would just see just blankness." Today, 6-year-old Kyle is in his fourth week of first grade, scoring high marks on his first tests. He is rambunctious and much thinner. Weaned off the drugs through a program affiliated with Tulane University that is aimed at helping low-income families whose children have mental health problems, Kyle now laughs easily and teases his family. Ms. Warren and Kyle's new doctors point to his remarkable progress — and a more common diagnosis for children of attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder — as proof that he should have never been prescribed such powerful drugs in the first place. For complete story, click here. (Webmaster Note: Perhaps if people spent more time understanding child development and what is to be expected from new people learning about this very complicated world, there wouldn't be such issues.)

Former Juvenile Jail Guard Arrested--September 7th, 2010--(Source: ktbs.com) POSTED: 2:24 pm CDT September 7, 2010 A former employee at the Caddo Juvenile Detention Center in Shreveport faces charges he battered an inmate without justification. Dale Smith, 56, of the 1000 block of Dalzell Street, was issued a summons to appear in court to answer simple battery charges, Caddo sheriff's investigators said. Smith is accused of knocking a 17-year-old inmate to the ground and choking him following a verbal altercation between the two. The incident occurred in May, investigators said. Smith was fired from his job, deputies said. For complete story, click here.

New Law to Prevent Abuse in Schools--December 11th, 2009 (Rec'd September 23rd, 2010)-- (Source: wrightslaw.com) On Wednesday, Congressman George Miller, Chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee told families, "Something is very wrong when our children are at risk of abuse or worse at school." Mr. Miller knew about Cedric, a 14-year old student in a special education classroom in Texas. He lived with a foster family because of a history of neglect, including malnutrition. In 2002, his teacher tried to punish Cedric by withholding food, despite the abuse he had suffered as a young child. Cedric's teacher delayed his lunch for hours to discipline him for not doing his work. When he did not comply with her demands, the teacher put him in a face down restraint and sat on him in front of his classmates. Cedric said repeatedly that he could not breathe. He died minutes later on the classroom floor as his terrified classmates looked on. Sadly, Cedric's story is not an isolated case. For complete story, click here.

Boarding school is a form of child abuse, says psychotherapist--June 10th, 2001 (Rec'd September 23rd, 2010)-- (Source: independent.co.uk) Children who are sent away by their parents to boarding school risk severe psychological damage, according to a leading psychotherapist. So bad is the problem that Nick Duffell, who has counselled former boarding school pupils, has now set up a support group. Children who are sent away by their parents to boarding school risk severe psychological damage, according to a leading psychotherapist. So bad is the problem that Nick Duffell, who has counselled former boarding school pupils, has now set up a support group. Boarding School Survivors (BSS) will run workshops for sufferers of "boarding school syndrome" whose symptoms include a hatred of the opposite sex, intimacy problems and obsession with work. This week, Mr Duffell will tell a health conference in London that boarders cope with the trauma of separation from their families in the same way as victims of child sexual abuse do, by burying their emotions so they are unable to form fulfilling relationships as adults. Successive writers including George Orwell and Evelyn Waugh have portrayed boarding school life as being filled with freezing showers and cold porridge. But J K Rowling has helped to fuel a recent increase in inquiries from parents of prospective pupils through the cosy picture she presents in her Harry Potter books. For complete story, click here.

State Finds Violations At Worthington Youth Home--September 24th, 2010--(Source: 10tv.com) WORTHINGTON, Ohio — A home for troubled youth that already faces criticism from its neighbors is now defending itself against a flunking state report card, 10TV News reported on Thursday. Inspectors with Ohio's Department of Job and Family Services found several violations at the United Methodist Children's Home. Among them were filthy living conditions in some of the High Street facility's six residential cottages, 10TV News reported. In the report, inspectors reported finding walls covered with graffiti, dirty and ripped carpets, moldy shower curtains and human feces on a floor, 10TV News reported. Interviews with the staff and children revealed an issue with how children are fed. Inspectors learned that some of them had to "wait until other children are done eating and wash the other child's bowl before they can eat." For complete story, click here.

Omaha Boys Town programs accused of mistreatment--September 23rd, 2010-- (Source: khsstv.com) Two Nebraska Boys Town programs are accused of treating children and teens improperly. The Nebraska Department of Health and Human Services has stopped sending troubled youth to two Omaha programs after a bad review. A Boys Town spokeswoman said no children have been mistreated at its Omaha facilities for troubled youth. But she said a recent review did uncover some issues that needed to be corrected. A Health and Human Services spokeswoman said referrals to both programs were suspended August 26th. For complete story, click here.

Death of Beloved Human Rights Activist--Deborah Ann Morgan--(October 17th, 1985 to September 8th, 2010)-- Deborah Morgan's courage and passion for justice will be remembered by all who knew her. Morgan was a survivor of SLS Health and championed the fight for justice to stop the abuse. There is no adequate reason for why she is gone. The State of NY has officially pulled all three of SLS Health's licenses. The lawsuit is nearly complete. And, hope was and continues to be restored for the victims. Deborah Morgan will always be remembered as a hero to everyone at HEAL.

Juvenile Detention Facility's Insurer Has No Duty to Defend 'Kids-for-Cash' Suits, Says Judge-- September 29th, 2010 (Source: law.com) Gregory Zappala, the owner of the juvenile detention facility at the heart of the "kids-for-cash" judicial corruption scandal in Luzerne County, suffered a setback this week when a federal judge ruled that his insurer has no duty to defend him in a spate of civil suits. Prosecutors have never charged Zappala with any wrongdoing, but the civil suits allege that he was part of a RICO conspiracy and was aware that kickbacks were being paid by his former partner to judges in order to guarantee that a steady stream of youths would be sent to a juvenile detention facility owned by Zappala's company. Zappala, the owner of Mid-Atlantic Youth Services, has argued in court papers that he never knew that former MAYS co-owner Robert Powell paid kickbacks to former Judges Mark A. Ciavarella Jr. and Michael T. Conahan. As a result, Zappala argued that General Star Indemnity Co. should be ordered to continue funding his defense of the civil suits because it is too early to say whether the policy exclusions would apply. Zappala was also seeking a ruling that the $1 million policy, in place for several years, should be deemed to provide up to $3 million in coverage in the Luzerne cases. Now U.S. District Judge A. Richard Caputo has ruled in favor of the insurer, declaring that Zappala's claimed lack of knowledge and involvement is irrelevant because Powell's confession alone is enough to trigger the policy exclusion. For complete story, click here.

DA's office did not object to no-jail plea deal for rapist, transcript reveals--September 29th, 2010-- (source: nydailynews.com) Prosecutors never objected to a no-jail plea deal for a city worker who sexually attacked three girls inside the Manhattan Family Court building, a transcript shows. The revelation came a day after Manhattan District Attorney Cy Vance Jr. blasted the judge's probation sentence for Tony Simmons as "outrageously lenient." Prosecutors had demanded jail time for Simmons, a veteran employee of the city Juvenile Justice Department who worked with troubled teens. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Chinese teen allegedly beaten to death at camp--September 29th, 2010--(source: google.com/hostednews/afp) BEIJING — A Chinese teenager was allegedly beaten to death at a boot camp for troubled youths that his mother had lured him to attend by promising he was going to study IT, state media said Thursday. Chen Shi, 16, died two days after enrolling in Beiteng School in Changsha, capital of central China's Hunan province, having been beaten up when he refused to run during training, the Beijing Times reported. According to witnesses, an instructor -- helped by two others -- beat him with a plastic pipe, handcuffs and a wooden baton when he refused to run. The incident comes amid controversy over China's hundreds of boot camps that aim to discipline unruly youths or wean them off web addictions. His mother Tang Yulin decided to enrol Chen to toughen him up because he was "afraid of hardship, had weak willpower and not enough self-confidence" and had failed a school exam, it said. They both travelled to Changsha from their home province of Jiangsu, in the east, after Tang told Chen he was going to study IT to persuade him to go. The school's admissions director had advised her to lie, saying 90 percent of students who attended were given a false reason for attending and the remaining 10 percent were "kidnapped" by their parents or school instructors. For complete story, click here.

Teen Freed From Lock Up Amid Sex Abuse Claims--October 9th, 2010 (source: miamiherald.com)--A teen was released from a state juvenile lockup in Pembroke Pines amid claims in a federal lawsuit that youths held there had endured "horrific" abuse. For complete story, click here.

Norfolk investigates worker for credit card use, absences--October, 2010 (Source: hamptonroads.com) THE ALLEGATIONS Lynn Moore was the director of the Norfolk Interagency Consortium, which helps troubled teens. Sources say the city auditor has found more than $10,000 in charges on a city credit card that Moore can't document or are "unsubstantiated." It is also alleged that Moore would not show up for work at the consortium's headquarters for days at a time but did not claim any vacation time for the last six years she worked. THE HISTORY This is the third instance of city credit card abuse in less than a year. Commissioner of Revenue Sharon McDonald and employee Barbara Lai also made improper charges. And a Norfolk Community Services Board employee is being investigated for being paid for 12 years but not showing up for work. (Complete story)

Worthington Children's Home Ends Residential Treatment Program--November 11th, 2010 (Source: nbc4i.com) WORTHINGTON, Ohio -- A very public battle over what to do about a home for troubled teens took another turn Monday. The new CEO of the United Methodist Children's Home in Worthington now says they'll no longer take in teens to stay at the facility. For more than 100 years, The United Methodist Children's Home has existed, and big changes came as the residential treatment program was cut Monday. "It has been a tough time. We were basically forced to make the decision," said Bill Wilkins, CEO. Dick Goetz lives right behind the facility and said he didn't know the change was coming. "I'm surprised to hear it. (I) don't know where the revenue comes from," Goetz said. For complete story, click here.

Suit attacks conditions at Miss. juvenile lockup--November 16th, 2010 (source: washingtonpost.com) JACKSON, Miss. -- A federal lawsuit claims guards at a Mississippi juvenile lockup have smuggled drugs to inmates, had sex with some of them and denied others medical treatment and basic educational services. The Southern Poverty Law Center, the American Civil Liberties Union and Rob McDuff, a Jackson attorney, filed the complaint Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Jackson on behalf of 13 plaintiffs against the Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility. The Justice Department also is investigating. "These young men live in barbaric conditions," said Sheila Bedi, the law center's deputy legal director. "I have done prisons conditions work for almost 10 years, this is the most violent, corrupt abusive prison I've come across." The complaint claims that guards allowed inmate fights that resulted in stab wounds and severe beatings, including one that left one youth with permanent brain damage. It also says inmates were stripped naked and held in isolation for weeks at a time and that sick inmates were denied proper health care. Sex acts between inmates and prison guards and nurses occurred in isolated, camera-free areas of the prison, including individual cells, medical unit examination rooms and restrooms, the lawsuit alleges. It also claimed handcuffed youth were kicked and punched by guards, while others secured in their cells were sprayed with chemical restraints. For complete story, click here.

North Texas Courts Send Troubled Teens Out of State--November 23rd, 2010 (source: myfoxdfw.com) DALLAS - A computer lab, weight room, indoor pool, movie theatre, and video arcade...and your tax dollars help pick up the tab. So, how do you sign up your kids? Well, you can't sign up for this program because it's ordered by a judge for troubled teens. But it's not a local facility. It's not even in Texas. So, when governments are facing major money problems, does it make sense to send young offenders thousands of miles out of state? Howard Nick looks like a tough guy but chokes up easily when talking about his 14 year old grandson. In September, a Denton County Juvenile Court Judge sent Nathan to Glenn Mills residential treatment facility outside of Philadelphia. "I said the only way you can hurt me is to send him to Philadelphia," Nick says he told the probation officer. "We hadn't been separated in almost 15 years," Nick told FOX 4. Nathan's juvenile records are confidential by law but Nick admits his grandson had problems with truancy, broke in to a car, and had probation violations. Now, Nick feels like he has lost his grandson, whom he's raised since birth. Nick says he begged the county not to send the boy out of state. "She called me and said they accepted him. And I said, 'oh, hell. Why so far away?'" Nick told FOX 4. "I was so upset I couldn't talk to the probation officer." Nick and his grandson are not alone. Denton County started sending juvenile offenders out of state last year. So far, taxpayers have shelled-out $84,327 for four juveniles. Most of that comes from the feds and grant money. Since 2005, Dallas County has sent 45 juveniles out of state to Pennsylvania, Arizona, and Arkansas at a cost of $963,292.00. Of that cost, $730,536.00 came directly from Dallas County taxpayers. Tarrant County has sent 15 juveniles to out of state facilities since 2006, costing taxpayers $538,063.00. But Collin County has not sent a single juvenile offender out of state. For complete story, click here.

Investigator Exclusive: Youth worker charged with raping teen--November 23rd, 2010 (source: wkyc.com) BROOKLYN -- An HIV-positive man who worked with troubled teens at a Cleveland residential treatment center is charged with raping a 17-year-old boy who was once a patient at the center, Cuyahoga County Prosecutor spokesman Ryan Miday said. Brooklyn Police arrested Ronnie Sagere, 34, after the boy went last Wednesday morning to MetroHealth Medical Center and reported that he was sexually assaulted at Sagere's home on Westbrook Drive, Miday said. The boy was sleeping at the home after getting drunk on booze bought by Sagere when he woke up to find Sagere on top of him, raping him, according to Miday. Sagere remained in jail Tuesday after a judge set bail at $100,000. He faces charges of rape, gross sexual imposition, kidnapping and felonious assault, according to court records. The felonious assault charge was filed because Sagere is HIV positive. Sagere worked at the Cleveland Christian Home, a residential center on Lorain Avenue, where wards of the state are treated for behavioral and mental health issues, said Cleveland Christian Home Chief Executive Officer David Lundeen. For complete story, click here.

Parents sue Nashville forensics company over jail death--November 27th, 2010-- (Source: tennessean.com) Birth defect blamed; parents say son beaten BY BRIAN HAAS • THE TENNESSEAN • NOVEMBER 27, 2010 The parents of a Memphis teen who died after being restrained in a Rutherford County jail have filed a lawsuit against the Nashville forensics company that ruled his death natural. The suit seeks at least $3 million in the death of Andron Reed, 18, from Forensic Medical, the company that was contracted to perform autopsies for the state of Tennessee. In it, Reed's parents accuse Forensic Medical of "deceitful and untrue statements and dishonorable professional conduct" in investigating Reed's death. In a separate federal lawsuit, the Reed family is suing the Rutherford County Sheriff's Office, saying his death was caused by "excessive and traumatic" restraints. For complete story, click here.

Republicans Sink Bill to Prevent Abuse in Teen Behavior Schools --December 6th, 2010 -- (Source: huffingtonpost.com) As Congress fights this week over taxes, the deficit commission and finally ending "don't ask, don't tell" another issue involving the health and safety of tens of thousands of American teens has flown under the radar. Last year, with broad bipartisan support, the US House of Representatives passed HR 911, the Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act, which would provide some minimum standards for the multimillion dollar teen behavior modification industry. The industry, which has largely escaped widespread public scrutiny, preys upon the fears of parents through deceptive marketing tactics and outright lies. Promising parents to straighten out their "troubled teens" (who usually aren't all that troubled) this industry locks away teens in abusive camps subjecting them to months or years of forced labor, humiliating degradation and unthinkable physical, psychological and sexual abuse. Tens of thousands of teens are suffering in these programs right now and dozens have been killed, but after weeks of promising negotiations in the Senate to move forward with some kind of protection for these youth, Senate Republicans abruptly closed negotiations and killed any hope this year of stopping this rampant child abuse. For complete story, click here (or read all links on the HEAL site relating to teen programs.)

Poor jail conditions blamed for suicides--December 11th, 2010 -- (Source: torontosun.com) WINNIPEG - Troubled teens are being put at greater risk of suicide in a jail that was never designed to hold them for long periods of time, says a Winnipeg lawyer. "The tendency is to treat them like adults, and they aren't adults," said Saul Simmonds. A 17-year-old girl was taken to hospital in critical condition Wednesday after attempting suicide at the Manitoba Youth Centre. Her medical status could not be confirmed Friday. This comes five months after a 15-year-old girl committed suicide at the centre. Simmonds says MYC wasn't designed to hold young offenders for years at a time -- something now commonplace -- and offers them little in the way of resources. "That kind of long-term holding does not allow a person to develop," he said. The increased presence of gangs at the youth centre makes it more difficult for some first-time offenders to cope, placing them at risk of suicide, Simmonds said. For complete story, click here.

School for troubled teens is under review after fight draws police: suspected ring leaders charged with felonies--December 14th, 2010 -- (Source: lohud.com) SOMERS — State officials will investigate Lincoln Hall in the aftermath of a 30-student riot that broke out last week at the residential school for troubled boys. The state's Office of Children and Family Services, which licenses Lincoln Hall, on Monday said it is conducting a "thorough review" of the school's operations, including its student-to-staff ratio and discipline procedures, and will meet with administrators to discuss ways to prevent further violence. "We are aware of and concerned about recent incidents on campus," said OCFS spokeswoman Susan Steele. The announcement came as four Lincoln Hall residents, accused of instigating Friday's riot that injured several employees, were granted residence at another youth center during an appearance Monday in Town Court. David Excource, 17, Cleveland Fowler, 16, Sergio Naranjo, 16, and Shakiem Way, 17, were charged over the weekend with first-degree riot, a felony, and are being held in county jail on $10,000 bail. They will be moved to a youth center in Mount Vernon if room is available, and are due back in court Jan. 10. For complete story, click here.

Mosque focus falls on former Dundee teen--December 15th, 2010 (Source: newsregister.com) ...He asked Crawford to take a polygraph exam, then to permit a search. When he was met with refusal on both counts, he left a surveillance team in place while he left to obtain a search warrant. In the affidavit, Poole said that based on this investigation, he believes the crimes of first-degree arson, first-degree criminal mischief, second-degree burglary, second-degree intimidation, possession of a destructive device and unlawful manufacture of a destructive device were committed, and that supporting evidence of the crimes would be found either at the Crawford residence or on Crawford's person. During his teen years in Yamhill County, he compiled a record that led his mother to place him in the Dundee Ranch behavioral treatment program in Costa Rica. However, she had to fly down and retrieve him after authorities shut the academy down on allegations of rampant abuse. He contended he was beaten and tortured there, as did other troubled teens sent there for treatment. His story was chronicled by then-reporter Matt LaPlante in an extensive News-Register article in 2003... For complete story, click here.

Home-based therapy best for troubled teens, experts say--December 17th, 2010 (Source: independentmail.com) Tough-love boarding schools have become a popular option for parents seeking to straighten out their unruly children. But critics say that these schools are not always the best or safest option. "There is absolutely no evidence that tough love works," said Maia Szalavitz, a journalist who scrutinized the troubled-teen industry in her 2006 book "Help at Any Cost." Data gathered by the United States Government Accountability Office in 2005 revealed 1,503 incidents in which students were mistreated by staff members at boarding schools and wilderness programs. In 2006, 28 states reported at least one death in residential facilities for troubled teens, according to GAO official Kay Brown's testimony at a 2008 congressional hearing. Less than a year after this hearing, the U.S. House of Representatives passed a measure intended to better protect teens at residential programs. However, the legislation never came up for a vote in the Senate. Szalavitz said parents should consider home-based treatment options before sending their children away to a boarding school. "The best treatments for teenagers involve the family," she said. "The idea that you can fix a relationship by exiling someone doesn't pass the common-sense test." For complete story, click here.

Hopevale: Home For Troubled Teens In Hamburg Closing--December 19th, 2010 (Source: wgrz.com) HAMBURG, NY-- It was started 155 years ago by the Sisters of Charity as a home for wayward girls. Now Hopevale, a Hamburg based agency which offers services to abused children and troubled teens, is shutting down after more than a century and a half of service. "We've got significant financial problems and we just couldn't go forward any more. We're out of money...I don't know how to put it to you clearer than that," said Jim Walter, a management consultant brought on to assist at Hopevale six months ago. Walter says a combination of factors have steered Hopevale toward financial ruin to the point where its directors have decided to cease operations and, regrettably, will have to lay off 190 full and part time staff. "Most of the income for this not for profit agency comes from the residential treatment center," explained Walter, who says changing trends in the methods deployed to assist troubled teens were a significant factor in Hopevale's financial plight. "In general, the use of residential treatment centers has dropped off -- they're trying to keep the child at home where they can and residential treatment is an expensive thing for counties to afford, so they look at alternatives a lot more closely than they used to," Walter told WGRZ-TV. Walter also noted some troubling incidents in the past year which caused Hopevale to temporarily cease accepting placements to its residential program, which also helped to contribute to dwindling enrollment to the point where there are only half as many kids as a year ago. "We shut down because there were concerns with regard to child safety and some concerns with regard to the effectiveness of the programs...when we did that, as we were working to improve out programs, we lost census," Walter said. For complete story, click here.

Abbeville school had role in rise and fall of enterprise for serving troubled teens--December 19th, 2010 (Source: independentmail.com) DUE WEST — A boarding school reopening near Due West next year was previously part of a thriving network of facilities for troubled teens reaching from California to the Czech Republic. Parents were eager to send their out-of-control adolescents to tough-love boarding schools like Carolina Springs Academy in Abbeville County. The facility, which filled to capacity soon after opening, was among more than a dozen institutions affiliated with the Utah-based Worldwide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools. At one point, tuition payments topped $90 million annually from students enrolled in behavior-modification programs designed by Worldwide's founder, Robert Lichfield. Worldwide's boarding school empire has crumbled in recent years. Under pressure from state regulators, Carolina Springs closed in 2009. It intends to reopen next year as a coed Christian boarding school without any ties to Worldwide, which also is known as WWASPS. Worldwide President Ken Kay said WWASPS is "out of business." He blamed the recession and media coverage of abuse allegations, arrests, raids and two students' deaths for contributing to its demise. WASPS still exists on paper, he explained, so that its insurance company will keep paying the attorneys who are defending Worldwide in ongoing lawsuits. The highest profile case is a federal suit involving 353 parents and former students. The suit accuses WWASPS and its affiliates — including Carolina Springs — of assault, battery, false imprisonment, fraud and racketeering. Students at WWASPS boarding schools "were subjected to physical abuse, emotional abuse and sexual abuse," the suit alleges. "In many instances, the abuse could accurately be described as torture of children." For complete story, click here.

Fire destroys former home for troubled youth--December 16th, 2010-- (Source: wlox.com) FORREST COUNTY, MS (WDAM) An early-morning fire gutted a three-story dormitory building in Forrest County once used to house troubled girls. The facility once known as Bethesda Home for Girls was recently leased by Ezekiel house ministries, which operates a transition house on Bouie Street. Organizers were planning on opening the old Bethesda location in January under a new name - Reclamation Ranch. For complete story, click here.

DA Says Counselor Targeted "Damaged" Teens to Sexually Abuse--January 20th, 2011 (Source: dnainfo.com) MANHATTAN SUPREME COURT — A juvenile justice counselor on trial for rape preyed on a child prostitute and other troubled and "damaged" teens because he thought they would not report him, prosecutors charged in summations at his trial Thursday. The DA argued Tony Simmons, 47, was a friendly, outgoing counselor who was well liked by colleagues and detainees. His cover worked until a supervisor heard about one of his exploits, Assistant District Attorney Evan Krutoy said during closing arguments Friday. Prosecutors charged Simmons knew the kids and their problems well, having served as a counselor for 16 years. "He knew they were damaged," Krutoy said. "He's not a man with a gun and a mask and in an alley. [He has] a smile and a [Department of Juvenile Justice] ID card." But when the predator could, "he did it and he knew it was risky," said Krutoy. Read more: <http://www.dnainfo.com/20110120/downtown/da-says-counselor-targeted-damaged-teens-sexually-abuse#ixzz1BiOkJC66> For complete story, click here.

Cleveland Job Corps program troubled, Plain Dealer investigation shows--January 31st, 2011 (Source: cleveland.com) The Cleveland Job Corps Academy opened in November 2007 with high expectations and a mission to educate, train, house and find jobs for troubled teens and young adults. Championed by the late Congresswoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones as a crucial community resource, the academy drew praise from then-U.S. Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao, who toured the $35 million, 25-acre campus in Collinwood six months later and boasted it "will help so many young people find hope and opportunity." But a Plain Dealer investigation has found that the academy is in turmoil. The investigation, begun last spring and based on interviews with current and former Job Corps workers, public records and internal documents obtained by the paper, revealed: Applied Technology Systems Inc., the Cleveland-based company that is paid millions of tax dollars a year to run the federal program, has failed to pay bills, at times leaving students without properly maintained fire alarms, medical services, uniforms and other supplies. Unruly students have been accused of numerous crimes, including fighting with neighborhood gang members, assaulting other students, stealing, and possessing drugs and knives. The crimes and behavior problems have disrupted learning, promoted fear on campus led to low morale and staff turnover, according to former employees and documents. ATSI often tolerated bad behavior and passed poorly performing students to meet contract and financial goals, former employees charge. For complete story, click here.

Md., Calif. Suspend 'Scared Straight' Programs--February 4th, 2011 (Source: abcnews.go.com) Maryland and California prison officials said Friday they have suspended youthful offender diversion programs featured on the television show "Beyond Scared Straight" after the U.S. Justice Department warned they could lose federal funding. The A&E series, which started Jan. 13, is produced by Arnold Shapiro, maker of the Emmy- and Oscar-winning 1979 television special, "Scared Straight." Like that show, it documents visits by troubled teenagers to prisons where intimidating inmates deliver in-your-face lectures about the harshness of life behind bars. A prison agency spokesman in South Carolina, the only other state featured on the A&E Network series, said the diversion program will be reviewed by the state's incoming corrections chief. The Justice Department said a study of nine such programs concluded they don't deter teenagers from offending. In fact, the youths were more likely to offend, according to Assistant Attorney General Laurie O. Robinson and Jeff Slowikowski, acting administrator of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. "In light of this evidence, the U.S. Department of Justice discourages the funding of scared straight-type programs. States that operate such programs could have their federal funding reduced if shown not to have complied with the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act," the federal officials wrote in an op-ed piece published Monday in The (Baltimore) Sun. Slowikowski said his office recently expressed these concerns to officials in the three states. For complete story, click here.

Mom suing after son dies in summer drowning--February 5th, 2011 (source: philly.com) CARNEZ BOONE would have been back home in Delaware County by now. But Boone, a 14-year-old Collingdale boy who had been sent to a residential treatment program in western Pennsylvania, disappeared in the murky water at Lakeside Park in Stoneboro last summer, drowning after having jumped off the high dive. Besides having to deal with Carnez's early death, his mother, Okita Allen, can't help but wonder what he was doing on the diving board in the first place. Carnez couldn't swim. According to a lawsuit Allen filed last week, school counselors pressured Carnez to jump off the high dive during a class trip with the YES Academy, a yearlong residential program for troubled teens. "My child is dead. There was no remorse, no compassion," said Allen, 38. For complete story, click here.

Founder uncertain about future of boarding school in Abbeville County--February 5th, 2011 (Source: independentmail.com) Narvin Lichfield spent a night in the Abbeville County Detention Center last month, and now he is having second thoughts about reopening his boarding school for troubled teens. "I might just liquidate the property," Lichfield said in an interview last week. "I am tired. I am worn out." (Webmaster Note: Hey, great idea!!! HEAL supports Lichfield in closing the program for good.) For complete story, click here.

Ex-Texas prison official on trial for pupil sex--February 6th, 2011 (Source: chron.com) By BETSY BLANEY Associated Press © 2011 The Associated Press Feb. 6, 2011, 10:56AM LUBBOCK, Texas — Six years have passed since a sex scandal involving jail administrators and teenage inmates were first investigated by Texas Rangers. In that time, the case has prompted the resignations or firings of several top state officials responsible for jailing Texas' juvenile criminals and sent a former West Texas jail administrator to prison. Now, after years of court motions and alleged inaction by a local district attorney, state prosecutors have one target left in their case: John Paul Hernandez. The 45-year-old former principal at the Texas Youth Commission's West Texas State School in Pyote is on trial this week on charges he sexually molested pupils in 2004 and 2005. For complete story, click here. (Hernandez was ultimately acquitted. Source: http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/41711814/ns/us_news/)

Former Judge Is on Trial in 'Cash for Kids' Scheme--February 9th, 2011 (Source: nytimes.com) SCRANTON, Pa. — A former Pennsylvania judge went on trial in federal court on Tuesday, charged with racketeering, bribery and extortion in what prosecutors say was a $2.8 million scheme to send juvenile delinquents to privately run prisons. The case against the judge, Mark A. Ciavarella Jr., who presided in Luzerne County, drew national attention for what legal experts say is a dangerous gap in the juvenile justice systems of many states — children appearing in court without lawyers. Mr. Ciavarella, now 60, sentenced thousands of young people, funneling them into two private detention centers prosecutors say were run by his friends who slipped him payments in a "cash for kids" scheme. Few of the young people had lawyers, a chronic problem that legal scholars say makes guilty pleas more likely, saddling them with criminal records. The state has since expunged more than 6,000 records of youths Mr. Ciavarella sentenced, some for crimes as small as stealing a jar of nutmeg. "It was a terrible lesson," said Laurence H. Tribe, a constitutional law professor at Harvard Law School who founded the Obama administration's Access to Justice Initiative. He added: "It highlighted the dangers for juveniles who don't know their rights, haven't talked to a lawyer and are urged by overburdened courts to take a plea. Once that happens, future opportunities for the child are essentially gone." In court here on Tuesday, Gordon Zubrod, an assistant United States attorney, portrayed Mr. Ciavarella's actions over seven years as a plot to enrich himself. William Ruzzo, a lawyer for Mr. Ciavarella, denied the charges. For complete story, click here.

Greg Kutz: Uncovering child abuse and neglect at residential, public and private schools--September 27th, 2010 (Received by HEAL on February 15th, 2011, Source: washingtonpost.com) The Partnership for Public Service Monday, September 27, 2010; 5:04 PM In Arizona, a teen with asthma and complaining of chest pains was forced by counselors at a residential boot camp to do pushups and carry cinder blocks for not having completed an assignment. The youngster subsequently died, with an autopsy finding more than 70 physical injuries. In West Virginia, a four-year-old autistic girl with cerebral palsy was tied to a chair, badly bruised and traumatized. In Utah, a 16-year-old boy in a wilderness therapy program collapsed and died after counselors ignored signs of physical distress for three weeks, including severe weight loss, severe abdominal pain and loss of bodily functions. These shocking and heartbreaking stories are among thousands of cases chronicled by Gregory Kutz, a Government Accountability Office (GAO) managing director, who led a nationwide investigation that documented widespread abuse, torture, neglect and death of troubled and disabled children in residential programs and in public and private schools across the United States. For complete story, click here.

Former Pa. judge guilty of corruption--February 18th, 2011 (Source: upi.com) SCRANTON, Pa., Feb. 18 (UPI) -- A federal jury in Scranton, Pa., Friday found former Luzerne County Judge Mark Ciavarella guilty of racketeering, mail fraud and money laundering. Ciavarella faces a possible prison sentence and must repay $997,600 to the government for his role in a kickback scheme in which he sent young offenders to a juvenile detention center run by a private company, WNEP-TV, Scranton, reported. Ciavarella was charged with 39 counts of racketeering, fraud, money laundering, extortion and filing false tax returns; he was found not guilty on 10 counts of receiving a bribe, eight counts of extortion and four counts of wire fraud, the station said. The jury deliberated for more than 11 hours in the trial that began Monday, hearing testimony from Internal Revenue Service agents, Luzerne County attorney Robert Powell, former Luzerne County Prothonotary Jill Moran and the defendant, who denied the extortion charges but admitted filing false income tax returns. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court in 2009 ordered that criminal records be cleared for juveniles sentenced by Ciavarella between 2003 and 2008. Ciavarella and another judge, Michael T. Conohan, agreed to plead guilty in 2009 to wire fraud and conspiracy, acknowledging they got about $2.6 million from the owners of two detention centers. But U.S. District Judge Edwin Kosik rejected the plea agreement. For complete story, click here.

Adam Lambert Tells Troubled Gay Teens To Love Themselves--February 19th, 2011 (Source: ontopmag.com)

Holder supports prevention for youths over courts--March 7th, 2011 (Source: washingtonpost.com) WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Eric Holder said Monday that some programs aimed at scaring troubled teens into better behavior are failing in their mission. Speaking to a legislative conference of county officials, the attorney general said the nation's system of juvenile justice must move away from prosecution and punishment and more toward prevention and intervention. Holder cited a scientific review that found that children ordered into nine so-called scared straight programs around the country are nearly 30 percent more likely to offend than youths who are not. "Scared straight" initiatives involve visits by troubled teenagers to prisons where intimidating inmates deliver in-your-face lectures about the harshness of life behind bars. The attorney general says many youths who are incarcerated for nonviolent offenses often emerge violent or at the very least, traumatized. For complete story, click here.

(Webmaster Note: Thank you to President and First Lady Obama for speaking up for children and against abuse and bullying.)

Bullying is not a Rite of Passage--March 10th, 2011 (Source: washingtonpost.com) Valerie Jarrett had just run through what would happen at today's summit on bullying when I asked her a rather blunt question. With all that's going on -- fights over budget cuts, the encroaching debt ceiling, the economy, job creation, not to mention the wave of protests across the Middle East and the bloody intransigence of Moammar Gaddafi -- why is President Obama focused on this today? "What could be more important than our children?" Jarrett, senior adviser to the president, asked during an interview in her West Wing office Wednesday Thursday. "There is a perception that bullying is a rite of passage. And it's not....It's just not acceptable." For complete story, click here.

SPLC Sues Mississippi County After 'Shocking' Video Shows Abuses at Juvenile Facility--March 8th, 2011 (splcenter.org) The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC) and Disability Rights Mississippi (DRMS) today filed a lawsuit against Forrest County, Miss., to force the county to comply with federal law and provide the children held at the county's juvenile detention center with access to lawyers and civil rights advocates following reports of abusive conditions at the facility. Video footage from the Forrest County Juvenile Detention Center shows a youth hogtied and other abuses, including a youth slammed against a wall by a guard. The video was recently released despite the county's effort to prevent it from being aired. When advocates for the SPLC and DRMS sought access to the detention center in order to provide detained youth with federally mandated protection and advocacy services, county officials barred their access to the children. For complete story, click here.

Friday, Mar. 18, 2011 Grand juries recommend youth jail be evaluated By ROBIN FITZGERALD - rfitzgerald@sunherald.com Grand juries for Harrison County's Gulfport and Biloxi divisions expressed concern over deteriorating conditions at the Juvenile Detention Center in final reports for their six-month terms. The report from the Gulfport panel gave a detailed list of recommendations, and concluded that while there have been improvements, "the deplorable physical conditions of the facility must be attended to immediately." The youth center is in Biloxi. The Gulfport panel took before-and-after pictures of improvements at the center, but recommended a strategic plan for building or relocating a modernized facility in Gulfport near the county's youth court. Until that happens, the report said, maintenance of the current facility should receive "utmost priority." The Biloxi panel's report recommended a third-party evaluation to make sure the youth center "is operated under acceptable guidelines and principals." Both panels also visited the county jail and children's shelter. The Gulfport panel recommended the jail booking and medical areas be renovated and expanded, and noted neither area is sufficient to handle the number of inmates housed at the jail. The Gulfport panel also addressed law enforcement concerns, and recommended cases be brought to the grand jury in a more timely manner. It also agreed with previous grand juries that all cases of sexual assaults against children be thoroughly investigated and evidence gathered as effectively as possible. The grand juries returned a combined total of 700 indictments and 130 no true bills. The Gulfport panel served under Circuit Judge Lisa Dodson, and was in session a total of 18 days. The Biloxi panel served under Circuit Judge Roger Clark. It was in session 12 days. Read more: <http://www.sunherald.com/2011/03/18/2955120/grand-juries-recommend-youth-jail.html#ixzz1H2YJymK7>

PANI Rescues 20 Young Americans Who Suffered Various Attacks--March 22nd, 2011 (Source: insidecostarica.com) The Patronato Nacional de la Infancia (PANI) - Costa Rica's child welfare agency - says it rescued on Monday a group of 20 American minors who allegedly received psychological and physical abuse by managers of a reformatory in Puntarenas. The academy "Teen Mentor" has been operating since 2010 in the Hotel Carra in Tarcoles de Garabito, Puntarenas. The PANI took the action to intervene following complaints from three psychologists at the academy. Ten children were transferred directly to a PANI shelter, while the case is still in under investigation. Parents paid from us$600 per month to keep their children between the ages of 13 and 18 in the program. PANI officials say all the youths found in the academy on Monday were all Americans. Jorge Urbina, manager of the PANI, told the media on Monday that the U.S. Embassy in San José was in the process of notifying all the parents to come get their children. The action by the PANI quickly reminds that of the "Dundee Ranch" academy back in 2004. Academy at Dundee Ranch was a behavior modification facility for United States teenagers west of Orotina. It was promoted as a residential school, offering a program of behavior modification, motivational "emotional growth seminars," a progressive academic curriculum, and a structured daily schedule, for teenagers struggling in their homes, schools, or communities. The facility was associated with World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools (WWASP). For complete story, click here.

Costa Rica government closes controversial 'tough love' youth camp--March 22nd, 2011 (Source: ticotimes.net) For the second time in the past nine years a behavior modification center run by the Utah-based World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP) was closed in Costa Rica for alleged psychological and physical mistreatment of residents. Last Friday, the Child Welfare Office (PANI) closed the center, known as Teen Mentor, which advertises therapeutic and psychological services to 21 U.S. teenagers aged 13 to 18. Parents had placed the troubled teens in the facility to address behavioral issues and problems with substance abuse. PANI closed the center after receiving complaints that the student residents were being subjected to physical and mental abuse from the supervisors of the program. Three PANI psychologists visited the facility to interview the students when they were alerted to the allegedly abusive conditions at the center, the daily La Nación reported. The organization's website, which has since been disabled, offered behavior modification services for a monthly fee. The residents had been staying at the Hotel Carara in the town of Tárcoles de Garabito, in Puntarenas, west of San José near the Pacific Ocean. "They rented the entire hotel for several months," said a hotel employee who asked that his name be withheld. "The boys were downstairs, the girls were upstairs. As far as abuse or things like that, we usually only saw the kids during pool time and don't really know what went on when they went to the beach or outside. When I came to work on Friday, PANI was here and by that night everyone was gone." Robert Walter Lichfield, the founder of the WWASP program, registered Teen Mentor as an official business in the national registry in August 2010. In the last 16 years, 15 behavioral facilities operated by WWASP have been closed due to similar allegations by child welfare organizations in the U.S. and other countries. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Family Resources is under investigation--March 24th, 2011 (Source: whbf.com) A center for troubled youth in davenport is under investigation after an alleged sexual abuse incident. It apparently happened when the boys were in time out. Family Resources is being investigated by the Department of Human Services after two teens, a 17 and 13 year old, who have a history of sex offenses, allegedly engaged in a sex act. The young people housed at the Family Resources' 24 hour care facility come through the court system and have significant emotional and behavioral needs... And staff members said they didn't find out about the November incident until days afterwards. "When our client came to us and admitted to the situation we immediately followed up with emergency medical care for him," said Cheryl Goodwin, President & CEO, Family Resources. The facility is now operating under a temporary license until their corrective action plan has been reviewed by the state. "The next step is to have somebody visit the campus and make sure that they are doing what it is they said they would do," said Roger Munns, Iowa Department of Human Services. Unfortunately, staff members and state officials said this isn't the first something like this has happened at the facility... For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here.

Wilderness, youth therapy programs closing--March 25th, 2011 (Source: sltrib.com) A wave of closures and consolidations in wilderness therapy and youth treatment programs in Utah will take nearly 200 jobs from Wayne County alone. Three programs for troubled young people, owned by Aspen Education Group, constitute the biggest employer in the county, which is home to the redrock landscape of Capitol Reef National Park, said Les Prall, of the Governor's Office of Economic Development. Without Aspen, he predicted unemployment in Wayne County will rise to nearly 22 percent. "That's the highest I've ever seen for an unemployment rate in a county," Prall said. "It's a very major thing, it's huge." The tightening national credit market was a big factor forcing the closures, said Aspen President Phil Herschman. Facing price tags of $18,000 to $60,000 for weeks or months in the intensive therapeutic programs, parents often turned to home equity or other loans, he said. Education loans for therapy "no longer exist," Herschman said. "The demand had just dried up dramatically." It's a trend that affects the entire multimillion-dollar industry in Utah. "We haven't had as many closures here, mainly because a lot of the programs are just barely hanging on to try and save themselves," said state licensing director Ken Stettler. CRC Health Group, Aspen's California-based parent company, will close two programs in Utah: An equine and behavioral therapy boarding school in Wayne County, and a substance abuse treatment facility for teens in St. George. Another Wayne County drug rehab program will move to Idaho. The state's longest-running wilderness therapy program, Aspen Achievement Academy, will move from Wayne County to Lehi and merge with another program, Outback Expeditions. A live-in treatment center for teens in Draper will merge with a similar facility in Syracuse. Read More at: <http://www.sltrib.com/sltrib/home/51497664-76/programs-aspen-county-therapy.html.csp>

Aspen Education Group to Restructure Programs--March 24th, 2011 (Source: strugglingteens.com) "As part of this operational restructuring, Aspen has announced plans to discontinue operations at five locations and consolidate services for three other facilities. The programs to be closed include Bromley Brook School (Manchester Center, VT), New Leaf Academy of Oregon, NorthStar Center (Bend, OR), Aspen Ranch (Loa, UT) and SunHawk Adolescent Recovery Center (St. George, UT). Aspen Achievement Academy (Loa, UT) will consolidate with Aspen's Outback Therapeutic Expeditions in Lehi, Utah; Youth Care (Draper, UT) will be moving onto Aspen's Island View campus in Syracuse, UT, maintaining its established brand name; and Passages to Recovery (Loa, UT) will be relocating to Shoshone, ID, to add a young adult substance abuse treatment component to Aspen's already existing SUWS Adolescent & Youth program." (Webmaster Note: Provided to help add information to the article directly below. Click title link to go to complete article. HEAL will not be posting the complete article on our website as it is our well established and evidenced belief that strugglingteens.com is little more than an unethical referral and self-promoting website that does not exhibit due diligence in the "information" they provide on programs. Woodbury's continued association with CEDU-based programs and other fraudulent and abusive facilities remains a serious concern.)

Town Relies On Troubled Youth Prison For Profits--March 25th, 2011 (source: npr.org) First in a two-part series on private prisons Prisons are filled with stress and violence; without proper supervision they can revert to primitive places. That's what happened at Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility in Mississippi, an NPR news investigation has determined. As the nation's largest juvenile prison, Walnut Grove houses 1,200 boys and young men in a sprawling one-story complex ringed by security fences about an hour's drive east of Jackson. The State of Mississippi pays a private corrections company to run the prison. NPR's investigation found that allegations swirling around the prison raise the fundamental question of whether profits have distorted the mission of rehabilitating young inmates. An Environment Of Violence Walnut Grove "started out and it was formed to be something good for youth, but somewhere down the line it took a turn for the worse," said former inmate Clayborne Henderson, 27. He spent two years for kidnapping in "the Grove," as they call it, between his 19th and 21st birthdays. Now he's working at a car wash and taking community college courses in Jackson, trying to straighten out his life. The Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility houses 1,200 boys and young men east of Jackson, Miss. John Burnett/NPR The Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility houses 1,200 boys and young men east of Jackson, Miss. He and other former inmates describe an environment of violence inside the youth prison as so pervasive it became entertainment. "It'd be like setting up a fight deal like you would with two dogs," Henderson said. "I did witness twice while I was at Walnut Grove, they actually bet on it. It was payday for the guards." For complete story, click here.

A RELIGIOUS SUB-CULTURE MANY AMERICANS HAVE NEVER HEARD OF, YET HAS THOUSANDS OF CHURCHES ACROSS THE COUNTRY ... CHURCHES THAT CRITICS CLAIM CAN FOSTER PHYSICAL AND SEXUAL ABUSE--April 6th, 2011 (source: blogs.abcnnews.com) Elizabeth Vargas' Yearlong Investigation Into The Independent Fundamental Baptist Church, Aired On "20/20," Friday, April 8, 10-11 PM ET Try to imagine the pain and humiliation of a teenage girl, just 15 years old, who says she was forced to stand in front of a New Hampshire church congregation and confess her "sin" of being pregnant. She says not only was she forced to confess her pregnancy, but also to ask for their forgiveness -- with no mention of the man she says sexually abused her. After all, she says, the pastor told her it's better than being stoned to death as the bible describes. That is what Tina Anderson alleged happened to her at her ultra conservative Independent Fundamental Baptist, or IFB, Church. The IFB has thousands of congregations across the country, but many people have never heard of it. That was, until another woman, Jocelyn Zichterman, began a public campaign -- armed with nothing but a computer and memories of her own alleged abuse that she says church beliefs can foster. And survivors are now coming out of the woodwork, to say she's not alone.

Elizabeth Vargas' yearlong exclusive investigation into a religious sub-culture that critics claim can foster – even cover up – physical and sexual abuse airs on “20/20” on FRIDAY, APRIL 8 (10:00 – 11:00 p.m. ET) on the ABC Television Network. Critics say the church teaches a strict interpretation of the bible including the practice known as breaking the will of the child, with some advocating that it even be applied to infants as young as two weeks old. “I had a decision to make that either I was going to kind of curl up in the corner and be quiet or I was going to stand up for my family and tell the truth,” says Jocelyn Zichterman. For complete story, click here.

Increasingly, Internet Activism Helps Shutter Abusive 'Troubled Teen' Boot Camps--April 5th, 2011 (source: healthland.time.com) For the last 40 years, teens with drug problems, learning disabilities and other behavioral issues have been sent to residential facilities to endure “tough love” techniques that are widely known to include methods of outright physical and psychological abuse. Whether labeled as boot camps, emotional-growth schools, behavior modification programs or wilderness programs, these organizations have operated without federal oversight, and state regulation of the schools ranges from lax to nonexistent. Now, however, individual critics of the programs are using the Internet to find each other and mobilize, and are bringing change. Consider the Elan School, in Poland, Maine, which has long been known for its extreme practices. On April 1, Elan shut its doors after four decades in operation, blaming negative publicity online for recent declines in enrollment. “The school has been the target of harsh and false attacks spread over the Internet with the avowed purpose of forcing the school to close,” Sharon Terry, Elan's executive director, told the Lewiston Maine Sun Journal. The paper reported: Despite several recent investigations conducted by the Maine Department of Education that Terry said have vindicated the school, “the school has, unfortunately, been unable to survive the damage.” Elan is just the most recent in a growing list of victories for opponents of tough residential programs for troubled teens. In the last three years, some 40 other private institutions like Elan have closed, and others have been condemned by state investigations, as activism online — mostly led by survivors of such programs and their parents — has increased. For complete story, click here (or review entire HEAL website and external links).

Agency serving troubled youth has troubles of its own--April 6th, 2011 (source: tcdailyplanet.net) By Charles Hallman, Minnesota Spokesman-Recorder April 06, 2011 Freeport West is a 41-year-old nonprofit human services agency that provides programs and services to at-risk youth and young families, with offices in Minneapolis and St. Paul. After several years of turmoil and the recent firings of its executive director and other staff, the agency may be currently facing its worst crisis in those 41 years of service to the community. A new interim Freeport executive director was selected last week to replace former executive director Ramona Wilson, who was hired almost four years ago. She “is moving on...to pursue other professional opportunities,” according to a March 16 press release. Wilson's departure was followed a day later by the unexpected firing of five staff members at the St. Paul office. One of them, Sherrie Ellis, said the interim executive director told her that she was let go due to lack of funding. Former St. Paul office manager Dora Darnes said that, when told she was fired, “I was in shock and devastated.” She was hired last June. “A lot of these kids come to depend on a lot of us and get a lot of different things from different staff people.” The series of events are puzzling, said Rev. Devin Miller of St. Paul last week, including closing the St. Paul office for two days after the firings. “You don't fire [the executive director] on Tuesday and then drop five staff on Thursday without due process,” he pointed out. Miller said that he met with Freeport Board Chair Fred Blocton once he learned of the firings and asked about “$115,000 on the table” for the St. Paul office. “How can you tell me that there is no money when you approved a budget with [a three-percent increase], then all of a sudden you fire five people?” “We served over 700 kids” since the St. Paul office opened in 2008, Ellis noted. “It's all about the kids and what they need. I'm worried as to what is going to happen.” The minister and other community folk are strongly suggesting that what is happening to the Freeport's St. Paul office could be the result of a tug-of-war between Blocton and Wilson. When the MSR last week contacted Blocton for comment, he responded with a March 24 prepared statement: “Freeport's board of directors, management team and staff are committed to providing quality programming...providing uninterrupted, quality services to at-risk [youth] is our number one priority.” However, two individuals formerly connected with Freeport have pointed out that the nonprofit organization might have been mismanaged during Wilson's tenure. “Too many decisions were made without doing the proper homework,” including opening the St. Paul office, said a former board member who spoke to the MSR on condition of anonymity. According to a March 16 press release, Freeport has hired an interim financial management team and a local firm to assist with compliance and reporting and is conducting a search for a chief financial officer. Although we were originally promised that our interview requests would be met, a Freeport spokeswoman subsequently told the MSR that neither Blocton nor anyone else with the organization would answer any more questions, including confirming reports of recent audits by several funding sources that found financial discrepancies under Wilson's leadership. “When [Wilson] came in, the organization was very financially stable,” said a former Freeport staffer who was on board when Wilson arrived. The person, who spoke to the MSR on condition of anonymity, added that the former executive director's management style had contributed to a constant turnover of staff. “[Wilson] has a tremendous ego,” added the former staffer. “I was in a position that I couldn't agree with the things she was doing.” Although at the time several board members did not support Wilson's candidacy for the job because of her limited nonprofit experience, the former board member said they eventually did support her hiring. “But just two months into hiring her, I was very sorry that I did,” the person admitted, adding that there was a constant clash of egos between the former executive director and the board. “Ramona came in there with very corporate ideals and not nonprofit reality. Clearly because of Ramona and the direction she started taking Freeport, we knew we could not go in that direction because it would pull Freeport down.” Later nearly half of the Freeport board left, “and not one of us had planned to leave,” the individual pointed out. “She [Wilson] strategically got rid of the key people that we felt over the years was the glue to running Freeport.” For complete story, click here.

Biblical Reform School Discipline: Tough Love or Abuse?--April 12th, 2011 (source: abcnews.go.com) “Because of that the trauma, she started spiraling in every way possible,” said her mother, Jeannie Marie, who did not want their last name made public. Priscilla, now 18, said she numbed the pain with drinking and rebellion, which terrified her mother. Desperate, Jeannie Marie turned to her church for help, learning about a Christian reform school that she says promised to “get right” her wayward daughter. But neither was prepared for the ordeal they say Priscilla experienced from November to January of this year at New Beginnings Girls Academy, an Independent Fundamental Baptist boarding school in La Russell, Mo. The school, according to its website, serves troubled teens so “through Jesus Christ, they can overcome their addictions, mend their broken relationships and get their lives on the right path.” Instead, Priscilla said she was told the rape was her fault and was subjected to harsh discipline -- ridiculed, restrained and deprived of proper nutrition and adequate clothing. As punishment for misbehaving she says she was forced to wear a red shirt and stand facing a wall, sometimes for 8 to 10 hours a day with only 15-minute breaks for food. “I was so achy it hurt,” said Priscilla. She said toilet paper and sanitary pads were rationed, despite Priscilla's urinary problems after the rape. She also said no one offered to get her medical care. “We thought maybe Priscilla would go there and hide out and pull herself together,” said Jeannie Marie. “We thought it was a safe place to go and we wouldn't have to worry...We trusted our church.” Priscilla left the school in January, but said the punitive approach left her with no self-worth and anxiety attacks so bad she cannot breathe. New Beginnings charges $10,300 a year, according to its admission application. On a signed form, parents agree to “corporal discipline,” which is spelled out in their mission statement as up to 15 “swats” with a wooden paddle in each 24-hour period for misbehavior. For complete story, click here. (Complete story references multiple IFB/Roloff-related programs.)

Sex abuse claim at Pines youth center investigated--April 22nd, 2011 (Source: hamptonroads.com) Virginia investigators have determined a Norfolk treatment center for troubled youth failed to properly report and document an allegation of sexual abuse by a North Carolina resident. The incident at The Pines Residential Treatment Center, a private facility that serves youth with mental, emotional and behavioral problems, was a “peer-to-peer” one, according to Meghan McGuire, spokeswoman for the Virginia Department of Behavioral Health and Developmental Services. The Pines has three treatment centers in Hampton Roads - one in Norfolk and two in Portsmouth, licensed for a total of 424 residents. North Carolina spokeswoman Renee McCoy said the state has suspended any new North Carolina admissions to the three Pines facilities, effective April 13, and is reviewing the cases of 113 North Carolina residents currently residing there because of concerns about patient care, treatment, staffing and training. The North Carolina families of some residents of The Pines have been contacted about possible moves. McGuire said in an email that the allegation was reported by a boy who stayed at the Norfolk facility, which is on Kempsville Road and is licensed for 82 youngsters. The allegation was reported to North Carolina officials after the youth's discharge on Jan. 31. The Virginia licensing officials were contacted last week by the North Carolina Division of Mental Health, Developmental Disabilities and Substance Abuse Services, according to McGuire. Officials in that office told Virginia officials a complaint had been received from the boy's family earlier this month. McGuire said that North Carolina had not found any proof of abuse but determined there was enough credibility to the complaint to take action. Officials there noted the incident had not been reported by The Pines to state licensing officials in Virginia and North Carolina, which is a requirement of state-licensed facilities. McGuire said other treatment concerns were also noted in the complaint. For complete story, click here.

S.C. has no say in youth centers: Little-known facilities hold troubled teens--April 26th, 2011 (source: postandcourier.com) SUMMERVILLE -- Many residents were stunned to learn last week that a local youth treatment center was housing violent teens from outside South Carolina. How could this happen, they wondered. The truth is: The state has almost no control of who is placed in these facilities or where they come from. In many cases, even the local police don't know who is in their backyard. South Carolina is home to 17 of these treatment centers that house nearly 800 kids and young adults struggling with mental illness, violent behavior and other problems. Many, like Palmetto Summerville Behavioral Health, are privately run facilities. Neighbors of the Palmetto Behavioral Health complex in Summerville have expressed concerns about security at the facility, which is surrounded by a 6-foot-tall wooden fence topped with 18 inches of lattice. State's involvement The state Department of Health and Environmental Control licenses these centers but has virtually no say in where they are located or who they accept as clients, agency spokesman Thom Berry said. DHEC inspectors typically visit these facilities just once every two years unless a complaint is lodged, Berry said. Even then, they are looking at things such as staffing ratios, the dispensing of medication and treatment plans. They don't control admissions or security measures. These facilities are not required to report escapes; only hospitalizations and deaths, he said. For complete story, click here.

AA headmaster's resignation not tied to abuse investigation--April 27th, 2011 Dr. George Martin was not asked to resign his position as headmaster at Amelia Academy because he investigated allegations of abuse of children in the 1980s at a Louisiana girls' home by a teacher currently employed by the academy, according to Kelly Anderson, the president of the board of directors of the Amelia Educational Foundation. Dr. Martin was replaced April 11 as headmaster at the private school. No reason has been given for his re-placement but rumors abound he had been forced to resign because of his investigation into allegations against an Academy teacher who was once employed at the New Bethany Girls Home in Arcadia, La. Online postings accuse the teacher of, "beatings on the body and the feet, humiliation, silent treatments and other torture and abuse," according to Dwayne Walker, the secretary and media director for the Survivors of Institutional Abuse organization. Mr. Anderson denied any investigation Dr. Martin made into those allegations had anything to do with his replacement by former Academy Headmaster James "Jim" Grizzard. Mr. Anderson said the allegations against the teacher were investigated and the results of the investigation were the allegations were "deemed not to be an issue for us." The teacher has been, "an exemplary employee for about 13 years," he said. The abuse allegations surfaced about a year ago, he said, and admitted there were "initial concerns" by parents of Academy students. The Foundation did a second background check of the teacher about two months ago, he said. This check also found no history of abuse, Mr. Anderson said, noting the teacher's spouse, who also was employed by the New Bethany Home in the 1980s had also passed a rigorous federal employment background check. There were no issues with the teacher at the Academy and no students have been withdrawn because of the teacher's employment, he said. Dr. Martin was traveling and not available for comment. Source: <http://www.ameliamonitor.com/>

Teen Challenge Training Center founder dies--April 29th, 2011 (Source: readingeagle.com) The New York City preacher who founded the Teen Challenge Training Center in Rehrersburg in 1962, the first of hundreds of biblically based recovery centers for drug addicts outside Times Square, died in a car crash in Texas, authorities said Thursday. The Rev. David Wilkerson, 79, who began preaching to troubled teens in Times Square in 1958, died Wednesday afternoon when his car veered head-on into a tractor-trailer on Route 175 in East Texas, about 95 miles southeast of Dallas, Texas Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Tela Mange said. Source: <http://readingeagle.com/article.aspx?id=304355>

Schram: Official silence on juvenile center abuse is deafening--May 6th, 2011 (Source: komonews.com) They don't want you to know. I don't exactly know what they're trying to keep secret, but they're doing their best to keep the public from finding something out. Last week, KOMO 4 Problem Solver Tracy Vedder aired a report detailing serious issues at the Echo Glen Children's Center: A teenage girl raped by a staff member; multiple instances of sexual harassment among the people in charge of the juvenile offenders detained there; allowing a convicted sex offender unsupervised contact with pre-teen and teenage girls. Missing from Vedder's report was any sort of explanation from state officials. They have repeatedly denied Vedder's request for an interview. I believe that Don Mead, the superintendent of Echo Glen, along with John Clayton, who is the DSHS Secretary in charge of juvenile rehabilitation, along with DSHS Secretary Susan Dreyfus, are hoping that this issue fades from public attention. I don't think that should be allowed to happen. For complete story, click here.

Bloomberg Pushes for Control of Juvenile Justice System (Source: Gotham Gazette, May 16th, 2011) Every year New York City sends of its most troubled teens hundreds of miles away. Far from family, they are confined in institutions that by many accounts are brutal, ineffective -- and expensive. These institutions have been deemed so brutal and ineffective by the federal government that the Department of Justice threatened to take over the system if the state did not make drastic improvements to the quality of care. For complete story, click here.

Speaker Paul Wesselmann says kindness, empathy keys to dealing with troubled teens (Source: postcrescent.com, May 17th, 2011) APPLETON — As he led an Appleton Public Library audience of about 125 teens, parents and educators in a workshop on connecting with youth in crisis, Paul Wesselmann almost never stopped smiling. Even while retelling stories punctuated by loneliness and despair, Wesselmann crackled with a lightness that resonated with his central message: hope. "Life is hard," he said. "And we get better." Sponsored by the city of Appleton, Lawrence University and the J. J. Keller Foundation, Wesselmann's presentation Monday was part of a broader community response to the half dozen youth suicides that have occurred in the Fox Valley since 2009. Even as Wesselmann conceded that "some of you came here tonight wondering, maybe hoping, that you could learn the secret of how to identify a kid that is in deep trouble and to go up them and say the right thing and save their life," he stressed that hope and help often arrive in "small deposits" of empathy and kindness. For complete story, click here.

Mandel: Inquest for troubled teen finally begins (Source: torontosun.com, May 17th, 2011) TORONTO - Mentally troubled and hard to control, Ashley Smith was locked up for much of her teenage years, pepper sprayed, Tasered, bound from head to toe in a restraining cocoon and banished for the equivalent of two full years to solitary confinement. Her crimes? She threw a crab apple at a postal worker. She stole a CD. And while in custody, she refused to behave — so they just kept extending her prison term. Smith was just 19 when she finally tied a ligature around her neck while in segregation at the Grand Valley Institute for Women in Kitchener. In the past, she had done this as a desperate act for attention and it always worked — the guards would rush in to save her. She didn't know that when she again tied those cloths around her neck on Oct. 19, 2007, the rules had changed. Correctional officers had been ordered not to intervene. And so they didn't. They stood by as Smith choked to death. Did the traumatized New Brunswick teen finally end her tortured imprisonment by killing herself? Or was it simply a tragic accident in a desperate cry for some human contact? For complete story, click here.

Long overdue end to Dozier School for Boys' legacy of abuse (Source: tampabay.com, May 27th, 2011) The news comes decades too late for generations of abused young men. But the state of Florida finally has stopped defending a culture of horrific abuse and will shut down a North Florida school for boys at the end of June after more than a century of looking the other way. The courage of former students who recounted the abuse they endured, renewed public scrutiny and a state financial crisis combined to force a decision that should have been made years ago. The Department of Juvenile Justice announced Thursday that the Arthur G. Dozier School for Boys — recently renamed the innocuous North Florida Youth Development Center — will be shut down and its 63 detainees will be sent to other facilities. For complete story, click here.

