Carney fires 29 in abuse incident (Source: boston.com, May 28th, 2011) Carney Hospital fired the staff of its adolescent psychiatry unit Thursday, after an investigation into an employee's alleged sexual assault of a patient uncovered serious patient safety problems. Hospital president Bill Walczak said he hired former attorney general Scott Harshbarger and his law firm a month ago to investigate the assault allegation and conditions on the 14-bed locked unit for extremely troubled teens. When he read Harshbarger's report Thursday, Walczak said he decided to replace the nurses and other staff on the unit. The report described "serious concerns about patient safety and quality of care on the unit. It was not functioning properly. It was recommended by them to start over on the unit," Walczak said in an interview. "We will have top- notch employees replace those who left. My goal is to make it the best unit in the state." He would not provide details of the alleged assault or patient safety concerns, or comment on why the entire staff was dismissed, given that the allegation involved one employee and one patient. For complete story, click here.

Ex-leader at Texas youth prison settles civil suit Associated Press - May 31, 2011 11:25 AM ET LUBBOCK, Texas (AP) - The attorney for a former West Texas youth prison inmate says his client has settled a civil lawsuit against a former prison school principal who was acquitted on sexual abuse charges.

Attorney Scott Medlock said Tuesday his 26-year-old client's settlement for $2,000 doesn't include an admission of wrongdoing by former West Texas State School principal John Paul Hernandez. Medlock says the agreement includes a "vague" letter of apology from Hernandez. In February, Hernandez was found not guilty of sexually abusing five inmates at the prison school in Pyote in 2004 and 2005. Medlock's client was 1 of the five. A Texas Rangers report implicated Hernandez in a sex scandal that upended the Texas Youth Commission. Lawmakers eventually ordered an overhaul of the system. Copyright 2011 The Associated Press Source: <http://www.newschannel10.com/Global/story.asp?S=14754508>

Former student claims abuse in teen boot camps--June 2nd, 2011 (Source: sacbee.com) SALT LAKE CITY -- A man from Washington state has become the latest to sue a Utah-based organization for troubled children, claiming he was physically and emotionally tormented during its teen boot camp programs in Mexico. Attorneys for Carl Brown Austin, 24, of Spokane, filed the lawsuit Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City against World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools. Austin spent nearly two years, starting at age 13, at the organization's Casa by the Sea and High Impact programs. He alleged he was a "virtual prisoner" in programs that meted out primitive punishment for hours on end. The lawsuit said Casa by the Sea in Ensenada, Mexico, was never licensed by any state regulatory authority as a "treatment center" and that High Impact in Baja, Mexico, was shut down by government edict in 2002 after complaints from parents. Austin claimed he was hogtied, given limited access to bathrooms and food and endured "The Big Green" - which meant having his head rubbed into an artificial turf until his face and mouth were bloody. It also claimed the organization and its officials conspired to conceal the abuse at its boarding schools. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here and here.

Why So Much Abuse is Allowed to Continue in Residential Care--June 7th, 2011 (Source: Time.com) by Maia Szalavitz The stories are beyond horrifying: an autistic boy crushed to death by a "restraint" gone awry; a disabled woman's diaper pulled aside as she is raped; an elderly woman left to lie on a urine-soaked box spring for six days after being beaten. In two of the nation's largest states, major media investigations this spring revealed hellish conditions in institutions for the disabled. The New York Times exposed ongoing violations, including physical and psychological abuse, in state-run homes for the developmentally disabled, while the Miami Herald uncovered similar tales of maltreatment and neglect in assisted-living homes for the elderly. Both investigations found that the operators of these institutions were able to inflict harm with impunity, repeatedly violating the rights of their residents — in some cases, killing them — while being paid millions of dollars by the government for their "care." Worse, when such abuses were exposed, the homes were not shuttered but simply advised not to do it again. Why is it that institutions are able to get away with the kind of torture and abuse for which parents or other caregivers would be incarcerated or otherwise prevented from ever perpetrating again? This is a question that has haunted me for a decade as I've investigated similar instances of abuse and neglect in programs for "troubled" teens. Several factors interlock all of these cases. If we want to stop the abuse, all of them need to be addressed. For complete story, click here.

Local Boot Camp Leader Accused of Kidnapping Minor--June 7th, 2011 (Source: ktla.com) PASADENA, Calif. (KTLA) -- An instructor at a youth boot camp is accused of kidnapping, false imprisonment and extortion in the alleged abduction of a truant teenager. According to police, Kelvin "Sarge" McFarland handcuffed the teen, then took the boy to a family member's home demanding money before releasing him. McFarland is also accused of trying to persuade the family to enroll the 14-year-old in his boot camp, Family 1st Growth Camp. For complete story, click here. For more on this story, click here, here, here, and here.

Despite Negative Perceptions, most young adults are doing pretty great--June 13th, 2011 (Source: Pittsburghlive.com) This is a really great article. Please read the entire article by clicking on the hyperlinked title above or visiting www.heal-online.org/goodteen061311.pdf.

Supreme Court backs Miranda warning when questioning juveniles The Supreme Court expands the rights of juveniles in a 5-4 decision that says police who remove a student from class for questioning must usually issue a warning of the right to remain silent. By David G. Savage, Washington Bureau June 16, 2011, 10:19 a.m. Reporting from Washington— The Supreme Court expanded the rights of juveniles Thursday, deciding by a 5-4 vote that police officers who remove a student from a class to question him about a crime usually must warn him of his right to remain silent. "It is beyond dispute that children will often feel bound to submit to police questioning when an adult in the same circumstance would feel free to leave," wrote Justice Sonia Sotomayor for the court. The decision does not set a strict rule for all cases involving young people, but instead says their age calls for giving them special protection. In a second criminal case, this one from San Diego, the court said judges may not impose longer prison terms on defendants in hopes of rehabilitating them. A third decision reopened the case of a Philadelphia area woman faced with a federal terrorism charge for having tried to poison a woman who had an affair with her husband. She argued she should have been charged with a domestic crime under state law. The juvenile decision reopens the case of a 13-year old student from Chapel Hill, N.C., who was taken from his seventh-grade class by a police officer and questioned about several burglaries in his neighborhood. The student, identified only as J.D.B., eventually confessed. He later contended his confession should not have been used because he was not warned of his rights. But he lost in a 4-3 decision by the North Carolina Supreme Court. The famous 1966 Miranda decision that required warnings to suspects about their rights applies only to persons who are in the custody of police and feel forced to answer questions. At issue in the case was whether a 13-year old at school would think he was required to speak to the police, or instead would understand he was "free to leave" and could walk away from the interview. Sotomayor said age is a crucial factor, and it suggests the student would feel he is in the control of the police. Officers and judges "simply need the common sense to know that a 7-year-old is not a 13-year old and neither is an adult," she wrote. "To hold, as the state requests, that a child's age is never relevant to whether a suspect has been taken into custody — and thus to ignore the very real differences between children and adults — would be to deny children the full scope of the procedural safeguards that Miranda guarantees to adults." The decision in J.D.B. vs. North Carolina sends the case back for the judges to consider again whether the student was in police control when he was questioned. Joining the majority were Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen G. Breyer and Elena Kagan. The four dissenters said the focus on the age of the individual will be confusing for police and judges. Last year, the court in an opinion by Kennedy barred states from sending juveniles to prison for life for crimes short of murder. The San Diego case involving rehabilitation resulted in an unanimous ruling. The justices agreed with a San Diego area woman who disputed a judge's decision to extend her prison term so she could participate in a drug rehabilitation program. Alexandra Tapia appealed her 51-month prison term, noting the federal sentencing law says that "imprisonment is not an appropriate means of promoting correction and rehabilitation." Citing that phrase, the Supreme Court ruled for her in Tapia vs. United States and told the judge to reconsider the length of her sentence. Carol Bond, the Philadelphia area chemist, won only the right to challenge her federal conviction on the grounds that it was unconstitutional to use a federal terrorism law to prosecute a domestic dispute. david.savage@latimes.com Copyright © 2011, Tribune Interactive Source: http://www.latimes.com/news/nationworld/nation/sc-dc-0617-court-miranda-20110616.0.2890375.story?track=rss&utm_source=feedburner&utm_medium=feed&utm_campaign=Feed%3A+latimes%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation+%28L.A.+Times+-+National+News%29

Juvenile inmates often isolated nearly 24 hours straight californiawatch.org | Jun 13th 2011 Juvenile inmates at California correctional facilities have been held in isolation nearly 24 hours straight on hundreds of occasions this year, in violation of state regulations. An audit by the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation in March found multiple facilities operated by the Division of Juvenile Justice kept youth prisoners deemed a threat in their cells for all but 40 minutes a day. Auditors found Ventura Youth Correctional Facility, about 50 miles northwest of Los Angeles, to be the worst offender. The juveniles placed on "temporary detention" or "temporary intervention plans" can be placed in solitary confinement for 21 hours a day. Youth facilities exceeded that limit 249 times from January through April, according to numbers provided to Nancy Campbell, who is appointed by the state courts to oversee the juvenile facilities. Campbell confirmed the findings [PDF] in a letter to the Prison Law Office last month. Campbell wrote: Documentation shows that the most frequent failure to meet out-of-room requirements has occurred at Ventura Youth Correctional Facility. In the 14 weeks documented, there were 173 out of 1,453 incidents during which youth on TD [temporary detention] or TIP [temporary intervention plans] spent more than 21 of 24 hours confined to his or her rooms. Other DJJ facilities struggle to meet mandated services requirements as well: OH Close Youth Correctional Facility (43 out of 588 incidents); Preston Youth Correctional Facility (15 of 245 incidents); Southern Youth Correctional Reception Center and Clinic (10 of 198 incidents); and NA Chaderjian Youth Correctional Facility (8 of 761 incidents). The Prison Law Office has responded to the violations with a new motion in the lawsuit Farrell v. Cate, which the state settled with an agreement to reform mental health care at youth facilities in 2004. The filing seeks to force the juvenile justice division to comply with the 21-hour isolation limit. "Those findings are consistent with what experts have been saying month after month, year after year, and the problem has not been solved," Sara

Norman, managing attorney at the Prison Law Office, told The Bay Citizen. "These are the problems that are hurting the youth the most, and we are out of patience." The problem, according to the audit, is much the same one faced by many California agencies. Juvenile justice has too few resources and too little staff. "Living unit staff consistently reported that priority is given to providing services to youth participating in the regular program," the report states. "Youth on TD are accommodated when time permits." California has just more than 1,000 juvenile inmates who have been convicted of serious crimes, called 707(b) offenses [PDF]. These crimes include murder, rape, drug sales, witness tampering and many others. Putting a youth in prolonged isolation -- a 23 and 1 program in juvenile justice division parlance -- can have a "profound" impact on his or her well-being, the state's Office of the Inspector General wrote in a 2000 report [PDF]. That document proves there have been problems with this practice for more than a decade. "Twenty-six of the 70 wards (36 percent) said they did not receive the required one hour out of their room in each 24-hour period," the inspector's office wrote then. "Some wards said that time out of the room was occasionally cancelled, especially on weekends." Source: <http://californiawatch.org/dailyreport/juvenile-inmates-often-isolated-nearly-24-hours-straight-10757>

Youth treatment program, shelter closes--June 18th, 2011 (Source: thetandd.com) An Orangeburg community-based treatment home and shelter for troubled boys and girls has closed its doors. Orangeburg Attention Homes Inc. discontinued its services because of a decline in clientele and budget cutbacks, OAH Chairman William Hamilton said. The program relied on a per diem, per child payment from the S.C. Department of Social Services and the S.C. Department of Juvenile Justice. But with the reduction in clientele, the money diminished. "If you don't have the students in your home, you don't get the per diem from the state," Hamilton said. "It kept declining and declining, and we kept losing ground on our financial stability." He said increasing competition was also a factor in the program's demise. "Our staff were trained for moderate management," Hamilton said, noting the clientele were generally children with some troubles but without any criminal background. "The placement homes now are the boot camp-style homes, and their staff is trained for high management. They deal with kids with more problems and some with more of a criminal background." For complete story, click here.

N.J. to close 2 residential treatment facilities--January 4th, 2011 (Rec'd June 22nd, 2011--Source: nj.com) TRENTON -- The state will close two publicly-run residential treatment facilities that are home to 39 children with mental illness or who come from abusive families, state Children and Families Commissioner Allison Blake announced today. The residential centers, in Ewing and Vineland, will close July 1. They cost about $15.2 million in state and federal money to operate, according to the state budget, but Blake said finances did not drive her decision and doubts the closures will net much savings. Blake said the decision was based on the ample evidence these children fare better at home or in home-like environments than in a large group. For complete story, click here.

Trust staff accused of abusing troubled teens--June 22nd, 2011 (source: tvnz.co.nz) New Zealand Child, Youth and Family has removed children from a high profile programme for troubled youth following allegations staff physically abused teens. But Wellington's Te Rakau Trust says it was just doing what CYF taught it to do. The trust has helped troubled teenagers for more than 20 years. It gives the boys - many from gangs - a home and uses performing arts to turn them away from crime and violence. But ONE News can tonight reveal that trust staff have now been accused of using violence themselves. CYF said "the allegations involved a range of issues, including the use of inappropriate discipline and restraint practices resulting in physical abuse". CYF has removed all three teens from the trust's care and suspended $800,000 in annual funding. For complete story, click here.

Posted on Monday, 07.11.11 Death reported at juvenile detention center THE ASSOCIATED PRESS WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- Officials say a juvenile died while in custody at a West Palm Beach detention center. The Florida Department of Juvenile Justice reports that the inmate died Sunday morning. The department and West Palm Beach police are investigating the cause of death. A Department of Juvenile Justice spokeswoman says the name of a juvenile inmate cannot be released under state law. Information from: The Palm Beach Post, <http://www.pbpost.com> Read more: <http://www.miamiherald.com/2011/07/11/2309866/death-reported-at-juvenile-detention.html#ixzz1Rufcl61n> For more on this story, see: <http://www.miamiherald.com/2011/07/14/2316519/teens-death-in-west-palm-beach.html>

Florida's Anti-Faces of Death Law May Hide How 18-Year-Old Died in State Hands July 18th, 2011 (source: browardpalmbeach.com) Thanks to the Florida lawmakers' successful bid to legislate morality in the state's public records law, we may never know how 18-year-old Eric Perez died in the hands of state workers. Perez died about a week ago at a West Palm Beach juvenile detention facility, due to either breathing problems, an enlarged heart, maybe a stroke, or after becoming "ill and psychotic" -- at least those are the different stories officials have told Perez's mother, according to the Miami Herald. His death was recorded on video, but since HB 411 was signed into effect by the governor, the media -- and subsequently, the public -- may never get to see that video. The rationale for the law may make sense on the surface: Most people who've seen Faces of Death -- a 1980 film that's just a roughly 100-minute compilation of real and fake footage of deaths -- would think there's no legitimate reason to watch the death of another human being. To anyone who wants to hold people and government accountable, though, death videos have proved to be important. Source: http://blogs.browardpalmbeach.com/pulp/2011/07/florida_death_video_law_juvenile_eric_perez.php

Ex-judge Ciavarella to be sentenced Aug. 11 in kids-for-cash conspiracy BY DAVE JANOSKI (PROJECTS EDITOR)Published: July 22, 2011 SCRANTON - Mark A. Ciavarella Jr., whose hard-nosed zero-tolerance policy as a Luzerne County Juvenile Court judge fueled a kids-for-cash conspiracy that generated millions in kickbacks from a for-profit detention center, will be on the other side of the bench Aug. 11 when a federal judge sentences him on racketeering and other charges. Ciavarella, 61, could get 15 or more years in prison when he appears before U.S. District Judge Edwin M. Kosik, who scheduled sentencing in an order issued Thursday. While a prison sentence is virtually a foregone conclusion in Ciavarella's case, it is unclear when he will actually begin serving his time. Defendants like Ciavarella who are free on bail pending sentencing are typically given several weeks before they are required to report to a facility chosen by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. And the former judge's attorneys will likely ask the court to allow him to remain free on bail while he pursues an appeal to the U.S. Third Circuit Court of Appeals. Some of the groundwork for that appeal was laid out in a letter written to Kosik by one of Ciavarella's attorneys Thursday. Ciavarella was found guilty of 12 counts in a 39-count indictment by a jury in U.S. District Court in February. His post-trial appeals were rejected by Kosik two months ago, clearing the way for a pre-sentence investigation conducted by federal probation officials to assist Kosik in calculating a sentence. Kosik must rule on several defense objections to the probation officials' report before imposing a sentence. Neither the report nor the objections have been made public. But a letter to Kosik filed Thursday by Ciavarella attorney William Ruzzo indicates the defense objects to a recommendation that the court, when fashioning its sentence, consider misconduct of which Ciavarella was, the defense maintains, acquitted. Under current federal law, a judge deciding on a sentence can consider misconduct by a defendant if it can be proven by a preponderance of the evidence, even though the defendant has not been convicted of a crime for that misconduct. Ruzzo's letter indicates the defense will argue on appeal that such misconduct should be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, a much stricter standard. "Mark Ciavarella was acquitted of many counts in a lengthy indictment. It would seem out of simple fairness that acquitted conduct means acquitted conduct," Ruzzo wrote. "Essentially, this is the change in the law that counsel would advocate on appeal." Efforts to reach Ruzzo were unsuccessful Thursday. In addition to a prison sentence, Ciavarella faces the possibility of hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines, but testimony at his trial indicated much of the money he received went to pay off heavy credit-card and other debts. Prosecutors have alleged he may have diverted some funds to others, including the proceeds from the sale of his Mountain Top home in 2008 before he was charged. In 2009, after Ciavarella entered a guilty plea that was later withdrawn, probation officials concluded he did not have the resources to pay a fine. Ciavarella, who was ordered to forfeit nearly $1 million by the jury that convicted him, has worked odd jobs as a painter and flower deliveryman since his arrest. Prosecutors alleged Ciavarella and another judge, Michael T. Conahan, conspired to close a county-owned detention center and direct juveniles to a newly built for-profit center in Pittston Township. The builder and co-owner of the center paid the two judges $2.8 million, according to a grand jury indictment. The state Supreme Court, which found Ciavarella wrongfully imprisoned juveniles on minor charges and failed to fully inform them of their right to counsel, vacated thousands of juvenile-court orders he issued in 2005-2008. Hundreds of former defendants in Ciavarella's court have filed civil-rights actions in U.S. District Court against the two former judges and other individuals and entities implicated in the kids-for-cash scandal. dianoski@citizensvoice.com Source: <http://standardspeaker.com/news/ex-judge-ciavarella-to-be-sentenced-aug-11-in-kids-for-cash-conspiracy-1.1178679#ixzz1SuJRngu7>

Calhoun County closes juvenile boot camp By Dianna Wray • Originally published August 1, 2011 at 5:45 p.m., updated August 1, 2011 at 11:20 p.m. OTHER CUTS The Juvenile Justice Alternative Education Program is the only program that has been cut during the ongoing budget workshops. Judge Mike Pfeiffer said the rest of $1.2 million being sliced from the budget is coming out of department ... SHOW ALL » OTHER CUTS The Juvenile Justice Alternative Education Program is the only program that has been cut during the ongoing budget workshops. Judge Mike Pfeiffer said the rest of $1.2 million being sliced from the budget is coming out of department budget requests. County officials are still working on the final budget, which isn't expected to be completed for a few weeks, Pfeiffer said. PORT LAVACA - Calhoun County officials, hoping to make up a $1.2 million budget shortfall, are closing its juvenile boot camp. In the wake of the recession, Calhoun County has had to cut about $4 million from its budget in the past two years. This year, finding they once again needed to make significant budget reductions, County Judge Mike Pfeiffer and the county commissioners met with Calhoun school district Superintendent Billy Wiggins two weeks ago to discuss closing the Juvenile Justice Alternative Education Program. The court officially decided to close it last week, Wiggins said. The boot camp opened in January 1999 as a program for students with recurring discipline problem and those in the juvenile probation system, Pfeiffer said. During the years, the juvenile court system has handled more of these types of problems, Pfeiffer said. This isn't the first time the boot camp program has wound up on the chopping block; the camp was temporarily closed by the Juvenile Probation Board in the summer of 2009 because the county discussed cutting funding. The county continued funding that year, reopening the program in October. The county allotted $128,000 for the boot camp last year, and only eight students were enrolled by the end of the school year, Pfeiffer said. The program wasn't being used enough to keep it open. "We support the school district and the teachers, but there's a point in time when it costs so much and you've got to look at how much it's really being used," Pfeiffer said. The boot camp is closed as of this week. Pfeiffer said the county will save $128,000 by cutting the program. The county is required by mandate to fund many programs. Since county officials are not required to fund the boot camp, the program was cut, Pfeiffer said. With the boot camp closed, two drill sergeants will lose their jobs, Pfeiffer said. The teacher assigned to the boot camp will be moved to either Hope High School or FLEX, the two alternative programs in the district. Students who expected to return to boot camp in the fall will attend the FLEX campus, Wiggins said. The only problem for the school district will be what to do with the students who have done things that require mandatory expulsion by the state. These students used to be sent to boot camp, but they will now be expelled to the street. Wiggins said they are looking for a place to send these students, but they haven't found a solution yet. Wiggins said he is sorry to see the program go, but noted it is understandable, considering these economic times. The school district went through its own cuts recently. The district closed Point Comfort Elementary as part of its budget cuts. "It has been a good thing, but we certainly understand the difficult economic times that we're all in, and we'll do everything we can to absorb those kids back into the school district," Wiggins said. Source: http://www.victoriadvocate.com/news/2011/aug/01/dw_calhoun_bootcamp_close_080211_147530/?print

Pa. judge gets 28 years in 'kids for cash' case August 11, 2011 (AP) PaSCRANTON, Pa. (AP) — A longtime northeastern Pennsylvania judge was ordered to spend nearly three decades in prison for his role in a massive juvenile justice bribery scandal that prompted the state's high court to toss thousands of convictions. Former Luzerne County Judge Mark Ciavarella Jr. was sentenced Thursday to 28 years in federal prison for taking $1 million in bribes from the builder of a pair of juvenile detention centers in a case that became known as "kids for cash." Ciavarella, 61, was motionless when the decision was announced and had no reaction. From behind him, where family members of some of the children he sentenced sat, someone cried out "Woo hoo!" In the wake of the scandal, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court tossed about 4,000 convictions issued by Ciavarella between 2003 and 2008, saying he violated the constitutional rights of the juveniles, including the right to legal counsel and the right to intelligently enter a plea. Ciavarella was tried and convicted of racketeering charges earlier this year. His attorneys had asked for a "reasonable" sentence in court papers, saying, in effect, that he's already been punished enough. "The media attention to this matter has exceeded coverage given to many and almost all capital murders, and despite protestation, he will forever be unjustly branded as the 'Kids for Cash' judge," their sentencing memo said. Al For, Ciavarella's lawyer, called the sentence harsher than expected. Ciavarella surrendered immediately but it was not immediately known where he would serve his sentence. Ciavarella, speaking before the sentence was handed down, apologized to the community and to those juveniles that appeared before him in his court. "I blame no one but myself for what happened," he said, and then denied he had ever incarcerated any juveniles in exchange for money. He also criticized U.S. Assistant Attorney Gordon Zubrod for referring to the case as "kids for cash," and said it sank his reputation. "He backdoored me, and I never saw it coming. Those three words made me the personification of evil," Ciavarella said. "They made me toxic and caused a public uproar the likes of which this community has never seen." Federal prosecutors accused Ciavarella and a second judge, Michael Conahan, of taking more than $2 million in bribes from the builder of the PA Child Care and Western PA Child Care detention centers and extorting hundreds of thousands of dollars from the facilities' co-owner. Ciavarella, known for his harsh and autocratic courtroom demeanor, filled the beds of the private lockups with children as young as 10, many of them first-time offenders convicted of petty theft and other minor crimes. The judge remained defiant after his arrest, insisting the payments were legal and denying he incarcerated youths for money. The jury returned a mixed verdict following a February trial, convicting him of 12 counts, including racketeering and conspiracy, and acquitting him of 27 counts, including extortion. The guilty verdicts related to a payment of $997,600 from the builder. Conahan pleaded guilty last year and awaits sentencing. Copyright 2011 The Associated Press Source: http://www.usatoday.com/news/nation/2011-08-11-pa-courthouse-kickbacks-sentence_n.htm?csp=34news&utm_source=feedburner&utm_medium=feed&utm_campaign=Feed%3A+usatoday-NewsTopStories+%28News+-+Top+Stories%29

Posted on Sunday, 08.21.11 Activists address deaths of imprisoned Fla. teens THE ASSOCIATED PRESS PLANTATION, Fla. -- South Florida community leaders are gathering today to discuss the deaths of two children who died while imprisoned in Florida. Southern Poverty Law Center and Stop Abusing Our Kids will gather at a church in Plantation on Sunday and offer their support for Gov. Rick Scott's vow to reduce the number of children imprisoned. Seventeen-year-old Demetrius L. Jordan died at the Indian River County Correctional Institute earlier this month Foul play is not suspected, but an autopsy will determine the cause of death. Authorities say a grand jury is looking into the July 10th death of Eric Perez at a West Palm Beach juvenile detention center, hours after unsuccessfully seeking medical care. Source: <http://www.miamiherald.com/2011/08/21/2368516/activists-address-deaths-of-imprisoned.html#ixzz1VeJ5k2T4>

Barry County youth home director charged with sex crimes Published: Thursday, August 25, 2011, 8:43 AM Updated: Thursday, August 25, 2011, 10:29 AM By Rosemary Parker | Kalamazoo Gazette The Kalamazoo Gazette File photo Michael Terpening HASTINGS — The director of a private youth home was charged Wednesday with various sexual crimes involving several of the troubled teens lodged at the residential facility. Michael Terpening, 32, of Bellevue, was arraigned Wednesday in Barry County District Court on nine felony counts of criminal sexual conduct and aggravated indecent exposure on multiple teen victims, according to a news release from Michigan State Police. He was the director of Earth Services Youth Home at 15485 Jenkins Road, in southeast Barry County's Assyria Township. Judge Michael Schippers set bond at $250,000, according to the release. Terpening was not in jail Thursday morning, according to jail officials. A Michigan State Police spokesperson who declined to be identified said the case unfolded after an older teen at the residential facility for teens in trouble complained of being victimized and other alleged victims were discovered. The incidents took place over several months, he said, with all victims residents of the home. According to its website, Earth Services: "is a 501(c)3 non-profit organization. The organization was originally founded in 1998 as Educated Animal Rescue, E.A.R. and then grew to become E.A.R.T.H., Educated Animal Rescue and Teen Haven. As of today, it has become Earth Services. Located in Lower Michigan, amongst the trees and rolling farmland of the rural Bellevue/Battle Creek area, our facility reaches out to our community and beyond, helping animals find their perfect place!" Source: http://www.mlive.com/news/kalamazoo/index.ssf/2011/08/barry_county_youth_home_direct.html

Teen program draws state auditor's ire By Christine McConville | Friday, August 26, 2011 | <http://www.bostonherald.com> | Local Coverage A jaw-dropping audit of a privately run but public-funded program for troubled teens has State Auditor Suzanne M. Bump planning to scrutinize spending at every one of the 1,200 social service agencies that together receive $2.3 billion a year in state funds. "We're looking at all the human service agencies," Bump told the Herald yesterday, hours after releasing a scathing report accusing the Northeast Center for Youth and Families Inc. in Easthampton of spending $406,360 in Massachusetts monies on people from Connecticut. The report also claims the agency overbilled Massachusetts $651,221 for its two foster care programs. "We want to ensure that other organizations aren't using state money to support their programs in other states," Bump said. A Northeast Center official said the agency disagrees with Bump's report. Article URL: <http://www.bostonherald.com/news/regional/view.bg?articleid=1361468>

Pharos-Tribune August 31, 2011 Horse deaths spark investigation Witnesses say animals were not properly fed by Daniel Human For the Pharos-Tribune BUNKER HILL — Miami County officials are investigating a therapeutic horse farm after a group found one horse dead and removed another that later died. The Miami County Animal Shelter has turned over details to the sheriff's department in an investigation of the horses' home, Full Quiver Farms Equine Mentoring Ministry in Bunker Hill, said Susan Kulla, head of the animal shelter. The farm has used horses to provide therapy to troubled teens. A group of horse enthusiasts began contacting county agencies after they found a dead horse, which had been partially eaten by pigs, and a second in near-death condition Sunday, said Nicole Emigh, one of the people who helped remove the horses from the farm. "It was in a stall with urine and manure, very hot ... no hay, nothing but a concrete floor, manure and that's it," she said. The horse, nicknamed Tuff, was unable to walk after about a day with its new owners, Emigh said. The Galveston Fire Department provided equipment to help lift the horse and veterinarians provided care, but Tuff died Monday, she said. Miami County Sheriff's Deputy Casey Bailey said he is working with the animal shelter on the investigation, but he offered no further details. Full Quiver Farms owner Leanna Sharp said the horses had been having ongoing health issues. "I did everything in my capacity to make them well, and it was not getting anywhere," she said. "So I called someone for help." Sharp said Tuesday she was unaware the second horse had died. Asked about the horse found dead Sunday, Sharp declined to comment and would not speak further about the matter. Emigh said she and the group she was with also searched for two horses that were supposed to be in the pasture, but no one could find the animals. She asked people who notice animals in poor condition to contact authorities. "I just want to express how important it is for people to report this to the humane society," she said. "If something's not done the first time, report it again." Source: <http://pharostribune.com/local/x2134993257/Horse-deaths-spark-investigation>

Troubled teens abused at Utah-based schools, lawsuit claims By Roxana Orellana The Salt Lake Tribune Published: September 2, 2011 10:40PM Updated: September 2, 2011 11:26PM After their case was dismissed last month in federal court, a group of about 500 parents and students have gone to state court with allegations of abuse by the operators of a Utah-based school for troubled teens. The lawsuit, filed Thursday in 3rd District Court, claims that from the mid-1990s to mid-2000s, students attending schools owned and operated by World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools Inc., (WWASPS) — founded by La Verkin entrepreneur Robert Lichfield — were physically, emotionally and sexually abused at the facilities. WWASPS is accused of a lengthy list of abuses, including that students were beaten, chained, locked in dog cages, forced to eat vomit and made to lie in urine and feces as punishment. The complaint also alleges students were forced into sexual acts. "At all times relevant, defendants did not disclose to the parents the physical, emotional, mental, and/or sexual abuse to which their children were subjected at their facilities and conspired, even to this day, to prevent them from discovering such abuse," the lawsuit states. The lawsuit lists a total of 59 defendants, including Cross Creek Center for Boys LLC., Cross Creek Manor LLC., Teen Help LLC and Brightway Adolescent Hospital. The facilities mentioned in the lawsuit — a number of which are now closed — are located throughout the United States, as well as Mexico, Costa Rica and the Czech Republic. The defendants are also accused of defrauding parents of tuition and other monies paid. The lawsuit was first filed in U.S. District Court in 2006, but Judge Clark Waddoups dismissed it in August, citing a lack of jurisdiction in August. Windle Turley, a Dallas attorney representing the plaintiffs, said Waddoups dismissed the case on jurisdictional grounds because of the way the case was structured, not on the merits of the case. "We had hoped we could continue to move forward in the federal court. But we're just glad we were going to be able to move forward now," Turley said. Asked about criminal charges, Turley had details only in connection with a case filed in Costa Rica against school director Narvin Lichfield, who is Robert Lichfield's brother, for alleged sexual abuse. Turley said those charges were ultimately dismissed. The plaintiffs are seeking an unspecified amount of damages, including punitive damages, to be determined at trial. A racketeering claim was dropped from the lawsuit filed federal court but may be added to the state lawsuit, Turley said. Attorney Stewart Harman, who represented Lichfield and Ken Kay, WWASPS' president, in the federal lawsuit, said "the reasons for dismissal are clearly and adequately laid out and set forth in Judge Waddoups' decision." Kay has previously denied the lawsuit's allegations as "ludicrous." "We don't condone any type of child abuse and it's highly unlikely that any of the incidents ever happened," Kay said in 2007, noting that troubled teens often have a record of fabricating stories. rorellana@sltrib.com © 2011 The Salt Lake Tribune Source: <http://www.sltrib.com/sltrib/news/52502999-78/lawsuit-abuse-court-students.html.csp>

Torture Alleged at Chain of Children's Homes By JONNY BONNER SALT LAKE CITY (CN) - Hundreds of parents claim a group of boarding schools tortured their children: locked them in dog cages, forced them to lie in feces and eat vomit, masturbated them and denied the troubled teens any religion "except for the Mormon faith." The Utah-based World Wide Association Of Specialty Programs and Schools and its owners - Robert Lichfield, Brent Facer and Ken Kay - went to great lengths to hide the "torture," which began in the mid-1990s and continued for a decade, the 357 plaintiffs claim in Salt Lake County Court. The plaintiffs say that 59 schools and owners tied to the company "jointly promoted, advertised, and marketed defendants' residential boarding schools as a place where children with problems could get an education while receiving instruction and direction in behavior modification for emotional growth and personal development." But they say the children were subjected to physical, emotional and sexual abuse at the schools including, Cross Creek Center for Boys, Brightway Adolescent Hospital and Red Rock Springs. They say the abuses inflicted upon some children for years "could be accurately described as torture." According to the complaint, students were locked in boxes, cages and basements at the schools, denied medical and dental care, and forced "to carry heavy bags of sand around their necks or logs throughout the day over many days." They were sexually abused, "which included forced sexual relations and acts of fondling and masturbation performed on them," according to the 119-page complaint. Students were "forced to eat their own vomit ... bound and tied by hands and/or feet ... chained and locked in dog cages ... forced to lie in, or wear, urine and feces ... forced to sleep on cold concrete floors, boxspring, or plywood," and put to forced labor, the complaint states. Children were "kicked, beaten, thrown and slammed to the ground ... forced to eat raw or rotten food ... poked and prodded with various objects while being strip searched ... denied any religious affiliation, except for the Mormon faith ... [and] threatened [with] severe punishment, including death, if they told anyone of their abuses and poor living conditions," according to the complaint. Their mail was confiscated, and personal visits and telephone calls were forbidden or discouraged, the parents say. "At all times relevant, defendants did not disclose to the parents the physical, emotional, mental, and/or sexual abuse to which their children were subjected at their facilities and conspired, even to this day, to prevent them from discovering such abuse," the complaint states. The defendant company still operates residential centers in Utah, South Carolina and Costa Rica, but has faced school shutdowns in Mexico, Jamaica and Samoa amid child abuse investigations, according to the complaint. It says that more than 2,100 students were enrolled in its schools in 2003. The plaintiffs filed a similar lawsuit in Federal Court in 2006, which U.S. District Court Judge Clark Waddoups dismissed in August for lack of jurisdiction. The parents seek punitive damages for fraud, gross negligence, false imprisonment, assault and battery, and breach of contract, and a protective order to prevent spoliation of evidence. They are represented by Windle Turley of Dallas, Texas and James McConkie II with Parker & McConkie of Salt Lake. Source: <http://www.courthousenews.com/2011/09/06/39546.htm>

Former Baptist Church Member Ernest Willis Sentenced to Prison for Rape of Teen Parishioner Tina Anderson Was Made to Apologize in Church for Pregnancy Resulting From Rape By SUZAN CLARKE and ALICE GOMSTYN Sept. 6, 2011 — A New Hampshire judge today sentenced former Baptist church member Ernest Willis to 15 to 30 years in prison for the forcible rape of a teenage girl from his church who got pregnant as a result. The case made national headlines because the victim, Tina Anderson, said she was forced to confess her "sin" -- the pregnancy -- in front of the congregation at Trinity Baptist Church, an Independent Fundamental Baptist Church (IFB) in Concord, N.H. The church's then-pastor, Chuck Phelps, helped arrange for Anderson to move thousands of miles away from home to live with an IFB family and give her child up for adoption. Today, it was Willis' turn to apologize before he was sentenced. Victim 'Thrilled' By Sentence Ernest Willis, 52, of Gilford said he was "sorry and ashamed for this thoughtless act of sexual misconduct." But in his lengthy statement he did not admit he forcibly raped the girl. Listening by telephone from Arizona, Anderson, now 29, said she was "thrilled" with the sentence. "It's a huge amount of vindication for me," she told The Associated Press. "I was never really believed, no matter how many times I said it was not consensual. Now it's been proven in a court of law that he's guilty and he's been given a significant sentence." Willis was arrested in 2010. A jury convicted him in May of three counts of forcible rape and a count of felonious sexual assault. His lawyers say he will appeal those convictions. Before his trial in May, Willis pleaded guilty to one count of statutory rape. He maintained they had consensual sex on one occasion only, but acknowledged the girl was under the legal age of consent. Willis remained stoic as the judge sent him to prison for a minimum of 15 years. In an April interview with ABC News' "20/20", Anderson said that after she was sexually assaulted by Willis, she was forced to stand before her Baptist congregation and confess her "sin" -- that she had become pregnant. She said she wasn't allowed to tell the group that the pregnancy happened because she was raped by Willis, a man twice her age. "I still struggle, because I've been made to feel guilty for so long," she said. At the age of 14, Anderson was hired as a babysitter for the Willis family. She said the first assault occurred in the backseat of a car during a driving lesson. Anderson said Willis pulled her into the back of the car and raped her. According to Anderson, the second assault occurred at her home when Willis showed up unannounced. "He locked the door behind him and pushed me over to the couch. I had a dress on and he pulled it off. I pushed my hands against his shoulders and said 'No,' but he didn't stop," Anderson said. Anderson told "20/20" that she confided her pregnancy to Willis. His reaction, she said, was to offer to pay for an abortion. When she rejected his offer, he presented another option, she said. "He asked me if I wanted him to punch me in the stomach as hard as he could to try to cause a miscarriage," she said. "I told him, 'No, leave me alone.'" The teen babysat Willis's children and considered him a father figure, a prosecutor said. "Her trust and admiration were repaid with violence and rape," prosecutor Wayne Coull told Merrimack Superior Court Judge Larry Smukler. Coull said the most aggravating factor of all was Willis's offer to cause a miscarriage. "For the defendant to be so cruel and selfish as to recommend such actions upon a child is just outrageous," Coull added. Anderson gave birth to a baby girl in 1998. The child was given up for adoption. Anderson has since married and had three other children. Phelps, the pastor who arranged for Anderson to move and give up her baby for adoption, told "20/20" that Anderson voluntarily stood before the congregation in 1997, that he reported Willis to the Concord Police and complied with all legal requirements of him at the time. During the trial in May, Christine Leaf, Anderson's mother, testified that she did not support her daughter's allegations, saying, "I only support the truth, not a lie." The Associated Press contributed to this report. Copyright © 2011 ABC News Internet Ventures Source: <http://abcnews.go.com/US/hampshire-man-ernest-willis-sentenced-prison-rape-tina/story?id=14460469>

Accused molester denied more kid time Judge denied request made by Michael Terpening Updated: Tuesday, 06 Sep 2011, 6:11 PM EDT Published : Tuesday, 06 Sep 2011, 4:00 PM EDT By Ken Kolker HASTINGS, Mich. (WOOD) - A former youth home director accused of molesting four clients will get no more time with his own eight children, despite his attorney's suggestion that the alleged sex crime victims -- all troubled teens -- have reasons to make up the allegations. Michael Terpening, 32, had asked a judge to allow him to spend time with his children at the family's home. That request was denied on Tuesday. Now, he can see them only through the Department of Human Services. "We have allegations from 17-, 18- or 19-year-olds who have been through the system... who have a variety of motivations for what they're testifying to," Terpening's attorney, J. Thomas Schaeffer, told the judge Tuesday. The children's attorney, who says he's read police reports about the alleged sexual assaults, fought against more visitation time for the father. "I resent the accusations that these individuals, just because they're convicted felons... that their word is no good," attorney James M. Kinney said. "They can be victims, too." Terpening, who ran Earth Services and The House Next Door -- a Barry County program for troubled teens -- is charged with 11 counts of sexual assault involving four former clients, all males in their late teens. Police say more charges might be on the way involving a fifth alleged victim. None of the charges involve Terpening's own children. The children's attorney said he believes Terpening has built himself up as a man who can be trusted, to make it easier to find victims. "When I look at this what I see is a man who is grooming these children. This is a trick; this is their game. This is their way about being open and being sneaky and getting more access to your child." About 10 supporters sat behind Terpening and his wife, Amanda, in the courtroom. They included friends, a former youth home worker and a former youth home volunteer. The state has filed a neglect petition to terminate Michael Terpening's parental rights. The children are staying with his wife, their mother. A DHS prosecutor and two attorneys for the children argued against Terpening's request for more time with his children. They criticized supporters who have created an online petition and a YouTube video, showing some of the children, on the father's behalf. "We have Mr. Terpening orchestrating a public display of alleged innocence," Kinney said. "He's exploiting his children, as is his wife, by allowing their pictures to be put on YouTube videos and broadcast to the world." Source: http://www.woodtv.com/dpp/news/local/gun_lake_region/accused-molester-denied-more-kid-time

Terpening to face trial for 12 assaults Judge cleared court during prelim hearing Monday Updated: Monday, 12 Sep 2011, 6:48 PM EDT Published : Monday, 12 Sep 2011, 9:50 AM EDT By Ken Kolker HASTINGS, Mich. (WOOD) - When Michael Terpening walked in to a preliminary hearing on Monday, he was faced with 11 counts of sexual assault. Before he walked out, he was bound to stand trial for 12 assaults. News of the 12th assault came after the judge cleared the courtroom on Monday. Terpening, 32, was in court to face a preliminary hearing on charges involving males in their mid- to late teens while he was operating Earth Services and The House Next Door -- Barry County programs for troubled teens. He allegedly assaulted four of his young male clients. The courtroom behind Terpening, who is currently free on bond, was packed with supporters just before Monday's hearing who insist that the four alleged victims are lying. "Anybody would love to have Mike for a son. Absolutely love Mike," said Liz Smith, Terpening's great aunt. One supporter, who says she spoke to the suspect last night, says she braced herself for the allegations. "He said what they have charged is really ugly. He said it's going to be embarrassing," said Linda Timmons, a friend of Terpening. "The people who are persecuting him are people who are of poor character," she added. Barry County Prosecutor Tom Evans says he believes Terpening's supporters had another purpose -- intimidation. "The presence of the people here; It's certainly a case of might beats right, okay. We'll bring in our three out-of-town attorneys, we'll bring in all our buddies, and we'll just run right over these kids, and we'll run right over this little prosecutor's office," said Evans. "There may be turnip trucks here, but I didn't just fall off of one." Then, Judge Michael Schippers closed the courtroom to the public, agreeing with prosecutors and the defense that the testimony was too embarrassing for the victims. "This is insulting; this is downright insulting," said Smith of the public's ejection from the courtroom. The prosecutor told 24 Hour News 8 that police have placed one victim into protective custody. He was among those expected to testify on Monday. A former worker at Terpening's home, Jamie Moore-Bell, says she has had contact with that victim: "He fully admitted that these were lies, that this did not happen, and he wanted to make this right," said Moore-Bell. "The state police were saying that that's coercion; I coerced him into making these statements." The father of one of the victims, who says his son was assaulted by Terpening, spoke with 24 Hour News 8. The father of the victim was angry that the courtroom was closed. When asked by 24 Hour News 8 if he wanted to be present in the court to protect his son, he agreed enthusiastically: "You're damn straight. Nobody else could protect my son when they were up here," said the father. The father of the victim says he drove his 16-year-old son from Indiana to the courthouse on Monday at the prosecutor's request. "I don't know if he's in the courtroom right now or not. As far as I know, he's in there talking to the prosecutor. They're not going to talk to my son that way," he said. He says police recently approached him about Terpening. That's when his son said the man had touched him about four or five years ago. "Touched him in some wrongful places," he said. The father of the victim says his son was about 12 years old at the time. Supporters of Terpening insist that witnesses are lying. But prosecutors say some of the victims were at the home at different times. "Some of them have never met before," said Evans. The father of the victim says his son isn't making it up: "I want justice for the other children." Terpening is married and has eight children. None of the alleged victims are Terpening's children, but he was ordered not to spend time alone with his children last week. Source: http://www.woodtv.com/dpp/news/local/gun_lake_region/michael-terpening-hearing-september-12-2011

Boot Camp aims to scare children straight--The Toledo Journal--09/16/2011 Mr. Mahone said that although the camp has had many success stories and opened a chapter in Chicago, Ill., the local juvenile court system refuses to work with him and recognize his program. A couple of judges claim the program doesn't work, he said. And when people call the courts looking for a scared straight program, the courts don't recommend his program. Source:

<http://www.thetoledojournal.com/news/Article/Article.asp?NewsID=110635&SID=20&ItemSource=L>

September 22, 2011 Single-Sex Education Is Assailed in Report By TAMAR LEWIN Single-sex education is ineffective, misguided and may actually increase gender stereotyping, a paper to be published Friday asserts. The report, "The Pseudoscience of Single Sex Schooling," to be published in Science magazine by eight social scientists who are founders of the nonprofit American Council for CoEducational Schooling, is likely to ignite a new round of debate and legal wrangling about the effects of single-sex education. It asserts that "sex-segregated education is deeply misguided and often justified by weak, cherry-picked or misconstrued scientific claims rather than by valid scientific evidence." But the strongest argument against single-sex education, the article said, is that it reduces boys' and girls' opportunities to work together, and reinforces sex stereotypes. "Boys who spend more time with other boys become increasingly aggressive," the article said. "Similarly, girls who spend more time with other girls become more sex-typed." The authors are psychologists and neuroscientists from several universities who have researched and written on sex differences and sex roles. The Science article is not based on new research, but rather is a review of existing research and writing. The lead author, Diane F. Halpern, is a past president of the American Psychological Association who holds a chair in psychology at Claremont McKenna College in California. She is an expert witness in litigation in which the American Civil Liberties Union is challenging single-sex classes — which have been suspended — at a school in Vermilion Parish, La. Arguing that no scientific evidence supports the idea that single-sex schooling results in better academic outcomes, the article calls on the Education Department to rescind its 2006 regulations weakening the Title IX prohibition against sex discrimination in education. Under those rules, single-sex classes may be permitted as long as they are voluntary, students have a substantially equal coeducational option and the school reasonably believes separation will produce better academic outcomes. Russlynn H. Ali, the assistant secretary for civil rights at the Education Department, said it was reviewing the research. "There are case studies that have been done that show some benefit of single-sex, but like lots of other educational research, it's mixed," she said. "When you're talking about separating students, treating them differently, you want to do it in a way that's constitutional, and you want to make sure that there is adequate justification. We certainly want to safeguard against stereotyping." The article comes at a time when single-sex education is on the rise. There were only two single-sex public schools in the mid-1990s; today, there are more than 500 public schools in 40 states that offer some single-sex academic classes or, more rarely, are entirely single sex. Many of them began separating the sexes because of a belief that boys and girls should be taught differently that grew out of popular books, speeches and workshops by Michael Gurian, Leonard Sax and others. Dr. Sax, executive director of the National Association of Single Sex Public Education, was singled out for criticism in the Science article, for his teachings that boys respond better to energetic, confrontational classrooms while girls need a gentler touch. "A loud, cold classroom where you toss balls around, like Dr. Sax thinks boys should have, might be great for some boys, and for some girls, but for some boys, it would be living hell," Dr. Halpern said in an interview. She said that while girls are better readers and get better grades, and boys are more likely to have reading disabilities, that does not mean that educators should use the group average to design different classrooms. "It's simply not true that boys and girls learn differently," she said. "Advocates for single-sex education don't like the parallel with racial segregation, but the parallels are there. We used to believe that the races learned differently, too." Dr. Sax criticized the article on many counts, and said it did not fairly reflect his current views. He vehemently rejected the comparison to racial segregation, and the use of the term "sex segregation." Legally, race is a suspect category, while sex is not. "We are not asserting that every child should be in a single-sex classroom, we are simply saying that there should be a choice," Dr. Sax said in an interview. The authors of the article, though, say that because there is no good scientific research backing such a choice, the government cannot lawfully offer single-sex education in public schools. The article cites a review commissioned by the Education Department, comparing single-sex and coed outcomes, concluding that, "as in previous reviews," the results are equivocal. The article also said that research in other countries, and data from the Program for International Student Assessment, also found little overall difference between single-sex and coed academic outcomes. While some studies have found better outcomes from single-sex schools, the article said, the purported advantages disappear when outcomes are corrected for pre-existing differences. For example, Chicago's Urban Prep Charter Academy for Young Men, a school whose high college admissions rates were praised this year by Secretary of Education Arne Duncan, was subsequently criticized by the scholar Diane Ravitch as having test results that were actually lower than average on basic skills. "This is very much a live issue, and I think it's snowballing," said Galen Sherwin, a staff lawyer for the Women's Rights Project of the A.C.L.U., who is handling the Louisiana case. "I see news stories every single week about new proposals, usually based on the idea that boys and girls learn differently. Often it's people who have attended training programs by Sax or Gurian, saying these programs will cater to boys' and girls' specific learning styles." Much of the impetus for single-sex public schooling came from popular books like Mary Pipher's "Reviving Ophelia" and, especially, a 1992 report by the American Association of University Women, "How Schools Shortchange Girls." But by 1998, when the association issued another report, saying that single-sex schooling was not the solution to problems of gender equity, the pendulum had swung, with boys' difficulties in school receiving more attention, in part because of books like Dr. Sax's "Why Gender Matters" and Mr. Gurian's "The Wonder of Boys." Source:

http://www.nytimes.com/2011/09/23/education/23single.html?_r=1&emc=eta1

Ex-judge gets 17 1/2 years in Pa. kickbacks case September 23, 2011 12:31 PM (AP) SCRANTON, Pa. — A former judge who orchestrated a massive kickback scheme involving for-profit youth detention centers was sentenced Friday to 17 1/2 years in federal prison, closing a major chapter on a scandal that prosecutors said shook Pennsylvania's judicial system "to its very foundation." Appearing in a federal courtroom in Scranton, former Luzerne County President Judge Michael Conahan, 59, apologized to the incarcerated youths, the legal community and the public for his role in the notorious "kids for cash" case. "The system is not corrupt," said Conahan. "I was corrupt." Conahan, a once-powerful man who regularly met for breakfast with the reputed boss of a northeastern Pennsylvania Mafia family, offered a direct apology to the children who spent time in a pair of youth lockups from which he and another former judge derived millions of dollars. "My actions undermined your faith in the system and contributed to the difficulty in your lives," said Conahan, who pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy last year. "I am sorry you were victimized." Federal prosecutors said Conahan and former Luzerne County Judge Mark Ciavarella Jr. took more than $2 million in bribes from the builder of the PA Child Care and Western PA Child Care detention centers and extorted hundreds of thousands of dollars from the facilities' co-owner. Ciavarella took the case to trial and was convicted of some of the charges. He was sentenced last month to 28 years in prison. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court overturned about 4,000 juvenile convictions after Ciavarella and Conahan were charged, saying that Ciavarella, who presided over juvenile court, routinely trampled on youths' constitutional rights in his eagerness to send them to the for-profit jails. Unlike Ciavarella, who denied jailing youths for money and defiantly attacked the government's case at his sentencing, Conahan accepted responsibility. Assistant U.S. Attorney William Houser acknowledged Friday. But he said Conahan's crimes required a stiff sentence. "Mr. Conahan abused his power to enrich himself and his friend, Mark Ciavarella," Houser said. "The justice system in Pennsylvania was shaken to its very foundation." Ciavarella and Conahan initially pleaded guilty in February 2009 to honest services fraud and tax evasion in a deal that would have required them to spend more than seven years in prison. But their plea deals were rejected later that year by U.S. District Judge Edwin M. Kosik, who ruled they had failed to accept responsibility for their actions. Conahan's attorney, Philip Gelso, told Kosik on Friday that his client was a changed man from two years ago. Conahan got counseling from a psychologist who helped him face his repressed "lifelong demons," many of them having to do with his father, a funeral director and former mayor of Hazleton, Pa., who dominated his son and made him feel insecure, incompetent and inadequate, Gelso said. Gelso recounted an episode in which a teenage Conahan was "beaten mercilessly" when he failed to tend to the funeral home's coal stove. "These factors excuse nothing, but they explain a great deal," Gelso said. Conahan, who had faced up to 20 years behind bars, had requested a prison term similar to the seven-plus years Kosik rejected two years ago. Gelso said outside the court that Conahan was "bitterly disappointed" by the 17 1/2-year sentence but that it would not be appealed. "There's a stark contrast between Mark Ciavarella and Mike Conahan. Mark Ciavarella fought this tooth and nail. Mark Ciavarella antagonized all of you, antagonized every child, every juvenile," Gelso told reporters. "But Mike Conahan didn't do that. Mike Conahan realized that people need to heal." In sentencing Conahan, Kosik spoke of the deep-rooted political culture that produced him, one in which corruption is tacitly accepted. The federal government's four-year investigation of public corruption in Luzerne and Lackawanna counties has snared more than 30 people, including state lawmakers, county officials, school board members and others. In a letter to Kosik, Conahan's sister recalled their father, dealing with a long-ago ethics investigation, couldn't understand why it was wrong to award a contract to a friend. Kosik said Conahan probably felt the same way about the juvenile-center kickbacks: "That everyone would benefit and no one would get hurt." Investigators disclosed earlier this year that they were led to the judges by reputed mob boss William D'Elia, who became a government informant after his 2006 arrest on charges of witness tampering and conspiracy to launder drug money. He and Conahan regularly met for breakfast. Kosik recommended that Conahan be placed in a federal prison camp in Florida so he can be close to his family. Source: <http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2011/09/23/ap/business/main20110762.shtml>

Polygamist communities sent teens to work long hours for low pay By Sheila Pratt, Postmedia News September 25, 2011 Winston Blackmore, 52, leaves court in this file photo. Photograph by: Brian Lawrence, PNG Merlin Archive EDMONTON — Truman Oler was 17 when he made the long drive to Sundre from his home in Bountiful, B.C., the base of Canada's controversial polygamous sect, Fundamentalist Latter Day Saints. Like dozens of other FLDS teenage boys, Oler left high school after Grade 9 and, at 15, he was working full time for a company owned by Bountiful's bishop, Winston Blackmore. Blackmore, who eventually had more than 20 wives, sent Oler to Alberta to work in his post and pole mill in Sundre, a small town southwest of Red Deer near the foothills. That was the late 1990s. The Sundre site, first owned by J.R. Blackmore and Sons and later by Oler Bros. Contracting, was still operating in Sundre until the spring of 2009. Documents obtained by The Journal show the FLDS company did business with dozens of Alberta companies by the time it folded. Court documents also raised questions about working conditions and pay in the FLDS company. Oler, like his fellow FLDS workers, believed if he obeyed the rules, paid his tithes and followed the bishop's teachings, he might be assigned a wife, a place to build a home, perhaps another wife. That was the promise. Oler was determined to be faithful. "I just never looked for a way out," he recalled in a recent interview with The Journal. At first, the crew worked day and night shifts making fence posts for a large local mill. Later, Blackmore and Sons got into logging on contract and workers cut timber and de-limbed trees. For a while, the young men drove the six hours back to Bountiful twice a month to attend church meetings and see family, recalled Truman, whose father had six wives and 47 children. Truman Oler was 13th of the 15 children by his mother, Memory Oler. While the plight of teenage brides has garnered much attention in the story of Bountiful, there is another dark side to the polygamous sect — the young men and women used as cheap labour for FLDS companies whose futures were totally dependent on a bishop's decisions. Dozens of these young people came to the Sundre area to work for Blackmore and Sons, and later Oler Bros., businesses that helped support the polygamous community back in British Columbia. The story of the young people in Alberta, as Oler's account reveals, is one of low pay, long hours and isolation. Occasionally, a young man would be kicked out for breaking the rules; some would leave on their own. Known as "lost boys," they were left to cope with no family support, no financial support and little education. Experts who gave evidence last winter in a B.C. court reference on the legality of polygamy noted that surplus young men are often sent away to work to reduce the competition for young wives desired by the older men — as well as provide cheap labour. A judgment is expected soon in the B.C. court reference that will determine the legality of polygamy under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. From the highway heading west of Sundre, the FLDS company site looked much like any other small industrial site in the busy rural county. A large rectangular Quonset building used as a repair shop, a few trucks, an old house, a double-wide trailer, all crowded onto the gravel yard. Oler says he earned $60 every two weeks at first and that went up to $100 every two weeks when he turned 18 — well below minimum wage. When he worked for Blackmore and Sons, sometimes he was issued a cheque which he was asked to sign and hand back to his boss. He says he never saw the cash. When Oler Brothers took over, his pay went up. Oler says he was provided with safety gear, hard hat and boots, when he made fence posts at the large nearby sawmill. He also noted safety checks at the mill. Oler also noticed young men from FLDS communities in Utah turned up at the site — rebellious teenagers sent on a "reform mission." A strict regimen of long hours, hard work, no pay and teachings from righteous older men was supposed to put them back on track, said Oler. In October 1997, another unusual new arrival — 14-year-old Teressa Wall, from Salt Lake City — turned up. When Utah FLDS leaders told her it was time for her to marry, she refused. She was banned from her family home and sent to Bountiful until she would repent. Shortly after, Bountiful's bishop, Winston Blackmore, sent Wall to work at the Sundre mill, Wall said in her video testimony to the B.C. court. Dressed in her long, pioneer-style dress, Wall often worked the night shift. While the others had warm clothes, she worked in winter in tennis shoes and an old coat and worked in the rain with no raincoat. Her job was throwing logs onto the "peeler" machine or taking the de-barked, cut logs off the other end of the machine and stacking them, she said. She was often told: "You could end all this if you would just get married," she noted. For nearly two years, she refused and continued working along with two of her brothers from Utah. Oler recalled seeing her at the mill, but they never spoke. One day, with no warning, Wall was taken back to Creston where the bishop, Winston Blackmore, again pressured her to get married. Dispirited by then, she agreed to do so. She was 17. Wall then returned to Sundre with her new husband, who worked at the mill while she took on the job of crew cook, according to her testimony. In the mid-2000s, Blackmore's operation was taken over by Oler Bros, which was owned by Truman Oler's elder brothers. They started logging. In 2006, the company had a crew of more than 40 workers, according to government documents. Oler said the wages went up to $400 to $500 a month and later $800. In April 2009, Oler Bros. declared bankruptcy. That year, Bountiful was under growing pressure from the B.C. government. Truman Oler's brother, Jim, bishop at the time, was charged with polygamy — but the charges were later stayed. Bankruptcy records give a glimpse into just how far FLDS business connections had grown over the years in Alberta. When the company went under, it had debts of $4.8 million and assets of $2.9 million. Dozens of companies were listed as creditors, in Sundre, the Rocky Mountain House area and Edmonton and Calgary, and into Ontario and B.C. Documents show Oler Bros. borrowed more than $2 million for vehicles, trucks, trailers, cars, including $1.4 million for "eight pieces of equipment from John Deere" based in Burlington, Ont. The list of 15 secured creditors included ATB, (with a claim of $90,000), Caterpillar Financial Services, ($280,000 claim), Daimler Chrysler ($900,000 for six trucks and trailers) a Red Deer company Haukendal Enterprise (claim of $364,904 for office furniture) and Equirex Vehicle leasing (a claim of $340,000 for three trucks). More than 100 companies are listed as unsecured creditors. The claimants include banks, tire companies, lumber companies, auto repair shops and United Farmers of Alberta ($15,000 claim). In his early 20s, Truman Oler started to push for better wages after he learned what other forestry workers in the area were paid. Eventually, the wage was raised to $15 an hour — still lower than the going rate in the industry. FLDS bosses justified the low pay, says Oler, by pointing out that they provided free room and board, and promised to buy vehicles for the workers — which didn't always happen. Jim Oler, of Oler Bros., could not be reached for comment. Winston Blackmore would say that low wages allowed everyone to have a job. In a 2006 documentary he said: "We compromised on wages — even I did. But why we compromised on wages is that everyone was employed." Truman Oler had no thought about taking his complaint to provincial labour authorities. But word of the substandard working conditions and undocumented American workers did finally leak out. Nancy Mereska lives near Two Hills east of Edmonton. She left the mainstream Mormon church in 1985 and went to university for a degree in psychology and women's studies. In 2003, she saw a television documentary on polygamy in Bountiful. Troubled by what she saw, she started a small advocacy organization, Stop Polygamy Canada. In the spring of 2004, Mereska learned of working conditions at the FLDS operations around Sundre. From reports she received, it sounded little better than a slave labour camp, she said in an interview — young men working for little pay, with little training, on dangerous equipment in a dangerous industry — and no way out. To Mereska, that was unacceptable in Alberta where labour standards were in place to protect workers, especially young people, from unfair practices. So she wrote to then employment minister Clint Dunford, asking for an investigation. The letter she got back in September 2004 was a big disappointment, she says. The department declined to investigate because she provided no specific evidence of safety violations. The letter also noted Alberta labour law allows teens at age 15 to work in logging though it is deemed one of the more dangerous occupations. The letter also appeared to justify any wages below minimum wage as if the FLDS company was a family business. "Alberta's employment standards do not prohibit a father from paying his sons a stipend rather than a wage," noted the letter from civil servant Walter Baer, then director of compliance for workplace health and safety and employment standards. "I phoned Baer's office, got his voice mail and said: 'What if a man has 50 sons?' 'He did not return my call.'" "I was furious," said Mereska. "I knew the terrible conditions under which these kids were working and no one would do anything about it." In 2005, a year later, Oler Bros. Contracting turns up for the first time in provincial occupational health and safety records. The record shows Oler Bros. had implemented a government-audited safety program and it was in place in 2005-07. "This means someone must have visited the site," said Janice Schroeder, communications officer for Alberta Employment and Immigration. The records also show two reported injuries, one in 2006 and one in 2008, the year the work crew officially dropped to 22 people. Mereska's 2004 complaint about low wages was likely not pursued because it was not specific, said Schroeder. Under provincial labour standards, only family farms are exempt from minimum wage requirements. The exemption does not apply to sawmills, she added. In 2009, another concerned citizen raised a red flag. Sandy McIntosh, an Edmonton-based specialist in occupation health and safety, also raised questions about possible violations of labour standards in the FLDS company. The case of Teresa Wall, working there at 14, is particularly disturbing, he said. She worked with hazardous machinery in a long dress without proper weather protection, according to her testimony. Yet safety regulations require workers to wear hard-toed boots, a hard hat, gloves and overalls, he said. "Young people were there working for nothing, some were sent from U.S.," said McIntosh in an interview. "How did they get across the border?" "Why do we let one group break the rules so easily?" For the province to treat this business as if it was a family farm is inappropriate, he added. "It is an industrial operation." It's pretty clear the money made in Alberta went to support polygamous communities in the B.C. and U.S., McIntosh added. "Alberta was in the chain and we don't want to acknowledge it. It's happening in our society, we should have an open discussion about it." It's late August and a busy Tuesday night in the cosy restaurant in the old Sundre Hotel. The specials on offer, a steak sandwich or sweet and sour pork, are in big demand. The kitchen serves up a very tasty bowl of steaming wonton soup. Seated at the counter, Dennis Herbert tucks into a plate of fried chicken and fries, gravy on the side. Born and raised in this small town, he's over 60 and still driving truck. He remembers when the Bountiful people started to show up. A few lived in the trailer court on the north side of town. "Some lived behind me in the trailer park. They didn't seem to be any trouble, just different," said Herbert. The women in their long dresses were noticeable walking into town from the work site near McDougall Flats, five kilometres west of town, he said. Sometimes they had young children with them. The town settled into a "live and let live" attitude with the small, hard-working group of FLDS people. The newcomers were polite, kept to themselves. Their small business all seemed temporary. If anybody had concerns, it seems, they kept them to themselves. Myron Thompson, a town councillor in Sundre, was a Reform MP when Bountiful people moved in. There wasn't too much talk about them, he said. "No one came to me with any concerns," Thompson added. Besides, in his view, any issues that might arise would be "left to provincial authorities." The FLDS site was located in the County of Mountain View, but the county had little to do with it, says former councillor Gerald Ingeveld. The company took an existing business so the county had no reason to get involved, he said. There was no sign the small group was trying to set up a bigger community, he said, it was just a few people living in old trailers. "It didn't look like a long-term operation," he added. Besides, there is freedom of movement in Canada, he added, so what could anyone do if the FLDS workers moved into Alberta to do business, he added. "We do have laws about how young brides can be, but we saw no evidence of those issues here," said Ingeveld. While the sprawling rural county is a bit of a Bible belt, it has also seen its share of folks with different beliefs, he said. There is a nudist colony, and years ago, there were cross-burning racists in Caroline, he added. And the Moonies once made a brief appearance. Al Kemmere was reeve of Mountain View County in 2004. He lives about 45 kilometres from Sundre. The county doesn't regulate workers' wages or health and safety conditions, so it would not have thought to investigate working conditions, he added. That is a provincial responsibility. "I think the community saw them being there on a temporary basis and that was the basis of their passive approach. 'If their beliefs were breaking the law, then there are mechanisms of society to look after that.'" University of Alberta professor Steve Kent, an expert in cults, says there's no easy way for a community to deal with a church like FLDS that arrives on its doorstep, especially if its members are well behaved. "It didn't seem there were any public issues with the FLDS people and, absent those issues, it's difficult to know what a local community could do," said Kent, who also testified at the B.C. court reference last spring. It's not the job of a county or town council to enforce criminal laws, said Kent. The provincial government, however, should have kept a closer eye, given the reports of poor working conditions and low pay, he said. "It's very clear the government has a responsibility to monitor labour conditions including proper payment for a day's work." "The province let these young people down," said Kent. In some countries, governments take a more active role in monitoring cults, says Kent. But in Canada, it's left up to private groups like Stop Polygamy Canada. Truman Oler was still working in Sundre, in his early 20s, when he started to think about leaving the church. He was tired of low pay, of having no place of his own, no possessions and no time for anything much but work — tired of coming up with $1,000 a month in tithes to then bishop Warren Jeffs. (His mother often subsidized his tithes.) In 2002, he quietly stopped paying his tithes. His brother noticed and threatened to fire him unless he started paying again. "I just said I didn't need the church any more," said Oler. "If you leave, you go with nothing but the shirt on your back," he said. "And you are told that you'll never see your family again." Oler rejects the term "lost boys" — that's what the FLDS likes to think of those who leave the church. Still, adjusting to life outside is not easy, says Oler. That is backed up by evidence presented by Timothy Dunfield, a University of Alberta doctoral student. In his affidavit to the B.C. court, Dunfield described the impact of polygamy on young men. To reduce the competition for teenage brides, young men are forced out. Or they have to follow a complex rules to qualify to get a wife, and in the end, it's a "political decision" whether they are deemed worthy. After years of indoctrination, the young men "are ill-equipped" for life on the outside, according to his evidence. They have to learn how to make decisions, handle money, make friends or find employment. Cut off from the emotional and financial support of their families, they often end up in poverty and isolated. U.S. authorities estimate about 1,000 young men, some as young as 13, have been expelled from FLDS communities south of the border, according to Dunfield's brief. Oler has moved on, built a new life, taken training as a heavy-duty mechanic. But his battle with the church goes on. Winston Blackmore is being sued for tax evasion. He is trying to get former employees like Oler to pay part of the back taxes. (Oler already paid back taxes on his earnings.) Although the Oler mill site has been sold to another company, Oler also says he is sure other FLDS companies are still operating in Alberta. Occasionally, Oler goes back to Bountiful to visit his mother, but it's painful. "If I show up she will come out of the house to talk to me, but I am not welcomed into the house," Oler wrote in his court evidence. "I dream of going down to the place where I was raised and made to feel welcome and treated like a family member and not some stranger who has been caught stealing something. Maybe some day things will change." spratt@edmontonjournal.com Edmonton Journal

© Copyright (c) The Edmonton Journal Winston Blackmore, 52, leaves court in this file photo. Photograph by: Brian Lawrence, PNG Merlin Archive

Source: <http://www.montrealgazette.com/life/Polygamist+communities+sent+teens+work+long+hours/5454783/story.html>

12-foot fence at trouble-plagued Palmetto Behavioral Health stirs split reactions By Glenn Smith gsmith@postandcourier.com Wednesday, September 28, 2011 SUMMERVILLE -- The new 12-foot-high fence outside Palmetto Behavioral Health has some neighbors feeling like a prison moved in next door. "All it needs is some razor wire," is a common refrain. But all that chain link translates into peace of mind for folks like Peggy Williams, who lives just around the corner from the treatment center for troubled teens. The fence, outfitted with special mesh and a curved top, is designed to put an end to the highly publicized escapes that have put this community on edge in recent months. "I love it," Williams said of the new fence. "I just wish they had done it sooner." Photo by Glenn Smith Reaction has been mixed over the new fence outside Palmetto Behavioral Health in Summerville. Palmetto officials released a statement Tuesday saying that previous attempts to install such a security fence at the Midland Parkway facility had been denied. They did not say by whom, nor would they reveal how much they paid for the new fence and other security upgrades. John Walker, a former maintenance worker at the center, said his supervisors pushed for a more secure fence as far back as 2007, but Palmetto executives didn't want to spend the money. Another ex-employee provided The Post and Courier with a copy of a 2007 bid from a company offering to install a 10-foot fence around the center for $23,650. Walker said Palmetto opted for a smaller wooden privacy fence because it was much cheaper. The result was that escapes became commonplace, with teens climbing the 6-foot fence without breaking a sweat, he said. "They went over it like it wasn't even there," he said. "I kept thinking, 'What happens if one of those kids gets loose and kills somebody?' How are they going to justify that?"

Most escapes from the center have been resolved peacefully. But in 2009, a 15-year-old boy was accused of attacking and beating a 64-year-old woman after he slipped away from the center by ducking out a side door, police said. Palmetto officials have insisted they wanted to install a more secure fence years ago, but backed off after receiving resistance from fire officials and neighbors. That is why they settled on the wooden fence, they have said. Palmetto, which operates three treatment facilities in South Carolina, has been under scrutiny since four Washington teens escaped from the Summerville center in April. Citizens were stunned to learn the teens had violent histories and that one of the youths had faced an attempted murder charge in Washington. Residents and elected officials questioned why such patients were being housed in a facility surrounded by residential neighborhoods and protected by little more than a privacy fence. Those concerns grew when two more teens escaped from the facility in June, and a third bolted in August. Walker and other former workers said there were far more escapes from the facility that were never reported to police. Police records list 12 missing-person calls and nine reports of runaways from the facility since 2006. But Walker said police were seldom notified if workers could round up the escapees first. He said he participated in several such round-ups, combing nearby backyards and woods for teens who had gotten loose. Palmetto officials did not directly respond to Walker's statements when asked Tuesday, saying that the center "does not release information concerning patients or employees." Town Councilman Walter Bailey, a former solicitor, said he was pleased with the new fencing and hopes it will resolve concerns over escapes. "They have belatedly done what they should have done a while back and hopefully this will take care of their security issues." State Rep. Chip Limehouse, R-Charleston, has pushed legislation that would bar treatment centers from accepting out-of-state placements of violent mental health patients. Limehouse said he too was encouraged by the new fencing, but state officials still need to keep an eye on Palmetto. "I have to compliment them for making improvements where they can," he said. "But there just seems to be an unfortunate amount of incidents coming out of this one facility. My hope is that they will get out of the news and stay out of the news." In the neighborhood around the center, residents responded to the new fence with a mixture of relief and ambivalence. Some thought it was just right; others, that it was overkill. Evelyn Mace, who lives in nearby Oakbrook Commons, recalled seeing some Palmetto workers chasing an escapee through the neighborhood a few years back. But she said she's never had any problems with the teens there. "They've never bothered me," she said. "I'm more concerned about teenagers on the loose around here after dark leaving trash up and down the roadway." For Palmetto's part, the center seems ready to put the controversy behind it. "Palmetto Behavioral Health will continue to provide the utmost professional care for the emotionally and mentally challenged individuals that are cared for at our facilities," the company said in a statement. "We are also committed to continuing our work as a valued member of the business and health care community." Copyright © 1995 - 2011 Evening Post Publishing Co.. Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/news/2011/sep/28/appropriate-or-overkill/>

Corporate Media and Larry Summers Team Up to Gut Public Education: Beyond Education for Illiteracy, Vulgarity and a Culture of Cruelty Tuesday 27 September 2011 by: Henry A. Giroux, Truthout | Op-Ed NOTE: This article is based on the preface of Henry A. Giroux's latest book, "Education and the Crisis of Public Values: Challenging the Assault on Teachers, Students and Public Education" (Counterpoints: Studies in the Postmodern Theory of Education), published by Peter Lang Publishing; First printing edition (July 30, 2011). Since the early 1970s, the rich, corporate power brokers and right-wing cultural warriors realized that education was central to creating a viable populist movement that served their interests. Over the last 40 years, the financial elites and their wealthy accomplices have not only mobilized an educational anti-reform movement in the name of "reform" to dismantle public education and turn it over to hedge-fund managers and billionaires; they have also taken a lesson from the muckrakers, critical public intellectuals, left-wing journals, progressive newspapers and educational institutions of the mid-20th century and developed their own cultural apparatuses, talk shows, anti-public intellectuals, think tanks and grassroots organizations. As the left slid into organizing around mostly single-issue movements since the 1980s, the right moved in a different direction, mobilizing a range of educational forces and wider cultural apparatuses as a way of addressing broader ideas that appealed to a wider public and issues that resonated with their everyday lives. Tax reform, the role of government, the crisis of education, family values and the economy, to name a few issues, were wrenched out of their progressive legacy and inserted into a context defined by the values of the free market, an unbridled notion of freedom and individualism and a growing hatred for the social contract. At the heart of this movement was a culture of cruelty and vulgarity that used education to produce a new form of political illiteracy in which there was no difference between opinions and arguments, reason and emotion and evidence and false statements. In this culture of illiteracy, science became a liability, thinking became an act of stupidity, anti-intellectualism became a virtue, social protections were described as a pathology and the social contract was dismissed as socialism. While social critic Michael Kazin does not mention the notions of education or public pedagogy in a recent New York Times article, he is right in stressing the centrality of education to the current right-wing-Christian-extremists takeover of almost every aspect of political and economic life in America - extending from the Supreme Court to the federal government to the dominant media-cultural educational apparatus. He writes: "Like the left in the early 20th century, conservatives built an impressive set of institutions to develop and disseminate their ideas. Their think tanks, legal societies, lobbyists, talk radio and best selling manifestos have trained, educated and financed two generations of writers and organizers. Conservative Christian colleges both Protestant and Catholic, provide students with a more coherent worldview than do the more prestigious schools led by liberals. More recently, conservatives marshaled media outlets like Fox News and the editorial pages of The Wall Street Journal to their cause." (1) Education has become the political weapon of choice for conservatives, and they have had astounding success in using the mainstream and new media to drown out the voices of more progressive critics. The evidence is everywhere. For instance, The New York Times is currently advertising its Watch Education Take Center Stage initiative and the keynote address is being given by the politically and morally discredited champion of neoliberal education, Lawrence Summers. Given his failed presidency at Harvard, his utterly shameful role in contributing to the financial crisis of 2008 and the failure of Obama's economic policies and his crude instrumental view of education, why would The New York Times select him as an educational leader and beacon of hope for any kind of educational vision designed to address future generations? Other speakers include the likes of Chester Finn, whose views on public education are as politically reactionary as they are theoretically bogus. Another example can be found in the ongoing Education Nation series sponsored on a number of platforms by NBC. It's endorsement of market-driven anti-public education policies are evident in its parading of the likes of Bill and Melinda Gates and their utterly anti-public, charter school, privatized and technocratic vision of education. Also included are the usual list of charter school, corporate funded anti-union, public school cheerleaders for defunding and privatizing American education. Of course, missing from these dog-and-pony shows are progressive public school reformers such as David Berliner, Stanley Aronowitz, Jonathan Kozol, Marian Wright Edelman, Donaldo Macedo, and others who have been fighting for real educational reform for the last few decades. Nor is there any mention of the many local struggling social movements fighting for public education and the ever-dissolving protections of social contract inherited from the legacy of the New Deal and the Great Society programs. Education at all levels is firmly in the hands of the rich, reactionary and the powerful. Is it any wonder given how invisible progressive forces are in this country that young people are not in the streets as they were in the sixties, refusing the future being offered to them by Wall Street and the moralizing Christian fundamentalists? Of course, this is not merely a debate about education; it is really about the emergence of an anti-reform movement that wants to create armies of low-skilled workers and consumers for the privatized, deregulated and commodified world of the 21st century where a survival of the fittest ethic has been elevated to the status of commonsense. This is a world in which the culture of cruelty is now so commonplace that audiences clap when right-wing politicians insist that people who are terminally ill should die rather than receive government support; it is a world in which the legacies and injustice of slavery and the Jim Crow era now shape a criminal justice system in which capital punishment is largely used to kill black men while, at the same time, used by crass politicians to provoke political support and cheers from audiences who could have once sat in the seats of Roman coliseums watching people eaten by wild animals; the culture of cruelty is now matched by the culture of vulgarity - reality TV shows mimic the worst values of American life; celebrity culture is now so crude that it is worse than illiterate, and celebrities such as Kim Kardashian become role models for legitimating a lethal combination of vulgarity and stupidity. The combination of vulgarity and illiteracy permeates American culture, particularly its political class. What is one to make of the current crop of Republican presidential candidates who claim, without irony, that climate change is not the result of human behavior; evolution is bad science; and in the case of the queen of idiocy, Michele Bachmann, ignore the most obvious scientific evidence about the HPV vaccine in order to make false claims about the value of this particular drug in saving the lives of young girls. In all of these examples, education becomes another way of making the larger public and young people either stupid or mindless consumers - even worse, both. The American public needs access to a new political and educational vocabulary in order to fashion democratically vibrant educational institutions; social movements; community educational centers; bookstores; and a lively, independent press. Young people, educators, activists, artists, parents, and others need alternative media such as Truthout, AlterNet and CounterPunch as popular civic outlets to make education central to building the formative culture that would create new generations of real public intellectuals, youth activists, social movements and a vibrant range of public spheres. I have taken up this issue in my newest book, "Education and the Crisis of Public Values." The book points to how educators and others can meet the current attack on education, young people and democracy itself. It offers a new vocabulary for better understanding the crisis of education as a crisis of democracy and public life, and provides a number of suggestions for what new beginnings are necessary, all of which is outlined in more detail throughout the book. Below is an excerpt from the preface that forecasts both the swindle of education offered by conservatives, the billionaires and corporate power brokers and why it needs to be resisted with as much urgency and collective power as possible. With all due respect to Charles Dickens, it appears to be the worst of times for public and higher education in America; public schools are increasingly viewed as a business and are prized above all for "customer satisfaction," and efficiency while largely judged through the narrow lens of empirical accountability measures. When not functioning as a business or a potentially lucrative for-profit investment, public schools are reduced to containment centers, holding institutions designed to largely punish young people marginalized by race and class. No longer merely tracked into low-achieving classes, poor white, brown and black youth are now tracked out of school into what is often called the school-to-prison pipeline. Schools have now become stress centers for the privileged and zones of abandonment for the poor. Public school teachers are now viewed as the new "welfare-queens," while academics are defined less as critical intellectuals and engaged scholars than as a new class or professional entrepreneurs. Under strict policies imposed in a number of states by right-wing politicians wrapping themselves in the rhetoric of austerity, higher education at all levels is being radically defunded while simultaneously being transformed into a credentializing factory restructured according to the values, social relations and governing practices of large corporations. In both public and higher education, ignorance is not merely fostered, but embraced through the course content whose value is almost exclusively defined through a metaphysics in which anything that can't be quantified is defined as useless. Corporate pedagogy has no use for critical thinking, autonomous subjects, the stretching of the imagination, or developing a sense of civic responsibility among students. Teachers who think and act reflectively, ask uncomfortable questions, challenge the scripts of official power and promote a search for the truth while encouraging pedagogy as the practice of freedom are now viewed as suspect, if not un-American. At the same time, amid all of the despair and foolishness on the part of right-wing politicians and conservative and corporate interests, it is not entirely clear that a spring of hope is beyond reach. As I wrote this preface, workers and young people were marching and demonstrating all over the globe against the dictates, values and policies of a market-driven economy that has corrupted politics, pushed democracy to its vanishing point and undermined public values. Unions, public school teachers, higher education, and all of those public spheres necessary to keep civic values alive are being challenged in a way that both baffles and shocks anyone who believes in the ideals and promises of a substantive democracy. In the United States, union-busting politicians such as Govs. Scott Walker (Wisconsin) and Chris Christie (New Jersey) not only want to gut social services and sell them off to the highest bidder, they are also symptomatic of a political fringe movement that wants to destroy the critical culture, dedicated public servants and institutions that give any sense of vitality, substance and hope to public and higher education in the United States. As the meaning of democracy is betrayed by its transformation into a market society, corporate power and money appear unchecked in their ability to privatize, deregulate and destroy all vestiges of public life. America's military wars abroad are now matched by the war at home; that is, the wars in Iraq, Afghanistan and Libya have found their counterpart in the war against the poor, immigrants, young people, unions, public-sector workers, the welfare state and schoolteachers. The call for shared sacrifices on the part of conservatives and Tea Party extremists becomes code for destroying the social state, preserving and increasing the power of mega-rich corporations and securing the wealth of the top one percent of the population with massive tax breaks while placing the burden of the current global economic meltdown on the shoulders of working people and the poor. Deficit reductions and austerity policies that allegedly address the global economic meltdown caused by the financial hawks running Wall Street now do the real work of stripping teachers of their collective bargaining rights, dismantling programs long associated with social services and relegating young people to mind-deadening schools and a debt-ridden future. David Harvey's notion of "accumulation through dispossession" has become a basic policy of casino capitalism. How else to interpret the right-wing call to tax the poor to subsidize tax breaks for billionaires and mega corporations? Despair, disposability and unnecessary human suffering now engulf large swaths of the American people, often pushing them into situations that are not merely tragic, but life threatening. A survival-of-the-fittest ethic has replaced any reasonable notion of solidarity, social responsibility and compassion for the other. Ideology does not seem to matter any longer as right-wing Republicans have less interest in argument and persuasion than in bullying their alleged enemies with the use of heavy-handed legislation and, when necessary, dire threats, as when Wisconsin's Republican Gov. Scott Walker threatened to mobilize the National Guard to prevent teachers' unions from protesting their possible loss of bargaining rights and a host of anti-worker proposals. Obama has joined the Republican Party, leaving us with a Republican Party line and a Republican Party of extremists. We have become a culture of forgetting, obliterating both the legacy of authoritarianism that characterized the Bush-Cheney years, while supporting a new group of Republican politicians who resemble Bush and Cheney on steroids. We are more than a nation in decline; we are a nation moving toward the bittersweet simplisms, policies and values of a new form of authoritarianism. With any viable leadership lacking at the national level, both young people and workers are watching the movements for democracy that are taking place all over the globe, but especially in the volatile Arab nations and in Western European countries such as France, England and Germany. Struggles abroad give Americans a glimpse of what happens when individual solutions to collective problems lose their legitimacy as a central tenet of neoliberal ideology. Massive demonstrations, pitched street battles, nonviolent gatherings, the impressive use of the new media as an alternative political and educational tool and an outburst of long-repressed anger eager for collective action are engulfing many countries across the globe. In smaller numbers, such protests are also taking place in a number of cities around the United States. Many Americans are, once again, invoking democracy, rejecting its association with the empty formality of voting and its disingenuous use to legitimate and justify political systems that produce massive wealth and income inequality. Democracy's promises are laying bare the sordid realities that now speak in its name. Its energy is becoming infectious, and one can only hope that those who believe that education is the foundation of critical agency, politics and democracy itself will be drawn to the task of fighting America's move in the last 30 years to a politically and economically authoritarian system. At issue here is the need for a new vocabulary, vision and politics that will unleash new democratic movements, institutions and a formative culture capable of imagining a life and society free of the dictates of endless military wars, boundless material waste, extreme inequality, disposable populations and unfounded human suffering. Central to "Education and the Crisis of Public Values" is the belief that no change will come unless education both within and outside of formal schooling is viewed as central to any viable notion of politics. If real reform is going to happen, it has to put in place a viable, critical, formative culture that supports notions of engaged citizenship, civic courage, public values, dissent, democratic modes of governing and a genuine belief in freedom, equality and justice. Ideas matter as do the human beings and institutions that make them count and that includes those intellectuals both in and out of schools who bear the responsibility of providing the conditions for Americans of all ages to be able to think critically so they can act imaginatively - so they can embrace a vision of the good life as a just life, one that extends the values, practices and vision of democracy to everyone. 1. Michael Kazin, "Whatever Happened to the American Left?" New York Times (September 25, 2011), p. SR4. Source: <http://www.truth-out.org/beyond-education-illiteracy-vulgarity-and-culture-cruelty/1317131147> (Webmaster Note: HEAL does not agree with everything in the above article. But, we believe it raises some interesting points.)

New Efforts to Crack Down on Residential Programs for Troubled Teens By Maia Szalavitz Friday, October 7, 2011 The first legislation aimed at regulating residential programs for troubled teens was introduced on Thursday in the House and the Senate. The bill would crack down on hundreds of programs housing thousands of teens, many of which use punishing "tough love" regimes found to include physical, sexual and emotional abuse. The Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act of 2011 was sponsored in the House by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) and in the Senate by Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa). A previous version of the bill passed the House twice, but was never introduced in the Senate (at the time, the relevant Senate committee was focused on President Obama's health care legislation). The legislation would prohibit sexual, physical and emotional abuse and would ban the use of deprivation — of food, sleep, clothing and shelter, for example — as punishment or for any other reason. The use of physical restraint would be permitted only for safety, and all programs would be required to provide residents with "reasonable" access to a telephone. It would require staff to be educated about what specifically counts as child abuse and how to report it, and mandate programs to disclose staff qualifications to parents. Investigations by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) in 2007-08 found dozens of deaths related to abuse at such residential programs, along with thousands of further allegations, many confirmed, of abuse. GAO investigators posing as parents also discovered widespread use of fraudulent marketing practices. MORE: Teens Made to Do Lap Dances in School in Supreme Court Case "The culture of abuse and neglect at some of these programs is simply unacceptable, as is the inadequate staff training, regulation and state oversight. Every day we wait to take action is another day that the safety of teenagers is in jeopardy," said Miller. "I hope my Republican colleagues will join me in helping put an end to these horrific abuses that put the lives of too many children in danger." Republicans, however, oppose additional federal regulations and believe these programs should be overseen by the states. "Ensuring the safety of the nation's youth is a priority for Americans on both sides of the political divide. We have learned a great deal about the abuse and neglect of troubled youth who live at residential treatment facilities," said Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.), chair of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, adding, "These at-risk youth deserve strong protections and we must ensure federal policies do not undermine the central responsibility of state and local leaders to ensure their safety and hold abusers accountable." In 2009, I reported for TIME on allegations of sexual abuse at Mount Bachelor Academy, a residential program in Oregon owned by Aspen Education, the largest national operator of residential teen centers, which include wilderness programs and "emotional growth" boarding schools. A state investigation that followed my article found that Mount Bachelor's treatment regime was "punitive, humiliating, degrading and traumatizing" and included "sexualized role play in front of staff and students." In March, the state also substantiated claims that neglect led to the death of a teen in another Aspen program, Sage Walk. That program had been featured on a short-lived reality show called "Brat Camp." But while Oregon has some oversight of these programs, in many states, there is none at all. Nail salons and dog grooming outfits are, in fact, more strictly regulated than troubled teen programs, which routinely use corporal punishment and isolation in the guise of treatment. MORE: Increasingly, Internet Activism Helps Shutter Abusive 'Troubled Teen' Boot Camps Cynthia Clark Harvey, whose daughter Erica died of heatstroke and dehydration after staff members of the Catherine Freer Wilderness program she attended insisted that she was faking her problems, testified during the first Congressional hearings held on the issue. "I support the legislation because it preserves true parental rights: the right to free and unmonitored communication with your child, the right to family-centered treatment and the right to know there are national standards that any program must adhere to," she said. The new bill is supported by the American Psychological Association, the American Academy of Pediatrics, the Child Welfare League and the American Association of Children's Residential Centers. The National Association of Therapeutic Schools and Programs, an industry group, has said it supports the "intent" of the legislation but opposes federal regulation. Maia Szalavitz is a health writer for TIME.com. Find her on Twitter at @maiasz. You can also continue the discussion on TIME Healthland's Facebook page and on Twitter at @TIMEHealthland. Source: <http://healthland.time.com/2011/10/07/new-efforts-to-crack-down-on-residential-programs-for-troubled-teens/>

Boy's death in juvenile detention center should jolt state lawmakers into action Posted Tuesday, Oct. 25, 2011 10 Signs of trouble were apparent at a Hood County juvenile detention facility before the death of a 14-year-old detainee this month. Why does it take a tragedy to propel the state to take a serious look at operations inside the Granbury Regional Juvenile Justice Center? Perhaps because too many local and state officials see the for-profit juvenile centers in Texas as a positive economic alternative to government-run institutions for troubled youths. Jordan Adams, a Cleburne middle school student, died in a Fort Worth hospital six days after being found unconscious Oct. 10 in his cell at the Granbury facility. A bedsheet was wrapped around his neck, according to police, who have not determined whether the death was an accident or "criminal incident." Regardless of the cause of death, when young people are placed in the custody of the state, there should be a reasonable expectation that their safety, health and general welfare will be protected. Sadly, too many heartbreaking examples point to that not being the case. State records show more than 250 complaints and serious incidents have been reported at the center since 2007, including youth-on-youth assaults, supervisory neglect and physical and sexual abuse. Perhaps the most disturbing statistic is the 133 cases of attempted suicide, an overwhelming amount in a four-year period for any group. Star-Telegram writer Dianna Hunt reported Sunday that the Hood County juvenile center, originally designed as a public-private partnership that would not cost taxpayers any money, had problems from the start. A coalition that included the county and a detention management corporation built the $6.5 million facility through the sale of tax-exempt certificates of participation (bonds). In a convoluted scheme, the management group was to lease the facility back to the county, then rent the place to operate a juvenile detention center that would pay off the bonds. The county would own it outright after 20 years. The private corporation floundered almost immediately when the daily census was far less than the 78 juveniles it needed to be "profitable." The county took over the operation for a while and then closed the facility because it was too costly, resulting in a downgrade of the county's bond rating by Standard & Poor's. Hood County in 2007 contracted with 4M Granbury Youth Services of Rockdale to operate the center, but a surprise state inspection two years later found "numerous unsanitary and unhealthy living conditions" at the facility. Among the violations cited were supervisory neglect, failure to make routine checks on detainees and failure to provide proper medical care, Hunt reported. In response to previously alleged and actual mistreatment in state juvenile facilities, major efforts were made to enhance security, supervision and medical attention for youths assigned there. The strategy included committing juveniles to privately run facilities. Regardless of who manages the detention centers, the responsibility rests with the state, which is charged with the care of these young people. The Texas Juvenile Justice Coalition in Austin has voiced concern about the lack of adequate supervision and oversight of juvenile justice facilities, particularly the for-profit centers, according to Executive Director Ann Correa. More needs to be done, and one specific corrective measure would be for the Legislature to fund independent ombudsmen to investigate complaints and concerns as recommended by the coalition. The death of a 14-year-old boy demands that Texans act, and with deliberate speed. Source: <http://www.star-telegram.com/2011/10/25/3473074/boys-death-in-juvenile-detention.html#ixzz1btETrapG>

Exclusive videos detail tactics at teen boot camps in Pasadena--October 26th, 2011 (Pasadena Star-News)

Source: http://www.pasadenastarnews.com/news/ci_19202277

For complete story, click here.

Pasadena police probe possible abuses after troubling youth camp videos surface By Associated Press, Published: October 28 PASADENA, Calif. — Police will investigate whether a crime occurred at a youth boot camp after videos surfaced showing instructors shouting at a boy wearing a tire around his neck and children being told to drink water until some vomited. Investigators will question boot camp operator Kelvin "Sgt. Mac" McFarland, police Cmdr. Darryl Qualls told the Pasadena Star-News (<http://bit.ly/vtQb7Q>) on Thursday. "Looking at the video we can only see McFarland, so we will start the investigation with McFarland," Qualls said. McFarland earlier denied to the newspaper that he appeared in the videos. A call left for him Friday was not immediately returned. McFarland was charged earlier this year with child abuse, extortion and other crimes. Prosecutors contend that he handcuffed a truant 14-year-old girl in May and told her family that she would be sent to juvenile detention unless she was enrolled in his camp. She was never enrolled. The Star-News this week released short video clips it said were made in 2009. On one, several instructors in military-style fatigues surround and shout at a boy who is wearing a heavy auto tire. At one point, the boy falls down crying but is ordered to stand again. In the other, several girls and boys are repeatedly ordered to drink water from colored plastic bottles. Several youngsters vomit. "I would certainly not subject my son or daughter or any child I know to this type of activity," City Council member Victor Gordo told the newspaper. "The short clips that I reviewed appeared to be more of a situation of intimidation and humiliation appearing to be employed under the guise of physical activity and discipline," Gordo said. The Star-News said the videos appear to have been made in Pasadena but did not indicate how it obtained them. McFarland runs Family First Growth Camp in Pasadena, which like other boot camps uses military-style discipline and exercises with a goal of instilling character and keeping at-risk youngsters away from drugs, alcohol and crime. The camp "doesn't believe in corporal punishment, nor will it be tolerated," according to a camp website. "The young men/women who come to us are good kids who have begun to make some poor choices with friends, school, drugs, alcohol, attitude with peers and family members," the website said, adding that through the camp, "these kids seek out, find, then learn to love themselves so they can love their families and start to move in a positive direction." The camp is funded through a combination of fees and charitable donations. Enrollment is through parents, although in some states juvenile justice systems send some offenders to boot camps. However, some studies have shown that juvenile offenders sent to boot camps were no less likely to commit new crimes than those who were placed in juvenile detention or given probation. The Star-News did not specify whether the videos were taken at a Family First training session and noted that some children seemed to be wearing T-shirts from another camp. Keith "Sarge" Gibbs, who runs Sarge's Community Base/Commit II Achieve Boot Camp, said that some of the children appear to be wearing his camp T-shirts. McFarland worked for him in 2009 but left to form his own camp after Gibbs learned that he had lied about taking a required background check, Gibbs said. "He left and took 28 families and kids with him, with my shirts and some paperwork," Gibbs told The Associated Press on Friday. Gibbs said he doubted that the video was shot during one of his camps. "Those individuals (in the videos) belong to Sgt. McFarland's team. Those are his teammates," he said. Although Gibbs uses some tire drills for strength training and does make youngsters drink a lot of water after long hikes, parents are always involved in the instruction and Gibbs said he has a policy against certain actions. "You can't demean or haze the kid ... your goal is to motivate these kids, to inspire them, empower them," he said. "If that was the entire program, I don't see where the kids are learning anything." "Do they need to be forced to drink water until they vomit? I don't think so," he said. A bill introduced earlier this month by Rep. George Miller, D-Richmond, would require training for boot camp staff. It also would require boot camp instructors to report child abuse and create a federal database where parents can check the credentials of boot camp operators. "This legislation will help put an end to these horrific abuses that put the lives of too many children in jeopardy," Miller said in a statement. Copyright 2011 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Source:

http://www.washingtonpost.com/national/pasadena-police-probe-possible-abuses-after-troubling-youth-camp-videos-surface/2011/10/28/gIQA7eRhPM_print.html For more on this story, see: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2054919/California-boot-camp-child-abuse-Kelvin-Sergeant-Mac-McFarland-caught-camera.html> and <http://www.ktla.com/news/landing/ktla-youth-boot-camp-instructor-arrested.0.6674918.story>

Boot camp abuses cited By Brian Charles, Staff Writer Posted: 10/29/2011 07:13:29 AM PDT William Edwards and Helen Edwards have made additional accusations against two Pasadena-based boot camps, which find themselves in the midst of a controversy over the harsh tactics employed by instructors. (SGVN/Staff Photo by Walt Mancini) PASADENA - A man who attended Pasadena-based youth boot camps run by Kelvin "Sgt. Mac" McFarland said episodes of harsh treatment were commonplace. And the man's adopted mother said children of immigrants and the illiterate were targeted for membership. William Edwards, 18, of Pasadena, said in one 2010 instance instructors at the Family First Growth Camp, which was run by McFarland, targeted a young girl for discipline by handcuffing her to a fence and kicking dirt on her. Edwards also recalled camp attendees having to drink large volumes of water that caused vomiting and nausea. "The drill instructors would say 'we will be here all day until you finish that water and if you take too long we will just make you drink more,'" Edwards said. Neither McFarland nor his attorney Evan Dicker of the Los Angeles County Alternate Public Defender's Office, returned calls seeking comment. In recent days, questions have been raised about McFarland, his former employer Keith "Sarge" Gibbs and their respective camps after two disturbing videos were published on this newspaper's website. In one of the videos, children - some as young as nine years old - are seen being forced to drink water to the point of vomiting. In the other video, a pre-teen boy is seen being screamed at by drill instructors, including McFarland, while carrying a truck tire around his neck. At the time of the taping in 2009, McFarland was employed by Gibbs. Gibbs can be heard on speaking on one of the videos. Both men have denied being present during the videotaping. Police investigating The videos prompted the Pasadena Police Department to launch an investigation and the acts have been strongly condemned by politicians from Pasadena City Hall to the nation's Capitol. Experts in the field of child development and child abuse laws have questioned both the efficacy and legality of the acts in the videos. For Edwards, the images in the videos serve as a reminder of what he said he witnessed firsthand. "(The drill instructors) would make you squat down with the tire around your neck," Edwards said. "It makes your neck and back hurt." Edwards is one of four children adopted by Helen Edwards, a 74-year-old retired U.S. Postal Service employee. Unlike many other parents who turn to boot camps, she said she didn't enroll her children to curb bad behavior. "I am raising them all by myself and I wanted to give them the experience of what a man's role in the world is," Helen Edwards said. "A great, smooth talker" She said she enrolled her two sons and two daughters in Gibbs' camp in 2008. After a dustup over training tactics and McFarland's failure to pass a background check, Gibbs and McFarland parted ways. Wooed by McFarland's charm, the Edwards family remained with McFarland when he branched off in 2009. "He is a great, smooth talker," Helen Edwards said. She said she was so taken by McFarland that she staked the operation, writing him a check for $2,000 to help start his camp. McFarland promised to repay, but hasn't, the retired postal worker said. Helen Edwards said she has never filed suit to try to retrieve her money from McFarland. For her investment, Helen Edwards served on the Family First Growth Camp's board of directors. For nearly a year she kept McFarland's books. But, the relationship soured when Helen Edwards began to have doubts about McFarland's ability to manage money. "In November of 2009, he went up on the monthly dues from $200 to $250 a month," Helen Edwards said. "And if you were late with the money it cost you a $25 late fee." Immediately, 13 families left Family First Growth Camp. In March 2010, McFarland turned to a new "recruiting tool," Helen Edwards said. "The third week of every month, he would come in with a child - who was skipping school - in handcuffs," she recalled. "And he would call the parents and make them pay $100 on the spot. And then $250 at the first of the month, as part of their dues." "Walking-around money" McFarland targeted some of Pasadena's most vulnerable residents, Helen Edwards said. "He would go after the immigrants and the illiterate," she said. Many of the parents who came in to pay McFarland for "finding" their children spoke little or no English and the boot camp used translators to help with the transactions, Helen Edwards said. Helen Edwards said she would receive the $250 and deposit the money into a business account. The $100 McFarland took from parents for capturing truant teens "was his walking-around money," Helen Edwards said. On May 16 Pasadena police arrested McFarland on suspicion of kidnapping, child abuse, child endangerment, extortion and unlawful use of a badge. McFarland allegedly handcuffed a truant Pasadena Unified School District student and told her parents, who spoke limited English, to pay him $100 or he would put their daughter in a juvenile detention center. McFarland has pleaded not guilty and is out on bail awaiting trial. Because of her financial dealings with McFarland, Helen Edwards said previous to seeing the videos she was reluctant to come forward with any information. She and her family left McFarland's group after adopted son Tyrone and one of the drill instructors got into a fight, Edwards said. A portion of McFarland's training forced children in the camp to wrestle adult drill instructors - at least one of whom as on active duty in the U.S. Marine Corps, she said. A match between Tyrone and a man identified only as "Sgt. Ronnie," turned into a brawl, she said. McFarland intervened and broke up the fight by reportedly using a choke hold on Tyrone, his mother said. "Tyrone, who is a big boy, almost 6-foot-tall, got free by flipping (McFarland) over his back," Helen Edwards said. "McFarland took Tyrone for a walk and told him not to come back to the camp anymore." A month later Helen Edwards said she pulled all of her children from the camp. brian.charles@sgvn.com twitter.com/JBrianCharles 626-578-6300, ext. 4494 Source: http://www.pasadenastarnews.com/ci_19222653

CDC Director Arrested for Child Molestation and Bestiality By Dr. Mercola Dr. Kimberly Quinlan Lindsey, a top official with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) has been arrested and charged with two counts of child molestation and one count of bestiality. Dr. Lindsey, who joined the CDC in 1999, is currently the deputy director for the Laboratory Science Policy and Practice Program Office. She's second in command of the program office. Prior to that role, she was the senior health scientist in the Office of Public Health Preparedness and Response, an office that oversees the allocation process for $1.5 billion in terrorism preparedness. According to CNN: "Authorities also charged Lindsey's live-in boyfriend, Thomas Joseph Westerman, 42, with two counts of child molestation. The two are accused of 'immoral and indecent' sexual acts involving a 6-year-old ... The bestiality charge says Lindsey 'did unlawfully perform or submit to any sexual act with an animal.'" Between January and August last year, Dr. Lindsey and her boyfriend allegedly involved the child during sex, and DeKalb County police claim they discovered photographs of Lindsey performing sex acts on a couple of her pets. Some of you may wonder why I've chosen to discuss this story. Some may think it's in poor taste and doesn't belong in a newsletter about health. However, I believe it's relevant to be aware that someone in charge of your child's health is allegedly engaged in child abuse. Her actions raise serious questions in my mind about her level of concern for the health and well-being of children in general. Dr. Lindsey Played Primary Role in Bogus Swine Flu Propaganda Campaign As you may recall, the 2009 H1N1 swine flu pandemic turned out to be a complete sham, with a fast-tracked and particularly dangerous vaccine being pushed as the sole remedy. Children and pregnant women were the primary targets of this dangerous vaccine. The H1N1 flu was a perfect example of how the CDC can brazenly distort reality, and often ignore and deny the dangerous and life-threatening side effects of their solution. As a result of this bogus propaganda campaign, thousands of people were harmed (and many died) worldwide. In August, it was revealed that the 2009 H1N1 influenza vaccine increased the risk for narcolepsy—a very rare and devastating sleeping disorder—in Swedish children and adolescents by 660 percent. Finland also noticed a dramatic increase in narcolepsy following vaccination with Pandemrix. There, an interim report issued in January of this year found that the H1N1 vaccine increased the risk of narcolepsy by 900 percent in children and adolescents below the age of 19. In the US, the H1N1 flu vaccine was statistically linked with abnormally high rates of miscarriage and stillbirths. As reported by Steven Rubin on the NVIC's blog, the US H1N1 flu vaccine was SIXTY times more likely to be reported to VAERS to be associated with miscarriage than previous seasonal flu vaccines. The only "winners" in this game were the pharmaceutical companies that received millions of dollars for this never-proven-effective and highly reactive vaccine, while being sheltered by our government from liability for any harm it caused. Dr. Lindsey played an important role in that campaign, which ended in tragedy for countless many—not from a killer flu (statistically, the 2009 H1N1 flu was Milder than usual) but from the dangerous and expensive "remedy" to this oversold non-threat. All of that said, I do want to stress that Dr. Lindsey has not yet been found guilty, and there are still many unanswered questions relating to this case. But this is not the only shocking story raising questions about the ethics of those involved in creating the CDC's health recommendations. Source: <http://articles.mercola.com/sites/articles/archive/2011/10/28/cdc-director-arrested-for-child-molestation--bestiality.aspx> and <http://www.cnn.com/2011/10/11/justice/georgia-cdc-arrest/index.html>

Pasadena women step forward with more boot camp allegations By Brian Charles, Staff Writer Pasadena Star-News Posted: 10/31/2011 06:05:02 PM PDT
PASADENA - At least three Pasadena women say they witnessed what they considered abuse by drill instructors from Family First Growth Camp while the boot camp operated on Pasadena city property. Pasadena residents Susan Lafferty and Nancy Rose and Sierra Madre resident Julie Unamuno said they forwarded their claims of abuse to the city by email in 2009, but nothing was done. "I saw (someone) getting in their faces and screaming while the children were sobbing. Some of the (children) were as young as 8 years old," Lafferty said. "And I could not see how any of this could help a child." "I would never even yell at an animal like that," Rose said. There was "no formal investigation related to the tactics" but officials will review the 2009 emails, Pasadena spokeswoman Ann Erdman said in a statement Monday. Erdman acknowledged that city officials were aware that Family First Growth Camp, operated by Kelvin "Sgt. Mac" McFarland, used the Arroyo and Hahamongna Watershed Park, both city properties, to train children. The camp was routinely ushered off city land for failing to have a permit, Erdman said. "Anytime park safety officers encountered the operation on city-owned property, they ordered them to vacate the premises immediately," Erdman said. Neither McFarland nor his attorney, Evan Dicker of the Los Angeles County Alternate Public Defender's Office, returned calls seeking comment. McFarland was arrested on May 27 on suspicion of child abuse, child endangerment, kidnapping, extortion and unlawful use of a badge stemming from his encounter with a young girl in Pasadena. His case is still pending. In July, Judge Stan Blumenfeld decided to hold McFarland over for trial. McFarland remains free on $185,000 bail. He is due back in court Nov. 16. McFarland's criminal record includes arrests and convictions for driving under the influence in 1991 and 2005, as well as a 2000 conviction for misdemeanor battery and a 2009 conviction for driving with a suspended license. McFarland can be seen in two videos that provide an inside look at juvenile boot camps. In one video, McFarland can be seen coaxing children to drink water to the point that several children began vomiting. In the second, he and several other adults can be seen taunting a child who has been forced to wear a tire around his neck. Those videos were released by this newspaper last week. The voice of boot camp instructor Keith "Sarge" Gibbs, who operates Sarge's Community Base/Commit II Achieve, can be heard on one of the videos. Both men deny being present for the videotaping. Gibbs has not been charged with a criminal offense. Lafferty, Unamuno and Rose all ride horses in the Arroyo and Hahamongna Watershed Park. They said the tactics employed by the Family First Growth Camp during their run-ins with the camp in 2009 bore striking resemblance to the scenes depicted in those videos. Unamuno, who is a riding instructor in the Arroyo, said she first encountered McFarland in November 2009. "I saw what appeared to be a drill sergeant was pointing his finger in a young girl's face while she was covered in dirt," Unamuno said. "She had been reduced to tears." Lafferty, Rose and Unamuno came forward after seeing the videos. Rose, Lafferty and Unamuno said they didn't see any children being forced to drink large volumes of water, but they did see children being forced to carry truck tires around their neck. During their horse rides, the women said they also saw children forced to scale steep hills during a heat wave in 2010 and also witnessed instructors regularly give obscenity-laced tongue lashings to the children. "Do you think breaking them down to be nothing and using obscenities is going to make them any better?" Rose asked. "They are not adults, they are kids and their minds are not even developed." After a handful of run-ins with the camp, the women said they decided to report the acts to Pasadena City officials. "We knew this was at the very least inappropriate behavior if not out-and-out abuse," Lafferty said. Lafferty contacted the Pasadena Department of Public Works, directing many of her emails to Martin Pastucha, the department's former director, Lafferty said. The women said they thought to call the Pasadena police, but were unable to make out a license plate on a car and were too afraid to approach the boot camp to ask for names, Rose said. It remains unclear what happened to the email sent by Lafferty, but Pasadena Police Department officials said they had no knowledge of any of the activities in the Arroyo or Hahamongna Watershed Park. "We do not have any prior complaints of child abuse against Mr. McFarland and Mr. Gibbs regarding boot camps," Pasadena police Lt. Tracey Ibarra said. Ibarra runs the Police Department's youth outreach program. Despite not having a permit, the camps returned in 2010 and were spotted in the Arroyo as recently as last summer, Rose said. The riding group began to alter its route to avoid the group, since Unamuno often takes her own children on the path. "It's unnerving to see that type of drill going on in that setting and trying to explain that to young children," Unamuno said. Meanwhile, no arrests have been made in the case, as investigators said they are still unsure a crime has even occurred, Ibarra said. "The Pasadena Police Department has had discussions with the District Attorney's Office, but there has not been any cases opened," Ibarra said. "We are still trying to determine whether there has been criminal act with identifiable suspects." The department has not contacted the Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Service since it's unclear whether any laws were broken, Ibarra said. The video contains episodes recorded during McFarland's time with Gibbs, according to multiple sources familiar with the camps. Gibbs has not operated free of controversy. In 2009, he was removed from Pasadena Unified School District campuses when accusations surfaced that his tactics were "too rough," according to district officials. brian.charles@sgvn.com twitter.com/JBrianCharles 626-578-6300, ext. 4494

Source: http://www.pasadenastarnews.com/news/ci_19235352 For more on this story, visit: <http://www.nbclosangeles.com/news/local/More-Allegations-Against-Youth-Boot-Camp--133044633.html>, http://www.pasadenastarnews.com/news/ci_19307909 and <http://www.tmcnet.com/usubmit/2011/11/02/5899803.htm>

November 5, 2011 In State Care, 1,200 Deaths and Few Answers By DANNY HAKIM and RUSS BUETTNER For James Michael Taylor, an evening bath became a death sentence. Mr. Taylor, who was 41 and a quadriplegic, had little more ability than a newborn baby to lift his head. Bathing him required the constant attention of a staff member at the group home for the developmentally disabled where he lived, near Schenectady, N.Y. One summer night in 2005, a worker lowered Mr. Taylor into the tub, turned on the water and left the room. Over the next 15 minutes, the water slowly rose over his head. He drowned before anyone returned. Joan Taylor, his mother, remembers the words her husband said as dirt was shoveled onto their son's grave. "This is the last time they're going to dump on you," he told his dead son. James Taylor's death was no aberration. In New York, it is unusually common for developmentally disabled people in state care to die for reasons other than natural causes. One in six of all deaths in state and privately run homes, or more than 1,200 in the past decade, have been attributed to either unnatural or unknown causes, according to data obtained by The New York Times that has never been released. The figure is more like one in 25 in Connecticut and Massachusetts, which are among the few states that release such data. What's more, New York has made little effort to track or thoroughly investigate the deaths to look for troubling trends, resulting in the same kinds of errors and preventable deaths, over and over. The state does not even collect statistics on specific causes of death, leaving many designated as "unknown," sometimes even after a medical examiner has made a ruling. The Times undertook its own analysis of death records and found disturbing patterns: some residents who were not supposed to be left alone with food choked in bathrooms and kitchens. Others who needed help on stairs tumbled alone to their deaths. Still others ran away again and again until they were found dead. Mr. Taylor was hardly the only resident to drown in a bathtub. Another developmentally disabled man at a house run by the same nonprofit organization drowned in a tub four months earlier. Through a Freedom of Information request to the State Commission on Quality of Care and Advocacy for Persons With Disabilities, The Times obtained data for all 7,118 cases of developmentally disabled people — those with conditions like cerebral palsy, autism and Down syndrome — who died while in state care over the past decade. The data from the agency, which is responsible for overseeing treatment for the developmentally disabled, included only the broad “manner” in which people died — by homicide or suicide, accidents or natural causes. By far the biggest category, other than natural causes, was “unknown,” accounting for 10 percent of all deaths in the system. The records suggested problems in care may be contributing to those unexplained deaths. The average age of those who died of unknown causes was 40, while the average age of residents dying of natural causes was 54. The Times reviewed the case files of all the deaths not resulting from natural causes that the commission investigated over the past decade and found there had been concerns about the quality of care in nearly half of the 222 cases. The records also showed that problems leading to deaths rarely resulted in systemwide steps, like alerts to all operators of homes, to prevent mistakes from recurring. Responses were typically limited to the group home where a resident died. At homes operated by nonprofit organizations, low-level employees were often fired or disciplined, but repercussions for executives were rare. At state-run homes, it is also difficult to take action against caregivers, who are represented by unions that contest disciplinary measures. New York relies heavily on the operators of the homes to investigate and determine how a person in their care died and, in a vast majority of cases, accepts that determination. And the state has no uniform training for the nearly 100,000 workers at thousands of state and privately run homes and institutions. The value of analyzing death records for problems in care that could be prevented through alerts or training has been well established, and is encouraged by the federal Government Accountability Office. Officials in Connecticut, for example, noticed four choking deaths in 2006, the first year the state published such data. They developed a statewide program — two days of initial training and a refresher course every two years thereafter. The state has had just one choking death since 2007. New York has had at least 21 during that same period. “It’s incredibly important,” said Terrence W. Macy, commissioner of the Department of Developmental Services in Connecticut. “If everybody knows you study it this hard and you have this level of detail, it’s going to have an impact.” There is no question that it can be extremely challenging to care for the developmentally disabled, a population that includes some people who are fragile and immobile and others who are unruly and inclined toward violence. But the problems in the New York system appear especially troubling given that the state spends $10 billion a year caring for the developmentally disabled — more than California, Texas, Florida and Illinois combined — while providing services to fewer than half as many people as those states do. Lawsuits are relatively rare after the deaths of developmentally disabled people in New York, in part because economic damages are difficult to prove, given that the victims are seldom employed. And sometimes families are simply grateful to the group home for years of care for their relative. This year, Gov. Andrew M. Cuomo forced the commissioners of the two agencies that oversee the developmentally disabled to resign amid a Times investigation of group home workers who were beating and abusing residents. In interviews, the officials who replaced them acknowledged problems with how the state tracks and seeks to prevent untimely deaths. Courtney Burke, the commissioner of the Office for People With Developmental Disabilities, which operates and oversees thousands of group homes, acknowledged that her agency suffered from a lack of transparency and what she called “a culture of nonreporting.” “One of the things I’m seeking to do,” she said last month, “is have better data on those deaths.” A Recurring Problem One evening last year, a large piece of London broil was left marinating in the refrigerator of a state-run group home in the hamlet of Golden’s Bridge, in Westchester County. The kitchen was supposed to be locked overnight. As in many homes for the developmentally disabled, residents known to be at risk for choking were not allowed to be left alone with food. But the kitchen was open during the early morning of June 5, 2010. No one noticed as Cynthia Dupas left her bedroom, opened the refrigerator and bit off a chunk of raw beef. She collapsed outside her bedroom and died. She was 51. Hers was hardly an isolated case. A quarter of the 222 death files reviewed by The Times involved a person choking to death. And given the state’s poor recordkeeping, the actual number of choking deaths is likely larger. The deaths often occur when residents try to eat food too quickly; physical limitations also play a role. Some of the fatalities came in quick succession: At a home near the Finger Lakes in 2001, a resident died after stuffing down a steak that was left on the kitchen counter after dinner, in violation of safety guidelines for several residents. Four months later, Maxwell Chaneles died at a Schenectady-area group home after being left alone to eat a steak. A nonprofit group that cared for Mr. Chaneles during the day had determined he was a choking risk who required mealtime supervision, but a second nonprofit agency that ran the group home where he lived had no such protections in place. He was 66. Less than two weeks later, Virgil Macro was served a breakfast that had not been prepared according to a meal plan devised to keep him from choking. Staff members at his Dutchess County group home also failed to supervise him while he ate. He was 39. In each case, the response suggested by the Commission on Quality of Care was mostly limited to the place where the death occurred. Workers who made mistakes were disciplined. Some employees in the home, or the local area, were retrained. But other states take broader action. In 2006, Ohio officials recognized an increase in choking deaths and issued a statewide alert. A year later, California officials noticed a similar rise in one part of the state and began an educational program that reduced deaths. A lack of standards and accepted definitions of basic terms also leads to deadly confusion. Terms like “bite-size” and “chopped,” which are key to defining what is safe for a person to eat, can be left open to interpretation by the staff at a given institution or group home. The Commission on Quality of Care regularly asks individual homes to revisit those definitions, but the state has not resolved varying interpretations. In contrast, Connecticut’s training materials, which the state credits with sharply reducing choking deaths, precisely define such terms with photographs and dimensions. State officials in New York cannot even agree on how many people are dying. The Office for People With Developmental Disabilities says 933 people in state care died in 2009. The Commission on Quality of Care says 757 did. Neither agency could explain the discrepancy. Outside experts said they were particularly puzzled that records maintained by the state would list the cause as “unknown” in more than 700 deaths over the past decade, and wondered how hard state officials had tried to determine what happened. Bruce Simmons was one of the many people the state had listed as dead of unknown causes. But a review of the records from the state’s own investigation reveals what occurred. He lived in a group home in Cortland, N.Y., which kept him under tight supervision around food because of his history of stealing food and choking. But the nonprofit group that took care of him during the day decided that was not necessary, and he choked to death in November 2008. He was 52. Lapses in Fire Safety All that is left of the house at 1534 State Route 30 in the Adirondack town of Wells is a grassy field and an empty driveway. More than two and a half years ago, the house, home to nine developmentally disabled residents, burned to the ground, killing four of them. The fire revealed shortcomings in staff training and safety standards. And the home’s evacuation plans were based on unrealistic expectations that developmentally disabled residents would be able to flee in an emergency. Large institutions for the developmentally disabled are built much like hospitals, with extensive fire safety measures. The group home had some safety features, like sprinklers in parts of the house, but was permitted to meet building codes akin to those of homes with able-bodied residents who know they should flee from a fire. Yet though the Wells fire took place in March 2009, the state has not undertaken a broad review of whether group homes, which now care for a vast majority of the state’s developmentally disabled, have appropriate safety modifications to protect residents who often do not understand that they are in danger. The fire at the house, known as Riverview, occurred in the early morning, starting in a trash can on a screen porch and spreading rapidly up vinyl siding into the attic of the L-shaped, one-story residence. An automatic alarm call was made at 5:25 a.m. to a monitoring company. The protocol established by the Office for People With Developmental Disabilities required that the company call the group home before notifying the Fire Department, which wasted minutes and violated state fire standards. By 5:30, the local fire company was dispatched, alerting Ken Hoffman, a firefighter who lived across the street and rushed over to help. When Mr. Hoffman arrived, all nine residents were still inside, but he and two staff members helped most of them evacuate. Then one resident fell, distracting the two staff members as three residents wandered back into the burning house, according to state records. There were further complications. The state had not informed local fire officials about the presence of the group home, leaving them ill prepared. “There was no contact,” said Peter Byrne, a Rockland County fire safety official who was on the panel of experts convened by the state after the fire. “If I roll into a single-family dwelling at 2 or 3 in the morning, I’m expecting mom, dad and 2.3 kids, whatever the average is, not 11 challenged individuals.” Credible investigations were performed — one by a local grand jury, one by the State Office of Fire Prevention and Control, and another by the panel that included Mr. Byrne. But a follow-up review undertaken by the two agencies most responsible for the developmentally disabled — the Office for People With Developmental Disabilities and the Commission on Quality of Care — included questions like whether residents’ day-to-day medical care needs were being met. The questions “were not germane to the fundamental questions posed by the Wells fire — what was the cause of the fire and what can we do in the future to prevent such fires from occurring in such a tragic manner,” Roger Bearden, the new head of the commission, said in an interview. Like most group homes in New York, the Riverview house was required to meet residential building codes, which are less than stringent. There were no sprinklers in the attic at the house, or on the screen porch where the fire started. Records showed that the building’s original plans required fire retardant materials on the porch ceiling and that a planned barrier wall in the attic was abandoned during construction. While the house was required to meet standards from the National Fire Protection Association, an interview with a top association official suggests that while the standards are open to interpretation, the house could have been more robustly protected. “There’s been an unresolved question about why a sprinkler wasn’t provided on that porch area,” said Robert E. Solomon, a fire safety expert at the association who served on the state panel. “Our standards would have probably put a sprinkler on that porch area where that fire occurred,” he said, which could have prevented the fire from spreading. The Riverview case also underscores widespread problems in how fire drills at group homes have been conducted. The Times reported in March that a whistle-blower warned a senior state official in 2008 that drill records were being routinely faked or implausibly speedy evacuation times were being claimed. State investigators found that was the case at the Riverview house. The staff also seemed unprepared; time was spent battling the fire with an extinguisher instead of evacuating residents. The grand jury convened by the district attorney of Hamilton County noted that fires were common in group homes, adding, "It would be a grave mistake to view Riverview's tragedy as an isolated incident." Some steps have been taken since the fire: tighter rules guiding new construction, bringing in outside supervisors for fire drills and outside experts for inspections. But Ms. Burke's agency did not say when it would review whether other homes in the system might also be lacking fire safety features sufficient enough for developmentally disabled residents. After several weeks of inquiries from The Times, Ms. Burke said she would reconvene the state panel that investigated the fire. Mr. Hoffman said he could not shake the memory of the fire. "It's still something that comes back to my mind on a weekly basis," he said. "We lost four neighbors that night." A System's Failure No one told Joan Taylor, after her son James died in August 2005, that there had been a similar bathtub drowning four months earlier. Or that the other drowning, like her son's, took place at a group home operated by a local chapter of the New York State ARC, the nation's largest nonprofit organization serving the developmentally disabled. In both cases, there had been concerns that ARC had too few staff members to supervise the developmentally disabled residents. Dalton Lacombe died at the ARC home in Malone, N.Y., in April 2005, after being left alone in a bath for up to 20 minutes. The house had 11 residents and one overnight staff member on duty. The state recommended hiring more employees, but backed off after discussions with ARC management. The death "wasn't related to staffing levels," Lester G. Parker, executive director of the Adirondack ARC, which oversees the Malone house, said in an interview. "It was related to a staff person clearly and significantly neglecting their duties." Mrs. Taylor had pushed for an increase in staffing at her son's group home near Schenectady, where three workers looked after eight severely developmentally disabled residents. ARC officials in Schenectady declined to comment. After Mr. Taylor drowned, the organization's only significant response was to fire his caregiver. "The guy who left James unattended is the scapegoat, and the agency really took no responsibility from the top," Mr. Taylor's sister, Patricia Taylor, said. Marc Brandt, ARC's statewide leader, acknowledged that no broad changes were enacted after the drownings, but said it was up to the state, not his organization, to take action. "If they see anything that is wrong, they've always let us know," he said. Mr. Taylor's mother has been a fierce advocate for people with developmental disabilities for decades. Mrs. Taylor, 86, started a parent group, lobbied in Albany and was appointed to the capital-area Board of Visitors of the Office for People With Developmental Disabilities. She is most proud of helping get legislation passed in 2002 that gave parents control over end-of-life decisions for the developmentally disabled. "I was insulted I couldn't make that decision for my son, who I wanted to die with dignity," she said. On a recent day, as Mrs. Taylor sat on the back porch of her apartment at a retirement home in Saratoga Springs, wearing tennis shoes and shorts, she leafed through the guestbook from her son's funeral, filled with 300 signatures, including those of local elected officials. "I don't know if my kid died with dignity or not," she said. She grew up on Long Island and trained as a nurse; her late husband, Robert, was an engineer with General Electric. She knew something was wrong with James, their youngest child, when he was still a baby. Suspecting he could not hear, she slammed cupboard doors near their infant son, and he did not flinch. She got a much greater shock after a doctor told her, "Your son is mentally retarded." Doctors recommended that he be institutionalized. Mrs. Taylor resisted, but she had five other children. Dealing with James, her sixth child — quadriplegic, sleepless and with the intellectual capacity of a 3-month-old — filled her days and nights. Eventually, she felt she had no choice. "I will never forget that day," Mrs. Taylor once wrote in an essay. "My husband and I woke up that morning both fighting back the tears. I dressed James in his very best suit and we drove the 30 miles back to the institution and left him there." "We both cried all the way home," she said. "I thought it was the worst day of my life." She has done advocacy work with ARC and Mr. Brandt over the years, and calls him "a saint," but she is angry about what happened to her son. Her daughter said it was because of her mother's advocacy work that Mr. Taylor's death received attention. She worries about the developmentally disabled who die and have no family around to push for answers for them. "These deaths are marginalized because these sort of people are not valued by society," Patricia Taylor said. When she was in the fourth grade, she dreamed of taking her brother and running away with him, protecting him. She finds it hard to accept that no one was able to protect him after he grew up. "I believe that God put these people here for a purpose, because if we didn't have them to look after, we would lose our humanity," she said. "How would we know compassion? It says in the Bible, do ye so unto the least of my brothers. I think that's what it's all about." Source: http://www.nytimes.com/2011/11/06/nvregion/at-state-homes-simple-tasks-and-fatal-results.html?_r=1

Woman recalls experience in Bassett-based youth boot camp By Frank C. Girardot, Staff Writer Posted: 11/06/2011 06:03:03 AM PST BUYA boot camp office room 304 at Bassett High School in La Puente, Calif., Friday, Nov. 4, 2011. (SGVN/Staff Photo by Keith Birmingham) ne Velazquez's youth boot camp experience she would consider uplifting or positive. Taken from a warm bed in her father's Redondo Beach home at 5 a.m. one morning, Velazquez said she was handcuffed, screamed at and videotaped by representatives of the Building Unique Youth Alternatives - a program run from an office on the campus of Bassett High School in La Puente. Things quickly got worse. "They first took me to Bassett High School for intake," Velazquez recalled. "They strip searched us and forced us on a bus where we had to put our heads down so we wouldn't see where we were going." Velazquez said she and a group of teens - many from foster homes or families new to the country - were taken to Camp Pendleton and forced to endure similar indignities for a week. Now, 20, Velazquez said she will never forget the experience - or the humiliation. "We would wake up at 5 a.m. and do vigorous exercise all day. If you fell, you were kicked and pushed and yelled at. We were called fat, whores, stupid, bitches, maggots, etcetera," she said. "I was on the ground doing exercises and had dirt kicked into my face, eyes, and mouth. They tried to force me to eat my vomit." Bassett Unified Superintendent Martin Galindo acknowledged the BUYA program has been operating at Bassett since at least 2005. He said the district has received no complaints. Sheriff's Lt. Victor Sotelo said deputies in Industry have had no complaints about the BUYA camp. "It pretty much runs independently. We don't give them a lot of oversight," Galindo said. "We don't have people there every Saturday looking at what they are doing. It's similar to any outside entity who uses our facility whether it be soccer or baseball, we count on them to run it properly," Galindo said. "But we can't monitor it." Calls to the program's office on the Bassett campus went unanswered Thursday and Friday. Brian Der Vartanian, a Glendale accountant who did BUYA's books until about 2007, said several police officers and deputies associated with the program left about three years ago. On its website, BUYA describes its program as "an intense, ten-week youth intervention program designed to change the destructive behavior of strong-willed, out of control or at-risk youth ... Our program begins with the eight-day camp component, focusing on discipline, responsibility, respect, and behavioral issues." And, BUYA promises results. "We have maintained a long-term, 85 percent success rate over our six-year history," the website notes. "The program is delivered by retired, active and reserve police officers, members of the armed forces and volunteers." A community college student near San Diego, Velazquez said she came forward to recount her experience with BUYA after seeing videos on this newspaper's website. One of those videos, shot at a boot camp run out of Pasadena, depicted children forced to drink water until they vomited. Another video centered on a young boy being forced to wear a tire around his body while a group of instructors - dressed in military garb - yelled and jostled him until he broke down in tears. Dr. Harlan Bixby, an expert on the effect of fluids in the body, said bingeing on water can be deadly. "Tap water is free of electrolytes, allowing it to penetrate cell walls without obstruction, he said. The swelling of cells does little damage in muscle cells, but can induce stroke-like symptoms in the brain, Bixby said. "That video of them forcing the children to drink water ... we had that three times a day. That was the only time to drink. After, you would have to hold the canteen above your head and if any water dripped, you would have to refill the canteen and do it again. Most of the time, we just threw it up, and didn't get any water in our systems. As Velazquez recalls, the methods used by boot camp instructors were nothing short of horrific. "They gave one teen laxatives, and made him put a (sanitary napkin) in his (rear end) and hike like that," she said. "One teen was overweight and they would taunt her telling her 'imagine there's a burger up that hill.'" Velazquez, who had been in and out of foster homes, said she attended a few more sessions and was promised a leadership role. "They would tell me to hit kids," she recalled. "I wouldn't do it, so they would hit me." Joyce Burrell, director of the Juvenile Justice Program in Human and Social Development for American Institute for Research, believes boot camps are ineffective in dealing with troubled teens, many of whom, like Velazquez, have been exposed to trauma in their personal lives. "We have to approach dealing with these children from a more trauma based approach," Joyce Burrell said about the effectiveness of boot camps. "There's a real split in terms of those who believe yelling and screaming at boot camps has it's place in treatment." Burrell sides with child development experts who believe that boot camps do more harm than good. Unable to deal with the experience, Velazquez said she overdosed on Ibuprofen and Tylenol which forced the Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services to take action. Ultimately she was pulled from the program. Since leaving, Velazquez has maintained contact with other teens forced to attend the camp and has become an advocate of sorts for teens forced into youth boot camps. Velazquez, who describes herself as a "good kid" can't understand why adults would subject children to the extreme sort of punishment she endured. "They tried to break me down, but they couldn't," she said. "I'm going to do what I can to keep the focus on this issue." Staff writer Brian Charles contributed to this story. frank.girardot@sgvn.com 626-578-6300, ext. 4478 twitter.com/frankgirardot facebook.com/crimesceneblog Source: http://www.pasadenastarnews.com/news/ci_19277095#ixzz1d5HdEb8V

EDITORIAL Open courts for kids An L.A. judge's proposal to let the public observe dependency court proceedings is a much-needed move toward both access and accountability. November 10, 2011 Michael Nash, the presiding judge of Los Angeles Juvenile Court, has long lobbied for legislation that would allow the public greater access to the work of California's dependency courts, where the fates of children in foster care are decided. Twice, bills have been introduced in Sacramento to achieve that important objective, only to be stymied by well-meaning but misguided objections from child welfare advocates and self-interested protests from public employee groups whose members would face greater scrutiny. Now, Nash is taking matters into his own hands, for which he is to be applauded. This week Nash circulated a proposed order that would accomplish what legislators have been unwilling or unable to do: open the courts, at least here in Los Angeles. Drawing on rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court and others, it notes that such access allows the public to monitor the effectiveness of the courts and those responsible for administering foster care — essential requirements of sound and open government. "Public awareness and understanding of the juvenile court system ... would promote public involvement in the governmental processes and might deter inappropriate actions on the part of some participants," the order says, quoting an earlier appellate court ruling. Importantly, Nash's proposed order would not open every proceeding, any more than the presumption of openness in adult court means that every hearing there is open to the public. Rather, Nash is changing the current presumption in favor of secrecy to one that favors openness, while at the same time allowing parties to object if they believe secrecy is necessary in a particular case. If anyone does object, the only issue that a judge could consider in weighing that objection is whether openness would likely be harmful to the child's best interests. Judges could not close a hearing to spare the feelings of witnesses or shield foster care workers from public accountability. It's a shame that the Legislature could not bring itself to pass a bill by Assemblyman Mike Feuer (D-Los Angeles) that would have done what Nash is setting out to do. But until the state's elected leaders can find the courage to do what's right on this issue, Nash's move will allow L.A. to serve as a laboratory for gauging the benefits of openness. Moreover, the judge's willingness to tackle this question even though it may expose him and his colleagues to greater scrutiny should help confront the insidious and destructive assumption that secrecy is necessarily in the interests of children. In fact, secrecy often allows them to be harmed without consequence. In Los Angeles, where too many children suffer at the hands of a sometimes indifferent child welfare system, Nash's order is urgently needed and long overdue. Source: http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/opinion/la-ed-courts-20111110.0.6638793.story?track=rss&utm_source=feedburner&utm_medium=feed&utm_campaign=Feed%3A+latimes%2Fnews%2Fprintedition%2Fopinion+%28Los+Angeles+Times++Editorials%2C+Op-Ed%29

latimes.com For teen program's chief, tough love may have turned criminal The operator of a Pasadena 'boot camp' aimed at turning around troubled lives with military-type discipline faces trial on charges of kidnapping and extortion for his treatment of a girl and her family. By Ricardo Lopez, Los Angeles Times November 13, 2011 The surprise visit to Alberto Ruiz's house was swift. Dress quickly, he was told. You're going to boot camp. His parents, worried about his drug use and habit of skipping school, had followed a friend's advice and called Kelvin McFarland. Ruiz's behavior had earned him a spot in McFarland's Family First Growth Camp in Pasadena, a place with a reputation for breaking gang-bangers and drug addicts and turning them into law-abiding teens. A former Marine who likes to be called "Sgt. Mac," McFarland founded the camp two years ago and boasted that his tough-love tactics and military-strict discipline were the perfect formula for reforming gang members, taming runaways and getting through to troublemakers. Ruiz, who is now 18, credits McFarland's intervention for helping him finish school and quit drugs. But authorities say McFarland's scared-straight approach crossed the line and veered into criminal behavior earlier this year when he crossed paths with another Pasadena teen. Investigators allege that in May, McFarland was driving in Pasadena when he spotted a girl walking along the street during school hours. He stopped to question her, then handcuffed her, placed her in his car and told her to direct him to a relative's home. At the relative's home, he demanded money from her father to enroll the 14-year-old in his program. The girl's father mistook McFarland for a truancy officer when he flashed a badge, Pasadena police said. McFarland is facing trial on felony charges of kidnapping, extortion, false imprisonment and child abuse, and unlawful use of a badge, a misdemeanor. Now Pasadena police are investigating possible abuses that allegedly occurred at a rival Pasadena boot camp where McFarland once worked. The Pasadena Star-News recently published videos allegedly filmed in 2009 in which McFarland can be seen yelling at teens, forcing them to gulp down water even as they retch and vomit. In one scene, McFarland and other drill instructors appear to scream at a youngster, inches from his face, as he collapses in tears under the weight of a car tire on his shoulders. The publicity has had a chilling effect on McFarland's Family First boot camp. Parents have pulled their kids out in droves. Where several dozen cadets once attended, only a handful remain. "I'm not going to lie ... we don't have 75 cadets, but we're still continuing," said Elpidio Estolas, one of Family First's directors. McFarland is quick to defend his work in the community, as is Keith Gibbs, the director of the rival boot camp. Both say they offer a last resort for exasperated parents who have nowhere else to turn. In interviews with McFarland, his cadets, their families and those who have worked with him, a complex portrait emerges. Critics describe him as a fast talker, easily seducing working-class Latino families with his authority-laden persona. Supporters say McFarland is a man filled with good intentions, who has overcome his flaws such as convictions for DUI and a misdemeanor assault. McFarland says his criminal history allows him to dissuade cadets from a life of incarceration. He talks openly about the months he was homeless and his continuing struggle with alcoholism. These attributes, he says, make him a relatable figure. McFarland is set to stand trial Wednesday, though the case has been delayed several times — once after his boot camp could no longer afford to pay his attorney, a former Pasadena mayor. He is now represented by a public defender. But McFarland continues to operate his program throughout Pasadena, in local parks and occasionally a small strip-mall church. In fact, it didn't take long for the boot camp to resume after McFarland got out of jail. In mid-June, from the stage of Faithworks Ministries church, McFarland — freshly released on bail — thanked his cadets and their families, quoting the Bible as he spoke. For days, they had rallied on his behalf outside a Pasadena courthouse, hoping a judge would reduce his bail. McFarland, a deeply religious man raised by an aunt in rural Georgia, looked on quietly. Dressed in his signature military fatigues, he occasionally barked commands as the cadets stood in formation. "I don't know of a boot camp that praises the Lord as much as we do," said McFarland, who granted The Times access to his boot camp last summer but has since refused to speak with the paper. After the morning drills, the group moved inside the church. The teens marched single file into a side room for a self-esteem workshop. Their families, meanwhile, sat in the pews, listening to a nutritionist. Involving parents in the program is a key component of success, McFarland says. "The program has benefited the children tremendously," said Mirza Balvaneda, who enrolled her son when he was only 8. "The other parents said I was brave to bring him in because he's so young, but he needed to learn some discipline." In addition to the instilling of discipline, parents — most of whom don't speak English — said they hope their children will take more initiative in their studies. When news of McFarland's arrest broke, some thought Gibbs, who operates Sarge's Community Base, was the one who had been arrested. The men have similar authoritative demeanors and dress — usually camouflage pants with dark polo shirts. They even have similar nicknames. McFarland is "Sgt. Mac," Gibbs is simply "Sarge." "People were calling me because they thought I was the one who had been arrested," Gibbs said. Gibbs said that he hired McFarland in early 2009 and that his new employee became his right-hand man. But now the two compete for recruits and offer differing views of how their relationship fell apart. Gibbs said he fired McFarland when he discovered his criminal history and heard complaints from staff that he was using excessive force when disciplining cadets. McFarland said he only followed Gibbs' orders. Gibbs has also faced allegations of child abuse. In a 2010 letter from Edwin Diaz, superintendent of the Pasadena Unified School District, Gibbs was told his permit to use school district facilities for his camp had been revoked. School officials had received reports from parents that Gibbs' boot camp tactics amounted to corporal punishment. Another parent charged that he had engaged in "an inappropriate sexual relationship" with a minor. Pasadena police investigated but never filed charges because the teen recanted her claims, Diaz wrote. Gibbs calls the allegations lies spread by disgruntled cadets who wanted out of his program. As his court date approaches, McFarland has kept a low profile, quietly running his boot camp and dismissing his critics, who he said are trying to destroy his business with baseless accusations. He says that at the end of the day, "it's all about the kids." ricardo.lopez2@latimes.com Copyright © 2011, Los Angeles Times Source: <http://www.latimes.com/news/local/la-me-sarge-20111113.0.4902275.story> For more on this story, visit: http://www.whittierdailynews.com/news/ci_19353747

Home for troubled boys is troubled By JACK BRUBAKER Staff Writer Prescott House, the last group home for juvenile offenders of its kind in Lancaster County, closed in July following negative state inspections. Its future is uncertain. The group home's owner, Sylvester "Casey" Jones, closed the facility voluntarily, but if he reopens it, the state would closely monitor its operations. For more than four decades, Prescott House has served as many as 12 male delinquents at a time in a substantial brick building at South Shippen and Green streets. The group home's reopening depends largely on whether Lancaster and

Other counties decide to resume sending juveniles to a facility that has suffered operational and financial difficulties for several years. "I'm sad that Prescott House has fallen on some hard times and hope it can be resurrected and be stronger than ever," says David Mueller, director of the county's Office of Juvenile Probation. Prescott House has worked closely with his office to meet the needs of residents over the years and has changed young people's lives, Mueller notes. On the other hand, he explains, "We're just not totally secure ... they can stay open for the long haul." Prescott House's teenage residents came from several central Pennsylvania counties. They were sentenced by the courts to stay at the group home for several months to a year for offenses ranging from theft and vandalism to drug use and firearms charges. Juveniles at Prescott House, a former residence, were not "locked down" as they are at the county's Youth Intervention Center, a facility that holds juveniles for a short time until their final disposition is determined. Group home residents attended classes at McCaskey High School and received job training. The primary goal was to develop skills and find jobs. With closure of the group home, local officials have been sending juvenile offenders to a facility outside the county. Factoring in the cost of travel for juveniles and probation officers, that can cost more than the $146.89 a day paid to house teenagers at Prescott House. Over the past five years, the county has paid Prescott House nearly $1 million to house and treat dozens of juveniles. Annual amounts have varied from $323,000 spent in fiscal year 2006-07 to just over half that amount spent in fiscal 2010-11. Mueller says county officials would like to keep payments for institutional juvenile treatment in the county. They also would prefer, for rehabilitative purposes, to keep children close to their families in their own communities. But whether that happens is largely dependent on whether Jones decides to reopen Prescott House. On Oct. 26, the state's Office of Children, Youth and Families issued Prescott House a provisional license to operate through next August. Roseann Perry, director of that office, notes that reopening the group home "would be the same as starting up any program from scratch," including hiring new employees. Mueller says Jones has told him he will be able to hire a full staff. Based on that claim, the county is in the process of establishing a new contract with Prescott House. Jones refuses to discuss his plans with a reporter. A former McCaskey High School administrator and interim member of the city school board, Jones has directed Prescott House since the 1980s. In 2005, Jones and Kenneth Dupree purchased the group home for $135,000 from the Lancaster County Council of Churches, which had opened it in 1970. Dupree later left the operation. Jones runs the group home as a business corporation under the name Jondou Inc. Although it is a for-profit business, Prescott House solicits charitable contributions of food, clothing and other items. Jones, 65, also is a bail bondsman who owes the county nearly $500,000 in forfeited bail. He is repaying that bill at $9,000 a month. The state's provisional license for Prescott House is a "warning to consumers and family members to know there are some issues going on at the facility," according to state Department of Public Welfare spokeswoman Anne Bale. The state has not yet accepted Jones' plan of action, she says, and is waiting to see what happens. The operation would be reassessed six months after it reopens. Annual and unannounced inspections conducted by the Office of Children, Youth and Families have found multiple deficiencies at Prescott House since at least the summer of 2009. (That office is in the Department of Public Welfare.) On July 28, 2009, state inspectors documented deficient staff training and inadequate treatment of clients in 18 categories. They also found holes in walls and a rusted bathroom vent. On June 1, 2010, inspectors again found multiple violations of state regulations, including inadequate staff training, incomplete client records, exposed wiring and a missing outlet cover. "At this point in time they struggle with keeping their residential census up and maintaining full-time employment for the staff," the inspectors noted. "Their attention to details could be improved." On Nov. 5, 2010, a routine inspection found multiple violations of state regulations, all related to tardy completion of health examinations of incoming residents. On April 5, inspectors, responding to a complaint, made an unannounced visit and found dirt and trash on residents' floors and water damage to several ceilings. Inspectors also found exposed wiring, a urine-stained toilet seat and a dirty, rusted exhaust fan. "While there was food in the facility, it did not appear to be enough for six clients," the report noted. "The staff on duty did not have a key to the freezer to access food." On June 30, inspectors conducting the annual licensing review found 20 violations of state regulations regarding employees and residents, as well as a missing basement heater cover. Jones then closed the building and dismissed the last three members of the professional staff. When the group home sheltered 12 residents, it employed seven full-time professionals and several other workers, including a cook, according to a former employee who does not wish to be named. But in March, when several employees sent an unsigned letter protesting conditions at the group home to the state Office of Children, Youth and Families and the Lancaster County Children and Youth Agency, only five full-time professionals were still working at Prescott House, the former employee says. The employees complained that they always were paid late. They said residents were not receiving well-balanced meals or sufficient food, and that the food was prepared by a cook under "unsanitary conditions." Further, they said the program increasingly was producing "negative outcomes" for residents. The employees said the group home's program had been successful in previous years, but more recently, under Jones' ownership, was "doomed for failure." Perry, the state official, says the number of state citations that Jones has received is high but not unique. "Certainly we have seen documentation of training missing or unacceptable conditions within the actual physical site in other places," she says. But she adds that there also are group homes "where there are no irregular items noted." Gary Horning, chief housing inspector for Lancaster city, says his bureau over the past several years has required Prescott House to upgrade electrical receptacles and clean up excessive amounts of trash. But the number of complaints for that type of facility, he adds, are "less than average. It's probably better than a fraternity house." While both the city and state assess the physical plant, and the state monitors employee and resident records, neither considers the solvency of the business. As the number of residents at the home has declined, so have revenues. "The need for out-of-home placement in Pennsylvania has decreased over the past few years," Perry says. "That certainly is a contributing factor." It's a challenge to operate any business these days, she notes. Operating a business with fewer "customers" is an additional burden. Lancaster County Children and Youth has not sent any clients to Prescott House for at least five years, according to James Laughman, the county's human service director. The county's Office of Juvenile Probation, the primary county agency that has referred clients to Prescott House, had three teenagers there until last spring. They completed their correction programs before the facility closed, according to Mueller. Juvenile Probation stopped sending new teens to Prescott House "when we started receiving complaints that staff members had made to the Office of Children, Youth and Families," Mueller explains. But concerns about the group home have been long-standing, he adds. "We haven't this past 10 years been completely enamored of the program," he says. "But every time we met with Prescott House we got a positive response, and changes were made." While he hopes the group home can reopen and Lancaster can send clients there, Mueller observes, "it's expensive to run a program like this. Unless you have a certain number of kids in it, you won't break even." Lancaster was sending two or three boys at a time, so Prescott House had to depend on surrounding counties to help fill other beds. The former Prescott House employee says that only Lancaster and Chester counties were sending children in the months before the facility closed. He says York, Berks and Dauphin counties had stopped using the program. jbrubaker@lnpnews.com Source: http://lancasteronline.com/article/local/496657_Home-for-troubled-boys-is-troubled.html#ixzz1djkzloZO

Uta Halee blames closure on state By Robyn Wisch, KVNO News November 15th, 2011 Omaha, NE – After 60 years serving troubled teens in Omaha, the Uta Halee Girls Village announced it will be forced to close its doors next month. Listen Now Nestled in the hills of north Omaha, the Uta Halee Girls Village has provided a serene setting for troubled young kids since 1950. The center provides counseling and residential psychiatric treatment for girls with severe emotional and behavioral problems. Uta Halee Girls Village has served troubled teens in the area since 1950. The center also closed nearby Cooper Village last year, which it managed for the Omaha Home for Boys. Leslie Byers brought her daughter to the facility several years ago because she said she had no other option. "When your child is cutting herself, when she's throwing dishes all over the place, simply because you said to go to bed, when you're afraid for your safety, and your other kids' safety," she said. Byers said when her daughter was in psychiatric crisis, the only option was to call 911, because the family had run out of lifetime in-patient insurance benefits. "... have them manhandle her, handcuff her, take her to the emergency room, give her a tranquilizer, and a couple of hours later, bring her home, all in the name of treatment. That's not treatment." The center blamed the closing, which is slated for Dec. 16, squarely on the state of Nebraska, saying the Department of Health and Human Services stopped referring kids for treatment at the facility in an effort to save money. Gary Kaplan, immediate past board chair, said DHHS has narrowly interpreted Medicaid rules that deny the center's intensive level of treatment. "If the Governor and his team weren't so effective at denying help to kids with traumas and mental illness and abuse, we would be staying open," he said. "But instead they've chosen to leave hundreds of our young people with serious needs in shelters and juvenile detention centers, inappropriate foster homes and out on the street." Gov. Dave Heineman was asked about the closing at a press conference Tuesday, and said he's not ready to comment because he doesn't have the details. Kaplan said in the past, the center has stayed open, with the help of private funds, when state support dwindled. But the facility, which has 60 beds in total, is currently serving just 14 girls in its residential program. Uta Halee also runs several community-based programs serving girls and boys that will also close. But Kaplan said the all-girl program will be the greatest loss. "A place where a girl who had been repeatedly forced to have sex with her coach, or her mom's boyfriend, or her cousin, who is reacting to that with clinical depression, with taking drugs, with acting out, with joining gangs, could come here to an all-girl environment," Kaplan said. "A place of healing with only girls around." Board members said the center is working with its current residents to find alternative treatment. Ninety employees at the center will also be laid off. The closing comes amid state reforms to the child welfare system that have led to three providers canceling their contracts with the state, and an audit that cited DHHS for mishandling state contracts. A spokeswoman for the Department, Kathie Osterman, said the changes in Medicaid rules were not about saving money, but about coming into compliance with federal regulations. She added providers were told several months ago the changes were coming. But for parents like Leslie Byers, no matter the details, the closing simply means fewer choices for parents in crisis. Her voice cracking, Byers said, "I wanted my daughter to be safe, I wanted her to have a chance to graduate. I didn't want her to have to be here, but I wanted all those things bad enough." "So don't take that option away because I don't know where she would be. I don't know where our family would be. Source: <http://www.kvnonews.com/2011/11/uta-halee-treatment-center-to-close/#comment-5888> (Webmaster Note: Uta Halee is one of the programs specifically referenced in "The Franklin Cover-Up" and is also referenced on our site at www.heal-online.org/aacrc.htm.)

David Protes, President, Chicago Innocence Project When Juveniles Confess to Murders They Didn't Commit Posted: 11/18/11 11:15 AM ET It was Chicago's feel-good story of the week. A Cook County judge on Wednesday overturned the convictions of four men who, as teenagers in 1995, falsely confessed to the rape and murder of a 30-year-old woman. The men were cleared by DNA evidence that linked a career criminal to the crime. Vincent Thames and Terrill Swift were beaming as they exited the revolving doors of the criminal courts building at 26th and Cal. The other two, Harold Richardson and Michael Saunders, will soon be free on bond. Now the Englewood Four, as they have been dubbed, await a decision by prosecutors whether to re-try them. Meanwhile, troubling questions linger. How did the four confess to crimes they did not commit? Why did it take so long to conduct DNA testing? And, underlying it all, why has Cook County State's Attorney Anita Alvarez persistently fought justice for the four?  On November 7, 1994, a sanitation worker found the badly beaten body of an African American woman in a dumpster behind a liquor store in the Englewood neighborhood on Chicago's South Side. The woman was identified as Nina Glover, a prostitute. Police interviewed a resident of the neighborhood, Johnny Douglas, at the scene. But they let him go when he denied knowing Glover. Four months later, acting on a tip, police picked up four African American teenagers for questioning. According to Det. James Cassidy, the teenagers voluntarily confessed, saying they took turns raping Glover before murdering her. Primitive DNA tests excluded the teenagers as the source of semen recovered from Glover, and all four claimed their confessions had been coerced. But they were convicted based on detailed signed statements about their involvement, and dispatched to prison for terms ranging from 30 to 40 years. In 2010, two of the prisoners requested advanced "STR" DNA testing along with a database search of the genetic profiles of criminals. Cook County prosecutors opposed the tests, contending that the trial court judgments were final. But a judge ordered them, and the stunning results were revealed last May. Not only were the four teenagers ruled out, but the DNA matched a person that cops had interviewed at the crime scene -- Johnny Douglas. A man with a history of preying on prostitutes, Douglas' rap sheet was impressive: 38 convictions, including for murder and sexual assault. He was shot to death in 2008. Exoneration was at hand for the Englewood Four -- or so it seemed.  As family members of the prisoners readied to welcome them home, State's Attorney Anita Alvarez set in motion a distinctly different course. She announced that she would vigorously fight their release. Alvarez's novel theory of the crime: Douglas had unprotected sex with Glover, left her unharmed, and she was later raped and murdered by the four teenagers. "He [Douglas] didn't kill every other prostitute he was with," Alvarez told the New York Times. "DNA evidence in and of itself is not always the 'silver bullet' that it is sometimes perceived to be," she declared. The county's chief law enforcement officer believed Det. Cassidy's version of the confessions. Otherwise, how could the teenagers have provided so many details about the crime? Turns out Det. Cassidy has a rap sheet of his own. In 1994, the year before the Englewood Four case, the detective took a detailed confession from an 11-year-old African American male who purportedly murdered an elderly Caucasian woman on Chicago's Southwest Side. A federal judge concluded the confession had been coerced, tossed out the conviction, and ordered the child's record expunged. In 1998, Cassidy was back, this time with another high-profile confession. Two African-American males -- ages seven and eight -- admitted killing 11-year-old Ryan Harris and dumping her body in a backyard, Cassidy claimed. The elaborate confessions created a national furor over pre-adolescent crime -- until the authorities found semen in Harris' panties. They sheepishly dropped the charges and eventually secured a confession from an adult male (though his actual guilt has been disputed.) Cassidy reportedly is no longer active on the force, having been reassigned to the Medical Examiner's office. (One wonders if his new job description includes obtaining confessions from the recently departed.) Point is, false confessions happen all the time. Out of the 76 wrongful convictions in Cook County since the advent of DNA testing, 25 were based on suspects admitting to crimes they did not commit, according to the Center on Wrongful Convictions at Northwestern University. False confessions are particularly common in cases involving juveniles. Just two weeks ago, the convictions of five suburban Chicago youths were upended in a case involving the 1991 rape and murder of a 14-year-old girl. They, too, had confessed to the crime and were exonerated by DNA. And, in the infamous Central Park jogger case in 1989, four of the five teenagers who confessed to the rape were later exonerated when DNA evidence confirmed another man's involvement. What is distinctive about the Englewood Four case, and deeply troubling, is that State's Attorney Alvarez will not acknowledge the mistake. She is an exception. In a study of 194 DNA exonerations, prosecutors refused to join defense lawyers in dismissing convictions in only four percent of cases where DNA evidence implicated an alternative suspect. Why is Alvarez a four-percenter? As a career prosecutor, perhaps she is blindly loyal to her troops, realizing that the blame for false confessions (unlike mistaken eyewitness testimony) falls entirely on law enforcement. Perhaps she is concerned about the large civil rights judgments that will inevitably follow if she throws Cassidy and his fellow cops under the bus. But even if we take Alvarez at her word on this subject -- "As a prosecutor, I have a duty to the victims in this case" -- then what is her duty to the Englewood Four? Haven't they been victimized for seventeen years? Re-trying these young men, an option Alvarez is considering, would compound the injustice and waste taxpayer's dollars. The system made a tragic mistake. It's time for Alvarez to confess it. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/david-protes/false-confessions-juveniles_b_1100665.html

Police investigating possible sexual assaults at teen group home Posted: Nov 23, 2011 12:26 PM PST Updated: Nov 23, 2011 7:17 PM PST David Dos Santos CLEVELAND, OH (WOIO) - 19 Action News has learned of an investigation into a series of suspected sex assaults by a youth worker at a group home for troubled teens. Cleveland Sex Crimes investigators have begun filing charges against youth worker David Dos Santos. The attacks reportedly happened at WestHaven. The group home run by Lutheran Metropolitan Ministry serves girls and boys, with troubled childhoods, who are leaving foster care or other agencies -- getting ready for life on their own. The home learned of the problem last week and called county child welfare workers. Soon after Dos Santos was fired. Dos Santos is suspected of abusing two teen girls, maybe more. Source: <http://www.woio.com/story/16112615/police-investigating-possible-sexual-assaults-at-a-home-for-troubled-teens>

Mentors reach out to troubled kids through poetry of the streets kminugh@sacbee.com Published Tuesday, Nov. 29, 2011 For one hour a week over five weeks, Louis Savala sized up the two young men visiting his English classroom, "spitting" spoken-word poetry and offering life lessons. He didn't participate; he didn't share despite their encouragement. And then, on Christopher Coon and Lorenzo McNeal Jr.'s sixth visit, 17-year-old Savala found his voice. He opened up about trouble brewing with another teen. He vented about being unfairly profiled as a Norteño or a Blood because of his looks. For the first time in a long time, Savala felt he'd be heard. "Getting the chance to talk and have people listen makes me feel I can say what I need to say," the Del Paso Heights teen said. Savala is among dozens of Sacramento-area youths who have found the power of personal expression with the help of 22-year-old Coon -- who proudly goes by his last name despite the word's racial connotations -- and 23-year-old McNeal, who is known as TroubleSin. Close friends for eight years, the pair began working with teens as "poet mentors" for the Sacramento Area Youth Speaks program. Now branching out, they conduct youth workshops rooted in the art of spoken-word poetry. Educators say the young African American men from tough backgrounds can reach students in a way many teachers cannot, empowering the students, making poetry cool and mixing in advice for life. Dan Chambliss, an English teacher at Highlands High School, said he has seen many students thrive since meeting Coon and TroubleSin. "There's an underlying association," he said. And that's important, he stressed, for any teacher trying to keep students interested in learning. "(Students) feel there's a place for them at school." Coon and TroubleSin, who call themselves the E-Legal Tag Team, forged a bond when their lives were in an uproar. Poetry, they say, helped save them. Coon was 15 and recovering from gunshot wounds in Meadowview. He narrowly escaped paralysis or death. As for TroubleSin, in a word, he described himself at the time as "hostile" over a volatile situation in his south Sacramento County home. He was looking to lash out -- but instead chose to reach out. He called Coon in the hospital: "It's time to get to work" -- writing, rhyming, making words their outlet. They shared what Coon calls "war stories," building off each other's emotions to create art. Then, as now, it was their therapy. Their work covers everything from love to abandonment to issues of race. In "Family Tree," Coon and TroubleSin touch on the cycle of discord in their families. In "The Hands That Rock the Cradle," they rhyme about their turbulent relationships with their parents. Students of English teacher Erin Klentos at Vista Nueva Career & Technical High School researched the 1865 poem by William Ross Wallace of nearly the same title, looking for other cultural references to the poem and its themes. They found it in everything from hip-hop to blues music. "I think they started to see the relevance of learning history and literature and being able to say, 'That still applies to me now,'" Kmentos said. Despite limited training, Coon and TroubleSin transition effortlessly from high school seniors to seventh-graders, gently teasing out participation and encourage critical thinking. They choose language students understand. "They say things like 'Who's a rule breaker?'" said Mark Taylor, who teaches seventh-grade English at Smythe Academy. "They're just trying to get the kids to think outside of the box, but they use terms like that to really access those kids who have a history of having behavior problems or academic problems." Coon and TroubleSin say they want teens to feel safe to speak their minds, no matter how raw the material. And it does get raw. "That's why we don't sugarcoat it: They're not sugarcoating it out there," Coon said, referring to the streets. The Tag Team has contracts with the Twin Rivers Unified School District and the Boys & Girls Clubs. Having worked with Sacramento City Unified, too, they dream of opening a center where youths can work on their art. Recently at Highlands High, TroubleSin led a discussion about the phrase "Association breeds similarity." Coon spoke of a close family friend who was a good kid and star athlete but fell in with the wrong crowd. "He's now laying in the grave because of this group. Real talk – this is serious. Please be mindful of the company you keep." Throughout their sessions with students, Coon and TroubleSin stress values such as respect and patience that apply in and out of the classroom, TroubleSin said. He tells youths that patience is what kept him alive and out of prison. "I could've acted out ... but instead I remained patient, and it's because I was patient I'm here with you today." Kmentos has seen her tough fourth-period class – her "killer bees" – practicing Coon's and TroubleSin's code since the pair started visiting. She believes their authority comes in the example they provide. They have "had a lot of bad things happen to (them), too, and they're OK. They're really grounded," she said. "You can travel through this war zone ... and you can come out OK, but you have to be on your game." Laronda Johnson, a 16-year-old student in Kmentos' class, described them as "hecka cool." "They're strong black men who do something different with their lives instead of being like other black men in this world ... (who live) that gangster life," she said. "The stuff they've been through is the stuff we've all been through," said Savala, who described his neighborhood, Del Paso Heights, as "crazy as hell." But he said Coon and TroubleSin have helped him see that he can rise above that, that "all this hustling on the street – it's nothing." On that sixth visit – Coon and TroubleSin's last to Vista Nueva – Savala embraced them. And then that night, he sent them a piece of his poetry for review. He's never felt he's had people to talk to, Savala said, except for the aging "OGs" – "original gangsters" – on the street. Finally, he found that at school. "I know there (are) people out there that care and ... who will listen," he said. © Copyright The Sacramento Bee. All rights reserved. Source: <http://www.sacbee.com/2011/11/29/4085607/mentors-reach-out-to-troubled.html#> (Webmaster Note: After School and Mentoring within the Community is a wonderful thing that we'd like to see more of in our cities and around the country.)

Assemblyman Anthony Portantino Calls for Youth Boot Camp Reforms--Whittier Daily News For complete story, click here or visit http://www.whittierdailynews.com/news/ci_19445152

Posted on Friday, 12.02.11 Feds condemn conditions at Florida youth prisons Federal civil rights investigators said two Florida youth prisons were harsh and dangerous — and likely are indicative of conditions statewide. BY CAROL MARBIN MILLER CMARBIN@MIAMIHERALD.COM Florida's youth-corrections system is so poorly administered that children are assaulted by officers, denied necessary medical care and punished harshly for minor infractions, a federal report released Friday concludes. Conditions are so severe, the U.S. Department of Justice said, that they violate the Constitution. The Justice Department's Civil Rights Division released a scathing 28-page report Friday on conditions at two North Florida youth prisons, the Dozier School for Boys and the Jackson Juvenile Offender Center. Though the two camps were both shut down by state juvenile-justice administrators earlier this year, the report said the state's "failed system of oversight and accountability" likely has resulted in dangerous conditions at youth prisons throughout the state. "These conditions return youth to the community no better — and likely less-equipped to succeed than when they were first incarcerated," Assistant Attorney General Thomas E. Perez wrote in a Dec. 1 letter to Gov. Rick Scott, adding that such practices "erode public confidence in the juvenile justice system and interfere with the state's efforts to reduce crime." Though the report is strongly worded, neither Perez nor the report itself suggested that the Justice Department intended to take further action. The investigation, which began in April 2010, concerned two large youth camps in the Panhandle — Dozier, a 159-acre campus that had been open for 110 years, and the nearby Jackson Juvenile Offender Center, or JJOC, which later combined with Dozier to form the North Florida Youth Development Center. Dozier had been the subject of intense scrutiny since October 2008, when The Miami Herald reported on The White House Boys, a group of now-older adult men who said they had been beaten and raped at the facility during their youth. And though investigators confined their research to the two Panhandle youth prisons, they concluded that the conditions they found likely permeate the state's youth-corrections system as a whole. "Florida's oversight system failed to detect and sufficiently address the problems we found at Dozier and JJOC," the report said. "We find that many of the problems we identified ... are the result of a systemic lack of training, supervision and oversight." The Florida Department of Juvenile Justice's spokesman, C.J. Drake, said Friday that the U.S. department's findings do not apply to other residential programs throughout the state. Last August, DJJ Secretary Wansley Walters said that the use of physical force on youths had dropped by 41.6 percent during the past two years as the state adopted a set of "best practices" in behavior management. In the past year alone, Walters said, more than half of the DJJ's residential programs either reduced or eliminated the use of physical force. "The issues and concerns raised in the investigative report on allegations of past staff misconduct at the closed [North Florida youth camp] are, in fact, confined to the closed facility and are not duplicated elsewhere in the DJJ system," Drake said Friday. "We have taken and will continue to take swift and appropriate action to address any conduct that violates laws, policies, or the safety and dignity of the youth in our care," he added. Since 2008, in fact, the DJJ has either closed or substantially reduced 23 residential programs across the state that performed poorly. Roy Miller, a children's advocate who heads the Florida Children's Campaign and has been a long-time critic of the state's youth-corrections program, said Friday he remains unconvinced that the state has implemented meaningful reform. "I have no confidence that this is not a systemic problem," Miller said. "Every time horrifying abuse has occurred, we get the same story from DJJ, that it is not systemic." Among the problems the U.S. Justice Department found: • Juveniles sent to the youth camps were subjected to unnecessary — and often excessive — physical force, including violent takedowns, choking and restraints that can lead to asphyxiation. In the spring of 2006, the Florida Legislature banned a host of so-called compliance techniques and takedowns in the wake of a national scandal, the death of 14-year-old Martin Lee Anderson, who died after guards at a Panama City boot camp punched, kneed and choked off his air supply during a long, violent restraint. The Martin Lee Anderson Act banned the use of stun guns, pepper spray, pressure points, mechanical restraints and psychological intimidation unless a child is a threat to himself or others. The Justice Department, however, said guards in North Florida used "dangerous" face-down restraint techniques, choked youths and used handcuffs on children who were not resisting. A September 2010 incident that was captured on video showed a guard who "appeared to strike and choke" a youth who "was not engaged in violent or disruptive behavior." The guard had "slammed" the boy into furniture and then the ground, shook the boy's arm, and then tried to force the youth's arm behind his back, though the youth appeared only to "be trying to avoid further confrontation," the report said. • Staff members at the camps also used isolation and confinement as punishment, the report said, though most experts discourage the use of isolation for all but emergency situations. And isolation was used, the report said, for "minor infractions." At Dozier, youths were placed in either a "controlled observation" area — the written procedure was to confine the youth for only a two-hour "cool-down" period — or in a longer-term Behavior Management Unit for up to 21 days. The report describes the two units as "particularly harsh environments," where youths were held in 9.8-by-5.5-foot cells with locked doors, bars and only a concrete slab for a bed. Administrators would place a "thin mattress" on the slab at bedtime. • Guards exercised "deliberate indifference" to the needs of children in their care, including youths who were at risk of killing themselves. "Suicidal youths were sent to isolation, although the facility rules prohibit confinement of such youths," the report said, adding: "This practice is very dangerous." • Youths may have been discouraged from seeking medical care, because they had to request a sick call from the same employees who may have abused them. And youths who were in the behavior management unit "did not receive adequate medical care, assessment of their mental health ... or assistance in determining whether they should be discharged from confinement." Last July, 18-year-old Eric Perez died at the Palm Beach County detention center after several guards and administrators ignored his pleas for medical attention. Perez's death remains under investigation by both the DJJ and a West Palm Beach grand jury. Source: <http://www.miamiherald.com/2011/12/02/v-fullstory/2529226/feds-condemn-conditions-at-now.html#ixzz1fSip5XLI> For more on this story and the Department of Justice's Investigation Report, visit: http://www.tampabay.com/specials/2011/PDFs/Dozier_JusticeDepartment120311.pdf

Doctors Put Foster Children at Risk With Mind-Altering Drugs By BRINDA ADHIKARI, JOAN MARTELLI and SARAH KOCH Dec. 1, 2011 — go.com Across America, doctors are putting foster children on powerful, mind-altering drugs at rates up to 13 times that of children in the general population. What's more, doctors are prescribing foster children drugs at doses beyond what the Food and Drug Administration has approved, sometimes in potentially dangerous combinations, according to a new report by the federal Government Accountability Office. "It's just almost beyond comprehension," said Sen. Thomas Carper, D-Del., who asked for the GAO investigation. "We want the doctors and nurses that are prescribing these medicines to look at their behavior and think and ask this question. Are we doing something wrong here?" In Florida, regulators have been grappling with that question since a 7-year-old boy, Gabriel Myers, killed himself in 2009 after being prescribed a powerful mix of psychotropic medication. His psychiatrist, Dr. Sohail Punjwani, had, at different times, prescribed two drugs that carry black box labels -- warning of the need to carefully monitor patients because of the increased risk of suicidal thoughts and behavior in children, which call for careful monitoring. However, even though Gabriel visited Punjwani's office seven times, his foster father said Gabriel usually only spent about five minutes talking to the doctor. Gabriel's death was ruled an accident, but investigators pointed to the possibility that the medication may have contributed to his death. The tragedy triggered a storm of outrage across the state. "I don't accept that the only way to reach a child who is 7 years old is through psychotropic drugs," said Florida Sen. Ronda Storm, during hearings over Gabriel's death. "I do not accept that." The boy's doctor settled a lawsuit in 2010 accusing him of prescribing a toxic cocktail of psychotropic drugs to a 16-year-old patient, who suffered a sudden heart attack and died. Punjwani settled that case but admitted no wrongdoing. READ: A Resource Guide for Children in Foster Care Additionally, Punjwani was arrested for driving under the influence and cocaine possession. He pleaded not guilty to those charges but went through a court-ordered rehabilitation program. When ABC News caught up with Dr. Punjwani, he told us, "Sad stories happen but that does not mean that everything else the doctor is responsible for it because we are in the business of taking care of these children," he said. Antipsychotic medication, which can cause a litany of health problems such as severe weight gain, an increased risk of diabetes and irreversible movement disorders, is among the top-selling drugs in America. LEARN MORE: Antipsychotics Most Commonly Prescribed to Foster Children Four drug makers have paid a total of more than $2 billion to settle claims they illegally marketed antipsychotics to children. All deny wrongdoing. "How do antipsychotics, drugs supposedly for people who have lost touch with reality, how do they develop such a wide market?" said neuropsychiatrist Dr. Stefan Kruszewski, who won millions of dollars as a key whistleblower against drug companies. There have been very limited long-term studies on antipsychotics in children. And for drugs already on the market, the duration of the studies that were used to get FDA approval for children have been as short as three to six weeks. ABC News interviewed a social worker now working in a state foster care system, who asked not to be identified. "Every child that I saw was basically on some type of psychotropic medication," the social worker told ABC News. "It's much easier to medicate a child than it is to physically restrain them, than it is to pay $200 an hour to a therapist to talk through their problems with them." Dr. Charles Zeanah, a prominent child psychiatrist who is careful to use a minimum of psychotropic medication in children, said that doctors are under pressure from all corners to do something with these troubled children and medication is one of their tools. "The pressures that I'm aware of are pressures that come from families and schools who have kids with troubling behavior," he said. "They want something done. They want something done quickly." Still, he adds, "The general consensus is that when you're treating young children, you always try behavioral intervention before you go to medication." The problem has not gone unnoticed by some state officials. In the state of Washington, doctors and regulators have implemented a new system to oversee psychotropic medication and identify red flag cases that exceed safety limits, by dosage or number of medications, or arise because of the young age of the child. In those red flag cases, a second opinion by a child psychiatrist is needed before medication can be dispensed. And some states including Louisiana, Florida and New York are even going so far as kicking out high-prescribing doctors out of Medicaid. Sen. Carper, who called for the GAO investigation, said he was shocked by the findings. "The idea that these kids are taking one, two, three times the regular dose for a child or for an adult -- it's just the wrong thing to do," he said. "We need to get to the bottom of this and do the best that we can to stop it, not just the Congress, not just the doctors, not just the states. All of us together." ABC News' Mark Abdelmalek contributed to this report. Watch the year-long investigation tonight on "World News with Diane Sawyer" at 6:30 p.m. ET and then see more on "20/20," Friday at 10 p.m. ET.

Source: <http://abcnews.go.com/Health/doctors-put-foster-children-risk-mind-altering-drugs/story?id=15064560> Additional Links/Information On this Topic Below: <http://abcnews.go.com/blogs/headlines/2011/12/boy-12-tells-congress-of-years-on-stupid-meds/> <http://isepp.wordpress.com/2011/12/02/government-report-confirms-2008-allegations-that-foster-children-are-over-medicated/> <http://www.gao.gov/products/GAO-12-270T> <http://abc.go.com/watch/2020/SH559026/VD55156221/2020-122-overmedication-in-foster-care>

Another case of sexual abuse against children within the Assemblies of God Church. Two youth ministers with the Assemblies of God church arrested for sex crimes against children in Polk County. December 14, 2011 POLK COUNTY, Fla. - Two youth pastors have been arrested for sex-related crimes against children, the Polk County Sheriff's Office announced Wednesday. Edward Demoreta, 30, is accused of having sex at least twice with a 14-year-old student at Mulberry Middle School, while he was her teacher there. Ricardo Navarro, 27, was arrested for texting a 14-year-old member of the church youth group with lewd requests. Both suspects were youth pastors at the First Assembly of God. Source: http://www.abcactionnews.com/dpp/news/region_polk/two-youth-ministers-arrested-for-sex-crimes-against-children-in-polk-county (Webmaster Note: Assemblies of God operates and oversees the Teen Challenge programs.)

Counselor accused of sex with teen in her care enters plea Posted: Dec 19, 2011 3:03 PM PST Updated: Dec 20, 2011 10:13 AM PST By Scott Adkins - email@wave3.com Brooke Briscoe (Source: Bullitt County Detention Center) _Sunrise Spring Meadows Residential Facility_ Det. Scott McGaha SHEPHERDSVILLE, KY (WAVE) - A counselor pleaded not guilty to charges of rape and sodomy on Tuesday after deputies say she had sex with a teen in her care. Bullitt County deputies arrested Brooke Briscoe, 27, Monday morning. Briscoe worked at Sunrise Spring Meadows Residential Facility, a group home that helps troubled teens. Investigators said she had sex with the teen at the facility. Deputies launched the investigation after Child Protective Services discovered Briscoe allegedly had sexual contact with a 17-year-old male on November 11. Briscoe is charged with rape in the 3rd degree and sodomy in the 3rd degree. "Sixteen is the legal consensual age in the State of Kentucky. However, even though he's of consent the problem is it's rape in the 3rd degree because someone is in a caretaker role with him. She was a counselor for him," said Det. Scott McGaha, Bullitt County Sheriff's Office. "Unfortunately, it does occur. We see it quite often and she has been charged with that. It's just unfortunate that it happens," McGaha said. Sunrise, a faith based non-profit, is located in Mt. Washington, KY. It's mission is "to care for Kentucky children who've been abused or neglected." Sunrise released a statement. Here's a portion: "We are conducting an internal investigation and are reviewing our policies and procedures to determine if there is anything we need to change to avoid a situation like this in the future." Briscoe was placed on administrative leave once authorities launched an investigation. Sunrise terminated her employment Monday. Copyright 2011 WAVE News. All rights reserved. Source: <http://www.wave3.com/story/16356564/deputies-arrest-counselor-charged-with-rape-and-sodomy>

Posted on Tue, Dec. 27, 2011 6 fired at Fla detention center where teen died The Associated Press Six employees of a South Florida juvenile detention center where a teenager died will be fired. The Florida Department of Juvenile Justice announced Tuesday that the Palm Beach Juvenile Detention Center's superintendent and assistant superintendent were fired. Four detention center officers also will be fired. Officials said a review of the facility's operations and management revealed that the six violated policies and procedures. Police and prosecutors are still investigating the death of 18-year-old Eric Perez in July. The teen died hours after seeking help for a severe headache and vomiting. An autopsy is pending. DJJ Secretary Wansley Walters said the agency could not wait for the outcome of the criminal investigation to discipline the employees because "necessary changes" at the center can't begin until "appropriate personnel changes" are made. Source: <http://www.miamiherald.com/2011/12/27/v-print/2563012/6-fired-at-fla-detention-center.html#storylink=cpy>

Local pastor found guilty of teen's sexual assault 7:26 PM, Feb 9, 2012 SACRAMENTO, CA - An area pastor who befriended a troubled teen and eventually molested her was convicted of eight counts of sexual assault of a minor. Cornelius Taylor and his wife let the teen move in with them when she was 16. According to the Sacramento County District Attorney's Office, Taylor began going to the girl's bedroom and sexually abusing her several times a week, even after she turned 18. Taylor faces up to seven years, eight months in prison when he is sentenced. Source: <http://www.news10.net/news/article/177811/2/Local-pastor-found-guilty-of-teens-sexual-assault?odyssey=tab%7Ctopnews%7Cbc%7Clarge>

Convention Focuses On Institutional Abuse By Jonathan Van Dyke Staff Writer | Posted: Wednesday, February 22, 2012 12:15 am Society's pillars - its institutions - are not immune to its horrors. This is a fact that in some ways helped form Survivors of Institutional Abuse, which is committed to increasing "national awareness about these deceptively practicing, indoctrinating, exploitive, mentally/physically/sexually abusive and spiritually harmful facilities." Not every institution is bad, but many times victims of such abuse have little idea where to go to get help, organizers said. "It was formed based on a need from survivors of institutional abuse," said Jodi Hobbs, founder and president of SIA. The abuse could come from any number of cultural institutions like church, school, juvenile hall, foster care or residential treatment. "I am actually a survivor myself, and in my research to try and find help for myself, there just wasn't much help out there," Hobbs said. SIA will host its first major event this weekend at the Queen Mary, which is free to the public but requires preregistration.

The theme of the event is United With One Voice. Together We Are Strong. Hobbs said her search for help and answers allowed her to encounter others who had been effected by institutional abuse. She found several other social networking groups that had the same goals as she did - eventually she formed SIA to try and bring all the disparate groups and resources together under one umbrella. "We kind of went on this journey alone," she said. "But we discovered it was better to do this together. The weekend's event will bring panels, movies and speakers onto the Queen Mary in order to discuss the many different topics that touch upon institutional abuse. "This is the first one of its kind ever - it's kind of a history-making event," Hobbs said. "We're looking to help through actions like mentorship and we want to help through the journey of healing." Generally, the people who come to SIA for help have been adults who still are dealing with the issues that an institution put them through as a child, Hobbs said. "They're the children who lived through it and now they're adults trying to find their way, and we want to help them do that," she added. The weekend event will include movie screenings, several speaker panels, a dedication ceremony and the SIA People's Choice Awards. Hobbs said the choice of using the Queen Mary was an obvious one for her. "Water is very healing and calming," she said. "We wanted this to be by the beach. The Queen Mary kind of provides that perfect atmosphere." SIA is a nonprofit group and Hobbs said it tries to cater its counseling and help to people based on individual needs of each personal story. The convention website www.sia-convention.org has a complete agenda and people can preregister there. The website www.sia-now.org has more information on the organization itself. WHAT: Survivors of Institutional Abuse Convention WHEN: Friday-Sunday, Feb. 24-26 (varying times) WHERE: Queen Mary COST: Free (require preregister) Source: http://www.gazettes.com/to_do/convention-focuses-on-institutional-abuse/article_01447924-5ce7-11e1-b793-0019bb2963f4.html

Tue Feb 21, 2012 at 08:32 AM PST The Abusive Side of a Tennessee Christian Group Home by lisakerr Two young women I recently spoke with in intimate and heart-breaking interviews learned the hard way that celebrity Christian endorsements and pretty pink websites can't cover up the dark, abusive side of Mercy Ministries. Over the past few weeks, they've shared stories with me of Mercy staff's use of coercive control and domination to attempt to "treat" them of their medical and psychological disorders and how Mercy required mandatory HIV and STD testing, as well as detailed confessions from the girls about their sexual past relations (specifically about any lesbian or bisexual experiences) upon intake. (Article originally published on RH Reality Check) Two young women I recently spoke with in intimate and heart-breaking interviews learned the hard way that celebrity Christian endorsements and pretty pink websites can't cover up the dark, abusive side of Mercy Ministries. Over the past few weeks, they've shared stories with me of Mercy staff's use of coercive control and domination to attempt to "treat" them of their medical and psychological disorders and how Mercy required mandatory HIV and STD testing, as well as detailed confessions from the girls about their sexual past relations (specifically about any lesbian or bisexual experiences) upon intake. Mercy Ministries is a Nashville, Tennessee based group which was accused of misrepresenting their counseling and recovery services to young women in Australia in 2008. The misrepresentation in Australia was two-fold. First, they claimed their services were free but had the girls sign over their government checks. Second, the ministry claimed to be using licensed therapists and professional counseling methods. In 2009, Mercy admitted their guilt in misrepresentation on both counts and paid back $120,000 of government aid it had wrongly taken from the girls who attended—in Australia. Although the media attention reached the United States, the founding group (based in Nashville, TN) was never investigated further. Instead Nancy Alcorn, the founder of Mercy Ministries took the investigation as a sign from God that the group was under "spiritual attack" and took fundraising efforts into high-gear. In 2009, founder Nancy Alcorn's blog stated: Since [the scandal], we have reorganized the governing structure of Mercy Ministries to bring new levels of oversight and accountability, have increased our funding efforts, and are in the process of opening two new homes—one in California, one in North Carolina—over the next two years. (Emphasis my own) The most interesting part of the statement is a complete disregard for the admittance of guilt for misrepresenting their services. Instead, Mercy put extra effort in "increasing funding efforts." Could this be because the scandal brought a large loss of donation support? Plenty of evidence can be found online about sponsors who cut off financial support and stopped their endorsements of the ministry program after the scandal occurred. Hillsong Church in Australia is one such group. In 2009, they issued a statement about their involvement with Mercy Ministries claiming that they cut all ties with the group. ...[W]e sever any affiliation with Mercy Ministries internationally, and would not be associated with any attempt by Mercy Ministries Inc or Mercy Ministries Ltd, to recommence within Australia, under that or any other name... We would encourage those, that any investigation involves, to cooperate fully. Religious groups like Mercy are hard to pin down when it comes to accountability—legally and otherwise. Abuses in large-scale ministries can range from financial irresponsibility, misallocation of funds, exorbitant salaries for founders, violation of employment laws to medical malpractice. Abuses like these often get overlooked until a whistleblower within the group speaks up. "These groups often operate under the radar of government oversight," Marci A. Hamilton, shared with me when I spoke with her last week about possible government oversight of a group like Mercy Ministries. Professor Hamilton, author of God vs. the Gavel, is one of the United States' leading church/state scholars, specializing in issues involving religious entities that harm others. Hamilton is also an advisor for victims in many clergy abuse cases, including cases involving child abuse. Upon further investigation, I found Marci's statement rang true. When I inquired about Mercy Ministries licensing with the state, Grant Lawrence Director of Communications for the Department of Mental Health, confirmed my suspicions that Mercy Ministries is not licensed by the Department, which gives group and residential homes guidelines and best practices. (They are licensed as a child-placing agency by the Department of Child Services which only governs children under age thirteen.) The Department of Mental Health also oversees the young adults within these facilities, providing each young woman with a social worker and licensed medical care. If Mercy isn't licensed by the Department of Mental Health, how can they claim to be providing proper medical treatment and licensed therapy to young women who are rape and sex trafficking victims, suffer from depression and are suicidal? They can't. According to Mercy's own website, qualifications to work at the program include a bachelor's degree and maturity in their relationship with God. Although the site claims that their counselors have either a master's degree in counseling or psychology (or be working toward such a degree) and meet state licensing requirements, there are two issues with this. One, statements from Mercy graduates counter this statement. Many residents claim that their counselor was not certified, trained or experienced to deal with the issues they faced such as depression, anxiety, eating disorders, and suicidal thoughts. Two, Mercy is not licensed with the Department of Mental Health nor are they a licensed medical treatment facility. They are governed by their own Board of Trustees which doesn't include medical or counseling personnel. Three, even if their staff is licensed, as they claim, the real issue is the curriculum they teach and what they consider "best practices" as opposed to what secular therapists use as standard practice. In upcoming articles on Mercy Ministries, I'll continue to examine the stories of two young women whose lives were negatively impacted on the group, the curriculum and therapy "methods" that were used to treat them and what experts in the field have to say about groups like Mercy. According to graduates, Mercy Ministries has a dark side that even the bright pink logo can't hide. Originally posted to lisakerr on Tue Feb 21, 2012 at 08:32 AM PST. Source: <http://www.dailykos.com/story/2012/02/21/1066794/-The-Abusive-Side-of-a-Tennessee-Christian-Group-Home>

Teen Mania: Endurance Bootcamp Or Religious Cult? FOX 11 News Investigative video report Updated: Thursday, 23 Feb 2012, 9:49 AM PST Published : Thursday, 23 Feb 2012, 7:41 AM PST Reporter: Gina Silva Posted by myFOX11 Editor/Producer: Jeffrey Thomas DeSocio DALLAS - It's an intense military style Christian retreat that promises to transform lives and inspire a greater love for God...and for thousands - it did just that. But Gina Silva reports some teens say they were traumatized, and accuse "Teen Mania" of being a cult. Check out the FOX 11 News Investigative video report Teens marching day and night...Crawling through mud and pushing their bodies to the limit. All in the name of Jesus... We have video of a program called "E.S.O.A.L." -- it stands for Emotionally Stretching Opportunity Of A Lifetime. This bootcamp-style Christian retreat...offered by the "teen mania" ministries. Teens here are called interns. They're given a number and assigned to a group with a captain as their leader. This camp is located two hours east of Dallas, Texas. The E.S.O.A.L. retreat is just one part of a full-year of Christian leadership training. Thousands have gone through it. Many say this is a life-changing experience...A spiritual awakening... Young people are growing with their relationship with Christ they're growing with their relationship with each other attaining spiritual maturity, building strong friendships. But others call teen mania the worst thing they've even been through... Source: <http://www.myfox11.com/dpp/news/investigative/teen-mania-endurance-bootcamp-or-religious-cult-2012-02-23>

Long term effects on survivors/victims of abuse By Janet Parker \(about the author\) opednews.com Torture is the calculated physical and psychological assault on the individual, a practice used to instill fear, punish or degrade, to dehumanize, or to obliterate the self. It is often said that anyone who has been tortured remains tortured, long after the physical wounds have healed. Torture is the deliberate infliction of severe pain by one human being against another. It leaves particular kinds of mental and psychological scars. This trauma is different from other traumas because torture is a violation committed in secret and in spite of official denial. Many believe that torture only occurs in the most repressive regimes. In reality, torture is widespread in all parts of the world. Although it is often perpetrated by police or security forces, it can also be carried out by armed forces, detention authorities such as immigration officials, hospital staff, or prison wardens. Torture can be physical or psychological. New methods of torture are, unfortunately, invented every year. Many are most familiar with physical torture such as severe beatings, extraction of nails or teeth, burns, electric shocks, suspension, suffocation, excessive light, heat, cold or noise, sexual aggression (rape and other sexual violence), forced nudity, isolation and sensory deprivation, mock executions or simulated drowning. However, psychological torture can be as traumatic and inflicts egregious harm. The psychological wounds of both physical and psychological torture last a lifetime. The coercive methods of Straight Inc. and other abusive residential treatment centers were designed to obliterate the sense of self so as to instill fear and force obedience to authority in young teens. Abusive methods of Straight Inc. included sleep deprivation, beatings, sexual humiliation, sexual assault, prolonged sitting or standing in forced positions, isolation and detention for prolonged and indefinite periods of time, forcing one teen to abuse another, and prolonged denial of rest, sleep, food, water, adequate hygiene. These same forms of abuse are utilized in many other residential treatment centers. Many victims continue to suffer in silence. Torture victims commonly report feelings of fear, guilt, shame, anger, disillusionment, insecurity and humiliation. For victims of torture, finding the courage to come forward and speak about what happened to them is very difficult. This is true for the many thousands of US children who were physically and psychologically abused and sometimes sexually abused in the program called Straight Inc. What happened behind the closed doors of Straight Inc., Roloff Homes, WWASPS, Teen Challenge and other programs is deeply personal and highly traumatizing. Speaking about it can evoke for survivors a range of emotions because the memories are triggers for retraumatization. Survivors are reluctant to speak publicly and may not have fully revealed their experiences to families and/or friends. In some instances, they may not have come to terms with it themselves. Survivors of torture find it very challenging to heal and try to move forward with their lives. Many victims from Straight Inc. and other abusive teen centers express frustration that, despite the fact that their torture occurred and was verified, it has not been publicly acknowledged. Survivors come away with different expectations of what constitutes justice. Some speak of the importance of criminal prosecutions, while others speak about civil compensation, rehabilitation or prevention of recurrence. All of them realize that there is a need to restore the sense of dignity and control that was taken from them when they were tortured. The Survivors/Victims of institutionalized abuse have responded with courage and resiliency and have launched a variety of legal challenges to these practices and also actions of activism and advocacy as well as a web of survivor support networks. The Web sites Fornits.com, TheStraights.com, Heal-online.org, and others have collected many of the survivors' stories. [\[i\] H.E.A.L.](#) and International Survivors Action Committee (ISAC) both previously provided reports about this abuse. Source: <http://www.opednews.com/articles/Long-term-effects-on-survi-by-Janet-Parker-120225-802.html>

Paul Babeu's Suspicious Past as School's Headmaster By Monica Alonzo published: March 08, 2012 Former DeSisto School student Melissa Burech Late school founder Michael DeSisto The Massachusetts mansion that served as the school's headquarters Subject(s): DeSisto School, Paul Babeu The most riveting detail to come out of Paul Babeu's three-year tenure as head of a private Massachusetts boarding school for troubled teens was his close relationship with a 17-year-old student there. Former students of the now-defunct school tell New Times that they often saw Babeu showering attention on fellow student Joshua Geyer. "I'd see [Babeu] around campus all the time," says Melissa Burech, who attended DeSisto School during Babeu's tenure. "And I saw [Babeu and Josh] together more than they should've been. I saw [Babeu] take him off campus." Babeu's sister, Lucy, alleges that Babeu was engaged in a sexual relationship with Geyer. The Rose Law Firm — hired by Babeu after allegations arose that he and his lawyer, Chris DeRose, threatened his Mexican ex-lover with deportation if the man revealed their romantic relationship — did not return calls for comment on his relationship with the student. Babeu, however, denied wrongdoing through the firm. Students say Babeu was a constant presence at DeSisto. The school occupied an expansive campus in the Berkshires of Massachusetts, where wayward teens, plagued with such problems as drug addiction, depression, anorexia, and mental illness, received what was deemed therapeutic treatment. Babeu was headmaster and executive director at DeSisto from April 1999 to August 2001, and students say they often saw him milling around campus with the school's founder, the late Michael DeSisto. Since the scandal involving his ex-lover broke in New Times on February 17, Babeu has minimized his role at the school, which was investigated for nearly two decades because of allegations that students endured systematic neglect and sexual and physical abuse there. Babeu, elected Pinal County sheriff in 2008 after serving as a police officer in Chandler for several years, lately has claimed he did not interact with students and had no direct supervisory responsibility over staff at DeSisto. But students who attended the school tell New Times that they saw Babeu in daily meetings where administrators discussed issues facing the school, including its disciplinary practices — which included students being forced to sit on metal folding chairs facing a corner for hours on end and students getting stripped naked and forced to wear nothing but bedsheets. Babeu's camp has carefully parsed denials that he engaged in a sexual relationship with Joshua Geyer. That is, Babeu, who would have been in his early 30s at the time, has not denied having a relationship with Geyer; he's only denied having an "inappropriate" relationship with his former student, according to his legal handlers. One justification for this statement could be that Geyer was old enough to consent to sexual intercourse in Massachusetts. The sheriff has eluded questions about how he could have developed a close relationship with a DeSisto student if his job did not involve dealing with students. ABC 15, in a report on Babeu's years at the school, received signed, but undated, letters from the former student. The Rose Law Firm released the letters to the station. "I have never at any time lived or engaged in any inappropriate sexual relationship with Paul Babeu," the first letter reads. "I have remained personal friends with Paul Babeu." The second reads, "I never lived with or engaged in any sexual relationship with Paul Babeu while I was a student at DeSisto private school." The station said neither letter was notarized and that there was no proof the letters were written by the student. New Times was unable to reach Geyer for comment. Lucy Babeu tells it differently, recalling a time when she saw Geyer at her brother's home in Massachusetts, and when she confronted her brother about the boy, Paul Babeu confessed that he was in love with Geyer. Melissa Burech and other students who knew Geyer, and attended DeSisto while Babeu was headmaster, recall signs of a close relationship between the two. Burech, who followed her family to Arizona a few years ago and now lives in Deer Valley, says she had friends in common with Geyer, friends in whom he confided about his "inappropriate" relationship with Babeu. "Because the school was so intense, so cult-like, you developed close bonds with people," she says. "I think Josh looked to [Babeu] for guidance, and I believe Paul twisted that, abused that power to get what he wanted." Another student, who grew up in New York, also found herself at DeSisto while Babeu was in charge of the school. The former student, who spoke on condition of anonymity, confirms what others have said: Babeu and Geyer were "together a whole lot," and Geyer "got taken off campus for lunch a lot" by the future National Sheriff of the Year. She says word got back to students that the pair often went to the Panda House, a Chinese restaurant in the area. "Everybody on campus knew about it," she says. "When Josh left the program, and so did Paul, it was a big thing about them dating. Everybody knew." The woman described Babeu as Geyer's "commitment holder," a title the school gave to staff members selected by students to monitor their progress. "You would go to someone you could trust, or [whom] you could speak to about your problems," the former student says. "They were supposed to help you heal." When Babeu took over as the school's headmaster, it was operating unlawfully without a state license, and it already was embroiled in lawsuits from dissatisfied parents. Each family paid tuition of about $65,000 a year for their child to be in an environment that was "excessively punitive" and created "an extreme risk of injury even death," the Massachusetts Office of Child Care Services said in legal papers. This state agency "received many allegations of abusive practices at the school," state investigators said, adding that Massachusetts officials repeatedly were denied access to the campus and to student files: "The school effectively stonewalled the OCCS, claiming [DeSisto School was] not subject to [state] licensing, but refusing to provide necessary information to back up [the] claim." The school argued that it didn't need a license because it wasn't serving enough special-needs students. According to Massachusetts law, if more than 30 percent of the student population was made up of such students, a license was required. When state officials finally forced open the school's files in 2001 after almost 20 years of complaints, they classified more than 40 percent of the student body as special needs. The school ultimately shut down in 2004 because it was unable to comply with state mandates. Court and state records paint a chilling account of life at DeSisto, including during the time that Babeu ran it. One student refused to stop leaning against a wall and was physically restrained for several hours. Another who threw a plate and got into an argument was tied up for nearly six hours. A student forced to sit in a metal chair for weeks, facing the corner, wasn't properly medicated, became severely depressed, and urinated and defecated on himself. The teen eventually was taken to the hospital for treatment for pneumonia. Records show that students had to take group showers, "denying them privacy and leading to instances of sexual abuse." A few months after a court ordered the school in 2001 to either shut down or apply for a license, Babeu resigned. He recently told various media outlets that he was only responsible for the school's operations, including maintenance of the grounds. But he told another story on a campaign website. There, Babeu described his time at DeSisto as a period when he was "frequently recognized for his effectiveness in personnel management and fiscal abilities." In 2002, when he applied for a job as a Chandler cop, Babeu noted on his application that, while at DeSisto, he supervised directors of the school and 80 full-time employees. Babeu counters allegations of his relationship with the student or his knowing about abusive conditions at the school by attempting to discredit his sister. He portrays himself as a victim under attack by a mentally ill family member. Babeu, the second-youngest of 11 children, described his family as one with "lots of different personalities" in a 2010 interview with the Arizona Daily Star. "I've seen lots of different things in our family, but that's all family business," he said at the time. Babeu's representatives at the Rose firm now are divulging this "family business" by releasing allegations detailing Lucy Babeu's alleged mental illness. According to the firm, she was placed in psychiatric care on two occasions, had her children taken away, and has been a frequent drug abuser. Lucy Babeu denied these claims to New Times, calling them "slanderous." The sheriff, a candidate for Congress in Arizona's conservative 4th District, says he's also a victim of attacks by political enemies. On March 3, during an interview with Newsmax, Babeu says the timing of the allegations are suspect. "[His being gay was] pushed around for months and months — in fact, for years," he told the conservative website. "Political opponents have threatened me, trying to go to the newspapers and the TV stations . . . clearly, looking at the timing of this election. They're literally five months away from primary ballots being mailed to voters, we being 10 points ahead." That was then. A new poll — taken after New Times broke the story that Babeu's Mexican ex-boyfriend says the sheriff and his lawyer tried to intimidate him into keeping the love affair secret — showed Babeu six points behind Congressman Paul Gosar in the 4th District. The former lover, Jose Orozco, says the sheriff's attorney raised threats of deportation when he refused to sign a document promising he would never disclose details of the affair. Orozco has filed notice that he intends to sue Babeu and Pinal County for $1 million for violating his civil rights. Babeu denied that he or his camp did anything inappropriate then, too, portraying himself as a conservative politician under attack because he is gay. And he again played the victim card, claiming Orozco had hacked into his campaign website and his Twitter account and had stolen his identity — charges that seem unlikely given that the sheriff gave Orozco access to his websites and accounts. Orozco and his lawyer, Melissa Weiss-Riner, say he turned over everything Babeu and DeRose requested but that they still pressured him to sign the non-disclosure document concerning the romance. An interesting side note is that Babeu, in 2002, went public about getting sexually abused by a Catholic priest in Springfield, Massachusetts. He said he was outraged because the church took years to defrock the priest who had abused him, his older brother Francis, and other children. It is similar outrage that moved DeSisto alumni to speak out against their former headmaster and the abusive treatment they received, partially under his reign. The New York student, who attended DeSisto from 1998 to 2003, is surprised to hear that Babeu now describes himself as a career-long advocate for victims' rights. "When did he become that guy? When did he become so involved in victims' rights? Why didn't he see problems in the [DeSisto] program, see that things needed to change?" she says. "He would hear about kids starving in the corner . . . You'd think he would know that was wrong." Melissa Burech, sent to the school from West Virginia when she was 15 because of a history of depression, says, "Things got worse" during Babeu's reign. "He signed up to be an administrator at this school, and he didn't do anything to help us or change what was happening there," she says. When state officials finally got on campus and gained access to students, their files, and school staff, the school was ordered to immediately stop its most abusive practices — such as strip-searching students, barricading them in their bedrooms with mattresses (or with staff sleeping outside doors), and banishing them to remote areas of the campus. Students, sent to what was known as the "farm," were not allowed to attend academic classes and were forced to perform manual labor for five to eight hours a day before they could eat or drink, Massachusetts child welfare authorities reported. "We had to cut down trees or restore the buildings," Burech says. "It was a big joke that we attended the school of the janitorial arts." The former student from New York recalls being forced to hold hands with several other girls for days at a time, no matter where they went, unless they were sleeping or eating meals that were limited to 15 minutes each. "We had to go to the restrooms that way, take showers that way, get dressed — try to put on our underwear that way," she says. "We had to hold hands under the stalls and, even if we had a male staff member [supervising], we had to ask for permission to take our hands apart so we could do what we needed to do in the bathroom. It was humiliating." She says they would rotate so that each girl had a chance to be at the end of the human chain and have the privilege of a free hand. "We all had different problems, obviously; that's why we were in that school," she says. "But we weren't stupid. We knew this behavior was wrong, and we knew it wasn't helping. It was just a way of torturing us." Burech now is attending school to become an occupational therapist. "If I saw [Babeu] today, I would say 'thank you' because those horrible experiences taught me to be a fighter," she says. "No matter what, he is part of my past. But I'm speaking up now because I want to inform Arizona about his past so he doesn't become part of our future." Source: <http://www.phoenixnewtimes.com/content/printVersion/2952182/>

Supreme Court orders new trial in 16-year-old's suicide at boarding school for troubled teens THE ASSOCIATED PRESS First Posted: March 09, 2012 - 10:22 am Last Updated: March 09, 2012 - 1:07 pm MISSOULA, Mont. — The Montana Supreme Court has ordered a new trial in a wrongful death lawsuit filed by the mother of a 16-year-old Colorado girl who committed suicide at a Montana boarding school for troubled teens. A Sanders County jury decided in October 2010 that World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools of Utah and its founder, Robert Litchfield, were not negligent in the October 2004 death of Karlye Newman, the Missoulian (<http://bit.ly/vrP6hQ>) reported Friday. Newman hanged herself with a sweat shirt after six months at the now closed Spring Creek Academy Lodge near Thompson Falls. Her mother, Judith Newman, sued WWASP and Litchfield for wrongful death, negligence, breach of contract, fraud and deceit. WWASP provided the policy and procedure manual for Spring Creek Academy Lodge. The Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that retired Justice John Warner, who was brought in to hear the case, wrongly barred the jury from hearing evidence that other WWASP-affiliated schools were shut down and investigated for abuses. "We conclude that the District Court abused its discretion when it limited the evidence concerning negligence to what Karlye knew and what happened to Karlye," Justice Patricia Cotter wrote. "The District Court determined it appropriate to admit evidence of what Karlye knew, but exclude evidence of what the defendants knew" about other suicide attempts at affiliated schools and conditions at Spring Creek. Cotter added that, "Without this information, the jury could not determine whether it was foreseeable to these defendants that Karlye was at risk of injury while a student at Spring Creek." James Manley of Polson, one of several attorneys representing Judith Newman, said the ruling means they'll get to retry the case "with all the evidence this time." Newman filed her initial lawsuit in 2006. It went to trial in 2010 after dismissals and out-of-court settlements whittled the list of defendants down to WWASP and Litchfield. Spring Creek, which settled with Newman, closed in 2008. Her lawsuit claimed the school misled her about her daughter's progress and condition, ignored signs that she had become suicidal and contributed to her death through a series of harsh punishments that included solitary confinement and refusing to allow the girl to have any contact with her parents. The defendants argued Newman failed to disclose previous suicide threats by

Karlye before she was enrolled at Spring Creek and that Newman signed off on Spring Creek's methods prior to enrolling her daughter. The defense said Spring Creek wouldn't have accepted Karlye had it known about the earlier suicide attempts. However, the school's brochures indicated the facility was suitable for suicidal youths, the Supreme Court noted. WWASP, which provided the policy and procedure manuals for several schools was the subject of other lawsuits, including a federal lawsuit involving 353 parents and former students who accuse the firm of assault, battery, false imprisonment, fraud and racketeering. Newman's case will be remanded back to District Court. Manley said he will ask for a new judge. Source:

<http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/a02e98e64ead4ee823bc92551b56209/MT--Supco-Boarding-School-Suicide/> Also see: http://missoulain.com/news/local/montana-supreme-court-orders-new-trial-over-suicide-at-spring/article_1e13bc1e-699d-11e1-a973-0019bb2963f4.html, <http://www.greatfalltribune.com/article/20120309/NEWS01/120309009/Montana-Supreme-Court-orders-new-trial-boarding-school-suicide?odyssey=tab%7Ctopnews%7Ctext%7CFrontpage, and http://www.sheboyganpress.com/usatoday/article/38760007?odyssey=mod%7Cnews%7Ctext%7CFrontpage%7Cp>

Former juvenile corrections officer jailed Associated Press March 15, 2012 A former juvenile corrections officer has been jailed after being accused of sex crimes. The former employee, Ardith Brown, faces charges of felony child molestation and sexual assault against persons in custody, the Georgia Department of Juvenile Justice said in a statement late Wednesday. Brown was a former staff member at the Regional Youth Detention Center in Gainesville. She was fired on Feb. 2, after an internal investigation into allegations of an inappropriate relationship with a 14-year-old in the department's custody, authorities said. Brown was being held in the Hall County Jail. Jail records did not indicate whether she had an attorney. The Gainesville case is the latest in a series of investigations involving the Department of Juvenile Justice, which began a system-wide review after the beating death of a 19-year-old at an Augusta facility. "As a result of our surprise inspections at all 27 Georgia juvenile detention centers, we've observed many of our Juvenile Corrections Officers become more diligent in monitoring youth activity at all our facilities," Commissioner Gale Buckner said in a statement. The agency recently named a new director of the Augusta Youth Development Campus, which has been at the center of several investigations involving its staff after the beating death. Nine workers at the Augusta youth center have been fired since November. Two others were demoted and offered positions at different facilities. Source: http://www.ajc.com/news/former-juvenile-corrections-officer-1386082.html?cxttype=rss_news_82001

Boot camp operator charged with rape March 28, 2012 The operator of a camp for troubled youth already facing kidnapping and other charges from a 2011 incident was charged Wednesday with sexually assaulting two 14-year-old girls in 2004. Kelvin McFarland, 42, operator of Family 1st Growth Camp, is being held on $275,000 bail after pleading not guilty to five charges from the 2004 incidents, which did not occur in Pasadena, according to Los Angeles Deputy District Attorney Carolina Lugo. Source: http://articles.pasadenasun.com/2012-03-28/the626now/31251155_1_boot-camp-pasadena-police-investigation-camp-for-troubled-youth Additional Coverage of this story is available at: http://articles.pasadenasun.com/2012-03-28/the626now/31251155_1_boot-camp-pasadena-police-investigation-camp-for-troubled-youth <http://altadena.patch.com/articles/local-boot-camp-instructor-charged-with-sexual-assault-of-teen-girls> http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/03/29/kelvin-mcfarland-charged_n_1387778.html <http://losangeles.cbslocal.com/2012/03/28/boot-camp-operator-charged-with-sexually-assaulting-teen-girls/>

Body Bags and Child Torture: Mitt Romney's New Approach to Education Become a Fan SAVE AS FAVORITE VIEW FAVORITES By Ruth Hull (about the author) Become a Fan (17 fans) -- Page 1 of 1 page(s) opednews.com Are body bags better than books for educating the next generation? Is vomit really proper food for teens? Should children be forced brush their teeth with toilet water? If you say, "Yes," Mitt Romney is the President for you. One wonders how it is that parents are rooked into spending $20,000 to $100,000 to place their kids in American Gulag Schools, such as World-Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP, run by Robert Litchfield, Mitt Romney's former campaign finance director) or the Aspen Educational Group (run out of San Rafael, California as part of Mitt Romney's Bain Capital). No wonder Mitt Romney was hesitant to release his tax records. Before you vote in a Presidential election, you may want to research this issue for yourself. Representative George Miller (D-CA), former chairman of the House Committee of Education and Labor, had a hearing on the subject. Legislation passed the house, only to go nowhere in the Democratically-controlled U.S. Senate. Let's look at what came out in that hearing. This is a video from that official hearing you should see before you go to the polls. <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YkmGgH11Dmk&feature=related> The organization HEAL has put together a list of suspected and confirmed abusive behavior modification programs in the United States. <http://www.heal-online.org/childtortureusa.htm> On this list are 19 facilities owned by Mitt Romney's Aspen Educational Group. There is another list of additional facilities that were closed down after the abuse or deaths came to the attention of investigators. An example of Mitt Romney's fine Aspen education is Mount Bachelor Academy in Oregon which was closed after an investigation revealed that students were required to engage in sexual rituals and other abuse. This was followed by more allegations of abuse from students and former students. See <http://online.wsj.com/article/AP16c969450d924f65b8ba47fd8c0869a.html> Mt. Bachelor Academy is but one of many Romney's Aspen Education Group's child abuse locations. The deaths have been mounting. Will the families of Sergey Blashchishen (<http://www.cafety.org/privately-funded-programs/794-media-release-sheriff-recommends-death-by-homicide-at-sagewalk-or-sagewalk>) who died in an Aspen program in Oregon and Mathew Myer (<http://www.heal-online.org/killer092509.pdf>) who died in an Aspen program in Texas and families of other Aspen victims get a warm fuzzy feeling if Mitt is elected Commander-in-Chief. 16 year old Aaron Bacon claimed to be sick and Aspen accused him of faking his illness. After 30 days of this "fake" illness, Aaron succumbed to death. So, your kid blew chemistry and got a B last year? He is a family embarrassment who would be better fixed or eliminated? Mitt Romney can help you. But how do you get your kid to an Aspen school? The NYRA and a variety of youth organizations have sounded the alarm to teens about Aspen and WWASP. Your son may not go willingly to his death. Don't worry. The bounty hunter in this video can escort your kid from his bedroom to the torture chamber in handcuffs, if necessary. <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=e8VLEHOM9js> The National Youth Rights Association has been speaking out against behavior modification schools for quite some time. Part of the trouble is that these schools are private and there is essentially no regulation of private schools. Read this article written by Natasha Hull-Richter during her tenure as President of the Orange County chapter of the National Youth Rights Association. WHO ARE WE? WHAT ARE WE? ARE WE HUMAN ENOUGH TO STOP AGE-RELATED TORTURE AND MURDER? <http://creativemethods.net/gulagschools.html> One additional note involves the psychiatrists who send other people's children to die in these institutions. They should be thoroughly investigated and have their licenses removed. Then there are the parents who are willing to send their kids off on the advice of an outsider that it will fix their kids, who were probably broken by the parents in the first place. These parents and doctors should pay big bucks to any surviving children. There is no excuse for child abuse or torture. The police who refuse to take reports of child abuse should be fired without pensions. The District Attorneys, like Tony Rackauckas, who refuse to prosecute child abuse, should be barred from public office for life. The judges who refuse to take the needs of children into account in divorce proceedings should be thrown off the bench. The political parties (hint, hint: Democrat) who use children, while doing nothing to promote youth rights, should be ostracized by voters. Like women, children are treated as worthless slaves to be exploited in the American system. It's time this changed. One of the organizations that is working to change things is the National Youth Rights Association. I recommend everyone check it out. <http://youthrights.org> This leaves the question of whether the Republican Party is planning a serious challenge to Barack Obama. Romney's connection to these torture schools is fairly well known. Polls show that Ron Paul could beat Barack Obama. So why would the Republicans go with a candidate with such a strong weakness as Mitt Romney instead of choosing a likely victor in Ron Paul? Could it be that Romney is a token candidate preparing the way for four more years of Obama? Watch the polls for Obama's landslide on November 6, 2012. Source: <http://www.opednews.com/articles/Body-Bags-and-Child-Torture-by-Ruth-Hull-120419-192.html>

Children in Solitary MAY 3, 2012 by Jean Casella and James Ridgeway This week, the The American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry released a policy statement condemning the use of solitary confinement for juveniles. There is no comprehensive data on how many teens and even younger children are in solitary confinement in the United States, but it is safe to say that the number run into the thousands. Juveniles in adult prison often end up in solitary confinement, and isolation is widely used in juvenile facilities as well. On the ACLU "Blog of Rights" today, David Fathi, Director of the ACLU's National Prison Project, puts the statement in context: As any parent knows, teenagers are different than adults. This common-sense observation is backed by hard scientific evidence; we know that an adolescent's brain continues to grow and develop well into his or her twenties. The fact that teenagers' brains are still developing makes them especially vulnerable to trauma of all kinds, including the trauma of social isolation and sensory deprivation. That's why the leading American child psychiatry association just approved a policy statement opposing the use of solitary confinement in correctional facilities for juveniles. The American Academy of Child & Adolescent Psychiatry represents over 7,500 child and adolescent psychiatrists and other interested physicians. This groundbreaking policy statement from adolescent psychiatry experts comes not a moment too soon. While recent settlements in ACLU lawsuits in Montana and Mississippi include limits on solitary confinement for youth, the practice remains alarmingly widespread, with thousands of persons under 18 held in solitary on any given day, in juvenile facilities as well as in adult jails and prisons. I remember the first time I visited a 13-year-old boy in solitary in an adult prison – his voice hadn't changed yet and he was too young to shave, but that didn't save him from being locked alone in a cell for 23 hours a day. Solitary confinement can be harmful for people of any age, but it's especially damaging to youth. The 17-year-old plaintiff in the ACLU's Montana case tried to kill himself several times while in solitary confinement in an adult prison. And while youth in solitary are a relatively small percentage of the total population of juvenile facilities, they account for more than half of the suicides. Fortunately efforts are underway to end this inhumane and destructive practice. In California, Sen. Leland Yee introduced a bill to ban solitary confinement for juveniles except in the most exceptional circumstances. The bill attracted considerable support, but eventually failed to pass out of committee. And in West Virginia, the Division of Juvenile Services recently announced a state-wide ban on the practice. Click here to read the rest, and to sign the ACLU's petition against solitary confinement. Source: <http://solitarywatch.com/2012/05/03/children-in-solitary/>

Kidnapping charge stems from 'boot camp' drug intervention May 10, 2012 02:58:30 PM Share This | Print Story | E-Mail Story By Todd R. Hansen/Colusa County Sun-Herald A Napa man was arrested after he reportedly took his 13-year-old grandson to Letts Lake in northwest Colusa County with the idea of getting him off drugs in a "boot camp" setting, the Colusa County Sheriff's Department reported. The reported victim "stated that he was accused of being on methamphetamine ... and stated he has never tried meth," sheriff's Lt. Shane Maxey said. The teen told investigators that his grandfather, Robin M. Jones, 64, and his father, Michael Jones, grabbed him from his sleep about 1 a.m. Tuesday, hog-tied him and then took him against his will to Letts Lake, Maxey said. The grandfather reportedly told other campers in the area that the teen was in "boot camp" under his custody, Maxey said. A U.S. Forest Service agent saw the boy and his grandfather arguing Wednesday, and stopped to see what the dispute was about. The teen told the agent he had been taken up to the lake from his Vallejo home against his will, Maxey said. The Colusa County Sheriff's Department was called about 3:30 p.m. The grandfather was arrested about 90 minutes later. Jones was booked into Colusa County Jail on suspicion of kidnapping, false imprisonment and child endangerment. Bail was set at $100,000. The boy, who lives with his father, was turned over to Child Protective Services for release to family members, Maxey said. No charges have been brought against Michael Jones, said Maxey, but the investigation continues. Maxey is not sure why Letts Lake was chosen by Jones, but suspects he was familiar with the lake. Source: <http://www.appeal-democrat.com/articles/grandson-116076-colusa-took.html#ixzz1ud8oU41x>

Source: <http://nky.cincinnati.com/article/ab/20120614/NEWS0103/306140136%26Ref=AR> Report: Nonprofit's kids got wrong pills Enquirer Exclusive: State officials allege maltreatment at Campbell Lodge Boys' Home 12:48 AM, Jun. 15, 2012 Written by Jim Hannah A Northern Kentucky home for at-risk youths failed to consistently provide three meals a day, a bed and clean clothes to the boys living there while improperly dispensing psychotropic medications to its residents, according to an investigative report obtained by The Enquirer that was prepared by Kentucky's top social-service agency. Some of the children at the Campbell Lodge Boys' Home also told investigators the staff antagonized them, roughed them up and at times medicated them with other children's prescriptions, according to a statement of deficiencies presented to the home on June 5 by the Office of Inspector General of the Kentucky Cabinet for Health and Family Services. "It is apparent that the environment included cursing, intimidation, humiliation, unnecessarily rough handling and hitting," state investigators wrote in their report. What state investigators found at the sprawling 78-acre facility resulted in the removal of about 25 children, the layoff of about 50 employees and the firing of Executive Director Barry Jones. The home has no residents now but apparently hopes to resume operations if it satisfies state authorities it has fixed the problems. A spokesman for the Cabinet for Health and Family Services said the results of its investigation "speak for themselves" and declined to answer specific questions about what would happen next at the home, including whether a criminal investigation was in the offing. Lodge attorney Ben Dusing, a former federal prosecutor who conducted a parallel internal investigation, released a written statement on the findings. "By any standard, the ... investigations suggest that the (Lodge) has fallen short of its long-standing mission - that of helping our region's at-risk young men," Dusing said. "Of course, this is unacceptable. The deficiencies and conduct identified in both the state and internal investigations must be - and will be - addressed directly, transparently and fairly." He said the home has not lost its state child-care license. The home has operated on a bucolic hilltop overlooking the Ohio River since it was founded by a priest in 1958 as a residential alternative for neglected or dependent boys ages 10 to 18. An independent board now operates the home that houses an average of 74 children over a year. It receives about $1.2 million in tax dollars annually, 76 percent of the nonprofit's budget. Jones, who earned $96,652 per year, referred all questions to his attorney, Walter Hornbeck. "During Mr. Jones' tenure as executive director of Campbell Lodge Boys' Home, he maintained the highest professional standards," Hornbeck said in a written statement. "As executive director he administered Campbell Lodge Home in compliance with all state statutes and administrative regulations and in accordance with the policies, procedures and directives of its board." Dusing said Jones was "removed" from his job after the state investigation found that the "significant problems" were the result of "noncompliance with internal policies and procedures, as well as instances of mismanagement." Some of the most serious findings involve the mishandling, mislabeling and improper dispensing of prescription medications. Children reported learning how to swallow their medications with no water to avoid drinking from a communal cup that one described as "nasty." One home staff member told inspectors he was ordered to give another child's attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder medication to a resident who began "acting out," according to the state investigation. The staff member admitted making handwritten labels with the child's name and dosage instructions even though the pills were not the same strength as prescribed. When state investigators looked in the home's medicine cabinet, they found two different strengths of the antidepressant Citalopram in the same bottle. Medical documentation, along with prescription pills, was dumped in a trash can that children emptied, in violation of numerous regulations and the federal health privacy act, investigators found. Investigators also observed another common complaint they heard from the children: They were not getting three balanced meals a day. The children reported they would be given a cereal bar or chips to take with their morning medications, but not served a meal that met the nutritional guidelines of the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The majority of the staff and children interviewed confirmed that it was common for residents to sleep on mattresses on the floor or on a sofa. While both those practices violate state regulations, the staff told investigators it was done because children feared the dark or their roommates.

Other people began to notice that the children might not have been receiving proper care. State investigators found a email written by a public school teacher begging the home to give her student a clean shirt so he would quit trying to wear it inside out to prevent other students from picking on him. The maltreatment would agitate the children, but when they acted out, they were roughed up, state investigators found. The children reported that staff members would restrain them so harshly they would cry, get carpet burns and black eyes. "Based on case record review and interviews, it was determined that the facility failed to create an atmosphere conducive to treatment, as required by the regulation," investigators wrote. In one incident, a child reported that when he threatened to run away, the staff antagonized him by saying they would give him an hour head start. Another child said the "staff always has an attitude" and "gets 'smart' with the kids." One child said a staff member constantly harassed him about his weight. At one point, someone filed a police report on the home for endangering the welfare of a minor, the state investigator said. A copy of the police report was not provided to The Enquirer. Investigators attempted to follow up on reports of staff using arm locks and choking but found no "specific documentations" on the incidents. Children would complain to home officials about their care, state investigators found, but nothing was done. One child reported hearing a staff member saying, "They will cover each other up." Another child called the grievance form "a waste of paper."

Wednesday, Jul 18, 2012 11:45 AM UTC Dark side of a Bain success A for-profit health company bought by Bain -- that Romney profits from -- has exploded in size and tales of neglect By Art Levine Clockwise from top left: Brendan Blum, Sergey Blashchishen, Matthew Meyer and Lindsey Poteet. Aspen Education already faced a wrongful death lawsuit over Meyer when Bain and CRC Health Group bought the company in 2006. Six deaths since the takeover, including Blum, Blashchishen and Poteet, have generated either lawsuits or complaints of neglect. It seemed a world away from the executive suites of Bain Capital when Dana Blum, a recent widow living in Portland, Ore., made the fateful decision to send her son Brendan to Youth Care, a residential program for troubled teens located in the suburbs of Salt Lake City. Brendan, a 14-year-old boy with Asperger's syndrome, had been extremely aggressive for years; he was even arrested a few times after attacking members of his family. Local therapists hadn't helped, and six months after her husband died, Dana was frantically casting about for solutions. A consultation with UCLA's neuropsychiatric unit convinced her that Youth Care's therapeutic and educational program would finally make a difference. Four months into his stay there, Brendan had earned a reputation as a temper-prone student who tried to shirk his obligations. So on the afternoon of June 27, when he complained to medical staff that he felt very sick, as if something were "crawling around" in his stomach, his concerns were dismissed. After 11 p.m., he woke up, complaining of stomach pain, and defecated in his pants. The on-duty monitors took him to the Purple Room, a makeshift isolation room used to segregate misbehaving students. There, he suffered a long night of agony, howling in pain and repeatedly vomiting and soiling himself. According to court transcripts and police reports, the two poorly paid monitors on duty did little more than offer him water, Sprite and Pepto-Bismol. They never telephoned the on-call nurse and waited until nearly 2 a.m. to contact the on-call supervisor, only to leave a voicemail. There was little else they felt they could do — Youth Care's protocol on emergency services meant they were too low on the totem pole to call 911 themselves. "They didn't trust our judgment in emergency situations," explains Josh Randall, a former Youth Care residential monitor, who wasn't on duty that night. "If you're working for $9.50 an hour on the graveyard shift, you don't want to buck the system." At any rate, the monitors had little expertise in how to respond — it was an entry-level job requiring only a GED, plus a CPR and safety course overseen by Youth Care itself. When the morning staff arrived at 7 a.m., they discovered Brendan facedown on the floor of the Purple Room, his body already stiff with rigor mortis. The state's chief medical examiner later determined that Blum had died of a twisted-bowel infarction, which requires emergency surgical intervention. "It made me very angry that they couldn't provide better emergency services for my son," Dana Blum told the online magazine Momlogic. "I feel like he was murdered" — although, in fact, no court has ever found Aspen or its staffers guilty of murder. Blum, who, with the help of insurance and school district aid, paid Youth Care $15,000 a month to care for her son, made those remarks in 2009; she can no longer speak publicly about Brendan's death, according to the terms of a settlement she reached last year in a wrongful death lawsuit against Youth Care and its parent company, Aspen Education. The failure at Youth Care was not due simply to the carelessness of a few workers — a point underscored when a Utah court found that the threshold needed to pursue criminal negligence charges against the two monitors in 2008 wasn't met and the charges were dismissed. And it wasn't the only example of alleged negligence or abuse at treatment centers for adult addicts and "troubled teens" that are owned by Aspen's parent company, CRC Health Group, according to a Salon investigation based on government reports, court filings and official complaints by parents and employees, along with interviews with former clients and staff. Our investigation found previously unreported allegations of abuse and neglect in at least 10 CRC residential drug and teen care facilities across the country, including three I visited undercover in Utah and California. With rare exceptions, such incidents have largely escaped notice because the programs are, thanks to lax state regulations, largely unaccountable. Court documents and ex-staffers also allege that such incidents reflect, in part, a broader corporate culture at Aspen's owner, CRC Health Group, a leading national chain of treatment centers. Lawsuits and critics have claimed that CRC prizes profits, and the avoidance of outside scrutiny, over the health and safety of its clients. (We sent specific questions on these basic allegations to CRC and owner Bain Capital. CRC would answer only general questions; Bain did not reply.) And CRC's corporate culture, in turn, reflects the attitudes and financial imperatives of Bain Capital, the private equity firm founded by Mitt Romney. (The Romney campaign also did not reply to written questions.) Bain is known for its relentless obsession with maximizing shareholder value and revenues. Indeed, this has become a talking point of late on the Romney campaign trail; he bragged to Fox in late May that "80 percent of them [Bain investments] grew their revenues." CRC, a fast-growing company then in the lucrative field of drug treatment, was perhaps a natural fit when Bain acquired it for $720 million in 2006. In conversations with staff and patients who spent time at CRC facilities since the takeover, there are suggestions that the Bain approach has had its effects. "If you look at their daily profit numbers compared to what they charge," Dana Blum said of CRC's Aspen division in 2009, "it's obscene." That point, ironically enough, was underscored by the glowing reports in the trade press about its profitability. The purchase of CRC came seven years after Romney publicly announced his retirement as CEO of Bain Capital, where he had been in charge since its founding in 1984. But at the time of his departure, Romney worked out an arrangement to continue to share in Bain's profits as a limited partner in the firm. Today, he is still an investor in 48 Bain accounts. Though he has refused to disclose their underlying assets, some information about them can be gleaned. For example, he has reported at least $300,000 to \$1.2 million, if not more, in fluctuating annual earnings from Bain Capital VIII, the convoluted $3.5 billion array of related funds that owns both name-brand companies such as Dunkin' Donuts and the lesser-known CRC Health Group. Most of these funds were made more attractive to privileged investors by being registered in the Cayman Islands tax haven. And Romney's connections to CRC run even deeper: Of the three Bain managing partners who sit on CRC's board, two, John Connaughton and Steven Barnes (with his wife), gave a total of half a million dollars to Restore Our Future, the super PAC supporting Romney. They also each donated the $2,500 maximum directly to his campaign. Bain takes over When Bain purchased CRC, it looked like an investment masterstroke. The company, founded in the mid-'90s with a single California treatment facility, the Camp Recovery Center, had quickly grown into the largest chain of for-profit drug and alcohol treatment services in the country, with $230 million in annual revenue. Under Bain's guidance, its revenue has nearly doubled, to more than $450 million. CRC now serves 30,000 clients daily — mostly opiate addicts — at 140 facilities across 25 states. In the first five years after its acquisition, Bain had already extracted nearly $20 million in management-related fees from the chain, although Bain investors haven't cashed in yet through dividends or an IPO. Bain's purchase, a leveraged buyout, also saddled CRC with massive debt of well over $600 million. According to company executives and independent analysts, hands-on oversight of subsidiary companies is a hallmark of both Bain and CRC. Romney's campaign literature boasts about Bain taking exactly this sort of direct role in helping to turn around failing companies. "Over the life of an investment, they have a strong management team willing to participate," Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst with CRT Capital, a leading institutional brokerage firm, says of Bain. The CRC acquisition immediately made Bain owner of the largest collection of addiction treatment facilities in the nation. Unlike some Bain Capital acquisitions, which led to massive layoffs, the company's approach with CRC was to boost revenues by gobbling up other treatment centers, raising fees, and expanding its client base through slick, aggressive marketing, while keeping staffing and other costs relatively low. But that rapid pace of acquisition couldn't be sustained in the mostly small-scale drug treatment industry alone. So Bain Capital and CRC set their sights on an entirely new treatment arena: the multibillion-dollar "troubled teen" industry, a burgeoning field of mostly locally owned residential schools and wilderness programs then serving, nationwide, about 100,000 kids facing addiction or emotional or behavioral problems. One of CRC's first acquisitions under Bain ownership was the Aspen Education Group. Founded in 1998 with about six schools, Aspen Education had expanded to 30 troubled-teen and weight-loss programs by 2006, including Youth Care of Utah. With Bain's backing, CRC purchased Aspen for nearly $300 million in the fall of 2006. Less than a year later, Brendan Blum was dead. At the time of the CRC acquisition, Aspen already had a history of abuse allegations, including at least three lawsuits, and two known patient deaths, one by suicide. Featured on "Dr. Phil", it grew out of schools inspired by the "tough-love" behavior-modification approach of the discredited Synanon program, which was eventually exposed as a cult. By 2006, Aspen was facing a wrongful death lawsuit, later settled, over an incident in 2004 in which a 14-year-old boy, Matthew Meyer, perished from heat stroke just eight days into his stay at its Lone Star Expeditions wilderness camp in Texas. Nevertheless, less than a year after Meyer died, NBC's "Dateline" extolled Lone Star as part of a puff piece on Aspen's success with overweight teens. As an Aspen press release boasted, the show told how a rebellious student who did a stint at Lone Star "returned a month later with a new outlook on life." In October 2006, just nine months before Brendan Blum died and as Bain's deal to purchase Aspen Education was being finalized, CRC received a far less upbeat assessment of Aspen's services. Following some phone conversations, family therapist Elisabeth Feldman walked into CRC's Cupertino, Calif., headquarters to see Dr. Thomas Brady, a psychiatrist then serving as CRC's chief medical officer, in order to confront him about a host of issues at Youth Care. She had stumbled upon the problems while trying to help her son's former girlfriend, a teenage girl who had suffered what Feldman called "gross mistreatment" at Youth Care. Of particular concern to Feldman was a three-month delay before Youth Care hired a psychiatrist to assess the young woman's deep depression and a failure to treat her Lyme disease. Feldman's ultimately unsuccessful crusade to get the woman released had led her to seek the services of a Salt Lake City lawyer, Thomas Burton, who had settled two lawsuits against Aspen Education for fraud, neglect and abuse. Feldman had been part of Brady's professional referral network for years, but this visit wasn't congenial. Feldman presented Brady with a 100-page sheaf of legal and corporate documents — including her affidavit describing "brutish punishment and isolation" at Youth Care — about Aspen Education programs in order to help support her charges of abusive treatment and neglect. These claims included reportedly covering up the alleged sexual assault of a female student by an Aspen employee at Turn-About Ranch in Utah; the girl was later duct-taped and restrained by staff, a former employee, Toni Thayer, told Feldman, after writing complaints about abusive staff conduct to management, state regulators and the Garfield County sheriff in 2004 — but no sanctions followed. (Subsequently, a lawsuit filed in June 2012 charged that staffers at the ranch engaged in the "torture" of a 15-year-old girl in 2005.) According to Feldman, Brady said he wasn't aware of any problems at Youth Care or Aspen Education and sought to mollify her about Bain's pending purchase of Aspen: "I have to trust that Bain did their due diligence," she recalls him saying. Dr. Brady confirmed, by email, that he spoke on the phone and met with Feldman, but said he has "no recollection" of making those remarks. And he insists that the documents she brought didn't support her claims of mistreatment. Even so, he says he took her concerns seriously and that CRC and Aspen conducted a thorough review. "I came to the conclusion," he said, "there was no merit to the accusations." He remained as CRC's medical director until May 2009 and said that although he encountered a few "untoward event" cases at Aspen during his time there, he saw no "pattern" of unsafe care. At any rate, Bain's purchase of Aspen Education went ahead smoothly. When, months later, Feldman learned about Blum's death, she was horrified to realize her warnings had had no effect. "For Bain and the big guys, nobody cared," she says. "It was all about the money." Questionable deaths When he died, Brendan Blum's was the first publicly reported death due to apparent neglect in CRC's 12-year history. But in the six years since Bain Capital acquired the company, there have been at least five more seemingly preventable deaths of patients at CRC's residential programs. Since the Bain takeover, critics and former employees charge that corporate attitudes have too often emphasized cutting costs and limiting public scrutiny at the expense of safety and quality of care. These tendencies appear to have produced risky, potentially life-threatening practices — only a handful of which have drawn public attention. Several lawsuits have been filed against CRC over mistreatment of its clients, but the company has never acknowledged any wrongdoing and has kept confidential any damage payments arising from legal settlements. CRC is a significant player in the scandal-prone, decentralized field of residential teen treatment that has more than 1,000 scattered facilities; the firm has nearly 36 therapeutic schools, wilderness sites and weight-loss programs catering to youth. The latest lawsuit over CRC's current practices was filed in January against CRC's prestigious $40,000-a-month Sierra Tucson drug treatment center in Arizona, for the allegedly poor monitoring and treatment of what the lawsuit says was an obviously suicidal 71-year-old patient, Dr. Edward Litwack; the center's own staff had assessed him as a "high" risk for suicide, requiring one-on-one supervision. He was reported missing last August, but it took two weeks for the staff to find his corpse on the grounds. Last October, after an investigation by Arizona regulators following Litwack's disappearance found 42 major violations, the center was put on one-year probation. The regulators found that ill-trained monitors spent too much time patrolling on golf carts rather than actually interacting with patients. CRC had purchased Sierra Tucson in 2005 for $130 million as its "crown jewel" shortly before plans to sell CRC to Bain were announced. "Then the business side started controlling admissions," says a former employee, who worked at Sierra Tucson before and after the CRC acquisition. "It doesn't take a brain scientist to realize that if you reduce staff [in key programs] and add sicker patients, there's going to be trouble." With the addition of a new 44-bed lodge in 2007, staff at Sierra Tucson was stretched thin, former staffers say; by 2009, a state licensing office fined the facility for having insufficient staff to prevent high-risk patients from wandering off. Other incidents suggest a corporate culture that often downplayed safety and quality of care. In 2010, at least two drug treatment patients died at the overcrowded New Life Lodge in Burns, Tenn., according to wrongful death lawsuits and an investigative series in the Tennessean. According to an account in the Tennessean, based on public records and interviews with people at New Life Lodge, one of the patients, a 29-year-old mother named Lindsey Poteet, had come down with pneumonia and was drifting into unconsciousness when she was driven in a private van to a Nashville hospital 30 miles away. The journey was undertaken on orders of the facility's medical director, although another hospital lay just eight miles down the road. Poteet stopped breathing en route and died the next day in Nashville. The other, Patrick Bryant, died on his 20th birthday just four days after being admitted to New Life; his mother alleges that he'd been misprescribed several medications and had been unresponsive for hours before being discovered by staff. A third patient, 18-year-old Savon Kinney, died last October just days after leaving New Life in a state of disorientation, his sister told the newspaper; his death sparked a state investigation. After the Tennessean series appeared last summer and fall, the state's Department of Mental Health froze all new admissions to the facility. (It was finally allowed to admit a smaller number of new patients in early April.) One former patient, Malca Fox, who had befriended Poteet at New Life, told me that she called state Medicaid (also known as TennCare), the facility's primary funder, to complain that the facility was far too overcrowded for personalized care. "All they [New Life] care about is making money," she said. In 2009, the state of Oregon forced the closing of two teen programs run by Aspen Education. State investigators found nine cases of abuse and neglect at Mount Bachelor Academy in central Oregon, including incidents of "sexualized role play," in which young patients were allegedly forced to do lap dances during therapy sessions. After Mount Bachelor and its director threatened costly lawsuits, the state's Department of Human Services softened the language of the report; CRC claims the allegations were false (while also fighting $37 million in abuse lawsuits over the school's pre-CRC practices). Even so, DHS "stands by our findings," a spokesman says of the 2009 report. That same year, at SageWalk Wilderness School in Hampton, Ore., 16-year-old Sergey Blashchishen died of heatstroke on his very first school hike, in an incident eerily reminiscent of Matthew Meyer's 2004 death in Texas. One morning in August, Blashchishen suited up in an 80-pound backpack; by afternoon, the heat had topped 80 degrees, and he was soon staggering, drifting off the trail, and complaining of dizziness and exhaustion. Staffers contended he was faking his symptoms and failed to call 911 until his pulse had stopped; that death is the focus of a negligent homicide investigation. To CRC officials, the lawsuits, criminal investigations and state sanctions all come in response to isolated events, aren't "systemic," and shouldn't reflect on the dedication and quality of a large company serving 30,000 trouble-prone teens and substance abusers each day. The company declined to respond to a memo outlining allegations made by alumni, parents and former employees about questionable practices at specific programs, citing a legal requirement to protect patient confidentiality. But a public relations consultant, Robert Weiner, who works closely with CRC and its most prominent board member, Gen. Barry McCaffrey, President Bill Clinton's drug czar, did respond in general terms in a phone interview: "The people you cited can whine all they want, but that's just a bunch of specifics we can't talk about compared to 30,000 people a day we're making better lives for." "In a human-run company there will be human errors in some cases," he added. "But in other cases, it's garbage." In a December 2011 press release in response to the Tennessean series, CRC vice president Jonathan Ciampi disputed criticism of CRC over the reported deaths, citing positive surveys of parents and clients, and certification by government regulators and accrediting agencies. "Safety and quality are our highest priorities." And in a conference call last fall for investors, CRC's new CEO, Andrew Eckert, discounted the developments in Tennessee as merely "unwelcomed bumps in the road." In fact, later in the call he claimed that "CRC is in the process of staking its ground as the definitive leader in clinical excellence." Camp recovery: More patients, more revenue Such claims of excellence do not seem to have pierced the canopy of the Santa Cruz redwoods, home to Camp Recovery, the first drug treatment facility CRC purchased in the mid-'90s. Nestled on 25 hilly acres in Scotts Valley, Calif., Camp Recovery is an idyllic setting for recovery for as many as 70 adults and teens at a time. Yet after Bain purchased CRC in 2006, according to former employees, safety and quality eroded, while state agencies periodically reported increasingly more troublesome findings after 2006 regarding conditions at the camp. "It got progressively worse," says Tom Corral, a counselor who was employed there before CRC bought Camp Recovery and worked there on occasion after the Bain takeover. Meanwhile, prices were steadily jacked up from about $6,000 a month to as high as $18,000. Under Bain ownership, Corral says, "they've been under a lot of pressure to cut costs, and they've been squeezed for profit." What most alarmed Corral and other former employees was that ever sicker and more mentally disturbed patients kept being admitted. The governing view, Corral recalls, was, "You've got to keep them at all costs." Camp Recovery is registered with the state as a nonmedical facility.

and so patients needing intensive medical or psychiatric care should be referred elsewhere. But such restrictions soon collapsed, say former staffers, in a drive for profits. “Certified nurses were reprimanded when we complained to the intake office,” says one former nurse. “When I didn’t want to admit a person who was falling down drunk, they wrote me up.” Former staffers say that Camp Recovery’s business staff even began to pressure nurses to knowingly admit patients with potentially deadly MRSA infections, which, the CDC warns, may require treatment by an infectious disease specialist. Shawn Botoroff, a former clinical technician who left Camp Recovery last year, said that when she started in 2007, nurses were primarily responsible for determining who was stable enough for admission. But they were soon overridden by camp administrators seeking to rope in more clients, Botoroff and other former workers say. To Denise Murphy, a former director of the camp’s adolescent unit, the decline became especially noticeable in 2008, when a new executive director took over, Bobby Stearns, hand-picked by CRC, who was determined, according to complaints to the NLRB, to crush a unionization drive and keep down costs. “It was so dangerous there, they’re lucky they didn’t get sued,” Murphy says. According to complaints made by staff at the time to the now-reorganized California Department of Alcohol and Drug Programs, CRC cut back on everything from drug-testing kits to staffing levels. In a 2009 interview, Stearns said any staff cuts were due to declining patient numbers. But eventually, the Department of Social Services, which has oversight over the facility’s 17-bed adolescent unit, confirmed that caseloads had soared and kids ran wild at night. The agency demanded corrective actions — improvements that former employees say were in large part ultimately abandoned. Equally troubling, former staffers report a pattern that echoes the events surrounding the deaths of Brendan Blum and Lindsey Poteet at other CRC facilities: When patients face a medical crisis, ambulances are usually not summoned. Instead, “techs,” whose emergency training, the former employees say, is generally limited to a two-hour CPR course, are ordered by supervisors to use a van lacking medical equipment to drive patients to the emergency room in nearby Santa Cruz. The tactic, say former employees, helps prevent the facility from being flagged in the 911 system, risking unwelcome attention from state or local officials. The administrative resistance to calling 911 was so pronounced that when one overmedicated, mentally disturbed patient fled the facility in hysterics one summer day in 2008, she was left to lie on the road outside the gate, screaming for help before collapsing into convulsions. One camp executive told staff on duty at the time, “Leave her alone. We don’t want to make a scene,” according to Botoroff and other former staffers. It was left to neighbors to call 911. Nevertheless, the camp still makes more emergency calls than any comparable facility in the Santa Cruz area, according to addition and ER doctors who reviewed 911 log data we obtained — perhaps a measure of just how ill many of the patients are at this nonmedical facility. That log showed 158 calls between January 2008 and August 2011. “That’s a lot of calls,” a local government official says. “It ought to be investigated.” Logged 911 calls represent only a small portion of total ER visits, the official observes, because it doesn’t account for people who arrive by other means. Camp Recovery’s drive for secrecy was especially pronounced when it came to potential instances of sexual misconduct, violence or drug use among the adolescents in treatment, former staffers say. “There were several situations in which we were told by the director of the adolescent unit, per [current executive director] James Bailey, not to call 911,” says Botoroff. Former staffers speak of wild nighttime teen assaults on weaker youth or even staff, and recount hushed-up incidents of underage girls having sex with adult male patients at their cabins. “They were trading favors for cigarettes and alcohol,” Botoroff says of one such incident she encountered. In almost all such cases of on-site crime, according to an employee complaint to state regulators, the orders handed down from Stearns, the former executive director, in 2009 were clear: “We don’t contact the police.” State investigators were rarely able to confirm the most serious employee allegations on the few occasions when they bothered to investigate, a review of state reports shows. But this could be due to efforts by managers to cover their tracks. Trevor Botoroff, a former Camp Recovery counselor and Shawn’s husband, says that sometimes managers would rewrite log sheets to make them seem more benign. At other times, supervisors would simply remove them. Murphy, the camp’s former adolescent director, came to see CRC as “the slumlords of treatment.” Other evasions are commonplace at Camp Recovery. The camp openly advertises that it offers prescription-based medical detox, though it is not licensed as a medical facility to do so. A failure of oversight But such complaints against CRC have rarely led to consequences for either their drug treatment or youth programs. The troubled teen industry in particular is a regulatory Wild West, with some states lacking any licensing system at all for these residential programs. Even some states that do license, such as Utah, appear unable to guarantee patient safety: about 10 young people are known to have died since 1990 while attending Utah residential and wilderness programs. Regulators often shield the teen care industry from genuine scrutiny, according to investigations by the GAO, congressional hearings in 2007 and 2008, and reports by such mental health advocates as the Bazelon Center and Mental Health America. In California, regulation of drug treatment facilities appears especially ineffective. California’s Department of Alcohol and Drug Programs, for example, has never investigated the deaths of nearly 200 patients over five years at CRC’s 12 outpatient methadone clinics. Mostly likely, addiction experts say, the clients’ rampant substance abuse is the culprit, not sloppy practices at CRC, but that supposition has not been rigorously tested. In fact, Pennsylvania regulators cited two of CRC’s methadone clinics for failing to properly screen patients for drugs or narcotic use, a potentially deadly oversight. Weiner, the CRC spokesperson, said that CRC itself would doubtless look into any client deaths: “At least somebody’s going to wonder why they didn’t come in for their treatment the next day.” “The programs have experienced the reality that there are no consequences if anyone dies,” says a knowledgeable ex-government official about California’s drug programs, including CRC’s methadone clinics, which have become the chain’s cash cow. With nearly 27,000 daily clients nationwide at 54 outpatient clinics, CRC founder Barry Karlin was dubbed by Treatment magazine “America’s Methadone King.” Loose oversight seems to have been critical in enabling CRC to flourish. It’s hard to imagine, in particular, that without the scandalously weak monitoring of the teen treatment industry CRC’s Aspen division would be able to continue its harshly regimented, unproven behavior-modification methods and dicey emergency protocols. “Without regulations and enforcement, this profitable industry will continue to have actors that present unacceptable risks to the children they serve,” U.S. Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., said last year when introducing a federal oversight bill. A culture of abuse and neglect? This apparent lack of oversight in the teen industry, combined with a widespread view by providers that their charges are manipulative troublemakers, has allowed a toxic culture of psychological abuse and medical neglect to prevail, according to parents, alumni and federal officials. As Greg Kutz, a GAO investigator, said in testimony about the industry in general before Congress, “It seemed that the only way program managers would believe they [the students] were not faking it is if they stopped breathing or did not have a pulse.” That culture is visible even at Aspen’s most upscale residential programs, such as Island View in suburban Syracuse, Utah. One former student there, Colleen Davidson, now 20, who graduated from the program in 2009, recalls her alarm when she coughed up blood one morning as she stood at the bathroom sink. She says she was never allowed to see a doctor because by the time the nurse wandered by a few hours later, another student had rinsed the blood from the sink. “They assume you’re lying,” she says. For months, CRC denied me press access to any of its facilities, so I visited Island View last August posing as a father of a troubled girl. During that visit, director Laura Burt confirmed this skeptical stance toward potential medical emergencies. She said the nursing staff would see my daughter immediately in case of a medical crisis but would monitor her if they suspected fakery: “We’re not going to rush her to the hospital if she’s just saying that and there is nothing that says it.” In March 2008, Duane Bernard rescued his son Matthew, then 16, from another Aspen program, Adirondack Leadership Expedition in Saranac Lake, N.Y., after gleaming from one of his son’s monitored letters the brutal conditions he was enduring. Matthew, who was sent to Adirondack by his mother during a custody dispute, later told his father of food deprivation, neglect of serious medical complaints, and cruel taunting by instructors, including an incident when field staff pressured one kid to lick clean a urine-soaked cup. Medical neglect, Duane Bernard says, was ingrained in Adirondack’s get-tough “wilderness therapy.” Father and son say that during Matthew’s monthlong stay, he was required to go camping in subfreezing weather with too-thin clothing and sleeping gear, and he soon developed severe numbness and frostbite in his right foot. But he wasn’t taken to an urgent care facility until shortly before his release and required eight months of medical treatment afterward. Duane Bernard wrote in April 2008 to state officials alleging child abuse, enclosing Matthew’s written descriptions of his alleged maltreatment, but the state’s child protection agency said it had no jurisdiction over Adirondack. “They blew us off,” Bernard says. I heard Matthew’s experience echoed in conversation after conversation with Aspen alums, many of whom suffer nightmares and PTSD-like symptoms. Hannah Sangillo of Bethesda, Md., now 19, ended up at SUWS of the Carolinas, Aspen’s showcase wilderness program in North Carolina’s breathtaking Pisgah National Forest, in 2010. She now considers her 49-day summer stay “child abuse.” She recounts one of several instances of heat exhaustion she experienced during hours-long hikes designed to promote self-reliance and personal growth. Even on scorching, humid days, when temperatures soared into the mid-90s, groups of girls were saddled with 60-pound-plus packs, exceeding Girl Scout safety guidelines. “I was not able to walk straight,” she says of one incident. “I was stumbling and sweating profusely. I kept telling people I needed to stop and they said: ‘No, we can’t stop yet.’” She temporarily blacked out, only to be dragged to her feet by fellow campers and prodded along the trail at the urging of what SUWS calls its “highly trained” field instructors. By the end of the summer ordeal, nearly half of her small team of girls had collapsed during hikes, she says, without receiving any medical attention. Throughout their time there, neither Sangillo nor Hannah Spungen, a 2007 SUWS graduate, ever saw a single staffer actually help young residents with medical problems. These included everything from heroin withdrawal to all-night vomiting caused by drinking from fecal-contaminated streams during their daily hikes. Before I interviewed the two alumni, I met with Shawn Farrell, executive director of SUWS of the Carolinas, who insisted to me that emergency care is a top priority. (Subsequently, CRC declined to answer any questions about allegations of medical neglect at this SUWS program. Shawn Farrell, the executive director of SUWS of the Carolinas, insisted to me that emergency care is a top priority. He says field staff are instructed to radio in symptoms of any injuries or illness immediately to the base camp's field medic and, if needed, arrange transport to a hospital only eight miles away. "We want the doctors to do the diagnosis," not the outdoors staff, he says. But this policy appears to fall apart in the execution. In Spungen's experience, "There's no protocol in place to make sure it's safe for you." These incidents seem to illuminate an institutional culture that allowed Sergey Blashchishen to die in 2009 before ever receiving emergency medical aid. As one government investigator told me about the field instructors at SageWalk, where Blashchishen died, "They were highly trained, but the culture overrode that." The SageWalk Field Instructor Manual — like other Aspen manuals, vetted by CRC, according to a former CRC official — requires staff to go through a rigid "chain of command" before emergency help can be summoned. "There are inherent delays in a system like this," the investigator observed. CRC spokesman Weiner defended those procedures: "If there's a [medical] issue they should go to the top supervisors," he said. "I don't see how that's wrong to make sure you're doing the right thing. That's why they're not the boss." Yet Weiner also insisted that CRC is "aware of complaints and problems at Aspen and wants to make sure it has the best practices possible." To that end, he pointed to a recent initiative by CRC to ensure that all its teen programs are certified by two leading accrediting agencies, CARF (the Commission on Accreditation of Rehabilitation Facilities) and a body known as the Joint Commission, a 60-year-old industry-funded nonprofit that accredits thousands of health care programs in the United States. This is perhaps of scant comfort, given that members of Congress harshly criticized the Joint Commission in the wake of revelations of medical negligence at Walter Reed and other Joint Commission-accredited hospitals. Moreover, many facilities in one of the most notorious chains in the teen treatment field, Straight Inc., were approved by accrediting agencies, including the Joint Commission, until they shut down in the wake of lawsuits and state action. Some maintained their high ratings even after Straight Inc. and several of its spinoffs were hit by state investigations and at least 90 lawsuits alleging abuse. No turnaround from the turnaround experts. Despite the accumulating lawsuits, state investigations and even criminal inquiries, Bain Capital has yet to force a major shake-up in the culture or leadership of CRC. Aspen co-founder Elliot Sainer and CRC CEO Barry Karlin remained in their executive posts until they retired in 2007 and 2010, respectively. Both now serve on the CRC board of directors. Trina Packard, the executive in charge at Youth Care when Brendan Blum died, remains in her post to this day. Rather than instituting reforms, CRC seems to have responded to the series of lawsuits, in part, by requiring parents to sign elaborate contracts that feature sweeping "hold harmless" clauses even in the case of death. "This is a business-driven model: caveat emptor," one Utah Education Department official conceded on background. The contracts leave parents like Julie Scheule, a Wisconsin mom, with little recourse when they suspect deception or abuse. In 2007, she sent her daughter, then 15, to an Aspen facility in Utah, since closed, called Aspen Ranch. Aspen, she now charges, "abused parental trust, abused our bank account, and abused the kids in their care." She had a change of heart when she realized she was being hit with thousands of dollars in extra costs and flew to the ranch to remove her daughter. She recalls her daughter hugging her, trembling, and saying, "Please mama, take me out of here." Aspen uses what the teen treatment industry calls a "levels" model that grants more privileges and freedoms as students follow the rules, but imposes sanctions of varying severity on those who slip up or disobey. Punishments were more often psychological than physical. According to former students, emotionally brutal isolation punishments and peer-driven encounter "therapies" were commonly employed to break down resistance, especially at Island View. For Colleen Davidson, the former student there who coughed up blood, the worst part was when students were prodded to confront each other about real or fabricated transgressions in harsh encounter sessions. (In fact, she says, they were very similar to the group therapies cited in the June "torture" lawsuit against Turn-About Ranch.) The sessions were so terrifying that girls resorted to desperate measures to avoid attending, according to Davidson. She recalls that some girls choked themselves to induce fainting; one rubbed feces in her own eyes to cause an infection. "They break you down, but they don't really build you back up," she says of the Island View approach. "I have nightmares from it, and the memories are really awful." The no-data zone CRC declined to address any program-specific allegations. A company spokesperson, Kristen Hayes, instead summed up the company's approach in a written statement: "Our mission is to bring best practices to our industry in clinical excellence and quality patient care," she wrote by email. "Our comprehensive risk and compliance protocols help to ensure the delivery of the safest, proven treatment processes." CRC has said that its teen care programs are based on recognized and evidence-based programs, including one called contingency management. But critics suggest that the approach as actually applied by Aspen is inconsistent with contingency management — which emphasizes primarily positive reinforcement — while alumni and lawsuits filed over the years by parents of former teen patients describe instead a distorted atmosphere of terror and punishment that undercuts their possible utility. But there are virtually no independent, well-designed, peer-reviewed studies showing that any residential programs for troubled teens actually work — and none at all for the behavior-modification approaches employed by Aspen. Research funded by the Department of Justice and a literature review by the NIH both found, in the context of youth violence and crime prevention, that get-tough, discipline-based approaches generally do more harm than good. Shy of evidence, CRC's PR machine offers up testimonials from pleased parents and CRC-funded surveys of parents and students that report positive outcomes. Hayes put me in touch with one of these parents, the mother of a self-destructive, drug-abusing 15-year-old son whom she sent to Island View, the Aspen program Colleen Davidson attended, after other treatments had failed. "I didn't want to stand around and wait for my child to die," she says bluntly. Enrolling him in Aspen, she says, was the turning point. "I wish all kids were as lucky as my son," she says. And what can't be washed away by good PR can always be described as an unavoidable tragedy. At Youth Care of Utah, admissions counselor Claire Roberts offered up this sort of soft-focus gloss when she told me about the death of Brendan Blum. "It was very traumatizing for us," she said. Then she added philosophically, "These things happen." No plausible deniability Mitt Romney may not know the details of Brendan Blum's death, but it is difficult to imagine he wouldn't be aware of the troubles facing CRC and the residential teen-treatment industry as a whole. Not only are two of his major campaign donors, Connaughton and Barnes, on CRC's board, but two of his key advisors, Robert Lichfield and Mel Sembler, faced firestorms after allegations of abuse emerged regarding their own residential treatment chains. Meanwhile, Ann Romney has said that she would make helping troubled teens a top priority as first lady. And CRC is roaring ahead with an expanded sales force; Eckert, the CEO, told investors in May, "We now have [sales] coverage in every major metropolitan area in the United States." The Romney campaign did not respond to queries about his investment in CRC. But candidate Romney has been outspoken about his belief that for-profit health care companies can flourish only without onerous regulations. "I had the occasion of actually acquiring and trying to build health care businesses," he said during a primary debate last year. "I know something about it, and I believe markets work. And what's wrong with our health care system in America is that government is playing too heavy a role." Crystal Manganaro likely has a different view. She is the mother of Matthew Meyer, the 14-year-old who died at Aspen's Lone Star program in 2004, and has forcefully advocated for a federal crackdown on teen residential programs, including those run by Aspen. "For those of you who have not lived through losing a child due to negligence, you just cannot imagine what it feels like unless you have walked through it and deal with it every day of your life," she said in 2009. "My son is dead and there is nothing I can do about that, but I'll be damned if my son died in vain." This article was reported in partnership with The Investigative Fund at The Nation Institute, with generous additional support from the Fund for Investigative Journalism. Art Levine is a contributing editor at Washington Monthly. Source: http://www.salon.com/2012/07/18/dark_side_of_a_bain_success/print/

Source: ktla.com/news/landing/ktla-lapd-officers-boot-camp.0.6164232.story ktla.com Disturbing Video Surfaces From 'Boot Camp' Run by LAPD Officers KTLA News 4:45 PM PDT, July 31, 2012 LOS ANGELES (KTLA) -- Two LAPD officers are under investigation for running a weekend boot camp for troubled teens in Hollywood. The 'military-style' boot camp was run by two officers, Ismael Gonzalez and Alex Nava, both from the LAPD's Central Division, the Contra Costa Times reports. Based on footage posted to YouTube, it involved aggressive tactics, including screaming at and taunting the kids. Two online videos show drill instructors screaming at young participants, disparaging them, and, in at least one instance, challenging one child to a fight. Much of the footage shows the children struggling to complete sets of push-ups and other difficult endurance exercises. In one scene, a group of exhausted-looking girls calls out, "316, sir," as they count off another squat with their hands held behind their heads. Several kids are seen crying during the exercises or as instructors lean down into their faces to shout at them. In one scene, a male officer pushes a girl from her knees into push-up position. In another, a young boy is brought to tears by an expletive-filled tirade. Most of the kids appear to be pre-teens or teenagers, but at least one child in the video looks to be about six years old. The program and videos were first reported by the Los Angeles Daily News. Gonzales told the Contra Costa Times that the program was modeled after the LAPD's Juvenile Impact Program, which also uses military-style tactics to scare juveniles straight. They saw that the LAPD program was effective, so they decided to start their own, he said. Gonzalez and Nava called their class the Juvenile Intervention Program. It has been in operation since February. An LLC for the class was formed last November, while their website states the program is a registered non-profit, the Times reports. They reportedly charged $200 -- twice the cost of the LAPD's program. The class met once a week for 12 weeks, and parents also received counseling. The LAPD says it did not know about the program, and that it will investigate both the class and the conduct of the officers. Source: <http://www.ktla.com/news/landing/ktla-lapd-officers-boot-camp.0.506366.print.story> For more on this story, visit: <http://laist.com/2012/07/31/lapd-officers-under-fire-for-running-boot-camp.php>, http://blogs.laweekly.com/informer/2012/07/video_la_cops_rogue_hollywood_boot_camp.php, and http://www.contracostatimes.com/california/ci_21194988/internal-affairs-investigating-2-lapd-officers-running-military

Originally published Thursday, August 2, 2012 at 5:58 PM A former Seattle-area mental-health counselor who had worked with troubled youth was recently charged with allegedly possessing and dealing in child pornography. By Sara Jean Green Seattle Times staff reporter A former Seattle-area mental-health counselor who had worked with troubled youth was recently charged with possessing and dealing in child pornography. Malcolm Hayes McKay, 72, surrendered his health-care credentials in 2007 for a sexually explicit online chat with an adult who was posing as a teen. McKay was never charged with a crime in the earlier case, but he was fired from the Ruth Dykeman Children's Center and surrendered his license as a counselor in 2007 after he sent "naked, graphic" photos of himself three years earlier, according to the state Department of Health. McKay thought the person he was chatting with was a 14-year-old boy. In a 2005 letter to the Health Department, McKay said he had a "sexual addiction" that was "out of control," according to department records. The new case dates to September 2009, when the Seattle Police Department's Internet Crimes Against Children Unit launched an investigation of McKay after an employee at YouTube filed a complaint with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, according to charges filed by King County prosecutors. Detectives determined McKay uploaded seven videos to YouTube, six of which showed either teen or young boys engaged in sex with adult men, charging documents say. McKay's computers, external hard drives, a digital camera and miscellaneous storage media and thumb drives were seized from his Seattle apartment, according to the charges. Among the files found on the items seized under warrant were 152 files of a child who had previously been identified by law enforcement, the charges say. According to three of the file names and descriptions of the videos, it appears the boy was repeatedly videotaped while being sodomized by someone claiming to be his father. McKay was charged July 20 with possessing depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct and dealing in depictions of a minor engaged in sexually explicit conduct. Prosecutors received the case from Seattle police June 14, said Dan Donohoe, spokesman for King County Prosecutor Dan Satterberg. It's unclear why it took almost three years for the case to be forwarded for a charging decision. After pleading not guilty Thursday morning before Superior Court Judge Theresa Doyle, McKay was ordered to report to the King County Jail to be fingerprinted, court records show. He spent less than an hour in custody before being released, according to jail records. Before surrendering his credentials in 2007, McKay had a private practice, counseled troubled teens at the Ruth Dykeman Children's Center and worked as an educator for the Northwest AIDS Foundation. He was also listed as an educator for the Seattle Institute for Sex Therapy, Education and Research and was quoted several times in The Seattle Times on topics related to sexuality. The earlier investigation did not turn up any evidence of inappropriate behavior with his clients. Information from Seattle Times archives is included in this report. Sara Jean Green: 206-515-5654 or sjgreen@seattletimes.com Source: http://seattletimes.nwsources.com/html/localnews/2018836564_childporn03m.html

Judge: Lawsuit against Utah-based schools for troubled teens will be heard in St. George THE ASSOCIATED PRESS August 15, 2012 - 3:32 pm EDT ST. GEORGE, Utah — Abuse charges in a lawsuit against a Utah company that ran a network of domestic and international schools for troubled teens will be heard in St. George, a judge has ruled. Fifth District Judge James Shumate ruled Tuesday the case should remain in southern Utah because most of the companies named as defendants — and the people operating them — call Washington County home. An attorney representing more than 350 former students and family members had argued the case should be moved to Salt Lake City to avoid prejudice and travel costs for his clients. The students are from more than three dozen states, England and Canada and attended the residential school programs between the mid-1990s and mid-2000s. The suit claims the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools, based in St. George, subjected the students to systematic abuse. The students claim they were denied food and medical care, lived in filth and suffered extreme emotional, physical and sexual abuse. Named as defendants are World Wide and its three principals, Robert B. Lichfield of Toquerville, and Brent M. Facer and Ken Kay, both of St. George. Also named are a network of about 50 affiliated businesses and individuals, which the lawsuit claims were controlled by the organization's principals through either family relationships or written management agreements. The lawsuit renews claims in a 2006 lawsuit filed in Salt Lake City's U.S. District Court that was dismissed last year for jurisdictional reasons. Dallas-based attorney Windle Turley, who represents the families, argued Tuesday for moving the case back to Salt Lake City, saying it would be easier for plaintiffs to travel to the Salt Lake area than to St. George, the Spectrum of St. George reported. He also said a Washington County trial would be prejudicial in favor of the defense. A Salt Lake City judge sent the case to Washington County in June in response to a defense motion. Attorney Stewart Harman, who represents the defendants, argued it should remain in Washington County because that's where "the documents of this alleged conspiracy would be located," The Spectrum reported. Shumate sought to assure Turley that St. George has sufficient resources to handle the complex case. The judge is allowing different parties to participate in various court hearings via telephone. He scheduled an Oct. 2 status conference to ensure the case is progressing. The students' attorneys say World Wide has operated more than 20 schools in seven states and in Costa Rica, Jamaica, Mexico, Samoa and the Czech Republic. They allege in court records that many of the schools were open for only short periods because of their failure to comply with licensing and regulatory laws, because of abuse allegations and because the organization's "principals drained excessive funds off the top." In June 2011, a student who claims he attended Casa by the Sea filed a separate federal lawsuit against World Wide and its owners. Carl Brown Austin, 25, of Spokane, Wash., says he spent nearly two years in the Ensenada, Mexico, school and was a "virtual prisoner" in programs that meted out primitive punishment for hours on end. When Austin's lawsuit was filed, Facer told The Associated Press he had served on World Wide's board but that the organization had shut down because there was no longer a need for its programs. Asked why former students might bring such accusations, Facer said children brought to such schools have a history of misrepresenting the truth. ____ Information from: The Spectrum, <http://www.thespectrum.com> (Story distributed by The Associated Press) Source: <http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/17c8089ab06649b3a849a33d4392d5c2/UT--Boot-Camp-Lawsuit#share>

Defense seeks victims medical records in sex-abuse case <http://www.standard.net/stories/2012/08/30/defense-seeks-victims-medical-records-sex-abuse-case>
August 31, 2012 FARMINGTON — A woman who worked at a residential treatment program for juvenile sex offenders is accused of sexually abusing one of the residents. Becky Evans, 40, is charged with second-degree felony forcible sexual abuse. According to court documents, from October 2011 to December 2011, Evans "caused a minor male victim to touch her breasts and genitals, skin to skin." Evans was charged in March after Clearfield police concluded an investigation. She appeared in 2nd District Court on Thursday. A jury trial has been set to run Dec. 10 through Dec. 12. A hearing for oral arguments concerning a motion filed by defense attorney Mark Moffat is set for Oct. 11. Moffat is seeking the therapy, treatment and discipline records of the 16-year-old boy who is the victim. According to the motion, Evans worked at Youth Health Associates, a residential treatment program for juvenile sex offenders. The teen "had been committed to the YHA facility for treatment for sexual offenses he committed against a minor," according to the document. The defense claims in its motion that Evans was made aware of the boy's history of aggression, impulsive behavior and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and the behavior of the boy may have led to the accusations. According to the documents, Evans denies having the teen touch her sexually. Deputy Davis County Attorney Cristina Ortega filed a motion opposing the defense's request for the boy's records. According to the prosecutor's court documents, the records between a therapist and patient are privileged. It also says the defense has not shown any history of the teen "struggling with issues related to honesty and trustworthiness," so providing the therapy records is not justified. Brian Garlock, owner and clinical director of YHA, said Evans worked for the facility for about a year. "She actually quit when everything came out," Garlock said. Garlock said his company has facilities across the state, including the one in Clearfield, and employs 200 people full time. They are provided with training concerning boundaries, "because even small boundary violations send the wrong message and we will fire people." YHA came under scrutiny in 2006 after Raechele Elton, 22, was raped and stabbed to death by Robert Cameron Houston, who was 17 at the time. Elton was a counselor at the Clearfield facility, where Houston was a resident. Source: <http://www.standard.net/stories/2012/08/30/defense-seeks-victims-medical-records-sex-abuse-case>

Tuesday, August 28, 2012 Volusia Rehab Center Worker Arrested For Molesting Teen DAYTONA BEACH, Florida -- The Volusia County Sheriff's Office has arrested a former child specialist following accusations that he molested a teenage client at the residential addiction treatment program where the man worked. The defendant, 34-year-old Corey Hodges, was fired by Stewart-Marchman-Act Behavioral Healthcare after the allegations surfaced earlier this month. While no other criminal offenses were uncovered during the investigation, other teenage girls at the program told law enforcement that Hodges was a pervert who would stare at their bodies, make inappropriate sexual comments and purposely drop things so that he could watch them bend over to pick them up. Hodges is facing one charge each of lewd or lascivious molestation and lewd or lascivious conduct. The victim is a 15-year-old girl who is a client at the RAP, or Residential Adolescent Program run by Stewart-Marchman-Act. Hodges started working at the Daytona Beach facility in February. Earlier this month, the girl disclosed that Hodges had allegedly molested her two times last month while she was in her room at the RAP program. On both occasions, the victim said Hodges touched her breasts under her shirt and also rubbed her over her clothes and kissed her on the lips. Both times, she said that Hodges told her not to tell anyone about it. On a third occasion, the girl said that after she broke her finger playing football, Hodges drove her to the hospital. On the way back, the victim said that Hodges rubbed her thigh and told her to pull up her shorts, but she refused and nothing more happened. Investigators with the Volusia County Sheriff's Office's Sex Crimes Unit interviewed other teenage girls at the program. One, a 17-year-old, told investigators that Hodges would ask her for hugs, made comments about other girls' bodies and talked about beating up a boy she was dating because Hodges was jealous. An 18-year-girl said Hodges told her that she should be a stripper because she had a nice body. And a 14-year-old girl revealed to investigators that while going through heroin withdrawal, Hodges ordered her to get out of her bed even though she told him that she was naked. She got up and tried to cover herself with a blanket, but she said that Hodges ordered her to drop it. During questioning by investigators, Hodges -- who lives in Palm Coast, Florida -- denied the allegations. Surveillance video from inside the facility showed Hodges going into one of the girls' rooms, in violation of staff policies. He also violated their policies when he drove the girl to the hospital instead of having a female employee do it. On Monday, investigators with the Sheriff's Office's Sex Crimes Unit obtained an arrest warrant for Hodges. He was arrested Tuesday by the Flagler County Sheriff's Office and transported to the Volusia County Branch Jail in Daytona Beach, where he's being held on $60,000 bond. Any other victims or anyone with information about Hodges is asked to call the Sheriff's Office's Sex Crimes Unit at (386) 323-3574. Source: <http://news.brevardtimes.com/2012/08/volusia-rehab-center-worker-arrested.html>

David Chura, Teacher, Author, "I Don't Wish Nobody to Have a Life Like Mine: Tales of Kids in Adult Lockup" The Harm We Do: Kids in Solitary Confinement Posted: 09/07/2012 5:19 pm When most Americans hear the familiar constitutional phrase "cruel and unusual punishment" they can tell you what it means, at least to them. Hanging. Flogging. Chopping a hand off. Chain gangs. Putting juvenile offenders in solitary confinement is high on my list of "cruel and unusual punishment." What else do you call locking up fifteen, sixteen-year-olds, some even younger, in total isolation for 24 hours a day, in some cases for months at a time, never leaving their cells? "All an inmate's needs are met right here," was the way the warden of the adult county jail where I taught high school students proudly described it as he gave a group of professionals a tour of the new Special Housing Unit (SHU). It was true. Each cell had its own phone, shower, toilet, concrete bed, and adjacent small enclosed rec area. All an inmate's needs were met, except for the most essential: human contact of any kind. These conditions are intolerable for anyone and are replicated nationally in our jails. The United Nations Human Rights Council reported that the U.S. has more inmates in solitary confinement than any other democratic nation. But locking up a kid in those conditions, a kid with more energy than a playground can hold; whose body at times practically vibrates with urges that many more advantaged teens struggle to control; whose emotional and intellectual development is at best undernourished, can only be called "cruel and unusual." Human Rights Watch agrees. It's recently released "Against All Odds: Prison Conditions for Youth Offenders Serving Life Without Parole in the United States" documents the overuse of solitary confinement with minors and its devastating effects on them, effects heightened by the prospect of life without parole. The young people interviewed considered isolation a "profoundly difficult ordeal," leaving them with "thoughts of suicide, feelings of intense loneliness or depression." But it's not just "lifers" in solitary who experience those "profound effects." I saw it when I visited my jailhouse students who were locked up in "the cage," as they called it. They were there because corrections deemed them a threat to "safety and security." In too many cases, however, that "threat" came from their acting-out behaviors due to untreated mental health issues or ADHD. Still others were seen as "pains in the ass" who "just needed to be taught a lesson." It didn't take long for the new SHU to fall apart, the way everything else does in prison. Walls were scuffed and gouged from inmates being dragged in; cell door windows were smeared as guys jammed and angled their faces to see anything, anyone. The only thing shattering that intense sensory deprivation was the sound of inmates shouting to each other, howling through the thick walls, trying to connect with another human, announcing to the world, "I'm still alive." And when they weren't screaming, they were sleeping -- 15, 16 hours a day. My students deteriorated as well. Once in isolation they abandoned any sense of civilized behavior. Young guys who would come to class shaven and showered, smelling of Old Spice deodorant, in fresh county oranges, now reeked of unwashed bodies; their hair dirty and matted, faces fuzzed; their eyes caked and puffy from sleep. I would bang on the window until they woke up and lifted their heads from under the pillows and blankets they burrowed under against the cold. They'd shuffle over to the door and we'd squat on our own sides of the concrete and glass wall and talk through the meal tray slot. It was then that I'd be hit by their sour, foul breath as though they were slowly decaying from the inside out. Finally in 2009 the Department of Justice investigated these abuses. The DOJ reported that half of the inmates in the SHU were between 16 and 18, and that the average stay in isolation for juveniles was 365 days. As a result of these "extremely lengthy sentences," the mental health of these young people worsened significantly, aggravated "by the jail's failure" to provide routine treatment. Unfortunately, this is far from an isolated case. Abuses of minors in solitary are happening around the country. I don't know how many people get the irony involved here, but I do know that the kids I taught did, even though they never "got" irony in class: We lock children up in inhuman conditions in order to teach them how to act

human. Unfortunately, as studies have shown, inmates learn a far different lesson. When they leave isolation they are angrier, more distrustful, more cynical about ever getting justice, and more prone to violence. What could be a more "cruel and unusual punishment" than to confirm these young people's bedrock belief that America as it is now has no place for them other than behind bars? Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/david-chura/juvenile-offenders-solitary-confinement- b_1864770.html

A Terrifying Way to Discipline Children by prisonmovement Happening more and more at schools across the country... kids are being arrested for minor infraction of rules, restrained, hand cuffed, and placed in rooms all alone. Our 'challenged' children are often the targets-are your kids safe from this type of treatment? What would YOU do if your this happened to your child? By BILL [...] Read more of this post

No state oversight at Southeast mental-health facility Purchase Image Exterior of the Blue Sky Behavioral Health Clinic at 52 Federal Road in Danbury, Conn. / Terence Corcoran/The Journal News Written by Terence Corcoran Filed Under News Putnam County, New York Putnam Hospital Center SOUTHEAST — Two men who ran a residential mental-health treatment facility the state shut down last year for violating patients' rights have formed a new company at the same locations that apparently does not require state oversight. Life Assist opened in Southeast earlier this year after the New York State Office of Mental Health shut down SLS, or Supervised LifeStyles, for ignoring state regulations and repeatedly violating its patients' rights. Unlike its predecessor, Life Assist stresses on its website that it does not provide clinical or treatment services and that it is not a residential or group home. As such, it is not subject to state oversight. Life Assist, a for-profit company, does promise to partner its clients who have substance-abuse or mental-health issues with a "life coach," provide clinical services through affiliated companies and get them a furnished apartment — all for a monthly fee. Life Assist is part of Blue Sky Behavioral Health, a Connecticut-based company formed by a former SLS owner, Joseph J. Santoro, and its former chief operating officer, David J. Palmer. Palmer is listed as executive director of Life Assist on its website and is chief executive officer of Blue Sky Behavioral. Santoro is listed as an owner of Blue Sky in papers filed with Connecticut. In an application last year with the Connecticut Department of Health to open Blue Sky Behavioral, an outpatient facility in Danbury, Palmer stressed the work he had done at SLS but never mentioned the New York investigation that led to its closure in December. Last month, a Life Assist client died outside one of its buildings on Tonetta Lake Road in Southeast. Arsen Keleshian, 40, of Greenwich, Conn., became combative with staff members and police before disrobing. Police subdued Keleshian, but he later died at Putnam Hospital Center in Carmel. The incident involved some type of physical altercation, but police did not use pepper spray or a Taser on Keleshian, said Capt. William McNamara of the Putnam County Sheriff's Office, whose deputies responded with state troopers. For full story, visit source: <http://www.lohud.com/article/20120828/NEWS04/308270065/No-state-oversight-So>

Jerry Brown, California Governor, Signs SB 1172, Bill Banning Gay Conversion Therapy For Minors Posted: 09/30/2012 11:45 am EDT Updated: 09/30/2012 2:20 pm EDT Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/09/30/jerry-brown-sb-1172-gay-conversion-therapy-california_n_1926855.html 2,126 175 California Governor Jerry Brown on Saturday signed a historic bill that will protect lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) minors from "reparative" therapies administered by mental health professionals aimed at altering sexual orientation or gender identities and expressions. Senate Bill 1172, which the National Center for Lesbian Rights notes was co-sponsored by the NCLR, Equality California, Gaylesta, Courage Campaign, Lambda Legal, and Mental Health America of Northern California, and supported by dozens of organizations, is the first law of its kind in the United States and will become effective on January 1, 2013. "Conversion" or "reparative" therapies include a wide variety of techniques from counseling to shock therapy to -- in extreme cases -- exorcism, used in an attempt to "cure" individuals of their homosexual and transgender orientations and identities. However, in recent years, even those who once championed the idea that someone can convert to heterosexuality have admitted that viewpoint is flawed. In April, Dr. Robert Spitzer, author of a landmark 2001 study that claimed gay people could be alleviated of their homosexuality, admitted that, "In retrospect, [I have to admit I think the critiques \[of my study\] are largely correct](#)... The findings can be considered evidence for what those who have undergone ex-gay therapy say about it, but nothing more." As SFGate.com reported, Brown said, "This bill bans non-scientific 'therapies' that have driven young people to depression and suicide. These practices have no basis in science or medicine and they will now be relegated to the dustbin of quackery." In a press release, the Human Rights Campaign responded to Brown's signing of the bill: "We're grateful to Governor Brown for standing with California's children. LGBT youth will now be protected from a practice that has not only been debunked as junk science, but has been proven to have drastically negative effects on their well-being. We commend Governor Brown for putting children first, and call on all states to take California's lead on this issue. We will continue our fight against this kind of child abuse, which has been deemed harmful to children by all major mental health, medical, and child welfare organizations." According to HRC, over 50,000 people had signed a petition urging the governor to sign the bill in the past week.

State to 'colonel': License your military school or deal with a prosecutor By Alexandra Zayas, Times Staff Writer Published Wednesday, November 21, 2012 Alan Weierman, the self-titled colonel whose unaccredited military school has been allowed to house children for years despite abuse allegations, got an ultimatum from the state this week: Get licensed or close. The Department of Children and Families warned Weierman in a letter that he has 30 days to earn a state license or DCF will seek criminal prosecution and is prepared to ask a judge to permanently shut down his Southeastern Military Academy in Port St. Lucie. The action is part of a statewide crackdown on unlicensed children's homes prompted by a Tampa Bay Times investigation that found hundreds of children are being housed outside of state oversight. Most of these homes operate legally under a religious exemption. However, the Times found five homes operating with no state-recognized credentials, and state officials subsequently found three more. All have been asked to show proof that they are trying to get accredited. Weierman's academy, a home for boys that combines religion and military-style discipline, is the first to be given a 30-day warning of legal action. If the state seeks a court order, it would mark the first time it has tried to shut down any unaccredited children's home since 2009, when DCF unsuccessfully sued to close a boys' home run by Weierman at the time. If a judge sides with the state, about a dozen boys living at Southeastern Military Academy could be sent home to their parents, who are paying $28,600 in tuition for them to learn obedience and discipline. DCF officials said they may issue warning letters to more homes but are still investigating. Weierman said this week that he would consult his attorney about how to respond. "I know they have a job to do and am confident that once they see our evidence, they will accept the place we are in the process," Weierman told the Times in an email. "I am not opposed to licensure," he said. "But I also am not opposed to a criminal proceeding about this. I can just imagine the state attorney's face when he is presented with this case. Like all he has to do is prosecute unlicensed boarding schools." After his long, contentious relationship with DCF, it appears unlikely the department would grant him a license. The last time they did, more than a decade ago, it was a short-lived decision both sides soon came to regret. In 2000 alone, DCF responded to allegations six times and found credible evidence in four investigations, including cases involving asphyxiation and beatings. Weierman said the allegations were false. He said DCF workers were dishonest and unfair and complained that DCF calls allegations "verified" using a lower burden of proof than used by the courts. In 2001, on the day DCF was scheduled to present evidence to a judge to revoke his license, Weierman surrendered it. He soon earned accreditation through the Florida Association of Christian Child Caring Agencies, a nonprofit group empowered by state law to regulate religious children's homes that choose to avoid a state license. FACCCA accreditation would still be an option to save Weierman's school, if he can earn it within 30 days, but FACCCA discontinued his accreditation in 2004 because his home, once a shelter for kids of all ages, had evolved into a boot camp. Weierman has since operated his academy as a "boarding school." In Florida, boarding schools must register with the Department of Education. But the agency only keeps a list of the schools. It does not regulate or inspect them. Since the school left FACCCA in 2004, DCF has responded to 13 allegations of abuse and neglect at Weierman's group home. In six cases, investigators verified the incidents, which included physical and mental injuries, medical neglect, threatened harm, bizarre punishment and asphyxiation. In 2008, a runaway told police he had been shackled for 12 days, beaten, choked to unconsciousness and berated with racial slurs. DCF investigated and found that all 16 boys at the home had been mistreated, including some who said they had been bruised and bloodied. The department called parents to remove all the boys, but prosecutors declined to pursue charges. In 2009, the state sought a permanent injunction to keep Weierman from housing children, noting that he was not accredited as was required by law. But a judge declined the state's injunction request and said Weierman was making a "good faith effort" to get accredited. Weierman is still trying. He says the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools is expected to review his school in March. But as far as DCF is concerned, his time is up. Alexandra Zayas can be reached at azayas@tampabay.com or (813) 226-3354. Source: <http://www.tampabay.com/news/education/state-to-colonel-license-your-military-school-or-deal-with-a-prosecutor/1262771>

HEAL SUPPORTER CYNTHIA ORTIZ BEGINS WORKING WITH STATE SENATOR PHIL GRIEGO TO AMEND NEW MEXICO'S LAWS TO BETTER PROTECT CHILDREN FROM INSTITUTIONAL ABUSE IN JANUARY, 2013: Phil A. Griego (D-NM--State Senator) introduced legislation on

January 24th, 2013 to improve legal protections for victims of child abuse and institutional abuse. The bill was SB 252 and we hope it will be re-introduced next session. For more information on this legislation, visit: <http://www.nmlegis.gov/Sessions/13%20Regular/bills/senate/SB0252.pdf>

HEAL SUPPORTER CAROLINE MALLARY PETITIONED MASSACHUSETTS STATE LEGISLATORS TO AMEND LAWS TO BETTER PROTECT CHILDREN FROM INSTITUTIONAL ABUSE IN JANUARY, 2013: Katherine M. Clark (D-MA--State Senator) introduced legislation based on Mallary's petition in January, 2013. The bill is S. 46 and has been referred to the Committee on Children, Family, and Persons with Disabilities. For more information on this legislation, visit: <https://malegislature.gov/Bills/188/Senate/S46>

UN HUMAN RIGHTS COUNCIL: Report of the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, Juan E. Méndez
February 1st, 2013

Excerpt from Report Summary:

The present report focuses on certain forms of abuses in health-care settings that may cross a threshold of mistreatment that is tantamount to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. It identifies the policies that promote these practices and existing protection gaps. By illustrating some of these abusive practices in health-care settings, the report sheds light on often undetected forms of abusive practices that occur under the auspices of health-care policies, and emphasizes how certain treatments run afoul of the prohibition on torture and ill-treatment. It identifies the scope of State's obligations to regulate, control and supervise health-care practices with a view to preventing mistreatment under any pretext. The Special Rapporteur examines a number of the abusive practices commonly reported in health-care settings and describes how the torture and ill-treatment framework applies in this context. The examples of torture and ill-treatment in health settings discussed likely represent a small fraction of this global problem.

Source: http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/HRBodies/HRCouncil/RegularSession/Session22/A.HRC.22.53_English.pdf (If the report is not available at this link, request a copy and we will send it to you.)

SIA March 2013 Mark Levine

MARK LEVINE, HEAL ADVISOR, SPEAKING AT SURVIVORS OF INSTITUTIONAL ABUSE MARCH IN APRIL, 2013

HEAL CALIFORNIA, KENTUCKY, AND HEADQUARTERS' CHAPTERS PARTICIPATE IN NATIONAL MARCH AGAINST CHILD ABUSE ON APRIL 22ND, 2013. (See: <http://www.heal-online.org/mac2013.htm> for more information)

S. 833, EDUCATIONAL SUCCESS FOR CHILDREN AND YOUTH WITHOUT HOMES ACT OF 2013, INTRODUCED BY SEN. PATTY MURRAY (D-WA) (See: <https://www.govtrack.us/congress/bills/113/s833> for more information)

This bill has been submitted twice since 2009. The purpose is to keep children and youth in their communities and ensure that public schools are meeting the needs of all students regardless of income inequality or disability. HEAL supports this legislation and believes it will help put an end to the misuse of public funds in sending public school children out of their home states to fraudulent and abusive residential programs out of state.

HR 1893, KEEPING ALL STUDENTS SAFE ACT, INTRODUCED BY REP. GEORGE MILLER (D-CA) ON MAY 8TH, 2013 (See: <https://www.govtrack.us/congress/bills/113/hr1893> for more information)

This bill's purpose is to prevent and reduce the use of physical restraints and seclusion in schools. HEAL supports this legislation and believes it will help stop the abuse rampant in schools and programs for children and youth.

HR 1981, THE STOP CHILD ABUSE IN RESIDENTIAL PROGRAMS FOR TEENS ACT OF 2013, INTRODUCED BY REP. GEORGE MILLER (D-CA) ON MAY 15TH, 2013. (See: <https://www.govtrack.us/congress/bills/113/hr1981> for more information) This is the most recent submission of this legislation which dates back to 2005 (HR 1738). This legislation would place additional programs under the regulations of the US Department of Health and Human Services. Problems with this legislation include that it does not specifically address requiring faith-based programs for youth be covered/regulated and since many States hold those programs exempt from regulation, it is unlikely that faith-based programs will be covered. In addition, programs that are currently "regulated" by the US Department of Health and Human Services regularly fail to protect consumers from fraud and abuse and rely on third-party accreditation bodies (i.e. Joint Commission) to provide oversight. Those accrediting bodies then rely on self-assessment as the primary source for information regarding compliance. While HEAL supports additional regulations, we fear that passing a law such as this with no real teeth will simply pacify consumers into enrolling loved ones in fraudulent and abusive programs while State agencies pass the buck from one agency to another to avoid serious regulation of this out of control industry.

HEAL CONFIRMED THE FOLLOWING PROGRAMS TO BE CLOSED IN 2013:

Eckerd's E-Ma-Henwu in North Carolina

Camp Tracy Children's Home in Florida

Camas Ranch (WWASPS) in Montana

Cross Creek Programs (WWASPS) in Utah

Academy at Swift River (Aspen/CRC) in Massachusetts

Hope Home and Academy in Mississippi

Austin Sendero Recovery in Texas

Victory Christian Academy aka Lighthouse of Northwest Florida in Florida

For more information on these closures, see <http://www.beyondbusiness.net/youarenext.htm>

HEAL ILLINOIS LAUNCHES FIRST PETITION TO CHANGE ILLINOIS' LAWS TO BETTER PROTECT CHILDREN AND YOUTH FROM INSTITUTIONAL ABUSE: Petition launched on March 17th, 2014. Learn more about our State Action Campaigns at <http://www.heal-online.org/action2.htm> and sign the petition now at: http://petitions.moveon.org/sign/illinois-general-assembly?source=c.tw&r_by=10225086

HEAL PARTICIPATED IN NATIONWIDE MARCH AGAINST CHILD ABUSE: HEAL participated in the national March Against Child Abuse in Monroe, WA on April 5th, 2014. For photos and more regarding our support and participation in this event, click here.

Mom Calls Rehab Place a Private Prison By JONNY BONNER
April 7th, 2014

SALT LAKE CITY (CN) - A mother claims in court that her teenage daughter was taken from Texas by a human trafficker and locked up at a secret "private prison" in Utah, where she was made to perform "mindless tasks of blind obedience." Miriam Blank sued Bain Capital, Aspen Education Group, Aspen Institute of Behavioral Assessment, the Harris County Office of Human Resources and Risk Management, Guardians of Hope and two people, in Federal Court. Blank claims her 16-year-old daughter, H.N., was removed from the Lone Star State by lead defendant Jack Nuszen, N.H.'s father, after he tried to portray her as an unfit mother to their five children. Blank claims the move was intended to thwart her visitation rights and "to spite and torment" her. "Jack Nuszen has used the biased Harris County Family Court system to case Miriam Blank as an unfit mother to their five children," the lawsuit states. "Although he is guilty of physically abusing N.H., he has, by falsely obtained court orders and engaging a human trafficking service, removed H.N. from her school, where she was an outstanding student and well-adjusted young woman, and against her will and without her consent, forced her relocation from Texas to Utah, where she is confined by the defendant Aspen against her will and without her consent in one or the other of its locked down compounds. There, she is locked up for an indefinite time, having done nothing wrong or truant solely to deprive her of her freedom and cause extreme anxiety to Miriam Blank, her mother, as to her whereabouts and welfare." Blanks says her daughter is being held an undisclosed and possibly remote area, where successful escapes are rare. "H.N. had no hearing as to why she was taken away and locked up. There was no forum for complaint, for explanation, for appeal, or protest against the placement, either before, during, or after it occurred. The only option was to run away, but these private prisons are often located in remote areas and are closely guarded in any event. Successful runs are rare, and most often police retrieve the escapee," the 21-page complaint states. "Once confined, no contact with the outside world is allowed, except with the persons transferring custody to the prison. Contact with family members or friends is not allowed, and even contact with the family member or agency that transferred full and complete custody to the prison is monitored, and the inmate knows that any disparaging remark or complaint about the prison will be punished by a loss of all privileges earned, meaning having to start at the bottom all over again to rise from level to level by successfully completing mindless tasks of blind obedience." "The hapless minors will soon learn that they can be locked up for their entire minority as long as there is money to pay for it. The custody transfer agreements allow the private prisons to do anything they want to the minors and can enforce compliance with their demands by punishment, sometimes extremely harsh, medication at the handlers' discretion, forced disclosure of private deeds or thoughts, public confession of past deeds or thoughts, etc. "What the private prisons do to the minor children whom they have incarcerated, if done by their parents or custodians on the outside, would be swiftly prosecuted as child abuse and false imprisonment." Blank claims defendant Guardians of Hope - the alleged human trafficker - and operator and defendant Norma Willcockson removed N.H. from school and transported her across state lines. She claims that once inside the private prison, "These helpless children can be deprived of freedom, of contact, correspondence, and communication with family and friends, or anyone outside the compound; they can be deprived of legal counsel; of sleep, food, privacy, dignity, education; compensation for their labor; the right to refuse treatment or enforced medication; or the need of a second opinion regarding the propriety of the treatment forced upon them; of the right to grieve, to object, to recourse, or to appeal; Harris County made no investigation of the private prison where it allowed H.N. to be sent." Blank claims she has copies of bills that Aspen submitted to Nuszen for its services, but the residential treatment center has refused to provide any information about H.N. "The county and its agents either know or should know that Aspen and its co-defendants incarcerate and isolate minors for an indefinite period of time who have never been adjudicated as truant or violators, and throw them in with other minors who may have been highly truant and adjudicated as misdemeanants, or who may have various forms of mental illness, criminal records, or drug addictions," Blank claims. "The county and its agents know that the prefrontal cortex of H.N. is not fully developed and that its complicity in inflicting upon her undeserved gross and unfair punishment will have a permanent deleterious effect upon her mental and emotional development, and will at the very least, cause her to suffer into adulthood the ravages of post traumatic stress." Bain Capital purchased Aspen Education for $300 million in 2006. Analysts estimated that companies like Aspen had profit margins of 10 to 20 percent of revenue, The New York Times reported in 2005, according to Blank's lawsuit. Blank's attorney did not respond to inquiries by press time. In January, the companies were sued by parents who claimed Dr. Phil paid to have their teenage daughter locked up. Blank seeks an injunction and a writ demanding that N.H. appear before a court in Utah, plus punitive damage, for civil rights violations and negligence. She is represented by Thomas Burton.

Source: <http://www.courthousenews.com/2014/04/07/66859.htm>

LA-area boot camp instructor sentenced for abuse Published 6:55 pm, Monday, April 21, 2014 LOS ANGELES (AP) — A former instructor charged with abusing youngsters at a Southern California boot camp for troubled teens has been sentenced to 60 days in jail. Edgar Alvarado also was given 30 days of community labor Monday and forbidden to perform any counseling, training or care involving children. He pleaded no contest to felony child abuse. Prosecutors say Alvarado owned "Recon 180," a paramilitary-style camp for troubled children with headquarters in East Los Angeles and a training facility in the mountains. Prosecutors say youngsters there underwent grueling physical regimens and some teenagers claimed they were punched, slapped or stomped. Several were hospitalized. Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/crime/article/LA-area-boot-camp-instructor-sentenced-for-abuse-5419340.php>

The It Gets Better Project has launched a new campaign to put an end to conversion/reparative therapy and treatment (aka brainwashing/coercive thought reform to change sexual orientation). Please contact them to share your story and to get help stopping this abuse. Victims of Conversion/Reparative Treatment Speak Out Now—<http://www.itgetsbetter.org/page/s/endconversiontherapy?source=20140306email> (Announced: May 8th, 2014)

JODI HOBBS, SIA FOUNDER, WITH OPENING CEREMONY FOR SURVIVORS OF INSTITUTIONAL ABUSE CONVENTION IN MAY, 2014

(Special Note: HEAL does not endorse nor support OWN network or anyone affiliated with HARPO Productions due to the ongoing enrollment of children by HARPO Productions programs (i.e. Dr. Phil) in fraudulent and abusive programs. In addition, other HARPO shows have presented programs and referrers/program networks such as Hazelden on Rachael Ray. We encourage Dr. Strozier to educate Oprah regarding her programs' complacency and active support of institutional abuse. (It even happens at her own program in Africa, see: <http://abcnews.go.com/International/troubles-oprah-winfreys-school-south-africa/story?id=12950275>)

HEAL ADVISOR, MARK LEVINE, IS RUNNING FOR CONGRESS IN VIRGINIA! (2014) Please volunteer and/or contribute to this campaign! With Rep. George Miller (D-CA) retiring, we need a strong voice in Congress who will take a stand against institutional fraud and abuse. Learn more and sign up at www.levineforcongress.com.

By Jessica Trufant May 14, 2014 3:32PM Marshfield man accused of raping teen worked with troubled teens in Quincy A Marshfield man accused of plying an underage, teenage girl with alcohol before sexually assaulting her at his Ferry Street home was employed at a Quincy program for teens with drug and alcohol issues. PHOTO/ Marshfield Police Joseph Regan, 49, of 1181 Ferry St. MARSHFIELD -- A Marshfield man accused of plying an underage, teenage girl with alcohol before sexually assaulting her at his Ferry Street home was employed at a Quincy program for teens with drug and alcohol issues. Stephanie Paauwe, director of development for Volunteers of America Massachusetts, on Wednesday said Joseph Regan, 49, of 1181 Ferry St., has been fired from Rebound Adolescent Treatment Program, located on Moon Island Road in Quincy. "Joseph Regan is no longer an employee of the Rebound Program for failure to report for work," she said. "We've been notified of the allegations made against Mr. Regan and are fully cooperating with authorities. At this time, our thoughts and prayers are with the victim and her family." Regan is charged with reckless endangerment of a child, enticement of a child under the age of 16, indecent assault and battery on a child age 14 or older, statutory rape with an age difference of more than 10 years and selling or furnishing alcohol to person under the age of 21. Regan is being held without bail pending the outcome of a dangerousness hearing scheduled for Thursday in Plymouth District Court. Police say that Regan offered a teenage girl a ride before giving her alcohol and driving her around. Regan allegedly then brought her back to his home, where he sexually assaulted her. Paauwe said the victim is not a client of the Rebound Adolescent Treatment Program. She could not say how long Regan had worked there. Marshfield Police Lt. Arthur Shaw said police executed a search warrant of Regan's home and vehicle last Tuesday after the incident was reported to them earlier that day. Regan on Sunday showed up at Marshfield police station with his attorney to turn himself in to officers. Calling Regan a "dangerous predator," Shaw said police want to speak to anyone who may have been assaulted by him in the past or who has any information that adds to the case. "We encourage any other potential victims to come forward, as we do consider this individual to be a dangerous predator," Shaw said. Shaw said Regan is not currently a registered sex offender and does not have any sexual assault charges on his record. Anyone with information should contact Marshfield Police Detective Greg Davis at 781-834-5591 ex. 141. <http://www.patriotledger.com/article/20140514/NEWS/140518042>

CT task force spars with parents over billing fraud in family court By Anne Stevenson, Communities Digital News Family Life February 1, 2014 New Haven Court House CONNECTICUT, December 26, 2013 (Story received May 23rd, 2014) — Colleen Kerwick, Hector Morera, and Dan Lynch say they are fit Connecticut parents with open family court cases who are struggling to pay millions in questionable court ordered fees spanning several years. This year, dozens of CT parents like Kerwick and Morera complained to the legislature that the court has misused the court appointment process to force parents into business relationships with unvetted and inappropriate court affiliated vendors who are bankrupting them through questionable billing practices. Despite a 2010 State auditor's report showing millions misappropriated from the Judicial Branch's \$500 million annual budget, a legislative task force established to assess CT's broken family courts disagrees with parents who blame internal fraud for the court's issues and say an audit of the court's books and contracts is unnecessary. In November 2013, Kerwick, a CT based entertainment attorney, told me about her "high conflict" divorce from a well to do Connecticut businessman Kenneth Savino. Police reports show that Savino had previously been arrested for assaulting Kerwick, and in April 2012, Savino was arrested again on risk of injury to a minor charges in addition to charges that he interfered with police. Kerwick says that collectively, the family has spent about $610,000 on litigation costs. Although the guardian ad litem Karen Tarpey billed the family more than \$40,000 to represent the best interests and wishes of Kerwick's and Savino's child, billing records show she spent very little time actually meeting with the child. Controversial child psychologist Sidney Horowitz also billed the family $20,000 to perform a custody evaluation. Savino received custody of the child after both professionals failed to provide the court with information sufficient to end her custody. Kerwick says that all of the professionals appointed to her case failed to warn her that Horowitz was in business with Judicial Branch officials who oversaw her case, and that other litigants had raised troubling questions about Horowitz's controversial billing practices. When Kerwick's savings began to dry up and she raised questions about the integrity of the billing practices of the professionals appointed onto the case, Kerwick says suddenly her lawyers had marbles in their mouths and the ink in their pens began to dry up. "After paying $110K in attorney's fees, I learnt that being pro se is more effective," says Kerwick. "That said, I'm only 2 years in so I may lose yet by attrition. My ex can outspend me." Hector Morera's experience with the Connecticut courts was similar to Kerwick's. In 2012, Morera was facing outrageous legal bills when he lost custody of his children, despite the fact that he has no history of abuse or neglect. In October 2013, a court order severed Morera's access to his children after local media reports exposed the fact Morera was ordered to pay a \$30,000 GAL bill for services not clearly identified. The tab for all Morera's legal bills currently totals over $52,000. Dozens of parents like Morera and Kerwick say their life savings and retirement accounts have been wiped out by the family courts. They want an audit to assess the extent of internal fraud in the system. Task Force Conflicted Over Whether to Audit State Vendor Payments to Family Court Professionals. In 2013, the Connecticut legislature established the Task Force to Study Legal Disputes Involving the Care and Custody of Minor Children to evaluate complaints from dozens of affected parents. The task force will assess complaints that the family courts are not only mishandling cases, but also facilitating widespread taxpayer funded fraud. Affected parents say that unethical vendors appointed to their cases are padding the bills by creating unnecessary conflicts and forcing them to pay for evaluations and services the families do not need. Parents are forced to deal with these vendors, because they have immense power to influence the outcome of their family court cases. Now complaints are surfacing that task force leaders have serious conflicts of interest. Insiders say these questionable professionals may also be blocking the efforts of honest task force members to meaningfully investigate and address the fraud and waste of State resources. Pointing out discrepancies in the rates that both parents and the State are required to pay for identical services, task force member Jennifer Viranault contends that a financial audit is needed to determine how the family court and the Public Defender's office are funding guardian ad litem and expert OPD bankrolls on some 575 family court cases annually. However, task force co-chair Susan Cousineau has thus far opposed efforts to obtain such billing records from the State.

Long time court reform advocates Michael Nowacki and Cheryl Martone have also raised concerns that none of the task force's members are parents who have experienced the family court's dysfunction first hand. They also say Connecticut legislators have appointed several family court industry officials who are affiliated with the Association of Family and Conciliation Courts (AFCC). Both Nowacki and Martone say it is a conflict of interest for AFCC members to oversee the task force charged with solving problems in the family courts created by the same questionable Judicial Branch vendor's programs and members. AFCC affiliated task force members include attorney Sharon Dornfeld, Justine Rakich Kelly of the Children's Law Center, and Judicial Branch administrator Joseph DiTunno who has helped oversee the court's problematic grant programs and operations for over a decade. Task force co-chair Susan Cousineau co-founded the AFCC's CT chapter with several of the judges whose decisions have been recently called into question by parents referenced in this article. According to an article published in Communities Digital News, the Association of Family and Conciliation Courts (AFCC) and its CT chapter are Judicial Branch vendors founded and operated by the CT family court's own salaried State employees. Questions have arisen as to why the Judicial Branch paid the AFCC to perform many functions in the family courts when the organization's members and directors are the same court employees who already receive a State salary to perform the same essential services. The Washington Times story focused on the AFCC's troubling past with the authorities and the organization's role in dozens of CT cases where parents were bankrupted by questionable bills. According to the IRS and various state offices, multiple AFCC chapters across the country have been repeatedly shut down by the IRS and authorities for violations of various laws and regulations. Since the Washington Times Communities story was published in May 2013, there has been no indication from law enforcement that they are investigating AFCC's activities. Although the corporation's sub regulatory activities in CT remain under investigation by the Secretary of State, the Secretary's office claims it has no duty or intention to report to law enforcement any information regarding the outcome of their investigation. Prior State Audits Uncover Widespread Mismanagement of Judicial Branch Resources, Lack of Communication With Law Enforcement This was not the first time State authorities had questioned the Judicial Branch's book keeping without filing a criminal case. In 2010, the Connecticut State Auditor released a report which detailed how the Judicial Branch's "lack of internal controls" resulted in severe mismanagement of the agency's $200m budget and internal administrative operations. Auditors also identified tens of millions intended to reach the State's most at risk families through Judicial Branch vendors which remained missing or improperly accounted for. However, Auditors failed to refer their findings to law enforcement to determine whether criminal activity had played any role in the misappropriations. The Connecticut State auditor confirmed in writing that their office chose not to report to law enforcement any of the "discrepancies" or evidence of possible fraud and criminal activities discovered during the course of their review of the Judicial Branch. The auditor wrote that he determined that his office had no duty to report such findings because it went beyond stated scope of the audit: "Our audit was focused on the Judicial Branch's lack of internal control, and therefore there was no follow up made with law enforcement." Connecticut's Office of the Chief Public Defender has also been the subject of several scathing State audits which detailed similar widespread mismanagement of taxpayer resources. Each year, OPD oversees the representation of thousands of indigent defendants in criminal and child welfare cases, as well as bankrolls the attorneys and experts appointed onto them. According to their annual report, OPD also financed more than 575 GAL's appointed onto family court cases. At a September 2013 Connecticut Freedom of Information Act Commission hearing, the OPD disclosed the following facts at the hearing: (1) OPD has not consistently kept an accurate tally of payments made to court appointed professionals, (2) OPD and the Judicial Branch do not always formally vet such contractors or require competitive bidding or consumer protection contracts to obtain such [State sponsored] appointments in the family courts, (3) OPD often pays some of the contractors appointed onto cases at rates that are several times the legislatively mandated rate for the same professional services, and (4) OPD will not open their books to disclose how much money is spent or allow the public to review the administrative billing records for its office operations. Despite these revelations, task force co-chair Tom Weissmuller says the State's bankrolling of GAL is done at reasonable State rates of about $50 per hour with a cap of $500 per case. While Weissmuller does sympathize with the complaints of parents about the GAL system as a whole, he notes that the task force is unable to conduct such an audit because no mechanism exists which would allow the task force to audit or assess privately bankrolled professionals. Paul Boyne, a CT father whose rights were taken away after he questioned the integrity of the billing statements submitted by the taxpayer funded professionals appointed onto his family court case, disagrees with Weissmuller. Boyne says that an audit of OPD's books to document allegations of billing fraud is exactly what is needed. Yet instead of auditing the books, Boyne says some task force members are blaming victimized parents for the State's mismanagement of its' own multi-billion dollar family court industry. Susan Skipp, another CT parent who says she was driven into bankruptcy and had her parental rights effectively severed after she raised concerns that her family had been targeted by a family court billing fraud scam, also says an audit of the Judicial Branch's books is needed to restore public confidence in the agency's activities. "If the Judicial Branch were a for-profit corporation, the board of directors would start 'fixing' it by conducting a financial audit of the company's book keeping records to see where all their money is going" says Skipp. "It does not make sense for members to block internal efforts to obtain financial records that document the financial dealings between problematic vendors and the State." Yet according to task force insiders, this is exactly the approach that the Legislature and the Judicial Branch appear to have taken. Skipp says that if the purpose of the task force was to address parents complaints about billing scams in the family courts, "perhaps the task force should start by ending the PR campaign blaming victimized parents for the State's own shoddy work and mismanagement of the Judicial Branch." "I just want to spend time with my kids" says Skipp. "Why does the court have to make this so difficult?" Read more at <http://www.commdiginews.com/life/ct-task-force-spars-with-parents-over-billing-fraud-in-family-court-6410/#JIG3IkImhVP6es1.99>

Sex abuse alleged at Utah youth home Courts » September trial set for Spanish Fork youth home employee. The Salt Lake Tribune First Published May 29 2014 04:28 pm Last Updated May 29 2014 04:32 pm A September trial date has been set for a man accused of sexually abusing two 14-year-old girls at a group home for troubled teens in Spanish Fork. Charges filed in 4th District Court allege that Wade Russell, 60, committed the crimes while employed at Extended Family Services. One girl said that on Nov. 3, 2013, her third night at EFS, Russell went into her room, lay down next to her bed and fondled her over her clothing, according to charging documents. She said she knew of another girl who also had been abused. Security camera footage from that time shows Russell's feet "sticking out of the doorway as if he is lying down," court documents claim. The girl's roommate confirmed that Russell was lying close to the victim, prosecutors say. The other victim said Russell sexually abused her on multiple occasions after she arrived at EFS in June 2013. She said that on Nov. 2, Russell asked her to join him in the laundry room because he could turn off the lights and escape the security cameras. Video from outside the laundry room allegedly shows Russell entering the laundry room and turning off the lights before the girl followed him inside. She claimed that Russell molested her then, and later the same day in her room. The second victim said Russell also used his cell phone to show her pornography. A job evaluation for Russell by EFS in August shows he was told not to have "any contact with female residents alone or out of the view of the camera," and that he was told to stop "hugging the young girls," according to charges. Charging documents do not indicate why those instructions were given. Russell denied to police touching either of the girls sexually and said the events recorded on camera amounted only to poor judgment on his part. When asked for his cell phone to search its browser history, he said he lost the phone, police reported. Russell is charged with three counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child, and one count each of forcible sodomy, sodomy of a child and attempted rape of a child, all first-degree felonies; and seven counts of second-degree felony forcible sexual abuse; and two counts of third-degree felony dealing in material harmful to a minor.

Source: <http://m.sltrib.com/sltrib/mobile3/58004247-219/russell-abuse-girl-camera.html.csp>

What happens when you introduce troubled teens to theatre Posted on: 11:31 am, May 27, 2014, by Sarah J. Clark Share this: Facebook Twitter Pinterest Google LinkedIn Email MANHATTAN, N.Y. — "I wish I could take it back. Actually, no. I don't wish I could take it back because what happens to me afterwards is one of the best things that happened to me in my entire life," Christopher Thompson said. Thompson is talking about an altercation he had at school. He hit a fellow student in the face with a lock. The student went to the hospital, received stitches and pressed charges. Thompson's life has never been the same. He's now a changed man with the help of Stargate Theatre Company. It was launched in 2013 by the Manhattan Theatre Club. It employed seven court-involved young men to write and perform a play. "I see kids whose confidence is built, whose ability to express themselves is better than when they came in," Judy Tate, an artistic director with Stargate. Tate is actually a four-time Emmy Award-winning playwright. For more than 10 years Tate has worked with troubled youth. "One of the reasons why I feel so dedicated to these young men is maybe they come from areas that have been left behind," she said. Youth that have participated in the program admit it's a completely different environment for them. "When I first walked in, I was shy," Thompson said. "I just didn't feel comfortable. I felt out of my skin. And I was like, 'Aghhh, this is awful, why am I here? I'm not a talker! But I need the money, so why not stay?'" Tate said at first many of the young men who come in are wary of any type of authority figure. "And here I am putting them in this situation and we're asking them to play," she said. "Gradually, over the course of time, their shoulders start to go down and their backs start to straighten up. Sometimes you start to see a smile where sometimes you might not have seen a smile before. Stargate had its first public performance in August 2013. "When we perform? Oh, my God, it's like heroine. It's like the greatest drug ever," Thompson said. The young men aren't after fame or fortune. They perform because the love it. "Even if people would have said, 'Wow, you guys are awful,' we'd be like, 'We did it and you didn't. You're just mad,'" Thompson said. "I really enjoy performing. I love it." For more information about Stargate Theatre Company, visit their website. Source: <http://fox4kc.com/2014/05/27/what-happens-when-you-introduce-troubled-teens-to-theatre/>

Local family encourages others to become foster care parents May is foster care awareness month Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print Email Local family encourages others to become foster care parents Show Transcript Hide Transcript More than 150 kids in our community are in foster care right now... and about 40-percent of them are not guaranteed a home. News 8's Brittany Schmidt introduces us to one foster-care family...whose been taking in kids for more than 3 decades....Brittany Mark, Maxine and Tom Jacobs started doing foster care in 19-76... Now more than 80 kids later, they say it's one of the most rewarding experiences of their life... My husband Tom and I have been married 41 years. Maxine is a retired ICU nurse...and Tom is a retired police officer We have two biological children, one just turned 40 this week and the other one is 36, and we have six grandchildren. They always knew they would have a big family When they left the house, we didn't like the empty nest part of it, we wanted children in the home, we enjoy that, we enjoy the confusion and the noise and all the things that go along with having a larger family. Tom and Maxine knew they had more love to give...so they decided to get into foster care. When we first started, we went through the licensing process, we were actually going to do care for adults....and the plans changed. Isaac came to us when he was 10, just about 11, it was suppose to be a short-term, like 3-6 monts foster placement before he went back home. Joy and Respect. We were pretty overwhelmed by that, coming from a little 10 year old boy so that always kind of stuck with us. Over the months, Isaac became part of the family. We had talked about it but he was never in a position that we thought he would be adopted because re-unification is the goal. Until one day...Isaac decided to make his short-term stay...a permanent one. TOM -- He came home and says I would you to sit down, I want to talk to you about something, he said I am going to let you adopt me and we went from there. Isaac was adopted by the Jacobs in 2007. He had his own room, a stable family...and all that was missing was a dog. He always wanted a dog because he had a dog when he was living at home with mom. When the Jacobs finally got a dog, they let Isaac name her. MAXINE -- and he named her joy. So that just made me feel that the joy and respect that he really wanted in his life that he is attaining that. Isaac is just one of the many lives the Jacobs have touched... It's really rewarding, there is much more reward than anything else. It's not only families who can think about foster care options. single parents and community members are encouraged to consider becoming a foster parent as well. Thanks Brittany, There are about 70 licensed foster homes in La Crosse...and the county is hoping to double that in the near future. If you would like more information about foster care...head to our website- news-8-thousand-dot-com LA CROSSE, Wis. (WKBT) - May is Foster Care Awareness month and local agencies are encouraging community members to take a chance on foster care. Related Content WKBT, News8000.com More than 150 kids in our community are in foster care right now and about 40 percent of them are not guaranteed a home. However, one family has been doing it for over three decades and said it's one of the most rewarding experiences of their family members' life. "My husband Tom and I have been married 41 years," said Maxine Jacobs, a foster care parent in La Crosse. Maxine is a retired ICU nurse and Tom is a retired police officer. "We have two biological children, one just turned 40 this week and the other one is 36, and we have six grandchildren," said Maxine. They always knew they would have a big family. "When they left the house, we didn't like the empty nest part of it. We wanted children in the home, we enjoy that, we enjoy the confusion and the noise and all the things that go along with having a larger family," said Maxine. The Jacobs knew they had more love to give so they decided to get into foster care. "When we first started, we went through the licensing process, we were actually going to do care for adults and the plans changed," said Tom Jacobs, a foster care parent in La Crosse. "Isaac came to us when he was 10, just about 11, it was supposed to be a short term, like three to six months foster placement before he went back home," said Maxine. Before Isaac moved in with the Jacobs, he told his social worker he wanted two things in life, joy and respect. "We were pretty overwhelmed by that, coming from a little 10-year-old boy so that always kind of stuck with us," said Maxine. Over the months, Isaac became part of the family. "We had talked about it but he was never in a position that we thought he would be adopted because re-unification is the goal," said Tom. Until one day, Isaac decided to make his short-term stay a permanent one. "He came home and says I would like you to sit down, I want to talk to you about something, he said I am going to let you adopt me and we went from there," said Tom. Isaac was adopted by the Jacobs in 2007. He had his own room, a stable family and all that was missing was a dog. "He always wanted a dog because he had a dog when he was living at home with mom," said Maxine. When the Jacobs finally got a dog, they let Isaac name her and he named her Joy. "So that just made me feel that the joy and respect that he really wanted in his life that he is attaining that," said Maxine. Isaac is just one of the many lives the Jacobs have touched, but they say they receive more than they give. "There is much more reward than anything else," said Maxine. It's not only families who can think about foster care options... single parents and community members are encouraged to consider becoming a foster parent as well. There are about 70 licensed foster homes in La Crosse...and the county is hoping to double that in the near future. If you would like more information about foster care, you can contact the La Crosse County Human Services Department at 608-789-4834. Copyright 2014 by WKBT News8000. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Source: <http://www.news8000.com/news/local-family-encourages-others-to-become-foster-care-parents/26165942>

May 25, 2014 1:33 AM by Sam Salzwedel Family takes child welfare crisis into own hands TUCSON - Steve and Nancy Boccardo think they have taken in about 50 foster children over the years. "We were trying to figure out a count the other day and didn't quite get there," Steve Boccardo said. "We know we've done 14 in the last couple." Some children have stayed in their home for 24 hours. Others stay a couple years. The Boccardos adopted four. They say the fosters are just like their two biological children. "The kiddos are just regular kids that need love," Nancy Boccardo said. "And they need a structured loving home and a place to lay their head until their families are healed." About 3,400 children in Pima County are in foster care across 700 homes. There are 14,000 foster children in the state of Arizona. The Boccardos grow attached to the children but are happy to see them go back to their families. "It's sad. It's bittersweet," Nancy Boccardo said. "But kids want to be at home with their biological families." The Arizona legislature is starting a special session Tuesday. Lawmakers hope to solve some of the problems the state's child welfare agency has been facing. Rep. Ethan Orr believes the session will only last 3 days and will deal with 3 main issues. He wants the state to offer a childcare subsidy to families that are trying to work and raise children. "If you don't have some assistance, there's a tendency to fall back on the Section 8 or the TANF and the more expensive government subsidies," Orr said. "And then sometimes people don't have the ability to take care of the kids. And then they end up in the system." He also wants CPS workers to have better access to data. Orr said a caseworker might not know if they are seeing a family with no CPS record or an extensive one. He also said access to data like animal abuse records could help workers see a bigger picture to analyze a situation. Orr said the state needs to take better care of the employees. He said a high turnover rate is costing taxpayers money. He hopes to see new retention bonuses for workers who stay with the agency for certain amounts of time. "They have to help families and see families when they're at their absolute worst," Orr said. "What kind of support do we give them when they go home? What kind of support do we give them so they don't get burned out?" To become a foster parent, about a dozen agencies in Pima County help with the training and licensing of families. Source: <http://www.kvoa.com/news/family-takes-child-welfare-crisis-into-own-hands/>

Doctor concerned burned foster child at risk Doctor concerned burned foster child at risk By Darcy Henton, Calgary Herald May 26, 2014 Comment 5 A veteran Strathmore emergency room doctor fears a vulnerable foster child may be in peril after she was returned to a foster home where she suffered serious burns to her face five months ago. Dr. David Rudkin told the Herald the two-year-old severely developmentally impaired aboriginal girl suffered first-and second-degree burns that he believes were the result of either abuse or extreme neglect. A former medical examiner and 30-year physician, Rudkin, 55, said he decided to speak out because he doesn't believe there has been an adequate investigation, and child welfare officials have returned the child to the foster home where he believes other foster children could also be at risk. "It's obvious no one is interested in doing anything," he said in an interview. "I think this is another catastrophe waiting to happen." But Human Services spokeswoman Kathy Telfer said the ministry is aware of the incident and believes it was investigated thoroughly by Child Intervention Services and the RCMP. "All parties involved in the investigations indicated that the injuries were accidental," she said. "We have also been working closely with the home and following up with the child frequently." Rudkin said he saw the child "looking distressed and in pain" when she was brought to emergency in January the morning after suffering the burns. The male foster parent accompanying her said the foster mother was bathing the child in the bath tub with a shower spray nozzle when one of the other children in the home turned the tap to hot, Rudkin said. "The burn pattern was suspicious or peculiar in that it was strictly confined to her face and did not go to her scalp, ears or neck," he said. "It would have been a significant amount of time there was hot water sprayed on this kid's face to cause this peculiar burn pattern ... It just didn't make sense this would have been a hot water burn."

Rudkin said it was also concerning that the foster parents waited 12 to 15 hours to bring the child to emergency. "I think this kid would have been screaming in agony and they would have acted on it, but they didn't," he said. After the child was transferred to Alberta Children's Hospital in Calgary, Rudkin said he followed up to see if anyone there had raised concerns about the nature of the injury. When he found out they had not, he contacted RCMP and Alberta child welfare officials to raise the alarm. Rudkin said when he called back later to find out what was being done, he found the case had been closed. The RCMP constable assigned to the case told him she visited the home and talked to the foster parents but didn't find anything worrisome or suspicious, Rudkin added. The doctor said he was astonished he was not interviewed by police or child welfare investigators. When he attempted to advocate for the child, Rudkin said he was referred to a series of child welfare officials who were "surly and defensive" and who said they couldn't talk about the case because of privacy concerns. He said at the bare minimum, the children should be removed from the foster home pending a proper investigation by child welfare officials and police. "I see kids with all sorts of injury all the time. I am trained as a family physician and I have been doing this for close to 30 years," he said. "Usually I can see the mechanism of the injury. It's pretty clear. This one? There's no way it could have happened like that. I just don't believe it."

Doctor concerned burned foster child at risk But Telfer said RCMP investigated the home and later that day indicated they would not be pursuing charges as they felt the explanation was credible. Telfer noted a child abuse team at the Alberta Children's Hospital also worked closely on the investigation. "We take any report of alleged abuse or mistreatment of a foster child seriously and we will take whatever action is necessary to ensure the safety and well-being of all of our children in care," she said. "We strive to have one of the most stringent screening processes for foster parents in the country." Rudkin took his concerns to the Alberta Child and Youth Advocate, but that office only looks into systemic issues arising from serious injuries, and a spokesman said it didn't find any in its review of the file. "We expect the decisions made by those responsible for her care will ensure her safety and her interests are the primary considerations," said the advocate's spokesman, Tim Chander. "We have assigned an advocate to ensure this child's interests are being considered by decision-makers." The situation arose after Human Services Minister Manmeet Bhullar launched an overhaul of the child welfare system to address concerns raised by an Calgary Herald-Edmonton Journal investigation last fall. The series revealed that child welfare workers frequently failed to follow basic policies and procedures in a range of areas from proper safety inspections of foster homes, completing criminal record checks on foster parents and other care providers and ensuring foster children received proper medical attention. The newspaper investigation also found repeated instances of caseworkers failing to follow policy that required they have frequent face-to-face meetings with foster parents and foster children. In some cases, children were not seen or foster parents visited for months. But Telfer said workers now have regular contact with foster children and foster parents, and all foster homes undergo a home assessment before being approved and are reviewed annually. "We monitor the safety and wellbeing of foster children after they are placed in a foster home," Telfer added. dhenton@calgaryherald.com

Source: <http://www.calgaryherald.com/news/alberta/Doctor+concerned+burned+foster+child+risk/9877118/story.html>

Foster care home need still exists Wednesday, May 28, 2014 12:00 AM Comments (1) There are 20 children faced with foster care in Greenwood. These children have been brought into the care of the state because of neglect or abuse of some sort. There are 11 resource foster homes in Greenwood. The number 11 can be misleading to those who find comfort in knowing that at least 11 homes can offer care to some of the children in care. What's misleading is that some of the 11 homes might already have children placed in them; the 11 homes might not be licensed for the children that are currently in care or may even be a safe haven for children from a neighboring county. So, let's think about this as if there were no homes in Greenwood that have made the commitment to care for children in foster care. In order to become a resource foster family you must be 21 year of age or older, be able to pass background criminal checks, fingerprint and SLED checks, have a physical done by a doctor that states you are physically and emotionally able to care for a child or children, the home must pass DHEC and fire marshal inspections and you also show your family is financially responsible and complete 14 hours of pre-service training. If you are interested in answering this call to help children in foster care by becoming a resource foster family, contact the South Carolina Youth Advocate Program at 864-312-6700 or visit www.scyap.com for information. Betsy Manning Greenwood Source: <http://www.indexjournal.com/Content/Opinion/Opinion/Article/Foster-care-home-need-still-exists/8/154/25729>

New group home regulations adopted in East Norriton; 15 'grandfathered' group homes not affected By Carl Rotenberg, The Times Herald Thursday, May 29, 2014 EAST NORRITON — The board of supervisors held a public hearing on group home zoning regulations Tuesday and filled a gaping hole in the enforcement and control of the permitted use by unanimously adopting the new regulations. Both the Civil Rights Act of 1968 and the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988 require that American towns allow group homes in all residential districts. Group homes are defined as a "residential facility used as living quarters by any number of unrelated persons requiring special care, specifically designed to create a residential setting for the mentally and physically handicapped. The individuals may be either transient or permanent residents." Township Manager Don Delamater said, "a few residents had some questions about the legality of group homes and how can they be located in residential neighborhoods" during the public hearing. Several concerns raised by members of the East Norriton Planning Commission at a May 21 meeting were rejected by Solicitor Sean Kilkenny in a May 27 memo to the board of supervisors. Annual inspections by the fire marshal cannot be imposed because it raises "fair housing, equal protection and ADA issues," Kilkenny said. Regulation of medical waste for a group home cannot differ from the treatment given by township officials to another township resident. Group homes cannot be required to either pay an annual fee or obtain an annual license. The group home operator is already required to apply for a permit. A suggestion that the ordinance should prohibit renting a part of a group home to individuals without disabilities was ruled out by federal regulations guaranteeing that families, and group home residents, can freely reside in a home. The ordinance requires, "group homes shall be permitted by special exception in the AR, BR, BR-1, MR, GA, CR, HR, HR-1, RR, RP, RO, ATR and IN zoning districts subject to additional requirements." The zoning hearing board would hold a public hearing and decide on granting the special exception. A group home operator will have to provide a fire sprinkler system in the home and all attached buildings, a fire alarm system, a dimensioned floor plan, a statement detailing adequate trained staff supervision, a minimum of four off-street parking spaces, a prohibition against outpatient services and a requirement that one non-resident caretaker employee shall be on the premises at all times. If the home has more than four residents, the operator will have to provide one additional off-street parking space for every two residents above the four-resident regulation. The board responded to the complaints of resident Rick Mumma in March about a grandfathered group home in the 200 block of Beechwood Road that provides care for two individuals. The home is rented by Firely Enterprises of Harleysville, which complied with the previous township regulations for group homes. Mumma estimated there were 15 group homes in the township that will not be subject to the new regulations because they began before the township enacted the new rules. In other business, Steve Tambini, the operations vice president at Pennsylvania American Water (PAW), told the board about the problems at the Norristown water treatment plant that caused a boil water advisory last week for six townships, including East Norriton. Tambini described the turbidity (cloudiness) problems with the intake water stirred up by two heavy rainstorms in early May and added another reason for the plant's decreased clean water production, said Delamater. "One of their treatment tanks was under maintenance and repair," Delamater said, "because a sweeper arm needed to be repaired." The board authorized Delamater to submit a Delaware Valley Regional Planning Commission (DVRPC) grant application for a traffic calming study on Old Arch Road. The $32,000 grant, if it is approved in October, will be supplemented with an $8,000 match by East Norriton officials. The board recently lowered the speed limit on part of Old Arch Road to 25-miles-per-hour. The Transportation and Community Development Initiative (TCDI) is a grant program of the DVRPC that supports local development and redevelopment efforts in qualifying municipalities of the Delaware Valley, according to the DVRPC website. Follow Carl Rotenberg on Twitter @CarlWriter.

Source: <http://www.timesherald.com/general-news/20140529/new-group-home-regulations-adopted-in-east-norriton-15-grandfathered-group-homes-not-affected>

Court defeat for Edina parents trying to bar son with mental disorder from marrying Article by: PAUL WALSH, Star Tribune Updated: May 27, 2014 - 8:47 PM Group home resident wins new hearing on his competence to marry. resize text print buy reprints Share3 It's going to take a lot more to keep a 27-year-old group home resident from marrying the woman he loves than a court ruling and his Edina parents' objections. The state Court of Appeals, pointing out that people with court-appointed guardians are allowed to marry in Minnesota, ruled Tuesday that a lower court failed to meet the burden of proof when it barred Michael O'Brien from someday exchanging wedding vows with the woman he has been dating for more than three years. Describing marriage as a

"fundamental right" afforded to anyone who has the "sufficient mental capacity" to understand it in contractual terms, the appeals panel said the District Court must review the case anew because it did not look deeply enough into O'Brien's ability "to understand the meaning, rights and obligations of marriage." The case is not about whether O'Brien would make a good husband. O'Brien's attorney Steve Beseres acknowledged soon after the ruling that "Mike is a nice kid with significant problems. But they've allowed people in prison and all sorts of different situations [to marry]." Judith and Timothy O'Brien have been guardians for their son since 2004, when the court cited his "serious, persistent mental disorder," namely struggling with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, mild mental disability and being bipolar. Judith O'Brien testified in the lower court about Michael having shot out cabin windows with a BB gun, once grabbing the steering wheel of a group home van and other misbehavior while he was a minor. As guardians, the O'Briens take care of all of Michael's daily living needs, as well as his medical and psychological care. Michael has said he gets along fine with his parents, but he feels they put too many limitations on him. A psychiatrist on behalf of the parents said Michael functions at a level below an IQ of 71 and his "overall broad independence" is that of someone slightly less than 10 years old. Michael's attorney said it's his clients hope that he and his fiancée, a client in a Twin Cities special-needs program, can someday live in a group home for couples. Meantime, Michael sees her a couple of times a week at her residence and stays over once a month. The O'Briens' legal challenge is preventing the couple from setting a wedding date, Beseres said. The Appeals Court ruling notes that Michael's fiancée described their relationship in testimony as "very loving," while Michael contributed that "he is in love with her." It concluded "Because the district court did not make sufficient findings to establish that Michael lacks the capacity to understand the meaning, rights, and obligations of marriage, we reverse the district court's declaratory judgment that Michael lacks the competence to marry ..." Tim O'Brien expressed disappointment with the appeals court ruling, noting that his son has had self-control difficulties for many years that sometimes erupted into "incoherent rage." Although he didn't reject the notion that Mark might someday be well enough to wed, Tim O'Brien said, "At this point in time, in my opinion, he lacks the ability to comprehend what a marriage contract entails." Beseres said he believes his client's parents have their heart in the right place but are on shaky legal ground. "I don't think anybody has any ill will," the attorney said. "You do anything you can for your kids." Paul Walsh • 612-673-4482 Source: <http://www.startribune.com/lifestyle/health/260820251.html>

Senate passes bill aimed at protecting children; may vote to formally disapprove of DSS head By SEANNA ADCOX Associated Press May 29, 2014 - 7:22 pm EDT AAA COLUMBIA, South Carolina — The South Carolina Senate approved a bill Thursday to protect children from parents who abuse drugs and debated whether to formally disapprove of the Department of Social Services director. A no-confidence vote could come next week. The bill is named for 22-month-old Jaidon Morris, who died in 2008 of a drug overdose a week after being returned to his parents from foster care. Sponsoring Rep. Mike Forrester, R-Spartanburg, said he hopes his bill prevents other children's deaths. If children are removed from their home because of drug use, the measure would require drug tests before a court rules on parents regaining custody. It also gives the Department of Social Services greater ability to end visits between a parent and child. "At the end of the day, we'll have something benefiting the children who can't look out for themselves," Forrester said. The bill now returns to the House. The Senate's approval followed an amendment requiring the children's welfare agency to tell lawmakers annually how many children are in the agency's care and on social workers' caseloads. Another Senate amendment requires audits of the agency every three years. The additions come as a Senate panel investigates potential problems at the agency. A growing number of senators are calling for the ousting of its director, Lillian Koller. Gov. Nikki Haley continues to support her. DSS is a Cabinet agency. Haley's office has dismissed the calls for resignation or firing as election-year politics. On Tuesday, three House Democrats introduced a resolution seeking a no-confidence vote in Koller. It was quickly discarded in the Republican-led House. But the effort is increasingly bipartisan in the Senate. A resolution introduced Thursday by three Republicans and three Democrats says the agency under Koller's leadership has failed to protect the state's abused and neglected children. The Senate unanimously agreed to put the resolution directly on the calendar, bypassing the committee process and allowing a vote on the no-confidence measure Tuesday. "It's time," said Sen. Katrina Shealy, R-Lexington, a member of the panel looking into DSS. "All the problems are not Koller's fault. But they haven't gotten any better. They're not going to get any better." The panel has asked Koller to return for a third day of testimony next Wednesday. Senators have focused on the deaths of two children in Richland County and one in Charleston County. Koller acknowledged last week that many caseworkers' loads are too large. She said the agency is working to set practical goals to make caseloads manageable for social workers. The agency has repeatedly said the average caseload statewide is six, but senators say some employees complain of being responsible for up to 100 cases. Panel members browsing a folder of data last week said it showed few workers with less than 10 cases. DSS still has not provided that packet to reporters. The Legislature can't force Koller out. That is a decision for Haley, who appointed her in 2011. But Sen. Joel Lourie, D-Columbia, said the Senate will reform the agency with or without Koller, in next year's budget process. The panel he sits on will make recommendations on the appropriate number of social workers and their salaries. Senate President Pro Tem John Courson, R-Columbia, called for Koller's resignation last month. However, he doesn't support the resolution, saying Thursday he doesn't want to set a Senate precedent. In response to Thursday's Senate action, the agency released a statement saying it supports any effort to help DSS better serve South Carolina's children and families. "DSS will always welcome the opportunity to work with our legislators and community partners about the countless hours and complex decisions our front-line workers make every day to protect the at-risk children of our state," the statement reads. "We are dedicated to delivering the most innovative services possible and will never stop working for ways improve our methods and practices." Source: <http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/6da30e2d58374637baaf1e84cd07e8cc/SC--Jaidons-Law>

Newport gets support with group home law Laguna, Costa Mesa chip in toward cost of petitioning the Supreme Court to hear the city's case. Email Share 33 By Emily Foxhall May 29, 2014 8:07 p.m. Two of Newport Beach's neighboring cities have pledged their support as it gears up to petition the U.S. Supreme Court for a hearing on its group home law. Laguna Beach and Costa Mesa have promised to contribute funding toward the costs of filing amicus briefs, which are written arguments submitted by independent organizations, often in favor of the petitioner. In Newport's case, the briefs are intended to sway the court to hear the case. Related Topics Justice System Laws and Legislation Trials and Arbitration See more topics » X Courts and the Judiciary U.S. Supreme Court Newport Beach plans to submit its petition to the Supreme Court by Aug. 18, asking the justices to reverse a 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that said a Newport Beach ordinance governing group homes could be challenged for discriminatory intent. At least three groups — the International Municipal Lawyers Assn., the League of California Cities and the Pacific Legal Foundation — are then expected to submit amicus briefs, said City Atty. Aaron Harp. It will cost roughly $30,000 in attorney time and printing cost for each brief, Harp said. He anticipated that much of the attorney time would be donated and that the three groups would take on some costs. So far, Costa Mesa and Laguna Beach each pledged $10,000 toward the costs. The city of Claremont said Newport Beach could use its name in support but did not give money, Harp said. "The decision of the 9th Circuit impacts all cities," he said, "and they're interested in supporting our challenge to that ruling." Newport Beach also spent $280,000 to hire prominent attorney Theodore Olson to work on its petition. The case centers on a municipal law adopted in January 2008 that placed strict limits on group homes, an issue with which many other cities have wrestled. Group homes had previously been operating freely in residential areas, according to court documents. The ordinance effectively prohibited new group homes from opening in most residential areas and required existing group homes to complete the same permitting process required of new ones. The total number of facilities in a neighborhood is taken into account during the permitting process, the documents continue. Newport Beach residents had been complaining about traffic issues, cigarette smoke and noise caused by their ever-changing cast of neighbors. But the new rules forced out many of the group homes because they could not qualify for the newly required permits. In the ongoing legal battle that ensued, a three-person panel of 9th Circuit Court of Appeals said last fall that the ordinance may have illegally discriminated against group homes for recovering alcoholics and drug users based on disability. But other 9th Circuit judges — although unable to find enough support to rehear the case — wrote a different opinion. They maintained that the panel's decision inappropriately allowed a neutral law that was fairly enforced to be challenged based on an accusation of ill intent. The city agreed, and felt prompted to petition the Supreme Court. "Until this decision, the rule has been that if a city adopts a neutral law that treats people the same and is fairly enforced, like the city's ordinance, you don't get to file a lawsuit to try and find out what the City Council was thinking at the time they adopted the law," Harp explained in an email. "This is a fundamental shift in the law and we hope that that the United States Supreme Court will take this case to ensure that local governments can continue to operate efficiently without bearing the burden and expense of frivolous lawsuits," he said. Group home operators Pacific Shores Properties, Newport Coast Recovery and Yellowstone Women's First Step House can file responses to the petition after the amicus briefs are submitted. The group homes are being represented by the Loma Mar-based firm Brancart & Brancart. The firm will evaluate an appropriate response as the time nears, Elizabeth Brancart said. A decision on whether the case will be heard is expected by the end of the year, Harp said. If it is not heard, the case will return to trial. Source: <http://www.dailypilot.com/news/tn-dpt-me-0530-amicus-brief-newport-20140529.0.6448988.story>

Teen Arrested for Setting Fire at Group Home 12:50PM Saturday May 31, 2014 Share With Facebook Twitter MySpace Yahoo! Google (CHATTANOOGA, Tenn.) -- A 17-year-old was arrested Tuesday after allegedly setting a fire at the Scholze Adolescent Center in Chattanooga. Firefighters responded to a report around 9 p.m. at 911 Pineville Road and found small flames coming from a ceiling vent in one of the residential rooms. The damages were estimated at $500 and no injuries were reported. A 17-year-old was charged with aggravated arson and transported to the Juvenile Detention Center. The investigation is ongoing and others at the group home may face charges, according to officials. Source: <http://www.wgowam.com/common/more.php?m=58&ts=1401366008&article=D957A5FAE6AD11E3B51EFEFDADE6840A&mode=2>

May 30th, 2014: HEAL Launches New Petition to Demand Utah Courts Allow for Satellite (aka Remote) Testimony when Parties/Victims are Non-Residents! Please sign now at: <http://petitions.moveon.org/sign/utah-courts-legislators>

Sex abuse alleged at Utah youth home | The Salt Lake Tribune Sex abuse alleged at Utah youth home Courts » September trial set for Spanish Fork youth home employee. | The Salt Lake Tribune First Published May 29 2014 04:28 pm • Last Updated May 29 2014 04:32 pm A September trial date has been set for a man accused of sexually abusing two 14-year-old girls at a group home for troubled teens in Spanish Fork. Charges filed in 4th District Court allege that Wade Russell, 60, committed the crimes while employed at Extended Family Services. Photos View photo gallery \(1 photos\) Join the Discussion Post a Comment One girl said that on Nov. 3, 2013, her third night at EFS, Russell went into her room, lay down next to her bed and fondled her over her clothing, according to charging documents. She said she knew of another girl who also had been abused. Security camera footage from that time shows Russell's feet "sticking out of the doorway as if he is lying down," court documents claim. The girl's roommate confirmed that Russell was lying close to the victim, prosecutors say. The other victim said Russell sexually abused her on multiple occasions after she arrived at EFS in June 2013. She said that on Nov. 2, Russell asked her to join him in the laundry room because he could turn off the lights and escape the security cameras. Video from outside the laundry room allegedly shows Russell entering the laundry room and turning off the lights before the girl followed him inside. She claimed that Russell molested her then, and later the same day in her room. The second victim said Russell also used his cell phone to show her pornography. A job evaluation for Russell by EFS in August shows he was told not to have "any contact with female residents alone or out of the view of the camera," and that he was told to stop "hugging the young girls," according to charges. Charging documents do not indicate why those instructions were given. Russell denied to police touching either of the girls sexually and said the events recorded on camera amounted only to poor judgment on his part. When asked for his cell phone to search its browser history, he said he lost the phone, police reported.

Sex abuse alleged at Utah youth home | The Salt Lake Tribune Cont. Russell is charged with three counts of aggravated sexual abuse of a child, and one count each of forcible sodomy, sodomy of a child and attempted rape of a child, all first-degree felonies; and seven counts of second-degree felony forcible sexual abuse; and two counts of third-degree felony dealing in material harmful to a minor.

Source: <http://www.sltrib.com/sltrib/news/58004247-78/russell-abuse-girl-camera.html.csp>

State Falls Behind On Abuse Registry For Group Home Workers Fired group-home workers remain in the field Comments 10 Email Share By JOSH KOVNER, jkovner@courant.com 7:15 p.m. EDT, May 29, 2014 The state department responsible for the care of thousands of intellectually disabled clients has failed in dozens of cases to place the names of group home workers fired for abuse onto a registry – created for the purpose of alerting other group homes not to hire those workers. As a result, potentially dangerous individuals remained in the field, free to be hired by unwitting agencies and possibly perpetuating a cycle of abuse, according to a state audit released Thursday. As of late 2013, there was a backlog of 182 cases in which a fired worker's name had not been entered into the abuse and neglect registry at the Department of Developmental Services, according to the report by the state Auditors of Public Accounts. Topics Accounting and Auditing Department officials acknowledged Thursday that the backlog has increased to 184 since September 2013, despite hiring additional workers to handle the registry cases. Thirty-nine new cases have come in, and the registry unit has processed 37 of them. Purchase your Officially Licensed UConn National Championship Gear HERE! The names of the fired group home workers haven't been entered because the required hearings before developmental services officials haven't been held. State law requires that, within 45 days after the worker is fired for substantiated abuse, the department notify the worker that his name has been submitted for placement on the registry and that a hearing will be convened. "Until the decision is rendered to place an employee on the registry, they can continue to work in the field of direct care, with another employer, potentially putting other clients at risk," the report states. The auditors said developmental services was failing to monitor the pending registry cases, and that its method of gathering information on the behavior of workers for private contractors was fragmented. In its response to the finding, the department said it has hired four people to work in the registry unit and is establishing a single system to capture information on abuse and neglect. The department said it was also looking to hire more hearing officers. The audit also found that the pace of investigations into serious cases of abuse and neglect that come to the attention of the department is too slow. When allegations arise at a developmental services facility or at a private agency that contracts with the state, investigations are generally required to be completed within 90 days. The auditors looked at the 243 open investigations as of Sept. 30, 2012, and found that all of them were older than 90 days and that many were older than six months. One was 53 months old. "The consequences [of these delays] are potentially serious," the auditors wrote. "Timely completion of investigations permits quicker action ... pertaining to the health and welfare [of clients]." Department spokeswoman Joan Barnish said the agency "will be ... including key partners from other agencies, the provider community and families to develop strategies for simplification and quality improvement to the investigation process." Copyright © 2014, The Hartford Courant Source: <http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-workers-fired-abuse-0530-20140529.0.1023222.story>

Gardner-Simmons Home closing after 26 years Updated 1:38 am, Friday, May 30, 2014 0 Larger | Smaller Printable Version Email This Georgia (default) Verdana Times New Roman Arial Font Page 1 of 1 TUPELO, Miss. (AP) — The Gardner-Simmons Home will close later this year after taking and caring for girls without a place to call home. The home was started in 1988. Last year, the Gardner-Simmons home rebranded as the Providence House Maternity Home for Girls and took in pregnant young women who needed a safe place to carry their child to term. Erin Stubbs, president of the Gardner-Simmons Home for Girls' and Providence House board of directors, told the Northeast Mississippi Daily Journal (<http://bit.ly/1jxd3zf>) the two girls who were living in the home when the decision to close was made were moved. Stubbs said the closure will include the home and the foster program. He said a formal announcement will come in June. The organization was named for Margaret Gardner and Robin Simmons, best friends and Chi Omega sorority sisters who were hit by a truck on Mississippi Highway 6 outside of Oxford while participating in a walkathon for the sorority. Once it was established as a group home, the organization expanded to organize foster families to serve girls the house couldn't hold. A 2008 court decision led to a reorganization of the foster care system, putting a premium on placing children in family and foster homes within their community and making group homes the lowest priority for placement. Following the ruling, group homes were seeing fewer and fewer children referred — a change that caused many group homes, like Tupelo's Alpha House, to close due to lack of funding and lack of need. The first resident under the new Providence House mission entered the home Jan. 7, 2013, and since, four young women have used the home's services, two delivered babies and one lived in the home for over a year as she learned about pregnancy and then worked to adjust to her new life as a mother. ___ Information from: Northeast Mississippi Daily Journal, <http://djournal.com> Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/article/Gardner-Simmons-Home-closing-after-26-years-5515429.php>

Keeping Kids Safe Focus of Foster Care Conference in Holyoke May 30th, 2014 HOLYOKE, Mass. (WGGB) — Foster care professionals gathered in Holyoke on Friday to address the growing need for providing at risk children with better care. This is the fifth year that the Treehouse Foundation has addressed the issue of foster care in America. The event was held at Holyoke Community College. Right now, there are 9,000 children in foster care in Massachusetts. "The need is tremendous. As a foster adoptive parent myself, I feel every child needs to be rooted in family and community and this is our vision here that everyone comes together to make sure all children are rooted in family and community," says Judy Cockerton of the Treehouse Foundation. Among the speakers was Bishop W.C. Martin who made the trip all the way from Texas. He called on the church to help at risk kids. "We have a very small church, less than 200 members, and we have adopted 76 children from the state and have gotten them into lovable homes, and members of the church have supplied wrap around services to help the children," says Bishop Martin. Among those being honored was Paul Fitzsimons, Deputy Commissioner of field operations for the Mass. Department of Children and Families. A recent report said DCF can do more to protect young children following the tragic death of 5-year-old Jeremiah

Oliver of Fitchburg. DCF says the whole community needs to work together to solve the problem. "No one department can be in the home, in every home, every hour of every day. Children are either supported or failed by all the adults in their life," says Fitzsimmons. Fitzsimmons says DCF has hired more than 200 staff members to help ease large caseloads. Source: <http://www.wggb.com/2014/05/30/keeping-kids-saaf-focus-of-foster-care-conference-in-holyoke/>

A Closer Look at Foster Care in the State May 30, 2014 by Editor in Children's Health, NC Health Beats, State Health Policy with 2 Comments By Hyun Namkoong In the wake of two abuse scandals in foster homes, House lawmakers want to study the quality of Department of Social Services policies for DSS employees who are foster parents. The recommendations from a joint legislative committee formed after last year's legislative session advised the creation of a continued study committee to more thoroughly examine the complicated DSS system. "There was so much to look at, so many things, in such depth," said Rep. Sarah Stevens (R-Mount Airy), the primary sponsor for the bill. "We recommended a continued study." A 2013 scandal involving Wanda Larson, a Union County social services employee and a 11-year-old boy who was found handcuffed to a porch with a dead chicken hanging from his neck prompted state lawmakers to study policies for employees who serve as foster parents in the system. The language for HB 1104 specifically directs the study committee to investigate whether or not a director or employee of a county DSS should be allowed to serve as a foster parent. "I am pleased that the committee will look at the foster-care system more closely," said Nancy Carter, executive director for SaySo, an advocacy organization for youth affected by the out-of-home care system in the state. "For years, folks weren't addressing any issues." In North Carolina, more than 14,000 children are in foster care. The study committee will also look into what can be done to shorten the length of time children wait in foster care for "forever homes," a permanent placement. Findings from last year's study committee show that children remain in foster care for an average of two years, which concerns advocates and lawmakers alike. "I anticipate bringing out a big piece of legislation in the long session," Stevens said. Source: <http://www.northcarolinahealthnews.org/2014/05/30/a-closer-look-at-foster-care-in-the-state/>

Teen shoots dead older brother, 18, in front of mother as the sibling tried to convince him to go to a wilderness camp for boys with behavioral issues Clayton Bronson, 18, a dedicated churchgoer and volunteer, was trying help his troubled brother Turner, 15 The pair got into an argument on May 22 in their Las Vegas and Turner shot Clayton in the stomach As their mother, Wendy, called 911, Turner is alleged to have shot Clayton in the head He has been charged as an adult with murder Wendy Bronson said they do not keep firearms in the house and does not know where her son go the gun By Joel Christie Published: 23:22 EST, 30 May 2014 | Updated: 08:39 EST, 31 May 2014 64 shares 375 View comments A troubled Las Vegas teen has been charged as an adult with first-degree murder after allegedly shooting his older brother during a heated discussion in front of their mother. Police say Clayton Bronson, 18, a dedicated churchgoer and volunteer, was trying to help his younger sibling Turner Bronson, 15, get his life back on track when the teen produced a gun and shot him. Turner made his first court appearance on Friday after being charged with murder, looking exhausted after spending the last week in jail, The New York Daily News reported. Clayton was scheduled to graduate from Sierra Vista High School in three weeks and planned to attend the University of Nevada, Las Vegas to study computer science and robotics. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +6 Turner Bronson,15, makes an initial appearance in Clark County Justice Court on Friday, May 30, 2014 in Las Vegas. Bronson, who turns 16 on Sunday, will be tried as an adult on one murder charge in the shooting death of his brother, 18-year-old Clayton SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +6 Te 15-year-old and his brother Clayton Bronson, 18, fought several times leading up to the fatal shooting because Clayton wanted his brother to 'get his life together' SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +6 Killed: Clayton's obituary stated that he was devoted to his church, school, family and community. He taught Sunday school at Good Samaritan Lutheran Church, volunteered at the church's coffee shop and a sandwich ministry SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +6 Clayton died three weeks before his scheduled graduation from Sierra Vista High School. He had been accepted to UNLV, where he planned to study computer science and robotics 'Clayton kept telling Turner to get his life together,' the boys' mother, Wendy Bronson, told investigators, according to the Las Vegas Review-Journal. The teens' mom heard the boys fighting from her bedroom before hearing a gunshot and running to find Clayton holding his stomach and saying Turner had shot him, police say. Clayton was trying to get Turner to go to a wilderness camp set up to help boys with behavioral issues. Wendy called 911 and followed the dying boy followed to the living room. But Turner then walked up to within three feet of his brother and shot him in the head as his horrified mother watched, according to the Review-Journal. He hid the revolver behind a couch cushion and paced the house until cops arrived, the newspaper reported. The mom told cops there were no guns in the home and she had no idea where her son got the weapon. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +6 A police report stated Turner Bronson, who was not under the influence at the time, had difficulties answering questions, as well as smiling and chuckling at inappropriate times. SHARE PICTURE Copy link to paste in your message +6 Clayton Bronson kept telling his brother to get his life together. Turner Bronson then shot him During questioning by police, Turner 'had difficulty answering questions' and 'would smile and chuckle at inappropriate times', according to the Review-Journal. Turner Bronson, who will turn 16 on Sunday, will be tried as an adult on one murder charge. Clayton Bronson, or 'Clay' as many called him, was a student ambassador who had traveled to France, Italy and Greece. He played baseball, ran with his high school track team, liked to snowboard, earned a second-degree black belt in taekwondo, and he was an avid cyclist. 'He had the unique ability to include everyone, especially those who were shy and would have otherwise been on the sidelines,' an obituary in the Review-Journal said. 'It was important to Clay to make sure no one felt left out ... Clay had a contagious enthusiasm for life that influenced and touched the lives of all who had the privilege to know him.' Read more: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2644505/Disturbed-teen-shoots-dead-older-brother-18-mother-sibling-tried-convince-wilderness-camp-boys-behavioral-issues.html#ixzz33LUZNUQA> Follow us: @MailOnline on Twitter | DailyMail on Facebook

(HEAL Special Note: Children are abused, tortured, and killed at many wilderness programs throughout the US. If Bronson was aware at all of the abuses that go on at wilderness programs, we believe such legitimate fear for his own well-being should be taken into consideration and that any charges against him in this tragedy be mitigated by understanding the legitimate terror Bronson may have felt when told he should agree to be sent to an unregulated wilderness program where children are known to be abused, killed, and become institutionalized for life. It is unfortunate that his family did not research the behavior modification industry prior to suggesting their son enroll in such a program.)

Group home counselor accused of drug possession with intent to sell by Kyle Wind Published: May 31, 2014 Article Tools Font size: A A A Our Social Networks Facebook Sign Up Text Alerts | newsletter R A group home counselor and driver for ChildFirst Services faces numerous drug and weapon-related charges after state troopers found suspected heroin, cocaine and raw marijuana at his home, the Wayne County district attorney's office said Friday. State troopers and the district attorney's office drug task force detective also found drug paraphernalia, an electronic scale and two .22 caliber revolvers with obliterated serial numbers during the search of the home Abraham Nyanti was renting in Lake Twp. District Attorney Janine Edwards said authorities were still investigating whether the 24-year-old sold or gave drugs to any youths but at this point was "thankful that the officers were able to make this arrest before a child who Mr. Nyanti supervised was hurt." Police went to Mr. Nyanti's 107 Batzel Road home in Lake Ariel after neighbors had complained about "suspicious activities" and smelled burnt marijuana when they spoke with him at his door, authorities said. Mr. Nyanti allowed police to search him and his home, during which police found, among numerous items, multiple bags of suspected heroin stamped with the word "Barbie" and one bag of what authorities believed was cocaine, prosecutors said. Authorities charged Mr. Nyanti with felony possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance and two felony counts of possession of a firearm with altered manufacturer's number and several related counts. Mr. Nyanti was being held at Wayne County Prison in lieu of $75,000 bail, and his preliminary hearing was scheduled for 9 a.m. Wednesday at the Wayne County Courthouse. Contact the writer: kwind@timeshamrock.com, @kwindTT on Twitter Source: <http://thetimes-tribune.com/news/group-home-counselor-accused-of-drug-possession-with-intent-to-sell-1.1695587>

State DCF To Close Group Home In Manchester Follow Your Town News On The Courant's Manchester Facebook Page Comments 2 Email Share 8 By JESSE LEAVENWORTH, leavenworth@courant.com The Hartford Courant 5:41 p.m. EDT, May 30, 2014 MANCHESTER — A group home for abused and neglected boys, the focus of neighborhood concerns because of the many police calls to the house, will close within the next three months, a state official said Friday. Reacting to the news, Mayor Jay Moran, who lives near the Nutmeg Drive home, said, "I think the neighborhood is going to be happy because of the amount of police activity. We're a very welcoming neighborhood, but that's not what we were expecting." The group home "is being closed for a number of reasons, but most especially because it is not being fully used and is not needed," Gary Kleeblatt, spokesman for the state Department of Children and Families, said on Friday. Topics Crime Homicide Southington "While the capacity of the program is for six children, only two children are currently living in the program," Kleeblatt said. "The Hartford region has a total of four of these short-term stabilization programs, and clearly the one on Nutmeg Drive was not being fully utilized. In addition, there was a relatively high level of police responses to the program." [Sample Our Free Breaking News Alert And 3 P.M. News Newsletters] Opened in 2006, the home is a STAR (Short Term Assessment and Respite) facility operated by Southington-based Community Residences Inc. The mission of the STAR program "is for at-risk, abused, or neglected children to have a safe, stabilizing experience with the support of caring staff in a short-term, home-like, therapeutic setting," according to the CRI website, <http://www.criinc.org/children-s-services/star-program.html>. The DCF has been reducing group care across the state, placing children instead with family members and in other settings, Kleeblatt said. Residents' fears and long-term doubts about management of the home peaked in the summer of 2011 with the arrest of Charles Wilson, 19 at the time, who was accused of shooting and killing a local convenience store clerk and another man in Hartford in May of that year. Wilson, who wasn't living in the Nutmeg Drive home at the time of the shootings but had lived there several years earlier, was sentenced in 2012 to 55 years in prison for the Manchester killing and other crimes. His arrested raised concerns among residents about the kind of teenagers who were brought into the program. Beyond safety concerns, police have cited the many calls officers answered regarding residents of the home who were absent without permission. Calls reached a peak in 2009, with a total of 129 (from Jan. 1 to Dec. 9). Of those, 117 were about missing persons. The calls dropped significantly after state Rep. Jason Rojas, D-Manchester, arranged the first meeting of neighbors and officials in August 2011. But Moran said police have been out at the home more frequently in the past year. The home will be closed in 60 to 90 days, Kleeblatt said. The two children now in the program, he said, "will receive individualized discharge plans that will ensure their specific needs are met." "We want the best for these kids, obviously," Moran said. "There's no ill will toward these children or the goal of the group home. ... But safety is first and foremost in the community, and the fact that there's police presence all the time scares people." Copyright © 2014, The Hartford Courant Source: <http://www.courant.com/community/manchester/hc-manchester-group-home-0531-20140530.0.5534744.story>

Dunn Co. group home worker accused of stealing money, diamond ring from residents By: Andrew Fefer - Email Posted: Fri 4:08 PM, May 30, 2014 By: Andrew Fefer - Email Home / Headlines List / Article MENOMONIE, Wis. (WEAU) -- The assistant manager of a group home near Elk Mound is accused of stealing money from several residents, petty cash, as well as pawning a resident's diamond ring. Prosecutors filed eight felony theft charges against Erin Instenness, 42, of Chippewa Falls on Friday. A warrant was also filed in the case. Instenness is accused of taking the money between January 2013 and April 2014. A total of more than $4,400 was reported missing from seven residents of Brotoloc North's Tara Place in the Town of Elk Mound last month. Its website says residents there can be mentally ill, developmentally disabled, or alcohol or drug-dependent. A criminal complaint says Instenness has worked for the company for 16 years, and when an administrator asked her about the missing money, she denied taking it. Investigators say that administrator also found a receipt in Instenness' desk from a diamond ring that was pawned. They later determined the ring belonged to one of the residents. The complaint says Brotoloc paid back the residents for their losses. Source: <http://www.weau.com/home/headlines/Dunn-Co-group-home-worker-accused-of-stealing-money-diamond-ring-from-residents-261302981.html>

Aurora man convicted of sexually assaulting woman in group home By Kirk Mitchell The Denver Post Posted: 05/30/2014 03:23:25 PM MDT Add a Comment Updated: 05/30/2014 04:26:58 PM MDT A 50-year-old Aurora man has been convicted of sexually assaulting a 55-year-old at-risk adult in a group home for the mentally ill, officials say. William Jesse Rattler and his wife were operating an unlicensed home for mentally ill patients at 1708 N. Lansing St., said Sue Lindsay, spokeswoman for Adams County District Attorney Dave Young. Rattler was originally charged with two counts of sexual assault on an at-risk victim involving two women who were living at the home. An Adams County District Court jury convicted him on one count and acquitted him on the second count, Lindsay said. Kirk Mitchell: 303-954-1206, denverpost.com/coldcases or twitter.com/kirkmitchell Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_25867406/aurora-man-convicted-sexually-assaulting-woman-group-home

How DeWitt investigator uncovered $17K welfare theft at Syracuse psychiatric hospital Print By Douglass Dowty | ddowty@syracuse.com The Post-Standard Email the author | Follow on Twitter on May 30, 2014 at 4:03 PM, updated May 30, 2014 at 5:11 PM Mark Roberts Officer Christopher Fuller DeWitt, NY -- A caregiver in a group home for people with disabilities knew in February something wasn't right. A resident's welfare benefits card had been wiped out in a matter of weeks. The employee discovered this after taking the resident shopping. There was no way that much money should have been spent so quickly. DeWitt police were called. While the group home was run by the Hutchings Psychiatric Center in Syracuse, the home was located in DeWitt. Detective Chris Fuller obtained the expense histories for benefit cards belonging to all the residents in the home. He tracked those expenses to Sam's Club and Price Chopper, among other places. Those were both places with membership programs that allowed Fuller to find out who actually bought the groceries. Sam's Club required a membership card and Price Chopper had the AdvantEDGE card. Fuller discovered that one of the group home workers, Alphonso Bradshaw, 62, had used the card. He also tracked purchases to Bradshaw's wife, nieces and other friends and family. The total amount of benefits stolen was $17,332.90 during a two-year period. Expenses included luxury food items like crab legs, steaks and shrimp. Sometimes there were two or three orders per purchase. "They were pretty much doing their grocery shopping with these cards," Fuller said. The number of victims also expanded during the investigation, encompassing five at the DeWitt group home and four others at a Syracuse group home, Fuller said. That included all of the residents whose benefit cards Bradshaw had access to, the detective said. These were lower-functioning people who needed assistance when going shopping in the community. Some residents lost more than $3,000 each to Bradshaw, according to a criminal complaint. During the investigation, Fuller also discovered that another worker, Ethalyn Crowder, 51, also stole from a patient, he said. She knew Bradshaw, but the two didn't appear to be colluding together on the crime, the detective said. Meanwhile, Hutchings alerted the state Inspector General's Office, which has oversight in regards to the hospital. The Inspector General's Office contacted Fuller. The office provided hospital records, including Bradshaw's timesheets and resident records showing whether they had been taken shopping on days the cards were used. The evidence showed that the cards were used by non-authorized people on days the residents were not shopping, Fuller said. Last week, officials from the inspector general's office arrived in town to collaborate with Fuller in interviewing suspects and witnesses. Bradshaw confessed to stealing the welfare, saying he sold the cards to friends, family and a store on the city's South Side in exchange for money to support his crack cocaine habit. Inspector General Catherine Leahy Scott announced the charges Thursday against Bradshaw and Crowder. She also listed nine of Bradshaw's friends and family who made purchases on the stolen cards. (The full list is in previous stories.) Fuller credited an alert caregiver for uncovering the thefts. "Luckily, one employee was on top of things," Fuller said. "The balance was much higher, but he knew there was no way the resident had spent that much money in a short amount of time." Now, the state Inspector General is going to probe more group homes to see if other workers are abusing the system in the same way, Fuller said. Source: http://www.syracuse.com/news/index.ssf/2014/05/how_dewitt_investigator_uncovered_17k_welfare_theft_at_syracuse_psychiatric_hosp.html

Rutherford Foster Care Concerns Updated: Friday, May 30 2014, 07:34 PM EDT A Rutherford County woman fears for her two-year old son's safety after he was taken by D.S.S. Jessica Lovelace says she has no idea where her 2 year-old son is now. She says she knows D.S.S. took him from her imperfect but loving home and put him in an abusive one. Jessica Lovelace says her two year old son was a happy toddler, then in December tragedy struck when his baby sister died. Lovelace says her daughter was born premature with a cleft palate and accidentally died of malnutrition. "I didn't make no mistake with my daughter. Because when I left the hospital I was under the impression I was doing right not wrong and if I needed to do more I would have been there," says Lovelace. With her baby's death under investigation, D.S.S. placed her other child in foster care. Lovelace says she noticed some bruises on him during the first two visits, but it was the third visit on Wednesday that prompted her to call 911. "These bruises were large. That was hand prints on his arm. They say it was a bite. No you can tell fingers from teeth," says Lovelace. In addition to being covered with bruises, Lovelace says he was filthy and smelled like urine. D.S.S. workers say they are working on the problem. "We check somebody out and when we place a child in a home, we feel sure they're safe. But we can't predict what could happen. But when we find out something happened we take immediate action," says John Carroll with Rutherford County D.S.S. Carroll would not say if the toddler had been removed from the foster home. The Rutherford County Sheriff's Department says they are investigating the foster parents and right now they're not saying who they are. Rutherford Foster Care Concerns Source: http://www.wlos.com/shared/news/features/top-stories/stories/wlos_rutherford-foster-care-concerns-16451.shtml

Report on Children in Foster Care Breaks New Ground A new report that WestEd contributed to is an "invaluable tool" for school districts as they develop plans to improve the academic achievement of youth in foster care, says Jesse Hahnel, the Director of the National Center for Youth Law's Foster Youth Education Initiative. The Invisible Achievement Gap, Part 2 (PDF) examines the relationship between foster care characteristics and academic achievement for students in foster care. According to the report, students who lived in group homes or had experienced three or more foster placements in one school year had the lowest academic achievement of all students in foster care. This report follows an earlier WestEd report, The Invisible Achievement Gap, Part 1, describing the dismal academic achievement of California's 43,000 school-aged students in foster care. In this latest study, researchers found that regardless of the characteristics of their foster care experience, students in foster care remained a distinctively disadvantaged subgroup. The Invisible Achievement Gap, Part 2, is a collaboration between the Center for the Future of Teaching and Learning at WestEd and the California Child Welfare Indicators Project. Source: <http://www.wested.org/new-report-on-children-in-foster-care-breaks-new-ground/>

Third DeSoto teen accuses teacher of having sex with him Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on gmail Share on email Share on print More Sharing Services 6 Posted: Jun 05, 2014 6:29 PM PDT Updated: Jun 05, 2014 6:29 PM PDT By: Calvert Collins - bio | email A third DeSoto teen has come forward to accuse his teacher of having sex with him. He joins two other 16-year-old boys who took English from Pamela Jones at Athletes for Change - a treatment facility and school in Glenn Heights for troubled teens. Once news broke of Jones' arrest for indecency with a child, the third teen told administrators he too was involved with her. All three teens were about to be discharged from the six-month program when the alleged sexual encounters happened. Dallas police have interviewed the first two and will interview the third. Jones' husband called the program's president on Tuesday morning and informed him of the alleged sexual encounters between his wife and her students. Dennis DeVaughn, president of Athletes for Change, says he had no choice but to turn her in. "We have an obligation, once any abuse or neglect we're notified of, we have not only a moral, but a legal obligation to make that call and we did," DeVaughn said. Dallas police say the first alleged incident happened on April 26 in Jones' car parked outside the victim's aunt's house. The second occurred on May 31 in her house where her four children played in another room. The third teen claimed he and Jones met at a Chili's, then went with her to a nearby motel. Jones started teaching English in January at the program. DeSoto ISD contracted with Athletes for Change and paid Jones' salary. The students inside Athletes for Change aren't typical. There are only 14 boys who live, play and study inside the residential facility. All have criminal records and have been court-ordered to the program. The organization's president fears the allegations will have long-term effects on his facility. "It's a shame, but we did the best we can in our program," DeVaughn said. Source: <http://www.myfoxdfw.com/story/25708135/third-desoto-teen-accuses-teacher-of-having-sex-with-him>

County tightens laws for group homes Group homes in neighborhoods limited to 4 people 1 By Gabriel Khoulis gkhoulis@covnews.com 770-728-1409 Newton County residents have consistently spoken out against efforts to open group or personal care homes in their neighborhoods, saying extra traffic and noise will ruin the peaceful nature of their neighborhoods and open the door for future unwanted development. Over the past several years, county commissioners have generally sided with residents and turned down applications that faced significant resistance. At the May 20 board meeting, the Board of Commissioners changed the county's law to make it even more difficult to open a group or personal care home in a Newton County neighborhood. The Board voted 4-0 (Commissioner Nancy Schulz was absent) to change the county's ordinance to place further restrictions on group homes in residential areas, including: -- Outlawing group homes from having more than four residents, including the manager -- Requiring the manager to actually be a resident of the home -- putting this use in line with other home occupation businesses Group homes already require a conditional use permit to locate in residential areas -- they're also allowed in some commercial zonings -- but now they'll have to meet the extra requirements. If a group home operator wants to have more than four people living in the home and wants the manager to be a non-resident, then the group home must be placed in a commercial setting. Jenny Carter, with the county attorney's office, said the change was made because concerns have consistently been raised about the compatibility of larger homes in residential areas. Carter recommended limiting the number of residents to four, based in part on studying other counties' ordinances and the fact the average household size in Newton County was 2.93 people (based on U.S. Census statistics from 2008 to 2012). During the public hearing required for an ordinance change, a man spoke in opposition to the change, saying group homes that keep youth often need to have at least six to eight people in order to make a profit. He said the state will only provide so much funding per person. In addition, the man said forcing group homes to move to commercial areas take children out of residential areas and put them into less appropriate commercial areas. Group homes serve multiple functions, including housing people with physical or mental disabilities who need help with basic life tasks. Group home voted down During the zoning portion of the May 20 meeting, before it had voted on the group home ordinance change, the Board of Commissioners voted down a personal care home proposal. Leroy Mack was seeking a conditional use permit for a personal care home to have up to five residents along with one resident manager at the 1,900 square-foot home at 110 Roberts Road, off of Brown Bridge Road. Roberts Road ends in a cul-de-sac and about 30 lots have access to the road. Multiple Roberts Road residents opposed the home, saying they would like for their quiet road to remain completely residential, including Scott Miller, who provided a detail slide show presentation. Miller said the personal care home could lower other residents' property value and resale ability. The Board voted 4-0 to deny the request for a conditional use permit. Source: <http://www.covnews.com/section/1/article/52932/>

Man convicted of sexually assaulting woman at group home for mentally ill patients in Aurora THE ASSOCIATED PRESS May 31, 2014 - 3:11 pm EDT AAA BRIGHTON, Colorado — A jury has convicted a man of sexually assaulting a 55-year-old woman at a group home for mentally ill patients in Aurora. The Adams County District Attorney's Office says 50-year-old William Jesse Rattler was convicted Friday of sexual assault on an at-risk victim. Prosecutors say he and his wife were operating an unlicensed home for mentally ill patients. Rattler was charged with two counts of sexual assault on an at-risk victim involving two women who were living at the home. The jury convicted him of one count but acquitted him of the other. Rattler is scheduled to be sentenced July 30. Source: <http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/e2c86994097c4145adfb2068b2ad7e4/CO--Sex-Assault-Patients>

Woman's group home thefts alleged Posted: Friday, May 30, 2014 10:21 pm MENOMONIE — A 42-year-old Lake Hallie woman has been charged with stealing items from a group home where she works in Elk Mound. Erin L. Instenness of 3555 S. Joles Parkway, has been charged in Dunn County Court with eight counts of theft of movable property, with each charge carrying a maximum penalty of three years in prison and a $10,000 fine. The thefts occurred April 1, online court records show. A warrant was issued Friday for Instenness' arrest. Source: http://www.leadertelegram.com/local_news/story/article_acd4d4c8-e872-11e3-a35c-001a4bcf887a.html?mode=print

Marin grand jury urges county to beef up foster care program Report says better funding, communication needed By Nels Johnson njohnson@marinij.com @nelsjohnsonnews on Twitter Posted: 05/31/2014 04:21:52 PM PDT Marin officials need to pay more attention and allocate more funding to foster care programs, recruit more foster parents and improve staff communication with them, according to the civil grand jury. The jury's latest report, "Shining a Light on Foster Care," says a $5,000 budget for recruiting foster parents is inadequate and asserts communication involving social worker staff and parents needs improvement including "a protocol to return calls within 24 hours." In addition, the county Department of Health and Human Services should "budget sufficient funds to provide foster children with therapy by licensed clinical psychologists or therapists rather than relying predominantly on interns," the jury said. Heather Ravani, assistant health and human services chief who oversees foster care, said officials welcome the jury's detailed review, noting the nature of the recommendations speak well of the overall program and the dedication of the professional staffers involved in it. Budgets can be increased, she noted, but recruiting foster parents is always a challenge. Those interested may call 473-5028 or go to marinhhs.org/foster-care. Overall, foster parents report good experiences with the staff they deal with, Ravani said, noting, "We pride ourselves on having good relationships with foster parents." And the use of interns, she said, has been abandoned under new federal health care procedures. "We do appreciate the thoroughness of the jury report and the attention they gave to the program," she added. The jury noted that the number of children in foster care fluctuates, rising from 79 in July 2012 to 101 during 2013. Last February, 91 children were in foster care. "Though the numbers may appear small, their need is great," the panel said. "The challenge is the successful balancing of child safety with the preservation of families." The jury concluded that decisions on removing a child from a family home are difficult, quoting a court official as saying some cases are so close "it's impossible to know exactly what to do." Those who suspect child abuse may call 473-7153, the jury said. The jury report reviewed foster program procedures and noted foster parents expressed concern about issues including lack of communication and inadequate monthly reimbursement allowances, which range from $657 for infants and toddlers to $820 for youths 15 to 19. "Nobody makes money fostering children," one social worker told the jury. Source: http://www.marinij.com/marinnews/ci_25873376/marin-grand-jury-urges-county-beef-up-foster

Jury's out on managed care of Medicaid : Business Jury's out on managed care of Medicaid Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2014-06-01T00:15:00Z 2014-06-04T13:28:33Z Jury's out on managed care of MedicaidBy Jim Doyle jdoyle@post-dispatch.com 314-340-8372 and Virginia Young vyoung@post-dispatch.com 573-556-6181 stltoday.com June 01, 2014 12:15 am • By Jim Doyle jdoyle@post-dispatch.com 314-340-8372 and Virginia Young vyoung@post-dispatch.com 573-556-6181 Loading... × Related Photos « Buy Now » A rainbow colored covered walkway connects the new Centene

building to the original on Wednesday, May 14, 2014 at Centene in Clayton. Photo by Stephanie S. Cordle, scordle@post-dispatch.com Enlarge Photo

Managed care companies make unconscionable profits In “Who best to deliver care” (June 1), reporters Jim Doyle and Virginia Young did a great job in writing around the elephant in the room: nam... Read more In 2008, Centene Corp. took on a contract to manage health care for 30,000 foster children in Texas — a tough new challenge for the Clayton-based Medicaid contractor. Texas state caregivers had been prescribing a lot of psychotropic drugs to these children and adolescents. As these youngsters were shuttled from one house to another, Centene executives said, state authorities often lost track of which medications the children were taking. “I think the state understood that their ability to manage this population was limited,” said Keith Williamson, Centene’s general counsel. Within a year of winning the contract, Williamson and other Centene executives said, the Texas foster care program was being more effectively managed: The state budget for foster children had declined, and the number of psychotropic drug prescriptions was reduced significantly. One key: Centene created a “health passport” for the children, an electronic medical record that follows them from county to county and into adulthood. Centene executives cite their success with the foster care program as an example of how a managed care company can provide quality care while saving money. But in Texas and other states, managed care of Medicaid continues to spark debate. “There are some cost savings — the Texas Legislature wouldn’t do it otherwise. (But) with the rollout of any managed care in a state, there are always concerns about quality of care,” said Clayton Travis, a health coverage policy analyst at Texans Care for Children. F. Scott McCowan, a clinical professor at University of Texas School of Law and director of the Children’s Rights Clinic, agreed that Centene has significantly reduced the number of psychotropic medications for foster kids through a “retrospective review” of children’s medications. But McCowan says it may take years before the state realizes significant cost savings in the foster care program. And managed care has yet to solve the problem of recruiting enough physicians willing to accept Medicaid rates of pay, he adds. While trends have favored managed care of Medicaid — about 35 states and the District of Columbia now contract with for-profit companies to manage their Medicaid population — there have been some high-profile stumbles along the way. In Kentucky, litigation continues over Centene’s early termination of its Medicaid contract. Centene executives say that Kentucky’s contract rates were based on misleading information regarding its Medicaid population. In Texas, state officials last month canceled a managed care contract with a Xerox subsidiary. The move came after the attorney general’s office sued to recover hundreds of millions of dollars that the company allegedly paid for Medicaid claims that were not properly reviewed. Xerox, which denies any wrongdoing, blamed unscrupulous dentists for taking advantage of the program. In 2012, Connecticut jettisoned its Medicaid contractors, saying it preferred to use the millions that went to administrative costs and profits to instead boost pay for primary care doctors and improve care. The head of the Medicaid program said the state lost confidence in the managed care contractors. “Their measured performance is not impressive,” Mark Schaefer told Kaiser Health News. MISSOURI HESITATES In Missouri, where lawmakers again turned down federal money to expand Medicaid eligibility, there also was reluctance to expand managed care. Currently, three managed care companies provide services in about 54 of the state’s 114 counties, covering less than half of the state’s 823,761 Medicaid participants. Legislative committees this year recommended a Centene-backed bill that would have shifted more children and parents into managed care policies run by private insurance companies. “I believe it’s a way to give the state some cost-certainty and better health outcomes,” said the sponsor of one of the bills, Rep. Todd Richardson, R-Poplar Bluff. But the House shelved the bill, and a similar proposal stalled in the Senate. Sen. Rob Schaaf, R-St. Joseph, a physician, led the opposition. “It’s not been shown that managed care for sure saves money,” Schaaf said. “There’s mixed research on that. We do know that it tends to limit the care of some people, especially the ABD (aged, blind and disabled) population, who are less able to navigate their way through it.” A study commissioned by the Missouri Medicaid program and performed by Mercer and Associates reported 2.7 percent annual savings for the current Medicaid managed care groups in Missouri. But Schaaf said that savings was wiped out by the study’s margin of error. And critics also contended that any savings stemmed from inadequate provider networks and denial of medically necessary services. In the end, the managed care bills died when the Missouri Legislature’s session ended May 16. “I would rather not just do stuff to make managed care companies wealthy but rather, to take better care of the recipients or save the taxpayers money, or both,” Schaaf said. The Missouri Medicaid Coalition, which is seeking to expand Medicaid coverage in the state, has not taken a position on whether these services are better provided by a state agency or a contractor. Bill Scheffel, Centene’s chief financial officer, insists managed care is focused on improving health care while saving tax dollars. “We provide quality health care, we save states money and we give them budget predictability,” Scheffel told the Post-Dispatch, adding that profit margins for the managed care industry are comparatively narrow. To measure the quality of health care, the company uses various metrics, such as rate of receiving immunizations, prenatal checkups, dental care for children, and follow-up appointments after discharge from a hospital. They also include hospital readmission rates and polls that show “member satisfaction” among Medicaid enrollees. One of Centene’s goals is to make certain patients receive proper care and don’t unnecessarily drive up their health care costs. For example, too many Medicaid patients use emergency rooms for routine care, rather than visit primary care physicians, said Holly Benson, chief executive of Healthcare Enterprises LLC, a Centene holding company that oversees four subsidiaries. “If you invest in primary care and preventive care, it means they’re getting the right care in the right setting,” she said. So far, managed care companies in Missouri appear to be meeting patients’ expectations. “I haven’t heard a lot of complaints about any of the managed care companies, and usually I do if someone is a bad actor in the health marketplace,” said Andrea Routh, executive director of the Jefferson City-based Missouri Health Advocacy Alliance, a watchdog organization for patients. But the jury is still out regarding the industry’s track record in delivering quality health care. “Based on the data provided by managed care companies, we’ve seen some modest increases in quality of care and some cost savings,” said Dr. Karen Edison, director of the Center for Health Policy at the University of Missouri. But it’s not clear if expanding managed care would yield similar results, she said. “The Medicaid managed care population is largely women and children, and they’re healthier and less costly than the older patients with multiple, chronic conditions like diabetes, heart disease and cancer,” Edison said. “It’s hard to imagine that you can translate the cost savings seen from managed care of women and children to the sickest Medicaid patients,” she said. Tim McBride, a health economist at Washington University, serves on a health policy advisory committee for Centene. Yet even he thinks Centene and other managed care companies need to provide more data to determine the effectiveness of these programs. “We as taxpayers give a check to these companies,” said McBride, “and we don’t get as much evidence or information back as I would like to see.” Source: http://www.stltoday.com/business/local/jury-s-out-on-managed-care-of-medicare/article_81ce0fc8-9eb4-5796-9dca-2072bac34cf6.html

MacArthur Foundation Fellow Tells World How to Improve Foster Care System Posted: 06/02/2014 12:51 pm EDT Updated: 06/02/2014 12:59 pm EDT Print Article Share 33 Tweet 14 Email 2 tumblr reddit Recently, I asked Founder and Publisher of Youth Communication, Keith Hefner, his opinion on the current state of the foster care system because he has been helping foster youth use writing as a cathartic tool for decades. Beyond winning the MacArthur Foundation Fellowship, he received the Luther P. Jackson Award for Educational Excellence from the New York Association of Black Journalists in 1977. Hefner is a 2004 graduate of the Columbia University Graduate School of Business, Institute for Non-Profit Management, Executive Level Program. Marquis Cabrera: What are your thoughts on the state of the current foster care system? Keith Hefner: The experience of foster care for most young people is the foster family. While many families are excellent, far too many are not. And, of course, children lose whatever support they have from those families at age 18 or 21 -- which is far too early for most to succeed on their own. Marquis Cabrera: Can you tell me about Youth Communication and any innovative programs you support? Keith Hefner: I am disposed to like programs that increase youth voice in the system. Represent [Magazine] does that through writing. The Mockingbird Society does that (in Washington State) through lobbying. Foster Youth in Action does that in several states by training young people to advocate for themselves and their peers at the county and state level. The Jim Casey Youth Initiative runs programs in several states that increase youth involvement. These are all wonderful programs, but they are afterthoughts. They need to be built into the system and well-funded. Marquis Cabrera: What methods or approaches do you believe will help to innovate the foster care system inasmuch that more youth will beat the odds? Keith Hefner: To put pressure on systems to improve foster families. The first step should be systematically collecting reports from foster youth about the quality of their placements. These teen reports should not be determinative, but they should figure strongly in agency decisions. For example, consistently low-scoring homes should be given the opportunity to improve. Such a scoring system would expose the low quality of many homes, and put pressure on agencies to close them (which would likely create a massive shortage of foster homes). The prospect of that would put real pressure on agencies and government to figure out how to solve the problem. Solutions could include more intensive support for birth families (to cut the number of youth who need foster homes in the first place), better training for foster families, higher pay for taking foster youth to attract a wider range of families, etc. But the first step is to create methods by which young people themselves can rate their experience in foster homes so agencies and the public cannot just bury their heads in the sand and ignore what's happening. Another thing we have noticed is that youth often have multiple workers -- employment specialist, housing specialist, social worker, etc. The cast of adults that teens must interact with is too large, and as we know, when everyone is responsible, no one is responsible. It's well known that a connections with stable, caring adults are important for youth in care. Systems should be designed to increase the likelihood that foster care professionals can serve that role. Finally, foster care systems need to find ways to provide a series of (declining) supports to youth until their mid- or late-20s -- housing, medical care, tuition support, mental health services, etc. For foster children, the state is the parent. For children who are not in foster care, the "new normal" is that many or most parents continue to provide support for them children well into their 20s (e.g., financial support, tuition, a bedroom, keeping the children on their health plan, etc. etc.). The state, as parent, needs to recognize that parenting has now changed and expelling youth at 18 or 21 -- especially the society's most vulnerable youth -- is cruel and immoral. The few post-18 and post-21 supports, like ETVs, need to be greatly expanded. For example, youth in care should leave the system with a voucher for $5,000 in mental health services, to be used any time up to age 40. That could be paid for by cutting the vast amounts of money spent forcing youth into therapy before they are ready to engage it. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/marquis-cabrera/macarthur-foundation-fell_b_5418977.html?utm_hp_ref=impact&ir=Impact

Barbara Brooks: Former foster parent charged with raping children ruled competent to stand trial WCPO Staff 4:37 PM, Jun 2, 2014 Barbara Brooks Copyright 2013 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. CINCINNATI -- A Colerain Township woman accused of sexually abusing children she babysat was ruled competent to stand trial Monday. Barbara Brooks, a 63-year-old former Hamilton County foster parent, pleaded not guilty in June 2012 to charges of sexually assaulting four different children she babysat between January 2000 and Feb. 27, 2007. Officials said the rapes occurred in her homes in Mt. Healthy and Springfield Township. During court proceedings in September 2013, defense attorneys attempted to introduce seven new witnesses to the case after opening remarks were made. Prosecutors were unaware of the witnesses, and some of them were in court listening to the start of the trial. That created an issue of separating witnesses from jurors and the court beforehand. Prosecution in turn was offered an option to allow the witnesses, declare a mistrial, or not allow the witnesses to be called. The third option, according to prosecutors, would have left open doors for multiple appeals if a jury convicted Brooks. Attorneys decided a mistrial, and a new trial date with new jurors, and possibly a new defense, was the best option. That new trial will start Sept. 2. Brooks is charged with 15 counts of rape and three counts of gross sexual imposition. If convicted of all the charges, she faces the possibility of spending the rest of her life in prison, said Hamilton County Prosecutor Joe Deters. Brooks was a foster parent from 1996 until 2008, according to Hamilton County Job and Family Services spokesperson Brian Gregg. Police arrested Brooks on June 7, 2012 after a relative of the alleged victims, who are now 18 and 23-years-old, reported to police that the babysitter had abused them between 2000 and 2003. In 2008, a child sex abuse complaint was made against Brooks, said Gregg. Cincinnati police investigated, but didn't file charges. Brooks resigned from the foster care program and Job and Family Services officials permanently terminated their relationship with her. "These cases are always difficult to comprehend," Deters said in a previous news release. "We are glad that the victims had the courage to come forward so that we can make sure that Brooks is never in a position to care for a child again." Source: <http://www.wcpo.com/news/local-news/hamilton-county/barbara-brooks-former-foster-parent-charged-with-raping-children-ruled-competent-to-stand-trial>

News Application withdrawn to convert Litchfield's Tollgate Hill Inn into drug treatment center The Tollgate Hill Inn in Litchfield. Shako Liu — The Register Citizen By Shako Liu, The Register Citizen Posted: 06/02/14, 7:31 PM EDT | Updated: 4 days ago # Comments A blueprint of the drug treatment facility that was proposed for the Tollgate Hill Inn as seen in April. Shako Liu — The Register Citizen LITCHFIELD >> Tollgate Center, LLC withdrew its proposal to convert the Tollgate Hill Inn into a treatment center for at risk youth last month, just one month after their application was submitted to the town's Inland Wetlands Commission. Nancy Lacko, secretary of the Inland Wetlands Commission, said the application never went to a hearing or to the Planning and Zoning Commission before it was withdrawn. The original plan said the proposed facility would provide an inpatient program for youths age 13-18, targeting three to four month stays. Clay Lifflander, owner of Hudriv Investments LLC, a small cap private equity firm in Dobbs Ferry, New York, said previously that he and fellow owner James Foy found the Tollgate Hill Inn in a search for potential locations in the Northeast. They thought the property was ideal for the proposed facility because of its buildings and acreage. After they dropped the application in Litchfield, Foy and Lifflander are scheduled to present a similar plan to the Zoning Board of Appeals of West Stockbridge, Massachusetts next week. They've proposed to turn the Williamsville Inn into a residential drug treatment center for adolescents. Jerry Elias, a home owner in West Stockbridge, said he has a house half a mile away from the Williamsville Inn, and he goes there every summer and stays as long as possible. He doesn't think it's the right location for the proposed facility. "They have this very sophisticated proposal [in Litchfield], but then they just suddenly packed up and left," Elias said. "It's a great concern to me. I think there is a need for this type of facility, but I wonder that's the appropriate location for it. I wonder if people in Litchfield felt the same way." Lacko said she doesn't know why there was such a sudden withdrawal of the application, as no reason needs to be provided for withdrawal. Owners of the Tollgate Hill Inn couldn't be immediately reached for comment. Reach Shako Liu at 860-489-3121 ext. 316. Source: <http://www.registercitizen.com/general-news/20140602/application-withdrawn-to-convert-litchfields-tollgate-hill-inn-into-drug-treatment-center>

Group home owners believe they are targeted by licensing changes - Las Vegas MyNews3 - KSNV Group home owners believe they are targeted by licensing changes Video Images State requirements pose threat to group home residences Group home owners and advocates are outraged and feel their homes are being threatened by new classification requirements Reported by: Sandra Gonzalez Email: sgonzalez@mynews3.com Print Story Published: 6/02 6:29 pm Share Updated: 6/03 11:46 am LAS VEGAS (KSNV & MyNews3) -- Group home owners and advocates are outraged and feel their homes are being threatened by new classification requirements. They say proposed legislation would devastate their industry. The Gentle Breeze looks like an average house in its neighborhood near Spring Mountain and Rainbow, but it's not. It has emergency exits, a sprinkler system, and lots of documents on the walls. That's because it is a licensed group home. Resident Ronald Schaub, an active 87 year old resident, loves his independence there. "I like being around people my own age, not that I dislike younger people because I was there," Schaub said. The home is classified as one that all patients are physically able to get out, should there be a fire. The owner, Miki Ton, wishes she could have the home also licensed to care for patients with physical or mental challenges including Alzheimer's. She, along with almost 200 advocates for group homes who were at a health care committee meeting, believe the rules changed on them without notification. "It's been hectic because we can't fill up our homes because we cannot get Category One residents. We went through this for over a year," Ton said. She says to change classifications for patients who cannot evacuate alone would cost the home thousands of dollars to change the sprinkler system to meet the requirements, for starters. And if Ronald falls or becomes disabled, he fears he'd have to leave this home and go to assisted living, where he's been before. "It was not the best place. It was nothing like this," he said. Chief of the State Fire Marshal Division Pete Mulvihill says his division has not yet made the classification requirement changes that group home leaders are complaining about. Both parties are divided and legislators have heard a lot of testimony, but they're confident that eventually common goals will be agreed upon. The battle will continue as advocates to retain the single family resident status are asking Gov. Brian Sandoval and federal leaders for help. Source: http://www.mynews3.com/content/news/Group-home-owners-believe-they-are-targeted-by/CNBE_8uPjku_9AC77YGRjQ.csp

U.S. Department of Education Releases Guidance to Improve Educational Outcomes of Children and Youth in Foster Care Details Created on Monday, 02 June 2014 20:21 Written by IVN Washington, DC - Today the U.S. Department of Education is releasing resources to emphasize and support the needs of foster care students. In addition to new guidance, ED has launched a dedicated web page, Students in Foster Care, and issued a joint letter with the U.S. Department of Health Human Services to education authorities about increasing educational stability for children and youth in foster care. The guidance released today will make it easier for caseworkers, child welfare agencies and tribal organizations responsible for the placement and care of children and youth in foster care to have direct access to their education records. The guidance provides states with information to implement the Uninterrupted Scholars Act (USA), an amendment to The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA). It also details the amendment's impact on the confidentiality provisions in the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA). The guidance will help states improve educational and developmental outcomes for students in foster care by providing authorized agencies with access to the records they need to meet the early intervention or educational needs of the students. "This guidance is part of our efforts to raise awareness of the needs of this vulnerable student population. When a child is removed from their family and placed in out-of-home care the disruption is extraordinary. Many have to change schools once or sometimes several times," said U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan. "This guidance will help lessen the impact of these disruptions and help provide students in foster care with educational stability, by making their school records accessible to those in charge of their care. We also hope it will shine a light on the benefit of these students staying in their schools and within an education community that can support them through a difficult period." The USA amends FERPA in the following two ways: First, it permits educational agencies and institutions to disclose students' education records to authorized child welfare agency representatives and tribal organizations. Second, the USA also allows educational agencies and institutions to disclose students' education records to authorized child welfare agency representatives and tribal organizations following a judicial order, without requiring additional notice to the parent. ED is working with the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to provide new resources to support educators and child welfare professionals in their work to improve the well-being of students in foster care. ED and HHS released a letter advising local educational and child welfare agencies to coordinate efforts to ensure the educational stability of students in foster care under the Fostering Connections Act. ED also launched the Students in Foster Care webpage this week, which provides information on important laws, guidance and technical assistance materials. The new guidance, letter and web page are just three of ED's continuing efforts to improve outcomes for children and youth in foster care. The Department has also worked to raise awareness of the impact of the Uninterrupted Scholars Act on the IDEA. The Obama administration believes that if we can improve the lives of the most vulnerable students, it will lead to better outcomes for all students. Source: <http://www.imperialvalleynews.com/index.php/news/national-news/9034-u-s-department-of-education-releases-guidance-to-improve-educational-outcomes-of-children-and-youth-in-foster-care.html>

Panelists talk with Maine tribes about trauma of foster care, separation from families Print Email Share Tweet Nell Gluckman | BDN Ester Attean, the co-director of Maine-Wabanaki REACH, presents on the history of Maine's Truth and Reconciliation Commission at the United South and Eastern Tribes Inc. board meeting. Buy Photo By Nell Gluckman, BDN Staff Follow on Twitter Find on Facebook Posted June 02, 2014, at 7:40 p.m. Last modified June 03, 2014, at 6:28 p.m. BAR HARBOR, Maine — The organizers of the Maine Wabanaki-State Child Welfare Truth and Reconciliation Commission hope the work they have done uncovering the stories of tribal members who were involved with the child welfare system will inspire other states to tackle such an undertaking. "One of our dreams would be if this work spread out to other states and helped other state child welfare agencies resolve what is going on with them," Martha Proulx, a manager at the Office of Child and Family Services, told the social services committee of United South and Eastern Tribes Inc., an association of tribes that is holding its semiannual board meeting in Bar Harbor this week. Proulx was one of several representatives from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission and Maine-Wabanaki REACH, the organization that established the commission, who talked to the committee about their work on Monday afternoon. The mission of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission is to understand the trauma suffered by members of the Wabanaki tribes who were taken from their families by the state and put into foster care or boarding schools over the course of more than a century. In 2013, a committee of five commissioners was sworn in and given the task of gathering testimony from tribal families and welfare workers in order to establish a more complete history of the events and create a set of recommendations for how to improve child welfare services and avoid such events in the future. "We're about trying to make visible truths that have been held inside, in some ways, as secrets," Carol Wishcamper, one of the five commissioners, told the social services committee on Monday. "Telling the truth, in our minds, will lead to the healing," she said. "And that healing, hopefully, will bring change." Wishcamper said those working with the Truth and Reconciliation Commission to gather statements have acquired about 40 testimonies from members of the Wabanaki tribes — the Penobscot Indian Nation, the Micmac, the Maliseet and the Passamaquoddy tribes in Pleasant Point and Indian Township. The commissioners visited all the Wabanaki communities to introduce themselves and hold talking circles, Wishcamper said. They've met with about 110 people in these settings. Community members who attend are invited to give statements publicly, or they also may speak to a single commissioner with a trained statement gatherer present, said Rachel George, the commission's research coordinator. The statements are recorded on an iPad and archived with the participant's permission. Those who choose to participate are given full control of the statement, George said. They can edit, revise or completely withdraw their statements if they prefer. The presence of a commissioner during the statement gathering is important to the process, George said. "They want to tell [their story] to somebody who is an authority figure," George said. "So many people have been told that that never happened, or 'I don't believe you.'" The commission's entire budget comes from fundraising efforts, Wishcamper said. Jointly, the commission and Maine-Wabanaki REACH have a budget of about $800,000. Starting in late June, the commission will turn its attention to Mainers who are or were involved with child welfare services and are not members of a tribe. George said they hope to hear from foster and adoptive families, Department of Health and Human Services personnel, individuals who provide counseling, lawyers and police officers. Truth and reconciliation commissions exist worldwide to provide survivors of traumatic events the opportunity to heal. A commission was convened in South Africa after apartheid and another was created in Canada to address that country's use of boarding schools for First Nations children. Maine's panel is unique because both the victims and the perpetrators have been involved from its inception, according to Proulx, who works with Maine-Wabanaki-REACH. Maria Girouard, the Penobscot community organizer, said this work goes beyond talking about child welfare services. "The work of the TRC has really enabled the community to start talking about healing," she said. "To start recognizing the many, many hurts that we have." Source: <http://bangordailynews.com/2014/06/02/news/state/panelists-talk-with-maine-tribes-about-trauma-of-foster-care-separation-from-families/>

Cuts devastate area treatment center Perry Behavioral Health Choices can only apply for $200K in state grants Jun. 4, 2014 | 0 Comments Email Print Share LinkedIn Tumblr StumbleUpon Reddit Del.icio.us Digg A Purchase Image Stanton Villa in New Lexington is a residential treatment center for women. / Chris Crook/Times Recorder Written by Anna Rumer Staff Writer Filed Under News Local News John Kasich Purchase Image Zoom Brooke Byers, right, and Lori Sharrer talk about their time at Stanton Villa in New Lexington. The facility, shown above, is a residential treatment program for women. / photos by Chris Crook/Times Recorder More ADVERTISEMENT NEW LEXINGTON — When Lori Sharrer was injured in a car accident at age 19, she never dreamed the painkillers she was prescribed would send her into a spiral of addiction. After 16 years of drug addiction, during which she lost custody of her two children, Sharrer is now a proud graduate of Perry Behavioral Health Choices' Stanton Villa program and coming up on 100 days of sobriety. But the program that helped her escape the clutches of drugs is in now in danger after a grant "realignment" by Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services leaves PBHC scrambling for funds. Stanton Villa, a 10-bed women's facility for those struggling with addiction, provides 80 Ohio women per year with programming and education helping them to fight their addiction, with an average of 64 women emerging about six weeks later sober and on their way to physical and emotional recovery. "I learned to love myself here. I hated myself," Sharrer said. "Sometimes I think I wasn't that bad. I never shot up or anything, but I was that bad with the pills. I saw hundreds of doctors in one year. The drug addiction, it just catches on, and you have no conscience. You don't care about anything but your next high." The services that helped Sharrer are now looking for a new way to stay open after a change was made in the way the Ohio Department Mental Health and Addiction Services are awarding Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment Block Grants. The department has decided to end the practice of "floating" money from the Ohio general revenue funds to SAPT providers while waiting for the actual grant money to come in from the federal government, often months late. Realigning the distribution schedules to match one another will "restore predictability and sustainability to the field," OMHAS Director Tracy Plouck said. However, realignment requires the existing $62.6 million of federal funding awarded in Ohio grants to be spread over six quarters rather than the normal four quarters, leaving Fiscal Year 2015 $20.9 million short starting in July. Plouck admits this realignment will jeopardize some local services but blames the government's delayed grant disbursement practices for the necessity of action. "We're as frustrated as everyone else and hope that the federal government will reverse its decision or resolve the problem it has created," she said in a statement. The Muskingum Area Mental Health and Recovery Board — which serves Coshocton, Guernsey, Morgan, Muskingum, Noble and Perry counties — will have to deal with a funding reduction of almost $365,000 because of the realignment. PBHC, the organization with the largest allocation, will face almost a 33 percent reduction in its $800,000 budget. Its most affected service will be Stanton Villa, which has up to this point been run almost solely with SAPT grant funds. The program costs a minimum of $492,400 annually, but this year, PBHC will be allowed to apply for only $200,421 from the government. "It's like a kick in the gut," Executive Director Theresa Snyder said, "We're going to make plans to stay open at this point, but I honestly don't know." The funding cuts come at a time in which PBHC was already having financial difficulties, after an employee was caught embezzling more than $200,000 in 2012. Although $60,000 was covered by their insurance and the employee was ordered to pay back the sum of the money, Snyder said she doesn't expect to see the money again. The combination of loss and grant reduction means Stanton Villa would only be able to pay four of its eight employees, most of whom are making just above minimum wage. The burden of the additional funds will fall upon outpatient treatments offered by the organization, Snyder said, as the majority of Medicaid and private insurance reimbursements come from nursing services. Medicaid expansion was supposed to be the saving grace of the realignment, with Ohio MHAS estimating an infusion of $557 million into the field in FY 2015. Stanton Villa's clientele was already vastly covered by Medicaid, however, and Snyder said she has seen virtually no increase in Medicaid payments since the expansion. Even outpatient treatments haven't been impacted greatly, she added, with less than a 10 percent payment increase now responsible for the deficit in other areas. Though Gov. John Kasich's mid-biennium review has allocated an extra $3 million to aid local chapters who are struggling with their budgets, local organizations are still bracing for the inevitable disruption to their services. Snyder hopes to get assistance from the community in approving a levy renewal later this year as well as from the Muskingum Area Mental Health and Recovery Board. The board has promised to help the program stay open, but Snyder knows there might not be much it can do at this point. "Their hands are pretty much tied," she said. "I know they'll do everything they can to help make sure we have the funding we need, but the field is very busy and there's a lot of demand and just no funding." Snyder said she has seen a worrying increase in the need for services in the past few years, especially concerning heroin and methamphetamine addicts. Even without hard drugs in the picture, there's plenty of work to be done, she said. Before she came to Stanton Villa, Brooke Byers hadn't realized she had a problem with alcohol. Growing up in an alcoholic home, Byers had lost more than 80 jobs and was arrested for public intoxication and a DUI before her time at Stanton Villa. "I was a blackout drinker. Once I started, I couldn't quit until I was passed out, picked up, or pulled over," she said. Wanting a mindset change but not expecting to stop drinking, Byers admitted herself to Stanton Villa in 2014. "Coming (to Stanton Villa) was probably the best thing I could have done for myself. It changed my life tremendously especially with my family," she said. "Just understanding that I don't have to be that person for people to like me. I'm very funny, I'm very bright. I'm just so happy now. I had gotten to the point where I didn't like me anymore." After graduating the program within one week of one another, Sharrer and Byers are now living together, attending 12-Step meetings and looking for jobs. They keep in touch with the clinical staff that helped them get their lives back in line, and they agree that, without the support and programming provided by PBHC, they wouldn't be where they are today. The option for those struggling with addiction could become even more rare if grant funding continues to be slashed, Snyder said. The next closest facility comparable for women is at the Rural Women's Recovery Center in Athens, a 16-bed facility Intake Coordinator Becky Barber said already faces a significant waiting list filled with women from all across Ohio. Long waiting lists and scrounging for funding aren't new for those involved in the mental health and addiction fields, though. Even at such a pivotal moment in what Kasich called "a public health crisis," Snyder continues to see a reticence of both individuals and the government to pay into addiction services, part of which she believes comes from anger centered on drug-related crime. "This field is necessary and relevant, but no one wants to fund it or look at it," she said. "We're angry and resentful. ... There's a lot of good that comes out of here, but it's bare bones."

Source: <http://www.coshoctribune.com/article/20140603/NEWS01/306030021/Funding-cuts-devastate-addiction-treatment-centers>

Dunwoody zoning board delays vote on Manget Way eating disorders center By Ralph Ellis The Dunwoody Zoning Board of Appeals decided Tuesday night to postpone a decision on an eating disorders treatment facility that wants to operate in a Dunwoody residential neighborhood. The board will take up the question again at 7 p.m. June 16. The Center for Discovery (CFD), a California-based company, spent about $1 million on a house and property at 1364 Manget Way for the eating disorders treatment center. Up to six teenaged girls would live there while being treated, the CFD says. Residents of the neighborhood, with support from the Dunwoody Homeowners Association, are fighting to stop the center. They're worried about traffic and complain the city green-lighted the center without telling them. About 120 people showed up for the Tuesday night meeting, most of them opponents of the facility. Many wore stickers that said, "I support the Manget Way neighbors." The zoning board of appeals must first decide whether it's even going to discuss the situation. City planner Rebecca Keefer signed a zoning confirmation letter Jan. 13, and ordinances say the residents' appeal should have been filed within 30 days. But they didn't file until April 22. Linda Dunlavy, lawyer for some homeowners, said they had no idea the eating disorders center was in the works. The city didn't tell anybody and CFD didn't post signs or notify people in the neighborhood, she said. She said the zoning board of appeals is entitled to consider "the totality of the circumstances" and that the clock should start from the time residents heard about plans for the facility. But Josh Belinfante, local lawyer for CFD, said there's no gray area. "The ordinance provides no exception," he said. Some board members seemed conflicted. Vice chairman Ardy Bastien wondered, "What gives us the right to decide beyond the 30 days?" Chairwoman Gerri Penn said she had "a real problem with expecting people to appeal the unknown." "I find it impossible to appeal in 30 days if they don't know about it," she said. If the zoning board of appeals decides to hear the appeal, the next question will be whether the city correctly classified the eating disorders facility. Keefer's zoning confirmation letter says it's a personal care home, which is allowed in a residential neighborhood. Dr. Craig Brown, CEO of CFD, said doctors and nurses would periodically visit the center but would not stay there 24/7, though psychologists would. "They're not there for medical treatment," Brown said of the patients. "They're there for psychological stabilization." Dunlavy contends the city made a bad decision and that the facility should actually be classified as a medical treatment facility, which zoning laws don't allow in residential areas. "She [Keefer] merely relied on the claims of the Center for Discovery," Dunlavy said. "This is not a personal care home. This is a commercial business. This is a medical facility." No matter what the zoning board of appeals decides, the next step in the battle may be Superior Court, since any decision cannot be appealed to the city council. Up to six girls between the ages of 11 and 18 would stay in the eating disorders center and receive 24-hour care. The typical treatment duration runs between 45 and 90 days, the CFD said. Brown said this would be CFD's first operation in Georgia. Other eating disorders centers are also located in upscale neighborhoods, he said, because that's where the problem is usually found. Source:

<http://www.reporternewspapers.net/2014/06/04/zoning-board-delays-vote-magnet-way-eating-disorders-center/>

Two deaths in privately run group homes stir concern in N.J. June 3, 2014, 10:06 PM Last updated: Wednesday, June 4, 2014, 3:10 PM By STEPHANIE AKIN STAFF WRITER The Record elizabeth lara/staff photographer The North Jersey Developmental Center in Totowa is one of two state-run facilities that are being phased out. Two men with severe mental and physical disabilities died from choking on food months after they were transferred from the North Jersey Developmental Center in Totowa to privately run homes as part of a massive restructuring of care for the disabled, according to union members and family advocates. The circumstances surrounding the deaths of Richard Fornarotto, 54, and Steven Cortes, 65, are uncannily similar and point to what some advocates for the disabled say are widespread problems in the way the state has undertaken its plans to close the North Jersey Developmental Center and the Woodbridge Developmental Center, a process that the state says will help improve treatment to thousands of people by better integrating them into their communities, but which advocates say has unnecessarily upended hundreds of lives. The deaths come at a time when families of those in the developmental centers are fighting the closures, saying such a drastic change could have devastating consequences. However, many circumstances surrounding the deaths are unknown, including whether they were the result of unfortunate accidents or whether the shift from one facility to another played a role. State officials, citing federal medical confidentiality laws, declined to confirm details about the deaths, including Cortes' and Fornarotto's names. But Nicole Brossoie, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Human Services, wrote in an email that there was no "causal connection" between deaths of residents and transfers from community centers. "Individuals with developmental disabilities often have multiple medical conditions that can shorten their lifespan — regardless of where they live," Brossoie wrote. "The administration firmly believes that all individuals deserve to be cared for in the least restrictive environment available." Fornarotto and Cortes were both under the care of state-appointed guardians, meaning they had no living relatives to manage their affairs. They had both lived in state institutions like the North Jersey Developmental Center since they were children but were transferred to private group homes in recent months, part of the first wave of residents to make the move. And they both choked on bits of food — Fornarotto on a cupcake and Cortes on a sandwich — according to sources with knowledge of their cases. "These deaths sadden me but they do not shock me," said Geoffrey Dubrowsky, a member of the New Jersey Council on Developmental Disabilities, which advocates for the disabled, and a relative and guardian of three people with disabilities. "When you move somebody from a facility where they have been most of their lives, surrounded by the people who know what kind of care they need, these results must be expected." Fornarotto and Cortes were among the 639 residents scheduled to be moved from the North Jersey and Woodbridge centers when the state announced the controversial decision in August 2012 to close both institutions and move as many of their residents as possible into privately run group homes, which are smaller and more integrated with surrounding communities and can help some of the higher functioning residents live fuller lives. The move reflects a long-standing shift in national experts' opinions about the best way to care for the developmentally disabled — people with such conditions as intellectual disabilities, autism and cerebral palsy — and responds to budget constraints, changes in public policy and regional New Jersey politics. The closures will save the state $27 million for the next fiscal year, money that will be redirected to community housing, where there are long waits for beds, as well as day programs and other services, officials have said. With a $1.6 billion budget, the state Division of Developmental Disabilities provides services to more than 40,000 disabled individuals, of whom 2,340 have lived in the seven developmental centers. An additional 8,000, most living with their families, are on a state waiting list for community services, such as group homes and day programs. The decision to close the centers was also hastened by a 2013 settlement with a state advocacy group, Disability Rights New Jersey, which argued in a federal lawsuit that the state was not complying with U.S. Supreme Court mandates to allow people with developmental disabilities to live in the least-restrictive and most-appropriate setting. The settlement sets a deadline for mid-2017 for the state to move, "all individuals determined to be eligible for community placement" — about 600 people. The developmental centers are closing far sooner. The Totowa center is scheduled to close on July 1 and the Woodbridge center will close on Jan. 1. Brossoie said that, per capita, only Arkansas and Mississippi have more people with developmental disabilities living in institutions and that Governor Christie recommended $102 million in, "new and annualized funding for community placements and community services and supports," in his budget recommendation for fiscal 2015. But Christie's plans to bridge a state budget gap over the next 13 months, announced late last month, also include skipping a $13 million one-time payment to those that provide community-based services to the disabled, such as — adult day care centers and group homes. "Has any of this happened in a developmental center in the past? Yes it has, but not to this degree," said Jenelle Blackmon, staff representative of the AFL CIO, who represents staff members at the Totowa center. The union stands to lose dozens of jobs when the centers are closed. Brossoie did not answer questions about the rate of deaths in developmental centers versus the rate of deaths in community settings. Cortes was born in Newark but had been in developmental centers since he was 8 years old, according to remarks at his funeral in May. Caregivers at the Cerebral Palsy Home in Livingston, where he was transferred in October, said he wasn't there long enough for them to know him well, but they were moved by his smile and his evident joy in living. He had a medical condition that made it difficult for him to swallow, although he was a very fast eater, according to staff members familiar with both cases who relayed detailed information to Blackmon and a relative of a developmental center resident. The staff members would not speak to a reporter directly because they feared for their jobs. Cortes was supposed to be on a diet of only ground-up or pureed food and to always be in direct eyesight of a caregiver, those sources said. But he was alone in an office on May 17 when a staff member heard a thump, the sources said. No one knew he had choked until the paramedics who were called to respond found the food lodged in his throat, the sources said. Fornoratto was on a group trip from the Benchmark Group Home in Branchburg to a ShopRite in February when he grabbed a cupcake from a shelf and stuffed it in his mouth. When he started choking, the group home staff members ran to get water and asked store customers to watch him, the sources said. State law requires staff members to immediately perform CPR and call 911, Blackmon said. He died Feb. 19. Blackmon said the staff at a developmental center would have known that because they are required by federal law to meet higher standards of care than group homes, which are designed for people who can function at a higher level and would benefit from greater integration into the community. Advocates against the closings said they accepted the rationale behind the decision to move people out of the developmental centers. But they said the process has been carried out too quickly to ensure the safety and well-being of vulnerable residents. "I believe their safety is being compromised," said Assemblywoman Valerie Vainieri Huttie, D-Englewood, who said she had received numerous calls from family members who are concerned about reports of the deaths. Email: akin@northjersey.com - See more at: <http://www.northjersey.com/news/two-deaths-in-privately-run-group-homes-stir-concern-in-n-j-1.1028426?page=all#sthash.lms4yem2.dpuf>

Marystown council votes against Blue Sky youth home proposal CBC News Posted: Jun 04, 2014 11:45 AM NT Last Updated: Jun 04, 2014 4:12 PM NT Facebook 27 Twitter 0 Reddit Share 27 Email Related Stories Marystown residents upset about plans for youth home Teen worried about future after Burin youth home closure The council in Marystown has voted against a proposal from a company to open a youth care home in a part of the town. Area residents attended a public meeting on Tuesday night to express their concerns regarding Blue Sky opening and managing the home in their neighbourhood. A group of concerned residents in Marystown attended a public meeting on Tuesday night, as council voted to reject Blue Sky's proposal to open a youth care home in the town. (CBC) Blue Sky takes care of foster children who have a myriad of needs — from those requiring temporary accommodation to those dealing with serious issues. Town council had previously held two meetings for residents to voice their opinions. "You keep saying this is a foster home, but it is a group home who can house children with drug addictions, sex offenders, aggressive behaviour, youth corrections involvements and so on," Marystown resident Wanda Barron said. The residents said the company quietly moved youth with behavioural issues from Burin to Marystown, with no notice to the residents, and no regard for their concerns. "This affects the safety of our kids, it is a needless worry put on our seniors that may affect their health, we will not feel safe and no one else will want to live there," Barron said. Councillors said their decision was not an easy one because the lines between a group home and a business are unclear. Marystown Councillor Lisa Slaney. (CBC) But in the end, council voted against the proposal from Blue Sky. "If we're going to move forward as a council and say, 'Yes this is a permitted use in a residential area,' we then have to realize the precedents that we set and how you bring that to the future because you will open up a can of worms," said councillor Lisa Slaney. In March, the provincial government announced a new framework for staffed residential care. Part of that process included the awarding of a private contract for three youth care homes on the island: T.J. MacDonald Achievement Home in Burin, Pine Heights Group Home in Grand Falls-Windsor, and the Bay St. George Youth Assessment Centre in Stephenville. Blue Sky CEO Anne Whelan said she was disappointed with Tuesday's decision and the reaction from the residents. "Fundamentally, what we heard tonight was a 'not in my backyard' kind of conversation," said Whelan. "People don't mean to be judgmental about people with physical or mental impairments. I think engaging in more public understanding is really the key." Council did, however, leave the door open for Blue Sky to propose another location for the home. Whelan said she will appeal council's decision first. Source: <http://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/newfoundland-labrador/marystown-council-votes-against-blue-sky-youth-home-proposal-1.2664386>

Disabled Clients' Protections Lacking Disturbing questions about how the state Department of Developmental Services is protecting its clients Comments 1 Email Share EDITORIAL The Hartford Courant 7:00 p.m. EDT, June 3, 2014 Two news stories reveal disturbing gaps in the state Department of Developmental Services' safety net. State auditors have discovered a large backlog in the list of group home workers fired for abuse of clients, The Courant reported this past week. The registry list alerts other group homes not to hire the fired employees. It's a good system — if it's kept up to date. But the auditors discovered there's now a backlog of 184 cases waiting to be added to the registry, meaning those former employees could be hired again by unsuspecting group homes. Topics Southbury Accounting and Auditing Maps Connecticut, USA Purchase your Officially Licensed UConn National Championship Gear HERE! That exposes residents to an unacceptable level of risk. Creating the registry isn't as simple as just identifying those who have been fired because of abuse. It's a complex process, including notifying the workers, conducting investigations and holding hearings on each case. Those accused must be given due process. But acting quickly is important. Having such a large number of open cases means potentially dangerous people might again be able to work directly with those living in group homes. To its credit, DDS has hired four additional staff to help process the backlog, with one more to join soon. It also says it is fixing the "fragmented" way it gathers information about workers. Those are steps in the right direction. Another issue facing DDS is the 2012 death of a resident of Southbury Training School. The relatives of 61-year-old Jackie Kiley Jr. became alarmed when the intellectually disabled man, who lived at Southbury for many years, developed an infection and became sicker and weaker. They tried to intervene on his behalf, but Mr. Kiley died. As reported in The Courant on Sunday, subsequent investigations have shown serious lapses in the treatment he received. The two cases are not parallel; Southbury is not a group home, and there is no abuse alleged in Mr. Kiley's case. But these reports raise disturbing questions about how DDS is keeping the state's most vulnerable residents safe. Source: http://www.courant.com/news/opinion/editorials/hc-ed-dds-bad-service-20140603.0.2805383_story

Foster care employee accused of sexual abuse Rikki Salzman faces charges NEXT STORY York County student makes cancer discovery Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text Foster care employee accused of sexual abuse MILLERSVILLE, Pa. — A Lancaster County foster care employee is accused of having a sexual relationship with a boy at a Millersville home. Rikki Salzman Rikki Salzman View Large Photos Rikki Salzman Video: Watch Susan Shapiro's report Photos: Recent Susquehanna Valley arrests Rikki Salzman, 32, is charged with institutional sexual assault, corruption of minors and unlawful contact with a minor. Officials say the acts took place at the Aborvale Manor facility, a foster care placement home, in Millersville. Salzman was an employee there. Officials first became aware of the alleged child abuse from the Department of Public Welfare on Jan. 16, 2014, according to the affidavit of probable cause. In a mandatory reporting form, the DPW relayed allegations that a female employee was involved in a sexual relationship with a juvenile male. When investigators spoke to the supervisor of Arborvale Manor, Mervin Fahnestock, on Jan. 23, they learned that there had been an internal investigation and Salzman had been suspended and later fired. Staff logs from Arborvale showed that there had been documented meetings with Salzman to discuss a variety of "inappropriate and unprofessional" interactions between her and the male residents in the facility, according to the affidavit. "Fahnestock also provided a video from the facility which is monitored by surveillance cameras that showed an inappropriate interaction between (Salzman) and (the alleged victim). Fahnestock also provided a documented interview of another male resident ... in the facility that provided extensive information and details regarding the sexual/intimate relationship that was occurring between Salzman and (the alleged victim)," the affidavit states. Several months later, the affidavit states that investigators talked to the alleged victim, who said that he and Salzman "were involved in an intimate relationship that included hugging and kissing on multiple occasions during his stay at Aborvale Manor." Read more: <http://www.wgal.com/news/foster-care-employee-accused-of-sexual-abuse/26328250?ixzz34Bxpz8wX>

Living in a tent under a DC bridge How often do so many of us walk past or drive by a homeless person and wonder how they ended up on the streets? Andrea McCarren reports. WUSA9 Andrea A McCarren, WUSA 6:23 p.m. EDT June 3, 2014 905 CONNECT 30 TWEETLINKEDIN 4

COMMENTEMAILMORE WASHINGTON, D.C. (WUSA9) -- How often do so many of us walk past or drive by a homeless person and wonder how they ended up on the streets? It is almost an everyday part of life in a city like Washington. WUSA9's Reporter Andrea McCarren and photojournalist Joe Martin recently stopped to talk to a woman living amidst a row of tents. "This is my home," said Shontay Alexander, unzipping her tent. When she turned 21, her time in the foster care system came to an abrupt end. "On my birthday, they were like, bye," she said. She has been homeless ever since, giving up one of her few possessions to buy a tent that's now her home. "I sold my laptop," she told us. "It's hard. It's sad." Shontay's mother died when she was just 13. "I don't know my Dad," she said plainly. As a little girl, Shontay bounced between foster homes. Today, unemployed and alone, her welfare checks go straight into a bank account. "I have dreams. I do. To get off the street. Do something positive," said Shontay. Among her meager belongings is a teddy bear. "Reminds me of my daughter," she said. A two year-old who is now in foster care, just like her mom. Shontay denies having any issues with drugs or alcohol. She says she has never been diagnosed with a mental illness. And she has no criminal history. And now, she says her primary goal is getting her daughter back. We wondered if she had any family and were able to track down Shontay's brother in DC. WUSA9 asked if he knew she was homeless and living in a tent. He said she "chose to go that way." So we asked, "Does anyone lucid ever choose to be homeless?" Her brother responded, "We're as baffled as you are." Source: <http://www.wusa9.com/story/news/local/2014/06/03/dc-woman-homeless-foster-care/9924595/>

Director must repay $23,000 stolen from Grafton group home By Gary V. Murray TELEGRAM & GAZETTE STAFF gmurray@telegram.com 4 comments | Add a comment WORCESTER— The former director of a group home for disabled adults in Grafton was placed on probation and ordered to pay full restitution after pleading guilty Wednesday to charges of stealing $23,000 from several residents of the home. Prosecutors said Sonia J. Boutin, 49, of Watertown stole the money from six residents of a Seven Hills Foundation community home for developmentally disabled adults in 2003 and 2004, while working as residence director of the home at 118 Providence Road in Grafton. Ms. Boutin was placed on probation for 5 years and ordered to pay $23,000 in restitution to the foundation after pleading guilty in Worcester Superior Court to six counts of larceny of more than $250 from a disabled person and two counts of identity fraud. The identity fraud charges involved allegations that Ms. Boutin, formerly of 19 Nottingham Road, North Grafton, used the personal information of residents to establish telephone and electricity accounts in the victims' names for her North Grafton home. As residence director, Ms. Boutin was in charge of making sure the group home's bills were paid and residents' money was used for their benefit, according to Assistant District Attorney John A. O'Leary. The prosecutor said Ms. Boutin instead cashed checks made payable to residents under her care, purchased money orders and deposited them into her personal checking account. Mr. O'Leary said the thefts came to light after a 2004 foundation audit uncovered discrepancies in patient funds, including missing cash. Ms. Boutin told foundation officials the discrepancies were the result of "paperwork errors" and that she would straighten them out, according to the assistant district attorney. He said Ms. Boutin did not return to work after being contacted by foundation officials. When Grafton police reached out to her, she told them they could keep her last paycheck and that she would not be returning to the area, according to Mr. O'Leary. Her lawyer, Keith T. Higgins, said at an earlier hearing in the case that Ms. Boutin called Grafton police before being indicted in 2005 and left a message saying she was in a shelter for battered women and would not be returning to Grafton any time soon. Saying Ms. Boutin's crimes involved "a significant breach of fiduciary duty" to "vulnerable victims," Mr. O'Leary recommended that she be adjudicated a common and notorious thief and sentenced to 2 to 3 years in state prison with 5 years of probation and an order of restitution. The recommendation that Ms. Boutin be judged a common and notorious thief, which was later adopted by Judge Janet Kenton-Walker, increased the maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment on the larceny charges to 20 years. Mr. O'Leary said the Seven Hills Foundation repaid the victims and that the restitution paid by Ms. Boutin should go to the foundation. Mr. Higgins recommended that his client, a divorced mother of three, be placed on probation and ordered to pay back the money she stole. Mr. Higgins said sparing his client a prison sentence would enable her to continue working at the realty company where she is now employed so she could make her restitution payments and would also allow her to raise her 14-year-old son. If Ms. Boutin failed to pay the restitution or otherwise violated the terms of her probation, she could ultimately be sentenced to up to 20 years in prison, Mr. Higgins told the court. Judge Kenton-Walker, who discussed the case with the lawyers in a lobby conference before accepting Ms. Boutin's guilty pleas in open court, said advisory sentencing guidelines did not call for a prison sentence in Ms. Boutin's case. The judge also said she felt it was more important that Ms. Boutin be allowed to keep her job so she could pay back the money she took. "No matter how miserable and rotten your own life is, nobody has the right to take advantage of people who can't help themselves, and that is just what you did," Judge Kenton-Walker said to Ms. Boutin. "You need to pay back every dime that you took — no matter how long that takes you," the judge said. Judge Kenton-Walker, who retained jurisdiction of the case, ordered that $2,000 in restitution be paid immediately and that the balance of the money be paid at a rate of not less than $100 a month. "I will be watching, trust me," the judge warned Ms. Boutin. "You have a chance here. Let's see what you do with it. It's entirely up to you," she said. Contact Gary V. Murray at gmurray@telegram.com. Follow him on Twitter @GaryMurrayTG Source: <http://www.telegram.com/article/20140604/NEWS/306049579/1116/RSS03&source=rss>

Woman will stand trial for beating in Detroit group home Caretaker accused of using broom handle, cord to beat autistic woman Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print Email DETROIT - A 49-year-old Detroit foster home worker has been bound over to stand trial in the videotaped beating of a disabled woman with a mop handle and extension cord. Kadia Konate Dennard, 49, is accused of using a broom handle and extension cord to hit the victim, Vera Gossett, at Strathmoor Manor. She had originally been charged with abuse and assault, but an additional charge of torture was added during a hearing Thursday. Quick Clicks Woman charged with beating autistic resident in group home Video exposes caretaker beating autistic woman A co-worker at the home recorded video of the incident on her cellphone. Gossett has a severe form of autism and can't speak. Her mother, Jacqueline Gosset, has mobility issues and decided to move her daughter into the group home seven years ago. She said she trusted the home until she saw the cellphone video, which contains graphic content. "It hurts, it hurts, it's painful to see my child like this," the mother said. "It's very painful." Dominique Blade, the certified nursing assistant who shot the video, had just started working at the group home. She said she was so disturbed by what she saw that she decided to start recording things. Blade testified that she saw Dennard abuse Vera Gossett for three hours. "She started hitting her ... all over her body," Blade said. "She [Konate-Dennard] told me, 'Well this is the way you have to handle her, she's an animal, you have to handle her and deal with her like this,'" Blade said. The owner, Bartholomew Ajulufoh, has had his license revoked and it isn't the first time he's been investigated by the state. Last year he was found guilty for how another resident had been restrained. Vera Gossett has been moved to a different home and is doing better. The other residents have also been taken out of the home. Source: <http://www.clickondetroit.com/news/court-hearing-thursday-for-woman-charged-with-beating-woman-in-group-home/26327516>

R.I. tightens procedures for prescribing psychotropic drugs for children in foster care Published: June 04, 2014 11:20 PM Comments 9 104 49+10 0 3 12 By Lynn Arditi Lynn Arditi Providence Journal Journal Staff Writer larditi@providencejournal.com Published: June 04 2014 11:20 PROVIDENCE, R.I.— Rhode Island's child welfare agency has brought in a psychiatrist to oversee the prescribing of psychotropic medications for youths in its care in the wake of growing nationwide concerns about the overreliance on these medications for foster children. More than 500 youths in the care of the state Department of Children, Youth and Families in 2013 were prescribed antipsychotics, antidepressants and other psychotropic medications, according to an analysis of data from Neighborhood Health Plan of Rhode Island, an HMO that serves Medicaid recipients. Many of these children were prescribed multiple medications, which increases the risk of side effects. "There are too many kids on meds and too many kids on multiple meds," said Dr. Elizabeth A. Lowenhaupt, a child and adolescent psychiatrist at Rhode Island Hospital who is overseeing the program at DCYF. "It's really about making sure we have services that are alternatives to the meds." In one extreme case, she said, a child was on six psychotropic medications and a doctor was requesting permission to add a seventh to treat the side-effects. Instead, she said, after talking it over "he decided to take the child off three medications and the side effects went away." Until this year, the DCYF had allowed regional administrators with no medical expertise to sign medication consent forms authorizing requests for new prescriptions for children and adolescents who have no parent or other legal guardian to oversee their medical care. New regulations enacted by the DCYF now require these administrators to get the approval of the department's consulting psychiatrist, in this case Lowenhaupt, for any new prescriptions for psychotropic medications for these youth. Administrators also must identify "red flags" for any new medication requests — including those for children under the age of 6 or for those taking three of more such medications — and seek the consulting psychiatrist's permission before approving them. Other red flags, she said, include children who are prescribed two or more of the same category of medications, such as two antidepressants, those taking more than the daily recommended dosage, and those who are taking any psychotropic medication without therapy or other behavioral health services. The data from Neighborhood Health showed that 518 youths — 22 percent of the 2,360 youths in state care — were taking psychotropic medications during the fourth quarter of 2013. Of those, 140 were taking two psychotropic medications, 86 were taking three and 54 were taking four or more. (A report released in April by the General Accounting Office found that hundreds of foster children in several states studied, as well as those in the general population, were prescribed five or more psychotropic medications even though there is no medical evidence to support such a regimen.) Of the 518 youths up to age 21 taking such medications, 442 were 17 years old or younger, according to Colleen Carron, an epidemiologist and director of data and evaluation for the DCYF. Among them were 32 children under 6 years old, the report showed. Most of those children were 4- or 5-year-olds who were being treated with ADHD, or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, medications, Lowenhaupt said. The report provided no comparison data for the use of psychotropic drugs among foster children with those of youths in the general population. However, a 2011 report by Neighborhood Health showed that children in state care in Rhode Island were three times more likely to be prescribed psychotropic medications than those in the general Medicaid population. Nationwide, children in foster care are prescribed psychotropic medications at a rate four times higher than the general Medicaid child population, and more often receive multiple medications, according to a study by the nonprofit Center for Healthcare Strategies. Rhode Island is one of six states where state child welfare officials are working with the Center for Healthcare Strategies to improve policies and procedures to reduce reliance on psychotropic medications in children. The other states are Vermont, New York, New Jersey, Illinois and Oregon. The project, funded by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, provides technical support to help states develop and adopt more effective protocols for use of psychotropic medications. Janice DeFrances, the DCYF's director, said the department had applied for a grant to participate in the project in 2011, and when it wasn't chosen she offered to fund the effort anyway. The department has since received some technical support from the center for its work, she said. On Twitter: @LynnArditi Source: <http://www.providencejournal.com/breaking-news/content/20140604-r.i.-tightens-procedures-for-prescribing-psychotropic-drugs-for-children-in-foster-care.ece>

Youth collects gifts for kids in foster care Story Comments Share Share Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size
Previous Next Nile Trice Posted: Thursday, June 5, 2014 12:05 am Youth collects gifts for kids in foster care By Bridges O'Neil St. Louis American Pattonville High School sophomore Nile Trice recently celebrated her 16th birthday in a unique way. Nile hosted a party at the Creve Coeur Ice Skating Rink where she collected more than $1,600 in gifts to be donated to the Foster and Adoptive Care Coalition. Attendees at Nile's birthday party earned free admission by bringing items most frequently requested by foster children – an MP3 player, bath and body products, a gift card or a remote control vehicle. It is a tradition Nile began when she was in the sixth grade. Within five years, she has raised nearly $5,300. "The one thing I've learned through my birthday charity events is that we all have the power to touch another person's life in a positive way," Nile said. "You just have to want to do it and not let anyone or anything stop you." Because of her efforts, Nile said many people have told her that they plan to host similar birthday charity events. "We actually had a family that was thinking about adopting a child," Nile said. "We're all very proud of her," said Pattonville Principal Joe Dobrinic. Dobrinic said that Nile is a dedicated student and a young lady with outstanding principles. Each year she selects a different local charity to support. This year she wanted to do something more personal in honor of her 9-year-old brother Jadon, who is adopted. The Foster and Adoptive Care Coalition is a United Way agency. For 25 years, the agency has strived to create permanency in every foster child's life by recruiting and supporting foster and adoptive families in the St. Louis metropolitan area. Nile donated her gifts to the organization's Birthday Buddies Program, coordinated by volunteer Fonda Fontroy Richards. The program matches donors with requests from foster children who would not otherwise receive a gift on their birthdays. Richards, who has volunteered with the Foster and Adoptive Care Coalition for nearly four years, is the adoptive mother of six and the proud grandmother of 15. "Foster parents are often short on funds but long on love," Richards said. "They want to give their foster children a gift, but just don't have the financial means. We are always looking for more donors – especially for older teens who often go without." Like Alexis, who will celebrate her 16th birthday in July and is in need of a donor to make her birthday wishes come true. Alexis has been in foster care for about two years. For her 16th birthday, Alexis has requested tickets to a St. Louis Cardinals game, a gift card to Forever 21, or a Fandango gift card that she could use at a movie theater. According to Shelley Thomas-Benke, director of FosterServe Volunteers, over 50 percent of children in the Birthday Buddies Program are teenagers in transitional or independent living who have high chances of aging out of the foster care system without families. "They really have no adult in their life close to them who are buying them gifts," Thomas-Benke said. Gifts should be donated by July 16 to reach Alexis in time for her birthday. Prospective donors can view the birthday wishes and notify the organization of their desire to fill a request or more. For more information, visit www.foster-adopt.org/BeaBirthdayBuddy. Follow this reporter on Twitter: @BridgesONeil. Source: http://www.stlamerican.com/news/community_news/article_0788f08c-ec5d-11e3-bed7-0019bb2963f4.html

Report Raises Concerns Over Homelessness After Foster Care Daily Real Estate News | Wednesday, June 04, 2014 About 25,000 young people age out of foster care each year, with a large number then facing homelessness, according to a new report released by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and Department of Health and Human Services. The report sounds an alarm to policy makers for the need to increase funding to programs to better serve this population and for greater research to determine what type of housing programs best work for former foster-care children. Youth who age out of the foster-care system may be the "single age group most at risk of homelessness," according to research. Young people in foster care typically age out of foster care on their 18th birthday. Some states extend that to 21. Between 11 and 37 percent of youths who age out of foster care have experienced homelessness, according to the report. What's more, research shows that 25 to 50 percent of these young adults leaving foster care "couch surf, double up, move frequently within a short period of time, have trouble paying rent, and face eviction." "All the available research underscores that these young people are too often faced with the hard choice of being precariously housed or living on our streets or in our shelters," says Katherine O'Regan, HUD's assistant secretary for policy development and research. "As we work toward ending homelessness, policy makers at every level of government must consider the unique challenges of young people who exit a system of care with little or no housing options available to them." Source: "New Report Examines Housing Challenges Faced by Youth Aging out of Foster Care," RISMedia (June 3, 2014)

How one county keeps troubled teens out of prison 10 June 2014 by Ted Roelofs Bridge Magazine contributor Benton Harbor resident Cree Coates on intensive probation for young offenders: "It made a huge impact." More than a decade ago, Berrien County, in Michigan's southwest corner, embarked on a juvenile justice plan built from a core belief: Nothing matters more than family. In 2001, officials in the county's family court system created programs aimed at kids who were at greatest risk of committing a serious crime. One program targets truant teens who had scrapes with the juvenile court system, in which parents and teens learn constructive family dynamics. Another offers intensive probation for teens at high risk of committing crimes, where probation officers all but become part of the family. The results are impressive. According to court data, the average number of juveniles sent to juvenile facilities dropped from 120 in 2001 to 35 in 2010. Recidivism dropped from 56 percent in 1998 to 17.5 percent in 2012. Elvin Gonzalez, who oversaw the programs when he became director of the Family Court in 2001, said the strategy is built on matching high-risk youth with community-based programs with proven track records. Those programs most often begin and end with family. "It is the central domain in a youth's life. Kids live in an ecology. They don't live in a bubble. They live in a family system," Gonzalez said. Before the shift, Gonzalez said, kids who were getting in trouble were usually sent to out-of-county juvenile facilities for a year or more. But that strategy did not address the troubled homes so often at the heart of their problems. Now many remain in their home community, with resources directed at making home and family a constructive – and not destructive – force in their lives. While the programs cost money, it cost more money to send troubled kids away. The average cost of community-based programs in Berrien County is about $5,000 per youth. The average cost of placing kids in a juvenile facility is $91,710 a year, Gonzalez said. Berrien County sent 112 youths to residential juvenile facilities in 2000. It sent 80 in 2013. Getting to know teens The first step is an in-depth assessment of boys and girls and their risk factors for committing crime. Some at highest risk are placed in a home-based, five-month treatment program known as Multisystemic Therapy, a system developed in the 1970s by a Virginia psychologist. It focuses on the array of factors that affect chronic juvenile offenders, including their homes and families, schools, neighborhoods and peer group. It employs three masters-degree level therapists and a supervisor, engaging the children and family members in individual, family and parent therapy sessions in their homes. Therapists also visit the these young people in school and at community or neighborhood sites. "We have worked with families that are literally homeless," said Edie Zars, who supervises the program. "We have worked with cases of domestic abuse and a parent with chronic health issues. We had youth that have had parents pass away. "The things we do range from helping families get furniture, get transportation, arrange medical treatment. We have a saying, 'Whatever it takes.'" Youths diverted from formal processing in juvenile court are enrolled in a nine-month program that includes multi-family classes and up to 20 family coaching sessions, plus up to 10 months more after the youth completes the program. From November 2010 to June 2012, 44 juveniles were served by this program. Of those, 23 graduated and 11 are still in the program. The others either dropped out or were discharged for getting into trouble. Of those who graduated, 82 percent did not commit new crimes during the following 18 months. The county also operates an intensive probation program that overlaps with the in-home treatment program for highest-risk youths. Two probation officers supervise caseloads of up to 20 juveniles, making frequent contact at home each week. The officers make sure the young people are attending school and meeting other requirements of probation. Part of the family The court-ordered program, typically nine to 12 months, is for youth who have been adjudicated delinquent and are at risk of more serious crime. "We become part of the family," said probation officer Jamey Frank. "We go to the home. We meet them at their jobs — all aspects," she said. "We go to schools. When you see a kid that often for a year, you become really close to them." Frank believes this approach is more likely to work than sending youth away. "Here we are working with trying to maintain in the community the supports they are going to have to live with. The reality is, that's their family and you have to make the best of the situation they are in." In 2006, Benton Harbor resident Cree Coates entered intensive probation at 14 after years of skipping school, getting into fights and running away from home. Coates recalled that her mother, a registered nurse, did her best to help. "I was just a kid with bad behavior. I got around with the wrong crowd," she said. Under intensive probation, she had to produce daily signatures from her teachers that she was at school. She received in-home counseling from a therapist. Probation officer Frank became a most familiar face. "I was seeing her almost every day, even on the weekends. She would just pop up," Coates said. Something clicked. Coates, now 22, completed the program and graduated from high school. She is now married, enrolled in Lake Michigan College and two semesters short of a degree in corrections, parole and probation. "She inspired me to do more with my life," Coates said of her probation officer. "It made a huge impact." Source: <http://bridgemi.com/2014/06/one-solution-for-teenage-criminals/>

Are We Overmedicating Kids in Foster Care? A third of the kids in foster care diagnosed with ADHD have been treated with off-label antipsychotic drugs. That's too many children getting medicine we know too little about. By Dawn Post | Friday, Jun 6, 2014 Share on reddit Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on linkedin Share on stumbleupon Share on email Share on print Share on gmail More Sharing Services 55 A recent study reported in the Journal of Child and Adolescent Psychopharmacology reveals that one third of children in foster care diagnosed with ADHD have been treated off-label with an atypical antipsychotic medication. As a parent, would you consent to your child being prescribed an atypical antipsychotic medication? I submit that the label alone should raise alarm. Atypical antipsychotic medications are major tranquilizers and neuroleptics used to treat psychiatric conditions. Some atypical antipsychotics have received regulatory approval for adults for conditions such as schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, dementia, autism, obsessive compulsive disorder and major depressive disorder. Most atypical antipsychotics are not approved by the Food and Drug Administration for use by children. But they can legally be used off-label, which means the drug can be prescribed to treat a condition for which it does not have FDA approval. News Topics Justice Health and Environment Author Dawn Post About | RSS These medications can cause troubling side effects in adults, including muscle rigidity, slow movement and involuntary tremors resembling Parkinson's Disease, as well as substantial weight gain, among other things. Because of the small body of evidence about the use of atypical antipsychotics by children and teenagers, it's difficult to determine their short term effectiveness and safety. And little is known about their long-term safety and efficacy due to the dearth of studies on this topic. Little is also known among many of the professionals prescribing these drugs about the mental-health impact of entering foster care. When children are initially removed, those who have experienced trauma as a result of removal and the abuse or neglect they suffered in the home will respond in various ways and, thus, there is no uniform means of identifying a traumatized child. For example, some children may suppress their feelings to protect themselves from further disappointment and rejection; others may outwardly misbehave, possibly because that is what they believe is expected of them or because they believe this act of sabotage will allow them to return home. Simply put, it may, in fact, be very difficult to identify from the child's outward behavior whether a child is experiencing trauma. In addition, services often center on correcting the child's behavior in the foster home as reported by the foster parent. As a result, the behaviors are addressed without identifying and treating the root cause. It is undisputed that children in foster care have a disproportionately high prevalence of mental health disorders. In New York City studies have shown that a large majority of children in foster care have a mental health problem serious enough to warrant treatment, yet most remain undiagnosed and untreated or, if they are detected, they are over- or irresponsibly medicated. Moreover, even children who have a diagnosis in foster care do not receive adequate or appropriate mental health services. Even for those families who access mental health treatment, they are generally restricted to one of many "Medicaid Mills" which are in the business of processing as many patients as possible. Assuming they are given a block of time, they are frequently faced with practitioners (frequently interns) who simply do not understand the dynamics of foster care and adoption and who cannot offer successful treatment and interventions. In addition, foster parents simply seek a quick fix to address what they perceive to be disruptive behaviors in the home. As a result, situations like this where foster children are medicated with atypical antipsychotics arise. There is action on a national level to address the issue. The PsychDrugs Action Campaign, an initiative of the National Center for Youth Law in Oakland works collaboratively with former foster youth, their advocates, and state agencies to develop more effective regulation of psychotropic medication for foster children and improved access to alternative treatments. By publicizing progress in states such as Florida, Texas, Georgia, Ohio, and California, the PsychDrugs Action Campaign seeks to help all the states to adopt reforms that are being developed in the most progressive states. For example, in Ohio they are using Pharmacy Benefits Claims data to identify the most dangerous prescribing practices and using psychiatric consults and supports to review the children's cases and the prescribers' progress towards safer prescribing. Particularly in those situations where psychotropic medications were prescribed to children under age of 6, where children were prescribed two or more antipsychotics for more than 60 days, or where children were prescribed four or more psychotropic medications concomitantly. In Texas, a recent law requires that kids who've been prescribed medication be seen by their prescribing physician at least every 90 days and requires that judges overseeing a child's foster care case be informed of behavioral and pharmacological treatments at all court hearings. Unfortunately, New York has not yet responded as other states have with proposed and enacted reforms. The Administration for Children's Services has issued guidelines encouraging physicians to "start low and go slow." According to an ACS "Quality Assurance" document, the prescribing psychiatrist must document his "reasons for prescribing the medication; name and dosage of medication and the date prescribed; previous non-pharmacological interventions; and expected results of the medication and potential side effects." Promisingly, a Psychotropic Medication Committee is currently being formed to provide further guidance in this area for ACS. We need to raise consciousness inside the local child welfare community and beyond. Potential financial motives must be recognized: Psychotropic medication usually elevates the child's classification from a "basic" rate to "special" or "exceptional," a change accompanied by a significant increase in financial compensation. Motivations in reporting of foster children's behaviors must be closely examined not only for financial incentives but also for practitioners taking the easy way out in terms of managing the behaviors. In reviewing records our office has seen a child as young as 2-and-a-half medicated with an atypical antipsychotic for "disruptive, unpredictable, and aggressive behavior." Emphasis must be placed on identifying and securing quality and consistent mental health services for children in foster care outside of the standard "Medicaid Mills" to provide for comprehensive treatment plans for children including therapy, parent-management training and specialized educational programs for biological and foster parents. And individuals like me, a member of the court community, must educate themselves about these drugs and seek to intervene if necessary with the legal tools available to us. We need to do better for our foster children. The views expressed are those of the author and not the organization. Source: <http://www.citylimits.org/conversations/255/prescriptions-and-foster-care>

Ex-boot camp guard sentenced for sex with inmates 0 More By Associated Press June 6 GEORGETOWN, Del. — A former guard at a boot camp program at the Sussex Correctional Institution has been sentenced to three years in prison for having sex with female inmates. Thirty-nine-year-old Christopher Peck of Felton, who had pleaded guilty to six counts of having sex in a detention facility and one count of official misconduct, was sentenced Friday in Superior Court in Georgetown. Delaware's Department of Corrections suspended the boot camp program after Peck was charged in December. The program aimed at keeping first-time offenders from committing new crimes. The News Journal of Wilmington reports (<http://delmarvane.ws/1k29Zvd>) that Peck, an Air Force veteran, admitted in court that what he did was wrong. ___ Information from: The News Journal of Wilmington, Del., <http://www.delawareonline.com> Source: http://www.washingtonpost.com/national/ex-boot-camp-guard-sentenced-for-sex-with-inmates/2014/06/06/1daaae8-eddf-11e3-8a8a-e17c08f80871_story.html

When Foster Youths Reach 18, to Whom do They Turn? When Foster Youths Reach 18, to Whom do They Turn? 5 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email Buy Now Buy Now Aging Out of Foster Care DREW NASH • TIMES-NEWS Roxy McMinn, 18, talks about her future after foster care while Independent Living Coordinator with Magic Valley Youth and Adult Services, Susan Baca listens behind her at the city park Friday, June 6, 2014 in Jerome. 2014-06-07T02:00:00Z When Foster Youths Reach 18, to Whom do They Turn? By Alison Gene Smith alsmith@magicvalley.com Twin Falls Times-News June 07, 2014 2:00 am • By Alison Gene Smith alsmith@magicvalley.com (0) Comments Related Galleries Gallery: Aging Out of Foster Care Blog: Foster Care - More than Fits in Print "Foster kids will try hard to hide and won't open up unless they feel like they trust you," Martin said. Read more JEROME • How do I work a washing machine? Can you send me some pizza money? My car is making a funny sound — help? Parents whose children recently moved out

are familiar with such questions. But to whom do foster care children turn after they reach age 18? A parent isn't always a text message away. Many foster-care children struggle to build the life-long relationships that some people take for granted, said Susan Baca, independent living coordinator for Magic Valley Youth and Adult Services. The agency currently is helping 62 youths aged 18 and over throughout the Magic Valley. Eight more will turn 18 later this year. The program, which contracts with the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare, helps adults become employable, works with at-risk youth and trains foster parents. Once children turn 18, they can sign themselves back into the system until they graduate high school. They must agree to abide by foster care rules but are free to leave any time. That's what Roxy McMinn did when she turned 18. She signed on to stay with her foster parents. Then a few weeks later, she ran into her birth mother. "She said, 'We need to reconnect,' and I said, 'I think you're right.'" That worked for a while, McMinn said. Then she lived with her brother, then went back to her birth mother's house. Now she's looking forward to moving into an apartment near the College of Southern Idaho, where she'll start classes in August. She said education is the goal that keeps her going. She wanted to be the first in her biological family to graduate from high school. Now she's thinking about majoring in early childhood education. Mercedes Martin, 18, recently started college and moved back in with friends where she formerly lived while in foster care. Leaving the system was nerve-wracking and exciting, she said. "It was like, 'I'm going to be on my own. What do I do?' But — 'I'm going to be on my own, this is awesome!'" At 18, Martin moved into an apartment on her own. Then she began to feel overwhelmed and concerned about her safety. A family she had lived with before welcomed her back. "They reminded me, 'You don't have to live alone if you don't want to.'" When Martin was growing up, her family moved a lot — from New York City, to Atlanta, to Twin Falls. They rarely stayed in one place for long. "I don't think I stayed in one place for more than a year," she said. She moved from school to school and struggled with classes. Now, with some stability, she's making progress. She recently started classes at Aletheia Christian College in Jerome. "I've learned more in one semester of college than 12 years of school," she said. Martin described her living conditions in Queens, N.Y., as "the ghetto ... a constant battle for safety." She said she used to carry a pocketknife everywhere and trained in mixed martial arts, focusing on jujitsu. Now that she feels safer, she's focusing on how to budget. Initially when on her own, she worried about budgeting and did a lot of research. "I obsessed," she said. McMinn's biggest worry was all the responsibility that comes with being an adult. "You're 18. If you do something wrong, there are consequences." One of her biggest surprises was learning that she could leave her foster home when she turned 18. Going from two years of rules to freedom was hard, she said. Baca said, "It's immediate independence." She said the independent living programs cover some very basic things that some foster children don't learn. Things such as where to find a doctor, how to make an appointment, how to get transportation, budgeting, banking, cost-comparison shopping, cooking healthful meals and even doing laundry. The agency starts working with foster children when they're about 15 to begin learning essential life skills. Closer to the 18th birthday, each child has a meeting to plan their future. The plan can change but serves as a guideline. The program helps foster children think about college and vocational programs, and some money is available to help pay for much of their college costs, Baca said. The program aims to keep foster children off the streets. "I can't say that hasn't happened," Baca said. "It's not a perfect system." Martin and McMinn are in groups that speak to foster parents, prospective foster parents and social workers. They try to explain how everyone in the system can better help teens. Youth and Adult Services can stay involved with a foster child until age 21 — or 23, if the youth is in college. "They don't make you feel like you owe them," Martin said, but she feels as if she should repay the program somehow. "You pay that back by all the good things you do in your life," Baca told Martin. The Magic Valley is desperate for more foster parents, Baca said. Those who can't be foster parents can help with respite care, giving foster parents a break. That requires a background check and short training. People also are needed to serve on boards and donate items such as suitcases. "Too often, their (foster children's) stuff is moved in garbage bags," Baca said. Call 211, the Idaho Care Line or Magic Valley Youth and Adult Services at 208-734-4435. The goal of foster care is to reunite a child with the birth parents when it's safe, or find a permanent family if reunification isn't possible, Baca said. Some prospective foster parents worry that they'll fall in love with a foster child, then have to give the child up to their biological parents. Others want to try foster parenting but worry about the effects on their birth children. Baca said she tries to work with new parents to quell their fears. McMinn and Martin said they're doing well on their current paths and look forward to the future. "Here, it's like a heaven on earth kind of thing," Martin said. Source: http://magicvalley.com/news/local/when-foster-youths-reach-to-whom-do-they-turn/article_8608f6a0-0f2e-542f-ad01-43640d194e2e.html

Racial Disparities in Michigan's Foster Care System June 6, 2014 by Patrice Garnette A recent report by the Michigan Race Equity Coalition in Child Welfare and Juvenile Justice discusses racial disparities in the Michigan adoption system. Children of color enter into the foster care system at a higher rate due to abuse and neglect (1.3 times more than white children). Children of color also more likely to age out of the foster care system and not return to their families. Of the 13,000 children in Michigan's foster care in 2013, minority children are 2.1 times more likely to age out of the foster care system. Broken down by race, black children are 2.3 times more likely, American Indian children are 1.4 times more likely, and Hispanic kids were 1.1 times more likely to have to leave the foster care system because of their age. Also, black children live with families that are investigated for abuse or neglect at a rate 1.6 times higher than white children. Key suggestions from the report are as follows: Continue to increase the number of foster care workers Increase the level of assistance available to foster care students who are in college or who are working until they reach 21 Improve data collection and increase data-driven decisions for improvement Increase funding to improve measures to prevent foster care neglect and abuse Patrice Garnette, Joint Center Graduate Scholar, The George Washington University Law School. Source: <http://jcpes.wordpress.com/2014/06/06/racial-disparities-in-michigans-foster-care-system/>

Green Bay group home for teenage mothers closing its doors By Gabrielle Mays Published: June 8, 2014, 10:36 am Updated: June 9, 2014, 1:12 pm GREEN BAY — A Green Bay group home for teenage mothers is closing its doors at the end of the month. Marion House has been serving the community for two decades. The group home is located on Green Bay's west side on North Taylor Street. Raven Coley and her daughter Nevach will have to find a new place to call home. "I've lived here for about two years," said Coley. During that time Coley says Marion House has given her better opportunities. "I think it was good for me to be here because if I would've stayed where I lived, I probably wouldn't have graduated," Coley said. Now Coley has her high school diploma. She's also gained some parenting skills from Marion House. "[I've learned] not to co-sleep with your child and how to feed your child the right stuff," Coley said. The group home opened in 1994. And today is the last remaining group home for teenaged mothers in Wisconsin. "The need for group home type housing for young teenage mothers and their children has changed dramatically. The counties that were placing historically with us are now looking to do relative placement," said Marion House Board Member Ann Weiss. The organization also lost federal funding. Marion House also offers transitional apartments for teen moms. Now the building, along with the group home, and all other assets will belong to Freedom House. "It's bittersweet," said Freedom House President Robyn Davis. Freedom House supports homeless families and gives them the skills they need to live on their own. The home is currently helping 12 families. Freedom House's president says 44 families are on a waiting list. "It will mean that we can help more people. We will not be using the assets here as a shelter. It's purely going to be for transitional housing and then we're going to determine what the next step will be for the use of the group home," Davis said. Davis says families will most likely move into the building within the next couple of months. As for Coley, she says she's sad to see Marion House close but she's working and looking for a new apartment. Marion House says it's currently helping about six young women find new places to live. Source: <http://fox11online.com/2014/06/08/green-bay-group-home-closing-its-doors/>

Woman gets prison for allowing kids to be molested Posted: Jun 07, 2014 4:41 PM PDT Updated: Jun 07, 2014 4:41 PM PDT WILKES-BARRE, Pa. (AP) — A Pennsylvania woman has been sentenced to 3½ to 10 years in prison for taking two children to a state prison so they could be molested by a convicted killer. Forty-two-year-old Rebecca Ann Butler of Danville was sentenced Friday in Wilkes-Barre. Prosecutors say Butler brought the girls to the State Correctional Institution at Retreat for several years, starting when they were 4 and 7 years old, to visit 47-year-old Andre VanCliff. He is serving a life sentence. Butler was convicted of two counts each of child endangerment and conspiracy to allow indecent assault of a child. Luzerne County Judge Michael Vough told Butler it was the "worst behavior" from a mother he'd seen. Butler admits putting the kids at risk but denies conspiring with VanCliff to have him molest them. Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Source: <http://www.wfmj.com/story/25720607/woman-gets-prison-for-allowing-kids-to-be-molested>

Graham denies foster respite home By Jay Ashley / Times-News Published: Saturday, June 7, 2014 at 15:28 PM. GRAHAM — "Inconsistencies and unanswered questions" doomed a request for an emergency foster placement home this week in Graham. Mollissie Peterson of Burlington requested the Graham City Council issue a special-use permit to operate a group home in a residence on Providence Road. Peterson did not attend the meeting. In her stead, Delmonte Blackwell, a co-director with Peterson of the Alamance Academy, said the home was to be used as an emergency foster respite home for children 12 to 18 years of age, rather than a group home for more troubled youth. These homes, he said, are for children who have been taken out of their homes by departments of social services for one reason or another. No more than four boys would stay in the home for no longer than 30 days, he said. Peterson previously appeared before the planning and zoning commission, which tied in a vote to allow the special-use permit. Blackwell spoke of having more than four children in the home, but later admitted he was talking about the Alamance Academy rules and not the plans for the Graham site. There was also a discrepancy in the square footage of the home. Blackwell said the youngsters would be monitored 24 hours a day by three shifts of workers. Neighbors Tisa Long and Blake Marley expressed concerns about placing young people in a neighborhood with high traffic and a reputation for drug busts. They also said they did not know what the plans for the home had been until two days ago. Source: <http://www.thetimesnews.com/news/top-news/graham-denies-foster-respite-home-1.329939>

Sauk Rapids treatment center fined in infant's death Kirsti Marohn, kmarohn@stcloudtimes.com 9:19 p.m. CDT June 7, 2014 Buy Photo Journey Home is a residential facility providing primary chemical dependency programming and housing for chemically dependent women and their children. (Photo: Times photo) Buy Photo 493 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN 4 COMMENT EMAIL MORE SAUK RAPIDS The Minnesota Department of Human Services has fined a home for mothers recovering from chemical dependency and their children and ordered its license to be placed on conditional status after determining it was at fault in the 2011 death of an infant. DHS launched a critical review of Journey Home, a Sauk Rapids residential treatment center operated by CentraCare Health, after a second baby died there in September 2013. In that case, the infant drowned after his mother fell asleep while bathing him. In an order issued last month, DHS did not find any maltreatment in the drowning. But in the first incident, the agency determined Journey Home was responsible for neglect of the mother and her infant, who died in October 2011. DHS issued Journey Home a $1,000 fine and ordered its license to be placed on conditional status for two years. CentraCare has appealed. The first death wasn't reported to DHS until May 2013, said Jerry Kerber, DHS inspector general. The agency was investigating the first death when the second death occurred, prompting the review. "Any death in a treatment program is of very, very serious concern to us," Kerber said. Journey Home is a residential treatment center for chemically dependent women and their children that has operated for 25 years. Mothers receive parenting support through classes and counseling. The facility is supervised 24 hours a day. CentraCare spokeswoman Jeanine Nistler declined an interview request because of the ongoing appeal. She emailed a statement that read, "Journey Home and all CentraCare Health services regularly review our policies and procedures to ensure that we are providing the best possible care to our patients and ensuring the safety of patients and visitors." Tragic event According to the DHS investigation memo, on Oct. 1, 2011, a woman under Journey Home's supervision allowed her 6-week-old infant to sleep in an unsafe location and position. The infant died during sleep. The mother was diagnosed with substance abuse disorder and had two children removed from her home through child protective services. She and the infant shared a bedroom, which had a single bed and a bassinet. According to the report, the woman brought the infant to a staff person at about 4:45 a.m. and said the infant was unresponsive and cold. CPR was started and the infant was taken by ambulance to the hospital, but died. The woman told law enforcement she had fed and rocked the baby to sleep at about 11 p.m., then laid the infant on her bed propped on a pillow. She fell asleep until 3 a.m., then watched television until 4:40 a.m., when she noticed the infant "didn't look right," according to the DHS report. An autopsy found no developmental problems, disease, injury or trauma. Co-sleeping in an adult bed with a pillow and blanket was noted as a significant condition contributing to the infant's death. According to the DHS report, on the night of the incident, a staff person reported checking on the woman three times. Each time, the staff person saw the woman awake in her bedroom holding the infant on her lap. Because the woman was awake, the staff person did not request that she move the infant to the bassinet. Journey Home staffers were trained that if they observed a mother sleeping with her infant in bed with her, they were to wake her and have her return the infant to the bassinet. Staffers were concerned for the safety of the infant in the woman's bed because she was on a high dose of methadone, and sometimes fell asleep while holding the infant during the day, the DHS report states. Methadone is a narcotic often substituted for heroin in treatment programs for drug addiction. Journey Home's internal review noted that the woman received training on the importance of having infants sleep on their backs in a bassinet. When arriving at Journey Home, parents are given information that included safe sleep techniques and the dangers of co-sleeping. DHS noted that Journey Home's policy at the time stated, "We discourage mothers from having their newborns sleep in their bed with them because of the possibility of suffocation but we do understand mothers may choose to sleep with their infants at times." Photos taken by law enforcement the morning of the infant's death show the bassinet was filled with snacks and soda. DHS found Journey Home was responsible in the first death because staff were aware of the risks involved with an unsafe sleep arrangement, the woman's high dose of methadone and her vulnerability as a parent. "They were aware that the mother was prone to falling asleep while caring for the infant," Kerber said. It also was clear that the bassinet wasn't being used, he said. 2nd death In the death last September, a woman staying at Journey Home fell asleep while bathing her child. The woman was also taking methadone. The woman told investigators she had started the water in the bathtub, left the drain open and used a washcloth to wash the baby. She left the baby in the bathtub while she used the toilet, and fell asleep. When she woke up, she saw the infant floating in the bathtub, which had filled with water. Efforts to resuscitate the child failed. DHS concluded that although the baby's death was tragic, Journey Home wasn't responsible. A staff person had checked on the woman at least four times the morning of the incident. Journey Home has a policy stating mothers are responsible for their children at all times unless they are signed into day care. The second death wasn't as predictable, Kerber said. While Journey Home staff were aware that the mother occasionally fell asleep, they didn't know she was going to bathe the child at that time. Unique model Journey Home is one of only six residential treatment programs in the state that allow parents to bring their children. Kerber said such programs are beneficial because they increase the likelihood of chemically dependent parents participating in treatment. "There are people who need treatment, but are refusing to go to a treatment program because they don't want their children to end up in the child protection system," he said. "This is really a nice alternative to that, in that they can bring their children with them and the bonding can continue." However, such programs raise questions about what times the parent or the center's staff is responsible for the child, Kerber said. "This arrangement presents unique risks," he said. "And we're certainly reviewing regulations in this area to see whether or not they're adequately addressing this situation." Kerber said he's confident the center is taking the deaths very seriously. DHS's order requires Journey Home to improve its assessment of parents and their ability to provide necessary supervision of their children. A contested case hearing will determine the outcome of Journey Home's appeal. If DHS's ruling is affirmed, a conditional license means Journey Home will be subject to closer and more frequent monitoring, Kerber said. Follow Kirsti Marohn on Twitter @kirstimarohn. Source: <http://www.sctimes.com/story/news/local/2014/06/07/sauk-rapids-treatment-center-fined-infants-death/10179079/>

The Hidden Danger of Internet Addiction Mania: Sketchy Treatment Centers Written by Whitney Mallett @whitneymallett June 7, 2014 // 02:38 PM EST If your loved one is plagued by turtleneck syndrome, characterized by a hunched forward posture causing numbness in the fingers or wrists, they may be suffering from an addiction to their smartphone, tablet, or other wifi-connected device. Poised to be the illness of the future, it's likely Internet addiction will also be the next moneymaker for America's multi-billion-dollar troubled teen industry. As the media jumps on study after study sensationalizing the amount of time tweens and teens spend online, we should be looking at regulating the programs marketed toward fixing the youngest pathologically screen-obsessed generation. The United States has lagged behind Asia in diagnosing and treating Internet addiction. China's Tao Ran opened the first treatment program in a Beijing military hospital in 2004 and South Korea soon followed suit with similar internet bootcamps, while internet addiction was only added as an appendix to the DSM in 2013. Better late than never, residential facilities across America are beginning to see a market in underage net addicts. America's first Internet addiction treatment program, reSTART, which opened in 2009 in Seattle not far from Microsoft's headquarters, now has a youth program. And other behavioral modification programs usually targeted at rebellious and/or drug and alcohol-addled teens are adding Internet addiction to the laundry list of problems they solve. One of these programs, Liahona Academy, shared this infographic with Motherboard in an unsolicited email. The US, however, should look at the proliferation of internet bootcamps in China as a cautionary tale. Over the past decade, hundreds of residential facilities for net-addicted teens have cropped up from Hebei to Guangxi. These facilities vary wildly. Ran, an expert in net addiction who holds a masters degree in medicine, runs a legitimate treatment program—the help he provides families is apparent in the independent documentary Web Junkies. But other facilities in the country are often run by quacks and snake oil salesman happy to pocket the yuan desperate parents are willing to fork over. Treatments at these facilities include unlicensed electrotherapy, and abuse that has ended in at least two deaths. 15 year old Deng Senshan died from a beating he suffered his first day at the Qihang Salvation Training Camp in Nanning City in 2009. The tragedy resulted in the China's Ministry of Health drafting guidelines for bootcamps which ban physical punishment, destructive surgeries, and forced lockups. Ran, the net bootcamp's pioneer, has been an advocate for increased regulation in the industry, and told Wired these oversights are at least a "first step." A year later, another teen Chen Shi was reportedly beaten to death at another camp in the Hunan province. Western media is quicker to pounce on human rights abuses abroad than at home. Shenshan's and Shi's deaths were more widely reported than instances of alleged abuse at residential treatment centers in the US. While treating Internet addiction in the US is very recent, bootcamp style facilities targeting troubled teens have been a growing industry for decades—there are even escort services that will kidnap your teen to get them there—and allegations of abuse have been numerous. In 2005, 33 states reported more than 1,600 staff members were involved in incidents of abuse in these residential programs, and a 2007 report from the US Government Accountability Office examined 10 closed civil or criminal cases from 1990 to 2004 where a teenager died. These programs are big money. Back in 2002, Forbes estimated the troubled teen was a \$2 billion a year industry. While as in China, these therapeutic boarding schools, wilderness camps, and behavior modification centers (some promising to de-gay teens) can vary wildly, the problem is that right now they are totally unregulated at the federal level. An effort to draft a bill enforcing standards for these programs was introduced to Congress last spring but did not progress past the committee stage. A new documentary Kidnapped for Christ about an American residential program in the Dominican Republic, executive produced by Lance Bass, is striving to galvanize greater support for regulations. The US isn't the only country just beginning to tackle internet addiction. In January, the first Internet addiction program in Sweden launched. And while the teen addicts in the Chinese camp featured in Web Junkies are all boys addicted World of Warcraft and other MMORPGs, Patrik Wincent at the Stockholm center reported that most of their prospective patients were girls addicted to social media. If the US wants to tackle Internet addiction head-on and avoid the inconsistent and potentially harmful programs that will likely crop up in a vacuum of services, South Korea provides the best model. Bootcamp-style programs are government run and counseling is funded by taxpayers. The Ministry of Public Administration and Security is making the dangers of Internet addiction a mandatory part of the curriculum from preschool to high school. This seems like a preventative measure that could limit how many youth might otherwise eventually need to attend an extreme residential program that separates parents and children and introduces the risk for potential institutional abuse. Source: <http://motherboard.vice.com/read/the-hidden-danger-of-internet-addiction-sketchy-treatment-centers>

Wrongful-death suit filed against DSS, foster parent in Charleston infant's death Christina Elmore Email @celmorepc Jun 7 2014 10:00 pm Jun 8 8:57 am
Former DSS Director Lillian Koller By all accounts, the birth of Aiden Dean Clark was nothing short of miraculous. His mother, wheelchair-bound from spina bifida, had miscarried three times before Aiden was born July 7, 2011. The hopeful beginnings of new life in the family came to an abrupt end less than two weeks later after state social workers removed him from his parents' Charleston home. They had placed Aiden with a foster mother after allegations of abuse surfaced against his father shortly after the baby's birth. Aiden died 15 days later. Aiden's parents stood by the then-brain dead infant at Medical University Hospital as doctors turned off the machines keeping him alive. His father held Aiden's tiny foot as the baby took his final breaths. Ellen Babb, an attorney for the family, said this didn't have to happen. A wrongful death lawsuit she filed last week in Charleston County alleges Aiden essentially suffocated after the foster mother left him alone in a sweater box instead of a crib. The suit is the latest in a string of setbacks for the beleaguered state Department of Social Services, which has been the subject of widespread criticism regarding its practices and child deaths that have occurred on its watch. Former DSS Director Lillian Koller and the foster mother, Jennie Downard, 71, of North Charleston, are both named as defendants in the suit. Aiden's parents weren't identified in the court documents. Charleston County Coroner Rae Wooten said she can't say whether the baby died as a result of the foster mother's actions. A lengthy and thorough investigation conducted by her office failed to determine a manner or cause of death, she said. "Whatever Ellen Babb alleged in her complaint is what she believes to be the case," Wooten said. "It's not necessarily based in fact." No criminal charges were filed in the case, North Charleston police spokesman Spencer Pryor said. "As a result of our investigation at the time, there was no evidence presented to show any intentional and harmful acts, nor was there any probable cause to lead to criminal charges in this incident," Pryor said. DSS spokeswoman Marilyn Matheus would not speak directly to the allegations in the suit, but she defended the decision to remove Aiden from the parents' home. A DSS investigation and subsequent court order resulted in his father being placed on the Central Registry of Child Abuse and Neglect and Aiden's placement with a well-regarded foster mother, Matheus said. "Law enforcement conducted a full investigation into this incident and the police report described Ms. Downard as a wonderful woman and caring person, that in no way was suspected of any wrong doing," Matheus said in a statement. "As an agency, we are constantly exploring new ways to better serve the at-risk children of this state and will never stop fighting to place them with the best and most devoted foster parents possible." Agency problems The family's wrongful-death suit was filed in the wake of some state lawmakers' calls for a massive overhaul of DSS to ensure South Carolina's children are adequately protected. Gov. Nikki Haley announced changes last month to the department's Richland County office after an infant in that county died in April while a DSS staffer searched for the baby's family. She's sending in back-up workers to help deal with case loads and is taking steps to improve communication between the office and law enforcement. Similar problems have been reported in the Lowcountry and other parts of the state, but Haley has not announced any policy changes addressing issues outside of Richland County. In an email, state Rep. Peter McCoy, R-Charleston, said that as a former prosecutor and a father of three children, he's been "extremely concerned" with the string of child deaths that have occurred under DSS supervision. "When children are placed in their care, there has to be a series of checks and balances to ensure the safety of these children at all times. It's time for the Legislature to take a hard look at DSS and their day-to-day operations and safety checks for children," McCoy said. "Anytime there is a fatality of a child, especially if the safety of that child has been placed in the hands of an agency like DSS, there should be absolute accountability to that agency," he said. "I'm hopeful we can get to the root of the problem at DSS and do all we can to ensure the safety of our children." After months of rebuffing calls for her resignation, Koller stepped down from her post as the agency's chief last week, the same day the wrongful-death complaint was filed in Aiden's case. A life cut short Questions about possible abuse arose shortly after Aiden's birth, prompting DSS to take an interest in the baby. The infant had been left in his father's care while doctors treated his mother for an infection that had developed following a Caesarean section. The father checked into Trident Medical Center days later, on July 20, after a neighbor advised that he should be evaluated for possible mental health issues, a North Charleston police report said. Hospital staff who examined Aiden during his father's visit called authorities to report signs of what was thought to be malnutrition, sepsis, pinkeye and bruising to his abdomen and knee, Babb said. The baby was transported to Medical University Hospital for a more thorough exam. That hospital's staff could not immediately tell whether a pair of bruises to the child were signs of an assault or if they were caused by something else, a police report said. Babb said Aiden was deemed to be in good health but he was placed with a foster mother anyway. "He was not malnourished and no signs of sepsis were found. He didn't have pinkeye, his tear ducts were just clogged," Babb said. "He was a healthy child when he left that hospital and was released to the foster mother." Aiden was placed with Downard on Aug. 2 and died roughly two weeks later. Downard could not be reached for comment. 'Another tragic tale' While in the foster parent's North Charleston home, Babb said, Aiden was left unattended in a sweater box that was filled with towels and blankets. He rolled onto his side on Aug. 14, 2011, and fought in vain against cloth and plastic as he gasped for air, she said. By the time Downard returned, the baby was unresponsive. Downard did not have CPR training and was unable to provide the care that Aiden needed to save his life, the complaint alleges. He lingered on life support for three days before he died. A crib in Downard's home had been filled with boxes during Aiden's stay. According to Babb, Downard reported during a deposition that social workers were aware that she kept the child in a sweater box perched atop a stool instead of the crib. At least three social workers had visited the home, Babb said, yet no one intervened. "The first time you go into a home as a caseworker and you see a child is kept in a sweater box, you should alert someone," Babb said. "It's a broken agency, and to be honest with you, it was broken long before Lillian Koller took over. She just made things worse," Babb said. "Caseworkers have too many cases and people aren't following up with what those caseworkers are doing." A Post and Courier story last month revealed that nearly a third of DSS workers were shouldering larger than recommended case loads for the month of May, according to internal preliminary reports. In Charleston County, 39 percent of the office's 33 workers had 20 cases or more, while 60 percent of workers had to see 21 children or more in a month. The numbers differed from a reported statewide case load average of six per worker, a number frequently repeated by agency leaders. Matheus said the department's caseworkers saw nothing in Downard's home that was cause for alarm. The sweater box that Aiden slept in, Matheus said, was a makeshift bassinet. "If you go into any hospital or NICU (neonatal intensive care unit), you would see similar situations where newborns are kept in an open container," Matheus said. "That wouldn't be an immediate cause for concern." A history of service Matheus said DSS caseworkers are trained to look for all safety concerns in addition to noting a child's condition during their visits. DSS is "dedicated to protecting South Carolina children" in partnership with foster parents and group homes that provide care when others cannot, she said. Downard said during a deposition that she had served as a foster parent for more than three decades and cared for more than 100 infants, Babb said. She reported watching over at least five other children in the wake of Aiden's death. Wooten, the coroner, said Downard had "a great track record," considering the number of infant children the woman had cared for over the years. "A lot of foster parents don't take children that young." Source: <http://www.postandcourier.com/article/20140607/PC16/140609417/1005>

Washington trip gives chance to address foster care concerns Washington trip gives chance to address foster care concerns Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email « » 2014-06-09T09:00:00Z Washington trip gives chance to address foster care concernsDUSTIN DUNCAN THE SOUTHERN The Southern June 09, 2014 9:00 am • By Dustin Duncan Dustin Duncan dustin.duncan@thesouthern.com Follow @zd2000 Loading... CARBONDALE -- A former foster child in Illinois now is fighting for changes in the foster care system. Yemisi Pleasant-Sloan, 25, formerly of Chicago, is now a Carbondale resident and SIU graduate. She spent her childhood as a foster child in Chicago. On May 21, she went to Washington D.C. to participate in the third annual Congressional Foster Youth Shadow Day where individuals affected by foster care can talk with their local congressman. "The whole purpose of the event is for current youth and former youth that have spent time in the foster care system to have the opportunity to go and meet with their local congressman," Pleasant-Sloan said. "We got the chance to talk with them and share our experiences in care, whether it was good or bad." Pleasant-Sloan said the idea was to talk to congressmen about procedures that were not so helpful in hopes they would take suggestions into consideration and make changes. Individuals at the event had the opportunity to see the day-to-day activities of members of congress by job shadowing certain members. Every participant could have a meeting with the members of Congress, during which they shared their personal experience and recommendations for the system. Pleasant-Sloan said the event allowed her to voice her concerns. "It was interesting for me because it was motivating," Pleasant-Sloan said. "There is definitely some work that needs to be done" she said "But things have gotten a lot better since the '90s when I was in the system." Pleasant-Sloan now works at Rainbow's End, a daycare center through SIU. She works with children from birth to age 1. "I love it," she said "I always knew I wanted to work with kids." The SIU grad said she is happy to be there for children in the early stages of their lives. It is important for children to have a loving environment," she said. "Somewhere where they are safe and an adult is paying attention to them and letting them know they are important." dustin.duncan@thesouthern.com Source: http://thesouthern.com/news/local/washington-trip-gives-chance-to-address-foster-care-concerns/article_f0b8b589-b5e1-150be-b560-f12a00953cdc.html

Number of children in foster care hits record high Agencies see more 'families in crises' as public assistance drops 2 | Children, DCF, Mental Health E-mail Print Share This Facebook Twitter Delicious LinkedIn Digg MySpace The number of children in foster care in Kansas is up, but the reasons why vary. By Dave Ranney KHI News Service June 9, 2014 TOPEKA — The number of Kansas children in foster care has reached an all-time high. The explanations why vary. In April, there were 6,156 children in the system. That's 356 more children than in April 2013, and 872 more than two years earlier. Cathy Mores/Special to KHI News Service The number of Kansas children in foster care is at an all-time high. View larger photo Dona Booe, chief executive of the Kansas Children's Service League, sees the escalating numbers as evidence of a building crisis. "This is a primary indicator that we're not reaching families before tragedies happen," Booe said. "These are families in crises, and we're not reaching them because the resources for reaching them have been exhausted." Officials in the administration of Gov. Sam Brownback don't view the growing numbers with alarm. They attribute the increase to better awareness and reporting of child abuse and neglect. "We are seeing an increasing number of reports being made," Theresa Freed, a spokesperson for the Kansas Department for Children and Families, wrote in an email to KHI News Service. "The increase in foster care cases is consistent with that. We attribute the increase in reports to greater public awareness of the issues of child abuse and neglect." In 2010, according to DCF reports, the agency logged about 55,500 reports of suspected abuse or neglect. It expects to field more than 74,000 reports in 2014. "We have done a tremendous job of working with community organizations to promote the reporting of child abuse and neglect," Freed said. "Our rate of removal, based on the reports, is constant." But Booe and other children's advocates suspect that increased public awareness is only one of the factors driving the foster care numbers upward. They noted that the increases have coincided with changes in DCF policies since 2011 that led to thousands of families being dropped from state and other public assistance programs. In the past four years, according to DCF reports, the number of children in households receiving public assistance fell from 24,567 in April 2011 to 11,867 in April 2014. "What we're seeing is that access to community supports and to government-funded supports have diminished in the last couple years," Booe said. "That takes a toll on families. It adds to the stress that they're under, and it increases the risk factors that lead to kids entering the system." At the same time, Booe said, state-funded support for services for at-risk families has been reduced. In the last four years, she said, state funding for KCSL's family support programs has been cut 10 percent. "That may not sound like a lot, but when you don't have a lot to begin with it is," she said. "I hate saying this, but we've lost a lot of our funding sources that went toward helping our highest-risk families. The assumption has always been that the private sector would step in and make up the difference — and people have stepped up, they've been very generous — but they've not been able to keep pace with the loss of government funding." According to DCF records, the agency spent $2.8 million on the grants in Fiscal Year 2012 and $2.6 million in fiscal 2013. It expects to spend $1.3 million in fiscal 2014, which ends June 30. The reductions, Booe said, mean programs like those administered by KCSL have fewer workers available to help families on the brink of having their children taken from them. "There are people, case managers, who know how to help these families get through crises, get things stabilized and then plan for a better future," Booe said. "But if a family has had its phone disconnected, the utilities have been turned off and they don't have a car that works, they're not going to know how to find someone who can help them get those resources. They need someone who can step in and help. "But it's these case-management kinds of services that there isn't as much state-funded support for," Booe said. "The services are there, but they're incredibly stressed right now. And if your kids are not already in the system, your access to these services is going to be very, very limited." Dana Cox, operations director at Ashby House, a family shelter in Salina, said she's also seeing demand for services outstrip supply. "Increased public awareness may be playing a role," she said. "But the far more serious issues have to do with the lack of services and the difficulty in gaining access to the services that are available. Mental health is a huge issue. Substance abuse is too, definitely." Cox and Booe said they assume that many of these families' crises have been heightened by the policy changes that cut thousands of low-income families from the state's public assistance rolls. Most of the changes involved increased work requirements. DCF has not done an analysis to see how many children now in foster care came from families that lost their welfare benefits, Freed said. But department officials, she said, "have not seen any evidence" of a correlation between fewer families receiving public assistance and more children being in foster care. The stiffer eligibility requirements, she said, were meant to encourage parents to find work instead of depending on government programs. But Ashley Thorne, who runs the Court Appointed Special Advocates office of Sedgwick County, said there's little doubt that poverty is driving significant numbers of children into foster care. "If you're a child in a family that's going through a cycle of violence or substance abuse and you're removed from your home, the court is going to give your parents a list of things they're going to have to do before you'll be allowed to return," Thorne said. "But these things — parenting classes, drug and alcohol testing, getting a psychological evaluation — all cost money," she said. "So if your parents can't afford to complete the court order or if they don't have someone who can show them how to complete it, their rights will eventually be terminated." Children are placed in foster care after a judge rules their safety or welfare is in jeopardy, usually due to parental abuse or neglect. They remain in foster care until a judge decides their parents are able to care for them in a safe environment. Reduced resources In Kansas, several juvenile court judges are participating in a pair of review panels designed to keep tabs on the state's foster care system. "Everybody is concerned about the number of kids coming into care," said Melissa Ness, a longtime children's advocate who coordinates the review panels. Salina and Ottawa County Magistrate Judge Mary Thrower serves on one of the panels. "I can tell you that in my district, inpatient drug and alcohol treatment for someone who's uninsured — and a lot of the people we're talking about here are uninsured — is very hard to come by," Thrower said. "I'm not saying it's not available, I'm saying it will be a while before you can get in. There simply aren't enough beds." Thrower said she's becoming increasingly frustrated with the system. "On one hand, we're dealing with cases that are much more complicated than they used to be," she said. "It's not that Mom or Dad has a drug problem, it's that they have a drug problem, and they need mental health services, and there are disability issues to deal with. "But then on the other hand, when we get these people motivated and they turn to the system for help, that help is difficult for them to access," Thrower said. "I hear that from parents all the time, and I hear it from social workers, too." Magistrate Judge Ann Dixon, who presides over most of the foster care caseload in Dodge City, said she's noticed an increase in the number of criminal drug-possession charges filed against adults whose children were present at the time of their arrest. "That is a grave concern, to know that children are in a house where needles and drugs are present," Dixon said. "It is neglect for these kids to grow up having no concept of what a normal healthy family is, thinking that drugs being out on the table is just the way it is." Dixon said her courtroom observations mirror Thrower's. "The severity of cases is up," she said. "The resources for responding to that severity are down." Admissions spike in 2013 Kansas privatized most of its foster care services in 1996, after the system failed several court-ordered reviews. Between 1997 and 2013, the state paid as many as six nonprofit organizations to oversee its foster care, adoption and family preservation efforts. Last year, DCF decided to contract with just two organizations: St. Francis Community Services of Salina and KVC Behavioral Healthcare of Olathe. The decision caused United Methodist Youthville of Wichita, TFI Family Services of Topeka and DCCCA of Lawrence to lose their contracts. At that time, Freed said the bids for the contract from KVC and St. Francis were lower than those from Youthville and TFI Family Services. DCF expects to pay St. Francis and KVC $135.3 million in fiscal 2014, about $12.7 million less than it spent in fiscal 2013. The contracts are projected to cost $142.7 million in fiscal 2015. Marilyn Jacobson, program analyst at KVC, said the agency noticed a spike in foster care admissions in spring 2013 that added more than 300 children to the system. Jacobson said KVC officials still don't understand what prompted the bubble. "We're not in a position to know because law enforcement and the courts control the (system's) front door, and this a front-door issue," she said. "Children get referred to us after they've been removed (from their families)." The numbers of children exiting the system, Jacobson said, have remained steady. "But we have this significant bubble of kids who came in all at once and are still working their way toward permanency," Jacobson said. "So when that gets added to everything else that's going on, we find ourselves at an all-time high. The problem isn't so much the back door as it is the front door." The federal review panels also aren't sure why the system saw a big increase in spring 2013. "These are volunteer panels," said Ness, who's also a lobbyist for St. Francis. "We do not have the research capacity to really get to the bottom of this. But it's clear that whatever is happening is happening on the front end of the system. It's not that kids aren't moving through the system, it's that more kids are entering the system." Fewer foster homes Though the number of Kansas children in foster care has increased, the number of licensed foster homes has remained flat. Records show that in April 2013 there were 2,486 licensed foster homes in Kansas; between 2009 and 2013, the state had access to an average of 2,491 homes. "A lot of homes are taking in multiple kids, more than they have in the past," said Jeff Piepho, president of the Kansas Foster and Adoptive Parent Association. "Turnover is an issue," he said. "A lot of times, foster parents will adopt the children they've been caring for and decide they're not in a position to keep being foster parents, so they quit. Another reason is they do it for a year or two and come away feeling like they don't have a loud enough voice. They don't feel like anybody listens to what they have to say." The association and DCF, he said, are trying to change that. "The other thing that's happening is people don't want to be foster parents because they think it would be so heartbreaking. They say, 'Oh, I could never do that,'" Piepho said. "We need to address that, too. We need to show people how they can be a positive, interruptive force in a child's life." Piepho, a Salina pastor, and his wife, Meadow, have cared for about 45 foster children in the past five years. The couple have adopted two children and are legal guardians for three others. Additional mental health funding At a Statehouse news conference last month, Brownback announced that his administration would spend an additional \$9.5 million on mental health services in fiscal 2015. Most of the money – up to $7 million – will come from the state's federally funded Temporary Assistance for Needy Families block grant, which is administered by DCF. It's not yet clear how much of the $7 million will be spent on services for families at-risk of having their children placed in foster care. During the press conference, DCF Secretary Phyllis Gilmore noted that more than 3,000 children had been removed from their homes since July 2013. "Mental health issues," she said, "are often at the root of the problems in these homes. That is a serious concern for me." Gilmore later released a list of seven programs – a mix of job training, substance abuse treatment, early childhood development, and in-home visitation services – that are likely to receive a portion of the $7 million. The governor's plan also would spend $500,000 on 81 additional beds in drug treatment programs across the state. "We're especially excited about the $500,000 that's being set aside for inpatient (substance abuse) treatment," said Dulcinea Rakestraw, vice president of treatment service at Preferred Family Healthcare, Wichita, and chair of the Kansas Association of Addiction Professionals. "But that's only a drop in the bucket when you compare it to the $10 million in cuts we've had to deal with" since FY 2009, she said, referring to reductions in both state and federal support. "The funding that used to be there just isn't there anymore," Rakestraw said. "And a lot of that has to do with changes in policies for determining who's eligible for Medicaid and who's not. That's been tightened up to a point where a lot of people who used to be eligible aren't anymore. So a lot of us are in this situation where we have beds available, we just don't have – and can't get – the money to pay for them." At-risk families, too, Rakestraw said, are being harmed by the governor's decision to not expand eligibility for Medicaid. "Medicaid expansion would greatly assist families that are struggling and could reach out and access service before things reach the point of being unsafe," she said. Source: <http://www.khi.org/news/2014/jun/09/number-children-foster-care-climbs/>

Vineland employee allegedly assaulted foster child, police say Enrique Rivera (Submitted Photo) Print By Don E. Woods/South Jersey Times The News of Cumberland County Follow on Twitter on June 09, 2014 at 4:20 PM Reddit Email VINELAND — A city employee was arrested last week for allegedly sexually assaulting a 14-year-old girl in foster care, according to authorities. Enrique Rivera, 40, of McClain Drive, was charged with aggravated sexual assault and endangering the welfare of a child. The Vineland Police Department was first contacted on June 6 by the Department of Child Protection and Permanency about a possible assault of a 14-year-old foster child in the Vineland area. After an investigation, Rivera was arrested on the charges and held in the Cumberland County Jail in lieu of $250,000 bail. According to police, Rivera is an employee in the city's Department of Public Works. The investigation is ongoing and anyone with information is instructed to contact Crime Stoppers at 856-691-0345, Vineland Police Department's Criminal Division at 856-691-4111 ext. 4180 of the Cumberland County Prosecutor's Office at 856-453-0486. Crime Stoppers is offering a $1,000 reward for information about the incident. Contact staff writer Don E. Woods at 856-451-1000, ext. 518 or dwoods@southjerseymedia.com Source: http://www.nj.com/cumberland/index.ssf/2014/06/vineland_employee_allegedly_assaulted_foster_child_police_say.html

Bill to Decriminalize Foster Youth Goes to California Senate By Brian Rinker, June 9, 2014 Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY A new bill that child advocacy groups are hoping will curb arrests of foster youth in group homes will likely be introduced today in the State Senate. The new legislation in its current form will trigger an investigation into group homes that call the police frequently on the criminal conduct of foster youth, limit out-of-pocket restitution demanded of foster youth and reduce time spent in juvenile detention centers. "The purpose of this bill is to prevent foster youth from being arrested and charged for misbehavior that wouldn't happen to anyone other than a foster youth," said Martha Matthews, an attorney for the advocacy group Public Counsel, who is helping author the bill. "We don't want foster care to be a pipeline to prison." Matthews said that normal teenage misbehaviors become serious, life-altering events for foster youth living in group homes. Instead of handling youth in-house, the homes frequently call the police for the slightest impropriety, exposing youths to the criminal justice system. Several years ago, Matthews represented a foster youth who had been charged with a felony assault with a deadly weapon. The deadly weapon: an avocado. The foster youth, who lived in a group home, had gotten angry and thrown the gnarled dark green fruit, known for its high fat and creamy texture, at someone. The group home called the police. Under the bill, an investigation by the state agency Community Care Licensing is initiated if a group home calls the police on its foster youth for criminal misconduct more than once a month on average over six months. The state requires group homes to have behavior management plans for the youth. "You don't want the cops to be your behavioral management plan," said Matthews. "The bill creates a threshold by separating the normal, well-managed group homes from the more chaotic ones that call the police all the time." The bill can only trigger an investigation; it lacks teeth when it comes to corrective action. The result and consequence, if any, are left completely up to the investigators. The County Welfare Directors Association, a nonprofit group of welfare workers, has tracked the bill and offered amendments. The association hasn't had a chance to read over the latest draft and therefore takes no position on the bill, according to their communication coordinator Sarah Jimenez. Sometimes a foster youth will get mad and smash something, often resulting in restitution. Matthews said most of the damage is covered by the group home's insurances, but the courts still makes the youth pay the full amount. The new bill will limit the restitution to only what isn't covered by insurance. If a foster youth is arrested, they can be held for long periods in detention, because, unlike kids with parents, they don't have anyone to pick them up and can spend weeks in jail, according to child advocates. AB 388 aims to reduce the time foster youth spend in detention by requiring immediate notification of the child welfare services and attorney to find alternative placement. There is a paucity of data to support the bill's assertion that foster youth in group homes are disproportionately thrust into the criminal justice system without good cause. AB 388, in part, is meant to collect this data. A 2011 study in Los Angeles does demonstrate that youth involved in both foster care and the juvenile justice systems fare much worse than those in just one of the systems. Los Angeles youths who exit both foster care and juvenile justice earn less as young adults and cost the public more than youths who only exit foster care, and are more than twice as likely to have been treated for a serious mental illness "We didn't realize crossover youth would have such striking distance," said Dennis Culhane, one of the study's six authors, speaking with The Chronicle's John Kelly in 2011. "We knew it would find they'd be troubled, but didn't expect this difference of degree to show up." Assemblymember Wesley Chesbro (D) introduced the bill, which will be endorsed by Public Counsel, California Youth Connection, Youth Law Center and East Bay Children's Law Offices. Brian Rinker is a Journalism for Social Change Fellow and a recent graduate from San Francisco State University's journalism program. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/news/bill-to-decriminalize-foster-youth-goes-to-california-senate/6924>

Become a Foster Parent Open Your Heart & Home to a Child with Special Needs As a licensed provider of foster care placement services, Rocky Mountain Human Services (RMHS) is seeking individuals and families who can provide a stable and nurturing family environment to children, ages 0-21, many of whom have intellectual, physical or emotional special needs. Training, support and compensation is provided for foster parents. Foster Care Homes: *Provide 24/7 living arrangements, with access to on-call services *Provide warm, supportive, person-centered, family settings *Help children connect with community resources and attend medical appointments, school or day programs and recreational activities *Are monitored and trained to promote a safety-first atmosphere Rocky Mountain Human Services: Screens applicants, including background checks and fingerprinting *Provides access to behavioral therapies for children *Offers ongoing workshops and support for foster care families/homes *Recognizes the need for caregivers to receive respite *Provides monitoring of foster homes by highly trained and certified employees ----- How to Become a Foster Care Provider with RMHS Foster care provider applicants must: *Be age 21 or older *Have reliable transportation *Have an extra room in the home *Exhibit stability in their lives *Submit a complete application *Provide fingerprint cards and health evaluations for all individuals living at the home *Complete first aid/CPR and other classes *Participate in home study (interviews and home visits by certified employees) Source: <http://www.rmhumanservices.org/become-foster-parent>

Classroom to Courtroom Helping teens in New Hanover County by BRIDGETTE WAGNER | photo by KATHERINE CLARK Sheila Evans has helped keep troubled teens from landing in district court for almost a decade, and she absolutely loves doing it. "I have the best job in New Hanover County," Evans says. Evans helps local teens through her dual positions as a teen court coordinator and district court coordinator at the Alternative Dispute Resolution Services and Training Center (ADR). She has helped expand teen court to include a youth court since taking the position in 2005, doubling the program under her direction. When she isn't working with teens in the courtroom, she's volunteering to help them in the classroom. Her volunteerism paid off at this year's YWCA Lower Cape Fear Centennial Gala, where among the group's picks of accomplished women in the community and one of the ten 2014 YWCA Lower Cape Fear Legends. "I was shocked to win. I don't even remember half of my speech. I just know that I said it is amazing to get recognized for stuff that you love to do," Evans says. It all started with volunteering in her children's schools for Cub Scouts, Girl Scouts, and as band mom. Her presence in local schools led to her working in child advocacy for seven years, and then as a regular substitute teacher in New Hanover County. She was soon offered a position hosting a television show, The Forum with Sheila Evans, on The Learning Network of the Cape Fear (TLN) station. The half-hour program, which she continues to host, features school board members, principals, and organizations relevant to students and their graduation projects. Evans hosted an episode about the local teen court and the next day received an email with a job offer. She has been working as coordinator ever since. Evans works with the Teen & Youth Court for the 5th District, which covers New Hanover and Pender counties. The program addresses first-time juvenile offenders in New Hanover and Pender, attempting to intervene early and keep them out of the court system. Student offenders who plead guilty for misdemeanors and certain school violations are sentenced by peers with punishments including community service or restitution, according to the program's guidelines. The alternate court also exposes students to the other side of the legal system. Volunteering students serve as clerks, bailiffs, and jurors. Evans says she owes a lot of Teen Court's success to her relationships with local attorneys and judges such as Chief District Court Judge J.H. Corpening II. "One time he said to me that it is not what it means to your kids when you volunteer on a regular basis, it's what it means to other kids," Evans said. "That is absolutely fundamental in what I do. I hope that it is something that I pass down to my kids." While rewarding, dealing with teens at war with one another can be tricky. Evans pairs teens who got into a fight as co-defendants, which is a different system from most teen courts. She does this not only to save time, but also because the teens will have to go back to school together. "Nobody said you had to be friends, but you have to go back to school the next day and get along," Evans says. Although nothing seems to stop Evans, being diagnosed with breast cancer in 2010 slowed her down. "I am thankful I didn't really have that difficult of a time. I purposely did chemo days on Tuesdays because I love my district court job so much I wanted to be there on Mondays," Evans says. Evans had a double mastectomy and has been in the clear since 2012. While she currently runs both teen court programs in New Hanover and Pender counties, she hopes to give up the Pender County program soon so that it can be loved a little better, and she can better focus on the New Hanover County program. While she reminds them of the courtroom dress code, most teens continue to show up in jeans, sneakers, and T-shirts. She's always pleasantly surprised with the teens who go out of their way to meet her expectations. "One kid had no dress pants, only shorts. He sent me a picture the day before court of khakis he bought at a thrift shop and a collared shirt. I love that I projected onto him, this is what I expect," Evans says. The tough love approach seems to pay off. "If you lay what you expect out there," Evans says, "they will meet your expectations." (Special Note: HEAL does not support "tough love". We do support justice and the right of all defendants to trial by jury of their peers.)

Justina Pelletier Begs for Release By Shannon McMahon Boston.com Staff June 9, 2014 3:51 PM Share Comment Share 46 Comment Justina Pelletier, the Connecticut teenager at the center of a lengthy custody battle between hospitals and her family, will reportedly be released. Pelletier, who has been living in foster care and a residential treatment center in Connecticut, appeared in a YouTube video today pleading for Massachusetts officials to send her home. The video shows Pelletier begging to be released. "All I really want to be with is with my family and friends," she said. "Please let me go home right now." The Boston Globe reported that state officials have taken steps to return Pelletier to her parents: "Late Friday, Massachusetts Health and Human Services filed a motion for reconsideration and dismissal agreeing that Justina should be returned home and the case should be closed," said Mathew Staver, a lawyer with Liberty Counsel, which is representing Pelletier's parents, Lou and Linda Pelletier. Reverend Patrick Mahoney, the Pelletier family's spokesperson, told the Globe: "Through the entire 16 months of this tragedy, the one person we've not heard from publicly is Justina herself. Now we can see her in her own words asking Judge Jonston and Governor Patrick for her release." Pelletier was placed under state care after doctors at Boston Children's Hospital concluded her condition resulted from psychological issues, rather than the rare mitochondrial disorder her parents say she suffers from. In February 2013 doctors alleged Pelletier was the victim of child abuse and custody was granted to the Department of Children and Families. Read the full Globe story here.

Source: <http://www.boston.com/news/local/massachusetts/2014/06/09/justina-pelletier-begs-for-release/KAIkIbknzA9ztpx1kxyL/story.html#>

Most local juvenile justice homes exclude girls By Jordan Gribble Staff Writer Published: Monday, June 9, 2014 at 9:10 p.m. Last Modified: Monday, June 9, 2014 at 9:10 p.m. Local juvenile justice group homes are far more likely to accept boys than girls since 2010 law changes that provided for a set amount of residents. Group homes were under a contract system in which facilities were reimbursed by the state for each child they had per day. Then the state put into place a system under Medicaid that allows such facilities in Terrebonne and Lafourche parishes to house only 16 kids at a time. That led local group homes to decide to house only boys in their facilities. "Girls are harder to treat," said Bob Licalzi, director of the Lafourche Parish Juvenile Justice Center. "We have a saying that two girls together are fine, but put three together and it's volatile. They fight each other and they fight the boys. We've even had girls assault our staff before." Some group homes made the decision to allow only boys for financial reasons, officials said. Kevin Champagne, executive director of MacDonell Children's Services in Houma, said his facility is one of those places. "The way our facility is set up, we've got two cottages that each have 12 beds. One used to have boys in it and the other one had girls in it," Champagne said. "When the state changed the licensure requirements for group homes it made it so we could only have 16 kids at a time. Trying to maintain each cottage with eight boys and eight girls would be financially difficult to fully staff. So we made a decision in 2010 to just keep one of our cottages open just for boys." The Louis Infant Crisis Center in Houma also provides beds for only pre-teen boys, officials said. Source: <http://www.dailycomet.com/article/20140609/ARTICLES/140609565?Title=2010-law-pushed-girls-out-of-facilities>

Wisconsin: Outstanding Child Abuse & Foster Care Professionals to go Along with the Great Food Posted: 06/09/2014 2:07 pm EDT Updated: 06/09/2014 8:59 pm EDT Print Article Share 12 Tweet 4 5 Email 0 tumblr reddit I had never seen the Mississippi River up close, with its picture-perfect views until I arrived in Wisconsin, but the beautiful city of La Crosse will also stand out to me for some of the best food in AMERICA. Having traveled the country covering Presidential elections or speaking on the subjects of Child Abuse and Foster Care, it's fair to say I have acquired a taste for good food. In La Crosse, with its population of about 50,000, there was the local tradition of "Fazyze's" restaurant. The first thing you notice when you walk up is the huge Blue outside awning. Of course Fazyze's was recommended, and I was told about its on-premise bakery. In Wisconsin, I just had to have some cheese curds, and it was some of the best food I had ever tasted. Light batter, and it was so good, the curds almost melted in your mouth. Then I ordered the Strawberry French toast. You know when a meal is so tasty that you never want the last bite to come. Yes, the food in New Orleans Louisiana is good, (Especially the Shrimp and Grits at Surrey's Café - a Brunch Spot in the Lower Garden District) but La Crosse can even compete with that. For Dinner, I went to a place called "Buzzard Billy's," which is known for its New Orleans style Cuisine. I ordered a Cajun steak, and it made you want to bite your fingers. That's how delicious it was. But that brings me to the reason why I was in La Crosse Wisconsin. There, like many communities across America, they do such admirable work on the issue of Child Abuse. The Mayo Clinic there was holding its annual Child Maltreatment conference. You may not have noticed it, but all across America "multidisciplinary" teams are now being used to intervene when child maltreatment is reported. Basically, the Multidisciplinary teams are exactly what they sound like. A collaboration with many different local agencies, from law enforcement to assisting the child on an emotional level, to protect children and ensure justice for Child Victims. I will never forget the professionals in La Crosse, like the lead organizer of the conference, social worker Philip Nielson. It's very clear how I feel about the great and positive work of Social Workers from a previous piece I did titled, "We should all hug a social worker." Some of the other speakers just from the morning session alone of day one, were Robert Hugh Farley, a world renowned expert on Child Abuse. His session was titled, "Undercover as a Pedophile: Six Years in their Shoes" and Jennifer Lee, from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children Even the Medical Director of the La

Crosse Mayo Clinic attended, Dr. David Rushlow, opened the conference. At 8:00 AM in the morning, they had hundreds of Child Welfare professionals, eager to improve on their expertise. The topics they were taking on are commendable to deal with the current day reality of abused children: Reconstruction Techniques for Child Abuse Injuries, Identifying adolescent victims of Sexual Exploitation and Gang Rape, the role of the medical exam in child abuse cases, Fractures and Head Trauma Review, how to assess abuse disclosures by children under 6 and of course Parenting Is Best Prevention . Perhaps the most compelling part of the day were the medical doctors that came up and talked to me, and they were down to earth individuals that just want to make the world a better place. But think about this for a moment, such doctors are on the front line with the Child Abuse battle. They are the first ones to see, and document horrendous child abuse. Burn-out for them, like the professionals, can be an issue. Just two weeks before the Mayo Clinic event, I was in Wisconsin again, this time for the Wisconsin Foster and Adoptive Parent Association annual conference that was held in scenic Wisconsin Dells. (In all likelihood, your community has such a Foster Parent organization) The Wisconsin Foster and Adoptive Parent Association took on relevant issues like Foster Kids aging out of the system. Imagine, your 18 years old, and thrown into society, on your own, with no support system. Pat O'Brien, a nice man and dedicated professional, also out of New York took on that issue. There are everyday heroes in every local American community. I will never forget the great work and kindness of the President of the Wisconsin Foster and Adoptive Parents Association, Sherry Benson, or her Vice Presidents Tina Christopherson, and Manda Wirth. All three ladies have several children in their homes as foster parents, and all three are the type of Americans that would give you the shirt off their back. Of course a commendable list starts with those that are a voice for the voiceless, people that stand up for those that can't defend themselves, and that is the Foster Parents throughout the world. Perhaps the next time you see a foster Parent, or a Child Abuse Professional, you should say thank you, for all that you do for others. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/dominic-carter/wisconsin-outstanding-chi_b_5474409.html?utm_hp_ref=impact&i=Impact

June 9, 2014 at 11:50 pm State suspends adult foster facility in Detroit where resident was allegedly beaten Detroit News staff and wire reports 2 Comments The state suspended the license of a Detroit adult foster care facility where a worker was videotaped beating a special-needs resident. The Michigan Department of Human Services Bureau of Children and Adult Licensing issued an order for Strathmoor Manor after an investigation "found violations of the Adult Foster Care Facility Licensing Act and administrative rules regarding the care of residents," officials said in a statement Monday. "BCAL took emergency action to protect the health, welfare and safety of vulnerable adults." A worker at the adult foster care small group home is accused of physically and psychologically abusing resident Vera Gossett, 24. "Vera Gossett was physically restrained without justification, man-handled, screamed at (often times with profanity), whipped with electrical cords and doused with water, when her behavior was not conforming," according to a complaint the Sam Bernstein Law Firm filed last month on behalf of Gossett's mother. Investigators were alerted to the beating after WJBK-TV (Channel 2) aired a story May 15 featuring footage, filmed by an employee, in which the worker is seen assaulting Gossett, who sustained injuries. The worker, identified as Kadia Konate-Dennard, 49, was arrested by Detroit police. Last week, 36th District Judge Ruth Carter ruled there was enough evidence to try her on felony assault, torture and vulnerable adult abuse charges. Konate-Dennard faces a Wayne County Circuit Court arraignment Thursday. Defense lawyer Suzan Gabbara said her client "was excessively overcharged," and nothing presented in court supports the charges. Strathmoor Manor had held a license to operate an adult foster care small group home since October 2006, the state said. The license was for six adults. The summary suspension order prohibits Strathmoor from operating its adult foster care home on Strathmoor Street or accepting individuals with physical or developmental disabilities, mental illnesses or aged adults, effective June 2. The order also requires Strathmoor to inform all guardians of adults in its care that its license has been suspended and that it can no longer provide adult foster care. From The Detroit News: <http://www.detroitnews.com/article/20140609/METRO01/306090106#ixzz34kxLRHvw>

DCF to close several group homes By Mark DavisPublished: June 13, 2014, 8:50 pm TORRINGTON, Conn. (WTNH) — The state Department of Children and Families is looking to save $10 million by closing several group homes. Some of the parents of the mentally-challenged kids in those homes say this is not a smart move. DCF says the number of kids in group homes has been reduced by 40 percent. They add that child welfare and foster care system is improving. Fifteen-year-old Ben Schuler has multiple mental health issues but he's been doing very well. He lives during the week in a group home in Torrington — one of the homes DCF has decided to close along with five other similar facilities. It's a decision that is giving him and his adoptive parents who he visits on the weekends a great deal of anxiety. "In the last year that he's been there he has made progress that he has not made anywhere else," says Ben's mother, Cindy Schuler. "His social skills have improved, his ability to communicate with us has improved." "We get to go camping, go-carting, a whole bunch of fun stuff, activities," Ben says. "It's a great place, I like to stay there ... I would not want them to close it." In a statement, DCF says Ben will still get individual treatment somewhere else. Adjustments to how we serve children and families are both warranted and necessary ... The department is making adjustments to its service array so that children can more readily get the help they need while living with a family in the community. "He would go into a home where supposedly someone was trained and live with their family," Cindy says. "So, it's a foster home." Cindy is certain this will not work and will cause confusion. "Ben already has a family, a very highly-functional, loving family whose unable to care for him, so to put him into a situation like that would be not successful." "I don't want to go anywhere else," Ben says. "I want to stay there." DCF says they have no choice but to close the homes because they are partially empty with just 19 kids in homes designed for a capacity of over 30. Source: <http://wtnh.com/2014/06/13/DCF-to-close-several-group-homes/>

Omaha sex offender facing life in prison (GOOD!) Updated 12:45 pm, Saturday, June 14, 2014 0 Larger | Smaller Printable Version Email This Georgia (default) Verdana Times New Roman Arial Font Page 1 of 1 OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — An Omaha man who spent less than three years in prison for participating in the gang-rape of teenager in 2000 now faces life in prison for allegedly sexually assaulting two young girls within months of leaving prison in 2004. Kelvin Smith, 35, was convicted this week by a Sarpy County jury of 11 sex-related crimes against the young girls, including first-degree sexual assault of a child and third-degree sexual assault of a child, The Omaha World-Herald reported (<http://bit.ly/SISMR8>). He faces up to life in prison when he's sentenced on Aug. 11. The girls were 9 and 10 years old when Smith began abusing them in 2004, months after he had been released from prison, prosecutors said. Smith was charged with first-degree sexual assault and false imprisonment in a 2000 attack on a 19-year-old woman. Prosecutors say several men dragged her into an abandoned north Omaha house and took turns raping her. She managed to escape after stabbing Smith with a knife. As part of a plea deal, Smith pleaded no contest to attempted sexual assault in that case. The victim in that case told the World-Herald on Friday that she had been angry over Smith's sentence in her case, which she felt was too lenient. But she said she's happy he faces decades in prison for his latest convictions. The Associated Press generally does not name victims of sexual assault. "I was really happy," she said, "but I was sorry it had to happen again." Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/crime/article/Omaha-sex-offender-facing-life-in-prison-5552821.php>

DeWitt nurse's lawyer on new charges stemming from resident's death: 'This is a political witch hunt' Tanya Lemon leaves court with her lawyer, Jeff DeRoberts. (Douglass Dowty | ddowty@syracuse.com) Print By Douglass Dowty | ddowty@syracuse.com The Post-Standard Email the author | Follow on Twitter on June 16, 2014 at 1:03 PM, updated June 16, 2014 at 5:05 PM Reddit Email Patient dies in nurse's care State: DeWitt nurse routinely slept on the job, allowing man to die and endangering others DeWitt nurse's lawyer on new charges stemming from resident's death: 'This is a political witch hunt' DeWitt group home patient's death investigated by new state agency created to protect disabled DeWitt patient who died in nurse's care identified in court papers For 8 hours, 8 minutes 25-year-old man didn't receive needed oxygen at DeWitt group home All Stories | Tanya LemonProvided Photo DeWitt, NY -- A DeWitt nurse was accused in March of falling asleep on the job, allowing a group home resident to die. Tanya Lemon was charged with felony endangering the welfare of an incompetent or physically disabled person in the September 2013 death of Dennis Dattolo at the state-run 4918 Briarwood Lane group home. Lemon is accused of not getting the man oxygen for eight hours and eight minutes. He died 14 days later from a brain injury due to lack of oxygen. Lemon is facing two crimes in connection with his death. But an indictment revealed today also charges Lemon with a dozen additional crimes relating to six group home residents, including Dattolo. She's now accused of endangering all of them between June 1, 2013 and Sept. 6, 2013. The state's year-old Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs is prosecuting the case. The new agency covers abuse allegations within the myriad of caregivers run by the state. All told, Lemon now faces 14 charges -- seven felonies and seven misdemeanors, the center said. Lemon's lawyer, Jeffrey DeRoberts, lambasted the new charges as a political ploy. "It's a political witch hunt," DeRoberts said after court. He criticized the state for taking the case from the Onondaga County District Attorney's Office. "We have a qualified district attorney in this county," DeRoberts said. "We don't need a new governmental organization to come in and try to make work for itself." Lemon faces a much tougher possible sentence given the new charges. She's due back in court July 3. A spokeswoman for the Justice Center declined to respond to DeRoberts's comments. Source: http://www.syracuse.com/news/index.ssf/2014/06/dewitt_nurses_lawyer_on_new_charges_stemming_from_residents_death_this_is_a_poli.html

Foster mom sues group home operator over alleged sex abuse Foster mom sues group home operator over alleged sex abuse (Tribune Illustration) By Mitch Smith Tribune reporter 7:14 a.m. CDT, June 17, 2014 A foster mother is suing a north suburban group home operator, alleging that the Allendale Association negligently allowed one of its employees to sexually abuse her foster daughter for nearly two years. Kelvin Perry, 51, was arrested in February and charged with sexually abusing a ward of the state whom prosecutors said he met in his role as an Allendale counselor. The girl was 16 at the time he was charged. The lawsuit filed Monday in Cook County court appears to reference the same incident, though it names the Allendale employee as Calvin Parry, with both his first and last names spelled slightly differently than those of the man arrested earlier this year. Asked about the discrepancy by the Tribune, officials at the Deratany Firm, which filed the suit, said Monday evening they were referring to Perry and would be filing an amended lawsuit. Perry, of Waukegan, met a girl at Allendale's North Chicago facility and stayed in touch with her after she was placed in a foster home, authorities said in February. Prosecutors said he abused her in the foster home and in a car outside a Schaumburg mall. Cook County jail records show that Perry is being held on $250,000 bail and is due back in court July 1. In Monday's lawsuit, a girl's foster mother alleges that a man named Perry sexually assaulted a child while she lived at the Allendale home from June 2012 through January 2014 and after she left the facility. The foster mother filed the lawsuit, which seeks more than $100,000 in damages, on behalf of the girl. The Tribune is not naming the plaintiff in order to protect the identity of the alleged abuse victim. A voice mail and email left Monday evening for an Allendale spokeswoman weren't immediately returned. mitsmith@tribune.com Copyright © 2014 Chicago Tribune Company, LLC Source: http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/local/suburbs/schaumburg_hoffman_estates/chi-foster-mom-sues-group-home-operator-over-alleged-sex-abuse-20140616.0.822682.story

Teen missing from youth home in Auburn Authorities are searching for 17-year-old Jacob Cabrera, who ran away from a youth home in Auburn on Friday. (Provided Photo) Print By Julie McMahan | jmcmahan@syracuse.com The Post-Standard Email the author | Follow on Twitter on June 17, 2014 at 4:11 PM, updated June 17, 2014 at 4:15 PM Reddit Email Auburn, N.Y. -- Auburn police are searching for 17-year-old boy who ran away from the Cayuga Centers group home early Friday morning. Jacob Cabrera ran away from 101 Hamilton Ave. at around 2 a.m., police said. The boy has a few contacts in the Auburn area, police said, but they believe he may have returned to Rochester, where he is originally from. Cabrera, who is 5'5" tall weighing 153 pounds, was staying at the residence, which provides treatment programs for troubled youths, according to the Cayuga Centers website. Cabrera's right ear is pierced, police said. Police are asking the public to call 253-3231 with any information on Cabrera's whereabouts. Source: http://www.syracuse.com/news/index.ssf/2014/06/teen_missing_from_youth_home_in_auburn.html

Extended foster care bill helps older teens further their education Story Comments Image \(3\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size 11 Previous Next Theresa Campbell / Daily Commercial Lakesha and Stacy Foster child Lakesha Griffin, 17, left joins her mentor, Stacy Morgan, director of Healthy Start at Kids Central, Inc. in posing for a selfie photo. Theresa Campbell / Daily Commercial Posing for selfie Foster child Lakesha Griffin, 17, left poses for a photo with her mentor, Stacy Morgan, director of Healthy Start at Kids Central, Inc. Theresa Campbell / Daily Commercial In gazebo Stacy Morgan, left, and Lakesha Griffin mingle inside the gazebo located across the street from Healthy Start at Kid Central, Inc., in Leesburg. Did You Know? Kid's Central, Inc. is the nonprofit, accredited lead agency selected by the State of Florida to coordinate child protection services in Florida's 5th Judicial Circuit, which includes Lake and Sumter counties. Kids Central focuses on the prevention and diversion of families from the child welfare system, the care of children in foster care, and strengthening families in communities. Posted: Tuesday, June 17, 2014 6:00 am Extended foster care bill helps older teens further their education Theresa Campbell | Staff Writer theresacampbell@dailycommercial.com dailycommercial.com | 0 comments Lakesha Griffin is smiling with a sense of relief these days. The 17-year-old Leesburg High school student will benefit from a bill signed in May 2013 by Gov. Rick Scott that will allow young adults living in the child welfare system to have the option to remain in foster care until age 21 in order to accomplish their educational goals. "This gives Lakesha more support. She is going to turn 18 in the middle of the school year, and in previous years, she would have had to move out on her own upon turning 18," said Nicole Pulcini Mason, director of community affairs for Kids Central Inc., who believes Senate Bill 103 6, sponsored by Sen. Nancy Detert — and renamed the Nancy C. Detert Common Sense and Compassion Independent Living Act — was the right legislation to sign into law. Griffin thinks so, too. "I would have been really scared," the teen said of the stress of moving out on her own on the middle of a senior year at LHS. "How would I live on my own? If I was out in the real world, I would have to focus on school and bills and that would be too much while still in high school." Griffin will turn 18 on Dec. 11. After she graduates from Leesburg High School, she plans to attend Lake-Sumter State College and then further her education in Tallahassee at Florida A&M University. "In five or 10 years, I see myself working with the mentally disabled, because I really like working with them," she said. "I can bond with them." The teen has been in foster care since infancy. "The Department of Children and Families has been in my life since I was 2 days old," she said, recalling she lived in the home of a family friend until age 14, followed by a stay at a Marion County foster home for two years. June 30 will mark her one-year anniversary of being back in foster care in Lake County. "It feels better to me," she said of living in Lake County. "Foster care is not as bad as people may think that it is. My mother was not able to take care of me, and I feel that I am in a better place. I used to be mad at her for letting me go into foster care, but now I am actually thankful for it. I have a better life being in care." Mason praises the teen's attitude and outlook on her life. "She is so motivated, smart, caring and a hard worker," Mason said. "Her grades are great (As and Bs) and she was recognized as a leader recently." "I find Lakesha to be a vibrant and bright young woman," added Stacy Morgan, director of Healthy Start at Kids Central Inc. "I've truly enjoyed being a mentor to her and hope that I have helped guide and shape her in a positive manner. I know she is destined for great success and will truly make an impact wherever she choose to focus. I've tried to be a strong role model and hope that one day she too will return the favor to another." Morgan also touts the extended foster care bill as needed legislation. "This will give our young adults leaving the foster care system more security and a smoother transition into adulthood," Morgan said. "Most 18-year-olds who didn't grow up with abuse or neglect aren't ready to go out on their own at 18, and these youths aren't either. Extended foster care gives them the safety net they need for a few more years. "I can't imagine Lakesha setting out on her own the day that she turns 18 while still in high school. I feel better knowing that she will have a host family to help launch her." However, under the new law, most of the young adults 18 and older, cannot live in a traditional foster home. Kids Central Inc. is currently seeking host families and apartment-style housing for these youths. "The need is critical," John Cooper, CEO of Kids Central Inc. said in a statement. "For these youth to be successful and for them to avoid more disruptions and setbacks, we need local housing for them." Kids Central Inc. wants to find suitable and safe housing options for these young adults, and the agency noted by placing older teens like Griffin into semi-independent style housing will help them become independent gradually. Also, it will keep them in their communities and avoid another change of schools. Residents interested in learning more about how to become a host family can visit KidsCentralinc.org and click on the Request for Proposals link, or call Independent Living Supervisor Hannah Rios at 352-387-3551. Source: http://www.dailycommercial.com/news/article_7a5f0343-88f8-547c-8071-dffb7eb8ee5c.html

New state rules for group homes a first step in neighborhood communication | The Columbus Dispatch New state rules for group homes a first step in neighborhood communication Jane E. Juergens Related Items By Rita Price The Columbus Dispatch • Wednesday June 18, 2014 6:28 AM Comments: 1 34 2 61 Before Jane Juergens was stabbed to death, there was no law that spelled out a way for neighbors to communicate with the operators of the Blendon Township group home where her killer lived. That changed this week with the signing of Gov. John Kasich's mid-biennial review. It includes new requirements for group homes and other children's residential centers to create community-engagement plans and file them with the state. Supporters say they hope to consider even more reforms in coming months. "The bulk of this legislation was focused on child placement and community communication," said state Rep. Anne Gonzales, who introduced the legislation in February. "Now, we're going to start taking a harder look at the function of the home," said the Republican from Westerville. "This is far from over." The legislation also mandates a 10-county pilot program to standardize the assessments used to determine the needs of children entering the foster system. Franklin County Children Services has acknowledged that the teen who attacked Juergens last fall, Jordan T. Stewart, was more deeply disturbed than anyone knew. He was living in a group home for foster youth operated by Consumer Support Services and had gone on an outing to a nearby park on Oct. 20. That's where Stewart encountered Juergens, 55, a Blendon Township resident who had gone for a run. He stabbed her more than two dozen times. Stewart pleaded guilty last month in adult court to charges of murder and tampering with evidence and was sentenced to life in prison with no chance of parole for 18 years. Juergens' friends and family have told legislation proponents "that Jane would be pleased that something positive is coming from this, so that these kids get better care," said Blendon Township resident John McGuire. Outcry over the case also led to a community summit on at-risk youth and a Children Services review of all group-home placements. McGuire said neighbors had long complained about problems at the Copenhagen Drive home where Stewart lived but never received responses. The Ohio Department of Job and Family Services said 105 group homes and residential centers for minors will be affected by the new communication requirements. The department has 90 days from the legislation's passage to write the new rules, which will require operators to provide addresses, contact information and a copy of the community-engagement plan to area first-responders. The plan must include protocols for neighbors to communicate concerns. The Ohio Association of Child Caring Agencies supported the legislation. Most members, Executive Director Mark Mecum said, already are meeting the requirements or would find it relatively easy to do so. Ben McDay, Ohio operations director for the Pennsylvania-based agency New Story, said its new center on the North Side works hard to be a good neighbor. The agency has held cookouts, and teens regularly perform chores in the community such as raking leaves and shoveling snow. "I think that's a fault that we've had for a long time — we've always been 'that house down the street,' and nobody really knew who we were and what we do," McDay said of the industry. "We're open to conversation and communication." Source: <http://www.dispatch.com/content/stories/local/2014/06/17/New-state-rules-group-homes-youths.html>

Two more reported missing from Auburn youth home; may be together Amiya Ince and Kendra Dexter Print By Jacob Pucci | jpucci@syracuse.com The Post-Standard Email the author | Follow on Twitter on June 18, 2014 at 12:44 PM, updated June 18, 2014 at 2:42 PM Reddit Email Auburn, N.Y. -- Two teenage girls are missing from Cayuga Centers, marking the second and third teen to run away from the group home in one week. Amiya Ince, 14, and Kendra Dexter, 16, went missing on June 8 and may currently be together, Auburn police Detective Jeffrey Mead said. The two went missing from 101 Hamilton Ave., the same location that another youth at the home, 17-year-old Jacob Cabrera, went missing from early Friday morning. View full size Amiya Ince Courtesy of Auburn Police Department Ince is described as a 5-foot-4-inch, biracial girl weighing 130 pounds. She has brown hair, brown eyes and a small scar on the back on her right hand. She was last seen wearing blue denim shorts, a white Tommy Hilfiger shirt and brown moccasins. Dexter is described as 5 feet 4 inches tall and weighing 145 pounds. She is biracial and has brown hair and eyes. She has a lower lip piercing. she was last seen wearing a pink shirt, gray sweatpants, brown moccasins and a head scarf. Source: http://www.syracuse.com/news/index.ssf/2014/06/two_more_reported_missing_from_auburn_youth_home_may_be_together.html

NY legislators want better foster care background NY legislators want better foster care background 1 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2014-06-18T03:01:56Z 2014-06-18T07:02:00Z NY legislators want better foster care background The Associated Press The Associated Press June 18, 2014 3:01 am \(0\) Comments ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — New York legislators have approved amending state law to require agencies placing children in foster care first check whether prospective parents have done it before and provided poor or questionable care. Sponsors say caseworkers sometimes remove children from homes suspected of being unsafe without either revoking the parents' certificate to provide foster care or reporting them to the state's child abuse hotline. Those parents may simply apply to another agency for foster children and get money for their care. The amendment, if signed by Gov. Andrew Cuomo, would require all foster care agencies check with the Office of Children and Family Services to determine whether prospective parents ever had foster a child removed from their home, evaluate the reasons why and determine if the foster home should be reopened. Source: http://poststar.com/news/state-and-regional/ny-legislators-want-better-foster-care-background/article_32a5a29b-360f-504e-84f9-38b1fd4c3cbf.html

Sunset area residents opposing addiction treatment center Attorney: Location not suited for 50 persons BOBBY ARDOIN Special to The Advocate June 21, 2014 0 Comments OPELOUSAS — Residents of a secluded area south of Sunset packed the St. Landry Parish Council meeting Wednesday as their attorney argued that a proposed addiction treatment center in the community lacks sufficient drainage and land area. Jack Burson, a Eunice attorney representing residents in the Choctaw Drive area the Interstate 49 service road, said the proposed Acadiana Addiction Center is "an ill-conceived project that has been misrepresented" from its inception. Burson said the facility, which will accommodate patients undergoing treatment for substance abuse, will be housed in a former residence that is unsuitable for the 50 persons the center intends to treat. He said that number of patients would require a level of water, drainage and sewage that the residence currently is unable to provide. Burson also said a 3-acre pond on the property is insufficient for the proposed facility's drainage needs. No representatives from the Acadiana Addiction Center spoke at Wednesday's meeting. St. Landry Parish currently has no zoning ordinance for unincorporated areas of the parish. However, Burson noted that state law allows parish governments to create zoning commissions to handle issues similar to the one faced by the Choctaw Drive residents, who packed the meeting held at the Old City Market building on the courthouse square. "Is it fair to permit something that is totally incompatible with the type of residential neighborhood that exists there?" Burson said. Sheriff Bobby Guidroz told the council his office has not been notified of an occupational license permit application from the Acadiana Addiction Center. Burson said the center will also need to undergo a lengthy permit application and screening process from the State Department of Health and Hospitals before it begins operation. The DHH, Burson said, has reported no activity concerning the treatment center. Council member Wayne Ardoin said he was told by the former owner of the property, whom he did not name, that the facility would operate as a health care business with its offices elsewhere. "This (center) is going to be located on a beautiful home site that is not designed for what it's supposed to be," Ardoin said. "I would like to see this stopped any way (the council) can, so it doesn't hurt these people." The council took no action on the matter Wednesday. Source: <http://theadvocate.com/news/acadiana/9496701-123/sunset-area-residents-opposing-addiction>

Bring Paris Jackson Home and Rescue Her from Utah! Comment on this story to take action! <http://www.kpopstarz.com/articles/96190/20140619/paris-jackson-boarding-school-suicide-michael-jackson.htm>

San Clemente to join Newport Beach in seeking controls for group homes By FRED SWEGLER / STAFF WRITER Published: June 18, 2014 Updated: 3:07 p.m. San Clemente is prepared to file a "friend of the court" brief in support of Newport Beach's efforts to apply zoning controls to group homes in residential neighborhoods. On a 5-0 vote Tuesday night, the San Clemente City Council agreed to file a court paper and contribute $5,000 to Newport's request for the U.S. Supreme Court to hear its case. Like Newport, San Clemente has group homes, often known as "sober living" homes, sprouting up all over town. Council members said they continually get complaints about what residents see as a business moving onto a residential street and disrupting neighbors' quality of life. Mayor Tim Brown described the homes as an "ongoing challenge in our city," saying there is little the city can do because federal laws such as the Fair Housing Act and Americans With Disabilities Act preclude local control. City Attorney Jeff Oderman said Newport Beach adopted an ordinance that applied what that city felt were reasonable standards for group homes with seven or more people, but a three-judge panel of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals overturned it. Oderman said Newport Beach requested a hearing by the full court, and the full court declined to hear it. But five judges expressed support for Newport's position, which led the city to look to the Supreme Court. Several San Clemente residents asked the City Council for help Tuesday night, saying there needs to be a balance between the rights of group homes and those of neighbors. Speakers described drug activity, street fights, threats, thefts, people crawling through windows and a danger to children. "It's just destroying our neighborhood," Pat Wernet said. "This industry is out of control," Sherman Fowler told the council. A report to the council cited one neighborhood where the Sheriff's Department and city code enforcement have stepped up their presence and the city organized a community meeting and tried for a mediation agreement with the owner of a group home, without success. City staff said one option for residents is to file multiple small-claims actions against a property owner for creating a public nuisance. Council members also suggested an ordinance to deal with homes that spur a lot of police calls, making the property owner responsible to pay for excessive calls. Oderman said a nuisance ordinance is possible as long as the calls involve bad behavior. "Running a drug house is not a permitted use, regardless of the Americans With Disabilities Act," he said. Contact the writer: fswegles@ocregister.com or 949-492-5127 Source: <http://www.ocregister.com/articles/city-618722-homes-court.html>

More foster parents needed in Iowa, nationwide Iowa KidsNet also hopes to increase diversity By Hayley Bruce, The Gazette Published: June 21 2014 | 11:01 am in News, 244 8 0 Photos Liz Martin/The Gazette Josh Phams has adopted a teenage son and has two foster children. Liz Martin/The Gazette Josh Phams has adopted a teenage son and has two foster children. 1 1 Joshua Phams always knew he wanted to have kids. It was just a matter of how he would go about it. Now, after being a foster parent for a year and a half, Phams — who is 33, gay and single — has adopted a 15-year-old boy and continues to serve as a foster parent for other children. The Cedar Rapids native said he always had considered being a foster parent, but had the benefit of watching some of his friends in gay couples caring for foster children. After hearing their experiences, Phams went to an information session, started filling out the paperwork and became a foster parent in January 2013. Now, he's also going back to school to become a social worker. Since he became a foster parent, Phams has had five children in his home. And though being a parent can, at times, be challenging, the Kirkwood Community College instructor said the experience has been incredibly fulfilling. "What's really unique and most rewarding is watching them bond and adapt to a new family," Phams said. "My youngest, it might have taken him three to six months, but even crossing the street holding your hand, feeling safe to call you Dad, them feeling comfortable to tell you their terrors — a lot of times when kids come into care, there's a lot of things that have happened to them so they don't know that it's a safe place." FOSTER CARE IN IOWA

Between 4,000 and 5,000 children are in Iowa's foster care system, consistently, year after year. And Iowa KidsNet — a collaboration of not-for-profit agencies that recruits, licenses, trains and supports foster and adoptive parents in the state through a contract assignment with the Iowa Department of Human Services — wants more foster parents like Phams. Penny McGee, statewide recruitment supervisor for Iowa KidsNet, said there's always a gap between the number of kids who need foster homes and the number of homes the organization has. But the gap becomes more apparent when one realizes that not all foster families are willing or able to care for children of every age. "We may have a foster family in Cedar Rapids who is willing to parent a kid age zero to five but not willing to parent a teenager, so, just because the homes match up doesn't mean there isn't a need," McGee said. For example, Linn County had 236 referrals in foster care in 2013 — meaning Iowa KidsNet received referrals from DHS for 236 individual children who needed a foster home. Of those referrals, 79 were 13 or older. Though Iowa KidsNet has 89 families available to take foster children in Linn County, only 23 accept children ages 13 or older. But Iowa KidsNet is seeking to increase more than the number of foster parents. The organization wants to improve diversity among foster parents, too. A NEED FOR DIVERSITY "There is a saying that culture is to people as water is to fish — in other words, culture influences us constantly, all the time," McGee said. "I think it's important to have a diverse pool of families to pick from for kids coming into foster care." Of the 236 referrals of children into foster care in Linn County last year, 45 were black-identified youths, one identified as Hispanic/Latino and 48 identified as multiracial. Of the 89 families available for a match, six identified as black and five identified as multiracial. McGee said a child could experience additional trauma if the foster family is not dedicated to and skilled in supporting their cultural identity. "They experience abuse or neglect or some other traumatic experience and it's traumatic to go into foster care," McGee said. "So if they are going into a home that's completely unfamiliar to them that just adds to the trauma the child has already experienced." Training regarding parenting diverse youths is available before and after families become licensed. SUPPORT AND AFFIRMATION McGee said diversity also needs to extend to support children in their sexual orientation and gender identity. "I think, as a society, we fail to recognize LGBTQ (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender or Questioning) families as a culture that needs to be supported or affirmed," McGee said. "We think of race or ethnicity, but we often don't think of sexual orientation or gender identity." Though there is no Iowa-specific data on the number of LGBTQ youths in the foster care system, McGee said LGBTQ-identifying youths are similar to youths of color in that they are overrepresented in the foster care system. Of the roughly 175,000 youths ages 10 to 18 in foster care in the United States, an estimated 5 percent to 10 percent — likely more — are LGBTQ, according to 2013 estimates from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Phams said he has received nothing but support as a single, gay foster parent, and he encourages anyone on the fence to learn more about the process and its rewards. "I think a lot of barriers are there because people aren't in a traditional role of having a husband or having a wife — either they're a lesbian couple or a single gay man or woman or a mixed minority, and they think they don't have a chance, or that people might not be open to accepting them as a foster parent. But the need is so great," Phams said. "The kids just need someone to love, and I think a lot of times what deters people that might be interested in my age group is that they're not educated about foster parenting enough or they haven't made those connections with people who have done it before." Phams, whose adoptive son identifies as bisexual, said he realized the gravity of his decision during a recent conversation with his son. "He wasn't able to come out (in his previous home), and he has said he thought he was going to have to wait until he was an adult to be himself — and now he's calling me Dad," Phams said. "It almost made me cry that he is now able to be himself at a younger age and really accept who he is so he can come to terms with that." - See more at: <http://thegazette.com/subject/news/more-foster-parents-needed-in-iowa-nationwide-20140605#sthash.cQbDhnt6.dpuf>

Griffo Foster Care Bill Heading To The Governor By Jim Rondenelli June 19, 2014 3:07 PM Share on Facebook Share on Twitter Senator Griffo's Office A bill sponsored by Senator Joseph Griffo to protect foster children from being placed in unsuitable homes has been passed by the state Senate and Assembly. Griffo says currently, there is no formal system in place that would require an agency to review and evaluate an applicant's history if the applicant were to apply to another agency to take in foster children. The legislation would require agencies to consult with the Office of Children and Family Services whether a foster parent's application has been certified or revoked, or if a child was removed from the home. "The state is responsible for the safety and security of every child placed in their care," said Senator Griffo. The bill was sponsored in the Assembly by Nily Rozic of Queens. It now goes to the Governor to be signed into law. Cuomo, Legislative Leaders Agree On Heroin Bills Read More: Griffo Foster Care Bill Heading To The Governor | <http://wibx950.com/griffo-foster-care-bill-heading-to-the-governor/?trackback=tsmclip>

GBI Raids Group Home, Charges Workers With Assault And Exploitation By: Winnie Wright - Email Posted: Thu 6:08 PM, Jun 19, 2014 By: Winnie Wright - Email Winnie Wright Multimedia Journalist Connect With Me: winnie.wright@wctv.tv Home / News / Georgia / Headlines List / Article Winnie Wright June 19, 2014 Morven, GA - GBI agents raid a group home, after residents report people breaking in their homes to steal food. Six people are under arrest. "It's terrible out there. They beat people, hurt people, everything." Strong words from William Wethersby who claims he used to be a resident of a group home formally known as Uplift Inc. He says he is glad he left the home when he did. On Thursday morning, agents from the Georgia Bureau of Investigations raided the facility and arrested the owner, Tyrone Terrell, and five other people. "We have reports of physical abuse. We have assault charges and battery charges as well on the people that were working there. As well as exploitation" using the finances of the clients for themselves to actually personally profit", says Special Agent, Steve Turner, with the GBI. According to Agent Turner, the facility was unlivable. Terrell was accepting money for patients to stay here and in turn, was taking their food stamps and making them fend for themselves. He says they didn't even provide air conditioning. The raid came after a two-month investigation into this facility in Morven and another in Hahira. "Morven PD has had multiple complaints about clients that were living there who were breaking out and breaking into people's homes because they weren't being adequately fed", says Turner. Wethersby says people were just doing what they had to do to survive. "Half the time they didn't feed nobody. The food's nasty, bugs, bed bugs, everywhere." Agent Turner says the suspects face charges ranging from Exploitation to Aggravated Assault. The GBI also says this is an ongoing investigation and additional charges are pending. All of the residents have been placed in other facilities. Source: <http://www.wctv.tv/news/georgianews/headlines/GBI-Raids-Group-Home-Charges-Workers-With-Assault-And-Ex-263893731.html>

Clark County sued by mother whose children suffered harm in foster care Paula Hammack, assistant director of Clark County Department of Family Services, left, and Lisa Ruiz-Lee, director of Family Services, are accused of failing to establish appropriate procedures for training employees and supervising foster parents. (Jerry Henkel/Las Vegas Review-Journal) Buy Photo By YESENIA AMARO LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL The mother of a 17-month-old toddler and a 2-month-old baby who suffered neglect under the care of their foster parents is suing Clark County, several Clark County Department of Family Services' employees and the foster parents. Former foster parents Andrea Hernandez, 38, and her husband, Waldo Hernandez, 40, were sentenced in March to five years of probation for failing to properly care for the two foster children last year. "Clark County (Department of Family Services) had guidelines for determining the appropriate priority of hotline calls, but failed to adequately train its hotline staff workers as to those guidelines," The complaint alleges. It accuses Lisa Ruiz-Lee, director of Family Services, and Paula Hammack, assistant director of Family Services, of failing to establish appropriate procedures for training employees and supervising foster parents. Attorney Marjorie Hauf filed the lawsuit last month in Clark County District Court on behalf of Jessica Hargrove, biological mother of the boys. The plaintiffs seek damages in excess of $10,000 for physical and psychological harm the children suffered in foster care. The claim alleges civil rights violations and negligence. Hargrove regained custody of her sons in April, Hauf said. They had been removed because of domestic violence between the parents and because of drug and alcohol use in the home, she said. Hauf and attorney Michael Kane, who is assisting, said once the children were in custody, the county had "the duty to keep them protected." "They put them off in situations that are worse than where they started," Hauf said. "Far worse than in their parents' home." Family Services spokeswoman Kristi Jourdan said she would not comment on the pending litigation. Hargrove visited the Family Services permanency worker handling her case numerous times and called the county child abuse hotline twice, first on Sept. 4 and again on Sept. 17. Nothing happened until Sept. 19, when Family Services finally tracked down the foster parents and Hargrove's children at an unapproved location, a trailer in Sandy Valley, 50 miles southwest of Las Vegas. The 17-month-old boy had a 3-inch burn scar on his arm and another large scar on his buttocks, while the 2-month-old baby had infections in every skin fold. The injury to the 17-month-old boy happened when the foster parents' 13-year-old son changed the toddler's diaper outside on a hot day, using a plastic bag as a diaper and a black mini-fridge as a changing table, according to records. The foster parents in December each pleaded guilty to one count of child neglect or endangerment with substantial bodily harm. The lawsuit names the foster parents; Anita Moody, who was assigned to investigate an allegation of neglect involving Hargrove's sons; Lisa Brochu, who was the case manager assigned to oversee the placement and care of the children; Kim Kallas, the social work supervisor supervising Brochu; Lisa Ruiz-Lee, director of Family Services; Paula Hammack, assistant director of Family Services, and other unnamed employees. The complaint alleges Family Services failed to supervise and conduct monthly meetings with the boys to ensure their safety. They also failed to properly investigate the couple and improperly licensed them, according to the lawsuit. It also claims Family Services' administrators failed to train social workers and supervisors on how to investigate prospective foster parents, how to select proper foster parents for children, how to supervise foster children, how to report suspicions of abuse to Child Protective Services, and how to prepare accurate reports for the county and state. For example, Brochu, who was the assigned case manager, "did not visit the children or the home of (the Hernandezes) as required by applicable policies, which allowed (the foster parents) to violate statutes and administrative codes controlling their licensure as foster parents," the lawsuit states. If Brochu "had followed Clark County's stated procedures, she could have discovered evidence of abuse and violations, and removed (the boys) from this foster home before they could be subjected to continued abuse and neglect." Any financial compensation from the case would be placed in a blocked account, and the children wouldn't have access to the money until they turn 18, said Hauf, who has been involved in other Family Services' litigation. Contact Yesenia Amaro at yamaro@reviewjournal.com or 702-383-0440. Find her on Twitter: @YeseniaAmaro. Source: <http://www.reviewjournal.com/news/las-vegas/clark-county-sued-mother-whose-children-suffered-harm-foster-care>

Private foster care troubles in California lead to new scrutiny Foster agency troubles Irfan Khan / Los Angeles Times One agency was found to have disputed spending of $50,000 in 2009, part of which went to lease this Hesperia house from the agency's executive director for more than $1,000 over the market rate. One agency was found to have disputed spending of $50,000 in 2009, part of which went to lease this Hesperia house from the agency's executive director for more than $1,000 over the market rate. (Irfan Khan / Los Angeles Times) Garrett Therolf contact the reporter CrimeAccounting and AuditingCompensation and BenefitsSocial IssuesPrivatization Private foster agency was cited for sexual and physical abuses, substandard housing and spending violations Of $11 million in bad expenditures at foster care charities from 2000-2010, about a tenth has been recovered County auditors looking into one of Los Angeles' biggest foster care agencies in 2003 uncovered $445,000 in ineligible or unsupported spending. Auditors found $234,000 in wages with no supporting documents to verify the hours worked, up to $29,000 in unsupported vehicle expenses and $47,000 that the agency paid to purchase one building and lease another from its top executives, according to the audit report. The county Department of Children and Family Services demanded that the private agency, Homes of Hope, return $440,000. Five years later, the county agreed to settle the matter for $36,000, to be paid in installments without interest. Homes of Hope is still paying off the debt today — at $600 per month. I can't explain it. I would have asked for more information before making the decision to give up on all that money. — Philip Browning, director of Children and Family Services, on the agreement to settle a dispute over $440,000 with Homes of Hope for $36,000 "I can't explain it," said Philip Browning, who took over as director of Children and Family Services two years ago. "I would have asked for more information before making the decision to give up on all that money." Homes of Hope is emblematic of the decades-long failure to adequately monitor California's $400-million-a-year private foster care industry. The agency, which receives about $3.6 million a year to care for neglected children, has become the focus of a renewed government effort to impose stricter controls on private groups that recruit and supervise foster families. Sukhwinder "Suki" Singh, the agency's founder and executive director, said in a brief interview: "We work very, very hard to provide care and supervision to our children." She declined to comment further. California began an experiment nearly 27 years ago that took a portion of foster care away from county bureaucrats and placed it in the hands of private agencies that legislators believed would be cheaper, more efficient and better for children who found their way into the system. Related Local L.A. County supervisors vote to hire 'child protection czar' See all related 8 In Los Angeles County, the 46 foster family charities typically undergo financial audits once a decade. Of more than $11 million in inappropriate expenditures identified by auditors at foster care charities from 2000 to 2010, only about one-tenth has been recovered, county records show. And no effort has been made to get back millions more potentially owed the state, according to other county records and interviews. "We have not done nearly as well as we need to be doing," Browning said. Auditors found that one agency, Teens Happy Homes in Los Angeles, spent liberally on cigarettes and beer — 30 cases in one instance. At another Los Angeles County contractor, America Care, taxpayer dollars were spent on alcohol, clothing from Nordstrom, tobacco, jewelry boxes, fine china, perfume and a martini set, according to county auditors. Related story: Private foster care system, intended to save children, endangers some Garrett Therolf Those living in private agencies; homes are a third more likely to endure physical, emotional or sexual abuse, a Times analysis found, div.clear { clear:both; } .trb_article_page_right { float:right; margin: 0px; } .full-image img { width:100%; } #bannerbox p.date { margin:auto; font-size:... Those living in private agencies; homes are a third more likely to endure physical, emotional or sexual abuse, a Times analysis found, div.clear { clear:both; } .trb_article_page_right { float:right; margin: 0px; } .full-image img { width:100%; } #bannerbox p.date { margin:auto; font-size:... \(Garrett Therolf \) The two agencies, which are no longer caring for foster children, later reimbursed the county for some of the expenses but never reached an agreement on all the expenses flagged by auditors. Salaries at some charities are high as well. ChildNet Youth & Family Services' former Chief Executive Robert Di Stefano, for example, received a compensation package worth $522,000 in 2010, according to the agency's tax returns. The agency said in a statement that a compensation survey had been used to ensure Di Stefano's compensation was at "market level" and sufficient to attract "the highest-quality executive talent." :: Singh, of Homes of Hope, opened her first foster care agency in 1994 — then another and another. By 2009, Singh was working full time as chief executive of Homes of Hope in West Covina and Interim Care in Rancho Cucamonga. She also worked a third full-time job that year as board president of Specialized Care in Rancho Cucamonga, according to the agencies' tax returns. cComments CPSdocumentary (facebook and youtube) has been covering LA's privatization of CPS and the huge increases the numbers of children taken to keep the profit margins and money flowing. When you create an industry built around profits for 'the more you take, the more you make' the more children will... LAsylum at 4:16 PM June 22, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 35 Between 2008 and 2011, 2,300 children lived in foster homes supervised by the agencies, according to state records. In their federal tax returns for 2009, the agencies reported that Singh worked a total of 120 hours a week at the three nonprofit corporations, receiving $311,000 in pay. In 2012 she collected $195,000, working 80 hours a week at two agencies, according to tax returns. She also charged almost $1.8 million in rent from 2007 to 2011 for properties she owned and leased back to her foster care agencies, according to financial statements filed with the state. "On the face of it, this does not appear to be the best use of funds," said Armand Montiel, spokesman for the Department of Children and Family Services. The privatization of foster care poured hundreds of millions of dollars into a system that had been dominated by government-run facilities. The private system now cares for over 80% of foster children placed with strangers in Los Angeles County. Related story: Jada's case highlights problems in foster care system Jada bears the scars of being scalded by a woman who is serving 15 years in prison for her abuse and got a waiver as a foster mother despite several convictions and abuse complaints. Jada bears the scars of being scalded by a woman who is serving 15 years in prison for her abuse and got a waiver as a foster mother despite several convictions and abuse complaints. Read the story The state pays the private agencies about $2,000 per child each month. As much as 60% of that money can be retained by the agency to pay for rent, supplies and salaries for administrators and social workers, who make weekly visits to foster homes to ensure children are properly cared for. The more children the charities place in homes, the more income. Monitoring the finances of the 46 private foster care agencies in Los Angeles County is the responsibility of the auditor controller. Five staff members are assigned to the task. Robert Fellmeth, director of the Children's Advocacy Institute at the University of San Diego School of Law, said: "When there are incentives to gather large numbers of foster homes without contributing very much to the kids' care, you need to check properly. Are they doing it? No." :: Questions about Homes of Hope's finances date to a county audit of the group's 2000-2001 expenditures. Auditors identified $445,000 in unsupported spending, including a $28,750 full-time salary paid to a relative of Singh's who was employed elsewhere. The agency's lawyer told auditors that the relative worked nights and weekends at Homes of Hope. In a rebuttal letter, Homes of Hope also said the supporting records for his hours and those of other employees were destroyed in an accidental fire. The agency declined the county's request to provide signed declarations with the employees' names, titles and typical hours. Auditors also learned that Singh and her then-husband were landlords at three Homes of Hope locations. At one, the charity was charged for more space than it was using, resulting in more than $14,000 in unallowable payments, the auditors concluded. Homes of Hope also failed to obtain required county approval in 2001 when it purchased residential property for $238,000 from Singh and her husband for a group home, the auditors reported. Singh had purchased the property in 1997 for $135,000. In her rebuttal letter, Singh said she was unaware that prior approval was required, and she argued that the purchase price reflected the fair market value. In 2003, auditors forwarded their findings to the Department of Children and Family Services, recommending that it get the money back. After initial letters were sent to Homes of Hope, four years passed without any written communication, according to county files. In 2009, six years after the audit, new fiscal workers took charge of the case and the county dropped its claims in return for a $36,000 settlement without obtaining the requested documentation to support the expenditures detailed by auditors. Related story: Tennessee uses incentives to change a troubled foster care system Garrett Therolf Tennessee instituted large monetary rewards and severe financial penalties to spur reforms among care providers. Tennessee instituted large monetary rewards and severe financial penalties to spur reforms among care providers. \(Garrett Therolf \) "From everything I've seen, I don't believe we handled this very well," Browning said. Amid Homes of Hope's financial troubles, state and county officials cited the agency for varied deficiencies. State regulators found that an adult male had been convicted of sexually abusing a foster child in her foster home. They also said that a foster father made sexual advances to with a foster child and had been certified despite similar allegations at another agency. In recent years, some of its foster homes lacked hot water, according to state licensing records. Others had no food in the refrigerator and cabinets. One had a bathroom with a crumbling tub and a sink with no faucet handles, according to state records of substantiated licensing violations. In 2008, a baby living with a Homes of Hope foster mother was taken to the hospital and was placed on life support. Doctors believed the baby suffered from shaken baby syndrome, and the foster mother was later banned from foster care for life for the "nonaccidental injury," according to state licensing records and county correspondence. Related Local L.A. County supervisors vote to hire 'child protection czar' See all related 8 Homes of Hope was cited for poor screening that allowed the woman to become the foster parent of five children under the age of 5 when she was already running a day-care center. In a written response, Singh said her social worker had properly monitored the home and the incident was unforeseen. State auditors also examined the 2009 finances of San Bernardino County-based Interim Care, where Singh also served as executive director, and found weak fiscal controls and $50,000 in spending that was disallowed. The disputed expenditures included $21,912 in lease payments to Singh above the appraised fair market value for two properties, the state auditors found. One — a house with a dirt yard in Hesperia — cost Interim Care $2,400 per month. The state determined that the fair market rental was $1,036. :: In Los Angeles County, Singh's case has sparked efforts to improve financial oversight of foster care agencies. Officials are working with state regulators to rewrite the rules on real estate transactions to ensure that contractors do not pay more than market value. Comments CPSdocumentary (facebook and youtube) has been covering LA's privatization of CPS and the huge increases the numbers of children taken to keep the profit margins and money flowing. When you create an industry built around profits for 'the more you take, the more you make' the more children will... LAsylum at 4:16 PM June 22, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 35 The officials said that new real estate contracts would have to be approved in advance, and existing contracts for inappropriately high levels of rent will be renegotiated. Despite the focus on Homes of Hope, the county continues to fund Singh's group and send children there. Officials say they can't afford to drop the agency because of the overload of foster children, whose numbers are increasing for the first time since the 1990s. "We just don't have enough homes," Browning said. garrett.therolf@latimes.com Times data editor Doug Smith contributed to this report. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/countygovernment/la-me-foster-financial-20140621-story.html#page=2>

Calif. Governor Signs off on Kinship Equity, Support for Exploitation Victims By Victor Valle, June 20, 2014 Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY
Photo Credit: Courtesy of 401KCalculator Note: This story was updated on June 20 Calif. Gov. Jerry Brown has signed a budget that includes new funding for kinship foster caregivers and more assistance to victims of commercial sexual exploitation (CSEC). The Relative Caregiver Funding Option Program brings $30 million dollars in funding to a county-option program that will make payments to kinship caregivers commensurate with payments made to other foster parents. Kinship caregivers in counties that opt in will see their monthly support from the state rise from a $370 welfare benefit to more than $800. Counties must decide on participation by October, and the program begins in January 2015. The state will fully pay for the increase for existing kinship caregivers, and counties will have to share the cost of new caregivers. If the $30 million proves not to be enough, then the amount will be increased appropriately, according to Reed Connell, who has been working with the Alliance for Children's Rights on this issue. "The legislature will provide enough money to cover if all counties opt in to the program," Connell said. "We're really focused on making sure we urge counties to opt in when the time comes." The other proposal that survived, which is focused on commercially exploited children, will cost $5 million in funding for 2014-2015, and $14 million for 2015-2016. The proposal will help fund training for child welfare workers in prevention, intervention skills to work with child victims of commercial sexual exploitation, as well as provide services that would directly meet immediate needs and care for the victims. Counties must opt in to this program as well. If counties opt in to these programs, they will commence on January 1, 2015. Four other child welfare-related proposals did not make the final package sent to the governor: A pilot program to improve permanency outcomes for foster youth Increased funding for child welfare courts, as The Chronicle reported on earlier this week A pay raise for social workers who work at Foster Family Agencies An initiative focused on foster and kinship care recruitment, retention and support "I'm deeply disappointed that the youth languishing in foster care were denied the right to permanent families," said Gail Johnson-Vaughan, executive director at Mission Focused Solutions, who led the push for the permanency pilot project. "The loss was to them and to the fiscal bottom line of the counties and state." Victor Valle is a reporter at the Chronicle of Social Change. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/news/funding-for-kinship-equity-support-for-exploitation-victims-makes-way-to-governor/7241>

Pine Bluff Foster Father Accused of Raping A Teen Boy Melissa Schroeder 7/06/2014 10:20 PM 06/20/2014 10:22 PM Jefferson County Sheriff's Department investigating a rape case. PINE BLUFF, AR -- A man who surrounded himself with children is now being accused of raping one. Jefferson County Sheriff's investigators say a foster father -- who also works with Pine Bluff Schools -- is behind bars tonight. 52-year-old Samuel Evans appeared in court today and a judge set his bond at $25,000. According to the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, Evans is still sitting in a jail cell as they continue to sort out what led up to this crime. Major Lafayette Woods said, "We actually investigate these things very seriously." Major Woods says Evans raped a teen boy last week. His mother called State Police after it happened and deputies arrested Evans on Thursday. Woods said, "So, when you're seeing things like this, it's very heartbreaking." Major Woods says Evans was a foster parent and he also worked -- in the Transportation Department -- at Pine Bluff City School District for 18 years. Woods said, "And their job is to provide those essential elements to a child, not to abuse them in any physical or mental way." While the Department of Human Services couldn't comment on the case, Director of Communications Amy Webb explained the process of becoming a foster parent, calling it rigorous. Webb said, "So we want to make sure people who are foster parents are capable of taking care of children and providing them everything they need." After a foster parent application is filled out, there are state and federal criminal background checks. Then, there's 30 hours of training, also interviews and home checks. It's a process that could take six months or longer, unfortunately it's not always enough. Webb said, "When that happens we want to make sure we respond swiftly and make sure no other kids get into that home." Major Woods says it's possible there are other victims out there. According to the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department they're waiting on DNA evidence as they continue the investigation. There's no word on when Evans' next court appearance will be. If you would like to follow Melissa Schroeder's reports on Facebook, you can click here and like her page. Source: http://www.arkansasmatters.com/story/d/story/pine-bluff-foster-father-accused-of-rape-a-teen/19385/-bHY0FUZukatsMJH_o57MA

H.R.4016 — 113th Congress (2013-2014): Introduced in House by Rep. Rosa L. DeLauro (D-CT-3rd) (02/06/2014) Quality Foster Care Services Act of 2014 - Amends title XIX (Medicaid) of the Social Security Act (SSA) to extend medical assistance coverage to therapeutic foster care services. Requires a qualified therapeutic foster care program to be state-licensed and provide: (1) foster care children under 21 with structured daily activities, including the development of age-appropriate social, communication and behavioral skills, trauma-informed and gender-responsive services, crisis intervention and crisis support services, medication monitoring, counseling, and case management; and (2) foster care parents with specialized training and consultation in the management of children with mental illness, trauma, other emotional or behavioral disorders, medically fragile conditions, or developmental disabilities, and specific additional training on the needs of each child provided such services. Please ask your legislators to oppose this legislation. It seeks to fund residential treatment and wilderness programs for Foster Kids. S. 1992 (introduced to Senate by Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-WI). To find your legislators, visit <http://votesmart.org/> and enter in your address and/or full zip (9 digits) code and click "search".

Ohio A-G applauds new state legislation Attorney General's information COLUMBUS — Ohio Attorney General Mike DeWine applauded the signing of legislation strengthening background check and human trafficking laws, as well as legislation signed earlier this week updating aspects of Ohio's foster care laws. "I thank Governor Kasich and the legislature for enacting these important laws," said DeWine. "Because of these bills, employers will receive more complete background checks, prosecutors will have more tools to go after underage sex trafficking, and foster youth will have more opportunities for normalcy while in foster care." Governor Kasich this week signed the following bills that DeWine supported and advocated: Senate Bill 143 (sponsored by Sen. Bill Seitz (R-Cincinnati), signed June 20): authorizes the Ohio Bureau of Criminal Investigation (BCI) to disclose in background checks certain arrests that still have criminal proceedings pending. (Effective 90 days from enrollment with Secretary of State) House Bill 130 (sponsored by Rep. Teresa Fedor (D-Toledo), signed June 20): makes multiple changes regarding human trafficking offenses, including removing the need for prosecutors to prove a victim under 16 or with a developmental disability was compelled to engage in commercial sexual activity, and increasing the penalties for soliciting minors or persons with developmental disabilities. (Effective immediately) House Bill 213 (sponsored by Rep. Dorothy Pelanda (R-Marysville) and Rep. Nicholas J. Celebrezze (D-Parma), signed June 17): makes several changes to Ohio's foster care laws, including enhancing the ability of foster youth to participate in extra-curricular activities, and allowing a court to terminate parental rights if the child has been abused or neglected three or more times (effective 90 days from enrollment with Secretary of State). Source: <http://www.thevw-independent.com/news/2014/06/ohio-a-g-applauds-new-state-legislation/>

'Boot-camp style' education on agenda: School board to consider alternative model for students with discipline issues School board to consider alternative model for students with discipline issues Jun. 23, 2014 The Rapides Parish School Board will consider major changes to the way it educates students with major disciplinary issues. Deputy Assistant Superintendent of Administration Clyde Washington presented a plan to the board's Education Committee for a new alternative program called RAPPs — Rapides Alternative Positive Program for Students. RAPPs would be a highly structured program for habitual rules violators or students who commit major infractions. The Education Committee passed the proposal on to the full board for consideration. "I'm excited to learn more about it," said board President Janet Dixon. The proposed location for the program is the J.S. Slocum Learning Center in Pineville. Washington described it as a "boot-camp style" experience for students in grades 6-12 who habitually violate rules at their home school or commit major offenses such as battery or possession of drugs or weapons. Currently, those students are assigned to Aiken Virtual School, with the option of completing their online work at the school campus in Alexandria, at a public library or at home. During the time last school year when the most students were enrolled in the alternative program due to suspension or expulsion, nearly 80 percent of them did not attend school on the Aiken campus. That contradicts what successful alternative programs have done, Washington said, which is provide structure. Under the proposed RAPPs model, attendance will be mandatory. The regimen will be strict. Students will adhere to dress code, will be supervised at all times and will participate in physical training unless medically cleared to miss it. Students can exit the program by complying with all rules and showing progress in subjects taken. The program would have a staff of 18 people. Transportation would be through the City of Alexandria's transit system or the school district, at an estimated cost of $80,000-90,000 to the district. Education Committee chair Darrell Rodriguez noted that response from local law enforcement and other support agencies to the RAPPs model has been positive. "We have support from all the agencies in the parish for us to work on this," he said. Source: http://www.thetowntalk.com/article/20140623/NEWS01/306230008/-Boot-camp-style-education-agenda-School-board-consider-alternative-model-students-discipline-issues?nclink_check=1

Will Anyone Stop Charter School Corruption? When politicians and pundits take to the barricades to defend "wonderful charter schools," is this what they're thinking of? A recent article in a Minnesota newspaper reported about a change in state law that could imperil the existence of a charter school that serves a student body sorely in need of heroic efforts. According to the reporter, "Nine out of 10 of the school's 275 high schoolers meet the legal definition of 'highly mobile,' meaning they do not have stable housing; 109 are flat-out homeless. Some couch-surf. Some sleep in cars, some in bus stations. Often they spend the night in small groups, for safety. Poverty — a given — is usually the least of their worries. To teens forced to support themselves, a diploma is a life raft." The schools founder and chief operator is quoted: "We have kids who are one credit away from graduating ... We are one of the first consistent things in their lives." A compelling story for sure and likely one example, among others, that was in the minds of most in Congress when the US House of Representatives recently passed controversial legislation to expand federal funds for more charter schools without placing any substantial new regulations on those schools. What lawmakers in Washington, DC had been told, of course, was that starting up lots and lots of charter schools was going to create a "marketplace of education," where the problem of "quality" would take care of itself as "bad" charters "go out of business," and the wonderful ones that do such great things for the most unfortunate children get picked up and replicated all over the world. For sure, there were those on "the outside" who advocated against expanding charter schools without taking into account steps toward stricter regulation. As The Nation's Zoe Carpenter pointed out, the bill's emergence in the House coincided with publication of a report by the Center for Popular Democracy and Integrity in Education that documented "shocking misuses of the federal funds being funneled into the poorly regulated charter industry." Nevertheless the charter sector won the Hill that day and has continued to ascend in state capitals around the country since. Meanwhile, real evidence of "the good charters" remains mostly anecdotal, as financial corruption and poor education results from "bad ones" continue to mount with every passing month. Just look at Ohio. Buckeye State Boondoggle The Buckeye State, where charter schools have operated for well over a decade, has had loose regulations, business-minded state governance, and a Beltway-based conservative think tank serving as a charter sponsor. According to a recent report in the Akron Beacon, "Enrollment in Ohio charter schools now stands at more than 120,000 in nearly 400 schools, with seven more schools expected to open next year. These quasi-public schools enroll less than 7 percent of Ohio's students and receive $912 million in state tax dollars, about 11 percent of all state funds set aside for primary and secondary education." According to charter school enthusiasts at the Center for Education Reform, Ohio is a "Top Ten" state — number 3, in fact — on its rating scale for states that provide "parent power" — something that is, apparently, in abundance when lots of charter and virtual schools and just about anything else but good traditional public schools are prevalent. (Vermont, one of the top performing school systems in the country, based on the National Assessment of Education Progress, is number 47 in "parent power.") Contributing significantly to Ohio's top rating no doubt is the state's citation for "providing even more growth" in the charter school sector. But nowhere on the CER site is there a hint of how all this choice and growth have actually benefited Ohio students and taxpayers. For that information, you have to turn to the progressive state group Innovation Ohio who earlier this year found that, in the 2011-2012 school year, the state's enthusiastic support of charter schools had resulted in a transference of $774 million from the public school system to charter schools that tend to perform worse on the state's school performance rating system. Since that report, very little to any improvements seem to have occurred. As a recent series of reports appearing in the Akron Beacon revealed, one of the states' most popular charter school chains, run by White Hat Management, has enjoyed such carte blanche operation that Ohio lawmakers approved additional funding for about 77 of those schools and exempted them from "full accountability until at least 2017." The legislation passed despite the fact that dropouts are so prevalent at these schools that many of them report "single-digit graduation rates." The Beacon reporter found that during last school year, more students dropped out of these schools than attended on the average day. Another Ohio newspaper, the Cleveland Plain Dealer, carried a recent editorial explaining that the primary beneficiary of the loophole legislation favoring White Hat run charter schools is not the state's students nor its taxpayers but the charter school operator, Akron businessman David Brennan who "has poured more than $4 million into the coffers of Republican candidates in Ohio during the last decade." In the face of lagging academic results, higher dropout rates, and the aroma of crony corruption, what do Ohio charter promoters do to improve their performance? Amp up their marketing. As another recent Beacon report found, "State audits suggest that some Ohio charter schools spend more than $400 in public money per student to attract them away from public schools." Using keywords such as "free, flexible, one-on-one and find your future," Ohio charter school companies are "advertising on television, radio, billboards, handbills and even automated telephone messages to entice students away from public schools." You have to wonder if this is how the taxpayers in Ohio like to see their hard earned money spent. In the meantime, one state over in Pennsylvania, the situation with charter schools doesn't look any better. Quaker State Cash Cow In the Quaker State, charter schools have long competed for funds with traditional public schools on an uneven playing field that exempts them from serving the full range of student abilities and revealing financial details of their operations to the public. Despite all this freedom from regulation, according to the Pennsylvania School Board Association, "Charter schools continue to academically underperform traditional public schools, with less than half of the brick and mortar charter schools meeting acceptable benchmark scores ... None of the cyber charter schools met the mark. Nearly three-quarters of traditional public schools, however, earned passing scores in the first year of the new measuring system." Despite poor academic results, Pennsylvania scores a 12 on the reform index contrived by CER. But what CER calls "parent power" in Pennsylvania is actually "no real oversight" according to the Keystone State Coalition, a "non-partisan public education advocacy group of several hundred locally elected, volunteer school board members and administrators from school districts throughout Pennsylvania." That organization's recent report tallied exorbitant costs associated with charter school operations and lavish CEO salaries and bonuses for charter school operators despite vastly underperforming the state's traditional public schools. A more recent KSC report revealed how Pennsylvania charters have gamed the system for special education funding, resulting in annual profits of $200 million to the schools. As one local Pennsylvania blogger explained, "Charter schools collected $350,562,878 last year for special education funding and spent $156,003,034 for special education! Where did the other $200 million go? The fact of the matter is that charter schools are not obligated to spend special education funding for special education purposes. That money can be spent for numerous miscellaneous reasons." (emphasis original) A KSC video that education historian Diane Ravitch linked to on her blog explained how Pennsylvania charters also game the special education financial process by luring away students from public schools who are classified special education in the least expensive disability categories, which would include relatively mild disabilities such as speech impairment, and neglect to educate students in more expensive disability categories that would include more severe disabilities such as autism. This is especially devastating to school districts such as Philadelphia where budgets are in perennial crisis. As the local news outlet The Notebook reported, "Philadelphia charter schools received more than $175 million last year to educate special education students, but spent only about $77 million for that purpose

... nearly $100 million gap at a time when city education leaders are considering raising some class sizes to 41 students and laying off 800 more teachers.” To fix a funding system that rewards charter schools for services they do not provide, Pennsylvania lawmakers from both parties introduced a bill (HB 2138 and SB 1316) to fund each district based on the actual number of students with disabilities it has and on each child’s needs. Charter advocates responded to this proposed legislation by opposing it. As bad as the situation is with charter schools in Ohio and Pennsylvania, it may be even worse in Michigan. The Great Lakes Robbery In the Great Lakes State, a series by the Detroit Free Press this month reported, “Michigan taxpayers pour nearly $1 billion a year into charter schools – but state laws regulating charters are among the nation’s weakest, and the state demands little accountability in how taxpayer dollars are spent and how well children are educated.” The yearlong investigation found, “Wasteful spending and double-dipping. Board members, school founders and employees steering lucrative deals to themselves or insiders. Schools allowed to operate for years despite poor academic records. No state standards for who operates charter schools or how to oversee them.” Meanwhile, “38 percent of charter schools that received state academic rankings during the 2012-13 school year fell below the 25th percentile, meaning at least 75 percent of all schools in the state performed better. Only 23 percent of traditional public schools fell below the 25th percentile.” For-profit corporations are permitted to run 61 percent of charter schools in Michigan even though over a third of those schools are in the bottom 25 percentile for academic performance. The variety of scams at work in the Michigan charter sector make your head spin. In one example, a real estate/investment firm bought property for $375,000 that it sold six days later to a charter school, for $425,000. The quick $50,000 profit went to founders of the firm – one the president of school’s management company, the other married to the school’s top administrator. At another charter school, members of the founder’s family were paid to provide meals and maintenance to the school,” and “family members still rent the building to the school or collect a management fee for running it.” How does the charter industry respond to such damning evidence of failure and corruption? With a marketing campaign of course. As the local Michigan blog Eclectablog noted, just as the Detroit Free Press series was unfolding, the state’s largest for-profit charter chain National Heritage Academies sprung into action and proceeded to purchase nearly all of the available ad space on the newspaper’s website. And by the way, the “parent power” ranking CER gives Michigan is 11, commending the state for its “robust charter law.” The unchecked charter school chicanery is not limited to the Northern Mid West. Sunshine State Scam A new investigation by the Orlando Sun Sentinel found, “Unchecked charter-school operators are exploiting South Florida’s public school system, collecting taxpayer dollars for schools that quickly shut down ... virtually anyone can open or run a charter school and spend public education money with near impunity.” Examples cited in the series include a man who received $450,000 in tax dollars to open two new charter schools just months after his first collapsed. The schools closed in seven weeks. Another example: A man with “a history of foreclosures, court-ordered payments, and bankruptcy received $100,000 to start a charter school.” It closed in two months. Sun Sentinel reporters found an elementary charter school that “sometimes had no toilet paper, soap or paper towels in the student bathrooms ... Students sometimes ate hours after their designated lunchtimes, often from fast-food restaurants.” School districts have little to no recourse when charters fail to submit financial reports – “some don’t file them or turn in unreliable paperwork.” And management companies that run two-thirds of South Florida’s charter schools add to the problems of transparency and financial disclosure. Despite these problems, charter schools continue to “pop up within blocks of each other – or in the same building – offering similar programs as neighboring schools. With such wild growth, district officials say, many new charters no longer fill a niche or offer innovation. Yet Florida lawmakers repeatedly have declined to tighten charter-school regulations.” Florida’s score in the CER ranking: 2. Someone Please Say, “Stop!” Despite this cavalcade of corruption – most of which has been published in just the past two months, mind you – must we now pay homage to the “wonderful” charter schools? Take that charter program for homeless children cited above. Do we demand more of those schools to be replicated? Do we ask whether we need an outside, unregulated vendor to reveal the unsurprising conclusion that it’s important to pay attention to the special needs of children? Do we ask why these children aren’t being accommodated in local schools and take the necessary steps to ensure they are? Or do we ask, why the hell do we have record numbers of homeless school children in this country to begin with? Good questions for sure. Yet in the meantime, at the urging of charter school advocates and others promoting “school choice,” lawmakers around the country are proposing and enacting new policies to feed more children into an increasingly corrupt charter chain pipeline. And in Washington, DC, that house legislation that would expand federal funding to these sorts of schools has been joined by a Senate version that is now steaming toward bipartisan consideration. Certainly, faced with such a growing calamity, it’s not being “negative” or “oppositional” or a “status quo defender” to stand in the pathway and yell, “Stop!” Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/will-anyone-stop-charter-school-corruption/>

‘Scream Rooms’ in Schools Are Being Taken to a Frightening New Level You won’t believe the tactic some educators are using to address misbehavior despite multiple student injuries and deaths. June 19, 2014 By Holly Eagleson Regular TakePart contributor Holly Eagleson writes about social issues, culture, lifestyle, and food for Redbook, Marie Claire, Glamour, and others. full bio Remember when acting out in school got you time with the principal or detention? Those are dream scenarios compared with the handcuffs, pepper spray, Tasers, and isolation rooms that unruly kids in Washington state could face for breaking school rules. Washington’s Bellevue School District recently came under fire for a policy that intended to sanction the use of isolation rooms—cell-like spaces that students are confined to involuntarily—for spontaneous misbehavior. The disciplinary policy was at odds with state guidelines, which only allow the use of seclusion when students are in imminent danger of physically harming themselves or others. Parents were further distressed by the vague language in the district’s policy that would OK the use of restraints such as handcuffs and deterrents such as Tasers and pepper spray. Local TV affiliate Q13Fox reported that one parent told the school board, “Putting in language like this will only give permission to some staff members to just do what’s convenient and not right.” Bellevue School Board President Steve McConnell responded by telling Yahoo Shine, “No teachers in our school district use Tasers or chemical sprays on special needs students.” Op-Ed: Schools Must Stop Ostracizing Kids With Special Needs The dustup renewed a fierce debate over the use of seclusion time-outs and restraints in public and private schools. In recent years, they’ve stoked outrage among parents, educators, and legislators owing to multiple resulting injuries and deaths. Still, their prevalence is shockingly widespread. According to a report from the U.S. Department of Education for Civil Rights, more than 110,000 students experienced restraint or seclusion from 2011 to 2012. With seclusion practices, children are routinely locked in padded isolation rooms for hours without bathroom breaks or monitoring. Given the nickname that sounds right at home in an Eli Roth film, it’s no wonder these so-called scream rooms have been host to their fair share of tragic incidents. In 2004, 13-year-old Jonathan King hanged himself in a concrete isolation room in his Georgia school using a cord he’d been given as a belt. It was not his first time in the “time-out” space; he had repeatedly asked not to be confined there and had threatened suicide to teachers weeks earlier. Restraint practices aren’t any less appalling. A 2012 ABC News investigation reported students being sat on by school employees, held down in a prone position, and stuffed into drawstring “sensory bags”—essentially glorified duffel bags. Many special education experts say these practices are especially deleterious to students with autism and disabilities who may require special monitoring and have underlying health issues. A 15-year-old Michigan teenager with autism who was pinned down for more than an hour by school employees became the second child in his state to die from restraint techniques, according to the National Disability Rights Network. In another horrifying incident, a seven-year-old girl diagnosed with emotional problems and ADHD was suffocated to death after being restrained by multiple staffers at a mental health day treatment facility. Her crime? Blowing bubbles in her milk during a time-out. The barbarism of seclusion and restraint policies isn’t the only cause for concern. There’s also a high probability that these practices will be used for the wrong reasons. A 2007 study published in the Journal of At-Risk Issues found that seclusion of at-risk students was initiated more frequently for nonviolent behaviors (leaving an assigned area or disrupting class) than for the intended purpose of curbing physical aggression. Despite the myriad issues with physical restraint and unsupervised seclusion, no research has found any therapeutic and educational benefit to either one. “It’s shown no efficacy in reducing maladaptive behavior, and it’s a crisis-based intervention only,” said Joseph B. Ryan, professor in the School of Education at Clemson University. Even in a crisis, employing restraints and seclusion are bad moves. “You’re aggravating a student that you’re trying to pacify, so it violates a lot of the evidence-based procedures on how you should respond to a child,” Ryan said. “And if you use it as a disciplinary method it can actually escalate aggression.” The U.S. Department of Education has set guidelines restricting the use of these methods in classrooms to instances when students are in imminent physical danger. Even with DOE oversight, no federal law is on the books to enforce the rules. Only 30 states have any laws on the practices, and 18 states require parental notification of their use. A report by the office of Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, found that existing laws and regulations impede families’ ability to bring cases to court. Rather, they force families to remove children from school to stop the practices of restraint or seclusion. This year Harkin proposed the Keeping All Students Safe Act, which would outlaw dangerous seclusion and restraint practices and limit restraints to emergency situations. It would also require extensive training of school employees and parental notification within 24 hours of the use of restraints or seclusion. For what it’s worth, McConnell, the Bellevue School Board president, told Yahoo Shine that parents of students who are placed in an isolation room receive verbal notification within 24 hours and a written account within five days. After a June 24 congressional briefing on restraint and seclusion in schools, the Bellevue School Board will do its own deliberating on July 1. That's when it'll conduct a hearing to pass a revised version of its seclusion and restraint policy that contains protections against inappropriate isolation and restraint of students and bans their use as forms of discipline or punishment. Source:

<http://www.takepart.com/article/2014/06/19/scream-rooms-schools-are-being-taken-frightening-new-level?cmpid=tpedu-eml-2014-06-27-screamrooms>

The Dr. Peter Breggin Hour

The Dr. Peter Breggin Hour

PodBean

The Dark, Deadly Side of China's Internet Addiction Camps Jun 24, 2014, 4:37 PM ET By RHEANA MURRAY Rheana Murray Teenagers assemble at the Internet Addiction Treatment Centre in the southeastern suburb of Daxing, near Beijing, China on March 1, 2007. AFP/Getty Images Chinese teens glued to their smartphones and video games have been treated in military-style boot camps since the country made Internet addiction an official disorder in 2008. But the strict camps haven't been entirely successful, according to experts who question controversial tactics like strenuous physical activity, and sometimes, abuse. Several young people have reportedly died at the camps, according to state-sanctioned media in China. Hospital First in US to Treat Internet Addiction Chinese Teen Dies at Internet Addiction Rehab Camp Teen Internet Addicts More Likely to Self-Harm: Study This week, supervisors at a camp in China's Henan province reportedly beat a 19-year-old girl to death when she failed to ask permission to use the bathroom, The Beijing News reported. Other reported deaths at Internet addiction camps across the country include a 14-year-old boy struck with a baton and pipe for being unable to do push-ups, according to the Los Angeles Times, and a 15-year-old beaten less than a day after arriving at camp. Some American experts don't think the answer to treating Internet addiction lies in boot camps. "For a treatment to work, it needs to last," Jenny Taitz, a clinical psychologist at the American Institute for Cognitive Therapy in New York, told ABC News. "And the very nature of a camp is that you can only stay there temporarily." AFP/Getty Images PHOTO: Teenagers make their way into the Internet Addiction Treatment Centre in the southeastern suburb of Daxing, near Beijing, China on March 1, 2007. For an addict to change, motivation has to come from within, Taitz added. "At a camp, people are telling you what to do. A more humanistic approach is much more likely to lead to long-standing change," she said. Taitz teaches Internet addicts mindfulness, meditation and emotion regulation tools to control their urges to reach for their smartphones or tablets. "I'm a clinician who bases my entire practice on evidence-based treatment, and I've never heard of a boot camp treatment in my scouring of evidence-based research," Taitz said. Internet addiction camps have been known to use forced physical activity and controversial tactics like electroshock therapy, which China's Ministry of Health banned in 2009. China has an estimated 24 million Internet addicts, China Daily reported. Source: <http://abcnews.go.com/Lifestyle/dark-deadly-side-chinas-internet-addiction-camps/story?id=24282781> (HEAL Comment: <http://youtu.be/vgeczZy6IDQ> (Meaning it happens here too.))

Report finds abuse at group home where disabled man found bruised, paralyzed Posted: Jun 23, 2014 3:23 PM PDT Updated: Jun 23, 2014 4:04 PM PDT (FOX25 / MyFoxBoston) Kevin Rothstein, Producer - email Mike Beaudet Producer Kevin Rothstein BOSTON (MyFoxBoston.com)--The family of a disabled man found bruised and paralyzed on the bedroom floor of his group home is still fighting for answers after a new investigation found suspicious behavior from a worker at the home but still doesn't say how he came to be so badly hurt. The family of Paul Stanizzi, who has never been able to talk, believes he was abused at the group home in Bedford but the Middlesex District Attorney's office declined to press charges, saying no criminal acts could be proven. But newly-released Disabled Persons Protection Commission investigative report fuels the family's suspicion by substantiating that abuse occurred but still leaving unanswered the question of how he got his injuries. The report was finished in March but first obtained by the advocacy group COFAR – the Massachusetts Coalition of Families and Advocates. "Some of the findings of the report are very, very concerning," said attorney Ben Novotny, who represents the Stanizzi family. "The bruising all over the face, on the arms, the legs, the footprint on the back of the legs are probably most concerning piece of evidence that's come to light." In addition to detailing the injuries, the DPPC report substantiated abuse in so far as the sole group home worker on duty admitted that he found Stanizzi apparently paralyzed on the floor but moved him to his bed anyway, and then waited approximately 25 minutes before calling 911. Once at the hospital, an MRI found damage to the vertebrae around Paul's neck. While the report does not say how Stanizzi was injured, it's clear the overnight worker was suspected. He couldn't explain how he had gotten a fresh scratch on his face, a statement that a Bedford police detective found "suspicious". The worker admitted making several false statements to investigators, for example saying Stanizzi may have gotten a black eye because he sometimes hits himself in the face. He later admitted Stanizzi doesn't hit himself in the face. The worker denied assaulting Paul, but investigators were skeptical. "The truthfulness of (the alleged abuser's) denial is called into question by the false statements he provided during this investigation", the report says. A spokesperson for the Edinburg Center, which runs the group home where the incident occurred, said in a statement, "The Edinburg Center cannot comment given pending legal action but we stand behind the quality care we provide for all of our clients." While the criminal investigation is over, the family's investigation is far from it – and they hope the DA will at some point consider re-opening the case. "Obviously we and the family are disappointed by the fact that no criminal charges have issued. At the same time that's not going to change, inhibit or redirect anything that we are doing," said Novotny. Source: <http://www.myfoxboston.com/story/25849828/report-finds-abuse-at-group-home-where-disabled-man-found-bruised-paralyzed> (HEAL Note: Institutional abuse affects people of all ages.)

Longmeadow Residents Concerned Over Possible Group Home Placement June 23rd, 2014 LONGMEADOW, Mass. (WGGB) – There were several concerns in Longmeadow at the Select Board meeting Monday night as the discussion of a group home being placed in a residential area picked up again. The property, on 222 Redfern Drive, would be home to four people who suffered brain damage, along with staff members coming and going to help them with their needs. The home is being rented by a company called "Servicenet" and that company has yet to submit and paperwork stating the actual intentions of the property. Some residents are concerned about the affects it will have on the neighborhood. "The concern is that it will, number one, place a commercial entity into a one-family residential zone. It will change the overall aesthetics of the building, it will increase parking, traffic and we're not sure that the use is the proper use, again, a commercial entity going into a residential zone of single family zoned homes," said Athene Zaleski, who lives nearby the home. The Select Board has directed the Town Council to look at new information regarding the intended use of the property and come back with a recommendation on whether Servicenet will be issued a certificate of occupancy for that home. They intend to have a special meeting next week to discuss the issue. Source: <http://www.wggb.com/2014/06/23/longmeadow-residents-concerned-over-possible-group-home-placement/>

Iowa Organization Wants to Establish Group Home, Near Beatrice Published Tuesday, June 24, 2014 11:59 am by Doug Kennedy, KWBE An Iowa faith-based organization that operates alcohol and drug abuse group homes, says it wants to forge ahead with establishing a group home for a dozen women in the former Carriage House Bed and Breakfast, a mile east of Beatrice. To do so, Teen Challenge of the Midlands will have to go through a lengthy process of amending Beatrice City zoning rules, which currently don't allow such homes in areas zoned for agriculture. :18 "to drug treatment" Pastor Warren Hunsberger is one of the leaders of Teen Challenge of the Midlands, which acquired the former bed and breakfast and has had two female employees living at the home, establishing relations in the community. Group home participants would stay voluntarily and are free to leave the program. The project did not receive an endorsement before a Beatrice City Council work session, Monday night. Councilman Rich Kerr recalls problems the city had with a former group home for youth with developmental and behavioral problems. :39 "the community's mouth" Teen Challenge Board member David Russell, of Urbandale, Iowa.....says the organization acquired the property from the owner at half price....with the remaining value donated. The organization has homes in Colfax, Iowa.... in Omaha...and has acquired a boys ranch near Alliance. The facilities are not required to be licensed by Nebraska Health and Human Services. Hunsberger talks about the Colfax home, acquired in 1986. :32 "that community now" Some neighboring land owners east of Beatrice are concerned about the group home. John Riha says those concerns include security, the potential effect on property values, and availability of water. :29 "any of them" Rhonda Zarybnicky resides south of the proposed group home. :26 "in the future" Mayor Dennis Schuster said a proposed amendment to the zoning ordinance would have to go before the city's planning and zoning commission and the city council. City Attorney Greg Butcher says a series of public hearings would likely be needed to answer all questions from the public and city officials. Source:

<http://www.kwbe.com/news/2014/06/24/kutt-local-news/iowa-organization-wants-to-establish-group-home-near-beatrice/>

House Bill Would Open Eligibility, Restrict Use of Federal Foster Care Dollars By John Kelly, June 24, 2014 Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY
Rep. Jim Langevin (D-R.I.) introduced a bill late last week that would implement a number of the major foster care financing reforms proposed by two influential foundations last year. Chief among them: making all foster youth eligible for federal funding under Title IV-E of the Social Security Act, but limiting federal funds to three years of foster care for each youth. "Too many children live in limbo in foster care, and we need to support a system that prioritizes permanent home placements," said Langevin, in a statement about the bill. The aim of the Permanent Families for All Children Act is to push states into quicker moves to permanency – reunification, adoption or guardianship – for children. This is accomplished through two principal actions: 1) Allowing states to claim reimbursements for all foster youths. Currently, federal reimbursement is only available for youths whose parents earned below income thresholds set in 1996. This, alongside dramatically reduced overall numbers, has led to a decline in the number of IV-E eligible children. While child welfare finance reform remains a hotly debated issue, there is virtually unanimous support for elimination of the current income test. 2) Stopping federal reimbursements for any foster youth after three years in care. Currently, there is no limit to how long IV-E funds can be drawn for a youth. "When abuse or neglect happens, our responsibility is to act quickly and thoughtfully to give kids their best chance to grow up in a loving and supportive permanent home," said First Focus Campaign for Children President Bruce Lesley, whose organization endorsed the bill. "This bill gives states an incentive to do just that and the supports they need to get the job done." Credit: Office of Jim Langevin Rep. Langevin with foster care alumna Victoria Flanagan during the 2014 Foster Youth Shadow day held in May. Langevin's bill would further limit the federal contribution to congregate care for foster youth. States would only receive half as much from the federal government for placements in residential care, and they could only use federal dollars for one year of placement in an institution. The bill would also use some savings from the limitations on foster care spending to sweeten loan forgiveness incentive programs for child welfare workers. Langevin would drop from ten to five the number of years a social worker needed to be on the job to qualify for student loan forgiveness. Most of the concepts espoused in the bill are identical or at least similar to the key parts of a plan published in October by the Annie E. Casey Foundation and the Jim Casey Youth Opportunities Initiative. Langevin's bill was referred to two committees: Ways and Means and Education and the Workforce. It does not yet have a companion in the Senate. States would have three years to comply with the legislation. Click here to read the legislation. John Kelly is the editor-in-chief of The Chronicle of Social Change. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/news/house-bill-would-open-eligibility-restrict-use-of-federal-foster-care-dollars/7284>

St. Jude's worker accused, returned to work before new sex charges Aldrin Antonio West was hired as a child specialist at St. Jude's on Sept. 12, 2011. On April 6, 2012, he was cleared by Family Services to become a house parent at St. Jude's Ranch, according to Kristi Jourdan, Family Services spokeswoman. (Las Vegas Review-Journal) By YESENIA AMARO ©2014 LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL A former employee of a Boulder City foster home faces sexual assault charges after he was investigated and cleared to return to work with minors, the Review-Journal has learned. A criminal complaint against Aldrin Antonio West was filed May 21 at the Boulder City Justice Court. He faces one count of open or gross lewdness over allegations of masturbating in the presence of another employee, former child specialist Jodi Lynn Fennell. West also faces one count of open or gross lewdness in connection with allegations of touching Fennell's breast, according to a copy of the criminal complaint. A warrant for West's arrest was issued May 22, but he is not yet in custody. He didn't return calls seeking comment Monday. Fennell has told the Review-Journal that she isn't the only victim. She said West was investigated by the Clark County Department of Family Services after two teenage girls made reports involving him in summer 2012. The Review-Journal does not normally name victims of sexual assaults, but Fennell said she wanted to be named in this article. "I want them to be accountable," Fennell said last week of Family Services and St. Jude's Ranch for Children, where she worked with West. St. Jude's Ranch is a county-licensed therapeutic foster care agency, and all employees must remain in good standing with Family Services at the ranch, which has several foster homes on campus, St. Jude's Ranch officials said. West was hired as a child specialist at St. Jude's on Sept. 12, 2011. On April 6, 2012, he was cleared by Family Services to become a house parent at St. Jude's Ranch, according to Kristi Jourdan, Family Services spokeswoman. A house parent lives at the home, runs the daily operations, ensures a child's needs are met and is the main contact at all times, Jourdan said. "House parents are not licensed foster parents, but they go through the same federal and local background checks and training as foster parents do," Jourdan said last week. West's employment was terminated on Dec. 20, days after Fennell filed a complaint with the Boulder City Police Department. She said she was not allowed to have any contact with the children at St. Jude's Ranch after her reports to police, Family Services and St. Jude's Ranch. In February, she found out she was placed on unpaid administrative leave. Christine J. Spadafor, chief executive officer at St. Jude's Ranch for Children, wouldn't say when and why Fennell was placed on administrative leave and said Family Services was reviewing the matter. The number of children that West supervised fluctuated but did not exceed six, Spadafor said. Before April 2012, when he was cleared to become a house parent, West had been "provisionally cleared" after a background check to work at St. Jude's Ranch under supervision, Jourdan said. Family Services won't confirm or deny that it's investigating or that it investigated inappropriate behavior involving West at St. Jude's Ranch. "While DFS investigates complaints thoroughly, the department does not confirm the existence of or comment upon the results of its investigations because of confidentiality laws that protect the safety, permanency and well-being of children," Jourdan said in May. But officials at St. Jude's Ranch earlier this month said Family Services was reviewing the matter. St. Jude's Ranch has checks and balances in place to ensure the safety of the children and employees, Spadafor said. Allegations are reported to Family Services, which determines whether an investigation is required. "As soon as St. Jude's Ranch for Children is informed about allegations, it takes immediate action," Spadafor said in a statement. "The children's safety is always our number one priority, which is why we aggressively and proactively investigated any hint of impropriety here." Fennell said that Family Services investigated the reports made by two teenage girls assigned West to attend "boundaries classes" and cleared him to return to work. Family Services wouldn't confirm or deny the reports made by the teenage girls and declined to say whether it took any disciplinary action against West. Jourdan did say that Family Services can and has referred people to boundaries classes conducted by outside counseling agencies. But she wouldn't say when people are referred to those classes and what the classes consist of. Jourdan also wouldn't say whether West was referred to boundaries classes. While Jourdan wouldn't say whether West had been investigated in the past, Fennell provided copies of two audiotapes she made with the permission of Family Services investigator Teresa Cragon, who was investigating her case for the department earlier this year. During one of the interviews, Cragon is heard confirming a prior investigation but tells Fennell, "I had no part in that investigation." She tells Fennell that "things would've ended up differently" if she had been involved in the first investigation. "I walked in the dark ... with someone who had been a sexual predator," Fennell tells Cragon during the interview. Cragon wouldn't comment for the story and referred questions to Jourdan. The Boulder City Police Department declined several records request for the Review-Journal to obtain a copy of the police report made by Fennell. The Clark County district attorney's office also declined a records request because documents are sealed until an arrest is made. The U.S. Department of Labor also confirmed that the department's Wage and Hour Division in Las Vegas has received some information with regards to St. Jude's Ranch that might or might not involve labor violations. "That information is currently under evaluation to determine an appropriate course of action, which may include an investigation by the division and or a referral to appropriate agencies," spokesman Jose Carnevali said Monday. Contact Yesenia Amaro at yamara@reviewjournal.com or 702-383-0440. Find her on Twitter: @YeseniaAmaro. Source: <http://www.reviewjournal.com/news/st-jude-s-worker-accused-returned-work-new-sex-charges>

Residential treatment center to close in Cape Girardeau Posted: Jun 24, 2014 12:33 PM PDT Updated: Jun 25, 2014 3:52 PM PDT Amber Ruch - email
(Source: John Broeckling/KFVS) Heartland News CAPE GIRARDEAU, MO (KFVS) - The Cottonwood Residential Treatment Center in Cape Girardeau, Missouri will close. By DAVID A. LIEB Associated Press JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (AP) - Gov. Jay Nixon has vetoed or frozen more than $1.1 billion of spending in Missouri's next budget, citing concerns about declining revenues and the potential for new tax breaks. Nixon's budget cuts announced Tuesday include nearly $276 million of line-item vetoes and $846 million of spending restrictions affecting everything from public education to Medicaid. The Democratic governor said his actions were necessary because the budget passed by the Republican-led Legislature was "dangerously out of balance." Nixon's actions mean there will be no funding increase for education when the new school year begins. But Nixon said he could release the additional school money if legislators in September sustain his vetoes of bills granting various tax breaks. Senate Appropriations Chairman Kurt Schaefer said Nixon is "holding school kids hostage." Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Continue reading >> The closure is a result of Missouri Governor Jay Nixon vetoing a $144.6 million general revenue spending and restricted $641.6 million in general revenue expenditures on Tuesday, June 24 in an effort to put the Fiscal Year 2015 budget back into balance. Debra Walker with the Missouri Department of

Mental Health said there are 23 children and youth currently being treated at the Cape Girardeau location. She said they will continue to care for their current clients until they are ready for discharge or provide ongoing care in another residential setting. Walker said current employees will receive layoff notices effective at the end of the calendar year with rights as afforded under the state merit system. Gov. Nixon cited several reasons for why the budget was more than $786 million out of balance. "As governor, it's my responsibility under the Missouri Constitution to keep the budget in balance by ensuring the spending authorized by the General Assembly does not exceed available revenue," Gov. Nixon said. "These actions are not easy, but they are absolutely essential to putting the budget back in balance and keeping the state on a fiscally responsible path." According to Walker, Cottonwood first admitted children in 1987. The treatment center is a residential program designed to meet the emotional and mental health needs of children and adolescents (ages 6-17) who meet the criteria for severe emotional disturbance. "It's actually pretty crushing," said Brittney Patrick. Patrick's 7-year-old son Blake is getting treatment at Cottonwood, and said it really bothers her that the facility is scheduled to shut down. "My son's been through a lot, so he's been in and out of facilities, hospitals all that, and we finally found somewhere that's close to home," said Patrick. Patrick said about a year ago, her son started throwing tantrums, banging his head, tossing chairs, and got out of control. At that point, he was hospitalized. "They kept upping his medicines every time, Blake was up to almost 27 hundred mg as a 6-year-old a day, he was like a walking zombie," said Patrick. Finally, they were able to get him into Cottonwood. "Cottonwood is not about upping his medicine, they're really working with him trying new things, and that's what Blake needs," said Patrick. "He was having really bad behavior and ever since he got here he's been really good," said Katessa Simmons, Blake's godmother. "They need their parents to be close to them when they're in their treatment." "I was just wondering where the kids would go you know most of the parents of the kids that are here are in the area, if cottonwood closed down, they would have to go north," said Jeff Beeson Jr, Beeson's mother has worked at the facility for more than 15 years and he said she was heartbroken to hear the news. "That would put employees out of business and they would have to search for other places to work," said Beeson. Brian Biri works at Cottonwood and said he's surprised and disappointed to see the facility close. "I think the kids that go there that get treatment that really does them some good, and I personally know a few of the kids that went there and got treatment and it really made a difference," said Biri. It's a difference that will now have to come from somewhere else. Patrick said she doesn't know where that somewhere else will be. "I don't know what a lot of parents will do, a lot of them would do without Cottonwood," said Patrick. There is a group petitioning the shutdown. They're asking Gov. Nixon to keep the facility open. You can join their online petition here, and check out their Facebook here. A petition has been started to save the facility. Copyright 2014 KFVS. All rights reserved. Source: <http://www.kfvs12.com/story/25859030/residential-treatment-center-to-close-in-cape-girardeau-mo>

Jacksonville group home worker arrested after disabled man choked By Dan Scanlan Tue, Jun 24, 2014 @ 5:13 pm Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on email A 44-year-old Jacksonville group home employee was arrested Tuesday in the abuse of a disabled adult, according to the Attorney General's Office. Mark Keith Griffin of Dunn Avenue was arrested by the state's Medicaid Fraud Control Unit and the Jacksonville Sheriff's Office after receiving a referral from the Florida Department of Children and Family's Adult Protective Services, the Attorney General's Office said. The arrest warrant said a disabled adult resident was choked at the Shady Pine Group Home at 5496 Shady Pine St. off Ortega Park Boulevard. Two employees told investigators that Griffin became angry at a client who repeatedly turned off a television during a Nov. 23 football game and yelled at him to turn it back on. Witnesses said he put his hands on the victim's neck and started squeezing despite co-workers yelling at him to stop, the warrant said. After being released about a minute later, the victim had "turned red and was coughing," the warrant stated. Griffin was put on administrative leave after the incident, then fired from the facility, which is a state-licensed group home. Source: <http://members.jacksonville.com/news/crime/2014-06-24/story/jacksonville-group-home-worker-arrested-after-disabled-man-choked>

Bend adult foster care home inquiry leads to 72 charges Home's owner, granddaughter accused of defrauding state By Scott Hammers / The Bulletin Published Jun 25, 2014 at 12:01AM An investigation into theft reported by a resident of a Bend adult foster care home has resulted in 72 charges for defrauding the state and has led to the arrest of the home's owner and her granddaughter. Charging documents filed in Deschutes County Circuit Court in late May outline the allegations against Constance Marie Herrera-Firkus, 66, Loris Firkus, 24, and Michael James Gardner, 27, Loris Firkus' husband. A probable cause affidavit filed in the case indicates it began with an investigation by Adult Protective Services into a complaint that money had been stolen from a resident of one of two Holden Homes facilities owned and operated by Herrera-Firkus. Instead, investigators discovered Herrera-Firkus had been employing her granddaughter, Loris Firkus, a convicted felon legally barred by the state from working in such facilities. Firkus, who was still on probation for a conviction for first-degree theft in 2009, has been held at the Deschutes County Jail since June 3. Investigators discovered Firkus had been using her cousin's name to elude detection by authorities, and that Firkus and Herrera-Firkus both submitted official documents to authorities using the assumed identity. On a November 2013 visit to one of the facilities, licensers with the state Department of Human Services observed someone they later learned was Firkus running out the back door. The resident manager later told the licensers Firkus had been working full time using her cousin's identity with her grandmother's knowledge, and that employees had been instructed to call her by the cousin's name if anyone from the state visited. In January, the licensers visited again, and Firkus introduced herself using her cousin's name and presented a CPR certification card bearing the cousin's name. Firkus eventually admitted in February to the investigators that she worked at the facility, though Herrera-Firkus continued to insist she did not, the affidavit states. Because state law requires a criminal background check that would disqualify Firkus from working at an adult foster care facility, prosecutors contend it was a criminal act for the facility to accept state payments while she was working there. Herrera-Firkus received more than $300,000 in Medicaid payments from the state Department of Human Services between October 2010 and May 2014. Firkus was paid more than $47,000 over four years working for her grandmother, the affidavit states, while collecting $185 a week in unemployment and $200 to $443 per month in food stamps during much of that time. Firkus did not report her income or pay taxes and would have been disqualified from receiving unemployment and food stamps benefits had she done so. In late May, a grand jury indicted Firkus, Herrera-Firkus and Gardner on a total of 72 charges. Several of the charges apply to more than one defendant; Herrera-Firkus faces charges of making a false claim for health care payment and aggravated theft by deception, Firkus for identity theft, unlawfully obtaining public assistance and tax evasion, and Gardner for tax evasion and unlawfully obtaining supplemental nutrition. No charges have been filed in connection with the original theft claim that started the state's investigation. Firkus is scheduled to enter a plea to the charges July 10, Herrera-Firkus on Thursday and Gardner on Friday. — Reporter: 541-383-0387, shammers@bendbulletin.com Source: <http://www.bendbulletin.com/localstate/2188182-151/bend-adult-foster-care-home-inquiry-leads-to-72-entryType=0>

Lawsuit: DSS negligent in assault of 6-year-old MEG KINNAR, Associated Press By MEG KINNARD, Associated Press Updated 4:57 pm, Wednesday, June 25, 2014 0 Larger | Smaller Printable Version Email This Georgia (default) Verdana Times New Roman Arial Font Page 1 of 1 COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — South Carolina's social services agency failed to protect a 6-year-old girl from a teenage foster child with known behavioral problems who was HIV-positive and admitted to sexually assaulting the girl, according to a lawsuit. The lawsuit currently pending in Richland County was filed last month by the girl's mother, who accuses the Department of Social Services of negligence. According to the lawsuit, a 14-year-old boy who had been placed in a foster home sexually assaulted the girl in June 2013 after he was left unsupervised by his foster parent. The boy had been removed from his mother's home in 2012 and placed in the foster care system. Officials at DSS knew that the boy had severe behavioral problems, had been sexually abused and was HIV-positive, according to the lawsuit. But during his stay in foster care, according to court papers, DSS officials didn't ensure that the teen was properly monitored or received appropriate counseling or other therapies for his behavioral problems. The lawsuit says that negligence ultimately resulted in the girl's abuse and exposure to HIV. Because the agency knew of the teen's history of abuse and his HIV-positive status, "DSS knew or should have known that he presented a heightened threat to others, especially young children, with whom he might come into contact," according to the suit, filed by Columbia attorney Dick Harpootlian. The boy ultimately admitted that he had assaulted the girl and was charged with criminal sexual conduct, according to the lawsuit. Court papers do not indicate if the girl is also now HIV-positive. In a statement provided to The Associated Press, a DSS spokeswoman said the agency investigated the situation, determined that treatment plans had not been followed and had subsequently disallowed the foster parent involved from having future foster children. The statement also said the foster child was regularly monitored and was in a "therapeutic" foster care home designed to meet his needs. "Like everyone involved in this situation, the staff at the Department of Social Services is deeply saddened at what took place here," Marilyn Matheus said. "The agency is committed, and always will be, to finding the best and most appropriate foster parents possible for our at-risk children and will never stop working to make our communities safer places." Source: <http://www.sfgate.com/news/article/Lawsuit-DSS-negligent-in-assault-of-6-year-old-5578581.php>

Franklinville man accused of sexually assaulting teen at group home Print By Jessica Beym/South Jersey Times Gloucester County Times Email the author | Follow on Twitter on June 27, 2014 at 4:14 PM Reddit Email Express-Times photo A 35-year-old Franklinville man has been charged with sexually assaulting a 17-year-old female resident of a group home in Clayton, operated by the New Jersey Mentor Program, for youth with "complex medical and behavioral challenges," according to police. Thomas Gillett Spio, of 7 Christopher Court, Franklinville, was arrested by the Clayton Police Department on Thursday. Police said Gillett-Spio was a direct support professional at the home and had "supervisory or disciplinary power over the victim," according to the criminal complaint. He is charged with second-degree sexual assault and endangering the welfare of a child. Authorities allege the incident happened on June 10. He is being held in default of $50,000 bail. The New Jersey State Police assisted in the investigation. Source: http://www.nj.com/gloucester-county/index.ssf/2014/06/franklinville_man_accused_of_sexually_assaulting_teen_at_group_home.html

Minnesota surgeon suspected of choking foster child By Sarah Smith Forum News Service Posted: 06/29/2014 12:01:00 AM CDT Updated: 06/29/2014 01:32:04 PM CDT PARK RAPIDS, Minn. -- A special-needs child allegedly abused by a Benedict surgeon has been removed from the home. "The county reacted very, very quickly and worked to put him in a safe environment," said Martha Weaver, spokeswoman for Anoka County Social Services. Dennis James Sullivan, 50, was charged this month in Hubbard County with attempted murder and two counts of assault for allegedly trying to choke his 10-year-old foster son by stuffing a surgical glove down his throat June 17. Hubbard County authorities added a fourth count of assault Monday for Sullivan allegedly tying a shoelace around the 10-year-old boy's scrotum in May, as allegedly admitted by Sullivan's wife, Rebecca, who has not been charged in the case. As a result, the attempted second-degree murder charge was upgraded to first-degree murder, "while committing domestic abuse with a past pattern of domestic abuse," the complaint states. Weaver said she couldn't comment on any other aspect of the case, but said the boy was placed with the Sullivans through a private adoption/foster care agency, not the county. "The county moved very quickly when it learned the boy was potentially in jeopardy," she said, declining to comment further. Sullivan's attorney has requested a mental evaluation in the case. Source: http://www.twincities.com/localnews/ci_26057663/minnesota-surgeon-suspected-choking-foster-child

Increasing Foster Children Prompts Focus on Reuniting Families Increasing Foster Children Prompts Focus on Reuniting Families ANCHORAGE - Increasing reports of abuse and neglect in Alaska's foster care homes is starting to have a strong impact on the state's adoption system. More from KTUU --According to the Office of Children's Services, there are more than 2,000 children in the state's care so far this year. Officials say despite the challenges, the goal is to find all of these children a safe home. For three-year-old Ashley, Barb Krafft is like her second mom. For a period of time, Krafft and her husband were Ashley's foster parents. Over the past two years, the Kraffts along with their three biological children have had nine kids sharing their home. "You just see the need of all these kids who are hurting and are struggling with what's happening in their life," Krafft said. It's a passion to help that can be tough, especially when it can mean dealing with the children's biologic parents. "The kids are the easy part," Krafft said. "Having to convey the positive and some of the negative to the parents and to the system, it's hard as a parent to watch some of these struggles even if they are not your own children." It's choices that the Office of Children's Services says makes the reunification process a challenge. "You offend, you use drugs again and you go back to treatment," said Kim Guay, child welfare administrator for OCS. "There are a lot of drugs and a lot of alcohol in our state, a lot of domestic violence." With more than 6,800 reports of harm last year, the agency says its focus is to lower those numbers by getting families back on a positive track while their kids are in foster care. "There is so much that needs to be done," Guay said. "There is so much success that can happen in Alaska and helping children out." A journey that through tears of sadness and joy is very much part of this foster mom's life. Officials from the Office of Children's Services say the public can help in a variety of ways, including calling immediately if you see any child abused or neglected. "If you have the love, and if you have the space and you want to share that, take the step forward," Krafft said. "Even if it's through texting, talking, meeting up for dinner." For more information click here <http://www.acrf.org/>. Copyright © 2014, KTUU-TV Source: <http://www.ktuu.com/news/news/increasing-foster-children-prompts-focus-on-reuniting-families/26736732>

Former group home manager accused of stealing food stamps Posted: Jul 01, 2014 8:31 AM PDT Updated: Jul 01, 2014 8:32 AM PDT By 19 Action News Digital Team - email Warrant issued of Shawuan M. Telfair. (Source: Westlake Police) WESTLAKE, OH (WOIO) - Westlake Police have issued an arrest warrant for Shawuan M. Telfair, 28. The Cleveland woman was a manager at a Westlake group home and used the Ohio Direction cards of three developmentally disabled male residents to make purchases totaling $749 that were not for those residents. Telfair was let go in Nov. 2013. Police say the thefts occurred during and after her employment and were discovered by the home's staff in May 2014. Westlake PD is seeking information on her whereabouts. Call 440-871-3311 if you know where she can be found. Source: <http://www.19actionnews.com/story/25915555/former-group-home-manager-accused-of-stealing-food-stamps>

Ex-doctor dies in prison after conviction for illegally distributing drugs Former doctor Nolan Crisp LEXINGTON, Ky. - A former physician at a health clinic in Bolivar died at a federal prison in Lexington, Ken., on Monday, one day after his 77th birthday. Nolan Crisp of Halfway was serving a two-year sentence for illegally distributing prescription drugs. He was sentenced to prison last October after pleading guilty on April 8, 2013, and was also ordered to pay a $10,000 fine. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons hasn't released information about Crisp's death, which is noted in the Bureau's Inmate Locator Service. Before he was sentenced, a physician gave the judge a review of Crisp's medical problems, at Crisp's request. That physician noted Crisp had a "significant hiatal hernia," chronic allergies, Parkinson's disease since 2006, coronary artery disease (after a heart attack in 2005), and a torn tendon in a hip that hampered ability to walk. The physician wrote to the judge that Crisp's "continued survival thus, in my opinion, requires care and very careful management of the medical problems." Crisp worked at Pomme de Terre Wellness Center (also known as the Bolivar Family Wellness Clinic and Northwoods Psychiatric Services) in Bolivar from June 2009 through Nov. 10, 2010, to provide pain management and other services to patients. Crisp admitted he wrote prescriptions for OxyContin, Oxycodone Hydrochloride, and Oxycodone-Aspirin for a purported patient with whom he was involved in a sexual relationship. The prescriptions were illegal because they were not in the usual course of professional practice and for a person who had no legitimate medical need for the prescriptions. Current and former clinic employees expressed concerns about Crisp's prescription-writing practices. For example, clinic staff noticed Crisp meeting people in the parking lot and giving them prescriptions, even though they were not being seen in the clinic. The clinic was getting so many patients claiming that their prescriptions were lost or stolen that they began requiring a police report. A nurse practitioner said word got out that Crisp was generous with narcotics prescriptions, and she would see patients parked across the street in a church parking lot waiting for him so they could get prescriptions. She also said that sometimes the clinic nurses would run a drug screen that revealed the patient was not taking the drugs being prescribed; they informed Crisp, but he continued writing prescriptions for the patient. The federal investigation included reviewing overdose reports from Citizens Memorial Hospital, Crisp's appointment schedule for the clinic, Crisp's Medicaid billing records while he was at the clinic, information regarding prescriptions written by Crisp and filled at six major pharmacies in Bolivar, and information from the Polk County coroner. During the period that Crisp worked at the clinic, there were 96 overdose incidents at the hospital, 29 of whom were connected to his care. During that same period, six of the patients who died from overdoses were connected to his care. The government retained an internal medicine physician specializing in pain management to review patient files. The physician was provided with charts for certain patients who were known to be drug abusers or who had overdosed. In the physician's report, he provided background regarding the standard of care for the use of controlled substances in the treatment of pain. He also provided a detailed analysis of Crisp's treatment of 20 patients. For the 20 patients, his opinion was that Crisp's treatment was reckless, dangerous, life-threatening, and inconsistent with sound medical practice. ---- Some information in this report came from a news release from the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Missouri in October 2013. Copyright Schurz Communications 2014 Source: http://www.kspr.com/news/local/exdoctor-dies-in-prison-after-conviction-for-illegally-distributing-drugs/21051620_26750206

New group home opens amid concerns Kristen Cates, kcates@greatfalltribune.com 1:59 a.m. MDT July 2, 2014 Richard Hamilton of Youth Dynamics shows off one of the double bedrooms in the new group home in the Skyline neighborhood. (Photo: TRIBUNE PHOTO/RION SANDERS) 83 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A new group home for children who are predominantly victims of neglect and abuse opened in the Skyline neighborhood this week, stirring up complaints from some within the neighborhood about whether zoning and covenants allow for such a place. Youth Dynamics operates nine other community homes across the state that cater predominantly to emotionally disturbed youths and teenagers and decided to open a group home in Great Falls after an analysis a few years ago determined between 50 and 60 Great Falls youths in need of extensive counseling and therapy were being sent to group homes in all corners of the state, Executive Director Peter Degel said. "The majority of the kids we work with are removed from their homes because of abuse and neglect," Degel said. Kathleen Gessaman, chairwoman of Neighborhood Council No. 3, said she can't address concerns neighbors might have with the group home but said neighbors are upset that a zoning issue didn't come to the neighborhood council for review first. Covenants in the neighborhood where the home is located specify it is for single-family dwelling, and she and others aren't sure if a group home qualifies as a single-family dwelling. She said the city doesn't help neighborhoods enforce covenants, either. "To me it's frustrating," Gessaman said. "It's a point that should be clarified. It's hard to enforce covenants when the city won't tell you what is happening. If the covenants say no, then the city should respect that." However, the city hasn't been involved in the purchase of the property and opening of the group home as it is not a zoning issue, said Craig Raymond, planning and community development director for the city of Great Falls. Over the years he said the courts have ruled in favor of group homes being considered single-family dwellings. Raymond said this is not a zoning issue but it's up to the neighborhood to determine whether it violates covenants. And it would have to determine if civil action is necessary. "The city does not enforce covenants," Raymond said. But even then, he thinks federal rulings regarding housing and what constitutes a single-family home would supersede any covenants. Carrie Galvez, executive director of the Great Falls Children's Receiving Home, said she doesn't care what the covenants say, more group homes like Youth Dynamics' North Skyline home for children who are victims of abuse and neglect are needed in Great Falls. The Receiving Home can only care for younger children and can only house up to 14 kids at a time. Group homes operated by AWARE and Kairos Youth Services are also trying to respond to different kinds of children in need. "That home is filling a void. Most of these kids are our kids," Galvez said. "We owe these kids in the community something greater than 'We don't want you here.'" She said neighbors of the Receiving Home have never had a problem with the kids living next door in the 20-plus years it's been in the same location. She also knows, much like her employees, those working in the Youth Dynamics group home go through extensive background checks and must be licensed by the Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services to be in operation. "I would not hesitate as a homeowner to have these kids right next door to me," Galvez said. "These are not bad kids; they come from bad situations." Degel said Youth Dynamics is licensed to treat and work with a maximum of eight children in the home at a time, ranging in age from 11 to 18. There are a home manager and different supervisors working in the house at all times along with a licensed therapist. Though most of the children they serve come from homes of abuse or neglect, they do occasionally work with youths who are working through the juvenile court system, but Degel said that's usually triggered by other familial issues. Children who are in need of a lock-down facility are not going to come to the Skyline North home, he said. "I think people will find that we're good neighbors," he said. Reach Tribune Staff Writer Kristen Cates at 791-1463 or kcates@greatfalltribune.com. Follow her on Twitter @GFTtrib_KCates. 83 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE Read or Share this story: <http://www.greatfalltribune.com/story/news/local/2014/07/01/new-group-home-opens-amid-concerns/11936413/>

Police charge rape at state group home Posted: Wednesday, July 2, 2014 12:14 pm | Updated: 12:15 pm, Wed Jul 2, 2014. Police charge rape at state group home By Justin Kloczko Journal Inquirer Journal Inquirer | 0 comments SOUTH WINDSOR — A former resident at a state-contracted Woodland Drive group home is facing sexual-assault charges after, police say, he raped a 13-year-old resident on at least one occasion. According to an arrest warrant affidavit, the man, Kevin W. Vargas, 18, of Hartford, is facing a charge of first-degree sexual assault stemming from an October arrest. Police say he had forced intercourse on another boy at a home run by Community Residences Inc. Vargas is free on a $50,000 surety bond and is due back in Manchester Superior Court on Aug. 1. Source: http://www.journalinquirer.com/towns/south_windsor/police-charge-rape-at-state-group-home/article_f9baa45c-0203-11e4-a3d0-0019b2963f4.html

Innovative new fostering service helps Bristol children avoid residential care By Hilda1 | Posted: July 02, 2014 Comments \(0\) A new fostering service which aims to prevent children in Bristol from going into residential care has just been launched. The new service, called Multi-dimensional Treatment Foster Care (MTFC), pairs foster carers with a clinical team of coaches, social workers, education workers and a therapist. Together, they help vulnerable children and young people to make positive changes in their lives, from behaviour at school to their relationship with their birth family. The aim is to prevent children with complex behaviour from going into residential care by giving them the skills needed to stay in a home setting. MTFC is run by Bristol City Council in partnership with charity Action for Children. The council funds the service as well as employing the clinical team, whilst Action for Children has responsibility for recruiting, training and supporting foster carers. Brenda Massey, the council's Assistant Mayor for Education, said: "Every child deserves the chance to fulfil their full potential. This new service in Bristol will offer children with serious emotional and behavioural issues a structured and nurturing family setting that reinforces positive behaviour. Studies have shown that MTFC has led to fewer foster care placements breaking down in the future." Mark Kingston, children's placement manager at Action for Children, said: "We have long provided fostering and adoption services across the South West, but our new Multi-dimensional Treatment Foster Care service is the first of its kind in Bristol. "The programme teaches good behaviour by encouragement, introducing clear boundaries and targeting patterns of problem behaviour. It also helps develop positive academic and living skills, allowing children the chance to stay in a home environment and avoid being placed in residential care." Action for Children is recruiting new foster carers in Bristol to help make the service a success. Carers will become integral members of the MTFC team, supported and guided by the clinical team of professionals who will help carers to provide highly structured placements for children who have previously struggled in residential children's units or foster placements. Each carer will have full support and training from the charity to be able to carry out their role to the best of their ability. Read more: <http://www.bristolpost.co.uk/Innovative-new-fostering-service-helps-Bristol/story-21316910-detail/story.html#ixzz36cdtSpBR> Read more at <http://www.bristolpost.co.uk/Innovative-new-fostering-service-helps-Bristol/story-21316910-detail/story.html#W5gxLW1XL506mLX1.99>

CASA launches initiative to treat traumatized children in foster care Ashley Goudeau, KVUE 6:43 p.m. CDT July 2, 2014 CONNECT 18 T CASA launches initiative to treat traumatized children in foster care KVUE AUSTIN -- At 27-years-old, Ereka Howard is an entrepreneur and motivational speaker, dedicated to helping people around her. But she wasn't always this put together. "I was dropped from a standing position by my biological mother and made no attempt to pick me up. I know that I was, my mother was on heroine and cocaine up until the day of my birth," said Howard. At five months, she was abandoned and put into foster care. Though she was too young to remember her past, the trauma stayed with her and was reflected in her behavior. "I acted out," she laughed. "I stole things. I was very rebellious," added Howard. "Wanting that comfort. That comfort in saying this is where I come from. I look like them." Helping people who serve foster children identify, address and treat trauma is the goal of a new initiative by CASA or Court Appointed Special Advocates. Thanks to a total of $120,000 from Impact Austin and the Texas Bar Foundation, staff and volunteers will be trained to do Trust Based Relational Intervention (TBRI), techniques developed and studied by professors at Texas Christian University that focus on healing a child's pain. "How can we treat the trauma and not punish the child for their bad behavior," explained CASA of Travis County Executive Director Laura Wolf. "The key is about understanding what's at the root of whatever it is you're seeing." Wrapping them in a weighted blanket is one way to help kids feel safe. Another is surrounding them with comforting scents and giving them the basics. "Sometimes they will come up, you know as foster mom is cooking dinner and say I need something to eat," said Wolf. "And what TBRI teaches us is instead of saying, which any of us would, instead of saying 'okay, dinner is going to be on the table in ten minutes, don't worry I'm cooking it right now,' you stop, you get down on their level, you look them in the eye and you say 'okay, I'm going to give you this powerbar and you can either put it in your pocket or you can put it by your place at the table and I'm going to finish dinner but you can have this powerbar. Dr. Pervis has taught us that when she's done this before with traumatized children a lot of times, they don't go ahead and eat that power bar they hold on to it because the comfort of knowing 'I'm not going to starve.' When I say I need food, I get it. That enables them to feel safe." Wolf says creating a feeling of safety is the first step to healing. CASA is hoping to have more success stories like Howard's, who serves as a CASA volunteer. Source: <http://www.kvue.com/story/news/local/2014/07/02/casa-launches-initiative-to-treat-traumatized-children-in-foster-care/12113469/>

THE HEAL REPORT PREMIERES ON YOUTUBE: JULY 4TH, 2014

Arizona heightens oversight of medications for foster children Arizona heightens oversight of medications for foster children S2014-07-06T00:00:00Z 2014-07-06T10:25:32Z Arizona heightens oversight of medications for foster children By Emily Bregel Arizona Daily Star Arizona Daily Star 18 hours ago • By Emily Bregel Emily Bregel ebregel@azstarnet.com Follow @emilybregel Related Documents Arizona psychotropic study GAO psychotropic study State won't share data about psychotropic drugs State will only release data if the Star pays $175 per hour commercial fee Foster kids on psychotropic drugs A study based on 2008 prescription claims found that 11 percent of Arizona foster kids — 1,681 children — took at least one psychotropic drug, like anti-depressants, anti-psychotics and stimulants such as Ritalin for attention-deficit disorders. More than 1 in 4 children ages 6 to 12 were taking the drugs, compared with one in 20 non-foster children that age. Still, Arizona's overall rate was lower than rates in five U.S. states studied in a U.S. Government Accountability Office report, where 19 percent to nearly 40 percent of foster youth in 2008 were on at least one psychotropic drug. "It is indeed concerning," said Dr. Kathy Smith. Kathy Smith, director of child and adolescent psychiatry at the University of Arizona. "What's causing that, is the question. Is it because we have people who don't have enough expertise prescribing medication? Is it because of changes in caregivers? Is it because these kids are really complicated?" Raised on Tucson's east side by an abusive parent, Angela Luna entered foster care at age 14. After being diagnosed with bipolar disorder, she was put on antidepressants and anti-anxiety medications and stayed on them for seven years. But she says her emotional problems were related to her childhood trauma, not mental illness. The medications numbed her pain and anger, she says, and prevented her from learning how to deal with her emotions — or even knowing how she felt. "I constantly felt stoned and high," says Luna, now 28, who has since been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder. "You're never given the chance to properly grow. ... Therapists ask, 'How's your medication?' Not 'How are you?'" Arizona foster children were 4.4 times more likely than nonfoster children on Medicaid to be prescribed powerful psychotropic drugs, a report based on 2008 data found. Arizona hasn't updated that report, but the number of foster kids on psychotropic drugs likely has grown along with the state's foster-care population: Between March 2008 and March 2014, the number of Arizona children in foster care soared by 62 percent from 9,721 to 15,750. Child-welfare advocates attribute the growth to deepening poverty leading to more cases of neglect. When used appropriately, psychotropic drugs — which affect mood, thought or behavior — can be lifesaving, experts say. But some child-welfare advocates say the drugs can be prescribed more for the convenience of overwhelmed caregivers than for the benefit of the child. "I see youth that are so overly medicated that they're literally drooling," said Christa Drake, former executive director of In My Shoes, a mentorship program for foster youth. "Sometimes it's like, 'Let's just medicate him and subdue him so we don't have to deal with the behavior.'" This year the state implemented new oversight and heightened reporting requirements regarding prescriptions for foster kids, said Steven Dingle, chief medical officer of the Arizona Division of Behavioral Health. As of January, "regional behavioral health authorities" — organizations that coordinate behavioral health care for foster kids — must regularly submit data on medication utilization rates among foster kids. The behavioral health authorities will also monitor the prescribing habits of doctors in their region and identify outliers. In addition, doctors must now get authorization — attesting they first tried psychosocial interventions like therapy — before prescribing the following: antipsychotic or ADHD medications for children under age 6; any psychotropic drug at a dosage level exceeding FDA recommendations; more than one antipsychotic or antidepressant simultaneously. The state has also formed the Arizona Psychotropic Monitoring Oversight Team, a partnership between the Department of Child Safety, AHCCCS and the Division of Behavioral Health Services focused on ensuring appropriate prescribing, Dingle said. The team plans to replicate the study on psychotropic prescriptions among 2008 foster children with more recent data, likely within the next six months, he said. Normal behaviors Despite the new reporting requirements, some worry medication use could increase as Arizona's child welfare system is stretched. Last November, the Arizona Department of Economic Security admitted that its Child Protective Service division failed to investigate more than 6,500 reports of abuse or neglect, in part due to sky-high caseloads for CPS caseworkers. CPS oversight was taken from DES and given to the newly created Department of Child Safety in May. Heavy caseloads leave caseworkers, caregivers and doctors with less time to concentrate on each child's medication regimen. A foster family shortage also means more children are in group homes, with less individualized attention, increasing the risk of fragmented oversight of their care. "The system remains ripe for medication misuse or overuse," says Sen. David Bradley, D-Tucson, who worked in child welfare for 20 years. Finding solutions other than medication takes resources, time and patience, said Drake, formerly of In My Shoes. Foster children need stability and a safe space to explore and express their emotions, she said. Instead, lots of kids get a diagnosis of conditions like "oppositional defiance disorder" when they act out, she said. That diagnosis can sometimes medicalize normal behavior, she said. "Most people would be upset if they were ripped away from their families and sent to live in a group home," she said. "A lot of our youth are acting appropriately in their surroundings." Foster kids with complex needs are often bounced between therapeutic and regular foster homes as their behavior stabilizes, then deteriorates again, said Sarah Huntoon, foster program director for Intermountain Centers for Human Development, which trains and licenses therapeutic foster homes. The more transitions, the more instability for the foster child — and the less likely he is to have a familiar caregiver who will notice and report concerns about medications. "Consistency of care is an issue," she said. Trauma is a given Experts say it makes sense that kids in foster care have a higher rate of psychotropic-drug use than other kids. Between 60 and 80 percent of foster youth have at least one psychiatric diagnosis or developmental disability, compared with 15 to 20 percent of the general population, said Dr. Sandy Stein, associate medical director of Community Partnership of Southern Arizona, the Regional Behavioral Health Authority for Pima County. The authority coordinates and manages behavioral health care for children in the child welfare system. Some of those diagnoses in foster children are related to lack of prenatal care, to parental substance abuse or to a family history of mental illness, Stein said. Lengthy stays in foster care, or transitions between foster families and group homes, can add to a child's sense of instability. "These kids have been traumatized," says Susie Huhn, executive director of Casa de los Niños, a social-service and foster-care agency in Tucson. "The very fact that they're in the foster care system means they've been exposed to toxic stress and traumatic events — so why wouldn't we expect they'll have more social or emotional issues?" But some worry about questionable prescribing practices. Among the 2008 psychotropic drug report's findings: Foster kids were nine times more likely than nonfoster children to be prescribed five psychotropic medications at one time. Almost 800 children, or 5.4 percent of the foster population, were taking two or more drugs. Only limited evidence supports the use of even two psychotropic drug in children, and no evidence supports children — or even adults — taking five at once, according to the U.S. Government Accountability Office. Arizona foster children ages 5 and younger were 5.5 times more likely than nonfoster children to be prescribed at least one psychotropic medication. That year, 225 Arizona foster children 5 and younger were prescribed the drugs. The state's foster kids were 7.4 times as likely to be prescribed the drugs in doses exceeding the maximum recommendation for their age group. Fifty-five foster children ages 1 and younger got a psychotropic prescription in 2008, though the report notes some drugs could have been prescribed to treat other conditions. The drugs can have serious side effects for infants, and the GAO points out that there is no established use for these drugs to treat mental-health conditions in infants. Long-term harm Even if kids improve with medication, powerful psychotropics may do a lifetime of harm. Common side effects include paranoia, weight gain, extreme fatigue and reduced bone density. Little research has been done on long-term impacts on brain development in children. And unlike in adults, side effects like weight gain can become permanent for children, even after they're taken off the medication. Proper diagnosis is often a challenge. Post-traumatic stress disorder can look a lot like ADHD, and the treatments for each are different, said Laurel Rettle, critical-care coordination administrator for Cenpatico, one of four Regional Behavioral Health Authorities in Arizona. Although medications can help those who suffer from PTSD in the short term, long-term use of stimulants — like ADHD treatments — will not. PTSD "is not, in and of itself, a serious mental illness," she said. "These children are dealing with things they never should have to deal with. You can compare it to children of war." Gera Patten has been a therapeutic foster mom since 1998. Most of her foster children came to her already on medications, she said, and many stayed on them until they aged out of the system. She believes psychotropic medications were used generally only when necessary and helped many of her foster kids get through a difficult time. Still, most of her foster kids ended up stopping their meds as soon as they gained independence, she said, and they seemed to thrive without the drugs. "They're at a calmer place," she said. "I imagine 90 to 95 percent of them take themselves off the medicine." "Assent" sought Bouncing between foster homes, group homes and behavioral-health facilities for foster youth, Luna learned to accept that the drugs were a necessary part of her life. "You take the meds and shut up and deal with it, or you get in trouble," she recalled of her time in a group home. "No one's there to tell you that we all struggle. It makes you hopeless." A foster-care mentor was the first person to suggest her emotions and anger were understandable, and that she wasn't destined to always need medication. Drake, of In My Shoes, encouraged Luna to question her medication protocol. "Christa saved my life," she said. "Christa told me, 'You have a right to know about your medicine.'" Starting this month, CPSA is formalizing an "assent" process for foster children under 18 to sign off on their treatment plan, said Stein of Community Partnership of Southern Arizona. "Assent" is not legally binding, as the child's caregiver has the final say on treatment, but the process will ensure children understand their diagnosis, treatment options and the goals of their medications, she said. "It's absolutely essential to engage kids in their overall health-care treatments," she said. Luna got off her medications at age 21 and earned her GED. She put herself through cosmetology school and as a hairstylist, client after client praised strengths she never realized she possessed: her compassion and listening skills. Now in her work as a mentor to foster youth, Luna says she sees children on four or five different psychotropic medications at a time. Some may have serious mental illnesses and require medication, but she thinks many of them just need understanding. Giving foster kids the emotional tools to cope with their trauma will have a far more positive effect on their lives, she said. "You have to cherish all your broken pieces," she says, "because it makes a beautiful mural." Source: http://azstarnet.com/news/local/arizona-heightens-oversight-of-medications-for-foster-children/article_d4ee1bb3-a7d3-55ac-b7a6-ddc410f3064a.html

State Halts Foster Care Placements With Contractor Alexa Ura, The Texas Tribune 1 07/07/2014 02:39 PM 07/07/2014 02:41 PM Following the drowning of two foster children on Sunday, the Department of Family and Protective Services has halted placements by a state contractor that was responsible for overseeing the children's care. Following the drowning of two foster children in Lake Georgetown on Sunday, the Department of Family and Protective Services has placed a temporary hold on foster care placements by a state contractor that was responsible for overseeing the children's care. DFPS said on Monday that placements of foster care children with Providence Service Corporation have been temporarily suspended pending an investigation into the death of a 4-year-old boy and his 6-year-old sister, who had been placed in a Cedar Park foster home. Officials with Providence could not immediately be reached for comment. The incident is likely to be met with scrutiny from child advocates who have suggested that the state's "foster care redesign" initiative, which Providence is spearheading through a pilot program, could be problematic. "This is an unspeakable tragedy," DFPS Commissioner John Specia said in a statement. "We will find out exactly what happened and whether or not it could have been prevented. Foster children must be kept safe." The state has tasked Providence, which oversees 29 foster children in eight homes in Central Texas, with leading the redesign of the state's foster care program, which pivots on increasing partnerships with private contractors to streamline the foster care placement process and keep children closer to home when they're placed with a foster care family. The redesign process formally began in 2010, though its first contract with Providence took effect in February 2013, according to DFPS. Through its contract, Providence has received $8.3 million from the state for foster care services, according to DFPS spokesman Patrick Crimmins. Its contract for 2014 alone is estimated to be worth $30.4 million, and the corporation has a five-year contract with the state. Opponents of foster care redesign have raised concerns about the oversight of the private contractors, and they have called for the state to examine the program's outcomes before expanding. The redesign has already been gradually rolled out in North Texas and West Texas, and the state is gearing up for a wider implementation. Ashley Harris, a child welfare policy associate with Texans Care for Children, said the state "shouldn't push further privatization" under the redesign initiative until it establishes better safety standards for children. "We're still learning the details of this heartbreaking case, but we know that Texas needs stronger statewide standards for screening and training foster parents," Harris said. In its review of the department, staffers at the Sunset Advisory Commission, which is charged with identifying inefficiencies at state agencies, also recommended that DFPS further evaluate performance data from its current contractors to better assess the foster care redesign model before implementing it more broadly across the state. DFPS said it agreed with the directive and was currently evaluating its contractors. This article originally appeared in The Texas Tribune at <http://www.texastribune.org/2014/07/07/cps-halts-foster-care-placements-state-contractor/>. Source: <http://www.myhighplains.com/story/d/story/state-halts-foster-care-placements-with-contractor/26100/KTM9fawjUWF0cU-blyL3g>

Pastor, Church Members Plead Guilty To Beating and Abusing 13-Year-Old Boy Updated: Tuesday, July 8 2014, 08:32 AM CDT A pastor and two members of a Corona church pleaded guilty Monday to state charges of beating and threatening the life of a 13-year-old boy, who was forced to dig his own grave, authorities said. Lonny Lee Remmers, 56, Nicholas James Craig, 24, and Darryll Duane Jeter Jr., 30, tortured the boy in the church-run group home where he lived, according to a witness report in affidavits for search warrants. Remmers was then the pastor of Heart of Worship Community Church and ran the group home where Craig, Jeter and the victim lived. It was unclear Monday whether Remmers was still the pastor. The March 2012 incidents included Craig and Jeter driving the victim to the desert and forcing him to dig his own grave. They then made him get in and threw dirt on him. They were responding to Remmers' instruction to "scare" the boy, according to the affidavits. While the boy was showering, one of the men rubbed salt into the cuts on his back, according to Steven Larkey, who lived in the group home and provided the witness report in the affidavit. He told investigators he could hear the boy screaming and saw blood all over the shower the next day. The victim was later tied to a chair with zip ties and placed in the shower. Mace was sprayed on his face, causing it to bleed, and he was not allowed to rinse off for about 30 minutes, according to the victim's account in the affidavit. At a Bible study later that evening at Remmers' home, Remmers asked the boy to sit in the middle of the group and then squeezed his nipple with pliers. The boy, his mother and sister were members of Remmers' church. His mother and sister lived in a women's group home, but the boy said he had been moved to the men's home as a disciplinary action. Remmers entered guilty pleas to inflicting bodily injury on a child and assault with a deadly weapon. He will receive a sentence of up to two years in state prison. At a minimum, he will receive the same sentence as Craig and Jeter, who each were placed on three years of formal probation and must complete a year in custody. They each pleaded guilty to charges of child abuse and making criminal threats, according to the Riverside County district attorney's office. "There were new developments, which we will not be discussing, that caused us to believe this was the best disposition for all those involved," said John Hall, spokesman for the Riverside County district attorney. Remmers' sentencing date is scheduled for Sept. 26. Source: <http://www.fox17.com/news/features/top-stories/stories/pastor-church-members-plead-guilty-beating-abusing-13yearold-boy-22212.shtml>

California pastor, 2 others admit they tortured 13-year-old, forced him to dig own grave Lonny Remmers, the pastor of a small church in Corona, sicced two of his goons on a 13-year-old boy in order to 'scare' him straight. The men beat the boy, forced him to dig his own grave, rubbed salt in his wounds and maced him in the face until he bled, documents show. BY Philip Caulfield NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Tuesday, July 8, 2014, 10:44 AM A A A 13 Share this URL cbs los angeles Pastor Lonny Lee Remmers, 56, pleaded guilty Monday to torturing a teen who lived at his Corona, Calif., church group home in March 2012. The thuggish pastor of a small Southern California church and two of his parishioners tortured a 13-year-old boy who lived at a church-run group home, savagely beating him, grinding salt into his raw wounds and forcing him to dig his own grave. The pastor, Lonny Remmers, 56, and his two goons even tortured the teen during a group Bible study session, forcing him to sit in front of the others while they twisted his nipples with pliers, court documents show, according to the Los Angeles Times. The assaults were part of a brutal campaign to "scare" the boy straight after he was moved from one home, where his mother and sister lived, to another allegedly for acting out, the Times reported. Remmers, Nicholas Craig, 24, and Darryll Jeter Jr., 30, pleaded guilty Monday to charges including inflicting corporal injury on a child, assault with a deadly weapon and making criminal threats. Remmers, who runs the Hart of Worship Community Church in Corona, was expected to be sentenced to two years in prison. The other two were given a year in home confinement, plus three years of probation. "It was a harebrained idea that got out of control and should've never gone that far," Jeter's attorney Rodney Nosratabadi told the Riverside Press-Enterprise after Monday's hearing. The brutal attacks occurred in March 2012, court document showed. cbs los angeles Darryll Jeter Jr., 30, Nicholas Craig, 24, and Remmers appear in a California court. Remmers sent the two younger men to scare the boy after he was allegedly acting up, court documents showed. After getting orders from Remmers to "scare" the boy, Craig and Jeter drove him to a remote area, where they lashed him with a belt and forced him to dig his own grave. The twisted pair then forced the boy to get in the hole as they tossed dirt on him from above, as though they were burying him alive, the documents said. Later, they returned to the home and the boy took a shower, while Craig and Jeter rubbed salt into the cuts on his back, authorities said. They also tied him down and sprayed mace in his face, causing his nose to bleed, the documents said. The boy later told police he thrashed so violently, he left the shower spattered with blood, the Times reported. Other members of the home reported seeing the blood the next day. The torment continued later that night at the Bible study session at Remmers' home, where the men clamped his nipples with pliers in front of about a dozen other men. Authorities said the sicko pastor claimed the boy needed to be disciplined for "not accepting responsibility for his actions." Corona Police Department Remmers is facing two years in prison. The other men were sentenced to a year in home confinement and three years of probation. The boy's mother had brought him to Remmers' church, which has 15 to 20 members. Corona is in Riverside County, about an hour east of Los Angeles. The teen hasn't been identified. By pleading guilty, the men avoided a kidnapping charge, which would have been the most serious against them. Remmers is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 26. Source: <http://www.nvdailynews.com/news/national/calif-pastor-2-plead-guilty-savage-torture-13-year-old-boy-article-1.1858546>

Proposed East Waco treatment center meets unanimous opposition Story Comments Image \(12\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra3 Linda Wilkerson-Long told Snugg Harbor officials the neighborhood around the site for a proposed residential treatment facility at 1916 Seley Ave. in East Waco had its share of problems already, and wasn't prepared to handle any more. She was one of about 60 community members who attended a midday meeting to show opposition to the proposed plan. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra10 Concerned residents, including Waco city manager Dale Fisseler, ask questions during the public hearing for a proposed 90-bed residential treatment center at 1916 Seley Ave. Tuesday. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra9 Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra11 La Vega superintendent Dr. Sharon M. Shields told Snuff Harbor officials her district was not prepared to handle an additional 90 students with special needs. Students at the proposed residential treatment center would attend La Vega schools. Buy this photo open house ra15 Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra6 Inside the former nursing home in East Waco. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra1 Elwayne Gilbert was one of about 60 community residents who attended Tuesday's public hearing. Like the others who attended, she did not support plans to put a residential treatment center in the former Pecan Ridge Assisted Living Center. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra14 Outside the former Pecan Ridge Assisted Living Center, a home for disabled adults located at 1916 Seley Ave. The facility was purchased for $275,000 and the new owners have filed for a license to open a 90-bed residential treatment facility for emotionally or mentally disturbed boys. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte open house ra4 Concerned residents were not satisfied with the answers they received to questions about how the residential treatment facility on Seley Avenue would be managed. Buy this photo open house ra13 Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte Inside the former nursing home, which once housed disabled adults. Buy this photo View all 12 images in gallery. Location 1916 Seley Ave. Waco TX Posted: Wednesday, July 9, 2014 12:01 am Proposed East Waco treatment center meets unanimous opposition By TOMMY WITHERSPOON twitherspoon@wacotrib.com Waco Tribune-Herald A proposed 90-bed residential treatment center in East Waco could cost La Vega schools an additional $1 million a year, plus force a building program to accommodate the extra students in the filled-to-capacity district. About 60 people who attended a four-hour public hearing Tuesday were unanimous in their opposition to an application filed by Snugg Harbor to operate a center for boys with severe mental, emotional or behavioral disorders. The public hearing, which took a negative tone toward Snugg Harbor owner Rosalyn Ruffin from the beginning, was required as part of the licensing process by the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services. Ruffin, a psychologist and marriage and family therapist from Katy, took a defensive posture from the opening minutes when members of the audience questioned the 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. hearing time, accusing Ruffin of selecting a day meeting when many are at work to discourage a larger dissenting crowd. The crowd, which consisted of area residents, Waco and La Vega school officials and Waco and Bellmead city and police officials, met in the cafeteria at the center at 1916 Seley Ave., which most recently was Pecan Ridge Assisted Living Center, a home for disabled adults. Ruffin hopes to turn the 27,148-square-foot facility into a residential treatment center for boys ages 8 to 17 that would be placed there through contracts with Child Protective Services. While the center is in East Waco, its potential clients would attend La Vega schools. As the hearing grew more contentious and audience members grew more frustrated with what many called Ruffin's "vague" answers, La Vega Superintendent Sharon Shields and Bellmead City Council member Kevin Wilson both asked Ruffin to have a second public hearing in the evening so those who had to work Tuesday can attend. Ruffin said only that she would "take the matter under advisement," drawing groans from the audience. After Shields asked Ruffin a second time to agree to another hearing, Shields invited Ruffin and Lea Long, a DFPS licensing inspector, to attend the La Vega school board meeting at 7 p.m. Tuesday to provide school officials with more detailed plans for the center and how it will affect the district. Ruffin said she also would take that invitation under advisement. Shields and Waco City Manager Dale Fisseler told Ruffin that they both were a little frustrated in their attempts to contact her to find out more information about her plans. Ruffin denied that she was dodging their calls, saying she had nothing to gain by alienating leaders from the community to which she plans to move. More students Shields said Ruffin's lack of specificity about her plans for her clients make it difficult for administrators to plan for the possible infusion of 90 more prospective students. She said most every school is over or approaching the state-mandated student-per-teacher ratio, and Snugg Harbor students, especially those with special needs, could force building projects, strain budgets and challenge the district to find specialized teachers for the troubled children. She said the school district currently has 11 students with some type of disorder and that adding dozens more would be "daunting." "We have difficulty dealing with students with these types of disorders," Shields said. "If they are our students, we will deal with them, but it will be a tremendous challenge for us and we are not getting the type of communication we need to prepare for these students." Ruffin, who dodged many of the most direct questions, allowed Catherine Wells, Snugg Harbor administrator, to answer most questions dealing with specific treatment and educational programs for the boys. Wells said the center will not accept sex offenders or those prone to violence or running away. Ruffin grew defensive and accused the crowd of cutting her off and not allowing her to answer their questions. At one point, she charged that the audience, filled with at least a dozen educators, does not care about children. "The problem is you are being vague," said Phil Bancale, a 39-year member of the La Vega school board. "You have lost our trust. Don't tell us we don't care about kids. We care about kids. We don't trust you." Randy Devorsky, La Vega school board president, said he lives 500 yards from the facility, which Ruffin bought in 2012 for $275,000. He complained that the grounds, which are surrounded on three sides by wooded areas, and the interior have not been kept up properly and likely are in violation of several codes. "This just ain't right, people," Devorsky said. "Somebody from the state of Texas should shut this down now. It should have never gotten this far." Waco City Council member Wilbert Austin pledged to see that the city deny Ruffin any special permits she may need from the city to operate the center. "I live 10 blocks from here and I don't want this here," Austin said. "You haven't done your homework. You won't answer our questions. You say you want us to work with you but you don't want to work with us. There is going to be a picket line around this place because you are not being fair to the people." Licensing process Long, who attended the hearing, said the DFPS licensing process could take two to three months longer. She said the overwhelming opposition to the center expressed at the hearing and the impact the center could have on the school system and the community will play significant roles in whether DFPS grants Snugg Harbor a license. Lacy Hollingsworth, a diagnostician at La Vega schools, and other educators challenged Ruffin's knowledge of state and federal guidelines regarding the education of students with special needs. "We are not attacking you, Ms. Ruffin," Hollingsworth said. "We are attacking your lack of a plan. Your plan does not have much depth. Your students are our students, and we will love them and care for them. But even a hypothetical plan is better than no plan at all." Ruffin applied for a state license for a smaller facility in Liberty County in southeast Texas two years ago. She said she withdrew her application after her proposal was met with hostility from the community. She said she is not getting the same kind of response in McLennan County. "The reaction in Liberty County was a slap in the face when it comes to humanity," she said. "I think this population here is more knowledgeable, more educated, more with it. They are able to express themselves better." After the hearing, Ruffin said she remains optimistic despite the opposition. "If the community would give us a chance, I think they will see that there is a need for this type of facility in this area and that we can become an asset to this community." Source: http://www.wacotrib.com/news/business/proposed-treatment-center-meets-unanimous-opposition/article_5e059ebe-a7ad-59cf-9733-fd4a7b6e9880.html

New study examines the foster care system in Arkansas Posted: Jul 08, 2014 4:53 PM PDT Updated: Jul 08, 2014 4:55 PM PDT By Julie Parr - bio | email
 TEXARKANA, Ark. - For a young child entering the foster care system can be a traumatic experience. Leaving their home, school, and familiar environment can cause a lot of stress for the child and new study exposes an alarming trend in the foster care system in Arkansas. Advocates now want to find better alternatives to meeting their needs. Mandy McLelland is not only new mom planning to one day foster children in Arkansas, she's also a county coordinator with "The Call," a statewide group that helps meet the needs of local children in foster care. "Anything that could cut down the time that children are going to spend in foster care, of course, we want to do that," said McLelland. According to the Arkansas Department of Human Services, at any given time there are roughly 4,000 children in the state's foster care system. Of those, between 500-700 have had parental rights terminated and are in need of adoption. But according to a recent study, there's a high rate of children entering foster care who may be better served in their own home. "We were surprised at how short of a time period the children stayed in the foster care system," said Jennifer Ferguson, Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families. In her report, statistics showed that nearly a third of the children who entered the system during a five year period left within 30 days. "More than likely if they're in there that short of a time period, they're not receiving a lot of services because it's hard to get services in place that quickly," said Ferguson. Half of all children entering foster care in Arkansas are under the age of six. State advocates want to come up with alternatives to keep short-term foster kids out of the system. Ferguson says the first step involves getting a waiver from the federal government to shift foster-care spending. "Currently, the way federal money is set up it really only helps pay for services when a child is in foster care," said Ferguson. Area four, which includes nine counties in the Texarkana region, recorded 23 percent of children exiting foster care within a week. It's the second largest percentage in the state. To help reduce the number of children entering foster care, the state is implementing new programs to identify needs of the child and families sooner. "So especially for some place like, area four, that has kids coming in for a very short period of time, that may be able to put more services in the home, so those kids are coming in and there will be funding for those services," said Ferguson. While the most common reason for removing a child from a home in Arkansas is neglect, the study showed the Texarkana region had a higher rate of children removed from the home due to physical or sexual abuse. McLelland says while there are cases where a child needs to be removed from home many children could benefit from staying at home with more services that meet their needs. "Parents could just need a little help, parenting classes, things like that. Get the wake up call they need, so they can have a nurturing home for their little ones," said McLelland. The Arkansas Advocates for Children and Families will soon release two more studies that'll look at reducing time spent in foster care and increasing stability of a child's placement in foster care. Source: <http://www.ktbs.com/story/25970718/new-study-examines-the-foster-care-system-in-arkansas>

Care provider charged with $164K in Medicare fraud By Tom Olsen on Jul 8, 2014 at 8:58 p.m. Email A Duluth adult foster care provider is accused of defrauding Medicaid of more than $164,000 by billing the state for professional services that were not performed or properly supervised. A Lisa Marie Huffman, 42, was charged recently by summons in State District Court in Duluth with seven counts of felony theft by false representation. The criminal complaint states that an investigation by the Minnesota Attorney General's Medicaid Fraud Control Unit determined that Huffman billed the state for services through two adult foster care companies she owned: Proactive Caring Accommodating Services (PCA North) and Peace of Mind Health Services. The companies provided in-home personal care services. Under state law, a "qualified professional," such as a registered nurse, licensed social worker, mental health professional or developmental disabilities specialist, must supervise all personal care assistant services in order for the services to be reimbursable by the state. State investigators began looking into the businesses in October 2011 after receiving a signed statement from a client stating that she had not received any supervisor visits from the company. A former personal care assistant also reported that she never had qualified professional supervision during three years with the agency. During the course of the investigation, several other clients and their families reported that they never received the necessary qualified professional visits, and complained about the level of care they received from the personal care assistants. Huffman spoke with investigators, telling them that she billed the state based on what her personal care assistants and qualified professionals documented on their timesheets, according to the criminal complaint. Investigators reviewed 3½ years' worth of timesheets and receipts, finding that documentation of the visits were lacking. Huffman claimed to investigators that most of her clients were not subject to qualified professional visits, according to the complaint. She stated that all required visits were made by two other employees. Investigators calculated what they determined to be overpayments for undocumented qualified professional visits from January 2012 to December 2012. The total amount is estimated at $164,234.46. A phone number listed for Huffman's home address was not in service Tuesday, and she could not be reached for comment. Court records indicate that she has not yet retained an attorney. Huffman is scheduled for an initial court appearance on Aug. 7. Source: <http://www.duluthnewstribune.com/content/care-provider-charged-164k-medicare-fraud>

Federal Monitor Raps State On Underfunding Community Services For DCF Kids Malloy's Budget Chief Defends Program Comments 0 Email Share 33
 By JOSH KOVNER, jkovner@courant.com The Hartford Courant 4:05 p.m. EDT, July 9, 2014 The latest federal oversight report on the Department of Children and Families criticizes the state for underfunding community programs at a time when large numbers of needy children are being diverted from institutions. As a result, "thousands of children and families" are lacking some essential services, including medical, behavioral, drug-abuse, educational and foster-care programs, according to the federal-court monitor's report for the first quarter of the year. DCF Commissioner Joette Katz has said she wants to rapidly reduce institutionalization from 21 percent of the children in the department's care, to 10 percent. Topics Medical Research Courts and the Judiciary Finance See more topics » X Justice System Conservation Budgets and Budgeting New York City The monitor, Raymond Mancuso, said he supports DCF's shift away from institutional care, but says the department may have to scale-back the initiative until the state increases funding for a range of smaller, neighborhood-based programs, foster care, and services in the family home. Purchase your Officially Licensed UConn National Championship Gear HERE! The court oversight stems from a class-action lawsuit on behalf of children who suffered neglect while in DCF care in the late 1980s. Mancuso notes that DCF's budget has been reduced by more than $75 million over the last three years, and said those cuts should have been reinvested. "A sizable portion of this funding is desperately needed to provide services" for the children diverted from group care, the report states. Benjamin Barnes, budget chief for Gov. Dannel P. Malloy, took issue with Mancuso's analysis. Barnes said that since 2009, "spending per case on community-based services ... has risen from $19,627 to $23,422, an increase of over 19 percent." Barnes said there have also been "significant increases in Medicaid funding for behavioral health services, which are not included in DCF's budget but are a key part of the community supports offered to the clients of that agency." "It is clear from our view of the budgets over the last few years that a sizeable portion of the savings from reduced institutional care has and continues to be used to augment community supports," Barnes said. Ira Lustbader, one of the lawyers representing the children in the class-action case, said the monitor's report "starkly shows that key resource problems threaten to overwhelm (DCF) and erode the progress that's been made with (Katz) at the helm." Lustbader, associate director of Children's Rights in New York City, said the federal court order requires that the state "provide the funding and resources necessary to fully implement the reform plan." In his report to the federal court, Mancuso said the availability of services in the community "has not kept pace" with the number of children being diverted or released from the residential campuses. "Consideration of tempering further reductions in (institutional) care should be considered until sufficient levels of community-based services are available," he said. Internally, Mancuso said Katz has made significant reforms, but the department's social workers are struggling with caseloads that are too high – even as the number of new abuse reports coming into the agency's hotline "have spiked considerably" since October 2013. The Courant reported on June 29 that child maltreatment deaths have surged in the last 18 months. At least 22 children died of abuse or neglect from Jan. 1, 2013, through June, and DCF had open cases with 16 of those families. Mancuso said that Katz's emphasis on keeping kids out of institutions and in foster care or at home with their biological parents should be praised. But this approach takes a lot of effort and oversight by DCF social workers and supervisors, who are strapped. As a result, the quality of abuse and neglect investigations, the management of cases involving needy families, and the coordination of care among multiple agencies has "regressed," Mancuso said. He noted that DCF has been authorized to hire 81 new employees, but he said more are needed given the complex caseloads. "At the time of the drafting of this report, over 200 social workers have caseloads that are 100 to 150 percent over existing standards, and 77 of those workers have exceeded 100 percent for over 30 days," Mancuso reported. Mancuso sampled 54 case files for the first-quarter 2014 report and found that only 51.9 percent of them had adequate case plans for the children and families receiving services. He said the standard is 90 percent. Mancuso said that in those 54 cases, DCF met "all of the needs" of the children and families involved 57.4 percent of the time -- but the standard is 80 percent. "Insufficient staffing resources and a failure to sufficiently reinvest money saved by the reduction in (institutional care) are a major impediment to improving the department's efforts on these critical measures," Mancuso said. He said that while more relatives are becoming foster parents to needy children, there still exists a severe shortage of foster families overall in Connecticut. Source: http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-dcf-community-funding-0710-20140709.0.6310873_story

Work to keep children safely at home Robert Luce 12:08 a.m. EDT July 9, 2014 Tom and Betty Halpin of Essex Junction speak as a committee of state legislators takes testimony on the Department of Children and Families in Winooski on June 5 in the wake of the death of two children under DCF supervision. The Halpins made the point that child welfare, rather than reunification with a biological parent, should be the DCF's primary concern. (Photo: GLENN RUSSELL/FREE PRESS) CONNECT TWEETLINKEDINCOMMENTEMAILMORE The recent deaths of two child abuse victims sadden and anger all of us. Importantly, it must move us to take action to protect other children from a similar tragic fate. Unfortunately, there is a risk that misdirected action could cause more harm than help for Vermont children. Vermont families, especially families in poverty, face enormous challenges. Untreated substance abuse, homelessness, lack of affordable housing and day care, lack of job training and economic opportunity, and mental health challenges leave many children "on the margin of care." The vast majority of these children are not at risk of physical abuse, but live in challenged families where the risk is child neglect. Recent research from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology provides powerful evidence that children on the margin of care have better long-term outcomes if they are left in their families rather than removed. Identifying and removing children who are being physically abused is critical. While removing children whose care is considered "neglectful" may be well-intended, the evidence shows that it is often more harmful than helpful to the long term interest of the children (and wastes precious public resources). Vermont already removes children from their families at a much higher rate than any of our neighboring states. Four out of five of these children are removed for "neglect" not "physical abuse." We must remember what we removing them to. The New York Times recently provided a sobering description of our nation's foster care system in its review of Cris Beam's new book "To the End of June." As Beam shows, the current foster care system by and large does not help the children who experience it. The MIT research and the current state of our foster care system support that children at risk of neglect are not best served by removal. How can our system account for this reality while protecting those children who are a risk of physical abuse? An effective solution must involve better identification of children at risk of abuse as distinguished from neglect. For children at risk of neglect we must increase our efforts to strengthen their families, not take them apart. A recent national review of children in foster care recommended that Vermont find new front-end strategies for strengthening families to keep children safely at home. There is no silver bullet, but one evidence-based solution is to increase the engagement with families in a sincere effort to keep them intact. Families who trust that there are people who are trying to help them stay together rather than break them up are more likely to be candid about their circumstances — which may also help identify those children who may be at risk of abuse. Creating this kind of trust is best addressed not by DCF workers in isolation and with powers to remove the children, but by family advocacy and integration of other community based public and private services that meet the needs of the families. Vermont will only become a better place for children if we help families be successful so children can safely live at home. There is a growing cadre of community based approaches that are showing positive outcomes. Experience has shown that removing legal barriers, trusting engagement with parents and old fashion social work are a successful formula to reduce the risk of neglect. To keep our children physically and emotionally safe we must first make a clear distinction between child abuse and child neglect. Let the recent deaths be a call to action; however let us act effectively, not counter-productively. Robert Luce, of Colchester, is a trial lawyer at Downs Rachlin Martin and an advisor to Vermont Parent Representation Center Inc. Source: <http://www.burlingtonfreepress.com/story/opinion/comment-debate/2014/07/09/work-keep-children-safely-home/12384641/>

Democratic Party's Divide On Education Policy Gets Worse Political pundits who try to tamp down talk of divisions within the Democratic Party must not be paying any attention to education policy. For quite some time, close observers of the nation's education policy have been calling attention to the fault lines between education progressives in the Democratic Party and Third Way-style centrists, such as Secretary of Education Arne Duncan and Democrats for Education Reform, who lean toward a market-based, econometric philosophy for public education governance. As Furman University education professor Paul Thomas recently wrote for Alternet, "While the Obama administration has cultivated the appearance of hope and change, its education policies are essentially slightly revised or greatly intensified versions of accountability reform begun under Ronald Reagan." But the Democratic Party's divergence from real progressive values for governing our schools mostly went unnoticed in major media outlets until recently when a few light bulbs went off among political observers. Writing for Slate, Matt Yglesias noticed, "Education reform, not 'populism' divides Democrats." Then, Connor Williams of the New America Foundation saw the light and explained for The New Republic, "In 2016, Democrats have good reason to run against Obama's education record." Now, Jonathan Chait has penned a piece for New York Magazine, "Teachers Unions Turn Against Democrats," in which he postulates that a "backlash" to President Obama's education policies, energized by education historian Diane Ravitch, could lead to an alliance between teachers unions and, gulp, Republicans. For sure, the divide on education policy within the Democratic Party has grown into a Rubicon, and now Democratic candidates and their operatives and supporters need to decide which side makes the most sense to ally with. The President's Great Day Goes Sour The divisions over education policy were all too apparent recently when President Obama joined Secretary Duncan to introduce an ambitious new plan to place more highly qualified teachers in front of students who need those teachers the most. As education reporter Lyndsey Layton of The Washington Post wrote, "The Education Department is directing every state and the District to devise a plan by April 2015 to get more good teachers into their high-poverty schools." "This is a really important exercise for the nation to undertake," Secretary Duncan said. The White House had already lined up Beltway groups such as The Education Trust to ballyhoo the effort. There would be a press gathering, of course. And to highlight the initiative, Duncan and the president had scheduled lunch with a group of teachers. A grand day for sure. But at the photo-op luncheon, it seemed the teachers hadn't gotten the memo. Instead of gabbing about the new teacher equity plan, they apparently talked mostly about "frustration at the lack of resources at their schools and the regularly changing demands of their jobs," according to Layton. McClatchy reported the conversation similarly, referring to a North Carolina teacher in attendance who, "Told Duncan that teachers are frustrated because they're being asked 'to do something great with minimal resources.'" And when reporters gathered, the question that was top of mind was not about the President's new initiative at all. Instead, journalists wanted to know how the administration felt about the nation's largest teachers' union calling for Secretary Duncan's resignation. Delegates of the National Education Association, meeting in Denver at their annual convention, had just passed a resolution citing the teachers' objections to the "department's failed education agenda" and calling for Duncan to resign. Duncan had initially "brushed off," according to a report from Politico, the NEA resolution. But the issue is undoubtedly nagging him. As education journalist Valerie Strauss of The Washington Post wrote, "Duncan can try to downplay the vote ... But the NEA vote is a new sign of growing disenchantment with Duncan's policies from the unions and well beyond them, as parents, principals, superintendents and others protest the Duncan agenda." How did the frustrations felt by everyday teachers and the growing resentment their organizations have with Secretary Duncan rule the day? Frustration Rules The Day The President's desire to see the nation's more experienced and educated teachers distributed in schools is a important for sure. Schools that serve poor, minority kids tend not to get the ones with the deepest resumes. As a recent article from The Huffington Post explained The more affluent the district, the more likely teachers are to have received a master's degree or higher. Affluent districts tend to employ teachers with more experience. The more white the school, the more likely teachers are to be certified in the subjects they teach. That news outlet's education reporter Joy Resmovits wrote in her report on the Obama initiative, "Students in high-poverty schools, a national survey has shown, are twice as likely to have their most important classes taught by teachers without proper certification. And federal data shows that minority students' teachers on average have less experience than the teachers of their wealthier peers." What's interesting though is that, as The Post's Layton pointed out, the President's initiative "doesn't address the thorny problem of how to identify an effective teacher." That challenge has been relegated to new teacher evaluation systems that Secretary Duncan has advocated for but teachers abhor. Those evaluations rely, to varying extents, on how students score on standardized tests. As education historian Diane Ravitch asked when looking over the President's new teacher equity plan, "Will the Obama administration ever figure out that test scores reflect socioeconomic conditions more than teachers? They might look at research or even the recent report of the American Statistical Association, which attributed 1-14% of score variation to teachers." Further, although the new teacher equity plan enforces requirements for states to put experienced and highly qualified teachers in schools serving high numbers of poor and minority students, the Obama administration has steered millions of federal dollars to Teach For America. TFA is an organization that places new teacher recruits from elite colleges and universities into some of the poorest schools in America — after only five weeks of training. And Secretary Duncan and his supporters claim they want to see more experienced, better educated teachers serving in schools serving poor, black and brown kids. Yet they hail actions, like the recent legal ruling in the Vergara v California case, that undermine the job security of more experienced teachers. If the President and his supporters really wanted to do more to help ensure more of the nation's best teachers ended up in front of students who need them the most, they would have embraced guidelines put forth by the Opportunity to Learn campaign last year. OTL's plan, Excellent Teachers For Each And Every Child: A Guide for State Policy, addressed the many factors that influence teaching quality and equitable distribution, such as learning conditions, school environment, and instructional resources. [Disclosure: OTL is a partner of the Education Opportunity Network and the Campaign for America's Future.] Yet instead, Duncan has continued to blaze an education policy path that talks out of both sides of its mouth – pronouncing great beliefs in the value of experienced teachers but doing everything possible to undermine them with unfair evaluations, competition from less-credentialed recruits, and attacks on their job protections. The frustrations teachers feel from these policies – while they grapple with the budget cuts imposed by conservative state governments – have been building for some time. And now they're boiling over. Should Democrats care? Democrats Will Have To Choose The list of education related legislation pending in Congress is not extensive and may not make any headway in a blocked up, unproductive House and Senate. So now the White House is relying on executive actions, such as its teacher equity initiative, to circumvent congressional gridlock. But it's hard to believe that executive actions will have much effect on the ground when the people on the ground, in this case classroom teachers, are not at all supportive. The fact of the matter is that this presidential administration and some of its most ardent backers have never really gotten education at all. Amy Dean asked in a recent piece for Truth Out, "Why does the Obama administration keep getting it wrong on education policy?" In her interview with Leo Casey of the American Federation of Teachers, she asked, "The priorities of the Obama administration's Department of Education seem little changed from the failures of the Bush administration ... What sort of policies should we be pushing for?" In response, Casey outlined a more positive, more progressive way forward, "We need to look at a different way to do accountability that would not be focused on standardized tests, but that would really look at good measures of learning. It would focus not on punishing and negative sanctions, but on improving what's going on in schools and classrooms. All of that is eminently doable on a national level and with a Democratic administration that is not so enthralled to the market model of reform." As my colleague Robert Borosage has argued, the divisions on economic policy among Democrats are "fundamental ... grounded on very different perspectives that lead in significantly different directions." In the education arena, those fundamental differences have been stewing in the pot for a long time. What teachers and their unions have done now is to finally serve them up to the table. Now, it's mostly a matter of seeing who will be the first Democrats to understand those differences and use them as wedge issues to influence the increasingly angry electorate. And when the November election looms on the horizon, and you're a candidate looking for volunteers to knock on doors and make phone calls, organizations like The Education Trust are nowhere to be found. Your local teachers on the other hand? Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/democratic-partys-divide-on-education-policy-gets-worse/>

Waking Up To Our Broken Education Policies Who could ever forget comedian Jon Stewart's commentary in early 2009 on how financial reporters totally botched reporting of the Great Recession. Stewart mocked journalists at CNBC for missing all the warning signs of the over-valued housing market and their failure to question wild speculation on sub-prime mortgage debt. In one famous clip, Stewart said financial reporters' astonished reaction to the economic calamity was like a journalist from The Weather Channel reporting at the scene of a tropical storm and wondering why he was getting rained on. Stewart's commentary about financial reporting back then would ring true today in describing how journalists are responding to recent fights over American education policy. Indeed, those in prominent news outlets tempted to jump into the fray of the nation's education debate should be aware they are late to the scene and way behind the narrative proceeding recent events. Trying To Catching Up Opinionators have been sleeping through a veritable rock concert of dissent over current education policies and are now suddenly awakening to declare the band just started and, "Boy, is it loud." "Teachers Turn On Obama," the headline blared from Beltway news source The Hill. "Teachers unions have turned on Secretary of Education Arne Duncan and the Obama administration," the story went, "creating a major divide in the Democratic Party coalition." The reporter, Peter Sullivan, seemed to believe that the Obama administration and public school advocates had been copacetic until the nation's largest teachers' union, the National Education Association, recently voted in favor of demanding that Secretary Duncan resign. As proof, he quoted laudatory comments from former District of Columbia education Chancellor Michelle Rhee praising "the work Duncan and Obama have done," and hailing a report from the National Council on Teacher Quality that found that because of federal pressures, 20 states now "require student growth to be the main factor in teacher evaluations, up from just four states in 2009." All these changes "progressed with little fanfare," Sullivan declared. But suddenly now, teachers unions and Democrats are "fiercest sparring partners." Another headline, "Teachers Unions Turn Against Democrats," came from New York Magazine. Jonathan Chait warned that teachers "are growing increasingly obstinate in their opposition of the sorts of accountability and pressure that Obama has helped bring upon them." The inspiration for their growing disenchantment: education historian Diane Ravitch. Ravitch, Chait insisted, "Has depicted education reform as a plot by corporate elites to privatize schools and destroy unions." Her "militance" is turning leaders of the nation's largest teachers' unions – the National Education Association and the American Federation of Teachers – into vehement opponents of what Chait appeared to endorse: opening more charter schools, extending school days, curtailing teachers' job protections, and evaluating teachers by students' test scores. Of course Chait didn't bother to explain why these policies are supposedly so good for education – just that anyone disagreeing with them is a "militant." An article in The New York Times on the recent NEA vote for Duncan's resignation quoted a representative of Democrats for Education Reform who contended "the Duncan vote" made the teachers look "like the lunatic fringe." One wonders where these people have been. Dissatisfaction with Duncan and the President's education policies isn't anything "new" at all. The conflict didn't start with Diane Ravitch, although she is certainly a prominent voice. And recent actions by teachers' unions are not as much a sudden lurch toward a more radical position as they are a reflection of frustration and resentment that's been building in communities, in the teaching ranks, and beyond, around the country. Welcome To The Education Spring For years, collectivist actions in protest of public school policy have been scaling up from isolated protests to a nationwide movement of unified resistance. The movement is widespread among teachers, students, and parents. From the beginning, the movement was grassroots driven and demanding of changes in the way our schools are being run. From boycotts against standardized testing among teachers in Seattle, to ongoing protests among principals in New York state against new teacher evaluations, to objections to over-testing of students in Texas, the movement is diverse and outspoken. From all corners of the country, students as young as eight years old are organizing and taking part in a variety of actions including zombie marches, prominent, headline-earning protests to school closures, and social media actions to whip up student resentment to the budget cuts and unfair policies slamming teachers and harming education programs. Students in Denver, Philadelphia, Providence, Rhode Island, Portland, Oregon, and elsewhere have formed student unions that have developed attention-getting tactics, which have spread to a national scale. Disenchantment with education policies has pushed protestors into the streets of Newark, Philadelphia, and Bridgeport, Connecticut. And discontent isn't limited to communities of the urban poor and people of color, as evidenced by news reports from towns and cities in Western New York – populated with mostly white, middle-class parents. In Pennsylvania, teachers, parents, and public school activists have staged multiple actions (here, here, and here) to protest severe budget cuts that have eliminated programs and laid off teachers. At the state capital of North Carolina, boisterous "Moral Monday" demonstrations against the state's conservative government have made public education funding part of a rallying cry for a more progressive agenda in that state. Over-reliance on standardized tests, a fetish of the Obama administration, continues to roil opposition across the nation. In Connecticut, resistance to the state tests is growing so rapidly that "the state Department of Education released guidelines telling school districts just how to deal with parents who want to opt out." In Pittsburgh, hundreds of Pennsylvania parents who had opted their children out of state tests caught the attention of a local news outlet that interviewed one of the mothers leading the fight. In Colorado, "a growing cacophony of assessment protests" has prompted public school officials to release new guidelines for opting out of tests because of so many "teachers, parents, school leaders and school boards have increasingly raised questions over the merit and amount of testing." On the west coast, anticipating the rising test rebellion in Washington, the state's largest teachers' union just "passed a motion to support parents and students who opt out of statewide standardized tests." And somehow journalists have missed all this? Why Now? The more interesting question for sure is not whether there is widespread discontent with the Obama administration's education policies but why is it reaching a crescendo now. Commenting on the recent moves by both unions, NEA and the American Federation of Teachers, to openly censure Arne Duncan, AFT President Randi Weingarten told reporters and bloggers at the recent AFT annual convention that the Secretary's positive response to a recent court case overturning teachers' long-standing job protections in California had been "the straw that broke the camel's back." The language of that judicial ruling, Vergara v California, was "so shocking ... and extreme," Weingarten stated, that when Duncan reacted positively to the decision, "it caused people to question what the issues are." Among those "issues," are recent "50 year anniversary recognitions of past court decisions that were about righting the wrongs of inequity," Weingarten elaborated, referring to the recent commemoration of the Brown v Board decision and other actions that enforced civil rights and racial integration of public schools. "But now federal policies have gone so far afield of that," Weingarten stated. Instead, current policies emphasize "accountability" of teachers and schools to such an extent they ignore the issues of "adequate and equitable supports for our schools." That's the story journalists who haven't been following education don't get. Behind nearly every protest to the status quo education policies are common grievances about resource deprivation, inequity, and widespread feeling that ordinary Americans no longer control their children's and community's education destinies. Despite how the particulars of the debate pivot to issues about content standards, to assessment results, to school choice, to teacher tenure, grievances with inadequate and inequitable funding and lack of democratic control are what's driving the debate – not teachers' unions, Diane Ravitch, or the inner dynamics of the Democratic Party. Reporters and pundits who would prefer not to see their write-ups about the education debate parodied in public had better get that. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/waking-up-to-our-broken-education-policies/>

Education 'Reform' Loses The Netroots Every year Netroots Nation is arguably the most important annual event in the progressive community and a telling barometer of what is on the minds of, as Howard Dean put it, "the Democratic wing of the Democratic Party." Last week's meeting was no exception. Mainstream coverage of that event has been focused exclusively on the reception Senator Elizabeth Warren got, and it was ecstatic for sure. The "clarity" of her message, as Esquire's Charles Pierce put it, that the economic trajectory of most Americans "is rigged" – and not in our favor – rang true with the attendees and they shouted their approvals. When she urged the crowd, "We can whimper. We can whine. Or we can fight back," it was clear those in attendance preferred door number three. But despite the enthusiasm for Warren's message, the inevitability of a Hillary Clinton presidential nomination permeated the air. As my friend and colleague Richard Eskow wrote, "A more appropriate slogan for the event, at least for some attendees, might have been 'I'm resigned to Hillary.'" While acknowledging that Warren's presence "had an extraordinary impact on the convention," Eskow pointed to "other opportunities" where progressives are finding political space and exploiting it for real, positive change. "These seem like promising alternative channels for progressive energy," he stated. For those whose white-hot enthusiasm for presidential politics may be dampened by the inevitability of a Hillary candidacy, there may be no more promising alternative channel than the raging fight for public education. The education related conversations at the meeting were numerous and animated – from demands for early childhood education, to anger at President Obama's K-12 policies, to outcries against the exorbitant costs of higher education and ballooning college debt levels. This hasn't always been the case at Netroots Nation. We've Come A Long Way The first Netroots Nation I attended, Pittsburgh in 2009, was mostly a celebration of the Obama victory the previous year. But as events rolled out the rest of that year and into 2010, it became painfully obvious that the new White House would maintain – actually even increase – a disastrous policy agenda carried over from the George W. Bush administration for the nation's public schools. Public schools activists looked to Netroots Nation as a venue where progressives could push back. We had our work cut out for us. As I wrote on the blogsite OpenLeft back in 2010, the Netroots Nation event seemed "generally in denial about issues of race and class that are at the heart of" problems in public schools. Instead, all the conversation was about "reform." And teachers' unions fought for attention on the agenda by addressing the worsening conditions for the nation's public school teachers as a "labor issue." "Lots of lip service was paid to 'saving teachers' jobs,'" I recalled. But "not much of anything on the agenda addressed the destructive education policies of the Obama administration." News that Michelle Rhee, the public school chancellor in Washington, DC that year, had fired another 241 teachers was completely overlooked in any of the panels and speeches. Instead, as I reported, "As the news broke, an attendee I was having coffee with was absolutely gleeful. 'There are too many bad teachers,' she explained to me while coolly scrolling through the headlines on her BlackBerry, 'And they're never made accountable for anything.'" Those around nodded in agreement. Certainly no one of any prominence at the meeting pointed out the blatant unfairness of the Obama administration's push to evaluate teachers on the basis of students' scores on standardized tests. And during the conference's education caucus, when National Education Association vice president Lilly Eskelsen warned of the rapidly expanding charter school industry that was spreading corporate influence and privatization of public schools, attendees defended "wonderful charter schools." A Turning Point At Netroots The following year, at Netroots Nation 2011 in Las Vegas, I led a panel that included Eskelsen, U.S. Representative Judy Chu (D-Calif.), Sabrina Stevens (who now leads Integrity in Education), and Kevin Welner, an education professor from the University of Colorado, Boulder and co-director of the National Education Policy Center. The title of that panel was "Engaging Progressives in the Fight for Public Education," and we warned attendees of the dangers of current education policies and urged attendees to get involved in the growing movement to take back our public schools. Both Eskelsen and Chu cited a Stanford study of charter schools nationwide that found most charter schools fail to outperform comparable neighborhood schools. And they decried the application of business models to education because business is designed to create winners and losers and stratify opportunities. Stevens spoke eloquently and passionately of her experience teaching in a Denver public school where a reform agenda imposed by the state had stifled teachers' practice, turned teaching into rote test-prep, and sapped the joy of learning from the students. At one point during the session, Welner asked if there was anyone in the audience from the Center for American Progress. Two attendees raised their hands, which prompted Welner to chide, "Your organization is as bad as the American Enterprise Institute on education," noting the groups that generally represent the range of the political spectrum – from left-leaning CAP to ardent right wing AEI – actively colluded in the campaign for corporate education reform. Both CAP staffers promptly walked out. Based on what transpired in 2014, it's now clear they – and the agenda masquerading as "education reform" – never really came back. A High Mark For Dissent In the ensuing two years, those fighting against corporate take-over of public education kept their cause on the Netroots Nation agenda, building to a crescendo in 2014. This year, the opening keynote included a speech from now president of the NEA (and remarried) Lily Eskelsen Garcia who warned of the growing dangers of privatizing the nation's public schools and the harmful education malpractice that arises from current obsessions with standardized tests. Then Rev. William Barber III, leader of the Forward Together movement in North Carolina, electrified the crowd with an address that included support for public education in a moral vision for America. Six panels on education topics – ranging from curriculum standards, to student suspensions, to student loan debt, to reclaiming the promise of public schools – presented a unified front against current "reform" policies and for a vision of equity and excellence in public education. Indeed, the dialogue at the meeting made clear the term "education reform" has become a pejorative in the progressive community. Getting Education Policy Above The "Snake Line" As Eskow wrote, "the emotional high point" of this year's conference was unquestionably Barber's speech exhorting the crowd to "get our policies above the snake line." The "snake line," Barber explained, marked a line in mountainous territory above which dangerous reptiles cannot live and where the "cold-blooded" can't survive. Indeed, America's cold-blooded education policies can no longer survive above the bright line of progressive values. Netroots Nation showed we're taking education policy to higher ground. As Barber urged us to do, we've turned to each other and declared, "We're on our way." Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/education-reform-loses-the-netroots/>

South Euclid group home resident charged with sexually assaulting fellow resident A resident of Grand Manner group home on Cedar Road in South Euclid is accused of sexually assaulting a fellow resident. (Adam Ferrise, NEOMG) Print By Adam Ferrise, Northeast Ohio Media Group The Plain Dealer Email the author | Follow on Twitter on July 09, 2014 at 4:28 PM, updated July 09, 2014 at 6:33 PM SOUTH EUCLID, Ohio — A resident of a group home for people with developmental disabilities is accused of sexually assaulting a fellow resident. Anthony D. Anderson, 25, is jailed on $50,000 bond after being charged with first-degree felony rape in South Euclid Municipal Court. He entered no plea Monday at his initial court appearance. Anderson is scheduled for a preliminary hearing July 17. Anderson's attorney, Tyresha Brown-O'Neal, did not immediately return a message seeking comment. The Cuyahoga County Board of Developmental Disabilities is also conducting an independent investigation of the incident, a spokeswoman said. A police report describes Anderson as a higher-functioning resident of Grand Manner, a group home located in a nondescript duplex on Cedar Road near South Belvoir Boulevard. A 25-year-old male resident told investigators that he was using the bathroom on July 1 when Anderson entered the room. Anderson turned off the light and sexually assaulted the man, according to police reports. The man told Anderson to stop several times, but Anderson persisted in the assault, police reports say. Anderson then stopped and went to his bedroom. The man told police he went to his bedroom and tried to sleep. The next day he notified a group home employee who took him to Hillcrest Hospital where a rape kit was taken, according to reports. The man told investigators that he never consented to sexual contact. The employee told police they already made plans to relocate the man to a different group home. The man is unable to read or write, according to police. The sexual assault nurse examiner told police the rape kit revealed no evidence, but that was not uncommon or inconsistent with the man's account of the attack, police said. Grand Manner operates at least one Cuyahoga County-contracted group homes. Lula Holt Robertson, the spokesperson for the county's Board of Developmental Disabilities, said the South Euclid home is not a county-affiliated group home. Holt Robertson said the county does investigate all complaints of incidents involving group homes housing the developmentally disabled, including the reported South Euclid sexual assault. Two county investigators are assisting police in their investigation, Holt Robertson said. If investigators substantiate the claims they will mandate a "plan of correction" for the Grand Manner aimed to prevent a similar incident. Holt Robertson said cases like this are rare. "People with developmental disabilities are just like everyone else," Holt Robertson said. "They can have the same problems as everyone else and have the same difficulties as everyone else. I wouldn't want anyone to think that a person with developmental disabilities is more prone to be in a difficult situation, though." Gary Toth, executive of Grand Manner and building owner, did not immediately respond to a message. Source: http://www.cleveland.com/metro/index.ssf/2014/07/south_euclid_group_home_reside.html

EDITORIAL: East Waco community rates answers, not attitude, on treatment center idea Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Thursday, July 10, 2014 12:01 am | Updated: 1:08 am, Thu Jul 10, 2014. EDITORIAL: East Waco community rates answers, not attitude, on treatment center idea Anybody trying to open a residential treatment center for boys with severe mental, emotional and behavioral problems probably has a heart of gold, but psychologist and family therapist Rosalyn Ruffin, who's trying to do just that in East Waco, sure didn't show much of it during Tuesday's four-hour public hearing. In the face of unanimous concern about the idea from residents and community leaders, she displayed what we'd call "the best defense is a good offense" approach. And, boy, did many of the 60 folks attending the hearing get offended. We'd hoped for more transparency about the project when Trib staffer Tommy Witherspoon interviewed Ruffin a week ago by phone, inquiring about her Houston-area company, Snugg Harbor, and its proposal to turn a vacant, 27,148-square-foot nursing home at 1916 Seley Ave. into a 90-bed residential treatment center for disturbed boys. Her assurance of answers at a public hearing instead yielded something else confrontational in tone. Residents witnessed evasive answers, an obvious lack of preparation, even haughtiness. The mood turned hostile and stayed so for all four hours. Even city and school officials voiced frustration, including La Vega ISD Superintendent Sharon Shields, who only learned of the company's application for a state license days earlier. The facility reportedly could cost La Vega ISD an additional $1 million a year and force a building program to house extra students in the already filled-to-capacity district. Far be it from us to advise a psychologist, but a project of this scope would seem to warrant a more conciliatory and forthcoming approach. Let's hope Ruffin tries a new tack, assuming she even meets with La Vega ISD leaders Tuesday. Source: http://www.wacotrib.com/opinion/editorials/editorial-east-waco-community-rates-answers-not-attitude-on-treatment/article_c1a5e179-7c5d-5b27-9c63-093866c7aa4a.html

Foster mom bonds out of jail after child left in car at Publix | www.wftv.com Foster mom bonds out of jail after child left in car at Publix 9 748 20 973 Related Raw: Foster mom says leaving child was a 'mistake' View Larger Monique Williams Sponsored Links FL Resident Special \$9.99 @ Gatorland! Price/Payment in 10 mins @ David Maus Toyota! Bathroom Emergencies Stink! Call Brownies.com! APOPKA, Fla. — A foster care parent bonded out of the Orange County Jail Friday morning after police said she left a young child in a car at a Publix grocery store on Thursday. Apopka police said Monique Williams, 53, left the 15-month-old boy unattended in her vehicle for approximately 20 minutes in the parking lot of the Publix on Rock Springs Road. "A passerby noticed the child in the car," said Capt. Randy Fernandez with Apopka police. Investigators said the car was not running and the windows were up. Williams was taken to the Orange County Jail after being questioned at Apopka police headquarters. "Why did you leave a child in the car?" Channel 9 reporter Julie Salomone asked. "It was a mistake," Williams said as she was being taken to a waiting patrol car. "He was very sick and just a mistake was made that's all." The foster mother told police the child had an eye infection. Investigators believe it was about 90 degrees inside the car. "The kid was wet from sweat and the medics were called to check on the child," said Fernandez. Williams was charged with child neglect and fulfilled a $1,000 bond Friday morning. Officials said the boy has been returned to the care of the Florida Department of Children and Families. Source: <http://www.wftv.com/news/news/local/foster-care-mom-arrested-charged-leaving-child-car/ngc5d/>

Source: www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/politics/bs-md-fosterdeath-reaction-20140711.0.7481508_story baltimoresun.com State lawmakers call for committee probe of group home death 'My first reaction is heartbreak,' state senator says By Jeff Barker and Erin Cox, The Baltimore Sun 9:03 PM EDT, July 11, 2014 Advertisement Two Maryland lawmakers said Friday they will ask a state Senate committee to explore the death of a 10-year-old disabled foster child who was in the care of a group home. Another state senator who advocates for people with disabilities said the boy's death at the Laurel-area group home pointed to a shortage of funding and resources to serve vulnerable people in Maryland. The Baltimore Sun reported Thursday that the boy died as the state was in the process of shutting down the home amid concern about staffing problems at the center. "My first reaction is heartbreak," said state Sen. Ed Reilly, an Anne Arundel County Republican who sits on the Education, Health and Environmental Affairs Committee, which oversees foster care. "We entrust the most vulnerable children to these facilities, and we have high expectations that they will do no harm." Reilly said he would review the facts of the case but plans to ask his committee to do a full investigation into what went wrong. Another committee member, Democratic Sen. Karen Montgomery of Montgomery County, said, "I would call for hearings, but it would be conditional on a follow-up that whatever is discovered is acted upon." Sen. Joan Carter Conway, a Baltimore Democrat who chairs the committee, said the issues surrounding the death appear to be significant enough for her panel to conduct a review. The boy, Damaud Martin, died July 2 at the home operated by LifeLine Inc., a state contractor that provides care for disabled children. It recently had been warned it would lose its license for having inadequate staff to meet the "health and safety needs of each child" and other issues, according to state Health Secretary Dr. Joshua M. Sharfstein. State Sen. Thomas M. Middleton, who is known for his advocacy for people with disabilities, defended state officials for trying to close the center. He said it is challenging to move swiftly when so few providers are available to serve the disability community. "The state was on the right track. They cited this company for failure to perform," said Middleton, a Charles County Democrat. "But if you're going to shut that place down, you need somewhere to put the kids." And although Middleton was not familiar with the specific circumstances at LifeLine, he said that in general the state has had a series of problems managing the needs of the disabled. "There's myriad problems that could have gone into this: insufficient funding, insufficient foster homes, not paying providers enough." LifeLine's chief executive, Theresa Martin, wrote to state officials June 5 that she intended to close her company's program for children Sept. 30 because state payments did not cover the costs of care. "The care provided the children cannot be simply dollars and cents, yet without adequate funding it is impossible to provide the quality level of service they deserve," she wrote. She could not be reached Friday for further comment. In September, the Board of Public Works approved the state's contract with LifeLine without discussion. A spokeswoman for Gov. Martin O'Malley said Friday she did not have any comment while the investigation continues, and referred questions to the two state agencies that oversaw the home where the boy died. Montgomery said she has an autistic, adult son in a group home and is attuned to the critical need for adequate staffing not only at the homes, but at the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene so that it can perform oversight. "We need to provide DHMH with enough money to have frequent inspections," she said. jebarker@baltsun.com ecox@baltsun.com Copyright © 2014, The Baltimore Sun

12-year-old kept prisoner in basement said stepmom threatened to make him 'disappear' Print By Jack Sherzer | Special to PennLive The Patriot-News on July 12, 2014 at 8:00 PM, updated July 12, 2014 at 8:04 PM Reddit Email A 12-year-old boy who was the subject of an intense 11-day manhunt by authorities — and who was found in basement of the family's Detroit home as his father was on national TV — says his stepmom kept him trapped and warned him to stay quiet, according to a court filing. A recent petition filed in juvenile court details abuse accusations made by the boy against his father, Charlie Bothuell IV, and his stepmother, Monique Dillard-Bothuell, ABC News reports. According to the ABC report: This photo provided by the Detroit Police Department shows Charlie Bothuell V, 12, of Detroit, who has been missing since June 14. Bothuell has been found alive in his father's basement. Detroit police spokesman Sgt. Mike Woody says officers were serving a search warrant at the home near downtown, on Wednesday, June 25, 2014, when they stumbled upon Bothuell. AP Photo/Courtesy Detroit Police Department Charlie Bothuell V, 12, told the court that he had been disciplined with a PVC pipe, sometime to the point that he was too sore to sit or walk, and has been abused by his father "for the entire two years he has resided" with him, the document states. It also said Charlie was found "shivering and hungry." Police found the boy in the family's basement June 25 — as his father was appearing on HLN's "Nancy Grace Show" to plead for help, reports sister news site MLive.com. MLive.com also reports the court petition describes punishing workouts the boy was forced to do: Charlie was forced to wake up at 5 a.m. each morning and complete an intense workout that included 100 pushups, 200 situps, 100 jumping jacks, 25 curls per arm and 5,000 revolutions on an elliptical machine. He was forced to repeat the workout each evening, though with 1000 less elliptical machine rotations, the petition says. Authorities say Charlie told them his stepmom put him in the basement after she accused him of lying about completing his evening workout, MLive.com reports. No charges have been filed against either the father or stepmother, but authorities say the investigation is continuing. Officials have since placed Charlie with his mother and removed two of his half-siblings from the home, according to MLive.com. Source: http://www.pennlive.com/midstate/index.ssf/2014/07/12-year-old_kept_prisoner_in_b.html

Police, State Probe Maryland Foster Care Death « CBS DC You are using Internet Explorer 6. Internet Explorer 6 is unsupported by this site and you may experience layout and functionality issues. It is recommended that you upgrade to a newer version of Internet Explorer or switch to another browser. | Download Internet Explorer | Download Firefox | Download Chrome Police, State Probe Maryland Foster Care Death July 12, 2014 10:56 AM View Comments Related Tags: Anne Arundel County Police, Baltimore police, Damaud Martin, foster care, LifeLine Inc, Rosita Martin Latest News D.C.'s Food Court Guilty of Deliciousness Cute Animal Alert Cheerleader Roundup College Hoops Edition Get Breaking News First Receive News, Politics, and Entertainment Headlines Each Morning. Sign Up BALTIMORE — The Baltimore Police Department homicide unit has taken over an investigation of the death of a 10-year-old boy at a home for medically fragile children because of the possibility that abuse he suffered six years ago played a role in his death. Damaud Martin died July 2 after suffering cardiac arrest at a home run by LifeLine Inc. in Laurel, Maryland, where state inspectors had found significant problems with staffing, documents show. The state has removed the other 10 children living there, said the Maryland health secretary, Dr. Joshua Sharfstein. The Anne Arundel County police began investigating Damaud's death, but brought in Baltimore police after determining that there had been a "prior trauma abuse incident in Baltimore city." That incident occurred in January of 2008, when Damaud was hospitalized with severe brain trauma. Damaud's mother, Tamekia Martin, was convicted of child abuse in May of 2009 after accepting an Alford plea, according to Damaud's grandmother, Rosita Martin. That's when a defendant maintains her innocence, but acknowledges that the prosecution has enough evidence to convict her. Rosita Martin said after Damaud was hospitalized, his 7-year-old sister, Sandoria, was placed in foster care. The children were first taken into state custody in 2006, then placed in Rosita Martin's home. The Department of Social Services returned the children to Tamekia Martin in November 2007, two months before Damaud's hospitalization. Baltimore Police spokesman Jeremy Silbert said Friday that the direction of the investigation into Damaud's death will depend on the findings of the state medical examiner's autopsy. "If they do rule the death was the result of the incident that happened in Baltimore city, this will become a homicide," Silbert said. Rosita Martin said Friday that her daughter never abused her children. "This is the most disgusting thing I've ever experienced. These were two sweet, innocent children and they robbed us," Rosita Martin said of the Department of Social Services. "They robbed us of our happiness with them." She said the Department of Social Services notified the family Friday that Damaud had died. Brian Schleter, a spokesman for the Department of Human Resources, said the agency had been trying to contact Tamekia Martin since Damaud's death, but could not immediately reach her. Rosita Martin on Friday said she is devastated by her grandson's death. She had become a licensed foster care provider after the children were first taken into state custody in 2006, and said she had been fighting ever since to keep the children in her care. She said she was never told where Damaud was living, and still does not know where her granddaughter lives. Rosita Martin said she has not seen her granddaughter since 2009. "They stole them from us and wanted us to believe that they had a right to do this," Rosita Martin said, tears streaming down her face. "I've been fighting diligently all day every day. Those children didn't deserve any of this. He was such a sweet little one, a sweet little boy. And nobody got a chance to see his beauty." According to the Anne Arundel County Police report, Tamekia Martin's parental rights had been terminated at the time of Damaud's death. The Baltimore City Department of Social Services is listed as the boy's legal guardian. Damaud had been in LifeLine's care since Dec. 4, 2013. Sharfstein said Damaud's group home was inspected regularly by the state, and reviews this year indicated more significant problems than in the past. A survey by the state in February found that four of eight employees did not have documents to support the successful completion of training for the special needs of the children at the facility. A complaint was filed in May alleging neglect at the facility because of a youth's bed sore. In June, the state noted inadequate staffing at the facility. "In 2014, they began to have more significant violations, and those included problems with the care that they were providing and that led us to No. 1, intensify our oversight, No. 2, start a process of closing them and transitioning the youth," Sharfstein said. The facility indicated it would give up its license in September, and the remaining children were moved over the July 4 weekend. LifeLine did not immediately return messages seeking comment. The Baltimore Sun first reported the boy's death and previous problems with the facility. Source: <http://washington.cbslocal.com/2014/07/12/police-state-probe-maryland-foster-care-death/>

NY legislators want better foster care background Media Sources // Sunday, 13 July 2014 01:10 // font size decrease font size increase font size ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — New York legislators have approved amending state law to require agencies placing children in foster care first check whether prospective parents have done it before and provided poor or questionable care. Sponsors say caseworkers sometimes remove children from homes suspected of being unsafe without either revoking the parents' certificate to provide foster care or reporting them to the state's child abuse hotline. Those parents may simply apply to another agency for foster children and get money for their care. The amendment, if signed by Gov. Andrew Cuomo, would require all foster care agencies check with the Office of Children and Family Services to determine whether prospective parents ever had foster a child removed from their home, evaluate the reasons why and determine if the foster home should be reopened. Copyright (2014) Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Source: <http://www.bayoubuzz.com/us-news/item/704676-ny-legislators-want-better-foster-care-background>

Bethel residents file complaints about group home issues By LORETTA RODGERS, Times Correspondent Posted: 07/13/14, 11:18 PM EDT | Updated: 1 week, 5 days ago # Comments BETHEL — For the second time in three years, residents of Arbor Drive filed complaints about the management and residents of a group home operated by Elwyn Inc. From foul language used by residents, staff and visitors to blaring car radios at all hours of the night, one resident said he has had enough. "To the management of the home on Arbor Drive, I say shame on you for failing the occupants of this group home, shame on you for failing the families, shame on you for failing the donors, and shame on you for failing Bethel Township and our residents," said the neighbor. "We expect you to manage a safe and wholesome environment for those who reside on that property." Supervisor Ed Miles said there are five group homes currently operating in the township and the one on Arbor Drive is the only one that is troublesome. Miles said for as much grief as this one home has given the community, the others are operating very well. "We have compassionate residents in our community, but we need this fixed." Police Chief Tom Worrirow verified that in the past three years there have been more than 40 calls of complaints about the Arbor Drive home. One resident said he has personally witnessed unacceptable outbursts, occupants causing damage to trash cans, mail boxes, signs smashed, shaken, and attempts made to remove the signage from its foundations. He added that he has also witnessed scuffles with police. A recent incident raised the ire of the residents and the board of supervisors. An approximately four-minute video exists of a group home resident dressed in nothing but a soiled adult diaper entering a neighboring property. "This woman was stripping her clothes off in the presence of my children as well as other children," said the resident. "We are sympathetic to the group home, and trying to be a good neighbor, but the problem is that this is unacceptable behavior." In 2011, this very same group home came under fire from residents who spent 45 minutes detailing problems to supervisors. Miles told the residents Tuesday night that the board of supervisors has been made aware of what has been happening and Worrirow has been keeping the board apprised of the incidents. Miles said he, Supervisor Jean Stoyer and Solicitor Mike Maddren met with Elwyn officials on June 3 about the matter and were assured that changes were going to be made. "The attorney representing Elwyn indicated they realized from that meeting and the described incidents, the program they were operating out of that home was not appropriate for the community," Maddren said. "They assured me they were going to cease that program at that house. They need to relocate the residents, which was supposed to be done by July 1, which obviously did not happen." Maddren said he has again spoken with the solicitor who assured him the residents of the home in question will be relocated within a week. One Arbor Drive resident said he is tired of living next door to the home, adding that he has concerns about employees having no identification. "Doors to that house are open all night and they are playing loud music," he said. "The employees do not wear badges or any sign of identification. This is ridiculous." Supervisors Chairman John Camero III said the board is working very hard to rectify the situation. "This does not end tonight and the board is working very hard with our solicitor to do everything we can," Camero said. "We will do everything in our power legally to make this right." Representatives from Elwyn Inc. would not comment due to the matter being a personnel issue and because of HIPAA regulations. Source: <http://www.delcotimes.com/government-and-politics/20140713/bethel-residents-file-complaints-about-group-home-issues#>

Mom: Son abused at Salem group home Report from Lynn woman with autistic child, 37, spurs probe Story Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Monday, July 14, 2014 3:00 am Mom: Son abused at Salem group home By Kristin Bornstein / For The Item Itemlive.com | 0 comments SALEM — Allegations of abuse made against a Salem residential group home have sparked an investigation by the Salem Police Department, the Essex County District Attorney's Office, and the Massachusetts Department of Mental Health. Teresa Carrington of Lynn believes that sometime in early March, her 37-year-old autistic son, Scott Crawford, was beaten so severely that traces of blood were found in his urine days after the incident allegedly took place. The facility, located on Green Street in Salem, is run by the May Institute, a nonprofit organization that provides services to individuals with autism spectrum disorder and other developmental disabilities. According to its website, the May Institute operates nearly 200 service locations across the country. Carrie Kimball-Monahan, a spokeswoman for Essex County District Attorney Jonathan Blodgett, confirmed the investigation but declined further comment. The investigation began shortly after Carrington discovered multiple bruises across Crawford's ribs and stomach as she helped her son out of the shower on March 22, 2014 during a visit home. Upon discovering the marks, Carrington said she took her son to the Salem Hospital emergency room. A medical report from Salem Hospital, provided by Carrington, listed two diagnoses for the injury: an abdominal wall contusion and microscopic hematuria, or stomach bruising with traces of blood in the urine. During that ER visit, Carrington said that medical personnel expressed heightened concern over Crawford's injuries because of his disability, and they immediately contacted the Salem Police Department. "The sergeants came, then detectives came, then a social worker. We were there for a long time," Carrington said. "First they asked me when the last time Scott was home. ... They wanted to be sure of where this happened, but he had been at Green Street all the time." A police report filed by the Salem Police Department cited alleged assault to a disabled party. The report stated that police officers asked Crawford how his injuries occurred and that Crawford responded with the name of a staff member from the residential facility. In the report, police wrote that "it appears that this staff member (name withheld) was the individual responsible for the bruising on Crawford's body," and also noted that although the attending physician was not able to specify the exact date of injury, the physician did say that "it could have been a few days ago." Carrington said she questioned how such a severe injury could have occurred at the group home if employees were following standard restraint procedures. In accordance with Massachusetts state general laws, all mental health facilities contracted or operated by the Department of Mental Health must adhere to Title 104 of the Code of Massachusetts Regulations, regarding "Restraint and Seclusion" procedures. The Department of Mental Health states a commitment to "eliminating the use of restraint and seclusion" as a means of behavior adjustment, and that such restraint should only be applied in emergency situations. Last updated in August 2010, the policy outlines the requirements of facilities to develop individual crisis prevention plans that identify potential risk factors for aggressive behavior and to maintain a plan for de-escalating such situations without the use of restraint and seclusion. In an event where restraint and seclusion methods are unavoidable, facility employees are required to document the use of restraint and seclusion using a two-part form and are also required to complete a patient debriefing form with the patient within 24 hours of the episode as an opportunity for the patient to comment on the incident. Carrington decided to contact the May Institute to retrieve copies of every incident report on file involving her son to determine how often and to what extent Crawford was being physically restrained. She alleges that the facility only provided her with one incident report filed around the time the alleged abuse occurred. That report described an incident that took place on March 16, when employees placed Crawford in two separate restraint holds, but it concluded that after the incident Crawford "only had a small scratch on his elbow." Carrington said that she is upset by the lack of documentation from the May Institute to explain her son's injuries because the March 16 incident report cites a vastly different conclusion from the hospital's medical report. She said she is familiar with physical restraint techniques and alleges that her son was handled with excessive force. Carrington is also afraid that the alleged abuser or abusers are still working with disabled persons. "I don't understand why things are not being done. This is wrong," she said. "What happens to people who do things to people that can't protect themselves? I believe this is a crime." Julia A. Burgess, the senior director of strategic and corporate communications at the May Institute, refused to comment on the investigation and said in a statement, "The May Institute is committed to providing the highest quality care to the individuals we serve. We consider their health and safety our primary responsibility. Privacy policies prevent us from commenting on the matter." Carrington said that although the incident left her son somewhat unstable, they are working to rebuild his daily routine. Crawford now resides at his mother's home in Lynn and recently returned to his job at the CLASS Inc., program in Lawrence. "They have turned my son's life upside down. He had been with the May Institute a very long time, and this has disrupted his entire life," she said. "I'm glad that physically now he is OK, but I'm pretty sure when this was happening to him, my son was hurt." Kristin Bornstein may be reached at kborn126@gmail.com. Source: http://www.itemlive.com/news/mom-son-abused-at-salem-group-home/article_bb137cce-0b09-11e4-9cc4-0019bb2963f4.html

What Millions Of Grandparents Want You To Know Posted: 07/14/2014 7:04 am EDT Updated: 07/14/2014 7:59 am EDT Print Article Share 259 Tweet 13 Email 9 Comment 8 There are nearly three million grandparents raising over five million grandchildren in the U.S. --officially. Those figures represent grandparents that have legal, physical, and financial responsibility for their grandchildren. But if you include grandparents who are head of households that include both birth parents and grandchildren, the figure climbs to seven million. And once you understand that all of those situations are vastly underreported, you begin to get a better picture of an enormous and growing sociological trend with serious implications for the future. From Raising Our Children's Children: Room In The Heart: Situations where grandparents have informal custody of grandchildren remain grossly underreported. Some grandparents conceal the fact that they have children in their care ... to avoid interference by social service agencies that may take the children from them. Some fear reprisals from drug-involved children and keep a low-profile while doing their best to keep grandchildren out of harm's way. Grandparents who don't want to rock the boat, don't tell. What are the reasons? The economy has a lot to do with the need for families to band together to make ends meet. Beyond that, reasons are varied. As you chip away at the smaller percentages of those caused by divorce, illness, death, and job-loss, one overwhelming reason grandparents most often need to step in and totally take over the responsibility of raising their grandchildren becomes frighteningly clear: substance abuse. Millions of grandparents are rescuing their grandchildren from a life of neglect, chaos, and abuse at the hands of addicted parents. These are families from every walk of life, of socio-economic strata, of size, shape, and color. Make no mistake, they are families like yours and mine. My book, Raising Our Children's Children: Room In The Heart, deals with the core group of caregiving grandparents -- the ones that are struggling to rescue and raise grandchildren on their own. Here is what they would like you to know. 1. Grandparents are often near or at retirement age, yet are starting over again with the huge financial responsibilities of raising young children, most of whom suffer from tragic and damaging effects due to addicted parents. They are children who may have been born addicted themselves, or have Fetal Alcohol Syndrome, failure to thrive, neurological issues, Reactive Attachment Disorder, ADD, ADHD, PTSD, developmental delays, abandonment issues, rage disorders... any or all of these problems plus many more. 2. After they have managed to save their grandchildren from harm, grandparents don't know where to turn for help. In fact, the little help available is scattered among agencies that differ from state to state, county to county, court to court, and can change with adjustments in local and federal funding. Each grandparent must frantically hunt and scratch and reinvent the wheel every single time. For many, if not most, there is no help at all. 3. The foster care industry will provide financial benefits and services to grandparents if they join "The System" and become licensed Foster Care providers. For many, financial struggles force them into that situation though the last thing they want is to be under the thumb of the very bureaucracy from which they fought to save their grandchildren! 4. Involvement of Child Protective Services and/or Departments of Social Services should be a blessing, but too often it's a curse for caregiving grandparents. There is an inherent lack of comfort with or outright distrust of those agencies among grandparents and kin. Although there are many good foster care homes, in general the whole system is fraught with problems. Most family caregivers want to keep clear of any involvement with untrustworthy bureaucracies they fear may result in loss of custody. There are many systemic reasons why the child welfare system/foster care industry provides a barrier to grandparents and so often fails to protect children. Currently those systems exist within an unworkable directive that drives them toward a narrow view of "family reunification." This mindset serves to undermine what is in the best interest of the child by unintentionally taking away stability, safety and security in the quest to drive the child first into, and then out of foster care, back to additive and/or failed parents and often back into foster care again. Grandparents and other kin are frequently used as merely a way-station rather than a "family reunification" destination. CPS will initially drop children off at grandma's doorstep, but after that, family members must fight to keep them, or become part of the system to do it. Foster care is a self-sustaining industry, the more children under their umbrella, the bigger their budget; for grandparents, it's join or lose. Director of Baltimore City Department of Social Services, Molly McGrath Tierney, had this to say - and much more - at TedxBaltimore 2014 Rethinking Foster Care: I run a well-oiled machine that does an outstanding job of taking other people's children. It does it with absolute efficiency. I regret that this success does not also result in us actually helping people. Now the abuse and neglect is awful for children, it's terrible for children, absolutely! When we also then take them from their families, we're digging a wound so deep that I don't believe we have a way of measuring it. This dismantling of families, has enormous consequences... 5. If and when grandparents finally manage to maintain custody and eventually adopt grandchildren, they become the children's de facto parents. Usually, children quite naturally transition to calling them mom and dad. As in any adoptive situation, the roles override the biological connection or lack of biological connection. Grandparents want you to accept interfamily adoptions in the same way traditional adoptions are accepted. They want you to "get it." Finally, grandparents want to know some things too: Why isn't there a national policy that supports them in their efforts to keep their grandchildren safe and their families together? They would like to know why child welfare agencies are so married to the foster care industry -- a troubled, overburdened bureaucracy at best -- at the expense of keeping children permanently within their own family group. They want to know why these issues are barely on the national radar. They want to know why society neither acknowledges nor values what grandparents and other kin do. Even now, when we have a president who was raised by grandparents, they would like to know what it would take to raise awareness. From Raising Our Children's Children: Room In The Heart, When I began this book, my goal was to offer grandparents and grandchildren a look at what others have been through and survived... and I hoped to raise awareness in others who may not realize the depth and complexity of this growing trend while providing a common sense outlook onto the issues. We are all inexorably wound together as individuals, as families, as communities, and as a society. We must take care to value, accommodate, and, at times, assist the variety and diversity, each unique facet, in the noble work - the blessed art - of family. Millions of grandparents and millions more grandchildren want you to know. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/deborah-doucette/grandparents-raising-grandchildren_b_5556815.html

Escapee from Northwestern boot camp apprehended By Mark Gilger (Staff Writermark_g@newsitem.com) Published: July 27, 2014 Article Tools Font size: [\[A\]](#) [\[A\]](#) [\[A\]](#) Share on facebook Share on twitter Share on google Share on linkedin Share on email Share on print More Sharing Services 4 Our Social Networks Facebook Sign Up newsletter COAL TOWNSHIP - A 17-year-old male housed in the boot camp at Northwestern Academy ran away from the juvenile detention facility Saturday afternoon, but was apprehended in a wooded area 90 minutes later in Mount Carmel Township. Coal Township police said the teen ran away from a group of other students shortly before 4:30 p.m. while on a nature walk in the woods with an academy employee. It was initially reported the teen was heading in a southeasterly direction from the academy. Police from Coal Township, Kulpmont and Mount Carmel Township, along with academy personnel, searched for the teen before locating him at about 6 p.m. A request was made for a state police helicopter to assist in the search, but was canceled when the teen was found and returned to the academy. The incident remains under investigation by Coal Township police. Source: <http://newsitem.com/news/escapee-from-northwestern-boot-camp-apprehended-1.1725538> (HEAL NOTE: What goes on at this boot camp?)

HEAL California Premiere's New Website: <http://healreport.tv> The HEAL Report is featured on this site. Check it out!

July 24th, 2014: The HEAL Report: Jill Vanderwater Tribute Part 1

Vocal opposition might not keep boys' rehab facility out of East Waco Story Comments Image \(4\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size 1 Previous Next Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte lavega ra1 People file in to attend La Vega ISD's meeting Tuesday, where they discussed the proposed rehab facility for emotionally disturbed boys. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte lavega ra4 Superintendent Sharon Shields presents her view on the proposed 90-bed rehab facility for emotionally disturbed boys during Tuesday's La Vega ISD school board meeting. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte lavega ra3 Bryan Waterhouse sits down after speaking at the La Vega Independent School District meeting Tuesday night about the proposed 90-bed rehab facility for emotionally disturbed boys. Nobody at the meeting voiced support for the facility. Buy this photo Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte lavega ra2 School board member Phil Bancale talks with people attending La Vega Independent School District's board meeting Tuesday, where they discussed the proposed 90-bed rehab facility for emotionally disturbed boys. Buy this photo Posted: Wednesday, July 16, 2014 12:01 am Vocal opposition might not keep boys' rehab facility out of East Waco By STEPHANIE BUTTS sbutts@wacotrib.com Waco Tribune-Herald Bellmead residents and La Vega Independent School District officials Tuesday night expressed strong opposition to Snugg Harbor, a proposed 90-bed residential treatment center for boys. But state licensing officials said those opinions, along with opposition from Bellmead and Waco-area residents voiced at another recent meeting, will not by themselves keep the center from opening in the area. "Residential Child Care Licensing will take into consideration all comments and concerns of the community," the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services said in a statement. "Snugg Harbor is still in the application phase, and opposition from the community alone won't exclude Snugg Harbor from receiving an initial license to operate." Julie Moody, Region 7 media specialist for DFPS, said no deficiencies were discovered in the license application for Snugg Harbor and the only reason it wasn't issued a temporary license to open was because the requirement for a public hearing in counties with a population of 300,000 people or fewer delayed it. Lea Long, a licensing representative from DFPS, attended Tuesday's meeting and said more consideration would be given to Snugg Harbor's license application because of the vocal opposition. About 50 people attended the La Vega Independent District board of trustees meeting Tuesday. No one spoke to support Snugg Harbor, a treatment center for boys ages 8 through 17 with severe mental, emotional or behavioral disorders. Most who spoke in opposition were either parents or teachers in the La Vega school district and were concerned about the financial strain it would put on the schools and the threat unstable students could pose to their children. "A disciplined and well-managed classroom is essential to the learning of all students," said Melanie Morgan, a La Vega ISD teacher. Local officials estimate it would cost the district an additional $1 million a year, plus force a building program to accommodate the extra students in the filled-to-capacity campuses. Amanda Russ, a resident who lives down the street from the proposed facility, said the neighborhood is filled with young children and retirees. The community doesn't have the resources to protect its residents from potentially violent students who could roam the neighborhood, Russ said. "I am totally, 100 percent against having that facility here because we're committed to making the area better. I hope that they do not give them a license," Russ said. Snugg Harbor, proposed by owner Rosalyn Ruffin, would be in East Waco at 1916 Seley Ave., which most recently was a home for disabled adults called Pecan Ridge Assisted Living Center. Ruffin held a public meeting on July 8 where La Vega ISD Superintendent Sharon Shields invited Ruffin to Tuesday's board meeting to present her plans for the center. Ruffin did not attend Tuesday's meeting. Shields said Tuesday she called Ruffin prior to the meeting and couldn't reach her. The Tribune-Herald was also unable to contact Ruffin. Shields encouraged the group of concerned residents to contact the licensing office to express their concerns. "We are reaching out to everyone we can to ensure our citizens' voices are heard," Shields said. The school district will do its best to accommodate the facility's students if it is approved, but the cost will eventually fall back upon the taxpayers, she said. "I don't think we've gotten our minds around the impact this kind of program would have on our community, the impact it would have on our classrooms," Shields said. "We're already maxed out on our funding." Source: http://www.wacotrib.com/news/education/vocal-opposition-might-not-keep-boys-rehab-facility-out-of/article_1fbd4a0a-a8b2-512b-af0d-313f38779372.html

458 children rescued from group home in Mexico AP 11:24 p.m. EDT July 15, 2014 The flag of Mexico hangs at a racetrack in Mexico City, Mexico, March 5, 2006. (Photo: Gregory Bull, AP) 109 CONNECT 55 TWEET 2 LINKEDIN 6 COMMENT EMAIL MORE MEXICO CITY (AP) — Federal and state police officers raided a group home Tuesday in the western state of Michoacan and rescued 458 children who were forced to beg for money and suffered sexual abuse while being against their will in filthy conditions, Mexico's top prosecutor said. Attorney General Jesus Murillo Karam said police also rescued 138 adults from the Great Family group home in the city of Zamora. The group home residents were kept in deplorable conditions, fed rotten food and made to sleep on the floor among rats, ticks and fleas and many of them were never allowed to leave the premises, Murillo Karam said at a news conference attended by top federal investigators and Michoacan Gov. Salvador Jara. "I'm in utter dismay because we weren't expecting the conditions we found at the group home," Jara said. Police detained the home's owner, Rosa del Carmen Verduzco, and eight workers for questioning, Murillo Karam said. The investigation began after five parents filed complaints last year with authorities because they weren't allowed to see their children at the home, Jara said. One of the parents was a woman who grew up and gave birth to two children at the home, which has been open for 40 years. She was allowed to leave when she was 31-years-old but Verduzco kept her two children, said Tomas Ceron, head of the Criminal Research Agency at the Attorney General's Office. Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Source: <http://www.usatoday.com/story/news/world/2014/07/15/children-group-home-mexico/12716985/>

Death at Stroud Township group home leads to investigation Pa. regulators found violations during Feb. inspection By Beth Brelje Pocono Record Writer July 16, 2014 12:00 AM The Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare is investigating a Stroud Township group home following the death last week of one of its residents. The Salisbury Behavioral Health Personal Care Home has had a number of inspection violations in the past — some serious, according to state regulators. Darlene Bancey, 62, was pronounced dead at 6:30 a.m. Thursday by Monroe County Coroner Bob Allen after she was found in a lake about 40 feet from the shoreline. The lake is behind the group home at 1482 Cherry Lane. Bancey died as a result of drowning, Allen reported. She went missing Wednesday night and was considered an endangered person because she had medical and psychiatric conditions. A search-and-rescue team looked for her overnight. On Friday, the Department of Public Welfare conducted an on-site investigation of the home, said department spokeswoman Kait Gillis. DPW is trying to determine if the home violated any regulations. Any action taken by the DPW will be guided by the investigation, Gillis said. Incident of abuse Salisbury Behavioral Health Personal Care Home is a nonprofit organization based in Baltimore, under the nonprofit Growth Horizons, which reported on its 2012 nonprofit tax form gross receipts of more than $16 million, largely earned through contracts with counties or the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare. The organization provides day programs, outpatient service and housing for developmentally disabled people for the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare and Mental Health Retardation Programs. The Monroe County home is licensed for up to 28 residents. Neither the Monroe County nor Baltimore offices responded to a request for comment Tuesday. Regulators noted during a Feb. 21, 2014, inspection that there were 19 residents, all with a mental illness. Of those, 11 were over 60 years old, according to an inspection report. The report describes an incident of abuse that happened Jan. 21, but was not reported until Feb. 24, a month after the incident and a few days after the inspection. Pennsylvania Act 13 Mandatory Abuse Report procedure requires verbal reports of abuse be completed within 24 hours of an incident and written reports be completed within 48 hours. During the incident, two residents had a verbal argument that escalated into a physical altercation. One resident struck the other several times, knocking that resident to the ground, and then kicked the resident on the ground several times. The victim was taken to the hospital and was found to have a closed head injury and multiple abrasions and bruises, according to state records. The victim soon moved out of the facility. The aggressor was hospitalized in a behavioral unit, given a change of medication and returned to the facility, the report said. The facility failed to notify the Area Agency on Aging of the abuse under the Older Adult Protective Services Act, the report said. When the incident occurred, the administrator did not complete the mandatory Act 13 abuse report but did complete a DPW incident report. Prior violations A check of previous inspection reports show some mundane and some more serious violations. January 2013: The facility had a hard time getting a resident to comply with a fire drill. July 2013: The freezer temperature was set too high. An inspection in December 2012 showed the home had no posted activities calendar for residents and also had no activities designed to promote an active involvement of residents with families and the community. An inspection in June 2012 found the home had not been maintaining quarterly account reports for residents who received assistance with their personal spending. During that same inspection, it was found that an employee hired Jan. 30, 2012, did not receive the required training to be completed within the first 40 hours of work scheduled. The training was not complete until Feb. 21, 2012. An inspection in July 2010 found black mold on two sides of a bath tub used by residents. Dead bugs, food particles and a pill were found on the floor of the activity room. In each case, DPW worked with the facility to define corrective action and renewed the facility's license each year. Source: <http://www.poconorecord.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20140716/NEWS/407160331>

Three DJJ employees suspended after teen inmate's suicide July 15, 2014 by South Carolina Radio Network Three South Carolina Department of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) employees have now been suspended after an inmate's suicide over the weekend. Agency spokeswoman Loretta Neal said in an email that the inmate died the night before while detained at DJJ's detention center. The Richland County Coroner's Office said the teen died from asphyxiation due to hanging himself. While the coroner's office did provide the 16-year-old's name, South Carolina Radio Network usually does not identify minors who commit suicide. The teen was being held on an adult charge of first degree burglary at the time of his death. Neal said the three employees were placed on suspension while the matter is fully investigated. "Any time a young person dies it is a tragedy, especially under circumstances like this," she wrote. "DJJ extends its deepest sympathy and condolences to the family of the young man." Neal did not say why the three employees were suspended. SLED does not comment on ongoing investigations. Source: <http://www.southcarolinaradionetwork.com/2014/07/15/three-djj-employees-suspended-after-teen-inmates-suicide/>

Patient dumping, foster homes among possible topics for referral to Legislature Commissioners cut pay for constables in Henderson and North Las Vegas By Conor Shine (contact) Tuesday, July 15, 2014 | 6:48 p.m. Bills to toughen checks on foster homes and to crack down on patient dumping at University Medical Center were among a slate of proposals the Clark County Commission will consider forwarding to the Legislature next year. Commissioners got a first look at 10 proposed bills during their meeting Tuesday. They'll have to shrink that list to four bills by Sept. 1, the deadline for submitting bill draft requests for the legislative session that starts in February. Under state law, the county is allowed to request only four bills to be drafted per session. County manager Don Burnette said it's possible some of the bills presented Tuesday could be sponsored by legislators, freeing up the county's limited slots for other requests. Commissioners will vote to approve a final list of bill draft requests next month. Here's a look at the bill requests proposed by the county, which came from four departments: University Medical Center UMC put forward two bills. One is an attempt to curb patient dumping from other hospitals to UMC's emergency room. The bill would force those hospitals to share an increased portion of the costs of patients transferred to UMC's emergency room. A second bill would allow UMC's newly formed governing board to go into closed meetings and bypass the state's Open Meeting Law in order to discuss "trade secrets." Department of Family Services The county's foster care and child protection agency has requested four bills. One would strengthen the agency's ability to investigate child welfare claims against entities and organizations. A second proposed bill would allow the agency to do more extensive background checks on people who are regularly in foster homes. The other two bills would clarify language in a pair of statutes to make the laws more consistent. Las Vegas Justice Court The Las Vegas Justice Court, which handles minor crimes and traffic incidents, is requesting a bill that would allow a portion of bail forfeitures and misdemeanor fines to be diverted into a special fund. The fund would receive 10 percent of the court's revenues — about $1.8 million — and would be used to pay for specialty courts. The remaining revenue would go into the county's general fund. The court's other bill request involves allowing temporary judges to replace sitting justices of the peace who are on medical leave. Real Property Management The county's real estate department is requesting two bills. Both would tweak statute to allow the department to perform repairs and maintenance to county buildings more quickly and at a lower cost. • • • Constables take pay cut Clark County Commissioners instituted a new pay scale for constables in Henderson and North Las Vegas in an attempt to boost transparency. The move also means a serious pay cut for the two constables, who will now make a fixed salary of $103,000 per year after the commission's unanimous decision Tuesday. The constables previously drew their salaries from a fund generated from commissions their offices earned for delivering legal papers and evictions. The amount each constable made in a given year varied depending on how much their office brought in. North Las Vegas Township Constable Herb Brown earned a salary of more than $250,000 last year with his offices bringing in $600,000 in revenue, according to the county staff. Henderson Township Constable Earl Mitchell made a salary of about $180,000 with his office bringing in about $800,000 in revenue. Keeping track of budgets and salaries for the 11 constable's offices has been a challenge for the county staff because each constable is responsible for keeping their own financial records. Commissioners concerned about a lack of financial transparency moved to put two of the largest offices — Henderson and North Las Vegas — onto a fixed salary system. The salary Mitchell and Brown will receive is equal to the pay of Las Vegas Township Constable John Bonaventura, who was already on a fixed salary. Commissioners voted last year to abolish Bonaventura's office when his term ends in January. Source: <http://www.lasvegassun.com/news/2014/jul/15/clark-county-commission/>

New charge filed against former foster-care worker New charge filed against former foster-care worker Aldrin West, 42, appears at Boulder City Justice Court on Tuesday. (Yesenia Amaro/Las Vegas Review-Journal) By YESENIA AMARO LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL A former foster-care worker will face a third charge of open and gross lewdness in a sexual assault case referred to Clark County District Court by a Boulder City justice of the peace on Tuesday. Aldrin West, 42, faced one count for open or gross lewdness over allegations of masturbating in front of former child specialist Jodi Lynn Fennell while working at St. Jude's Ranch for Children, and a second count of open or gross lewdness because he is alleged to have touched Fennell's breast, according to the criminal complaint. The complaint will be amended to add a third count of open or gross lewdness in a separate incident where West is alleged to have masturbated in front of Fennell. Justice of the Peace Victor Miller found there was probable cause to send West's case to District Court, where he is scheduled to appear July 31. West, who also uses the name Adrian, plans to plead not guilty, and a trial date then will be set. R. Roger Hillman, an attorney with the Clark County public defender's office, said, "He denies everything," Hillman said. Binu Palal, deputy district attorney with the Clark County district attorney's office, said West has not yet posted bail, which is $4,000. St. Jude's Ranch for Children is a county-licensed therapeutic foster care agency, and all employees must remain in good standing with the Clark County Department of Family Services. Fennell said prior to her case, Family Services investigated reports of inappropriate behavior made by two teenage girls involving West. After investigating the reports, the agency assigned West to attend "boundaries classes" and cleared him to return to work. Family Services wouldn't say whether West had been investigated in the past, but Fennell provided copies of two audiotapes she made with the permission of Family Services investigator Teresa Cragon, who was assigned to investigate her case earlier this year. During one of the interviews, Cragon is heard confirming a prior investigation but tells Fennell she had no part in that investigation. Contact Yesenia Amaro at yamara@reviewjournal.com or 702-383-0440. Find her on Twitter: @YeseniaAmaro. Source: <http://www.reviewjournal.com/news/las-vegas/new-charge-filed-against-former-foster-care-worker>

Adult Foster Care Home Forced to Close - Northern Michigan's News Leader Adult Foster Care Home Forced to Close Posted: Jul 16, 2014 2:54 PM PDT Updated: Jul 23, 2014 2:54 PM PDT By Meredith Barack, Reporter - email Six people forced to find new homes. The adult foster care facility where they lived shut down for failing to renew their license. Residents say it has been a wonderful place to live, and they are upset they were given little time to move. The Department of Human Services says the Cedar Crest Adult Foster Care home in Remus had a license in the past, but failed to renew it, forcing them to shut it down. Operating an adult foster care in Michigan without a license is illegal, and the owners said they are well-aware of that despite operating for a year without one. "I think coming in here with people in their 80's and 90's and telling them they've got to move by night is pretty low." Mary Cowles is one of six people forced to move out of Cedar Crest. "I think it's stinky. I got other words for it too. I just don't think this is right." But this is what the Department of Human Services says in a statement to 9 & 10 News: "Michigan law requires all adult foster care homes to be licensed in order to operate. Cedar Crest has been operating an unlicensed facility, so that is not allowed." "I've had licenses for almost 13 years, would have been, but I applied for my license on my proper time, said they didn't get it, I reapplied, said they didn't get it, 3 times I did that." Owner Donna Walch says she eventually hand delivered an application, the $25 fee, and a compliance letter to a DHS office. "They got the compliance letter, but they didn't get the check or the application. I know I don't have a license, I know that's illegal but I've tried to do my part. Why would I jeopardize? This is my only income." DHS says they have no record of the filings or fee payments. And residents and families are obviously frustrated. Including Mary, "I'm not moving out. If they move me, they're going to pick me up and take me. I think I have a right to be where I wanna be." And Donna isn't giving up. "I'm going to reapply. I'm going to open back up if it takes all I can do. I'm going to open back up and do what I've been doing for many years." Four caregivers are also now out of a job. DHS did work with residents who needed it to find them other places to stay. Source: <http://www.9and10news.com/story/26037339/adult-foster-care-home-forced-to-close>

Unaccompanied Immigrant Minors to Be Placed in Florida Foster Homes Print article Send a Tip by Kerry Pickett 16 Jul 2014 post a comment The Children's Home Society of Florida confirmed with Breitbart News on Monday that some unaccompanied minors crossing the southern border of the U.S. will be sent to local foster homes in the state next month. "As you're aware, this is an incredible humanitarian issue. Children's Home Society of Florida is assisting the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to provide safe shelter and care for children who enter the United States without their families," spokeswoman for Children's Home Society of Florida Heather Morgan wrote in an email statement. "In Brevard County, we will be working with local families that will serve as transitional homes for 12 children. In Broward County, we will provide temporary shelter and care for 24 children in a group-home setting." Florida Today recently reported federal authorities contacted the private not-for-profit social agency around two months ago to aid the federal government with providing humanitarian services for the migrant children. This would include finding short-term, transitional housing and other care. According to FT, another 45 are expected in Fort Lauderdale and may end up in Brevard County. "We're going to start with about 12 children," Teresa Miles, the executive director of the Brevard division of the Children's Home Society of Florida, told FT. "Our goal is to keep them safe and to get them together with an appropriate family." Miles added that the agency is looking for willing families that can speak both Spanish and English to take the children in for at least 30 to 45 days, and families will receive stipends of $20 a day to care for the children along with educational support offered by the agency. However, questions remain as to how secure such living environments may be—not only for the community but also for the young people who are brought are placed into homes. Individuals trafficked into the United States may be most at risk when placed in less restrictive environments, Breitbart News learned recently from Brenda Zurita, a research fellow of the Washington, D.C.-based Concerned Women For America's Beverly LaHaye Institute: In the Violence Against Women Reauthorization Act (VAWA) of 2013 (Section 1261, which is an anti-trafficking provision), another layer was added to the care of UACs. If a UAC turns 18 while in the care of HHS and is then transferred to the custody of the Secretary of Homeland Security (DHS), the alien may be placed in an alternative to detention such as "with an individual or an organizational sponsor, or in a supervised group home." How easy would it be for traffickers to snatch this young adult from these situations and put them into debt bondage, forced labor or sex trafficking? However, Jesse Zermeno, founder and president of Operation Hope of Brevard, a Fellsmere-based organization that gives food, clothes, books, and other services to children and families with roots in Latin America, sees it differently, telling FT, "At the end of the day, it will be a good thing for someone in our community to touch these children's lives." "These children, for sure, need to be with their parents. But now their future is unknown," Zermeno said, adding, "Even with that, you just can't put children in the street or expose them to danger again. We have to open our hearts and take care of the children and the system." Source: <http://www.breitbart.com/Big-Government/2014/07/16/Unaccompanied-Immigrant-Minors-To-Be-Placed-In-Florida-Foster-Homes>

The Failures of America's Foster Care System By Joachim Hagopian Global Research, July 19, 2014 Region: USA Theme: Poverty & Social Inequality I worked with the largest county children's welfare services in America for more than a quarter century. For several decades as a licensed therapist in Los Angeles County, I provided mandated therapy to both children as well as young adults were aging out of the child welfare system. Over the years I made countless trips to LA County Children's Court representing dozens of children and families as my clients. My decades of firsthand mental health experience saw the destructive inside machinations of a corrupt, overloaded, thoroughly broken foster care system do more damage than good to children and families with whom I closely worked. Like all institutions in America, the child welfare system is just another corrosive, morally bankrupt, oppressive mechanism by which to control the poorest people in this country, acting as a national conduit pipeline to prison, substance abuse, human trafficking, homelessness, mental illness and early death. Though each county child protective services department in the United States operates under a separate budget funded by individual county, state and federal mental health source dollars, the child welfare system in this country is so overburdened and systemically flawed, it has been failing our kids miserably for a long time now. We all hear about the horror stories of murdered children in the foster care system who fell through the cracks. High profile cases exposing the tragic fate of young people trapped in a system that fails to protect them are far too common. They are written about extensively in newspapers all the time. But the American public rarely is privy to the inner workings of a system gone bad from the firsthand perspective of an insider who worked within that failed system for decades. This is my account of the child welfare system as a therapist who worked out in the community with young people on either probation or within foster care as well as in residential group homes. I observed the broken system from the inside out. Universal human rights are routinely violated every minute and hour of every single day, bringing with each passing year even more atrocities of neglect and abuse from the system designed to protect children. Instead it is literally destroying them. The shocking, gaping problems of the largest child welfare department in America that is the LA County Department of Children & Family Services (DCFS) that I interfaced with for many years epitomizes what has gone so terribly wrong with the national system operating in every state and county throughout the United States. To illustrate the blatant flaws inherent in the child welfare system, I shall present the stories of two families that as a therapist I strongly advocated for children as my clients to reunify with their biological families in LA County Children's Court. The first case was an eight year-old boy I shall call Pablo who when two months old was placed by DCFS to live with the boy's aunt due to the his mother being an alleged drug addict unable to properly care for the child. Pablo also had a sister six years older also placed with the biological mother's sister. Prior to my being assigned as Pablo's therapist, the fifteen year old sister had grown increasingly rebellious and defiant, clashing with her aunt and after running away from home, DCFS decided to place her in the foster care system. Because of the volatile relationship the sister had with the aunt as her primary caregiver, the DCFS social worker assigned to the case became suspicious of the aunt's capacity as primary caregiver to Pablo. DCFS normally contracts with local mental health agencies in the community to provide mental health services to minors with open cases in the child welfare system. I was working as clinical manager to one of the DCFS mental health providers overseeing community service operations in both biological and foster care family homes as well as group homes in the Pasadena area. I also directly supervised approximately eight to ten therapists including Pablo's therapist. When DCFS grew concerned about the aunt's capacity to provide a healthy home environment for Pablo, based on DCFS' recommendation, the Children's Court judge stipulated that a licensed therapist be assigned Pablo's case. At that point I became directly involved in Pablo's care as both his weekly individual therapist as well as his and his aunt's weekly family therapist. My assessment of Pablo and his aunt's relationship after providing therapy services in their home for about two months was that Pablo was responding well to treatment and already beginning to make considerable progress with his treatment plan goals that I had collaboratively formulated with both Pablo and his aunt. They had to do with learning to stay on task with such daily activities as picking up toys after play and following his aunt's prompts for redirection. As a child given the mild case diagnosis of Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD), a way over-diagnosed mental health classification conveniently used to label high energy children who simply have minds of their own and pose as management problems in an educational system designed to stamp out children's spirited creativity in favor of docile compliance. Pablo experienced some difficulty focusing both in the classroom and at home and engaged in hyperkinetic motor movement and behavior that would often get him into trouble in both settings when he failed to comply with adult imposed rules. Under the psychiatric care of one of my agency's staff psychiatrists, Pablo was taking daily medication prescribed for his ADHD. After I completed and presented to DCFS my written assessment and clinical findings noting early progress in treatment per protocol under my service agency contract with county Children's Services, against my recommendation and based on approval from the DCFS social worker's supervisor, unbeknownst to me, one afternoon the social worker abruptly entered the family home and forcibly removed Pablo from the only family home he had ever known in all his nine years, severely traumatizing and terrorizing the little boy. Neither he nor the aunt nor I ever saw what seemed like an ambushed assault and violation of the worst order coming. In one fell swoop they were not only interfering and undermining the family's progress in treatment, they were also destroying this family. The social worker created such extreme havoc in the home, Pablo was crying hysterically and uncontrollably as the social worker literally ripped him from his aunt's arms and physically coerced him out the door. In all the turmoil, chaos and family drama he had created, the highly unprofessional DCFS social worker forgot to even take any of Pablo's clothes or medication with him prior to placing the highly distraught boy against his will and choice into foster care, a task that was left for me to follow up with the next day. After receiving the brokenhearted aunt's horrifying account, I took Pablo's clothes and meds over to the nearby foster home where Pablo was now living, consoled a still very traumatized Pablo and spoke briefly with the foster parents who had worked with DCFS for a number of years. Children's Services had completely gone against the family's therapist's recommendations, but most importantly against the family's best interest to stay together as an intact family, suddenly and violently uprooting this fragile young child with absolutely no justifiable reason at all. Clearly Pablo was severely traumatized by the system's cruel and unusual decision to suddenly break up this family. There was no question that the aunt loved her nephew as her own son and the little nephew most definitely loved and needed his aunt as every child needs his mother. Seeing the irreparable damage and harm the system willfully inflicted on my clients, I immediately contacted the social worker and his supervisor and arranged an emergency meeting a couple days later. When pressed for an explanation, neither the social worker nor his supervisor could supply a remotely legitimate reason for separating the boy from his only family. The most they could come up with was feebly mumbling something about the boy's teacher remarking that one day Pablo had come to school wearing dirty clothes. No consideration apparently was ever made to think that every chance this little guy got he was on his knees playing in the dirt because that is what healthy, energetic, lively little boys do. For unknown reasons, it was clear that DCFS was on a witch hunt to demonize the aunt in their false accusations to break apart the family. I saw firsthand the criminal misuse of a totalitarian system run amok operating under the sinister guise of protecting children from harm but by its own vindictively blind and destructive actions was doing grave harm to my vulnerable innocent client who never knew what hit him. I started seeing my client for his individual therapy sessions at his new foster home. But used to seeing me within the safe and familiar confines of the only home he ever knew, I quickly realized he was not comfortable in the foster home setting, so I began bringing him to a nearby park a couple times a week to help the child cope with the trauma the system had senselessly caused. Every time I would show up, the first thing out of this poor little kid's mouth was, "When can I go home to my aunt?" It was heartbreaking. As a professional, I could never express my true feelings about the Nazi-like tactics responsible for his current trauma, anxiety and pain. In a matter of weeks the boy had gone from living his entire life with his aunt and sister, then to just living with his aunt and every other week hour-long visits with his sister, to now not living with any family at all. To his never ending question, I finally told him, "Pablo, I'm doing everything possible to get you home with your aunt." Because the child system had absolutely no basis for removing Pablo from his family home and knew it, they got caught in a compromising position of having to save face, notoriously unable to ever admit mistakes. In the meantime, they were constantly challenged and confronted by this therapist strongly recommending immediate reunification with the aunt. Just prior to the next scheduled Children's Court hearing, on the holiday weekend the social worker and foster mother met with Pablo at the foster home and actually manipulated the nine year old child into allegedly agreeing that his aunt had used a belt to punish him. Without any visible sign as evidence other than their little boy's "forced confession," at the last minute they were able to bring fabricated evidence to court that would assure the judge to back their decision to keep the child locked in foster care indefinitely. When I spoke to the aunt, I completely believed her when she told me she never touched Pablo with a belt. And in my next session with Pablo, he himself even denied such an event ever took place. Clearly the social worker and foster parent falsely twisted and put words in the boy's mouth to maliciously trick him into keeping him from living with his aunt. After showing up at Children's Court a number of times in person and writing numerous letters and reports to both DCFS and the court judge expressing my serious concerns that the move to foster care was clearly not in the child's best interest and was doing irreparable harm to the young boy, the Children's Court judge suddenly ordered me off the case. After developing a close supportive relationship with the child helping the boy cope with the sudden traumatic loss of his aunt, now the system was removing his therapist as his only advocate in a position to get him back living with his aunt. Because the system viewed me as both a threat and a thorn in its side, an unpleasant reminder of its own wrongdoing, the corrupt and devious system eliminated me from ending the prolonged damage being inflicted on both this boy and his aunt. The system had no qualms about committing the despicable crime of repeatedly afflicting traumatic harm whereby this nine year old's support system would one by one abruptly be eliminated from him. His sense of abandonment at that young age must have been so profound that the damaging effects are likely to leave permanent scars, never knowing he could trust those he felt closest to because they could all of a sudden disappear from his life at any time. This is the kind of diabolical harm I witnessed time and time again by an appallingly ugly system exercising life and death power and control over a half million foster kids in this country. Another case came to me when an upset father arrived at my clinic after his son and daughter had been taken away from him and placed in foster care. I was in my office when the secretary called me to the lobby to deal with the distraught parent desperate to get his two kids back. I brought him back to my office and learned the circumstances that had befallen him as a struggling, low income, single parent. Ultimately I told him to contact his children's DCFS social workers and request that they contact my agency for services and sent him home wishing I could do more. Two or three months later I was contacted by one of his kid's social workers and I became the therapist of his 14-year old son and 6-year old daughter. It turns out that earlier in the year the son I shall call Jim ended up with an abscess tooth infection that was swelling up and his father Bill rushed him to Children's Hospital Emergency Room. Jim was admitted overnight but hospital staff contacted DCFS suspecting that possible physical abuse had caused Jim's facial swelling. Two DCFS investigators interviewed Jim in the hospital and then unannounced the following evening showed up at the family residence with police officers in tow. After finding empty prescription bottles in the bathroom medicine cabinet, on the spot they made the snap decision to remove the six year old girl named Lisa from the only home she ever knew. They woke her up from a deep sleep and once again stole another traumatized, hysterical small child from her understandably agitated biological father. The DCFS investigators placed Lisa and Jim into a foster care home, again without any solid evidence of either abuse or neglect, minus the customary criteria for children services to remove kids from their biological family home. The trauma for a six year old girl to be awakened and grabbed up by a police officer and carried away into the night from the only parent she had ever known and loved is both life altering and embeds such deep fears that most likely will haunt her the rest of her life. I can bear witness that for several years afterwards the trauma of that fateful night caused her to go into panic attacks cowering in anxiety and fear every time she saw a police officer in blue uniform. That is how deep-seeded the damage done to this defenseless little girl by the malevolent system that failed to protect her. Though the damaging trauma had already been done, during the ensuing months LA Children's Services ultimately found no evidence of parental abuse and after four months, Jim was reunified with his father at the same time that I was assigned as therapist. But Lisa remained in foster care. I began seeing Jim weekly for his individual therapy at the local high school where he was a freshman and family therapy at his home with his father. I went to Lisa's foster home weekly for her therapy where I discovered the elderly foster mother smoking cigarettes inside her home, obviously posing physical health danger to my client. There is a very sad and sickening irony when the system sworn to protect children was placing and knowingly keeping a child in harm's way after causing irreparable harm in originally taking her away from the only family who loved her. Though no evidence of child abuse was ever uncovered by Children's Services, the father Bill had only one-hour supervised visits with his daughter Lisa each week at the DCFS office. Throughout their entire lives both Jim and Lisa had lived under their father's care despite each having different mothers. The boy's mother was schizophrenic and the girl's mother was diagnosed with bipolar disorder. Jim as Lisa's older brother had a very caring and protective relationship with his little sister. Both the father and brother's sense of loss with Lisa no longer living with them made them both feel depressed as their family was not complete without her. Lisa's biological mother currently lived in San Bernardino County and after learning Lisa had been taken away from her father, she opportunistically contacted LA County DCFS to seek custody of Lisa. However, six years earlier when Lisa was only two months old the mother showed up for a visit with the father toting Lisa having visible facial scratches and abrasions. Once the father contacted DCFS, he received full custody. The mother was out of Lisa's life after that. Therefore, the only family life Lisa ever knew was the love from her father and brother. It turned out Lisa's intellectually challenged six year older half-sister had aggressively hit and scratched two month old Lisa just prior to that fateful visit six years earlier. Lisa's half dozen years older half-sister at that time was also being sexually molested by adult males the mother allowed into their home though the abuse was discovered a couple years later. Though Lisa's mother could not keep either Lisa or her mentally challenged, sexually abused daughter safe, years later because LA County Children's Services had removed Jim and Lisa from their father that year, under DCFS recommendation the Children's Court judge began authorizing every other weekend visits to the mother's home in San Bernardino County where that same sexually abused, still physically abusive older sister also lived, except now that older sister was twice Lisa's age and size at 12-years old. Over the next several months six-year old Lisa would disclose in her individual therapy sessions with me how her older sister would be constantly aggressively hitting and picking on her. The mentally impaired older sister did not like suddenly having a cute little sister competing for her mother's attention after having the mother to herself her entire life. As a legally mandated reporter of suspected child abuse, I contacted Children Services abuse hotline and submitted a written child abuse report to DCFS that was then passed onto San Bernardino County Child Protective Services (CPS) to initiate a follow up investigation of suspected child abuse. Several weeks later I learned that Lisa's mother had caught the older sister and Lisa observing pornography on the internet. Within that same month while the older sister had a friend staying with them on a sleepover it was learned that the older sister who slept in the same room with Lisa woke Lisa up and insisted that she watch the older sister and her friend lay naked on top of each other simulating having sex. The severely sexually damaged 12-year old was clearly acting out both sexually and aggressively, a classic symptom of early sexual abuse. Overwhelmed, my six year old client was confused and disturbed by her bizarre sister's behavior. A couple months later in yet another incident the older sister physically forced Lisa to place a wad of Vicks Vapo-Rub up inside her vagina. When Lisa began screaming in pain, the mother quickly doused and washed Lisa's burning private parts. But throughout Lisa's time with her mother, Lisa began to regularly suffer from vaginal infections due to the ongoing abuse. Fixated with touching and sticking foreign objects into the vagina is also classic evidence of sexual abuse. When the father took Lisa to the family physician, the doctor expressed concern that Lisa's reproductive organs were at risk of permanent damage. Yet despite my constant series of abuse reports and subsequent San Bernardino County CPS' investigations, apparently not enough substantiated evidence was ever found to warrant suspending all contact or changing the every other weekend arrangement at the mother's. It became my client's word versus her mother's and other daughter's. Clearly Lisa was being physically, emotionally and sexually abused by her older sister on a consistent and regular basis yet despite my countless phone calls, writing abuse reports every month, numerous letters and quarterly reports all bringing red alert full attention to Children's Services in both counties as well as the LA Children's Court judge presiding over the case, along with my showing up at Children's Court repeatedly warning all authorities of the incessant overt abuse going on, nothing ever changed. The judge refused to even allow me into her courtroom. I would walk in and she would ask, "Who is this person?" Upon learning I was the child's therapist, more than once the judge ordered me out of her courtroom with me asking her loudly, "Did you get all my abuse reports?" Not only were all authorities that included DCFS social workers, the child's attorney, the father's attorney and the judge all fully aware of the ongoing abuse occurring every other weekend in San Bernardino County, the judge actually decided to completely wash her hands clean of the case, closing Lisa's LA County file and transferring it to San Bernardino. But far worse, knowing she was being abused, the judge willfully sent Lisa to permanently live with her mother in the same home where the older sister was regularly abusing Lisa. At the final LA Children's Court hearing with the judge having already made up her mind, she finally permitted me inside her courtroom to testify on record presenting the overwhelming evidence. But at that point it was too late, Lisa was being sent to live permanently with her mother and abusive older sister, like it or not. The LA County judge obviously knew the child would only be further harmed by her decision. To me, that clearly constitutes criminal disregard and malfeasance betraying the very oath she had sworn to protect children from abuse. From day one of Lisa's sad life never was her mother able to adequately protect Lisa from her other daughter's abuse. It is all on record. Jim missed his sister badly and only became more depressed while Lisa's father Bill became extremely upset and agitated over this unacceptable, unjust and inhumane court ruling. Based on petty reactions to the father's anger, all players in the Children's Court system complicit in this crime even included the father's own attorney recommending Lisa be sent away to another county knowing full well Lisa would only be further abused. Even Lisa's own DCFS social worker secretly knew it was wrong, apologizing to me after admitting it was his supervisor who was pushing permanent placement with the mother. The judge arranged the exact reverse of the prior schedule. Lisa would now live fulltime at her mother's and only be allowed to spend every other weekend with her father and brother. I would continue seeing her every other weekend for both individual and family therapy. I also continued conducting individual and family therapy with Jim and his father. Such outrageous unfairness, gross injustice and system's complicit abuse were excruciating for Lisa who missed her brother and father so much, she would cry uncontrollably and throw fits every other Sunday when she knew she had to return to her mother's abusive home, dreading she would continue to be victimized. Yet no one was protecting her, despite my over-the-top advocacy and the emotional pleas of both her father and brother. Lisa felt we were failing her in our impotence to change anything. The poor little girl thought her father and brother no longer loved her enough. It was an intolerable situation thanks to the child lack-of-welfare system. Finally with more child abuse reports after Lisa told me her sister pushed her down the stairs at her home, Lisa's social worker from San Bernardino County Children's Protective Services finally began paying attention to me and ultimately recommended Lisa return under her father's care. Driving two hours each way on numerous occasions out to San Bernardino County Children's Court, I continued advocating for Lisa to be protected from her older sister's nonstop abuse and her mother's proven, longstanding incapacity to protect Lisa. After two years of fighting the system as their family therapist, all my efforts to seek justice for Lisa and her family finally paid off as the Children's Court judge in San Bernardino at long last ultimately ordered Lisa's reunification with her father and brother. But the severe damage had already been done to Lisa. The system had criminally failed her and in my clinical opinion, Lisa was traumatized for life. Such protracted mental and emotional anguish most likely impaired her mental stability for life. She was not the same little girl I met when I first became her therapist. Her capacity to focus was completely shattered. Her capacity to trust was totally destroyed. As I see it, the mother's neglect and inability to protect Lisa, her father's, brother's and my inability to protect her from the system's horrific criminal abuse as well as her sister's abuse that lasted nearly two straight years, has permanently crippled this little girl for life. These cases presented here are just two examples of how the child welfare system in America destroys families and individuals. With god-like powers the criminal system makes such far reaching life and death decisions with millions of families that hurt the lives of so many innocent, defenseless children. Children's services and the foster care system whose sole purposes are to protect children from abuse do just the opposite. They betray our children every single day, inflicting irreparable harm on generation after generation of America's youth. The Orwellian Big Brother police state is currently a living nightmare oppressively ruining people's lives by running roughshod over citizens' and families' rights in America. Local county children services agencies work hand in hand with law enforcement to usurp their authority by daily invading our homes and arbitrarily plucking our children from our biological families when no abuse or neglect is even present. The fact that abuse goes on regardless of socioeconomic level is belied by the fact that children in the child welfare system virtually all come from poor, impoverished families. Similar to the inequality of the prison population and broken justice system, the broken child welfare system also appears to prey exclusively on those living in poverty. This apartheid tyranny and betrayal is criminal injustice of the highest magnitude. In thousands of cases the only abuse is once again the punitive, megalomaniacal, thoroughly destructive arm of big government destroying private citizens' lives and the sanctity of the family unit as a scared institution. This pervasive damage is currently being done to the American family. The majority of children living in the foster care system truly are victims of some form of child abuse, often at the hands of biological adult family members that are most often the children's parents. I have worked with countless youth and adolescents who were sexually, mentally and emotionally damaged by chronic abuse and neglect from adult family members and adult family friends. The demand for adequate care and treatment for these emotionally impaired children overwhelmingly exceeds available services. In situations where serious neglect and abuse are occurring, in the interests of protecting the child from further abuse, obviously it becomes necessary on both ethical and legal grounds to remove the child from the home immediately as a last resort (although the traumatic effects of removal of children may be lessened if the abuser(s) was instead removed). But prior to tearing so many families apart, clear-cut evidence of abuse needs to be present. Far too often in my extensive experience, it is not. Efforts to keep the family intact by providing monitored support, therapy and training is far more effective and humane than constantly yanking children from their family homes. It is common even after prolonged severe abuse for kids to want to return home to their biological families and their abusers over remaining with foster care families. Then of course there is an extremely high incidence of abuse coming at the hands of abusive foster parents. More times than I can recall I learned of another abusive situation caused by a foster parent. Barely half of all foster parents hold a high school diploma. Many are low income households that need and use the foster care money as their main source of income. Fiduciary abuse of mispending dollars that should be utilized for the care and maintenance of foster children is all too common. In the turnover shuffle from one foster home or group home to the next, many sent to ten or more in the course of their placement in the system, children quickly see through the transparent motivations of foster parents who value their monthly paycheck more than the kids they are entrusted to care for. A very revealing fact is that a sizeable 22% of kids in foster care repeatedly run away or end up aging out of the system staying with friends rather than remain in the foster care setting. In one study during the year prior, one third of teenage runaways were in foster care. Nearly 40% of youth that arrive in runaway shelters nationally were in foster care during the preceding year. 11% arriving in shelters were homeless. Another alarming finding estimates that up to 45% of those leaving the foster care system end up homeless within their first year. These astounding numbers clearly show that the current system is failing these young people. Young adolescent girls from abusive, impoverished backgrounds placed in the foster care system prone to drug abuse and being runaways are especially easy targets for adults pimps and human traffickers to exploit them as prostitutes and sex slaves. Children in the system come to see themselves as mere cash commodities to their surrounding adults, which when internalized manifests as self-worth debased into a mere monetary value. That makes children in the system especially vulnerable and prone to being exploited by adult human traffickers, pimps and predators. 60% of female minors rescued in the United States from human sex trafficking operations in 2013 were already former victims of the broken foster care system. In LA County in 2012 56% of the girls participating in a support program for commercially sexually exploited females were previously in the child welfare system. In New York City in 2007 of the 2250 victims of human trafficking, 75% were involved in the child system. In Florida an estimated 70% of trafficking victims were from the system. These numbers prove how the foster care system is but a direct pipeline to human trafficking. Only 50% of foster care children graduate nationally from high school and only 2% go on to college. Clearly the outcomes for system aged out young adults are atrocious. Remarkably high percentage of them become statistics suffering from substance abuse, homelessness, prostitution, human trafficking and crime. Karl Dennis, executive director of the Illinois based Kaleidoscope, states: "80 percent of the adults in in all the California correctional facilities are graduates of the state juvenile justice, child welfare, mental health and/or the special education systems." Recognizing the enormity of poor outcomes befalling young adults who are aging out of the child welfare system, several years ago California smartly extended continuing support services funding up through age 23. The crucial importance of providing ongoing assistance into young adulthood with additional educational, vocational/job, therapeutic and housing resources has been a huge step in the right direction though still more needs to be done. Just as there are good, well meaning, compassionate children's court judges, county social workers, child and family therapists and children's attorneys, there are also plenty of good caring foster parents. But because the system is so overloaded and overstretched beyond humane capacity, too many of these all-important players in the child welfare system act as dysfunctional cogs in a highly dysfunctional, uncaring bureaucratic system. The number of children removed from families of origin in the last fifteen years has doubled while the number of foster parents has steadily decreased. When a county social worker has 100 or more kids on his or her caseload, and is mandated to make monthly visits to dozens of placements all over the county and then complete monthly reports on each child, it becomes virtually impossible to offer quality monitoring care and accurately managed services. Hence, so many young people fall through the ever widening cracks into the black hole abyss of mismanaged negligence and endangerment. The current system is reactive and crisis driven, frantically patching up all the gaping, dam-breaking holes and cracks while too many others always open up in their wake. In its current structure and operation, the flood of high profile deaths and permanent injuries to America's most vulnerable population is beyond the faulty, broken system's means to manage, protect and correct the current abominable conditions. A sorely needed overhaul of the system becomes imperative. Of the five billion dollars federally allocated to annually fund child foster care in this country, 90% of that money spent on the child welfare system is reactive, after-the-fact interventions instead of proactive, preventative measures that would minimize the incidence of child abuse from ever taking place. Investing in programs that provide support to prospective parents and families can go a long ways to strengthening parenting skills and building a social support network of community resources vital to child abuse prevention. Monies allocated for addressing the root cause of child abuse prior to the actual abuse serve as a far more prudent and wise long term investment. More families would be able to stay together while the current exorbitant costs of outsourcing biological parents with hired hands too often in it to collect monthly paychecks from an overtaxed system clearly has not worked. Whether unintended consequences of a thoroughly broken and shattered system or by pre-calculated, sinister design, the present foster care system merely serves as a human trafficking and prison pipeline to death and destruction. Foster care was originally intended to be a temporary placement until children could be adopted. Emphasis needs to be placed on reunifying with healthy and willing biological family members as well as finding suitable adoptive parents. But most of all prevention programs need to be instituted in every community throughout the nation. The present failed system is an enormous burden, grand theft automatically to both countless children's lives stolen and destroyed as well as an American taxpayer rip-off. As a nation, we can and should do better. We owe it to our children, and that includes all our children. Joachim Hagopian is a West Point graduate and former US Army officer. He has written a manuscript based on his unique military experience entitled "Don't Let The Bastards Getcha Down." It examines and focuses on US international relations, leadership and national security issues. After the military, Joachim earned a masters degree in Clinical Psychology and worked as a licensed therapist in the mental health field for more than a quarter century. He has worked extensively with child abuse victims within the child welfare system. He now concentrates on his writing. Source: <http://www.globalresearch.ca/the-failures-of-americas-foster-care-system/5392130>

Legislatively Speaking – Foster Care 19 July 2014 By Senator, Lena C. Taylor State Senator Lena C. Taylor The Department of Children and Families' mandate is to protect, care for, and oversee the well-being of foster children in Wisconsin. Unfortunately, due to bureaucratic issues and misguided policy, many children – and the public – are getting the short end of the stick. This is unacceptable as it prevents all Wisconsin residents from receiving the opportunities they need in order to pursue a successful future. We need to hold Wisconsin, as well as the rest of the nation, to a higher standard when protecting our children, as it is falls to all of us; the larger community, to help those who need it most. A recent incident involving a mistreated, malnourished 1-year-old speaks volumes to the needed reform for child care services in Wisconsin. This baby – known only by her initials, B.Y. – had suffered broken ribs, bruises and internal bleeding, and hadn't gained weight since she was seven months old. The mother was quickly arrested and charged, but the most troubling detail was that she had been the target of numerous allegations of neglect previously. Over a span of five years the mother was named in five complaints. During that time, she was also caring for six other children. How many of those allegations panned out to real results to intervene and change the negative cycle? Zero. It is not only the children who are at risk. The Department of Children and Families must, under law, file a public summary of the case within 90 days. However, in the case of B.Y., the department insisted on a delay, citing an opinion from law enforcement that the summary would interfere with the investigation. However, no one from law enforcement ever asked to withhold the information, according to a Journal Sentinel investigation. After this was brought to light, the offending wording was removed and a spokesman for the department cited "evolving policy" for the delay. "The public is ill served if information within the report compromises the criminal proceedings," they said. My colleague Senator Bob Jauch (D-Poplar) hit the nail on the head when he noted that "Either they don't understand the law, or they are on the border of ignoring it." If the delay was indeed part of a new department policy, it sacrifices the public's right to know in a timely manner and their safety. Is this trade-off reasonable? I believe it isn't. B.Y.'s tragic oversight comes notwithstanding recent efforts to double down on preventing foster care abuse. In February of this year, the Bureau of Milwaukee Child Welfare launched the Care4Kids program, which "creates a medical home for children in foster and other types of out-of-home care". Care4Kids established a permanent team of specialists and primary care providers whose duty is to provide foster children with healthcare. Unfortunately, the program only serves about half of Wisconsin foster children – and only if their health issues are reported. This leaves room for unwilling or purposefully neglectful parents, for whom the status quo doesn't change. Senator Tammy Baldwin recently worked to improve medical coverage for foster children by introducing the Quality Foster Care Services Act. The proposed bill would look to extend Title XIX (Medicaid) of the Social Security Act to encompass medical assistance for therapeutic Foster Care Services. Unfortunately, the bill does not have much hope of passing. As long as our Federal Congress remains unable to act effectively, it is up to Wisconsin to take action and address this problem ourselves. As Wisconsinites, we have shown that we are not willing to stand idle to our own issues. The Program Care4Kids was recently implemented for five counties in Southeastern Wisconsin, creating a medical facility and establishing medical testing requirements for individuals participating in out-of-home Foster Care. Although this initiative is a step in the right direction, it will not completely curtail our current foster care issues. We need to do more to improve communities across our state, and that includes implementing these programs in all counties. Currently, Care4Kids only applies to roughly 2,600 foster care participants, which only accounts for roughly 33% of all children in the Wisconsin foster care system. The lack of complete coverage for all children participating in out-of-home foster care elicits the potential for more children to remain neglected, or without complete and comprehensive medical care. The question remains, how many more "B.Y.s" have to suffer because of our inaction? Almost 8,000 foster children call Wisconsin their home, and it's time for us to make sure that home treats them right. We need to ensure that all Wisconsin children are brought up right and with the opportunity to succeed in the future. We need to start seeing reforms because we can no longer afford to see our children suffer. It is in their best interest, and ours, to ensure that they live healthy, fulfilling childhoods, guaranteeing that their futures remain bright. - See more at: <http://milwaukeecourieronline.com/index.php/2014/07/19/legislatively-speaking-foster-care/#sthash.S04mH5JB.dpuf> Source: <http://milwaukeecourieronline.com/index.php/2014/07/19/legislatively-speaking-foster-care/>

Baby dies while in foster care at East Texas home - KFDA - NewsChannel 10 / Amarillo News, Weather, Sports Baby dies while in foster care at East Texas home Posted: Jul 21, 2014 6:22 AM PDT Updated: Jul 21, 2014 2:55 PM PDT HUNTINGTON, Texas (AP) - Officials say a 2-month-old girl has died at an East Texas home as the woman with whom she was living ran an errand and left several other adults to watch the baby. The Angelina County Sheriff's Department says an autopsy was scheduled Monday on the infant, whose name wasn't immediately released. Sheriff Greg Sanches says an initial review indicates the baby apparently died of natural causes. Sanches says the woman in whose care the child was entrusted had to pick someone up Saturday and left the sleeping child in the care of several family friends at a home near Huntington. One of the adults checked on the girl, noticed she wasn't breathing and called 911. Child Protective Services has been notified. Huntington is about 120 miles northeast of Houston. Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. Source: <http://www.newschannel10.com/story/26068940/baby-dies-while-in-foster-care-at-east-texas-home>

13th Judicial District seminar spotlights benefits of child permanency Register for free presentation by Aug. 8 By Journal-Advocate staff Posted: 07/21/2014 01:34:22 PM MDT A seminar in Fort Morgan on Aug. 15 will focus on the benefits of permanent child placement. The seminar is offered to residents of Colorado's 13th Judicial District who have an interest in the state's foster-care system or dependency and neglect cases. Children who "age out" of the foster-care system lose benefits and, without a family or other support to turn to, may not know how to live independently, an announcement from the District Court says. "Children placed outside their homes face many challenges during their formative years. The lack of permanency is one of those challenges," said 13th Judicial District Chief Judge Michael K. Singer. "The courts, the child welfare system, the legal profession, and the community all benefit when we focus together on the goal of finding permanent homes for these young people. The goal of this seminar is to hear from professionals, community organizations, and other interested persons concerning the best methods of achieving permanency for vulnerable children." The idea of the seminar sprang from a Colorado Judicial Branch workshop for experts in dependency and neglect cases in the fall of 2013. During the workshop, two youths spoke about their experiences in the state's foster-care system, and an idea to bring them to the 13th Judicial District to speak grew to a district-wide seminar on permanency. Those two youths will be among the speakers during the seminar, scheduled from 7:45 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 15, at the Fort Morgan High School Auditorium, 709 E. Riverview Avenue in Fort Morgan. Attorneys who attend will receive continuing legal education credits, and all attendees will be offered breakfast, a snack and lunch. There is no cost to attend the seminar. Other speakers include people involved with permanency roundtables, which consist of members involved in a child's case who get together and help guide permanency decisions for the specific child; and members of the Office of the Child's Representative, Respondent Parents' Counsel, the Family Justice Information System and the Court Improvement Program. Organizers encourage attendees to bring something to take notes on as there is not a writing surface available in the auditorium. The 13th Judicial District includes Kit Carson, Logan, Morgan, Phillips, Sedgwick, Washington and Yuma counties. For more information or to reserve a seat at the seminar, please contact Amanda Lindsey at amanda.lindsey@judicial.state.co.us by Aug. 8. There is also information on Facebook under the group 2014 13th Judicial District Permanency Seminar. Source: http://www.journal-advocate.com/sterling-local_news/ci_26185862/13th-judicial-district-seminar-spotlights-benefits-child-permanency

Court Orders State to Finish Foster Care Reforms Monday, July 21, 2014 Today, Judge Charles Snyder of the Whatcom County Superior Court ruled that the State must finish the job of reforming the foster care system as it promised to do in a 2011 settlement agreement in Braam v. State. Noting that the "essence" of the class-action lawsuit was about "inappropriate and insufficient levels of care and services", the court rejected the State's request to significantly weaken the settlement agreement. The Court also rejected attempts by the State to get out of required: Reductions in caseloads; Increases in monthly visits to children and visits between siblings; and Improvements to caregiver training and support of caregivers. "The Court affirmed today that the clear promises made to foster children to improve care must be kept," said Mary Van Cleve of Columbia Legal Services, who argued the motion on behalf of the foster children. "While the State has made some significant improvements under this case, key areas still need fixing. As a result of today's ruling, the State should redouble its efforts." While it recognized that the State had made "enormous" changes to the foster care system under the lawsuit, the Court found that the State had not shown that it was unable to comply with the rest of the agreement. Last December, the attorneys for the foster children sought enforcement of the Revised Settlement Agreement. In 2011, the State hailed the Revised Agreement, which followed an earlier 2004 agreement, as a "model" containing "realistic and achievable" reforms. Had the Plaintiffs not sought court enforcement, the case would have been dismissed. The State will be required to tell the Court how it plans to comply, and the Court will review progress in 12 to 14 months. The Court found the State was in compliance on services to medically fragile children, an outcome on which it had complied for 18 of the last 24 months. The Agreement covers all 10,000 children in foster care. More detailed data on the Braam case can be found at www.braamkids.org and http://www.dshs.wa.gov/ca/about/imp_settlement.asp. Source: <http://columbialegal.org/Court-Orders-State-Foster-Care-Reforms>

Former Bethel foster parent Peter Tony sentenced to 66 years for child sex abuse Michelle Theriault Boots July 22, 2014 Email Print Text Size-A +A The Bethel house where Marilyn and Peter Tony lived from the early 1990s to 2012, and where Peter Tony allegedly abused children in the couple's foster and daycare. Eli Martin photo A Fairbanks judge on Tuesday sentenced Peter Tony, a former foster parent in the Southwest Alaska community of Bethel, to 66 years in prison for sexually abusing children. "You will be in jail for the rest of your life," Superior Court Judge Douglas Blankenship told the 70-year-old defendant. Related: Former Bethel foster father Peter Tony pleads guilty to child sex abuse charges Alaska Office of Children's Services under scrutiny in wake of Bethel sex-abuse allegations Blankenship said Tony preyed on vulnerable children entrusted to his care for nearly 40 years. Tony admitted to molesting his stepdaughters, two of whom later committed suicide, an unknown number of foster children in his care and a young girl his wife was babysitting, according to a court transcript of the hearing. The abuse happened between 1973 and 2012, the transcript said. One of Tony's victims, former stepdaughter Kimberley Bruesch, was in the courtroom. Bruesch has spoken publicly about the effect of Tony's abuse on her and her sisters. The judge found there was "likely a connection between (Tony's molestation) and (the sisters) taking their own lives." The sentencing came five months after Tony pleaded guilty to three counts of sexual abuse of a minor. The charges were linked to molestation of a 4-year-old girl in 2011 and a 12-year-old foster child in 1998, the only instances of abuse prosecutors said they had enough evidence to charge. Tony's case has attracted widespread attention in part because some of the abuse happened while he was a state-licensed foster parent in a region where child sex abuse is epidemic. Bethel district attorney June Stein has said her office prosecutes more than 200 cases of sexual abuse of a minor each year. From 1984 to 1998, Tony and his wife, Marilyn, took in seriously needy foster children, including teenagers who still needed help learning to clean themselves, children with fetal alcohol syndrome and kids who had already cycled through dozens of foster homes. After the couple's foster care license was abruptly revoked in 1998 due to what is described in state records as a "substantiated" report of sexual abuse, they began operating an informal, unlicensed daycare. Tony was arrested 15 years later on sex abuse charges. In court Tuesday, Tony made a statement in which he talked about his "blackout" drinking days and said he had "no guidance" growing up, according to an audio recording of the hearing from Bethel public radio station KYUK. When asked whether he had anything to say to his victims, Tony apologized. "I am sorry those things happened," Tony said. The father of another victim was also present in the courtroom Tuesday, with the same victim's mother listening in by phone. The sister of a third victim listened by phone, too. Blankenship said he had considered factors, including the possibility of rehabilitation, in sentencing Tony. He concluded that Tony should not be eligible for discretionary parole because of a "lack of likelihood for rehabilitation." The 82-year sentence, with 16 suspended, handed down by the judge means there is no chance Tony will live long enough to be released on mandatory parole. "He will be long dead before he was eligible," Stein said. "Perhaps a sentence of this magnitude will deter other people." Contact Michelle Theriault Boots at mtheriault@adn.com. Source: <http://www.adn.com/article/20140722/former-bethel-foster-parent-peter-tony-sentenced-66-years-child-sex-abuse>

Tales of foster care abuse sound 'like prison' Posted: Jul 23, 2014 10:05 PM PDT Updated: Jul 24, 2014 1:09 PM PDT AUSTIN, Texas (AP) - A legislative committee looking to improve the state's foster care system is hearing from Texans who told lawmakers of abuse and trauma in the foster homes where they grew up. Some choked back tears Thursday during emotional testimony before the Texas House Select Committee on Child Protection. Committee

Chairwoman Dawnna Dukes even said what she heard sounded "like prison." The state's 17,000-child foster system has been under scrutiny since seven children died of abuse or neglect in fiscal year 2013. This year, only one such youngster has died. But officials are investigating the July 6 drowning in Lake Georgetown of two siblings in foster care, ages 4 and 6. A recent review found child protective caseworkers only spend 26 percent of their job meeting with youngsters and families. Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Source: <http://www.newschannel10.com/story/26098879/house-committee-scrutinizing-texas-foster-care>

Maryland agencies need to improve oversight of group homes, officials say Signs of financial mismanagement can go unnoticed by regulators, they acknowledge Comments 1 2 next | single page Health Secretary Dr. Joshua Sharfstein (right) and Department of Human Resources Secretary Ted Dallas at a legislative briefing on oversight of group homes. (Doug Donovan / Baltimore Sun / July 24, 2014) Related Group home for disabled children struggled to provide adequate care Disabled foster child dies at Maryland group home Maryland group home where boy died had staffing shortage, nurse says Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun 8:42 p.m. EDT, July 24, 2014 State officials said at a legislative briefing Thursday that their agencies must do more to flag financial mismanagement at group homes — problems similar to those that went unheeded at an Anne Arundel County facility where a 10-year-old disabled foster child died this month. Maryland's health and human resources secretaries appeared together before a joint committee of state lawmakers in Annapolis to answer questions about oversight of LifeLine, the operator of the group home where the boy died. They also recommended legislative action to enhance their oversight of contractors that care for such foster children. The hearing was triggered by a Baltimore Sun investigation revealing that the state awarded contracts worth millions of dollars to LifeLine despite numerous issues — problems with past care, an imprisoned founder, unpaid taxes, and allegations of abuse and neglect — that several lawmakers said should have prompted officials to act sooner. "How many chances do we give these providers?" said state Sen. Joanne Benson, a Prince George's County Democrat. "Do we keep on giving them chances hoping and praying that it'll get better?" Maryland Health Secretary Dr. Joshua M. Sharfstein shot back: "Absolutely not." He defended health inspectors, saying they acted quickly once serious issues with LifeLine's care were identified this year. But he and Ted Dallas, secretary of the Department of Human Resources, said both agencies need to do more when contractors display questionable management. "I think we probably give people too many chances on the administrative and financial side," Sharfstein said. "That's why we're here very clearly saying we can do better and that the way that we can do better is to pay more attention, have more tools and be able to be more aggressive around administrative and financial issues before they start to affect clinical care." Dallas, sitting next to Sharfstein before two dozen lawmakers, provided a similar message: "We think both agencies need to be more sophisticated and have better resources when we're looking at fiscal issues as opposed to quality of care." The state began the process of removing 11 children from LifeLine's Laurel-area apartments in early June, after confirming complaints of poor care in February and May, and after learning from The Sun that the company had failed to report numerous calls to Anne Arundel police and fire departments alleging abuse and neglect. But on July 2 — before all of the children were moved to a new facility — Damaud Martin died. His LifeLine nurse told The Sun that the apartment he was living in was understaffed that night. Officials are investigating his death and whether inadequate care might have played a part in it; they have said it is too early to draw conclusions. LifeLine officials did not respond to requests for comment Thursday. Lawmakers went out of their way not to blame state agencies for LifeLine's problems. But several took issue with the distinction Sharfstein and Dallas made between effective monitoring of care and ineffective monitoring of the company's financial problems. "It is my feeling that when you have administrative violations and you have fiscal problems that this is definitely going to impact the quality of care," said Sen. Joan Carter Conway, the Baltimore Democrat who called for the briefing. She said a company facing substantial tax debt — LifeLine had an IRS lien of more than $1 million — would start "cutting corners" and use its funds to pay down that debt. Sen. Edward Reilly, a Republican from Anne Arundel County, agreed: "If an organization is under financial pressure, the quality of care will suffer." The Sun's investigation found that state officials were not aware LifeLine had broken its lease on its Laurel headquarters office early this year. The company failed to tell state officials that it filed for bankruptcy protection in August 2012 — listing its founder, Randall Martin Jr., as the sole shareholder. Martin was sentenced to 50 years in prison in February 2013 after being convicted of setting fire to his former mistress' rowhouse. Despite a state audit that found LifeLine was insolvent, the state extended the company's contract in March 2013. Six months later, the state awarded LifeLine a nearly three-year contract worth $4.9 million. Dallas told lawmakers Thursday that the six-month extension gave the company time to provide a plan to fix its financial problems and allowed his agency to start planning to remove LifeLine's children if necessary. "Doing that in less than a month was not something we thought was safe and prudent, and we wanted to give ourselves more time on both fronts," he said. That's not what his agency told the Board of Public Works, according to state records. Its remarks in the agenda said the extension was being requested "due to the limited competition received" for the contract to provide group home care to foster children who are severely disabled. Several lawmakers at Thursday's briefing questioned the 2011 decision by state officials to close LifeLine's facility for disabled adults while allowing the company to care for medically fragile children. In March 2011, the state suspended the company's license to care for disabled adults after finding poor care — including the care given to three residents who died. Sharfstein said the same inspectors who recommended closing the adult facility said LifeLine's care of disabled children was fine. Just a week after the suspension by Sharfstein's agency, Dallas' agency approved a $15 million contract for LifeLine to care for more disabled children. Read more: http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/sun-investigates/bs-md-lifeline-hearing-20140723.0.4372501_story#ixzz38tuQamPL

DCF Commissioner Catches Heat Over New Policy 5 days ago by Louisa Moller Reporter Comments \(0\) Share Update Share Update: 3 20 Share Update: 3 20 DCF Commissioner Responds to Heat On New Mental Health... WTIC - Hartford, CT DCF Commissioner Responds to Heat On New Mental Health Policy Share Video Link & Embed DCF Commissioner Responds to Heat On New Mental Health Policy Share on email Linking and embedding are disabled for this video. Copy video embed code: Copy video link: Privacy Policy | Terms of Use This video player must be at least 300x170 pixels in order to operate. DCF Commissioner Responds to Heat On New Mental Health... DCF Commissioner Responds to Heat On New Mental Health Policy Previous Up Next Share on email Connecticut Department of Children and Families Commissioner Joette Katz is standing by a new policy to shut down agency group homes. Katz appeared on Thursday with several organizations before a group of lawmakers to deliver a progress report on a statewide overhaul of the mental health system for children. Katz said she wants to reduce the number of children in group homes of institutionalized care from 21 percent to 10 percent. But, some lawmakers worry that the move has sent more children with complex mental health needs to emergency rooms. "We've moved hundreds and hundreds of children into a different type of setting. It's having an impact on the system," State Senator Beth Bye (D-West Hartford) said. Katz countered that DCF children only make up roughly 25 percent of children served in ERs. "What I say is that children should be raised in homes, not in institutions. And any congregate facility, whether it's a group home, a safe home, a residential treatment facility, Should not be a placement. It is a treatment setting," Katz said. A concrete plan for the statewide overhaul of the mental health system is scheduled to be presented to lawmakers in October. Read more: <http://foxct.com/2014/07/24/DCF-commissioner-catches-heat-over-new-policy/#ixzz38tvUHZkp>

Tales of foster care abuse in Texas sound 'like prison' By Associated PressPublished: July 24, 2014, 6:28 amUpdated: July 24, 2014, 8:40 pm 20 431 Related Coverage Siblings drown in Lake Georgetown; foster home investigated Report: Texas not giving face time to foster kids AUSTIN (AP/KXAN) — Young adults who grew up in Texas' foster care system recounted harrowing stories of abuse and emotional trauma Thursday for members of a legislative committee looking for ways to better protect such children. Some choked back tears during a hearing of the Texas House Select Committee on Child Protection, and chairwoman Dawnna Dukes said what she heard made foster care sometimes sound "like prison." The state's 17,000-child foster system has been under intense scrutiny since seven children died of abuse or neglect in fiscal year 2013. Another three died "in kinship care," after being assigned to live with relatives. This year, one foster child has died, but officials are still investigating two siblings in foster care, ages 4 and 6, who drowned July 6 in Lake Georgetown, near Austin. An outside review found child protective caseworkers only spend 26 percent of their job meeting with youngsters and families. "If we expect them to come out and graduate college we need to make sure they're not being abused in care," said Tyrone Obaseki, a former foster care child. He now spends his time advocating for the children he says cannot fight for themselves. "I was body slammed at the age of 6. My teeth fell out... no one really cared." Lena Francis, now 20, testified that she was in foster care in Houston from birth until age 7 — then adopted. She said she was often locked in a dark room for hours and prohibited from eating or drinking. "These agencies, they don't know what happens. And how can you report that because, at the end of the day, you've still got to go home with that person?" Francis said, her voice cracking. Francis said Texas should mandate drug testing for potential foster and adoptive parents, as well as institute random visits to homes where children are placed. "For the most part, we're being abused," Francis said. "I want people to be held accountable." Roshaude Williams, 23, said he was in foster care until age 19 and lived in two-dozen homes around Texas. He said foster parents put him on medications he didn't need because state funding increased for youngsters with medical problems — and that he eventually attempted suicide by walking into traffic. "I guess it's all right now, but I've had 20-something jobs," Williams said. "I can't hold one down." John Specia, commissioner of the Department of Family and Protective Services, said that the system fails when children are shuttled between so many homes. He said he's pushing for an agency "culture change" that would make foster care placements more permanent, saying no child should reach adulthood while still bouncing around the system. "I've met very, very few children that aged out of the foster care system, that were in the system for any length of time, that had a good experience," said Specia who has been in his post about 18 months. "If a child goes in at 2 and ages out at 18, we've failed miserably and the child is going to have very, very serious problems." Former caseworkers say the workload also hampered their efforts to help the children. "There were times where I had very high caseloads and I was not able to devote the time a child needed to them," former caseworker Ashley Harris said. "Caseworkers are just running round checking on kids but are not able to look for red flags and that ultimately puts the child in danger." Specia said that, today, 40 percent of Texas foster children have been placed with relatives, and that he'd like to see that increase. "We have problems in some foster homes I will not deny that," Specia said. "We have an awful lot of good providers out there doing a good job, and we have a lot of foster parents out there doing a good job." Dukes responded: "And we have a lot of folks that are not, and that's the reason we are having hearings." Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. Source: <http://kxan.com/2014/07/24/house-committee-scrutinizing-texas-foster-care/>

Our Foster Care System Is Becoming A 'Pipeline' For Human Trafficking 60 percent of the children rescued in a recent FBI sting had been in foster care at some point Written by Elise Hilton | Friday, July 25, 2014 28 If we really look at this issue of child trafficking in America, it's another lens through which to understand how broken our foster care system is. Many of these girls, especially, have been put into multiple placements, and many of these girls in those different placements have been abused. So one survivor leader whom we work with who was trafficked from the age of 10 to 17 – all through California, Nevada, Washington state – she talks about how, for her, foster care was the training ground to being trafficked. She understood that she was attached to a check. And what she points out is that at least the pimp told her that he loved her, and she never heard that in any of her foster care placements. At any given time in the U.S., there are about half a million children in foster care. Many of these children are in crisis situations, and will be in foster care for only a short time, returning home or to live with a family member when the crisis has been resolved. Other children, however, remain in the system. The lucky ones will remain in one home, loved and nurtured, possibly even adopted (although for most that can take up to 4 years.) Unfortunately, most children in foster care will have to live in at least 3 different placements, and every year, 300,000 children "age out" of the system, meaning they turn 18 and no longer receive support services. Most foster parents try their best to provide stable, loving environments for the children in their care. However, it is becoming increasingly clear that the U.S. foster care system is becoming a "pipeline" for human trafficking. In an interview with NPR, Malika Saada Saar of Rights4Girls discusses this issue: If we really look at this issue of child trafficking in America, it's another lens through which to understand how broken our foster care system is. Many of these girls, especially, have been put into multiple placements, and many of these girls in those different placements have been abused. So one survivor leader whom we work with who was trafficked from the age of 10 to 17 – all through California, Nevada, Washington state – she talks about how, for her, foster care was the training ground to being trafficked. She understood that she was attached to a check. And what she points out is that at least the pimp told her that he loved her, and she never heard that in any of her foster care placements. Further, Saada Saar cites 60 percent of the children rescued in a recent FBI sting had been in foster care at some point. One young woman, Withelma "T" Ortiz Walker Pettigrew, testifying before the U.S. House of Representatives' Committee on Ways and Means, told her story of foster care and being trafficked. The experience of foster care, she said, gave her the mindset that she was tied to a paycheck, that her worth and value were not intrinsic; she was worth only the money she brought in. This set her up as easy prey for traffickers. From my own experience and that of others, the money that is given by the state is supposed to be utilized to provide for the child's basic needs — however the money is often used for other things, specifically for special luxuries for the caretaker and their biological children and families, unrelated to the financial support of the child it was intended for. These caregivers will make statements like "you're not my child, I don't care what's going on with you, as long as you're not dead, I'll continue to get my paycheck." This "nothing but a paycheck" theory objectifies the youth and the youth begin to normalize the perception that their presence is to be used for financial gain. This creates a mind frame for the youth that their purpose is to bring income into a household. This mindset, she testified, sets many children in foster care up for the seduction and grooming of human traffickers. Craving attention and stability, a child who has been moved from one placement to another can easily find themselves lured into a world of promises made by the trafficker, only to find themselves used for financial gain. Many children in foster care have been previously abused, putting them at further risk. Another obstacle that must be overcome in order to prevent children from falling prey to traffickers is treating victims as criminals. Many states continue to prosecute children who have been picked up for solicitation or prostitution, rather than providing mental health and other services that would keep them out of the hands of traffickers. CAS Research & Safety cites the need for emotionally stable care for these children: Foster care children are targeted by traffickers because of their need for love, affirmation, and protection. Victims are trained to call sex traffickers "daddies" and themselves "wifies" – a perverted reflection of the family unit that these children are seeking. These children long for a family...even if it means being subjected to extreme violence and abuse. There will always be children who require care outside of their biological families. Clearly, what we are doing now is not always working well. In fact, it seems as if foster care is often a precursor to becoming a victim of human trafficking. We must do better for our children, especially children who are most vulnerable. Source: http://theaquilareport.com/our-foster-care-system-is-becoming-a-pipeline-for-human-trafficking/?utm_source=rss&utm_medium=rss&utm_campaign=our-foster-care-system-is-becoming-a-pipeline-for-human-trafficking

Woman accused of stealing from mentally disabled in group home: Best of the beat Print By Barb Galbincea, Northeast Ohio Media Group Sun News Email the author on July 26, 2014 at 4:00 PM, updated July 26, 2014 at 4:24 PM Reddit Email A Cleveland woman is accused of stealing from residents of a Westlake group home. Here are some of the stories you may have missed in the last week from Bay Village, Rocky River and Westlake. Accused: A Cleveland woman is accused of stealing food stamp cards from three adults with mental disabilities who live in a Westlake group home. Police say that Shawuan Telfair bought hundreds of dollars worth of food using the cards. Source: http://www.cleveland.com/westlake/index.ssf/2014/07/woman_accused_of_stealing_from.html

Trial pending for woman accused of abuse Anthony Borrelli, Staff writer 1:03 p.m. EDT July 27, 2014 A woman accused of sexual abuse has pleaded not guilty to the charges and is awaiting trial. Broome County Court (Photo: ANTHONY BORRELLI / STAFF PHOTO) Story Highlights Joyce Prince is accused of sexually abusing a resident of a state-operated group home in the Town of Dickinson. A trial is expected to be held in Broome County Court. Prince pleaded not guilty after being indicted by a grand jury. CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A Johnson City woman has pleaded not guilty in Broome County Court to charges she had inappropriate sexual contact in 2012 with a male resident of a state-operated alternative group home in the Town of Dickinson. Joyce D. Prince, 38, was indicted June 27 by a Broome County grand jury for a felony count of third-degree criminal sexual act and a misdemeanor count of endangering the welfare of a child. She pleaded not guilty June 30. The case is expected to go to trial before Judge Martin E. Smith, though no date has been set. State police said an investigation found Prince, while she was employed in the state-operated Prospect 1 SOIRA group home, engaged in inappropriate sexual contact with an unidentified developmentally disabled male resident. The alleged victim was 16 years old at the time of the incident, court papers said. The group home is operated by the State Office for People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD). Prince, who was employed by the state for 13 years, is accused of committing the illegal sexual act in early September 2012, according to court papers. Prince's defense lawyer, Ronald Benjamin of Binghamton, said the allegations of the person being sexually abused by his client lack any merit. The case could go to trial sometime this fall, he said. "It's a totally ridiculous case," Benjamin said. "We would like to get her exonerated." In December 2013, an arbitration hearing regarding Prince's employment determined allegations were not credible enough to terminate her, according to court records. Prince remains on administrative leave until the criminal case is resolved, Benjamin said. Prince was released on her own recognizance after the arraignment in county court. Source: <http://www.pressconnects.com/story/news/crime/2014/07/27/woman-abuse-trial-pending/13221891/>

Michael Jackson's daughter advised by doctors to reconnect with her family Paris, 16, has reportedly become estranged from her relatives following her attempted suicide last June and medical professionals believe she'll find it beneficial if she re-establishes her relationship with them Share on twitter Share on email Share on facebook Share on print More Sharing Services 1 27 July 2014 A source told TMZ.com: "The doctors who have been treating Paris have told her she needs to create a family support system. She's become estranged from her entire family." The troubled star - who has grown close to her biological mother Debbie Rowe - has spent almost a year at therapeutic boarding school Diamond Ranch Academy in Utah, but doctors think her mental health will continue to improve if she rekindles her bond with her grandmother Katherine Jackson, her brother Prince, 17, and her half-brother Blanket, 12. The source explained: "Doctors want her to mend fences with Katherine, her siblings and other immediate family ... they think it's important to her healing." The actress was given the all-clear from doctors in May and is reportedly adamant she won't return to the $14,000-per-month private school in the Autumn. However, Katherine - who is a co-guardian to Michael's three children alongside T.J. Jackson - doesn't think that's a very good idea and thinks she should return. Source: <http://home.nzcity.co.nz/news/article.aspx?id=190800&fm=newsmain%2Cnrhl>

Marcus Fiesel: Horrific story of foster child's murder retold in TV documentary WCPO Staff 11:15 AM, Jul 27, 2014 7:41 AM, Jul 28, 2014 Marcus Fiesel Copyright 2014 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Copyright 2014 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Marcus Fiesel UNION TOWNSHIP, Ohio – Three-year-old Marcus Fiesel's gruesome murder by his foster parents shocked the community in August 2006. The story was retold in a TV documentary Sunday night. Liz and David Carroll wrapped Marcus in a blanket, bound him with duct tape and left him in a hot closet without food and water while they went out of town for a weekend family reunion, prosecutors said. After finding him dead, David Carroll and his live-in lover, Amy Baker, took Marcus' body to a rural area and burned it with gasoline. Then they threw the remains in the Ohio River. The Investigation Discovery channel looked back at Marcus' story late Sunday night. Marcus died of heat exhaustion between Aug. 4 and Aug. 6, authorities said. After that, the Carrolls and Baker spent nine days planning a cover-up. On Aug. 15, Liz Carroll reported Marcus missing. She told police she had taken Marcus and three other children to Juilfs Park in Anderson Township. She said she passed out because of low blood pressure and when she recovered, Marcus was gone. A week later, Carroll held a news conference at the park and made a televised plea for help in finding the boy. Thousands of people searched the area for days. Within a week, though, Baker told authorities that the Carrolls killed the child, and the foster parents were arrested. Liz Carroll was found guilty and was sentenced to 54 years to life. David Carroll took a plea deal and got 16 years to life. Baker got immunity. Liz Carroll told police the whole thing was Baker's idea and that Baker tied up Marcus, but prosecutors didn't believe her. Angry that Baker got off scot-free, a Kentucky prosecutor charged her with tampering with evidence for dumping the remains within Kentucky's jurisdiction. Those charges were dropped. Baker was convicted on a drug charge in Ohio and spent a few months in prison. Marcus' death put the spotlight on failings in the foster care system. The non-profit that placed Marcus with the Carrolls lost its license. New laws put tougher restrictions on foster parent eligibility and require closer screening of applicants and more training. They also require daily background checks on foster parents and regular checks on children. RELATED: Marcus' murder drives foster-care system improvements Source: <http://www.wcpo.com/news/local-news/marcus-fiesel-horrific-story-of-foster-childs-murder-retold-in-tv-documentary>

Ruling balances kids' safety and family rights Cedar Rapids Gazette 11:58 p.m. CDT July 26, 2014 Buy Photo Gavel(Photo: The Register)Buy Photo 3 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE That the Iowa Department of Human Services has been able to remove minors from parents' custody and into foster care with little or no judicial oversight is disturbing at best. That the family's continued separation might be based on stipulations outlined in a loosely regulated "safety plan" is outright frightening. We applaud District Judge Ian Thornhill for finding it unconstitutional for DHS to use such voluntary agreements when they interfere with custodial rights of a parent or when they are initiated by a non-custodial parent or one without any established rights. The widespread use of these documents and lack of strict guidelines or adequate oversight has resulted in unacceptable, if unintended, consequences for too many families. In a recent Johnson County court case, a 5-year-old girl was placed in foster care after a non-custodial parent made unsubstantiated allegations of abuse, signing a "voluntary foster care placement agreement." The custodial parent was not notified and did not take part in the agreement. Even after the allegations were proved false and an attorney, hired by the custodial parent, petitioned for return of the child, Iowa DHS refused. Because of Thornhill's judgment, no more will such plans be used to remove or keep children from their home without the consent of a custodial parent. Further, they will not prevent a parent's contact with a child, or restrict access to a child by a parent who has not signed the agreement. Thornhill's decision puts in place some much-needed boundaries on the agency's use of voluntary removals. It is unconscionable that a child could be taken without his custodial parent's knowledge, consent or proper judicial review. Source: <http://www.desmoinesregister.com/story/opinion/2014/07/27/ruling-balances-kids-safety-family-rights/13232151/>

Counselor charged with assaulting 16-year-old after disciplinary dispute Story Comments \(15\) Image \(1\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next Andre Lamar Heard Andre Lamar Heard Posted: Monday, July 28, 2014 12:00 am Counselor charged with assaulting 16-year-old after disciplinary dispute By ANDREA SALAZAR andrea.salazar@theeagle.com The Eagle | 15 comments An employee at a local children's residential treatment center recently was suspended after Brazos County authorities charged him with assaulting a 16-year-old at the facility. Andre Heard, 36, was arrested Friday in connection with a June 25 incident at Everyday Life Residential Treatment Center in the 6900 block of Broach Road near Bryan. Cedric Payton, co-founder and administrator of the 13-year-old center, described Heard as a good role model with extensive training and said he was defending himself against the teenager's attack from behind. The facility manager called authorities to report a physical altercation between Heard and the teen, which occurred as Heard tried to cut a lock off the boy's locker to take away his computer for disciplinary purposes, according to court documents. Heard, a counselor at the center for almost two years, told investigators that after the 16-year-old refused to comply with staff members' instructions, the two began "tussling" and ended up on the ground, according to authorities. The employee said he was holding the teenager down by the back side of the neck, but added that, because the boy was moving around, it was possible he was holding him down by the front of the neck, investigators said. The boy, who has since moved to a group home in Boerne, told police that after he pushed Heard, the counselor "went crazy," grabbed him by the throat and slammed him to the ground, according to the probable cause statement for Heard's arrest. Photos from the day of the incident show scratches and bruising to the teen's neck, as well as blood coming from his left ear, where an earring had been torn off, investigators said in the probable cause statement for Heard's arrest. The document didn't specify whether the teen was treated at a hospital. Heard was charged with Class A misdemeanor assault causing bodily injury, which is punishable by up to one year in jail. He was released from jail Friday after posting $4,000 bail. Payton said no employees previously have been charged with such a crime at his facility. "We're on top of it," Payton said. "We're cooperating fully with CPS and the sheriff's department." Open since 2001, Everyday Life cares for 44 abused or neglected boys between the ages of 10 and 17. It has an A-plus rating from the Better Business Bureau and is a child protective services licensed child-care administrator. The Texas Department of Family and Protective Services website lists 11 deficiencies, described as any failure to comply with child care licensing standards, at the facility during inspections in the last two years, including two reporting violations and the misapplication of a prone restraint on a child. The Brazos County Sheriff's Office reported receiving 36 calls for service from the treatment center between January 2013 and March 2014, mostly regarding runaways. "We're not known for being a facility that doesn't care for its kids," Payton said. "We do a lot for our kids and the community." Source: http://www.theeagle.com/news/crime/counselor-charged-with-assaulting--year-old-after-disciplinary-dispute/article_9599feac-3017-5355-b802-3059fe402832.html

Former mentor at NE Ohio children's treatment center gets 44 years in prison for sexual abuse THE ASSOCIATED PRESS July 28, 2014 - 7:13 pm EDT AAA CLEVELAND — A worker from a now-closed residential treatment center has been sentenced to 44 years in prison for sexually abusing two teenage girls who lived at the northeast Ohio facility where she was a strength coach and mentor. At a sentencing hearing Monday, the judge called 34-year-old Cassandra Goodson a predator. Goodson is from the Cleveland suburb of Shaker Heights. Prosecutors say she began having sex with two girls when the teens were 13 and 15. Goodson pleaded guilty last month to six counts of sexual battery and five counts of unlawful sexual conduct with a minor. Goodson's attorney did not return telephone calls. The Cleveland diocese's Catholic Charities converted the residential facility for troubled teens into an outpatient center earlier this year. Source: <http://www.therepublic.com/view/story/2726fde0f8ce4c75b827235da6b9ce0b/OH--Ex-Mentor-Sexual-Abuse>

Paris Jackson Leaves Boarding School For Family? Michael Jackson's Daughter Now Has A Boyfriend By Chill Harrison | July 28, 2014 09:15 PM EDT More Sharing Services 0 comments (Photo : Instagram @parisjacksonn) Paris Jackson has left boarding school, at least for the meantime, so she could bond with her family. However, this time Michael Jackson's daughter might be bringing back her boyfriend. According to the report by TMZ, Paris Jackson left boarding school for family as she was spotted hanging out with her friends in Calabasas on Wednesday night. Her cousin and co-guardian, T.J. Jackson, was also seen accompanying them to make sure Michael Jackson's daughter is alright. Source: <http://www.kpopstarz.com/articles/101336/20140728/paris-jackson-boarding-school-michael-jackson-daughter.htm> (HEAL Note: Keep Paris Free and Free ALL The Children!)

Appeals court orders permit revoked in Clarkson Street group home battle By Alan Prendergast Tue., Jul. 29 2014 at 1:05 PM Write Comment Categories: Follow That Story, News The Bennet-Field mansion at 740 Clarkson, bought in 2011 for $700,000. The Colorado Court of Appeals has overruled a

Denver judge's decision to allow Open Door Ministries to operate a treatment program for recovering addicts in an historic mansion on Clarkson Street -- the latest twist in a long-running zoning battle in the neighborhood that was the subject of my 2011 feature "Meet the Neighbors." ODM now has only a few weeks to either appeal the decision to the Colorado Supreme Court or make drastic changes to its Lighthouse boarding home, which neighbors contend was started with an improperly issued permit, one that the appeals court now says must be revoked. See also: "Judge's ruling further muddles group home flap" ODM acquired the 6,700-square foot Bennett-Field house at a short sale for $700,000 more than three years ago, planning to use it as a residential-treatment facility for recovering male addicts and alcoholics. Neighbors, however, complained that the area was already saturated with group homes, and ODM's bid for a "transitional housing" permit for the operation was twice denied by city officials. A city anti-clustering ordinance requires that large residential-care facilities be at least 2,000 feet from each other and that no more than two can exist within a 4,000-foot radius of any newcomer. There are already three such facilities less than 4,000 feet from 740 Clarkson. But ODM did obtain a room-and-board permit for the property, allowing it to move its clients into the house. (One judge subsequently ordered them to operate certain portions of their program off-premises.) That R&B permit was obtained before ODM even purchased the house, on December 30, 2010, the last day such a permit could be sought before the area was down-zoned in a manner that prohibited such uses. Next-door neighbor Jesse Lipschuetz took ODM to court, arguing that the city never should have issued the permit. Denver District Judge Ann B. Frick agreed; but she also gave weight to ODM executive director David Warren's argument that his organization had relied in good faith on the city's action and would suffer harm if the permit was revoked. Eighteen months ago, Judge Frick granted summary judgment to ODM. But the current appeals court ruling maintains that Frick's court didn't have authority to address the issue because ODM hadn't complied with the notification requirements involved in filing its cross-claim. That decision doesn't address the neighbors' ire over the city's confusing and often conflicting zoning actions, but the result is -- at least for now -- a victory for residents of the block who believe the area already hosts too many group homes. Whether there will be further rounds of legal argument is unclear. Lipschuetz and Warren could not be immediately reached for comment. Source:

http://blogs.westword.com/latestword/2014/07/appeals_court_orders_permit_revoked_in_clarkson_st_group_home_battle.php

Stanton adult foster care facility ordered to close By Joe LaFurgyPublished: July 28, 2014, 7:13 pmUpdated: July 28, 2014, 7:22 pm 2 43 STANTON, Mich. (WOOD) — The state has ordered a Montcalm County adult foster care facility to close because it isn't properly licensed, meaning nearly 40 residents will have to find a new home before the end of this week. Laura's Loving Acres, located on Colby Road near Stanton, was ordered shut down by an Ingham County Circuit Court judge last Wednesday. The order goes into effect Thursday, giving families little time to find new homes for their loved ones. "I do want some answers," said Julie Ross, who managed to find another home for her mother Marge Gamble this weekend after a Department of Human Services employee informed her of the court order last week. "I want to know if we're evicted, why weren't we given notice. And if they're closing this place down, I'd like to know exactly why. We have heard nothing. Not a word, except 'get out,'" she said. Last week's court order provides some of those answers. The suicide of a resident last November brought state investigators to the facility. They started asking questions about the agreement made between the owners and residents. It was a unique arrangement. Marcia and Marvin Zylstra are listed as owners of the three buildings that make up the facility. Their son Tim Zylstra ran a separate company that provided health care. Residents needing care could use Tim Zylstra's company or one of their choosing. Since one company owned the home and one or more companies provided care, Tim Zylstra told 24 Hour News 8 he didn't need an adult foster care license. But state investigators said the separate arrangement was only on paper. Interviews with residents, guardians and other information showed Zylstra's parents "... served as nothing but decoys for an operation completely directed by Timothy Zylstra," according to court documents. And the arrangement investigators found required a license, according to regulators. The judge agreed and issued the closure order. As to why there was such short notice to residents and their families, Department of Human Services spokesman Bob Wheaton says that in general, the department has to wait for a court's decision before closing down a home. "Providers have rights, and the completion of our investigation does not necessarily bring the matter to a close — particularly when the provider disagrees with our findings," Wheaton said. He says DHS tried sending workers to help residents find new homes, but employees at Laura's Loving Acres won't let them on site. Tim Zylstra told 24 Hour News 8 that's the first he's heard of that. Meanwhile, families are caught in the middle. — Source: <http://woodtv.com/2014/07/28/stanton-adult-foster-care-facility-ordered-to-close/>

The Truth About The New Orleans School Reform Model Anyone who saw the remarkable HBO series The Wire remembers the scene in the fourth season focused on Baltimore public schools where the term "joking the stats" defined how corporate-driven reengineering of the public sphere has distorted institutions so they no longer serve ordinary people. An anniversary post for The Atlantic described that memorable moment thus, "Historical pressures push teachers in season 4 as President George Bush's No Child Left Behind education plan casts a real-life shadow. When a new city teacher, formerly of the Baltimore police, hears how his school will teach test questions, the young man immediately recognizes the dilemma: 'Joking the stats ... Making robberies into larcenies. Making rapes disappear. You joke the stats, and majors become colonels. I've been here before.' Joking the stats is a practice now so ingrained in the way education solutions are posed to the public that examples are rampant. But anyone who wants to have a genuinely honest discussion about education policy based on the real facts of the matter — and not statistical distortions achieved through gross manipulation and "policy speak" that covers up realities on the ground — needs to constantly question what policy leaders and their scribes in the press are foisting off as "information." There are better sources to turn to, and the Internet makes that search remarkably easy. No Way To Talk About NOLA An especially egregious example of "joking the stats" is the way school administration in New Orleans — where, basically, the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina was used as an opportunity to summarily fire school teachers and turn over the majority of schools to privately managed charter school operators from out of town — is now being marketed to the entire country as a "solution" for public education everywhere. As I pointed out in a recent piece for Salon, "In the most recent presidential election, both candidates hailed the New Orleans charter-dominated system as a model for other states to follow. It has been touted by think tanks on the center left and the far right as "what should come next" for "transforming" the nation's schools." I went on to explain that although this model of "reform" was being touted by politicians and in the press, "There's no evidence anywhere that the NOLA model of school reform has 'improved education.'" This prompted a letter to my Salon editor from an official of the Recovery School District in New Orleans (RSD NO) — the administrative apparatus put in charge of most of New Orleans schools post Katrina — stating there were "several inaccuracies regarding the Recovery School District and the state of public schools in New Orleans." I post the exchange that ensued not just to take readers deep into the weeds of understanding why the NOLA model for running schools should be avoided at all costs, but also to exemplify why and how to contest the "solutions" for education policy constantly being marketed to us by a disingenuous campaign that distorts data to serve its generally hidden ends. Call "Jeffrey [sic] Bryant states 'There's no evidence anywhere that the NOLA model of school reform has 'improved education.''" The percentage of RSD students performing at grade level on state assessments has more than doubled from 2007-2013 from 23% to 57%. RSD has been first in the state of Louisiana in performance growth each year since 2007. Also, the percentage of all New Orleans public school students attending a failing school has decreased from 65% in 2005 to 5.7% in 2013. 67% of all public school students in New Orleans attend A, B, or C schools, up from 20% in 2005. "Jeffrey states 'Any comparisons of academic achievement of current NOLA students to achievement levels before Katrina should be discredited because the student population has been so transformed.'" The proportion of African-American students has decreased since Katrina, but only by 7 percentage points; and the proportion of free and reduced lunch students has actually increased by 6 percentage points. Pre-Katrina — 04-05 New Orleans public school students: 94% African-American; 3% White; 3% Other 77% eligible for Free and Reduced School Lunch Post-Katrina — 12-13 New Orleans public school students: 87% African-American; 7% White; 6% Other 83% eligible for Free and Reduced School Lunch "Jeffrey states 'despite reform efforts, the NOLA Recovery School District has many of the lowest performing schools in Louisiana.'" To say this, clearly indicates that Jeffrey does not have the context needed to explain what the RSD is and what we were created to do. The RSD is not a typical school district. Back in 2003, the Louisiana legislature created the RSD to transform the state's lowest performing schools. A school has to fail for four consecutive years to be RSD eligible. So, only the lowest performing schools are eligible to be in the RSD and as you can see from the growth data, we are improving these schools and will continue to make progress to ensure they are high performing. "Jeffrey states 'You're not allowed to choose the best performing schools in the city — those that make up the Orleans Parish School Board — because those are selective enrollment only. You're not going to get priority based on proximity, even if there is a school across the street from your home.'" "OneApp, New Orleans's central enrollment system, was created by the RSD and the Orleans Parish School Board to provide students and families with the opportunity to choose a school anywhere in the city that suits their interests and needs. Of the 85 public schools, 75 are part of the enrollment system. These 75 schools, are all RSD schools and the schools that Orleans Parish School Board directly operates. In 2012, OPSB passed a policy that states that the remaining ten OPSB schools will join when their charters are up for renewal or they can volunteer to join now. RSD has been vocal about the need for all schools to join now voluntarily and some have chosen to do so already. "As far as the priority based on proximity comment, we do offer geographic priority for 50% of the available seats in a school. We did this in an effort to allow for families who want to send their children close to home, while also ensuring that students from outside of a school's neighborhood have access. "I am writing to request that accurate context and facts be sought prior to posting articles pertaining to our organization and public schools in New Orleans. I am also requesting that Jeffrey correct the article or allow us to publish a response to his piece. Thank you for your time and consideration." Zoey Reed Executive Director of Communications, External Affairs Recovery School District

Response Dear Ms. Reed, Thanks so much for reading my Salon piece "Look out, Chris Christie: The new war on public schools just might be defeated" and taking time to write a thoughtful reply. In your letter to my Salon editor, you contend that my article contained "several inaccuracies regarding the Recovery School District and the state of public schools in New Orleans." I want to respond specifically to each of your points and use this exchange as an opportunity to go into more depth about the record of achievement for RSD-NO. As I stated in my article, public school policies implemented in New Orleans following Katrina are being held up as a "reform" model for troubled school systems around the country, and it is important that we have clear understandings of what this model has actually accomplished. Your first point of difference with me was that I've misread the "evidence" of the NOLA model's school performance record. While I stated that evidence of improvement is practically nonexistent, you counter, "The percentage of RSD students performing at grade level on state assessments has more than doubled from 2007-2013 [and] the percentage of all New Orleans public school students attending a failing school has decreased from 65% in 2005 to 5.7% in 2013." Although these statistics certainly sound impressive, there is much more to the story behind these numbers. As Louisiana math teacher Mercedes Schneider has pointed out on her blog (<http://deutsch29.wordpress.com>), the main reason RSD has made such great strides in grade level performance is that from 2012 to 2013 the state changed the formula and scale for measuring school performance, which artificially inflated RSD's scores. Schneider, who also authored the book "A Chronicle of Echoes," wrote on her blog, "Of the 37 RSD-NO schools with complete 2012 and 2013 SPS/letter grade information, 26 increased a letter grade as an artifact of [state superintendent] John White's changes to the scoring system ... In other words, had the same rules applied in 2013 as were applied in 2012 to grading RSD schools, then 15 schools would have received a 'D' instead of a 'C,' five would have received an 'F' instead of a 'D,' and five would have received a 'C' instead of a 'B.' Had consistent criteria been used in grading RSD-NO from 2012 to 2013, its district letter grade would have remained a 'D.'" RSD-NO scores were further inflated due to the fact that of the 63 schools in the 2012-2013 ratings, only 49 have complete data for both years, and only 37 have letter grades other than "T" for both years. As you know, "T" schools have no letter grades because they are considered to be in "turnaround" state and are exempt for two years. Thus, of the 64 RSD-NO schools in the 2012-2013 ratings, only 37 have the data that any school outside of RSD is expected to have for a two-year period. Despite how state reports on RSD-NO performance have been able to "juke the stats" in the district's favor, those schools continue to show little if any academic gains. As Louisiana teacher Mike Deshotels recently reported on his blog (louisianaeducator.blogspot.com) the Louisiana Department of education has just released the results of the state accountability testing called LEAP and ILEAP for the Spring of 2014. The report includes a percentile ranking of each of the public school systems in the state according to the performance of their students in math, and English language arts. Deshotels, who taught Chemistry and Physics at Zachary High School near Baton Rouge and served as Research Director for the Louisiana Association of Educators, noted, "This official LDOE report now ranks the New Orleans Recovery District at the 17th percentile among all Louisiana public school districts in student performance ... this means that 83 percent of the state's school districts provide their students a better opportunity for learning than do the schools in New Orleans... This 17th percentile ranking places the New Orleans takeover schools just about where they were before the takeover." As Deshotels pointed out, "Dramatic improvements in the LEAP measure of grade level performance for math and ELA" has coincided with "very little improvement for Louisiana students" on the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAPE). He concluded, "This discrepancy is a strong indication of score inflation for the state's accountability testing. Either the tests got easier or students learned how to perform better on the state tests without significantly improving their English and math skills." Your next point of contention is with my statement, "Any comparisons of academic achievement of current NOLA students to achievement levels before Katrina should be discredited because the student population has been so transformed." My statement merely echoes advice from respected education researchers. Independent, peer-reviewed studies generally agree – as research experts at the National Education Policy Center recently did, in comments regarding a study of RSD-NO charter schools – "Right after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans experienced immediate and dramatic shifts in the school population, with a quick enrollment decline from about 68,000 to 32,000 students – slowly climbing back to 42,000 by 2011 ... making well-founded conclusions becomes exceptionally problematic in a city with such fundamental changes and such potentially strong selection effects." Your next complaint is with my finding that, "despite reform efforts, the NOLA Recovery School District has many of the lowest performing schools in Louisiana," which you contend, indicates I do "not have the context needed to explain what the RSD is and what we were created to do." As Louisiana Weekly recently reported, the whole intentions behind creation of RSD-NO have been murky from the beginning. As the analysis stated, "Before Hurricane Katrina, the RSD (created in 2003) could only take over a school with a performance score less than 60, and which had already gone through four years of corrective action. To legally justify taking the majority of New Orleans schools and then privatizing them, the state changed the failing benchmark from 60 to just under the state average of 87.4. The constant changing of grading scales and benchmarks has continued since, and has become an often scoffed at trademark of Superintendent John White's dissemination of annual data." In fact, the whole "context" for RSD's existence has changed since its inception. As the Louisiana Weekly article reported, "According to a study by Tulane University's Cowen Institute for Public Education Initiatives: 'Intended as a mechanism for restructuring and reform, the RSD was never meant to be a permanent part of the public school governance landscape in New Orleans. Instead, the RSD was meant to take control of and turn around chronically failing schools for an initial period of five years. After that time, and assuming adequate school improvement, schools would be released from the jurisdiction of the RSD and returned to their local school board.' But that didn't happen." As the article pointed out, the charters that constitute RSD-NO have been given the power to choose whether or not they want to return to the OPSB. But all those eligible thus far have said, "No," because they would then be subjected to a higher level of scrutiny that characterizes OPSB management. Your last point of contention is with how I've portrayed the OneApp process parents have to do go through to find placement for their children in NOLA schools. You state that the process was created "to provide students and families with the opportunity to choose a school anywhere in the city that suits their interests and needs." A recent article by Jessica Williams for The Lens described what the OneApp process means for most parents and how well they fare as they seek to find a school "that suits their interests and needs." Williams looked at the probable trajectory of students whose "failing" schools were being closed down by the district and found, "the vast majority ... are headed to other substandard schools next year." Williams reported that parents needed to relocate their students were given a list of choices by the district, and "of the 17 schools listed with grades C or better, nine had seats open in only one or two grades. Five others had no vacancies." As Williams reported in another article, "Parents have few options when moving kids from failing public schools" in the RSD-NO system. She found, "More than seven years into the New Orleans choice experiment, documents and interviews reveal the schools are so academically anemic that the RSD fell short in its attempts to comply with federal policy requiring school districts to offer higher quality alternatives to students in failing schools." Mercedes Schneider has gone into greater depth on the messy, confusing nature of the OneApp process. On her blog, she recently wrote, "enrollment is no longer based upon students residing in a given area and automatically attending a community school. Thus, the 'parental choice' of selecting a school by moving to the neighborhood is moot. That choice exists no more. Now, parents must apply to the schools they would have their children attend – even if they live right next to the school." Further complicating matters, the process "involves a detailed application process, with one application necessary per child within RSD and OPSB direct-run schools, and a different consolidated application (no guarantees here) for some (not all) OPSB charter schools. And even though the RSD/OPSB direct-run application notes that siblings are given priority for attending the same schools, there are no guarantees there, either." For years, parent activist Karran Harper Royal has struggled to place her children in schools she feels would be best for them and has concluded that what RSD-NO provides to parents isn't real "choice" at all. She has written, that instead of providing real choice, "students only have the choice to apply to over 70 schools; many students end up in lotteries for the higher performing schools. Students not selected in the lottery don't have a choice; they have to attend schools where available seats remain." Even the higher performing charter schools, Harper Royal noted, are routinely "not offered as options for the lowest performing students in New Orleans." For these reasons and others, Harper Royal has joined with other civil rights activists in filing a civil rights complaint against RSD-NO. To conclude, one point we agree on is, "The RSD is not a typical school district." Let's also agree to keep it that way. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/the-dishonest-case-for-the-new-orleans-school-reform-model/>

New Bill Calls for Religious Freedom in Foster Care By Brian Rinker, July 30, 2014 Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY Two Republican senators on July 30 introduced a bill that would allow faith-based child welfare providers the freedom to discriminate against foster parents based on religious beliefs. The Child Welfare Provider Act 2014 co-sponsored by Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) and Rep. Mike Kelly (R-Pa.) is meant to safeguard religious freedom among faith-based organizations that provide adoption and foster care services. Many private providers of adoption and foster care services are faith-based organizations, which contract with the state to recruit adoptive/foster parents. Some religious providers only recruit married men and women to be foster parents, refusing to serve same-sex or unmarried couples because of their religious beliefs. A handful of states have enacted civil union and same-sex marriage policies that strip the funding and contracts from faith-based organizations that refuse to incorporate those practices in their adoption and foster care services. The most notable case occurred in 2011, when Illinois severed ties with five faith-based child welfare providers since the state's civil union law took effect last month. The groups – five regional affiliates of Catholic Charities – object to licensing unmarried and gay couples as foster or adoptive parents. Similar actions have since been taken in Massachusetts and Washington, D.C. "Limiting their work because someone might disagree with what they believe only ends up hurting the families they could be bringing together," said Enzi in a press release. "This legislation will help make sure faith-based providers and individuals can continue to work alongside other agencies and organizations, and that adoptive and foster parents have access to providers of their choice." The inclusion act follows on the coattails of the Supreme Court's recent decision that institutions have religious rights. "This bill is about fairness and inclusion," said Kelly in the same press release. "It is about ensuring that everyone who wants to help provide foster or adoptive care to children is able to have a seat at the table." The bill, if passed, would protect faith-based organizations' right to act in accordance with their beliefs, prevent the government from taking "adverse actions" against them and provide relief for those organizations that feel their rights have been violated. A bill to strip federal funds from any provider that would not consider any adoptive or foster couple was proposed in 2011 by former Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.). Though Stark drew 56 co-sponsors, the bill went nowhere. Brian Rinker is a Journalism for Social Change Fellow and a recent graduate from San Francisco State University's journalism program. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/news/senate-bill-calls-for-religious-freedom-in-foster-care/7744>

ACLU to Highlight Lakota Child Foster Care Crisis to United Nations >PRWEB.COM Newswire > PRWEB.COM Newswire Rapid City, SD (PRWEB) July 30, 2014 The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) has included South Dakota's persistent and alleged illegal seizure of Lakota children in a report it is scheduled to present to the United Nations in Geneva, Switzerland in August. The United Nations will convene the 85th session of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, at which the ACLU will present an update on the United States' compliance issues with human rights provisions as set forth by the UN. In a section of the report entitled "Lack of Due Process in American Indian Child Custody Proceedings in South Dakota", published on July 9, 2014, the ACLU details how statistics relating to the rate at which Lakota children are removed from their families when compared to non-Native counterparts "reflect intentional and unintentional racism, consistent with practices that have been condoned for decades in much of the United States." The report can be found here: <https://www.aclu.org/human-rights/american-civil-liberties-union-icerd-shadow-report-us-periodic-report>. The report further asserts that the Indian Child Welfare Act, passed in 1978 by Congress with the aim of stemming the problems of Indian children being removed from families and extended families within their tribes, has severe limitations. One of these limitations is the lack of a regular and comprehensive review by any federal agency to ensure state compliance with statutory requirements. "Individual states are already required to report on a variety of measures regarding children in their care, but not on issues specific to ICWA compliance or the Indigenous children under state care," the report states. Additionally, the funding apparatus for tribal child welfare programs and officers hired to ensure ICWA provisions are being followed are cobbled together from different federal agencies and child welfare programs, leading to oversight confusion, the report states. A lack of funding for oversight and implementation is also listed as a limitation to the law in its current form. The ACLU filed suit in the United States District Court for the District of South Dakota (Case No.: Civ - 135020JLV) in March 2013 against various South Dakota state officials involved in the removal of Indian children from their homes under state child custody laws. A copy of the complaint is available here: <https://www.aclu.org/racial-justice/ogala-sioux-tribe-v-van-hunnik-complaint>. The suit -- filed on behalf of the Oglala Sioux Tribe and the Rosebud Sioux Tribe -- alleges state officials violated the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution along with ICWA provisions routinely, which routinely resulted in the wrongful removal of scores of Lakota children on an annual basis. Madonna Papan, a resident of Pennington County and member of the Oglala Sioux Tribe, had her two children stripped from her custody in a hearing that lasted less than 60 seconds, according to the complaint. Court officials refused Madonna Papan and her husband access to the petition filed against them and continue to grapple with the psychological effects the trauma has had on her children. The Lakota People's Law Project (LPLP) has been working on foster care issues relative to the Native American children of South Dakota since 2005, partnering with tribes and leaders in South Dakota. An average of 742 Native American children are removed from their homes in South Dakota on an annual basis, according to the United States Children's Bureau's "Child Welfare Outcomes: Reports to Congress." When controlling for the factor of poverty, South Dakota still ranks third in the nation for the highest number of children taken into custody by the Department of Social Services, according to the National Coalition for Child Protection Reform's "2010 NCCPR Rate of Removal Index." While Native American children constitute 13.5 percent of the child population in South Dakota, they comprise 54 percent of the youth foster care population, according to the Child Welfare Outcomes compiled by the Children's Bureau. South Dakota has allegedly continued to ignore stipulations in ICWA that mandate placement of Native American children in Native American homes, placing about 87 percent of Native children in non-Native homes, according to data provided by the South Dakota DSS to LPLP in an email in 2011. The ACLU will present the child foster care issue as one of seven major issues that continue to confront the United States as it attempts to comply with the major human rights treaty monitored by the UN, according to the report. The other issues include Racial Profiling, Racial Disparities in Sentencing, Racial Discrimination in the U.S. Capital Punishment System, The Right to Vote, Discriminatory Treatment of Guestworkers and Undocumented Workers and Predatory Lending and the Foreclosure Crisis. "The fact that the ACLU saw fit to include the child foster care crisis affecting the Lakota Nation in South Dakota effectively demonstrates the importance of remedying this egregious situation by allowing the tribes to have authority over their children," said Chase Iron Eyes, an attorney with LPLP. "The United States can not continue to forward itself on the international stage as an authority on human rights and a bastion of freedom when it has such reprehensible racism festering in its own backyard." The United Nations definition of genocide as set forth in Article 2 of the General Assembly Resolution 269, includes the following provision: "forcibly transferring children of one group to another group." The Lakota People's Law Project is also funding several Lakota professionals to work on this campaign, and is launching an on-line petition campaign to pressure the Federal Departments to make the South Dakota tribes a priority for funding allocations. The Lakota People's Law Project's activities have included funding and supporting Native experts to provide technical assistance to the tribes on family and child welfare issues. The project combines public interest law, research, education, and organizing into a unique model for advocacy and social reform. The Lakota People's Law Project is sponsored by the non-profit Romero Institute based in Santa Cruz, CA. The Institute is named after slain human rights advocate Archbishop Oscar Romero of El Salvador. The Institute seeks to identify and dismantle structural sources of injustice and threats to the survival of our human family. Read the full story at <http://www.prweb.com/releases/2014/07/prweb12053305.htm> Read more: <http://www.digitaljournal.com/pr/2090996#ixzz39JSqoN00>

Maplewood treatment center at fault after resident left in subzero cold By Sarah Horner shorner@pioneerpress.com Posted: 07/30/2014 12:01:00 AM CDT Updated: 07/31/2014 07:30:44 AM CDT The Minnesota Department of Health has found a Maplewood residential treatment center at fault for an incident that left a resident hospitalized after being left outside for several hours in subzero temperatures. The state agency issued its findings in an investigative report released this week that looked into conduct at Community Foundations, 1096 Gervais Avenue. The facility is operated by South Metro Human Services. According to the report, a resident diagnosed with a mental illness and chemical dependency issues was absent from the unlocked facility from about 10:30 p.m. to 6 a.m. during a night in March when temperatures fell as low as 15 degrees below zero. The resident's hands and feet suffered frostbite, and hospitalization was required. The resident also had a cut on the forehead. Staff members are expected to alert employees who arrive for the overnight shift when a resident isn't in the building. Bed checks to ensure residents' whereabouts also are supposed to be conducted during the night. The report pointed to neglect in both areas. "There were systems breakdowns related to communication between shifts as to the resident's absence from the facility in addition to how a room-bed check was conducted," the report stated. Terry Schneider, executive director of South Metro Human Services, said the facility regretted the incident and has since complied with the health department's recommendations to safeguard against it. "They asked us to do a staff training on how to conduct bed checks, and we expanded that protocol to make sure the location of individuals is known throughout the course of the day, not just during the bedtime hours," Schneider said. Schneider added that staff "feel really badly" about what happened. "It distressed the staff a great deal," he said. "We care a great deal about our clients' welfare, so this was very difficult for everyone involved." Schneider said he could not comment on the resident's current condition because of client confidentiality policies. In addition to the Maplewood center, South Metro Human Services operates 15 smaller residential supportive services facilities throughout the state. Its staff also provide in-home treatment to clients living with mental illnesses. Source:

http://www.twincities.com/health/ci_26244348/maplewood-treatment-center-deemed-at-fault-after-resident

Unlicensed group home for mentally ill discovered 2 By Staff Reports news@rockdalenews.com A Conyers woman was charged with operating an unlicensed group home in Conyers for those with mental illnesses. Sharon Ann Seats, 46, was charged after an investigation by the Conyers Police Marshal along with Code Enforcement and the Department of Community Health, for operating an unlicensed home health facility out of her home on Creek Forest Court in Conyers. CPD Cpl. Chad Sims, the City of Conyers Marshal, was notified by police patrol of a residence in the Forest Villa subdivision that appeared to be operating as a personal care home business. Cpl. Sims contacted the Ga. Department of Community Health, the government organization charged with regulating personal care homes and issuing licenses for the same, who confirmed neither this address nor the resident is licensed with their agency. Sharon Seats told police she was formerly a certified nurse assistant at Serenity personal care home in Stone Mountain prior to it being shut down following several investigations by the Department of Community Health. Seats stated she then relocated to 1213 Creek Forest Court and "took some patients from Serenity with [her]". Seats was housing two adult males and one adult female, all suffering from various forms of mental illness, and collecting several hundred dollars payment each month from each patient. Source: <http://www.rockdalenews.com/section/24/article/20574/>

Contractor serving 1,100 foster children quits By Associated PressPublished: August 1, 2014, 2:44 pmUpdated: August 1, 2014, 9:07 pm 25 173 Related Coverage Tales of foster care abuse in Texas sound 'like prison' AUSTIN (AP) — The contractor leading a pilot program to overhaul Texas' troubled foster care system canceled its five-year contract with the state Friday, forcing the Department of Family and Protective Services to take over direct management of about 1,100 foster children. Providence Service Corp. last February signed a five-year, $30 million deal that included managing 1,100 children in West Texas, the first region selected as part of a redesign of foster services statewide. But the firm is now pulling out. "The care and services for these foster children will not be affected in any way," John Specia, commissioner of the Department of Family and Protective Services, said in a statement. "This will be a smooth transition." The 17,000-child statewide foster care system has been under scrutiny since seven foster children died of abuse or neglect in fiscal year 2013. Only one such youngster died this year, but two siblings in foster care, ages 4 and 6, drowned last month in a lake near Austin and the case is still being investigated. Those children were placed in their foster home by Providence Kids, the Arizona-based child-placing company for Providence Service. In recent years, Texas has moved to privatize its foster care placement efforts. Under the redesign, Providence Service, rather than state officials, was managing other contractors charged with selecting foster homes and providing other services for children within the system. The Department of Family and Protective Services said the company exercised an opt-out clause after state officials notified it about "several issues" with contract performance, including missing targets on efforts to better place siblings together and keep children close to their existing homes. Ashley Harris, child welfare policy associate for the advocacy group Texans Care for Children, said, "It should now be clear to everyone that just barreling ahead with further privatization isn't going to work." "We can do some things on the cheap," Harris said in a statement, "but protecting a child after the state takes custody of her is not one of them." Source: <http://kxan.com/2014/08/01/contractor-serving-1100-foster-children-quits/>

State funds overhaul of child services Last updated: August 03, 2014 4:17PM - 98 Views By Anthony Gonzalez - agonzalez@civitasmedia.com Representative Sarah Stevens (Wilkes, Surry), who is co-chair of the Legislative Research Commission's Committee on Omnibus Foster Care and Dependency, said she was pleased by the steps included in the budget relating to child protective services. Photo Representative Sarah Stevens (Wilkes, Surry), who is co-chair of the Legislative Research Commission's Committee on Omnibus Foster Care and Dependency, said she was pleased by the steps included in the budget relating to child protective services. Story Tools: Font Size: SRALEIGH — State lawmakers passed the Child Protective Services Improvement Initiative on Saturday, an act they hope will give the state Department of Social Services tools it needs to best protect children. The CPSII was ushered into legislators' hands after two high profile cases revealed significant DSS case mismanagement, a lack of background checks and a lack of communication between county Department of Social Services offices, while at the same time showing an increase in caseloads and a reduction of federal aid. One high profile case occurred in Wilkes County. After being molested by their father, two children allegedly were raped by two caretakers they were placed with by Wilkes County DSS. The children contracted a sexually-transmitted disease, according to the arrest warrant. One of the caretakers previously had been convicted of child abuse in Surry County. The two caretakers remain in police custody awaiting trial. Another high profile case occurred in Union County. A child under the care of a Union County Department of Social Services supervisor was found by police at the supervisor's home handcuffed to the front porch with a dead chicken wrapped around his neck. Five social service workers were fired, one demoted, while the supervisor and her partner were charged by police for felony child abuse. Representative Sarah Stevens (Wilkes, Surry), who is co-chair of the Legislative Research Commission's Committee on Omnibus Foster Care and Dependency, said she was pleased by the steps included in the budget. "We have some money to provide more workers. Now we need revisions to the law to make the process more clear and to expedite the process to protect children," said Stevens in voting for the budget bill. According to Stevens, Child Protective Services' should have a caseload no greater than 10 families at any time for workers performing child protective services assessments and 10 families at any time for staff providing in home services. However, data suggests that in 43 of the counties in the state, 21 have a caseload size of more than 15 cases per worker; and further, in nine of those 21 counties, there is an average caseload size of more than 20 cases per worker. During the 2013-2014 fiscal year, records show county departments of social services lost federal funding for child protective services under the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) Block Grant and Title IV funding. However, the number of child protective services investigations has grown by 20 percent from fiscal year 2002 to fiscal year 2012. Funding Child Protective Services Lawmakers appropriated to the Department of Health and Human Services, Division of Social Services, the sum of $7,369,970 for county departments of social services. Of those funds, $4,500,000 shall be used to replace federal funds counties lost during the 2013-2014 fiscal year previously used to pay for child protective services' workers. Beginning Oct. 1, the remaining $2,869,970 shall be used to provide additional funding for child protective services' workers to reduce caseloads to an average of 10 families per worker. In-Home Services Funds in the amount of $4,500,000 are to be allocated for child welfare in-home services to provide and coordinate interventions and services that focus on child safety and protection, family preservation, and the prevention of further abuse or neglect. Oversight of Child Welfare Services Funds totalling $750,000 shall be allocated to fund nine positions to the division to enhance oversight of child welfare services in county departments of social services. These positions shall be used to monitor, train and provide technical assistance to the county departments of social services to ensure children and families are provided services that address the safety, permanency and well-being of children served by child welfare services. Pilot Program Also, $300,000 shall be used to establish and implement a child protective services pilot program. The funds shall be used to enhance coordination of services and information among county departments of social services, local law enforcement agencies, the court system, Guardian ad Litem programs, and other agencies as deemed appropriate by the department. The division shall coordinate with the Government Data Analytics Center (GDAC) in developing the pilot program and commence the pilot program by Dec. 1. Statewide Evaluations In addition, $700,000 shall be used to provide for a comprehensive, statewide evaluation of the state's child protective services system. The Division of Social Services shall contract for an independent evaluation of the system, which evaluation shall include developing recommendations on the following: (1) The performance of county departments of social services as related to child protective services. (2) Caseload sizes. (3) The administrative structure of the child protective services system in the State. (4) Adequacy of funding. (5) Child protective services' worker turnover. (6) Monitoring and oversight of county departments of social services. The division shall report the findings and recommendations from the evaluation to the Joint Legislative Oversight Committee on Health and Human Services no later than Jan. 4, 2016. Study Conflicts of Interest/Public Guardianship and Child Protective Services. The Department of Health and Human Services, Division of Social Services, shall study the issue of conflicts of interest in child welfare cases as related to public guardianship. In conducting the study, the department shall consider the following regarding addressing potential conflicts of interest: (1) Creating internal firewalls to prevent information sharing and influence among staff members involved with the conflicting cases. (2) Creating a formal or an informal "buddy system" allowing a county with a conflict to refer a case to a neighboring county. (3) Referring the guardianship to a corporate guardian until the child welfare case is resolved. (4) Having the Department assume responsibility for either the guardianship or the child welfare case. (5) Recommending legislation to permit the clerk the option to appoint a public agency or official, other than the Director of Social Services, to serve as a disinterested public agent in exceptional circumstances only. (6) Any other issues specific to this matter the Department deems appropriate. The division shall submit a final report of its findings and recommendations to the Senate Appropriations Committee on Health and Human Services, the House of Representatives Appropriations Subcommittee on Health and Human Services, and the Fiscal Research Division. Anthony Gonzalez may be reached at 336-835-1513 or on Twitter @newsgonz. Source: http://www.elktribune.com/news/community_news-home_top-news/50144963/State-funds-overhaul-of-child-services#U97fnOl0y1s

WASHINGTON STATE PASSES LANDMARK LEGISLATION: ESSB 5946, SIGNED INTO LAW ON JULY 23RD, 2014

by The HEAL Team

Beginning August 23rd, 2014, all Washington public schools are mandated to eliminate ineffective and punitive (i.e. exclusionary) discipline practices and to provide due process for all children facing discipline in public schools.

In 2012, HEAL submitted requests to Washington legislators asking they investigate the misuse of Individual Education Plans and oppressive disciplinary policies. Our recommendations to Washington legislators included the following:

• Mandate an annual report by the OSPI detailing how many students have been sent to private residential programs; what residential programs were used; where the residential programs were located; and the cost of each enrollment.

• Place a moratorium on contracting with out-of-state residential schools and programs.

• Amend Washington State Laws as proposed in Initiative 999 from 2008. See: <http://www.secstate.wa.gov/elections/initiatives/text/i999.pdf>

• Amend our State's child abuse statutory definitions to include the following: :

Emotional Abuse Citation: Ann. Stat. § 9:6-8.21 (New Jersey Statutory Definition) Abused child or abused or neglected child means a child under age 18 years who is in an institution, and:

• Has been placed there inappropriately for a continued period of time with the knowledge that the placement has resulted or may continue to result in harm to the child's mental or physical well-being

• Who has been willfully isolated from ordinary social contact under circumstances that indicate emotional or social deprivation The definitions and laws pertaining to child abuse and/or endangering the welfare of a child in our State are found in our Rev. Code §§ 26.44.020; 26.44.030; 9A.16.100. Please amend our State's laws to include the above definitions as applied under our Child Endangerment, Child Welfare, and Child Abuse laws."

ESSB 5946 Mandates the Following:

* Edits for clarity and readability

* The removal of the word "punishment" throughout the chapter

* The relocation and consolidation of rules regarding non-attendance and discipline (HEAL Note: May include statewide reports regarding IEP/RTC use)

* The revision of rules regarding emergency suspensions, expulsions, and conversion

* The revision of due process notice requirements, procedures, and timelines (HEAL Note: Due Process for Minors, No More Secret Spiriting Away)

* The alignment with civil rights laws, specifically vital documents and protected classes (HEAL Note: Respecting the civil rights of minors, including due process should in large part eliminate the use of out-of-state placements, if not entirely.)

* The removal of physical restraint or the use of aversive therapy as a general education discipline exception, and adding a reference to the Special Education rules detailing those provisions (HEAL Note: Outlawing physical restraint and aversive therapy, it is about time!)

* The addition of definitions and procedural requirements for reengagement meetings and reengagement plans

Other organizations who contributed to these efforts include, but, are not limited to:

Washington Appleseed (<http://www.waappleseed.org/#!school-discipline/c6wu>)

ACLU of Washington (<https://www.aclu-wa.org/sites/default/files/attachments/Guide%20for%20Public%20School%20Students.pdf>)

Change can happen, it is up to all of us to make sure it does!

EXCLUSIVE: Riker's Island bosses promoted after managing jail where teen inmates were beaten In May, Correction Commissioner Joseph Ponte promoted William Clemons to chief of department. Turhan Gumusdere, one of Clemons' top underlings, was named warden of Rikers' largest facility. BY Dareh Gregorian, Reuven Blau NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, August 6, 2014, 2:30 AM A A A 8 Share this URL Bryan Smith/Bryan Smith Joseph Ponte, commissioner of the city Department of Corrections, stands by his appointments of William Clemons and Turhan Gumusdere, said a spokesman. The foxes might be in charge of reforming the hen house. Two top jail bosses were recently promoted to plum spots in the city Department of Correction even though they ran a Rikers Island facility for troubled teens where a federal report found repeated inmate beatdowns were improperly reported and investigated. In May, Correction Commissioner Joseph Ponte named William Clemons his chief of department, the top uniformed position. Clemons previously served as warden of the East River lockup's Robert N. Davoren Center from April to December in 2011. That's the Rikers facility where teens awaiting trial were subjected to a "culture of violence," according to Manhattan U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara, who released a bombshell report Monday detailing violence that occurred there from 2011 to 2013. The 79-page report concluded that correction officers covered for each other and blatantly lied in reports, even when medical evidence and surveillance video directly contradicted their version of events. But more than 30% of the time, surveillance video that should have captured altercations mysteriously disappeared, according to the report. One of Clemons' top underlings, Turhan Gumusdere, also worked at the teen facility as deputy warden of security from April to November 2011. In May, Ponte named him warden of Rikers' largest facility, the Anna M. Kross Center. The jail head defended the promotions, arguing many of the incidents cited by the feds occurred before or after Clemons and Gumusdere were in charge. "Commissioner Ponte stands by his appointments of Chief Clemons and Warden Gumusdere, who have shown exemplary leadership in their current roles and are fully committed to the Department's reform agenda," said jail spokesman Robin Campbell. Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/riker-island-bosses-promoted-article-1.1893293>

City Council hearing to probe abuses at Rikers teen jails BY Erin Durkin NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, August 6, 2014, 12:46 PM A A 77
 23 Share this URL Councilman Fernando Cabrera The City Council will hold a hearing to probe rampant violence at jails holding teen offenders at Rikers Island, the chair of its juvenile justice committee said Wednesday. A Department of Justice investigation found young inmates were routinely beaten by guards, and the Daily News reported that two top jail bosses were recently promoted to high-ranking posts despite running the facility for troubled teens while the abuses were going on. Councilman Fernando Cabrera (D-Bronx), chair of the juvenile justice committee, said the group would convene a hearing to grill corrections officials on the matter. "The mistreatment of prisoners is out of control. More than half of the Rikers population suffers from mental illness, yet solitary confinement is still widely used perpetuating mental illness," he said. "This tells us it is the time to stop unconstitutional practices and conduct a full review of procedures." Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/blogs/dailypolitics/city-council-hearing-probe-abuses-rikers-teen-jails-blog-entry-1.1893963>

'Better Than Republicans,' Not Good Enough For Education A common admonition progressives have gotten used to hearing over the years is to support more conservative Democratic candidates because "Republicans are worse." This admonition makes some sense in electoral politics, when, in most cases, progressives face a ballot box decision where they have to choose the "lesser evil" instead of someone who wants to do something really horrible like roll back government policies to what was in favor a hundred years ago. Elections, after all, are societal constructions where you're forced to make a choice between only two candidates, usually. To not vote at all forfeits your right to have a say-so in the matter. And few Americans get the opportunity to vote for third party candidates who have viable shots at winning. But "better than the other side" loses any legitimacy in the policy arena, or at least it should. For sure, there are often trade-offs between adversaries in the legislative process. But when there's not an actual bill facing an up-or-down vote, there's simply no reason for progressives to accept policy positions from office holders on the basis of those positions being better than what the other side wants. Yet progressives who push for policies reflecting their values are constantly scolded for exhibiting a "have it all fantasy." They're told to give centrist Democrats "credit" for positions where there is some agreement – such as marriage equality or climate change – and understand when those officials have to make deals with the other side. "That's how the game is played," goes the refrain. When it comes to the education policy arena, "the game" has played into a disaster for the nation's schoolteachers, parents, and students. Two new interviews with leading voices in the progressive education movement have brought to light how policy compromises forged by centrist Democrats have enabled truly bad consequences for public education. And progressives are increasingly saying "enough." A "Catalyst For Something Really Idiotic" The "better than the other side" retort came to the fore in my recent interview with Lily Eskelsen Garcia, the charmingly feisty new president-elect of the National Education Association at the 2014 Netroots Nation convention in Detroit. Quick to rise to the top of our discussion were recent actions by both the NEA and the American Federation of Teachers to demand the resignation of U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan. A particular sore spot for the unions has been the Department's insistence that states wanting federal grant money or waivers to harsh legal penalties imposed by the feds put into place elaborate evaluation systems that rate classroom teachers based, to varying extents, on student test scores. Eskelsen Garcia echoed what many educators and experts have said that these types of test-based evaluations are unfair to teachers and encourage schools to cheat or game the system in order to hit their numbers. For the first time in public, she spoke of her conversation with Duncan on July 16, the first discussion between them since the unions had called for his resignation. "He's very upset with the NEA Representative Assembly's decision to call for his resignation," she recalled. "He felt he wasn't being given enough credit from NEA for advocating for expanded early childhood education and greater access to affordable college. And it's true there is no light between us on those issues." But as Eskelsen Garcia pointed out, "Sure, we get pre-K dollars and Head Start, but it's being used to teach little kids to bubble in tests so their teachers can be evaluated. And we get policies to promote affordable college, but no one graduating from high school gets an education that has supported critical and creative thinking that is essential to succeeding in college because their education has consisted of test-prep from Rupert Murdoch. The testing is corrupting what it means to teach." In other words, being for something that progressives usually want – expanding education opportunities to more of the nation's young children and college-aged students – can't absolve a Democratic administration from implementing bad policies taken from the other side of the political spectrum – in this case, harsh measures that punish teachers and schools for conditions that are by and large out of their control. Eskelsen Garcia told Duncan, "When you required states to base their education programs mostly on test scores, and let states respond with 'OK, we'll just do this,' you encouraged bad policy. You became the catalyst for something really idiotic. Eskelsen Garcia is far from being the only progressive voice criticizing the status quo in education policy making. "A Sorry Substitute When Government Gives Up" One of the most outspoken and articulate parent advocates for public schools is Helen Gym from Philadelphia. Gym, who co-founded the grassroots activist group Parents United for Public Education, was also on hand at Netroots Nation where she appeared on a panel "Reclaiming the Promise of Public Education." A reporter, Bill Hangley Jr., for the local Philadelphia news outlet The Notebook caught up with Gym after the event and asked her to reflect on her experiences there. What she described is an awakening among progressives to the reality of education "reform" policies pushed onto communities by the Obama administration and a host of conservative state governors. As a result of these policies, "We're seeing public land being turned over to private enterprises," Gym explained, "labor rights being undermined, state takeovers and emergency managers upending democratic governance of schools, schools closed down and communities devastated in their wake." Current education reform policies, Gym insisted, are "a launching pad for some of the grossest abuses in the dismantling of public services nationwide. In Detroit, an emergency manager who superseded an elected school board and shuttered dozens of city schools was simply a precursor for a city emergency manager who overran local governance and was shutting off water to hundreds of thousands of Detroit residents, while letting wealthy delinquents like golf courses and sports teams off the hook." Gym was particularly critical of political leaders on the left who have abandoned the cause of education equity to rally around the rightwing notion that a market based approach that provides more "choice" will improve education results. "We used to have an equity agenda in this country," she lamented, "where our public schools' vision, despite their flaws, became a model for the world. Moneyed interests have poured millions into convincing the public to walk away from that social contract. But choice is just a sorry substitute when government gives up on equity." "No Longer Neutral Territory" For years, education policy has been portrayed as a neutral ground where political factions were supposed to "meet in the middle" and agree to do "what's best for kids." This was never really true, but the narrative played well to the media and to policy elites. But "education reform" has mostly been a product of groupthink built on a consensus without diversity and without the input of skeptics. Now, that the false consensus is crumbling, people on the ground are more determined to take control of the narrative and make politics about fighting the free market assault on the common good. "At Netroots," Gym observed, "I think the future was really laid out for us by the Rev. William Barber, leader of North Carolina's Moral Monday movement, who called for fusion politics and mass coalition-building to re-establish a real and moral civil rights agenda of our time – of which education is but one part. This is where I see the future going and what inspires me today." "People in the progressive movement have to realize," Eskelsen Garcia asserted, "that regardless of the particular fight they are engaged in, it starts with education. Whether you're fighting for environmental causes, women's rights, voting rights, all of these causes – and the very foundations of democracy and how our society makes decisions – start at a schoolhouse door." Gym echoed these views, saying, "You're naive if you don't make the connection between what's happening to our schools and communities and what we're doing more broadly as a nation in terms of attacks on poverty, attacks on immigrants – most of whom are in our public schools too – and attacks on women and women in labor, in particular. "For a growing number of progressives, education is not neutral territory." But is public concern over education significant enough to change the political equation? Both Gym and Eskelsen Garcia believe the public concern is building and in some communities is influencing elections. Gym noted that progressive activism animated by the fight for public schools made critical differences in recent mayoral races in New York City and Newark. Eskelsen Garcia stated, "We've proven that when we ask people to sign petitions and show up at the ballot box to support public schools, they will. And they will do it in droves." As my colleague Robert Borosage recently observed, "Providing a fair and healthy shot for every child requires reversing the conservative retreats of the last decades." The "economy that does not work for working families," which Borosage decried, is being mimicked by education policies that don't work either. This policy agenda "won't be changed without fierce battles to dislodge powerful and entrenched interests and change the rules." The fact that centrist Democrats don't really get this is what is animating progressives in ways not seen since the fight for civil rights. "These fights will be at the center of our political debates over the next years," Borosage wrote. "They will be pitched battles against powerful interests. Politicians will have to decide which side they are on." Those politicians had better choose carefully. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/better-than-republicans-not-good-enough-for-education/>

Suspensions, Expulsions, Arrests Don't Work: On School Discipline, We Can Do Better By Daniel Willingham RCEd Commentary Stick a few hundred kids together in a building for six hours and you can bet that a few are going to misbehave. How teachers and administrators should react to rule infractions -- especially more serious ones -- is perennial problem. A newly published report from the School Discipline Consensus Project, with over 700 experts contributing, offers the most comprehensive answer I've seen. The report starts with two grim facts. First, present practices are ineffective. Policies tend to focus on student removal--suspensions, expulsions and arrests--as a way to keep schools orderly and safe. But while they are removed, the offenders fall behind in their schoolwork, and removal puts them at greater risk for dropping out or getting in trouble with the law. Second, present policies are poorly implemented. Students are often suspended for minor infractions such as cell phone use, and kids from some groups--those with disabilities, kids of color, and LGBT youth--are disproportionately disciplined. What's a better way? The overarching principle emphasized in the report is the creation of more positive environments in schools and classrooms, and more supportive relationships among students, teachers, and administration. Sounds great. How do we get there? Actions in schools and districts such as these: Collect (disaggregated) data on infractions and on factors that are predictive of misbehavior. Make these data transparent to all, consistent with privacy policies. Work on school climate, for example through social/emotional learning programs. Design a graduated system of responses to misconduct that keeps students in school whenever possible, addresses the harm caused, and considers the factors that may contribute to the problem, while encouraging students to take responsibility for changing their behavior. Have a place on school grounds to which disciplined students can be removed but still receive instruction and social or emotional support, as needed. Partner with police to ensure that officers understand school policies, to formalize cooperation in written documents that are periodically reviewed, and to ensure that officers on school grounds are committed to the school learning environment. Plan for ways to divert students from the juvenile justice system for minor infractions (if appropriate); plan for ways that students released from correctional facilities can transition smoothly back to community schools. The six points listed above constitute an incomplete summary of the very broad goals that the report addresses. These broad goals are cashed out in over 60 more specific action recommendations. But even in a long report (some 400 pages,) these inevitably end up as guidelines rather than specific blueprints, e.g., "Address physical facility conditions and school security procedures to ensure schools are safe and feel secure while also being welcoming and orderly." The value of the report lies not in the specificity of the recommendations, but in the breadth of its vision. It gives an administrator or legislator a view of just how broad the problem is, and emphasizes that attending to just one or two pieces of this complex puzzle will not be sufficient. And although it cannot serve as a policy guidebook, it does lay out big-picture conclusions based on solid research. A natural reaction upon reading this report might be despair: 60 recommended actions, each of them formidable in its own right. The authors anticipate this reaction, and confirm that implementing all of the recommendations at once would be impossible, and further, that there is no right or wrong place to start. The important thing is to start. Let's hope this report provides some impetus to reform in discipline practices. There's little evidence that current policies are serving students and schools well, and there is reason to think we can do better. Daniel Willingham is a columnist for RealClearEducation and professor of psychology at the University of Virginia. He also writes the Daniel Willingham science and education blog. Source:

http://www.realcleareducation.com/articles/2014/06/17/suspensions_expulsions_arrests_dont_work_on_school_discipline_we_can_do_better_1018.html

NY excludes prison time from sex-abuse law Article more in New York | Find New \$LINKTEXTFINDS\$ » smaller Larger facebook twitter google plus linked in inShare Email Print smaller Larger Associated Press ALBANY, N.Y. — New York has amended its penal law to exclude prison and jail time when calculating the 10-year period that elevates a repeated low-level sex offense into a felony. The law effective Nov. 1 will exclude time locked up from the calculation whereby two or more misdemeanor offenses rise to "persistent sexual abuse" punishable by up to four years in prison. The applicable crimes are misdemeanors of forcible touching and sexual abuse in the second or third degree, meaning sexual contact without the other person's consent, including children who by law cannot consent to sex. Sponsors say time incarcerated shouldn't count since offenders then are removed from general society and unable to commit the crimes against innocent people. —Copyright 2014 Associated Press Source:

<http://online.wsj.com/article/AP7b513261427c42a9900a2ac1f5689233.html>

The Impact of Foster Care on Students' Education August 4, 2014 | 12:15 PM By Melissa Prax 1 Comment Email STEVENDEPOLO / FLICKR Harold Sloke was 12-years-old when he entered South Carolina's foster care system. Not long after that, he ended up repeating ninth grade three times. "A lot of my caseworkers believed I would never graduate, so they just kept passing me along, and I kept getting into trouble," Sloke told The Annie E. Casey Foundation. Foster care offers kids temporary living arrangements to improve their current home environment. Sloke grew up in the system, and after attending a dozen different high schools, he eventually graduated. That's not an uncommon journey for many kids in foster care. Only half of foster youth complete high school by their 18th birthday, according to data from the National Working Group on Foster Care and Education, compared to the 70 percent of kids not in the foster care system who graduate by age 18. "I probably wouldn't have graduated," said Sloke. "And I could have ended up in prison (if my teacher hadn't intervened)." Children ages five to 17 make up the largest group of children in foster care, and just under 60 percent of these kids will experience at least two to three living placements, according to the National Working Group on Foster Care and Education. That can really set back a student's learning. When a move to a new school happens, up to six months of academic progress can be lost, which can make finishing high school a struggle for some students. In the Midwest, nearly 37 percent of previous foster youth repeated a grade. Many foster care students ultimately make the decision to drop out of high school, especially after class credits sometimes don't easily transfer from school to school. For those who choose to stay enrolled, the path isn't necessarily a traditional one. Some foster children complete high school after five years, or choose an alternative like a General Educational Development (GED) transcript or diploma. Here in Ohio, youth age out of the system when they are 18, unless they're adopted or return to their biological family. When foster children are still under that age, each county in Ohio offers support, and foster care placement is an issue typically addressed through private agencies. While many states, including California and New York, have done recent and extensive research, Ohio's records on foster care children's education and enrollment differ county to county. In attempts to improve the nation's outlook, the Uninterrupted Scholars Act was signed into law by President Obama last January. The act lets foster care organizations look at educational records to better help support foster care youth and prevent educational turbulence. Source: <http://stateimpact.npr.org/ohio/2014/08/04/the-impact-of-foster-care-on-students-education/>

More Time in Foster Care Linked to More Psychotropic Medicating August 3, 2014 Children as young as four in foster care are taking three or more psychotropic medications, and the length of time that children aged six or under are being medicated with psychotropics increases two-fold for every year that they live in foster care, according to a study in Psychiatric Services. University of Maryland researchers studied 1,491 foster children aged six and under in a mid-Atlantic city between 2009-11. While other studies have shown that psychotropic medicating of foster children is high, this is the first to examine developments over time in care. "The higher likelihood of using antipsychotic, antidepressant, and ADHD medications for three or more weeks per month with each increase in year of age suggests a trend toward chronic use," they wrote. "Such use occurred over a very short period of tremendous developmental growth." Listing some of the serious side effects and dangers of common psychotropics, the researchers then wrote, "Notwithstanding these risks, few patients receive routine metabolic monitoring in outpatient clinical care." They further noted that, "Few youths in this study had a psychotherapy visit, not to mention evidence-based treatments," and concluded, "There is a critical need for long-term studies to evaluate the effect of chronic exposure on children's health and well-being." Age-Related Trends in Psychotropic Medication Use Among Very Young Children in Foster Care (dosReis, Susan et al. Psychiatric Services in Advance, August 1, 2014; doi: 10.1176/appi.ps.201300353) Source: <http://www.madinamerica.com/2014/08/longer-time-foster-care-linked-psychotropic-medicating/>

Rikers prison guards used excessive force on minors, Justice finds Injuries included broken bones, cuts needing stitches By Phillip Swarts - The Washington Times - Monday, August 4, 2014 Corrections officers used excessive force to control adolescent inmates at a major New York City prison, including inflicting wounds that required medical treatment, a Justice Department investigation concluded Monday. Rikers Island corrections officers hit inmates in the face or head, and beat prisoners who were not resisting, Justice Department investigators reported, adding that the abuse often took place in areas not covered by surveillance cameras. The results were broken jaws, arm and leg bone fractures and cuts that required stitches, among other injuries, the agency's report said. "The extremely high rates of violence and excessive use of solitary confinement for adolescent males uncovered by this investigation are inappropriate and unacceptable," Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr. said Monday in a statement. Mr. Holder said the Justice Department and New York City officials must work to ensure that "incarceration is used to deter, punish, and ultimately rehabilitate, not merely to warehouse and forget." The Justice Department's two-year investigation uncovered many specific examples of violence that occurred in the jail. For example, one inmate on his way to lunch got into a heated argument with a corrections officer captain. It culminated with the captain throwing out the inmate's bag of chips, and the inmate cursing the officer. Upon the inmate's return to the school classroom area — where there are no cameras — the captain ordered three other guards to mace and then beat the inmate, kicking him in the face and ribs. The inmate was not taken for medical treatment until three hours later, and an internal prison system review decided the use of force was justified. In 2012 and 2013, investigators found more than 1,000 inmate injuries at Rikers Island annually resulting from excessive use of force by corrections officers. Nearly half of all inmates suffered injuries at some point in their stay in the prison, the report said. In 2013 alone, emergency medical services for adolescent detainees were needed 459 times, though some of those may have been due to fights among the inmates. The Justice Department report said investigators found "a pattern and practice of conduct at Rikers Island that violates the rights of adolescents." "Simply put, Rikers is a dangerous place for adolescents and a pervasive climate of fear exists," the report said. Commissioner Joseph Ponte — who became the city's Department of Corrections leader in April — will likely have his tenure judged by many in New York based on how he addresses the problems at Rikers Island, where several adult inmates have recently died due to abuse or negligence. "I have made it clear that excessive use of force, unnecessary or unwarranted use of punitive segregation and corruption of any kind are absolutely unacceptable, and will not be tolerated under my watch," Mr. Ponte said in a press release Monday. Investigators said there was little intervention or oversight by senior management, adding that corrections officials failed to "address the extraordinarily high levels of violence." Preet Bharara, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, said the conditions seemed "more inspired by 'Lord of the Flies' than any legitimate philosophy of humane detention." "For adolescents, Rikers Island is a broken institution," Mr. Bharara said. "It is a place where brute force is the first impulse rather than the last resort; where verbal insults are repaid with physical injuries; where beatings are routine while accountability is rare; and where a culture of violence endures even while a code of silence prevails." Investigators also found that solitary confinement was often used excessively as a punishment, including for inmates who were mentally ill or who were placed in confinement for months at a time for minor infractions. On any given day, 15 to 25 percent of the inmate population was being held in solitary confinement, often for months at a time for non-violent infractions, the report said. Source: <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2014/aug/4/prison-guards-used-excessive-force-on-minors-justi/?page=all#pagebreak>

Foster care watchdog says reform has slowed Rina Paltu August 04 2014 Audio from this story 1:12 Listen Share this story Share via Email Share on Twitter Share on Facebook 49 After Gabriel Fernandez's death in 2013, the county spun into action, creating a Blue Ribbon Commission to recommend changes to the child welfare system. Since then, a new report says, things have stalled. NBC4 A foster care watchdog will issue a report Tuesday saying the pace of reform for L.A. County's troubled child welfare system has slowed over the past few months. In April, a Blue Ribbon Commission issued a final version of its report on the county's foster care and child protection agencies - and called for urgent action to address a "state of emergency". The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors responded by creating an Office of Child Protection and deciding to hire a child welfare czar to oversee reforms. Since then, things have slowed, however, said Dan Heimpel, a lecturer at UC-Berkeley's Goldman School of Policy and founder of Fostering Media Connections, a journalism non-profit dedicated to watching the child welfare system. Tuesday's report will be the first of quarterly reports on the progress of reform. "What we see is a lack of real strong urgency," Heimpel said. "A lot of that has evaporated and that's been a little bit disheartening." The Blue Ribbon Commission made 42 recommendations the board then endorsed, but Heimpel said he's unclear how they will be carried out. "We have not seen any evidence that any financial resources have been committed to these reforms," Heimpel said. There has been some progress: Next week, the "transition team" created to design the bureaucracy of the new Office of Child Protection is expected to present a job description for the new agency's director to the Board of Supervisors. The state has created a mechanism for counties to increase stipends for families who take in relatives as foster children. Typically, relatives get less money than other parents, but if L.A. county opts into the state funding stream, that would change. But other recommendations, like a request by the Los Angeles County District Attorney to create an electronic system for tracking child abuse investigations, have indefinitely stalled, Heimpel said. "We're not advocating for any particular reform," he said. "But the idea that the system can be improved and that the only thing that's going to make sure that happens is people taking a look at it and really holding the players who've taken this on accountable." Source: <http://www.scp.org/news/2014/08/04/45765/foster-care-watchdog-says-reform-has-slowed/>

Two Day Gathering For Indigenous Adoptees & Foster Care Survivors Of The '60s Scoop Generation by mmmniontalk on August 5, 2014 98 Views The Indigenous Adoptee Gathering Committee will be hosting the first national "Bi Giwen Indigenous Adoptee Gathering 2014", for Indigenous adoptees and foster care survivors. The gathering will take place in the unceded territory of the Algonquin nation on September 20th and 21st, 2014 at the Richelieu-Vanier Community Centre in Ottawa, Ontario. The focus of the gathering is to provide adoptees and foster care survivors, from across North America, a unique opportunity to be: (1) heard, listened to and have their lived experiences validated by other survivors; (2) be met 'where they are at' in acknowledgement that as survivors they are all at different places on their journey towards healing and wholeness; (3) prioritize community support while building to strengthen mutual and accountable relationships for the survivors' safety and collective well-being; and; (4) build momentum towards a national grassroots, survivor-led, community-driven justice and healing movement to address impacts of colonial child welfare policies. The gathering will feature a series of workshops, presentations and evening activities, by survivors for survivors, with support from Indigenous and non-Indigenous volunteers. For further information contact Colleen Cardinal at (613)790-7057 Source: http://nationtalk.ca/story/two-day-gathering-for-indigenous-adoptees-foster-care-survivors-of-the-60s-scoop-generation/?utm_source=rss&utm_medium=rss&utm_campaign=two-day-gathering-for-indigenous-adoptees-foster-care-survivors-of-the-60s-scoop-generation

Rikers Island Guards Accused of Horrific Inmate Beatings Won't Be Prosecuted By Margaret Hartmann Follow @marghartmann Though the case was highlighted by the New York Times and a U.S. attorney's report, 4 Shares Share 0 Tweet 4 Share 0 Share 0 Email Print Share In a report this week on the treatment of teen inmates at Rikers Island, U.S. Attorney Preet Bharara described the prison as "a place where brute force is the first impulse rather than the last resort, a place where verbal insults are repaid with physical injuries, where beatings are routine, while accountability is rare." Still, one would probably assume that the guards accused of severely beating two inmates strapped to gurneys would be punished after the case was referred for prosecution twice by the New York City Department of Investigation, highlighted in Bharara's report, and described in a front-page New York Times exposé last month. However, the Bronx district attorney's office said on Tuesday that it has decided not to prosecute the officers who allegedly left the walls of a medical examination room stained with the blood of two inmates. Witnesses were so disturbed by the December 2012 incident that they reported it to investigators, which is rare at Rikers. Three anonymous clinicians told the Times that after Andre Lane, 24, splashed guards with an unknown liquid, he was taken from solitary confinement, handcuffed to a gurney, and wheeled into a clinic examination room where there were no video cameras. Lane repeatedly screamed, "Don't leave me, they're going to kill me." The witnesses say about six officers were in the room, and several medical staffers begged them to stop beating Lane, but they refused. Later a second inmate, 20-year-old Tamel Dixon, was taken to the examination room and beaten as well. Related Stories 8 Appalling Stories of Inmate Abuse From Rikers Island's Teen Jails Can Mayor de Blasio Tame Rikers Island? Mentally Ill Rikers Inmates Are Frequently Attacked by Officers, Says Secret Study The official incident report said, "Dixon was eventually escorted to the main clinic for medical examination without any further incident of force used." A senior health official told investigators that one of the guards warned him not to tell anyone what really happened, remarking, "Sure is good there were witnesses to see that those guys hit their heads on the cabinets themselves." The case was referred for prosecution in July 2013 and June 2014, but on Tuesday a Bronx district attorney's office spokeswoman told the Times that the case will not move forward "because of inconsistent versions of events, contradictions between the witness statements and the forensics (injuries of the inmates), and the inability of witnesses to observe the events." The U.S. attorney's report described a "powerful code of silence" among Rikers staffers, and it's clear just from the statistics exposed in the last month that it's extremely rare for Rikers guards to be prosecuted for assaulting inmates. While The Times reported that between January and November last year 129 inmates were injured so badly by guards that they required emergency treatment, in the last five years the Bronx district attorney's office has opened just 20 cases against correction officers, and only four have resulted in prison sentences. Source: <http://nymag.com/daily/intelligencer/2014/08/rikers-guards-wont-be-prosecuted-for-beatings.html>

South Bend group home worker admits to abusing mentally disabled resident Lance Anglin, 51, pleaded guilty to a charge of criminal deviate conduct for sexually abusing a mentally disabled man in a South Bend group home. Emily Pfund Posted on Aug. 6, 2014 at 9:04 a.m. A South Bend man pleaded guilty Tuesday to a charge of criminal deviate conduct for sexually abusing a mentally disabled man. Lance Anglin, 51, a former worker at a South Bend group home, was accused of forcing a 49-year-old mentally disabled resident to perform oral sex on him, according to a report from the South Bend Tribune. Lance Anglin pleaded guilty on Tuesday, Aug. 5, to a charge of criminal deviate conduct for forcing a mentally disabled man to perform oral sex on him. (Photo supplied / St. Joseph County Jail) The victim told his mother about the incident when she picked him up at the home to go out for a meal, according to court documents obtained by the Tribune. She then told other staff at the home, reported the incident to police and other necessary state agencies like Adult Protective Services. According to the documents, the victim was too disabled to give proper consent. Anglin was removed from duty when the allegation was made and fired after his arrest in August 2013. He is scheduled to appear in St. Joseph Superior Court for sentencing on Sept. 25. Source:

<http://www.elkharttruth.com/news/crime-fire-courts/2014/08/06/South-Bend-group-home-worker-admits-to-abusing-mentally-disabled-resident.html>

RaiseAChild.US Opposes New Bill That Allows Religious Foster & Adoption Agencies to Discriminate Against LGBT Parents & Families

>PRWEB.COM Newswire > PRWEB.COM NewswireLos Angeles, CA (PRWEB) August 06, 2014 A bill introduced in Congress by Sen. Mike Enzi (R-WY) and Rep. Mike Kelly (R-PA) would allow religious foster and adoption agencies to deny services to same-sex and unmarried heterosexual couples, LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender) and heterosexual singles, and people from other religions. "The Child Welfare Provider Inclusion Act of 2014 is harmful to foster children," said Rich Valenza, Founder and CEO of RaiseAChild.US. "It is a misguided attempt to go back to claiming religious rights ahead of the real needs of foster children. At a time when RaiseAChild.US is successfully growing a larger, more diverse and inclusive pool of safe, loving, and permanent homes for the 400,000 children in our nation's foster care system, this bill tries to shrink and edit that pool of prospective parents by using taxpayers' funds to promote intolerance, discrimination, and homophobia." RaiseAChild.US is the only U.S. nonprofit organization that encourages and assists the LGBT community in building families through fostering and adoption through direct services and its Parent Advocate mentorship program. The organization's success rate for moving interested foster and adoptive prospective parents through the training and certification process has proven to be five times greater than the industry's national average. "This bill runs contrary to the beliefs of most faith-based communities, recent national polls, and what science overwhelmingly tells us: that there are no differences in children adopted by heterosexual versus same-sex couples," said Valenza. "My hope is that all people who have children's best interests at heart will contact their elected representatives in Washington and let them know this kind of legislated hatred will not be tolerated. To solve the nation's foster care crisis we need to expand the available pool of prospective parents, not reduce it." More than 16,000 same-sex couples are raising an estimated 22,000 adopted children in the U.S., according to the Williams Institute at the UCLA School of Law. Societal acceptance of LGBT-headed families is growing rapidly, and scientific studies are showing that the sexual orientation of parents does not negatively affect their foster adopted children. A Gallup poll published in May 2014 found that a majority of Americans (63%) now say same-sex couples should have the legal right to adopt. A 2013 study by the Williams Institute found that family type is not a predictor of a child's psychological adjustment among early placed adopted children with lesbian, gay, or heterosexual parents. A 2012 study by the Williams Institute found that foster kids do equally well when adopted by gay, lesbian, or heterosexual parents. In support of positive legislation that puts children's needs first, RaiseAChild.US has joined forces with Family Equality Council and a coalition of more than one hundred child welfare, foster/adoption, civil rights, religious, and LGBT advocacy organizations in support of the Every Child Deserves A Family Act. This legislation focuses attention on the best interests of children in the foster care system. By eliminating state laws, policies, practices, and procedures that exclude potential adoptive and foster parents because of their marital status, sexual orientation, or gender identity, this bill will dramatically increase access to permanent, loving homes for children in foster care. According to the U.S. Department of Health & Human Services' Administration for Children & Families, there are 400,000 children in our nation's foster care system. More than 104,000 of these children have had parental rights terminated and are waiting to be adopted. Families certified for both foster and adoptive placements are in short supply. RaiseAChild.US finds prospective parents through media campaigns that include outdoor advertising, radio and television public service announcements (PSAs), print media, social media, and special events. All prospective parents who sign up at events or at the RaiseAChild.US website receive free information, support, and mentorship through the organization's unique Parent Advocate program. Since 2011, RaiseAChild.US has engaged more than 2,200 prospective parents nationally and become a leading organization for public education and advocacy on behalf of these children. Read more: <http://www.digitaljournal.com/pr/2106085#ixzz3A21JAwuB> Source: <http://www.digitaljournal.com/pr/2106085>

Marion elder group home closed after reports residents locked in bedrooms overnight Cited home one of only three in state By Erin Jordan, The Gazette Published: August 8 2014 | 12:01 am in Front Rotator, Local News, News, Photos State officials closed down a Marion group home Thursday based on allegations owners had locked four elderly residents in their rooms overnight. The Iowa Department of Inspections and Appeals revoked the certificate of Park Setting Elder Group Home, 1470 Tama St., Marion, based on allegations operators Don and Peggy Berns locked residents in their bedrooms, in one case using a board to block the tenant's door after state officials told them not to lock the rooms. "There was no real justification provided as to why they took that action," said department spokesman David Werning. "It's my understanding they didn't have overnight staff at that point. I could hypothesize it was for convenience." A four-page certificate revocation notice says the Berns also failed to secure medication and hazardous chemicals, did not get physicians' orders for over-the-counter drugs and admitted tenants whose health needs the Berns could not meet. "They retained individuals that were beyond their (the Berns') level of care," Werning said. "They (residents) were exhibiting dementia and there was no record of any training for staff." "Not a good situation," Werning added. The Bernses can appeal the closure. A hearing is scheduled for Sept. 9 in Des Moines. Residents were being moved from the group home Thursday, with Department of Human Services caseworkers and the state's long-term care ombudsman helping family members figure out new facilities or care situations, Werning said. The closure came after a complaint was made about the elder group home, one of only three in the state, Werning said. The others are Postillion in Davenport and Seventh Heaven in Dubuque. Elder group homes are single-family residences operated by a person providing room, board, personal care and some health-related services to three to five elders not related to the operator. The home must be staffed 24 hours a day, according to Iowa Code. Elder group homes, never widespread in use, have declined in recent years with the growth of assisted-living centers, Werning said. Park Setting, opened in 2011, was fined $1,000 in 2012 after state inspectors found the group home insufficient in standards that include evaluation of tenant service plans, staffing and records checks. A third investigation in 2012 yielded no fines or certificate action and a 2013 survey found no violations. The Bernses had not returned phone calls or an email from The Gazette by press time. 1 Comments: (319) 339-3157; erin.jordan@thegazette.com Read more at <http://thegazette.com/subject/news/marion-elder-group-home-closed-after-reports-residents-locked-in-bedrooms-overnight-20140808#vOmL9ZXCiCODJpo.99>

Exclusive: Family of group home residents in Bronx claiming abuse Sarah Wallace has the Eyewitness News exclusive. By Sarah Wallace Friday, August 08, 2014 BRONX (WABC) -- Family members of mentally challenged adults make disturbing claims of abuse against a group home. State investigators are now confirming that they are looking into at least two incidents at the Union IRA home in the Bronx involving alleged staff abuse. Investigative Reporter Sarah Wallace spoke with devastated and outraged relatives. These are loving relatives who are unable to keep their loved ones at home because they are so severely disabled. So the families have to trust strangers. Now, they believe that trust has been broken in the worst kind of way imaginable. "When I saw Bianca, she had a blue and black eye and I said wow," said Carlos Ramos. Ramos can't even bear to look at the pictures he took of his severely disabled daughter, Bianca. Ramos visits his daughter every weekend at the Union IRA group home in the Bronx, when he saw this (black eye) during a trip in May, he says he demanded an investigation. Sarah Wallace: "They told you that a staff member hit her in the eye?" Ramos: Definitely...It was physical abuse." He says he was never told who did it and what happened to them. "How does somebody do that? That's what hurts me so much. How does anybody do that to my daughter?" asks Ramos. Or to Tony Kearins' daughter Laura Kearins's sister. They say they were told earlier this week by staff at the Union IRA home that 45-year-old Debbie had been taken to Lincoln Hospital. "They said it was allergies...yes, that she had rubbed her eye all night. Does that look like someone rubbing her eye, Sarah?" But what is even more disturbing is this internal hospital report which says Debbie was abused in the emergency room by her escort from the group home who was quote "Verbally aggressive towards patient" and "violently pushed the patient." So much so that hospital police intervened. "Debbie can't speak, she can't get on the telephone and say, Laura, they're doing something," adds Laura. She adds, "You go to bed and worry, what's happening to them in the middle of the night." Tony Kearins was just as upset. "This facility needs to be cleaned out from top to bottom. There's been a coverup. We don't know what else is happening. Metro IRA would not comment about any staff because of a state investigation. A spokesperson for the agency which oversees homes for the mentally challenged told Eyewitness News. "We will continue to work with the (state-run) Justice Center and law enforcement to ensure that employees who are accused of criminal conduct against individuals with developmental disabilities are thoroughly investigated and brought to justice if found guilty." "You don't just hurt my daughter, you killed me," Tony said. Source: <http://7online.com/news/exclusive-family-of-group-home-patients-claiming-abuse/248923/>

Families First Group Home in Davis at Center of Lawsuit Permalink Posted Thursday, August 7th 2014 @ 11am by KFBK News - Kaitlin Lewis The Families First Group Home has been at the center of lawsuits for years. Allegations of neglect and child sex abuse closed the home in 2013. But trouble continues. In a new lawsuit, a victim of alleged child sexual abuse is charging that he was molested at the home. "The group home was an abominable facility," Dr. Joseph George, who is representing the victim, said. The victim claims he was also restrained by employees; forced to spend the night locked in a room without a bed, water, or the use of a restroom. "Euphemistically called a 'quiet room,'" he said. George says the boy's father found out about the situation and contacted police. Davis police cited the home, but that didn't stop the violence. "Then the word gets out that the guy who initiated the 'quiet room,' he gets fired. Then our child gets harassed by the other workers there," George said. Families First in Davis has since been shut down, but as George says, the new lawsuit seeks accountability for violence in a facility that should have been a safe haven. Read more: <http://www.kfbk.com/articles/kfbk-news-461777/families-first-group-home-in-davis-at-center-of-lawsuit-12647061/#ixzz3A26qKQm>

DCF resumes placement with foster care subcontractor By Tim Potter The Wichita Eagle Published Friday, August 8, 2014, at 11:16 a.m. Updated Friday, August 8, 2014, at 11:22 a.m. comments Email Print Reprints close x Photos « 1 of 2 » Jaime Green/ The Wichita Eagle | Buy this photo "I felt it was in the best interest of children to suspend placements until all homes could be inspected. Our investigation into the death is ongoing, but placements are once again permitted," said Phyllis Gilmore, secretary of the Kansas Department for Children and Families. Brian Corn/ The Wichita Eagle | Buy this photo A 10-month-old girl died after being left in this Dodge Charger in the 1500 block of South Topeka. (July 25, 2014) Affidavit: Both Wichita foster parents smoking pot while baby in hot car Child dies after being left in car in south Wichita Police, state conducting own investigations into child's death in hot car Wichita police present baby-death case to prosecutors Foster father charged with first-degree murder in death of baby in hot car DA: Foster father was using marijuana when baby left in car Baby's death in Wichita puts focus on foster system Police affidavit on Seth Jackson case After suspending foster care placements with a subcontractor that sponsored a Wichita foster home where a 10-month-old girl died after being left in a hot car, the state has allowed placements to resume, a state agency said Friday. "I felt it was in the best interest of children to suspend placements until all homes could be inspected. Our investigation into the death is ongoing, but placements are once again permitted," said Phyllis Gilmore, secretary of the Kansas Department for Children and Families. "While we know this affected our valued foster families, it was never intended to be an insult to foster parents who have opened their homes to care for children in need. It was simply a safety precaution," Gilmore said in an e-mail news release. The baby died July 24. The next day, DCF ordered contractors to assess the safety of all children in TFI-sponsored homes, the release said. The directive was to inspect within 72 hours homes where children were under 7 and within a week where foster children were older than 7, the release said. During the inspections, social workers with the two foster care contractors, Saint Francis and KVC, "addressed with the foster parents any safety concerns and reiterated the importance of removing children from vehicles and refraining from being impaired while serving as a foster parent," Gilmore said. "We were pleased to learn that no major issues were discovered. It appears the recent tragedy is a rare exception to an otherwise strong record of foster care child safety in Kansas." Read more here: <http://www.kansas.com/2014/08/08/3587691/DCF-resumes-placement-with-foster.html#storylink=cpy>

Roskam: Fighting human trafficking in the foster care system Published: Thursday, Aug. 7, 2014 4:09 p.m. CDT Caption U.S. Rep. Peter Roskam, R-Wheaton, represents Illinois' 6th District By Peter Roskam For too many children in the foster care system, their lives have been filled with instability, abuse, and neglect. Often these children are passed from home to home not knowing how long they will stay in one place or who they can trust. The psychological toll of such an environment makes it all too easy for human trafficking rings to target vulnerable foster care youth and force them into what can only be described as modern day slavery. That is why lawmakers, community leaders and law enforcement agencies are joining forces to prevent the estimated 104,000 children in foster care from becoming victims of physical and psychological abuse. Source: <http://www.mysuburbanlife.com/2014/08/04/roskam-fighting-human-trafficking-in-the-foster-care-system/a3lo5op/>

Boy celebrating 13th birthday drowns in Oregon Ridge lake Beach closed indefinitely after death of boy from Silver Spring camp Comments 12 By Jean Marbella and Alison Knezevich, The Baltimore Sun 9:01 p.m. EDT, August 8, 2014 A Laurel boy who was celebrating his 13th birthday drowned at the Oregon Ridge lake Friday, prompting Baltimore County officials to close the beach until further notice. Dennis Kemp, 13, of the 3000 block of Old Channel Road, was on an outing with the Silver Spring-based Camp Sonshine, according to county public safety officials. Fire Department rescuers were called to the park shortly before 12:30 p.m. Witness told them they saw the boy in distress and slipping under the water, officials said. Kemp's body was recovered just after 3 p.m. in about 45 feet of water, officials said. He and others from the camp had passed a swimming test required for entry to the deeper part of the lake. County officials described the section where the boy drowned as a "roped area," but said swimming was permitted there. Camp Sonshine is a Christian camp founded in 1981, according to its website. Participants in the camp's Wilderness Teen Program arrived at Oregon Ridge shortly before noon, according to a statement posted on the site. "We are deeply saddened by this situation and are going to do everything that we can to help the family and campers affected," the statement said. "This is the first time that something like this has ever happened at Camp Sonshine in our 33-year history." "We send our prayers and thoughts to the family at this time," the statement said. "More than everything, we are a family here, and any loss felt by one of us is felt by all of us." County Executive Kevin Kamenetz spoke with the boy's parents, who were called to Oregon Ridge after their son was reported missing. Kamenetz also spoke to staff at the park. "This is a terrible tragedy," he said, "On behalf of the citizens of Baltimore County, I offer deepest sympathy to the victim's family and friends." Park lifeguards searched the water unsuccessfully for the boy until county rescue crews arrived from the nearby Texas Station in Cockeysville, and from Kingsville and Middle River fire companies. A Carroll County dive unit also responded. Baltimore City sent a sonar unit, but the boy's body was recovered before it arrived. Baltimore County Fire Lt. Jay Ringgold said rescuers could not remember any previous drownings in the lake. Oregon Ridge, at more than 1,100 acres, is the largest park owned by the county. The beach and its pavilion will remain closed indefinitely to allow investigators to review the incident, Ringgold said. Read more: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/baltimore-county/cockeysville/bs-md-oregon-ridge-missing-0809-20140808.0.1501573.story#ixzz3A29YWSLR>

Oklahoma mother sentenced to 22 years in prison for keeping 4-year-old son in dog cage | Fox News Oklahoma mother sentenced to 22 years in prison for keeping 4-year-old son in dog cage Published August 08, 2014 Associated Press Facebook Twitter 6 CLAREMORE, Okla. — An Oklahoma woman has been sentenced to 22 years in prison for locking her 4-year-old son in a dog cage. A district judge in Claremore handed down the punishment Thursday to the 34-year-old Chelsea woman. She pleaded guilty in May to child abuse by injury and child neglect. ADVERTISEMENT ADVERTISEMENT Court documents say the boy was held in the cage last year for an estimated 14 hours each day. Her co-defendant and common-law husband was sentenced last month to 27 years in prison for child abuse and sexually abusing another child. The man told authorities that they kept the boy in the cage for discipline and protection. The Associated Press typically does not name victims of child abuse and is withholding the adults' names to avoid identifying the child. Source: <http://www.foxnews.com/us/2014/08/08/oklahoma-mother-sentenced-to-22-years-in-prison-for-keeping-4-year-old-son-in/>

Foster care cases to remain open to the public under new order Judge Michael Nash Gina Ferazzi / Los Angeles Times Superior Court Judge Michael Nash presides over Los Angeles County's juvenile court. Hearings to decide whether a potentially endangered child should be removed from his or her parents and placed in foster care will remain largely open to the media and public under a new order from Nash. Superior Court Judge Michael Nash presides over Los Angeles County's juvenile court. Hearings to decide whether a potentially endangered child should be removed from his or her parents and placed in foster care will remain largely open to the media and public under a new order from Nash. (Gina Ferazzi / Los Angeles Times) By Garrett Therolf contact the reporter CrimeJustice System New courtroom rules will allow foster care placement hearings to be open, if participants identify themselves Hearings to decide whether a child should be removed from a home will be largely open to the public Los Angeles County court hearings to decide whether a potentially endangered child should be removed from his or her parents and placed in foster care will remain largely open to the media and public under a new judicial order. Superior Court Judge Michael Nash, who presides over the county's juvenile court, issued the order Friday in response to an appeals court decision that struck down a previous order opening the courts to public view. Related story: Judge erred in opening dependency court to media, appeals court rules Garrett Therolf In a 2-1 decision, appellate panel says L.A. County judge's order interfered with individual judges' discretion in juvenile hearings. In a 2-1 decision, appellate panel says L.A. County judge's order interfered with individual judges' discretion in juvenile hearings. \(Garrett Therolf\) Under the new order covering all dependency hearings, Nash said judicial officers should ask attendees to identify themselves and state their interest in the case or the court's work. Under the previous order, Nash did not require attendees to identify themselves. Lawyers involved in the case will have the opportunity to argue that the news media or public should be barred from the hearing, but they must show that the presence harms a child's best interest. In January 2012, Nash issued his first decree that dependency hearings, which had been presumptively closed for years, were now presumptively open to the press. Related Opinion Newton: Failing our children, in and out of court See all related 8 But in March, a California appeals court ruled that Nash erred in the order. In a 2-1 decision, the appellate panel said the first blanket order opening the courts for hearings to decide whether children should be removed from their families interfered with individual judges' discretion "to determine, on a case-by-case basis, whether a person may be admitted to the hearing based on a 'direct and legitimate interest in the particular case or the work of the court.'" Comments Superior Court Judge Michael Nash, is to be commended for bringing transparency to the juvenile court. I think the appeals court erred in wanting to continue to keep the juvenile court proceedings cloaked in secrecy. Andre-Leonard at 10:08 AM August 09, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 1 The appeal had been brought by a 15-year-old girl who challenged a judge's decision to allow a Times reporter to observe a hearing at which lawyers discussed whether she should be removed from her family after being assaulted by her stepfather. Leaders of the court-appointed law firm representing most of the county's foster children said they would not have objected to the first order if Nash had required attendees to identify themselves upon entering the courtroom. Twitter: @gtherolf Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/countygovernment/la-me-media-access-20140809-story.html>

In Need of Care: Child neglect easy to miss, affects development, safety By Deb Gruver The Wichita Eagle Published Saturday, August 9, 2014, at 2:49 p.m. Updated Sunday, August 10, 2014, at 6:58 a.m. comments Email Print Reprints close x Photos « 1 of 2 » Brian Corn/ File photo After a 12-year-old Wichita girl and her siblings hadn't taken a bath or brushed their teeth in a month, they got cleaned up at the Wichita Children's Home. Reports of suspected child abuse or neglect in Sedgwick County This story is part of our ongoing "In Need of Care" series. As reports of child abuse and neglect rise locally, the stakes are huge – for the children and for the community. The Eagle takes readers inside two cases to examine how the system works and to show the problem's extent. Here are the previous stories: CASE 1: Part 1: The girl in the basement | Part 2: Parents are charged | Part 3: Lawyer wants case closed to media | Part 4: Reports of abuse 'unsubstantiated' by DCF | Part 5: Trial continued to October CASE 2: Part 1: Helpless in the face of violence | Part 2: State proves 4 children in need of care, judge says | Part 3: Reintegration of kids in child-in-need-of-care case 'viable option,' judge says CASE 3: Part 1: Child neglect easy to miss, affects development, safety Suspect child abuse or neglect? Report it Confidential reports may be made by calling the Kansas Protection Report Center toll-free at 800-922-5330. The Kansas Department for Children and Families says on its website: "Every call is taken seriously and every effort will be made to protect your identity." The number is answered 24 hours a day. In situations where a child's safety is at immediate risk, people should call 911. More information about reporting is available at the DCF website, www.dcf.ks.gov/Pages/Report-Abuse-or-Neglect.aspx. If you are required by law to report suspected abuse or neglect – for example, if you are a teacher, doctor, social worker or therapist – you may use the Kansas Intake/Investigation Protection System. A complete list of mandatory reporters is available at www.dcf.ks.gov/services/PPS/Pages/MandatoryReportersChild.aspx. How to get help The Kansas Children's Service League hotline for parents, 1-800-CHILDREN, offers education, resources and referrals. How to give help Give or volunteer • Child Advocacy Center of Sedgwick County, which helps abuse victims navigate services and resources, needs new or gently used children's clothing; toys for boys ages 5 to 14, such as Hot Wheels and footballs; and gas cards for families. The center also needs financial donations and volunteers. Donations may be dropped off at 130 S. Market, Suite B183, Wichita, KS 67202. More information is available at www.cacskansas.org or by calling 316-660-9494. • The Wichita Children's Home is where children who have been placed in police protective custody initially stay. The home is the only emergency residential center in Sedgwick County open 24 hours a day. The home at 810 N. Holyoke keeps a list of needed donations and volunteers at <http://wch.org/giving/wishlist>. More information is available by calling 316-684-6581. • Court Appointed Special Advocates for Children offers free training for volunteers who want to advocate in court for an abused or neglected child. More information is available at www.casaofsedgwickcounty.org or by calling 316-866-2920. The volunteer form is online. • Wichita Area Sexual Assault Center also seeks volunteers. More information is available at www.wichitasac.com/volunteer or by calling 877-927-2248. Become a foster parent Kansas children need foster parents. To become foster parents, you must: • Be at least 21 years old. • Be able to meet basic income guidelines. • Be able to provide adequate bedroom space and a separate bed for each foster child. • Have reliable transportation. • Complete 30 hours of free training in Partnering for Safety and Permanency – Model Approaches for Partnerships in Parenting. • Agree to use nonphysical forms of discipline for children. • Be willing for everyone in your household to undergo a complete background check. There are different levels of foster parenting. Family foster care parents provide children with temporary homes until they can return to their own homes, be placed with relatives, find adoptive homes or become adults. Respite care providers give foster parents planned time off to recharge. Emergency providers care for children just coming into foster care who have not been placed in a home yet. The state contracts with two foster care providers. More information is available by calling Saint Francis Community Services toll-free at 866-999-1599 or going online to www.st-francis.org or by calling KVC at 316-618-5437 or going online to www.kvc.org. Sources: Kansas Department for Children and Families, www.st-francis.org, www.kvc.org They hadn't taken a bath or brushed their teeth in a month. That's what a 12-year-old Wichita girl told social workers recently after she and her siblings got cleaned up at the Wichita Children's Home. They had been living without electricity or water, court documents say, because their parents hadn't paid the utility bills. Prosecutors filed a child-in-need-of-care petition on behalf of the four children July 30 after police removed them from their home during a welfare check three days before. Neglect happens every day in homes across the Wichita area. In state fiscal year 2014, which ended June 30, physical and medical neglect of a child made up about 18 percent of all child-in-need-of-care cases assigned for investigation by the Kansas Department for Children and Families. Since February, The Eagle has been regularly reviewing child-in-need-of-care petitions and is following several cases through the system, including this one. To protect children's privacy, The Eagle is not identifying them or their parents. The petition alleges that the children were covered in bug bites, some scabbed over and some fresh. That the youngest child, a 7-month-old, hadn't been to the doctor since she was born. That the youngest boy, who is autistic and nonverbal, was kept in a locked house out of fear he would run away. People hear about "dirty house" cases and may think it sounds draconian that police remove children because of how a house looks, Sedgwick County Deputy District Attorney Ron Paschal said. But a dirty house is one thing, he said. A filthy house that can affect a child's health is another. "We've all had a house that's been dirty before. My house is dirty right now," Paschal said Friday. "When we talk about these kind of cases, we talk about houses that are so severe or so chronically dirty that they will ... present some kind of risk to the child." Paschal remembers a case in which a family was using a bathtub as a toilet because the home had no running water. The family urinated and defecated in the tub. A girl in the home cut her foot on a broken beer bottle in the yard, got in the tub to use the bathroom and became sick with a severe infection that threatened her life. He recalled another case where a wall appeared to be moving with cockroaches. "It's not uncommon to see children who are living in filth," Paschal said. "Not dirty houses, but filth." Neglect cases grow The number of reports of child abuse and neglect in Sedgwick County has increased 31 percent since 2009, records from the state show. The state agency that investigates child abuse and neglect, formerly known as SRS, received 12,989 reports in Sedgwick County in the state fiscal year that ended June 30. The department assigned 7,438 of those intakes to a social worker for further review. Physical abuse accounts for 33 percent of the cases. Physical neglect makes up almost 14 percent, and medical neglect makes up almost 5 percent. "It takes a significant concern before (a neglect case) is going to rise to the level where it gets assigned to investigate," said Diana Schunn, executive director of the Child Advocacy Center of Sedgwick County. "Any time there is that potential for short-term or long-term negative outcomes, those are the cases where we get involved." Neglect manifests itself in various ways. A child may be seriously overweight or short for his age because he isn't being fed regularly. Or he may show up to school dirty on a regular basis, wearing the same clothes over and over. He might need to go to a doctor for a problem that's been ignored. Or parents may leave children alone, as was the case in May when a maintenance worker discovered a 1-year-old in a closet at a Wichita apartment complex. The mother said she put her son in the closet when she took the child's father to work. In some cases, a combination of problems threaten a child's safety. "Neglect is often an ongoing situation. It's a combination of things that are occurring," Paschal said. "Hygiene, attention issues, nutrition. We see a little bit of everything when it comes to neglect." Brian Dempsey, director of protection and prevention services for the DCF, said a report initially may be made because, say, a child is coming to school dirty. "A lot of times with any report, that's the tip of the iceberg and when we engage the family, we find other issues that (need to be) addressed as well," Dempsey said. "It's nasty" In the case filed late last month, social workers sent all of the children to Via Christi Hospital St. Francis, where doctors examined them and treated them for bug bites. The next day, investigators began interviewing the children and the parents. Asked by social workers whether she understood why she and her siblings had been taken away, the 12-year-old girl said "because my parents are working on getting the bed bugs fixed," the petition says. All of the children, including the baby, had bug bites. The girl said her family did not have air-conditioning. She said she shared a room with her baby sister and opened windows in the home to try to keep cool. She said her parents brought home bread, jelly and peanut butter for the children to eat. The oldest boy in the home said he shared a room with his younger brother, who is autistic. The girl said her parents "have to lock the doors because the (boy) will run out of the house and down the street," according to the petition. The oldest boy told social workers his parents brought home chips and pudding to eat. "It's nasty," he said of their home, adding that it smelled. The oldest girl told social workers her home would be better if someone could help her parents "get the house clean." Despite the allegations, the girl said she thought she and her siblings were safe in the home. Previous reports The children's parents wouldn't let social workers into their house, owned by a relative, the petition says. Social workers interviewed the father July 28 in front of the home. He also had bug bites, the petition says. When social workers asked for access to the home, the father said he couldn't find his keys. He later called the children's mother, the petition says, and told her, "They want in the house." He told investigators the children were bitten by bugs while playing outside. He denied that the home was unlivable and said there may be fleas in the home because the children brought a toy home from a friend who had pets. He later told social workers the family had consulted a lawyer who said not to let investigators in without more information. The father said the family did not receive assistance of any kind. He said his wife worked, and he was getting involved in wind and solar energy but didn't have any customers yet. Social workers later interviewed the children's mother by phone. One of them "explained the importance of seeing the home to make sure it is safe for the children to return to," the petition says. The social worker explained the state would not return the children to the home without seeing it. The mother confirmed there was no electricity or water at the home, court documents say. The mother said she remembered the state previously had offered the family preservation services but she and the father "thought we were okay on our own at that point so we just didn't think we needed services." She said the family had to buy a new vehicle recently and it cost more than what they had expected. A "giant water leak" under the house caused the water bill to get "way too expensive and out of hand," the mother said. The mother confirmed that her son with autism was not receiving any services. "I don't know where to go for him either," she said, according to the petition. "He's too old for Rainbows." Rainbows United serves children with special needs from birth to age 21, according to the nonprofit group's website. The DCF had two previous reports about the family, one from January about the oldest girl not attending school regularly. The DCF "addressed the concerns with the family and referred them to Saint Francis Community Services. The family was unable to be located and DCF was provided with a false address. DCF closed the case," the petition says. On Feb. 13, the DCF received a report that the baby had tested positive for cannabis. "There were additional concerns that (the baby) had not been seen by a physician since her birth. The intake was screened out," the petition said. The state requested a clinical interview assessment of the parents and the oldest three children, medical exams for all the children, dental and vision exams for the three oldest children, and developmental examinations for the two youngest children. Social workers who observed the baby said she seemed happy and on track developmentally. Signs of neglect/neglect can be easy to miss, experts say, but there are telltale signs. "The person who the child spends the most time with can tell you," said assistant district attorney Sandra Lessor, who prosecutes many of Sedgwick County's children-in-need-of-care cases. Common signs are: • Being underweight or short for one's age. • Hoarding food. • Poor hygiene. • Medical conditions or problems that aren't being treated, including vision and dental issues. • Behavior problems. • Lack of parental supervision. • Refusal by a family to let someone into a home. Public awareness of neglect is important, said the DCF's Dempsey. "Certainly in some of these scenarios, if nobody is in that home, it's hard to see," he said. "That's why rely on schools, for example." If people suspect child abuse or neglect, they should report it, Dempsey said. Too often, experts say, people don't want to get involved or make a fuss. The DCF can offer or refer services to parents struggling financially or who need help with parenting or household skills, Dempsey said. "The best place for any child, as long as it's safe, is in the home," he said. Lessor had a simple piece of advice to help children in the community: "Keep your eye open for your neighbor kids." Reports of suspected child abuse or neglect in Sedgwick County Fiscal 2009 Fiscal 2010 Fiscal 2011 Fiscal 2012 Fiscal 2013 Fiscal 2014 Reports received in Sedgwick County 9,901 10,606 10,748 11,680 12,366 12,989 Reports assigned for further investigation in Sedgwick County 5,242 5,434 5,854 6,768 7,401 7,438 Reach Deb Gruver at 316-268-6400 or degruver@wichitaeagle.com. Follow her on Twitter: @SGCountyDeb. Read more here: <http://www.kansas.com/2014/08/09/3589266/child-neglect-easy-to-miss-affects.html#storylink=cpy>

Too much, too young? One in three Wyoming foster care children prescribed psychotropic drugs 4 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email » Foster Care Dan Cepeda/Star-Tribune photos Carissa O'Malley, center, and her brother Cameron, 15, take instructions from dance teacher Andrew Nelson at the Heart of Dance Productions dance studio recently in Casper, Wyo. Carissa, 22, legally adopted Cameron after he was drifting through different foster families. After the adoption, she took him off of his prescribed psychotropic medications and increased scheduled activities such as cycling and dance lessons. 2014-08-10T00:15:00Z Too much, too young? One in three Wyoming foster care children prescribed psychotropic drugs By LEAH TODD Casper Star-Tribune The Billings Gazette 17 hours ago • By LEAH TODD Casper Star-Tribune 0 CASPER, Wyo. — For Cameron O'Malley, weekends at his sister's house meant tucking a pair of jeans, a few shirts and his toothbrush into his backpack. The 15-year-old's foster mom would zip a weekend's worth of pills the size of jelly beans into plastic baggies. Cameron and his sister Carissa, 22, knew the routine: Take daily with food. Carissa didn't like the medications, prescribed for a list of conditions she was not convinced Cameron even had: Prozac for his hyperactive attention disorder. Fluoxetine for depression. Straterra for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Wellbutrin for depression. They made Cameron's brain feel weird, like he was thinking in fog. But if the adoption was to go through, he and his sister had to follow the rules. Nearly one in three foster children in Wyoming is prescribed psychotropic medications like the ones Cameron took. That's more than four times the rate found in other low-income children not living in foster care, where the frequency is one in 12. Critics say psychotropic drugs — any medication that affects a patient's mood, thought or behavior — lack evidence as to their effectiveness and safety in children. Many of the medications have not been studied in children, and doctors say they can't assume what works on adults will be safe for children, whose central nervous systems are still developing. Carissa believes state and medical officers rushed to use prescriptions to control Cameron, who acted out as a child. "They want to put a diagnosis on everything," she said. Cameron was a "lost" child in the middle of a large family, one social worker wrote in a 2011 report. His parents focused on the youngest of the family's 12 children, giving little to no attention to the older kids, the worker wrote. In reports filed with the Wyoming Department of Family Services between 2004 and 2011, doctors attributed Cameron's conditions and behaviors to abuse and neglect he endured as a young boy. His mother was charged with neglect, and Cameron left his biological family for good about 2010. By 2011, he'd been diagnosed with ADHD, mild long-term depression, post-traumatic stress disorder and anxiety. He had lived with foster families on five separate occasions. Carissa didn't like the medications, and she wasn't alone. "I never wanted to take meds," Cameron said. He felt lethargic while on them. He was tired, not himself. Carissa recalls how out-of-touch he was, slow to engage in conversation. But to not take the medications? He thought he'd get in trouble. Reports on file with DFS suggest that while in foster care, Cameron attended classes regularly. His teachers described him as respectful but easily distracted. He required multiple prompts to stay on task. He had an active imagination and was easily absorbed into his drawings. Cameron received a few disciplinary procedures in school but was never suspended. His grades varied tremendously — from A's to F's. "Cameron needs to work on listening to directions," one teacher wrote on a report card. "When Cameron tries hard in class, he does excellent work." Cameron told doctors repeatedly he was sad about leaving his brothers and sisters, who were also living in foster care. A doctor once noted that fluoxetine, prescribed for Cameron's depression, seemed to calm Cameron down. Beyond that, doctors never noted whether the medications were working or not. Nearly 30 percent of the state's 3,500 foster children were prescribed at least one psychotropic drug last year, according to data from the state Department of Health. In comparison, only about 8 percent of the 57,000 Wyoming children whose low family income qualified them for Medicaid took psychotropics. Though no definitive national average has been tabulated, several regional studies suggest that Wyoming is among the most frequent prescribers of the medications. A 2011 report using Medicaid claims from five states found that 21 to 39 percent of children in foster care received a prescription for psychotropic medication in 2008, compared with 5 to 10 percent of children not in foster care. In 2004, a report showed that psychotropics are prescribed to foster care kids at rates three to 11 times greater than the rate for Medicaid-insured youngsters. Though the rate of psychotropic medication use among foster children has decreased in Wyoming since 2010, the number of children taking the drugs has increased slightly. Some experts attribute the higher rate of psychotropic drug use to the fact that foster care children are more likely to have suffered emotional or mental trauma than their peers, said James Bush, the state medical officer for Wyoming Medicaid. Foster children have often been abused or neglected seriously enough to draw the attention of state authorities. On top of that, many have been taken from their homes. Some experts say children in foster care are up to twice as likely to be diagnosed with a mental health disorder than other children. But that doesn't account for the fact that a child in state custody in Wyoming is four times as likely as his peers to be taking the mind-altering medications. Carissa's fondest memory of her brother is at a doctor's office when Cameron was about 3 years old and his younger sibling needed blood drawn. A nurse prepared a needle. Cameron watched. As the nurse brought the needle toward their infant brother, Cameron broke out into tears. "No!" Carissa remembered him saying. "Don't poke my brother!" Carissa lost touch with most of her siblings around the time she aged out of the foster care system. She moved into her own place about five years ago and works now as a welder and hairdresser in Casper. She said she wanted to adopt as many of her 11 brothers and sisters as she could. Carissa believed that DFS allowed her to communicate with Cameron because no foster parent was pushing to adopt him, unlike the case with her other siblings. Weekend visits started in late winter 2012. By last summer, Cameron moved in full time with Carissa. And when he did, Carissa said no more medications. Cameron's prescriptions always made his sister uneasy. Carissa rented books from the library on mental health and ADHD. She researched the side effects of many psychotropic medications — suicidal thoughts, severe liver damage, heart-related problems. She signed up Cameron for a local mountain biking club. She volunteered him to shovel stalls and groom horses at a nearby therapy farm, and when his grades started slipping, she wrote him a daily schedule. "He needed an activity, not medication," Carissa said. She signed the last page of adoption paperwork on Valentine's Day. Bush, the state medical officer for Medicaid, wanted to know how doctors were prescribing the drugs to Wyoming children. To find out, the Department of Health examined Medicaid claims from 2009 to 2013 and counted how many listed a psychotropic prescription. Bush looked for children who fell into one of several categories and found that between 1 and 2 percent of foster care children in Wyoming were prescribed more than 150 percent of the dosage recommended by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration during those years. Between five and 11 children under the age of 5 were prescribed psychotropic medications, and one child in each of his study years took more than five of those medications at the same time. Little is known about the drugs' long-term and short-term risks, especially when they're used in combinations. That prompted the Health Department to add an extra layer of accountability to outlier cases, where a child's dosage is high, his age is young or the number of prescribed medications is greater than five. Now, every case that exceeds one of Bush's parameters — too many, too much or too young — will receive a second look from medical faculty at the University of Washington, which partners with the University of Wyoming as the state's medical school. It's not that in all cases doctors made mistakes in prescribing these children's medications. Sometimes, exceeding the recommended dose is advisable, Bush said. But those cases should be rare, he explained. "And you should document closely and you should make sure you've explored other options," Bush said. Psychotropic drugs themselves are not problematic, he said. Being underdiagnosed is a problem, too. With kids, it's often a very tentative diagnosis. "How can you diagnose a 2-year-old as psychotic?" Bush said. "The children's brain is still evolving, it's still maturing." Marty Nelson, clinical services administrator for the Wyoming Department of Family Services, said he advocates as few medications as possible. "It's better for kids to not be on medications or to be on as few medications as they need," Nelson said. But there are cases when medications like psychotropics are necessary, Nelson said. For foster care children, that's a decision reached by a group of physicians, case workers and, ideally, the child's biological parents. "While we want the therapy to deal with the depression and anxiety, that's going to take a little time," Nelson said. "So for the six months before the talk therapy, the children are better off not beginning depressed or anxious." As talk therapy increases, ideally the medications should decrease. "What I'm hoping for them as adults is saying, 'Get your talk therapy and you won't have to get your medications,'" Nelson said. "But I don't know how that tracks out over time." Cameron doesn't fall asleep in class anymore. He said he has matured since moving in with Carissa a year ago. He's not angry. No tantrums, no behavioral problems, Carissa said. Why? Cameron threw a thumb in Carissa's direction. "It's because of her," he said. Before moving in with his sister, Cameron had never played an organized sport, never been part of a team. So far, mountain biking makes the short list of Cameron's favorite things. It's just fun, he said. "You feel free because you get to go as fast as you want," he said. His favorite thing, though, is hanging out with his sister. He walks their dogs, Capone, Delilah and Envy, outside every day. Carissa knows she has three years left with Cameron before he is 18. She hopes that by then he will have found a passion in his life. She recently sent him on a three-week adventure trip in California so he'd have some positive childhood memories. They plan to spend time at a brain center in Colorado to explore alternative treatment options. Cameron still deals with attention issues, and because of developmental delays, he needs help focusing. But the two of them steer clear of the medications that doctors once proposed to address those problems. "By taking a pill, it doesn't just automatically make things better," Carissa said. "That is not the answer, especially not by itself." A few days ago, a postcard came in the mail. On the front was a picture of teenagers jumping into the air, flanked by ice-capped mountains. On the back, she read Cameron's scratchy handwriting. "I have been haveing (sic) the best time of my life so far," he wrote. "One amazing thing I found was a dead baby octopus. I picked it up and chased people with it. I found a whole bunch of sea shells. Well I better get going. Sincerely, Cameron O'Malley." Read more: http://billingsgazette.com/news/state-and-regional/wyoming/too-much-too-young-one-in-three-wyoming-foster-care/article_1ee9cf95-ba7e-52b5-9b8d-8a47cf0d0c5d.html#ixzz3A2DNt4pZ

Springfield residents raise concerns about group home for girls in East Forest Park Some residents of Forest Park in Springfield are opposing using this site at 64 Treetop Ave. for a group home for girls. (The Republican file photo / John Suchocki) Print By Peter Goonan | pgoonan@repub.com The Republican Follow on Twitter on August 11, 2014 at 3:22 PM Reddit Email Springfield headlines Springfield Mayor Domenic Sarno responds to Holyoke Mayor Alex Morse's 'Ice Bucket Challenge' East Forest Park residents describe Springfield group home plans as threat to neighborhood tranquility From The Republican's archives: Images of Page 1 from the past 50 years, week of Aug. 10-16 Lieutenant governor candidate Steve Kerrigan to visit Springfield Tuesday Adolfo Colon denies cocaine trafficking, over 200 grams, in Springfield SPRINGFIELD — Residents of East Forest Park have launched a petition drive, opposing plans for a group home for girls at 64 Treetop Ave., raising fears that such a facility will "change the character of this wonderful neighborhood." Joan Ingersoll, executive director of the Mental Health Association, said her agency is planning a four-person group home for girls ages 16 to 22, that will be staffed 24 hours a day and not cause any harm or disruption to the neighborhood. Paul Edwards, a neighbor at 56 Treetop Ave., said residents are very upset and have gathered more than 60 signatures. "Our concern is that this corporation is going to place a large number of mentally unstable patients into a densely populated neighborhood," the petition states in part. "The homes in this street are situated very close together, yet it has remained a very quiet neighborhood for many, many years. Some residents have been living here for 60+ years." City Solicitor Edward Pikula, in a legal opinion to Deputy Planning Director Philip Dromey, said the proposed group home is exempt from local zoning regulations under state law. Under the law, known as the Dover Amendment, such a use of property is exempt because it involves educational services by a nonprofit educational institution. The group home is being provided through the Youth in Transition program, which involves residential services and to help the girls establish the skills they need in order to live independently, Ingersoll said. The petition asks that the Mental Health Association "find a more suitable location for their potentially proposed facility." The petition states that neighborhood residents were "completely unaware of the plans while renovations progressed. Ingersoll said the girls residence was in a different Springfield neighborhood for seven years without any complaints in that time. There is no date for the move yet, but there will be an open house for neighborhood residents to set the site and ask any questions, she said. "We fully expect that this program will not disrupt or negatively impact the neighborhood in any way," Ingersoll said. "We expect the girls to be good neighbors." The Mental Health Association purchased the property, and is caring for girls under the care of the state Department of Children and Families, Ingersoll said. Source: http://www.masslive.com/news/index.ssf/2014/08/springfield_residents_raise_co.html

S.C. ranks among worst in care of underprivileged children Tim Smith, The Greenville News 2:53 p.m. EDT August 11, 2014 South Carolina ranks among the worst states in its care of underprivileged children, according to a national study released this morning. (Photo: Rick Nease , MCT) 19 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN 1 COMMENT EMAIL MORE COLUMBIA — South Carolina ranks among the worst states in its care of underprivileged children, according to a national study released this morning. The state ranks 32nd in percentage of maltreated children, with one being the lowest ranking; 46th in health for the children and 42nd for education. Overall, the study by WalletHub, a personal finances website, ranked South Carolina 45th in its care of underprivileged children. The study used a variety of factors to rank each state, ranging from infant death rates, to food insecurity to percentage of children in foster care. South Carolina had one of the lowest percentages of children in foster care, according to the study, but one of the highest percentages of children in single-parent families. The United States has the second highest rate of relative child poverty among economically developed nations, according to WalletHub. Source: <http://www.greenvilleonline.com/story/news/local/south-carolina/2014/08/11/sc-ranks-among-worst-care-underprivileged-children/13888253/>

Texas Judge Orders Removal of YouTube Video Exposing Abuse in Foster Care System News Links Aug 11, 2014 0 281 HOUSTON, Texas — In a continuing cover-up by Child Protective Services ("CPS") in Texas, ng they had too many children to take care of. The trouble with CPS started when their youngest son Buddy, died in March 2013 because he had HIV. The Cooks had adopted Buddy and his younger sister after their biological mother left the children with the Cooks. She was hiding from CPS from two different states. Photos on Mrs. Cook's Facebook page show the scars, bruises, and cuts on the boy when he was left with them. It was the Cooks that notified CPS that the mother had left the children in their care. The biological mother of the boy, Amanda Lunsford, was later found incompetent to stand trial for allowing eight men to sexually assault Buddy. Lunsford had also left her six-week-old daughter in the tent for three days. Lunsford has had three more children since she was found incompetent to stand trial. CPS took the Cooks' seven children on the same day that Buddy died. Mrs. Cook has told authorities, members of the Sunset Commission, Breitbart Texas, and others that the CPS caseworker lied and withheld evidence about Buddy's HIV status and the biological mother's CPS history from law enforcement and the Coroner. Mr. and Mrs. Cook were arrested for Injury to a Child by Omission. Although the charges were dropped in December of 2013, CPS kept the children for four more months. The agency still will not relinquish legal custody. Under Texas law, CPS and the Judge have until October to terminate the Cooks' parental rights or the case must be dismissed. Even though the children are back in the Cooks' care after they have been exonerated from any wrongdoing, CPS still has legal custody of the children. CPS is expected to dismiss its case against the Cooks in October. The Cooks have spent over $140,000.00 defending themselves and protecting their family from CPS. Jim Black, a CPS watchdog from Humble, Texas, said that "anytime a TDFPS employee fails to follow the guidelines, statutes, and rules set forth by the State, they are actually insubordinate to their employer, the people of Texas. When it comes to statutes, in many cases that insubordination results in down-right criminal behavior. Moreover, what we have is the fox guarding the henhouse. Texas needs another entity in charge of CPS internal investigations.

Right now it is the Office of the Inspector General of the same agency.” Lana Shadwick is a 22-year lawyer who has been a family court associate judge, CPS lawyer, and prosecutor. Follow her @LanaShadwick2 Source: <http://www.theminorityreportblog.com/2014/08/11/texas-judge-orders-removal-of-youtube-video-exposing-abuse-in-foster-care-system/>

DOJ slams Riker's Island for horrific violence against young inmates Cory Doctorow at 8:00 am Tue, Aug 12, 2014 ADVERTISE AT BOING BOING! SHARE TWEET STUMBLE COMMENTS From the age of 16 on, children are integrated into the general population at Riker's Island, where the guards routinely engage in brutal, illegal beatings whose video evidence mysteriously disappears. The DOJ's investigation is unequivocal in its condemnation, documenting events like guards beating mentally ill inmates until they were hospitalized, then continuing to beat them in the face and head after they were restrained on a medical gurney. Based on a review of Department 24-hour reports from October 2012 through early April 2014, we identified 64 incidents involving blows to an adolescent inmate's head or face. This is undoubtedly an underestimate of the number of headshots during this period, because 24-hour reports contain only initial incident summaries prepared by staff themselves. Indeed, our review of incidents and witness interviews suggest that headshots were utilized far more frequently during this period. However, the fact that these summaries so often openly refer to headshots is disturbing. Our consultant reported that headshots are far more common at Rikers than at any other correctional institution he has observed. In many instances, correction officers readily admit hitting inmates but claim they acted in self-defense after being punched first by the inmate. As a threshold matter, even when an inmate strikes an officer, an immediate retaliatory strike to the head or face is inappropriate. Moreover, there is often reason to question the credibility of the officer's account. These incidents also disproportionately occur in locations without video surveillance, making it difficult to determine what transpired. Source: <http://boingboing.net/2014/08/12/doj-slams-rikers-island-for.html>

Failure in foster care redesign Express-News Editorial Board : August 11, 2014 E-mail Print 0 Page 1 of 1 Recent Headlines Today's Editorial Cartoon: Aug. 18 Values tested by border crisis School accountability system failing Your Turn: Aug. 16 Telemedicine plan merits state support SAN ANTONIO — Changing Texas' beleaguered foster care system won't matter if the funding is inadequate to keep these vulnerable kids safe. That is the clear takeaway from recent news surrounding the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services foster care redesign. As numerous media outlets have reported, the lead contractor for foster care redesign, Providence Services Corp., has voluntarily terminated its five-year contract with the state after just 18 months. It essentially handled a pilot version of the redesign. This is hardly a loss. The Arizona-based firm, which was tasked with the care of 1,100 foster kids in 60 North and West Texas counties, had issues. Earlier this summer, two children in its care drowned. The state put Providence on notice for failing to keep kids close to home or develop a wide array of services for the young Texans. It also struggled to stay on budget. The rationale Providence gave for dropping its $30 million annual contract was a lack of money to adequately serve children and families. This concern was raised in the Sunset Advisory Commission's review of DFPS' foster care redesign, which noted there was “no additional investment of state funding” but still “the expectation that the quality of care provided to foster children will improve.” John Specia, commissioner of DFPS, has said a second pilot will continue, but expansion is on hold as the agency studies what went wrong. Clearly, the redesign should be on hold until lawmakers address the funding concerns. The stakes are high. In fiscal 2013, seven young Texans died despite being in foster care. It's also telling that the typical CPS worker juggled 32 ongoing cases in 2013, per state figures. The best practice is 17 children per worker, according to the Child Welfare League of America. A redesign of the foster system could, ultimately, lead to a stronger safety net. But a redesign doesn't matter if funding for child welfare is inadequate. Source: <http://www.mysanantonio.com/opinion/editorials/article/Failure-in-foster-care-redesign-5681984.php>

GCPD: 2 arrested for abusing foster kids Small Text Medium Text Large Text Print Email GCPD speaks about arrested foster couple GARDEN CITY, Kan. - Garden City police officers say they started looking into a couple suspected of foster abuse after concern from the Kansas Department for Children and Families. More from KWCH.com Twins top Royals Water main break floods West street Saturday Royals hold off Twins, increase division lead Man shot by Newton Police officer dies Supreme Court upholds conviction in baby's death Capt. Randy Ralston said by the time the investigation wrapped up, the alleged victims no longer lived in the home. “No serious injuries as far as needing medical treatment immediately, because of the time frame from 2008 to now obviously a lot of the injuries have healed and were unreported.” The abuse is said to have occurred over six-year period, from 2008 to 2014, to seven children. The couple faces multiple child abuse charges. They're scheduled to appear in court later this week. ----- Two people have been arrested, accused of child abuse, with the crimes dating back six years ago, according to Garden City police. Police said the child abuse case against foster children began in April. The investigation revealed two women had allegedly abused and mistreated several children who were in foster care in the 1300 block of East Fair. Eight victims, between the ages of 1 to 15 years old, told police the abuse reportedly began in 2008. Glenda Griffin, 40, and Stacy Griffin, 47, were arrested last week. Glenda faces 9 counts of child abuse and 1 count of child endangerment. Stacy was booked on two counts of child abuse. The case will be turned over to the Finney County attorney's office for formal charges. No other details are being released at this time. Source: <http://www.kwch.com/news/local-news/gcpd-2-arrested-for-abusing-foster-kids/27418508>

KSN investigates safeguards to keep foster children safe By Brittany Glas Published: August 12, 2014, 10:31 pm Updated: August 12, 2014, 11:03 pm 5 162 Related Coverage Garden City police arrest two for abuse against foster children GARDEN CITY, Kansas — After the Garden City Police Department arrested two people on suspicion of abuse against foster children, KSN is investigating what safeguards Kansas has put in place to keep foster children safe. The Kansas Department for Children and Families says Glenda Griffin, 40, and Stacy Griffin, 47, like all foster parents in the state, underwent background checks when they became licensed foster parents. KSN wanted to know what the exact procedures are to keep foster children safe. We sat down with representatives of Saint Francis Community Services Tuesday to learn more about the safeguards. In Kansas, two programs are designed to protect foster children: the foster care home system and reintegration services. Per Kansas Department of Health and Environment regulation, both require monthly home visits. “All of our foster care homes are assigned a foster care worker and those staff are responsible to go at least monthly out to the home and visit with the foster parents, as well as with the children, to see how they're adjusting in the home,” said Patrice Claassen, the director of foster care homes for Saint Francis Community Services. At that time, Claassen says, a visual inspection of the home environment is also conducted to ensure the site still meets regulations. These visits usually take about an hour, but could last longer. “Also regularly with visits between the parents and the biological children, or between the children and the family, the biological family,” said Rachel Marsh, an attorney for Saint Francis Community Services. “You'll see bruising, you'll see marks, you might see if the clothes aren't being changed, if they're coming to school dirty; all of those [can be] signs of abuse or neglect. They're something that can be observed by a social worker who's licensed to notice those things,” explained Marsh. Reintegration services may also include requiring a social worker to transport foster children to and from medical appointments and/or therapy appointments, as needed. Foster care workers are required to complete activity logs and summaries of those monthly reports, indicating what they have seen and how the child is adjusting to life in the foster home. In order to remain foster parents in Kansas, foster parents' license must be renewed each year, complete with a thorough site inspection. “Sometimes there are blatant signs that you can tell, and sometimes there are no signs at all until a child may disclose to another party of incidents that have occurred,” said Claassen. “What we know about children who have been abused or neglected is that they may have been sort of trained to be quiet about that, or they've learned not to talk,” said Marsh. “You do have a higher risk population when you're talking about foster children, which is why it is necessary and helpful in the vast majority of situations that the providers in the system are having their eyes and ears on the child as often as we can,” she continued. Regardless of the checks and balances put into place, experts tell KSN you cannot prevent everything. “All of the regulations that we have in place probably wouldn't prevent bad choices from being made,” said Claassen. Source: <http://ksn.com/2014/08/12/ksn-investigates-safeguards-to-keep-foster-children-safe/>

Violence by Rikers Guards Grew Under Bloomberg By MICHAEL SCHWIRTZ and MICHAEL WINER AUG. 13, 2014 Inside Photo Guards' violence toward young inmates of New York City jails on Rikers Island was the focus of a scathing federal report last week. Credit Richard Perry/The New York Times The portrait that emerged from the report on Rikers Island by the United States attorney's office in Manhattan last week was of a place with almost medieval levels of violence, meted out with startling ferocity by guards and their superiors. The two-and-a-half-year investigation, which focused on the abuse of teenage inmates by correction staff, was exhaustive in cataloging the brutality. But a critical question that went unaddressed is how conditions were allowed to get to this point. Rikers has been a place of violent excess for decades. And the growing ranks of inmates with mental illnesses, reaching nearly 40 percent of the jail population today, have added to the challenges for correction officials. But conditions worsened substantially under the administration of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, which reduced jail staff and failed to curb escalating violence by guards, according to former correction officials, inmates' advocates and others

intimately familiar with the jail. “There was very little interest in expending political capital and financial capital on the jails,” said Martin F. Horn, who was correction commissioner during Mr. Bloomberg’s first two terms. Photo Michael R. Bloomberg, mayor for 12 years, presided in a period when violence by guards at Rikers rose sharply. Credit Ozier Muhammad/The New York Times As mayor, Mr. Bloomberg earned a reputation for being a consummate manager who leveraged his private sector experience to tackle municipal problems. But he never made Rikers a high priority, at a time when conditions were drastically deteriorating, according to people familiar with its problems. During Mr. Bloomberg’s last term, use of force by officers on inmates jumped by 90 percent, according to Correction Department data. Inmates’ advocates and public officials charged with overseeing the jails said they pleaded for the administration to address the issue. “We met with the Department of Correction and the Bloomberg administration about the prevalence of violence directed by correctional staff towards prisoners, and they didn’t respond,” said Dr. Robert Cohen, a member of the New York City Board of Correction, a watchdog agency. Early on, the Bloomberg administration cut more than 3,000 correctional positions. While some of the cuts were attributable to the declining inmate population and the closing of facilities, Mr. Horn said the reductions eventually went too far. When even more were proposed in 2008, he sent a letter to the city’s budget office, warning that further reductions would be “impossible without compromising the safety of everybody in the jail.” For the remaining officers, mandatory overtime became the norm. Exhausted guards were increasingly prone to lashing out at inmates, officers and oversight officials said. More recently, during Mr. Bloomberg’s third term, the Correction Department greatly reduced the number of officers responsible for escorting mentally ill inmates to therapy, meaning that many were locked in solitary confinement 23 hours a day and rarely got out for services. Resentment and anger among inmates built, according to a senior health department official, leading to more attacks on guards by inmates. A mental health task force, created by the Bloomberg administration in 2011, produced few results and lacked participation from key city officials, including Raymond W. Kelly, who was the police commissioner. Stu Loeser, a former press secretary who is again a spokesman for Mr. Bloomberg, challenged claims that as mayor he was indifferent to conditions at Rikers, noting that at City Hall the mayor sat a few feet from Linda I. Gibbs, the deputy mayor who oversaw the Correction Department, and conferred with her “throughout the day, almost every day.” Violence at Rikers Island 250 Use-of-force incidents Rate per 1,000 inmates 200 150 100 50 0 ’90 ’13 Source: Department of Correction The current crisis at Rikers stems in part from aggressive efforts to end the chaos and bloodshed that plagued its jails in the 1980s and 1990s. At the time, the average daily population was around 20,000, almost twice its current level. Gangs like the Netas and the Latin Kings battled one another as well as the guards. The chief problem then was inmate violence. Slashings and stabbings were routine. And a thriving trade in drugs and weapons went virtually unchecked by a demoralized staff. Today, violence is once again surging, but now it is the guards who are perceived to be at the heart of the problem. Bernard B. Kerik, who helped oversee Rikers from 1995 to 2000, first as the top deputy at the Correction Department and then as commissioner, is credited with bringing inmate violence under control. A beefed-up SWAT team was equipped with clubs, pepper spray and electrified stun shields. A data system similar to the Police Department’s Compstat was created to identify the jails’ trouble spots. In 1999, there were fewer than 100 stabbings by inmates, compared with 1,100 five years earlier. But even as conditions improved, advocates warned that allowing guards to rely so heavily on force could get out of hand. “Whenever you impose a system of restraint on this scale, it can easily be abused,” Jonathan S. Chasan, a lawyer for the Legal Aid Society, said in a 1999 interview with The New York Times. The frequency of officers’ using force on inmates remained steady during Mr. Kerik’s tenure under Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and dipped during Mr. Bloomberg’s first term, reaching its lowest point in 2004, according to department data. But then it spiked. Photo Martin F. Horn, former correction commissioner, saw a reluctance to expend political or financial capital on the jails. Credit Andrea Mohin/The New York Times In 2004, the department documented 961 altercations with inmates involving force. In 2013, with the ranks of inmates with mental illnesses on the upswing, there were 3,285. In the first six months of 2014, use of force was up by a third. Mr. Horn, the former commissioner, left shortly after the 2008 beating death of an 18-year-old inmate named Christopher Robinson. Mr. Robinson was killed by a gang of teenage inmates who prosecutors said were enlisted by officers to brutalize other inmates. New York eventually paid $2 million to Mr. Robinson’s mother, and two officers went to prison. Mr. Horn blamed City Hall for being ignorant of the complexities of Rikers. Mary Lynne Werlwas, a Legal Aid lawyer, agreed. “Bloomberg did nothing to restrain his out-of-control work force at Rikers,” she said. Conditions worsened under Dora B. Schiri, who became correction commissioner in 2009 and was widely criticized by uniformed workers for what they perceived as ineffectual leadership. Though Ms. Schiri promised changes, her reform efforts often fell short. She had talked of reducing solitary confinement, but it expanded during her tenure. A multimillion-dollar centralized intake facility intended to streamline the processing of incoming prisoners was deemed a failure and closed after four months. Photo Dora B. Schiri, correction commissioner for more than four years, talked of reducing solitary confinement, but it expanded. Credit Michael Appleton for The New York Times A former senior department official who worked with Ms. Schiri and declined to speak for attribution so as to avoid retaliation from former colleagues described her as extremely intelligent, but unable to put her vision into effect. She appointed chiefs who failed to develop a systematic plan for addressing a longstanding culture of violence, and she rarely toured the jails, preferring to meet off-site with senior staff at department headquarters. She almost never addressed the uniformed staff at roll call, one of the few places where commissioners can communicate directly with officers, the official said. In an email sent by her spokesman, Ms. Schiri, who is now commissioner of the Connecticut Department of Emergency Services and Public Protection, declined to address the rise in violence, but said that while she oversaw Rikers, “there was an appreciable increase in referrals of staff to the inspector general for criminal prosecution for misconduct including excessive force.” Recent Comments robertgeary9 2 days ago Between 1984-1996, a fellow INS officer just happened to be from NYC. Although I had served as an infantry squad leader and high school... FreeOregon 2 days ago Violence is a sign the staff and guards are suffering mental illness. See Philip Zimbardo's classic 1971 Stanford Prison Experiment. Why do... Sancho 2 days ago It's becoming increasingly clear that Rikers Island, a vast torture chamber which is in fact the world's largest penal colony, should have... See All Comments During her five-year tenure, violence by officers increased almost every year, and the number of serious injuries suffered by inmates in altercations with guards jumped. Howard Wolfson, a former deputy mayor who is now a spokesman for Mr. Bloomberg, defended Ms. Schiri, saying she had made important changes, such as increasing the number of supervisors and bolstering mental health care, taking advantage of additional money allocated by the mayor’s office. As a result, Mr. Wolfson said, “we experienced the start to improvements in 2013.” Under Ms. Schiri, former and current correction officials said, the influence of the president of the correction officers’ union, Norman Seabrook, grew. Daniel Selling, a former director of mental health care at Rikers, called Mr. Seabrook “much more powerful than any commissioner.” The union’s clout has made it more difficult to punish uniformed officers. The federal report identified a lack of accountability for guards as a root cause of the violence. Photo Norman Seabrook is the powerful president of the city correction officers’ union. Credit Hiroko Masuike/The New York Times Over the previous two administrations, there have been incremental efforts to improve conditions, some of which succeeded for a time. But these have been achieved mostly through court intervention. The department has been the subject of six class-action lawsuits in the past three decades, alleging egregious violence by officers. Five of the suits ended with judges issuing court orders aimed at reducing brutality, though mostly for individual facilities like the solitary confinement unit. One of the more successful suits, according to Mr. Chasan, the Legal Aid lawyer, led to the stationing of federal monitors to oversee the solitary-confinement cellblocks in the late 1990s and early 2000s, including the supervision of staffing decisions. “If someone had a history of violence, they were turned away,” Mr. Chasan said. “The result was a dramatic decrease of abuse.” The most recent suit, brought by Legal Aid on behalf of 12 inmates who were seriously injured during encounters with guards, has been certified for class action and is currently the subject of settlement negotiations with the city. Since taking office, Mayor Bill de Blasio has pledged to bring Rikers under control. He appointed Joseph Ponte, who has a reputation as a reformer, as correction commissioner and allocated $26 million in the new budget for more officers and $6 million for mental health programs. Mr. de Blasio has embraced inmates’ advocates in a way that his predecessor never did. Five Mualimm-ak, the director of Incarcerated Nation, a group that helps inmates who have spent time in solitary, said he had met with Mr. de Blasio five times since the mayor took office. He said he also met with Mr. de Blasio’s staff at least twice a week. He met with Mr. Bloomberg once. Pressure from outsiders, including the news media, the city’s Department of Investigation and now federal officials, to enact changes is the strongest it has been in years. After releasing the report last week, prosecutors gave Mr. de Blasio 49 days to submit a plan to reduce brutality or face federal intervention. Advocates say they are hopeful about the possibility for change, but they question why it has taken so long. “I’m encouraged, but I think this attention and action was overdue,” said Jonathan S. Abady, a lawyer who has been pressing brutality cases for 12 years. “Unnecessary violence and excessive force have afflicted Rikers Island like a highly resistant disease for decades.” Source: http://www.nytimes.com/2014/08/14/nyregion/why-violence-toward-inmates-at-rikers-grew.html?_r=0

Hurdles remain for Snugg Harbor in permitting process Story Comments Image \(2\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte snugg harbor ra2A Snugg Harbor owner Rosalyn Ruffin, speaking at a public hearing last month, says Waco and McLennan County need a facility like the one she proposes. Staff photo— Rod Aydelotte snugg harbor ra1A Waco City Councilman Wilbert Austin, center, says he will fight Snugg Harbor's application for a city permit. Posted: Wednesday, August 13, 2014 5:01 pm Hurdles remain for Snugg Harbor in permitting process By TOMMY WITHERSPOON twitherspoon@wacotrib.com Waco Tribune-Herald A proposed 90-bed residential treatment center in East Waco, under threat of derailment by a Waco City Council member, must clear at least two more administrative hurdles as it waits for state licensing. Besides getting a license from the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, Snugg Harbor, which proposes to operate a center for boys with severe mental or emotional disorders at 1916 Seely Ave., also must win city approval at two or more public hearings and gain a city special-use permit. Snugg Harbor owner Rosalyn Ruffin, a marriage and family therapist from Katy, said last month at a state-mandated public hearing that she thinks the former nursing home is zoned properly for her proposed business and she could begin operations as soon as she obtained her state licensing. But since then, city of Waco officials have told Ruffin that Snugg Harbor will be classified as a transitional shelter II under zoning ordinances, and that it will require a special permit issued by the city council. Ruffin balked last month at the public hearing when Waco City Manager Dale Fisseler informed her that she would need a special permit from the city. But this week, she said she is committed to the project and is "thinking about applying" for the special permit. "The state is waiting to hear from me about a few matters, and I am just going to go through the application process with the state and let the city take it from there," Ruffin said. "I intend to let the procedure take its course, and I will try to get the city and the community to see what I am trying to do. There are children at risk and I am trying to help, that's all. There is a need." In a letter dated July 23, Fisseler asked Lea Long, a state licensing supervisor, to put the state's licensing decision on hold until the city completes its special permit process. Julie Moody, a spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, said Ruffin is being cooperative with state licensing officials and said the process is ongoing. But the residential child care licensing division cannot issue a permit to any operation until all credentials, qualifications and permits have been satisfied from the city where it is located, she said. Community "in need" "The community of Waco and McLennan County is in need of residential treatment centers like the one Ms. Ruffin has proposed," Moody said. "There are 552 children from McLennan County in foster care. Only 309 of those children remain in McLennan County. That means 243 children have to go outside of their own communities for the care they need. That means those children are further away from their families and schools and other support." Moody said she is unsure how many of those children need the specialized care at a facility similar to what Snugg Harbor is proposing. "But there is a great need for foster homes and for a treatment facility to care for children traumatized by the effects of abuse or neglect in McLennan County. And that need isn't going to go away anytime soon," she said. Ruffin has said she hopes to turn the 27,148-square-foot facility into a residential treatment center for boys ages 8 to 17 that would be placed there through contracts with Child Protective Services. She said the center will not accept sex offenders or those prone to violence or running away. If Ruffin applies for the city's special permit, it will go first to the Waco Planning Services Department. Two public hearings are required in the granting of a special permit. One would be before the Waco Plan Commission, which would decide whether to recommend the special permit request to Waco City Council. The second public hearing is held by the city council, which would decide if the permit should be granted. Despite overwhelming opposition at the first public hearing last month, Ruffin said she could use the other hearings to meet the public and try to "educate the citizens about any fears and concerns they may have." In a letter dated Aug. 5 to Long, the state licensing supervisor, Waco police Chief Brent Stroman said he cannot support the project at this time because of a "lack of transparency in dealing with the owner, Ms. Ruffin, and the seeming unwillingness to answer or respond to questions posed at the community meeting and in dealing with city staff." Councilman's opposition District 1 City Councilman Wilbert Austin said nothing Ruffin can say at this point will change his opposition to the proposed center. "She hasn't responded to nothing we have asked of her," Austin said of Ruffin. "That tells me she is not going to do right if she gets it. I hear from my constituents daily, and they don't want it. We just don't need that type of facility in District 1." While the center is in Waco, the students there would attend La Vega Independent School District schools. La Vega Superintendent Sharon Shields attended last month's public hearing and expressed grave concerns about the district's ability to handle such an influx of potentially troubled students. She invited Ruffin to attend a La Vega school board meeting the next week to discuss the proposal, but Ruffin did not attend. "Let's just say it would be a tremendous undertaking," Shields said of the proposed center's students attending La Vega schools. Source: http://www.wacotrib.com/news/business/hurdles-remain-for-snugg-harbor-in-permitting-process/article_f165c7e7-e3dd-55bc-a18f-9d4b75f40a2e.html

Palmetto youth worker to face judge for sexual battery Posted: Aug 13, 2014 1:04 AM PDT Updated: Aug 13, 2014 1:11 AM PDT By Melissa Beckman - bio | email Leroy Bostic. Mug shot courtesy MCSO Weblinks Palmetto youth specialist accused of sexually assaulting teens Palmetto youth specialist accused of sexually assaulting teens Updated: Tuesday, August 12 2014 10:17 PM EDT2014-08-13 02:17:14 GMTAug 12, 2014 7:17 PM PDTAug 12, 2014 7:17 PM PDT Mug shot of Leroy Bostic Jr, from a previous arrest A father is in shock after learning his son is locked up and accused of sexually assaulting two teen boys. Leroy Bostic Jr., 34, is locked up on charges of sexual battery, lewd and lascivious molestation and introduction of harmful material to a minor. A father is in shock after learning his son is locked up and accused of sexually assaulting two teen boys. Leroy Bostic Jr., 34, is locked up on charges of sexual battery, lewd and lascivious molestation and introduction of harmful material to a minor. More>> PALMETTO, FL (WFLA) - A man hired to work with troubled teens is now locked up on charges of sexually battering two young inmates. Leroy Bostic, Jr., 34, is set to face a Manatee County judge Wednesday on charges of sexual battery, lewd and lascivious molestation, and introduction of harmful material to a minor. Bostic started working at the Palmetto Youth Academy for teen offenders on June 9. He was fired Monday. The Manatee County Sheriff's Office claims a 15 and 17-year-old at the facility made the allegations against Bostic. Monica Lewman-Garcia with G4S Americas, that contracted Bostic, released this statement: "The safety and security of the youth entrusted to our care is our top priority. As a condition of employment, all G4S Youth Services employees are expected to comply with local, state or federal laws or ordinances as well as G4S codes of conduct. Mr. Bostic was hired as a Youth Specialist at G4S Youth Services' Palmetto Youth Academy on June 9, 2014. Mr. Bostic was hired based on his qualifications and experience and on his ability to pass complete background and drug screening checks, in accordance with the law and requirements of the Florida Department of Juvenile Justice. Mr. Bostic was terminated on August 11, 2014." Source: <http://www.wfla.com/story/26266585/youth-worker-to-face-judge-for-sexual-battery>

AUSTRALIA--> State Government changes to foster care to promote more prompt permanent home placements for children by: Dana McCauley From: Port Phillip Leader August 15, 2014 12:00AM Changes to legislation will mean foster children can be placed into permanent care more promptly. Source: News Corp Australia WITH the State Government set to overhaul the foster care system to give children more stability, a Port Phillip woman has called for more families to open their homes. Mary* said she was shocked by the system's callousness when two "beautiful children" she looked after for a week, as a family friend, were separated and sent to live in outer Melbourne suburbs. "It took all my might not to fall apart in front of the eldest, who was visibly distressed," Mary said. "These children are lovely, wanting to learn, wanting to help cook and most of all, to be read a story at night ... They will be moving every few days to a week, living out of bags, for the next few months." As a parent of small children, Mary said she was not in a position to become a foster carer right now, but she urged Port Phillip residents who could to open their homes. "I'm sure there are people out there who might have left it too late to have their own kids, or theirs have grown up and left, who could potentially fill their house with more laughter and nurture," Mary said. And she hoped new legislation, introduced in Parliament this month, would make the task more appealing. IS THE FOSTER CARE SYSTEM WORKING? HAVE YOUR SAY BELOW. FOR MORE LOCAL NEWS IN YOUR NEWS FEED LIKE US AT THE PORT PHILLIP LEADER FACEBOOK PAGE. The laws, if passed, will allow children to be placed with a permanent foster family after 12 months in the system. This will allow birth parents a chance to get their act together, while sparing children the current trauma of a protracted wait for permanent care. A 2012 parliamentary inquiry established that many foster children were being shuffled between family members, foster carers and residential care placements for an average of five years before being settled permanently into a home. Community Services Minister Mary Wooldridge said too many children were deprived of certainty about their future. "Continuity of care, certainty about the future and the ability to form positive attachments with trusted adults are important for the healthy development of all children, and especially for vulnerable children," Ms Wooldridge said. Under the new laws it will also be easier for carers to allow siblings to have contact with each other. Foster Care Association of Victoria Executive Officer Katie Hooper said 1000 extra carers were needed across Victoria to ensure children could be placed appropriately. "That way even if we have to place siblings separately, they could be close enough to each other to have regular play dates," Ms Hooper said. * Not her real name, which has been changed to protect the children's identities. Click here to find out more on foster care in Victoria. FOSTER CARE REFORM FOSTER children eligible to be placed with a permanent foster family after a year, giving them more stability RECOGNISING the child's need for ongoing contact with their birth family, where appropriate INDIVIDUAL case plans to be developed earlier BIRTH parents who are making progress can get one 12-month extension Source:

<http://www.heraldsun.com.au/leader/central/state-government-changes-to-foster-care-to-promote-more-prompt-permanent-home-placements-for-children/story-fngnvlpt-1227024653740?nk=95b02fbafd88cbbf22be417b058891e>

Drugs and foster kids: too much, too young? By LEAH TODD Casper Star-Tribune August 14, 2014 2014-08-14T16:28:45Z By LEAH TODD Carissa O'Malley and her brother Cameron, 15, take instructions from dance teacher Andrew Nelson at the Heart of Dance Productions dance studio on July 19, 2014, in Casper, Wyo. Carissa O'Malley, 22, legally adopted Cameron to get him out of foster care. After the adoption, she took him off of his prescribed psychotropic medications and increased scheduled activities such as cycling and dance lessons. CASPER, Wyo. — For Cameron O'Malley, weekends at his sister's house meant tucking a pair of jeans, a few shirts and his toothbrush into his backpack. The 15-year-old's foster mom would zip a weekend's worth of pills the size of jelly beans into plastic baggies. Cameron and his sister Carissa, 22, knew the routine: Take daily with food. Carissa didn't like the medications, prescribed for a list of conditions she was not convinced Cameron even had: Prozac for his hyperactive attention disorder. Fluoxetine for depression. Strattera for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Wellbutrin for depression. They made Cameron's brain feel weird, like he was thinking in fog. But if the adoption was to go through, he and his sister had to follow the rules. Nearly one in three foster children in Wyoming is prescribed psychotropic medications like the ones Cameron took. That's four times the rate found in other low-income children not living in foster care, where the frequency is one in 12. Critics say psychotropic drugs — any medication that affects a patient's mood, thought or behavior — lack evidence as to their effectiveness and safety in children. Many of the medications have not been studied in children, and doctors say they can't assume what works on adults will be safe for children, whose central nervous systems are still developing. Carissa believes state and medical officers rushed to use prescriptions to control Cameron, who acted out as a child. "They want to put a diagnosis on everything," she said. --- Cameron was a "lost" child in the middle of a large family, one social worker wrote in a 2011 report. His parents focused on the youngest of the family's 12 children, giving little to no attention to the older kids, the worker wrote. In reports filed with the Wyoming Department of Family Services between 2004 and 2011, doctors attributed Cameron's conditions and behaviors to abuse and neglect he endured as a young boy. His mother was charged with neglect, and Cameron left his biological family for good about 2010. By 2011, he'd been diagnosed with ADHD, mild long-term depression, post-traumatic stress disorder and anxiety. He had lived with foster families on five separate occasions. Carissa didn't like the medications, and she wasn't alone. "I never wanted to take meds," Cameron said. He felt lethargic while on them. He was tired, not himself. Carissa recalls how out-of-touch he was, slow to engage in conversation. But to not take the medications? He thought he'd get in trouble. Reports on file with DFS suggest that while in foster care, Cameron attended classes regularly. His teachers described him as respectful but easily distracted. He required multiple prompts to stay on task. He had an active imagination and was easily absorbed into his drawings. Cameron received a few disciplinary procedures in school but was never suspended. His grades varied tremendously — from A's to F's. "Cameron needs to work on listening to directions," one teacher wrote on a report card. "When Cameron tries hard in class, he does excellent work." Cameron told doctors repeatedly he was sad about leaving his brothers and sisters, who were also living in foster care. A doctor once noted that Fluoxetine, prescribed for Cameron's depression, seemed to calm Cameron down. Beyond that, doctors never noted whether the medications were working or not. --- Nearly 30 percent of the state's 3,500 foster children were prescribed at least one psychotropic drug last year, according to data from the state Department of Health. In comparison, only about 8 percent of the 57,000 Wyoming children whose low family income qualified them for Medicaid took psychotropics. Though no definitive national average has been tabulated, several regional studies suggest that Wyoming is among the most frequent prescribers of the medications. A 2011 report using Medicaid claims from five states found that 21 to 39 percent of children in foster care received a prescription for psychotropic medication in 2008, compared with 5 to 10 percent of children not in foster care. In 2004, a report showed that psychotropics are prescribed to foster care kids at rates three to 11 times greater than the rate for Medicaid-insured youngsters. Though the rate of psychotropic medication use among foster children has decreased in Wyoming since 2010, the number of children taking the drugs has increased slightly. Some experts attribute the higher rate of psychotropic drug use to the fact that foster care children are more likely to have suffered emotional or mental trauma than their peers, said James Bush, the state medical officer for Wyoming Medicaid. Foster children have often been abused or neglected seriously enough to draw the attention of state authorities. On top of that, many have been taken from their homes. Some experts say children in foster care are up to twice as likely to be diagnosed with a mental health disorder than other children. But that doesn't account for the fact that a child in state custody in Wyoming is four times as likely as his peers to be taking the mind-altering medications. --- Carissa's fondest memory of her brother is at a doctor's office when Cameron was about 3 years old and his younger sibling needed blood drawn. A nurse prepared a needle. Cameron watched. As the nurse brought the needle toward their infant brother, Cameron broke out into tears. "No!" Carissa remembered him saying. "Don't poke my brother!" Carissa, the oldest child, lost touch with most of her siblings around the time she aged out of the foster care system. She moved into her own place about five years ago and works now as a welder and hairdresser in Casper. She said she wanted to adopt as many of her 11 brothers and sisters as she could. Carissa believed that DFS allowed her to communicate with Cameron because no foster parent was pushing to adopt him, unlike the case with her other siblings. Weekend visits started in late winter 2012. By last summer, Cameron moved in full time with Carissa. And when he did, Carissa said no more medications. Cameron's prescriptions always made his sister uneasy. Carissa rented books from the library on mental health and ADHD. She researched the side effects of many psychotropic medications — suicidal thoughts, severe liver damage, heart-related problems. She signed up Cameron for a local mountain biking club. She volunteered him to shovel stalls and groom horses at a nearby therapy farm, and when his grades started slipping, she wrote him a daily schedule. "He needed an activity, not medication," Carissa said. She signed the last page of adoption paperwork on Valentine's Day. --- Bush, the state medical officer for Medicaid, wanted to know how doctors were prescribing the drugs to Wyoming children. To find out, the Department of Health examined Medicaid claims from 2009 to 2013 and counted how many listed a psychotropic prescription. Bush looked for children who fell into one of several categories and found that between 1 and 2 percent of foster care children in Wyoming were prescribed more than 150 percent of the dosage recommended by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration during those years. Between five and 11 children under the age of 5 were prescribed psychotropic medications, and one child in all but one of his study years took more than five of those medications at the same time. Little is known about the drugs' long-term and short-term risks, especially when they're used in combinations. That prompted the Health Department to add an extra layer of accountability to outlier cases, where a child's dosage is high, his age is young or the number of prescribed medications is greater than five. Now, every case that exceeds one of Bush's parameters — too many, too much or too young — will receive a second look from medical faculty at the University of Washington, which partners with the University of Wyoming as the state's medical school. It's not that in all cases doctors made mistakes in prescribing these children's medications. Sometimes, exceeding the recommended dose is advisable, Bush said. But those cases should be rare, he explained. "And you should document closely and you should make sure you've explored other options," Bush said. Psychotropic drugs themselves are not problematic, he said. Being underdiagnosed is a problem, too. With kids, it's often a very tentative diagnosis. "How can you diagnose a 2-year-old as psychotic?" Bush said. "The children's brain is still evolving, it's still maturing." Marty Nelson, clinical services administrator for the Wyoming Department of Family Services, said he advocates as few medications as possible. "It's better for kids to not be on medications or to be on as few medications as they need," Nelson said. But there are cases when medications like psychotropics are necessary, Nelson said. For foster care children, that's a decision reached by a group of physicians, case workers and, ideally, the child's biological parents. "While we want the therapy to deal with the depression and anxiety, that's going to take a little time," Nelson said. "So for the six months before the talk therapy, the children are better off not being depressed or anxious." As talk therapy increases, ideally the medications should decrease. "What I'm hoping for them as adults is saying, 'Get your talk therapy and you won't have to get your medications,'" Nelson said. "But I don't know how that tracks out over time." --- Cameron doesn't fall asleep in class anymore. He said he has matured since moving in with Carissa a year ago. He's not angry. No tantrums, no behavioral problems, Carissa said. Why? Cameron threw a thumb in Carissa's direction. "It's because of her," he said. Before moving in with his sister, Cameron had never played an organized sport, never been part of a team. So far, mountain biking makes the short list of Cameron's favorite things. It's just fun, he said. "You feel free because you get to go as fast as you want," he said. His favorite thing, though, is hanging out with his sister. He walks their dogs, Capone, Delilah and Envy, outside every day. Carissa knows she has three years left with Cameron before he is 18. She hopes that by then he will have found a passion in his life. She recently sent him on a three-week adventure trip in California so he'd have some positive childhood memories. They plan to spend time at a brain center in Colorado to explore alternative treatment options. Cameron still deals with attention issues, and because of developmental delays, he needs help focusing, Carissa said. But the two of them steer clear of the medications that doctors once proposed to address those problems. "By taking a pill, it doesn't just automatically make things better," Carissa said. "That is not the answer, especially not by itself." A few days ago, a postcard came in the mail. On the front was a picture of teenagers jumping into the air, flanked by ice-capped mountains. On the back, she read Cameron's scratchy handwriting. "I have been having (sic) the best time of my life so far," he wrote. "One amazing thing I found was a dead baby octopus. I picked it up and chased people with it. I found a whole bunch of sea shells. Well I better get going. Sincerely, Cameron O'Malley." Information from: Casper (Wyo.) Star-Tribune, <http://www.trib.com> Read more here: <http://www.newsobserver.com/2014/08/14/4071333/drugs-and-foster-kids-too-much.html?#storylink=cpy>

Changing 'normal' for foster care's used and abused children By Penny Young Nance, Vicky Hartzler Published August 15, 2014. They normalize the experience of being used for financial gain? Isn't that slavery? Who would say such a thing? Is that an actual quote? These are the words of Ms. Withelma "T" Ortiz Walker Pettigrew as she testified before Congress in 2013 on how to prevent sex trafficking of youth in foster care. Now only in college, T spent the first 18 years of her life in the foster care system, and for seven of those years she "was a child being sexually trafficked on the streets, internet, strip clubs, massage parlors and even in the back of express papers." Words like those above should never have to come out of a child's mouth. Never. There is no doubt that the system and its consequences are problems that need fixing. If you ask T, she would be the first to tell you that sex trafficking is a heinous crime – one committed by heinous people – and that the foster care system in this country does not do enough to care for the youth residing in it. In 2010, Los Angeles officials reported that 59 percent of juveniles arrested for prostitution were in the foster care system. More recently, in 2013, 60 percent of child sex trafficking victims recovered in an FBI nationwide raid from over 70 cities were children involved with the foster care system or group homes at some point. In 2012, Connecticut reported 88 child victims of sex trafficking. Eighty-six of them were involved with the child welfare system, and most reported abuse while in foster care. With all the various numbers from all the various studies, there is still only one number that we need to worry about: one. One victim of this atrocious crime is too many. While the connection of foster care to child sex trafficking victims is not definite, the current foster care system does not do enough to protect those living in it or help them prepare for normalcy once they leave it. Some child welfare policies may have unintentional negative effects on the well-being of the children living under them. Rules and policies that inhibit youth from participating in sports, obtaining a driver's license, or even getting a part-time job may contribute to a young person's isolation and inability to gain "meaningful relationships or attachments," no matter how well-intentioned those policies may be. There is no doubt that the system and its consequences are problems that need fixing. Over the past year, the U.S. House of Representatives has been working to craft bills that aim to prevent child sex trafficking and improve the lives of foster care youth. On Wednesday, July 23, those bills were passed with sweeping bipartisan support. Each of the eight bills is an important, effective piece of legislation that goes far to change the atmosphere that has been plaguing the foster care system, equip the federal government to combat the horrific crimes of human and sex trafficking, and/or provide for the proper treatment of victims of sex trafficking. The bottom line is that human trafficking is nothing more than modern-day slavery. That it has come to be associated with foster care youth is deplorable. This practice is the buying and selling of human beings with the average age of entry into servitude between 11 and 14. Through exploitation, it reduces an individual's value to that of an object. Sickeningly, because of a foster child's vulnerable nature, they are heavily sought after by the industry and are targeted by criminals who run sex trafficking rings. We must work to help those most at risk of falling victim to this evil crime. The scourge of human trafficking runs deep and is difficult to root out. By no means does that mean it cannot be addressed or solved. Through legislation passed in Congress and support and outreach from groups like Concerned Women for America, we can bring this heinous crime to light, uproot traffickers, and make sure that children like T find normalcy in loving, caring homes. Penny Young Nance is president and CEO of Concerned Women for America. Congresswoman Vicky Hartzler, Representative for Missouri's 4th Congressional District. Source: <http://www.foxnews.com/opinion/2014/08/15/changing-normal-for-foster-cares-used-and-abused-children/#>

Florida's Foster Care Program Becomes Model for Nation Wide Pilot Program: Updated: Saturday, August 16 2014, 09:11 PM CDT The Florida Department of Children and Families' electronic system used for placing foster children across state lines is being used as the model in a national pilot project. Six states will participate in the pilot program over the next several months. Florida has used the system since 2008. Officials say it significantly decreases the amount of time it takes to place a Florida foster child into a home with relatives or adoptive parents in another state. The state processes approximately three thousand requests for children to move in and out of state each year. The database also saves nearly 100 thousand dollars annually in postage and paper. Florida's foster care program becomes model for nation wide pilot program. Source: <http://www.veartv.com/news/features/top-stories/stories/floridas-foster-care-program-becomes-model-nation-wide-pilot-program-48284.shtml>

Butler County children services workers strike Sheila McLaughlin, smclaughlin@enquirer.com 8 a.m. EDT August 18, 2014 Buy Photo Picketers protest Monday after efforts to avoid a Butler County Children Services caseworker strike broke down. (Photo: The Enquirer/Amanda Rossmann) Buy Photo 75 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE About 30 protesters are picketing Monday morning after a last ditch effort to avoid a strike Butler County Children Services broke down. Union representatives and county officials met with a federal mediator for three hours on Sunday but County Administrator Charles Young said neither side would budge on wages. "The gap between what we can offer in compensation from the county and what the union was looking for just proved too large to overcome today," Young said. "The county must move to performance pay. The old model of compensation that the union continued to seek in annual step increases and annual percentage increases nearly bankrupted the county during the crisis following the 2008 recession and we simply can't go back there." Union President Becky Palmer said county officials "are using the children's wellbeing as a pawn in a fight by those who are more concerned with political ideology." She emailed this statement to The Enquirer: "We believe that the entire negotiation process demonstrated a blatant lack of good faith bargaining on behalf of the employer and Commissioners. There have been comments made by the employer that they were hoping to avoid a strike. It appears to the union that these comments were disingenuous. The union believes that the Commissioners' attempt to force a strike in this manner creates a tremendous amount of liability regarding the children this agency is charged to protect. We are devastated that the agency directors, Jerome Kearns and Bill Morrison, have chosen to stay silent and further the agenda of the County Commissioners. We believe they are using the children's wellbeing as a pawn in a fight by those who are more concerned with political ideology. We will continue to be available to negotiate a fair contract on behalf of our members." The county had offered annual lump sums payments of between $500 and $550 for the next three years with the hope of eventually moving toward performance pay. The union had accepted a fact finder's recommendation in June that workers receive automatic step increases and cost of living raises of 1.5 percent for the first year, with 1.75 percent and 2 percent each of the following two years. Felicia Bernardini, the fact finder, reported that pay ranges for Butler County caseworkers were "substantially below average" compared with children services workforces in counties with similar demographics. Butler County caseworkers have gone without raises for three years. The union had threatened to strike Monday over wages after more than a year of unsuccessful negotiations. County officials made a final offer Wednesday, which included the lump sum payments. The union rejected it. County officials hired 16 full-time workers last week to fill existing vacancies, and Young said seven of them will start work Monday, while the county attempts to get help from 25 full time temporary workers from agencies that provide services to children. The strike will leave the agency with about 48 staffers to investigate new complaints of abuse and neglect and provide services for children already in county care, Young said. The $23 million agency – supported in part by a local tax levy – oversees about 365 foster children. Young said the lump sum payment system with a goal toward performance pay already has been accepted by 10 unions representing county employees. "The fact finder's recommendation would have resulted in an annual increase in compensation costs of over $700,000 and total costs during the contract of $1.3 million. We cannot afford those kinds of increases," Young said. He said it would take a better offer from the union for the county to move to end the strike. Financial projections presented to county commissioners last week indicate children services already won't be able to make payroll in early 2016 and expects to have a $2.2 shortfall in 2014, mostly because of the increased costs in placing foster children. Union representatives have said the county was at fault for the financial gap because it was over spending on programs to place children in foster care rather than investing in less expensive programs to keep children with their families. Agency officials have been working for about a year on restructuring to reduce foster care numbers. Source: <http://www.cincinnati.com/story/news/local/2014/08/17/butler-county-children-services-strike/14197997/>

Teen Alleges Abuse At Police/BDF Camp posted (August 18, 2014) Email Print Last week we told you about the camp that police are offering to Belize City families who have troubled teenagers in their house. It's a boot camp run by the BDF at Camp Belizario in Cayo. It can last for four to six weeks depending on whether the students are enrolled in school. But, one Belize City family today reached out to us to say one week was too long. Their 16 year old son has come back with a story of wretched and systematic abuse that's, honestly, hard to believe until you hear them out. We spoke to mother, son, and a neighbor today to hear their allegation of constant beatings at the hand of police... Voice of: Georgia, Mother "I called him and he said to please come for me because they beat me. I ask what happen and so he was crying over the phone and he said to please come for me because they beat me, they got me in mud and water and if they move the GSU beats them." Voice of: 16 year old "They have a long chain and they whop me in the back with it and they stomp me in my belly when I am explaining to them. They don't want to hear anything - they still beat us. I was on the ground because I was in bad pain and as I turn over one of the soldier kick me in the belly and whop me on my foot several times. One of them stomp me in my jaw and burst up my jaw. They had to give me an injection in my jaw to make it numb. Everybody who was in my barrack house got beaten. A soldier took a chain and whop a young man about 4 times at the back of his head and his head was bursts up. He must have gotten stitches in his head. Everybody got beaten - everybody saw their blood." "Every 5am in the morning, once you can't do 80 pushups they beat you." Jules Vasquez "Are you sure you are not misunderstand what is going on? Maybe they are trying to say that maybe they are giving you all a boot camp to try to strengthen you up or to teach you some discipline." Voice of: 16 year old "We were at the station at Raccoon Street, Mr. Hamilton told us that it is a camp where we will learn a trade and that we would be better off in life and when we went there nothing like that happen. All what we did as we got drilled so they beat us. I went there thinking that I would learn a trade from them but I never knew that this is what would happen to me." Voice of: Georgia, Mother "My son call me crying and I talk to the man who my son borrowed the phone from and he said the only way my son could go down was if the parents go for them." Junior Willoughby, father "They said they were going at the BDF camp to learn something for the future or to defend the country if that be the case, but we are not sending them for them to get beaten up - that is stupidity." Voice of: Georgia, Mother "Any parents who are listening to this right now, don't make any police come and say that it's just a little training or a camp or a little swimming - don't believe them because all they do is beat them." While it is administered by the BDF, Police are in charge of the camp and we spoke to Senior Superintendent Edward Broaster who told us he is certain that the young man's allegations are completely false. He says no GSU personnel have been assigned to the camp, and added that his officers just went there today and he can confirm that there are no abuses. We will keep looking into the story. Source: <http://www.7newsbelize.com/sstory.php?id=29755>

Back To Schools White People Cannot See As the season for new school openings rolls out, there are reasons for a new consciousness-raising about those schools – the kind of consciousness-raising that can be brought about when there's a shock to the system like Ferguson, Missouri. Of the many heartfelt, well thought-out, and clearly written responses to the ongoing travesty happening in Ferguson, one of the most insightful was "Dear White People: The Race You Can't See Is Your Own" that appeared on Blue Nation Review. Written by author and communications consultant Anat Shenker-Orsorio, the post delved into the issue of race and perceptions of race – the starting point for understanding not only what caused events in Ferguson but also what conditions the different ways people have responded to those events. From a scientific perspective, Shenker-Orsorio explained, people "formulate judgments by race. Not only does race constrain our ability to recall and differentiate among faces and constrain empathy for physical pain, it structures our desired responses to public policies." These are just the facts of the matter – with one notable exception, as Shenker-Orsorio noted: "whites don't see race ... when they're looking at other whites." To illustrate this phenomenon, Shenker-Orsorio recalled a focus group she had run in which "we showed different groups an all white image and asked them to discuss it. None of the white folks remarked upon the lack of people of color, but for the African American, Latino and Asian-Pacific Island groups, it was the first thing they said." Shenker-Orsorio also pointed out how the "oxymoronic" term "majority-minority" is another "clear indicator" of how white people continue to perceive themselves as a "majority" even when statistically they no longer are, in many respects. Public education, in particular, is now one of those "majority-minority" arenas. As numerous recent reports have recently conveyed, this new school year will be the first in which white students are no longer a majority in public schools. Of course, this seismic demographic change didn't happen overnight. For years, schools have been becoming more and more populated by higher percentages of non-white children, with many districts having been mostly non-white. But given this understanding of the way white privilege distorts perceptions of reality, it's not a leap of logic to suggest that political and policy leaders have a distorted understanding of the conditions in schools populated by children who look nothing like them. And it's not unfair in the least to wonder if these leaders are incapable of really seeing the schools they purport to render policy direction for. Failure To See The Funding Crisis Take the issue of school finance. While some would have us believe that the "recovery" has healed school finances, the reality for most schools is very different. The financial recovery that has occurred in some public and private sectors simply has not happened in K-12 education. Despite some improvements in overall state tax revenues (which provide about 45 percent of K-12 education funding), according to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities: New state budgets for school year 2013-2014 provided less per-pupil funding for kindergarten through 12th grade than they did six years ago – often far less. 34 states provided less per-student funding for K-12 education in 2013-14 than they did in fiscal year 2008. Schools in around a third of states entered the school year with less state funding than they had the previous year. At least 35 states provided less funding per student for the 2013-14 school year than they did before the recession hit. Adding to the financial plight, counties and municipalities that fund schools at the local level collected 2.1 percent less in property tax revenue in the 12-month period ending in March 2013 than in the previous year. There are no indications 2014 is any better. Federal funds for K-12 education have continued to decline too according to a report in FiveThirtyEight. Federal per-student spending fell more than 20 percent from 2010 to 2012 and continued to fall in 2013-2014. Title I was down 12 percent. Spending on disabled education went down 11 percent. No increases are coming from the feds for the 2015 school year. The impact of funding cuts were significant as school administrators had to dig deeper into budgets and cut instructional-related expenses, including teaching positions, instructional materials, and teacher professional development: A survey of school superintendents found that federal funding cuts implemented in 2014 resulted in reduced expenditures on professional development (59 percent), eliminated personnel (53 percent), increased class size (48 percent), and deferred technology purchases (46 percent). Another survey of school district leaders found only 11 percent disagreed/strongly disagreed that budget shortfalls would be "a challenge for my school district." Only 16 percent of district officials surveyed about their instructional budgets in 2013 said they expected their financial situations to improve in 2014. It's not likely 2015 will bring on a recovery. The "Recovery" Isn't Happening Where funding has increased, it has generally not increased enough to make up for cuts in past years. A recent report on school funding levels in New York by the Alliance for Quality Education found a $5.9 billion shortfall on what is owed to schools in that state. The report quoted a school official who said, "We've cut writing classes, science, athletics, arts, everywhere." Another official said, "We have eliminated our entire business program, cut our JV sports teams, reduced our academic intervention programs, as well as decimating our administrative leadership team." Cuts to school funding in Pennsylvania have been so severe staffing levels have hit a ten-year low. Democratic state leaders accuse Governor Corbett of cutting a billion dollars from the state education budget, with one public school advocate quoted as saying, "We've lost over 400 teachers ... 20 percent of the teaching compliment of the Allentown School District." In the current North Carolina state budget, education gets $500 million less than the 2008 inflation-adjusted budget, even though school populations have grown dramatically. Progressive group NC Policy Watch has tracked, county by county, the effects of budget cuts on classrooms, documenting slashed classroom teacher and teacher assistant positions, increased class sizes, and cuts to instructional supplies and textbooks. One little-noticed provision in the budget ensures schools no longer get more money when their enrollments increase. In Florida, Governor Scott declared this year's budget includes record levels of education funding, but his proposal left the state's per pupil spending about $200 lower than in the 2007-08 school year, while district needs have only risen. In Michigan, after a previous state budgets cut education spending over $1 billion, modest increases in the 2015 version barely recovered a quarter of what had been cut. This means a school district, such as Ann Arbor for example, will have funding levels of $6,445,869 (based on 2010-11 levels) compared to $7,727,263 from the previous year. But the cumulative results are still a near $30 million shortfall over a four year period, and that's just for one district. In Kansas, largest-ever cuts in state school funding history took funding back to 1992 levels, when adjusted for inflation. The cuts resulted in the elimination of teaching aids, school specialists, and classroom teachers. Textbook purchases were put on hold, schools resorted to radical measures including removing half the light bulbs, dropping tutoring activities, and cancelling summer school. In Nevada, state funding for schools is so inadequate, communities are resorting to unheard of measures, including, as NPR recently reported, a district raising funds through bars and brothels. Nationally, a recent survey of teachers found one in three using textbooks 10 years old or older. Thirty percent of teachers report not having enough textbooks to assign homework. Another national survey found budget cuts have resulted in only a third of schools now having school librarians. Funding Disparities Follow Race/Income The relationship of education cuts to race becomes even more obvious when recognizing how resources, as dear as they are, are being distributed. The budget cuts themselves have been distributed in inequitable fashion, with schools serving the poorest – and by proxy nonwhite – children bearing the brunt of the disinvestment. As an annually recurring report on school funding fairness found in its 2014 edition, "The Great Recession triggered dramatic reductions in state and local revenue from property, sales and income taxes. To prevent layoffs and cuts to education programs, the federal government provided substantial stimulus funds on a temporary basis. When the stimulus ended, however, states faced a crucial test: either restore revenue or allow cuts to education funding and programs. This report shows many of the states failed this test, sacrificing fair school funding after the foreseeable loss of federal stimulus." That report found "school funding in most states remains remarkably unfair ... The majority of states have flat or regressive funding distribution patterns that ignore the need for additional funding in high poverty settings. Even among 'progressive' states, only eight provide more than a 10 percent boost to high poverty districts. In the five most regressive states (North Dakota, Vermont, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Nevada), the poorest districts receive at least 20 percent less funding than higher wealth districts." Even within school districts there are huge disparities in spending depending on the wealth – and by proxy, the race – of the local community. As a recent article on The Huffington Post contended, “Students who live in wealthy communities have huge advantages that rig the system in their favor.” The article pointed to an analysis showing that “wealthier districts” use private local education foundations to ensure their students “attend summer schools that provide educational enrichment, help students make up courses they missed or failed during the academic year, and look good on students’ transcripts when they apply to college.” For students who aren’t in these affluent districts – no such luck. “Just within Los Angeles County,” the author noted, “there are huge differences between wealthy communities like La Cañada Flintridge (with a median household income of $154,947 and 2.1 percent poverty rate) and San Marino ($139,122 — 4.6 percent) and poorer cities like Pomona ($48,864 — 20.4 percent) and Huntington Park ($36,620 — 27.7 percent) in their ability to raise additional money for their local schools.” Regarding federal funds, as the above referenced report from FiveThirtyEight noted, “most federal education aid targets two groups, low-income and special education students, who are overrepresented in urban school districts. As a result, urban districts have been hit harder by the recent cuts.” Funding Fairness Matters, A Lot These funding disparities have consequences. As the author of the above linked Huffington Post article noted, “Affluent students in well-off school districts have higher rates of high school graduation, college attendance, and entry to the more selective colleges. This has little to do with intelligence or ability.” According to a report at Vox, researchers found, “Spending more money on educating children in poor districts can dramatically change the trajectory of those children’s lives.” The analysis found, “A 20 percent increase in per-pupil spending could make a big difference for students from poor families ... The additional spending had virtually closed the high school graduation gap between poor students and their wealthier peers. High school graduation rates increased 23 percentage points for poor students, and those students attended school or college for another year on average.” Another recent study, according to an article at Education Week, found, “How much state governments spend per pupil and how they spend it does in fact have a significant correlation with achievement, particularly for the low-income students.” The researches found, “A $1,000-per-pupil funding increase is correlated with a .42-point increase in National Assessment of Education Progress scores for low-income 4th graders ... an increase of 20 percentage points in the state share of spending correlated with a 1-point improvement in the 8th grade math scores of low-income students.” Funding fairness mattered even more as, “An improvement in the equity of funding across a state can improve academic performance without any additional spending overall. And the effect is significant: For example, a 20-point improvement in the equity ratio, holding all other factors constant, is correlated with nearly 2 point improvement in 4th grade NAEP reading scores for low-income students, equal to a roughly 1 percent gain.” The School Reality White People Cannot See Many who slough off the importance of equitable funding for schools instead point to other issues they deem to be more apt to even the playing field – such as promulgating new standards or changing teacher personnel policies. According to this view, if we were just to “raise the bar” on what we expect all students to achieve or “hold teachers more accountable” for the results students get on standardized tests, then these issues of funding simply wouldn’t matter. These arguments are distractions. As the new president of the National Education Association Lily Eskelsen Garcia recently stated, “That is their narrative. Because if you can talk about something like that you don’t have to talk about why do these kids have an Olympic swimming pool and these kids have a leaky roof. How come these kids get French classes and AP classes – and they should – and these kids don’t even get recess because they spend it drilling and practicing for the standardized test. Equity costs money, so you want to change the subject as fast as you can.” Back to Shenker-Osorio, she concluded her reflection on the Ferguson tragedy with a call “to face some hard truths. The race we don’t see is our own, and it keeps us from understanding our privilege and thus others’ lived experience of baked-in, perpetual, harms.” One of those “baked-in, perpetual harms” is that too many of the schools in this country are like the school Michael Brown attended in Ferguson. As a recent post on the liberal blog site Daily Kos noted, Brown’s schools “was created by merging two of the poorest, most heavily minority districts around St. Louis – Normandy and Wellston. The poverty rate for families sending their kids to Normandy Schools was 92 percent. At Wellston School District, the poverty rate was 98 percent. Every single student in the Wellston district was African American.” The fact that Brown graduated from this school and was about to attend college may have been a “miracle,” as the post claimed. But the reality of his dead body bleeding on the street should spur a call to action very different from the actions education policy leaders want us to undertake. The fact these folks can’t see that is what really is the whole problem. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/back-to-schools-white-people-cannot-see/>

“This is a test”: Educating to End the School-to-Grave-Pipeline in Ferguson and Beyond By I AM AN EDUCATOR on August 22, 2014 “We were at graduation, me and him, and we were talking. He said he wasn’t going to end up like some people on the streets. He was going to get an education.” –Hershel Johnson, a friend Michael Brown’s since middle school. In the wake of the police murder of the unarmed 18-year-old African American high school graduate Michael Brown, and the ensuing uprising of the people of Ferguson, the Ferguson-Florissant School District announced classes would not resume for the school year on Aug. 14 as planned, and as of today, school is still not in session. The unrest between police and protesters prompted Gov. Jay Nixon (D) to declare a state of emergency in Ferguson and then impose a curfew. Comedian John Oliver described Gov. Nixon’s curfew announcement as “patronizing,” and charged him with speaking in the tone of a “pissed-off vice principal” attempting to further restrict the freedom of the people of Ferguson. Oliver’s school analogy may have been prompted by Nixon’s statement that, “...to protect the people and property of Ferguson today, I signed an order declaring a state of emergency and ordering implementation of a curfew in the impacted area of Ferguson... But if we’re going to achieve justice, we must first have and maintain peace. This is a test.” For all of his authoritarian scolding, Gov. Nixon is correct about one thing: This is a test. But it isn’t one that will be scored accurately by a police force or a political class that sees itself as above the law. Ferguson, like cities around the nation, has plenty of problems of race, class, and education to choose from. The schools in Ferguson—like to many districts across the nation—are still separate and unequal. 77.1 percent of the students in the Ferguson-Florissant School District are black, and some 68 percent of white students who live in the district attend schools outside of the district. Black students make up a disproportionate 87.1 percent of students without disabilities who receive an out-of-school suspensions, according to 2011-12 data from the U.S. Department of Education’s Civil Rights Data Collection. And the black youth continue to be targets when they leave the schoolhouse and enter the streets. Last year, black residents accounted for 86 percent of the vehicle stops made by Ferguson police and nearly 93 percent of the arrests made from those stops, according to the state attorney general. FBI statistics show that 85 percent of the people arrested by Ferguson police are black, and that 92% of people arrested specifically for disorderly conduct are black. The city of Ferguson is 67.4 percent black and 28.7 percent white, yet five of the six city councilmembers are white and six of seven school board members are white. The first African American Superintendent of the Ferguson-Florissant School District, Dr. McCoy, was forced out of his position in March by the then all white school board. Normandy High School, the alma mater of Mike Brown, has a poverty rate of 92 percent. As Daily Kos related, “The grinding poverty in Mike’s world only allowed Normandy High School to acquire two graduation gowns to be shared by the entire class. The students passed a gown from one to the other. Each put the gown on, in turn, and sat before the camera to have their graduation photographs taken. Until it was Mike’s turn.” “Career and college ready” are the new buzzwords in the education reform world and every teacher certainly hopes their students achieve these personal successes. Yet to limit education to only these puny goals is to extinguish the true power of education. Education must also be in service of transforming our very troubled society. Mike Brown was to have started attending Vatterott College on August 11, two days after he was killed, exposing the fact that the work of educators to help students achieve a diploma means little if our society succumbs to lawless police who gun down our unarmed children in the street. Many black youth have had their caps and gowns snatched from them and replaced with orange jumpsuits, as students are funneled into what is commonly called the “school-to-prison-pipeline”—a series of interlocking policies such as zero tolerance discipline and high suspension rates, overbearing police presence in schools, and high-stakes exit exams required for graduation. But increasingly it appears police are intent on constructing what I guess we now must term the “school-to-grave-pipeline”—a series of interlocking policies such as giving police weapons designed for war zones, the disproportionate policing of areas frequented by black youth, and incentivizing police to shoot black people by not arresting them and giving them paid leave when they do. The school-to-grave-pipeline is not only a problem in Ferguson. Nationally, a study revealed that a black person is killed by police somewhere in the United States every 36 hours. When there are witnesses, or when onlookers are able to capture these murders on a cellphone camera, we get to hear about their case; people such as Eric Garner, Ramarley Graham, Sean Bell, Oscar Grant, and many others. Yet too often, black people are shot down by police and discarded with little attention. If education is not dedicated to empowering our youth to solve the problems they face in their communities, in our nation, and in our world, then it isn’t really an education at all—it is an indoctrination designed to reproduce oppression. As Richard Shaull explains in the forward to Paulo Freire’s masterwork, Pedagogy of the Oppressed, “Education either functions as an instrument which is used to facilitate integration of the younger generation into the logic of the present system and bring about conformity or it becomes the practice of freedom, the means by which men and women deal critically and creatively with reality and discover how to participate in the transformation of their world.” The way you know that those who control the education system—the many corporate style education reformers who push high-stakes testing and standardized curriculum—are not actually interested in nurturing black youth, closing the achievement gap, or supporting education that undermines oppression, is that you won't hear any of them publicly defending Michael Brown or calling for the arrest of his murderer, Darren Wilson. (Or maybe Bill Gates, Arne Duncan, and Michelle Rhee carpooled and got lost on their way to the rally in Ferguson?). On the issues that most deeply affect the lives of African Americans—mass incarceration, police terror, unemployment, housing discrimination—these education reformers and officials have nothing to say, content to prattle on with the exhortations about “accountability,” “career ready,” “21st century education,” and other hollow pronouncements devoid of the social supports that would make them a reality. Thankfully, educators in Ferguson and around the nation are rising to the challenge of redefining the purpose of education with the intent of building a more just society in wake of the killing of Michael Brown. On August 17, Dr. Marcia Chatelain tweeted a call for resources for parents and educators to talk to young people heading back to school with the hashtag #FergusonSyllabus. People from around the nation began collecting and retweeting articles, books, videos, and photos to aid educators in lesson ideas that engage students in a critical dialogue about the meaning of Michael Brown's death and the mass uprising it has inspired. Jackie Gerstein, Ed.D (@JackieGerstein) tweeting with #FergusonSyllabus, wrote: And Caryn Riswold (@feminismxianity) tweeted: Some of the best lessons ideas shared on #FergusonSyllabus include a link to the video, “Race the House We Live in,” about redlining and housing discrimination, a Rethinking Schools lesson on teaching about The Murder of Sean Bell (a young African American killed by New York City Police), Christopher Emdin's essay, “5 Ways to Teach About Michael Brown and Ferguson in the New School Year,” and Teaching for Change's, “Teaching About Ferguson.” Any teacher of American history or civics would do well to discuss Amy Goodman's essay, “The ghost of Dred Scott haunts the streets of Ferguson,” outlining the case of the slave (buried just down the street from where Mike Brown was killed) who took his case for freedom to the Supreme Court, which subsequently ruled that African Americans had, “no rights which the white man was bound to respect.” National Public Radio ran a story on August 19th, “Ferguson Teachers Use Day off As Opportunity for Civics Lesson” where they reported, “So this morning, instead of being in the classroom, 150 area teachers took part in some unusual professional development: picking up broken glass, water bottles and tear gas canisters from the street. “It says ‘Defense Technology’ on it,” says social studies teacher Arthur Vambakertes, showing off a busted canister from his trash bag.” When the schools reopen in Ferguson, teachers would do well to close up the jingoistic textbooks, discard the bubble tests, and ask students what they think about the fact that our nation spends more on “defense technology,” militarized policing and mass incarceration than on education. It might not be on the new Common Core exams, but the killing of Michael Brown is a test for our nation's schools nonetheless. As I prepare to head back to the classroom, I pledge to Michael Brown and his family that I will do my best to foster a classroom that allows for the emotional intensity and critical dialogue vital to achieving a world that puts institutional racism in its final resting place and gives our black children a bright future. — Jesse Hagopian is the editor and contributing author to the forthcoming book (available for pre-ordering), More Than a Score: The New Uprising Against High-Stakes Testing. Jesse teaches history and is the co-advisor for the Black Student Union at Garfield High School, the site of the historic boycott of the MAP standardized test. Jesse is an associate editor for Rethinking Schools magazine, a founding member of Social Equality Educators (SEE), and recipient of the 2013 “Secondary School Teacher of Year” award from the Academy of Education Arts and Sciences. Follow Jesse on his blog at www.iamaneducator.com or on Twitter: @jessedhagopian Source: http://iamaneducator.com/2014/08/22/this-is-a-test-educating-to-end-the-school-to-grave-pipeline-in-ferguson-and-beyond/comment-page-1/#comment-3987

August 18, 2014 Nonprofit Shares Data About Troubled Teens With Researchers By Nicole Wallace Researchers are gaining access to enormous amounts of data about teenagers who are struggling with depression, bullying, and other problems, thanks to Crisis Text Line, which has been operating for a year. The service makes it easy for teens to get crisis counseling and referrals simply by sending text messages on their cellphones. The nonprofit is making available data about roughly 60,000 counseling sessions in the hope that academics, government officials, and other charities can help even more troubled young people. “With researchers and policy makers being starved for this kind of data, suddenly they’ll be able to make more informed decisions about how do you try to help teens in crisis,” says Bob Filbin, chief data scientist at Crisis Text Line. The public dataset provides visualizations of aggregated information. Among the findings: Alaska, Kentucky, and Montana have the most requests per capita for help for suicidal thoughts. Requests for assistance related to sexual orientation are highest on Sunday and Monday. Text messages about self-harm peak between 9 p.m. and 10 p.m. The data don't contain information that could identify individuals. Researchers who apply to gain access to more in-depth data go through a formal application process, are restricted in how they can use the information, and have to follow strict guidelines to keep the data safe. Professors at the Johns Hopkins University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the University of Rochester are already working with the data, and researchers from the University of California at Berkeley, Princeton, and Stanford have started the application process. “A lot of people are interested because there just isn't data available on teens in crisis,” says Mr. Filbin. Officials at Crisis Text Line say that the value of its data will only grow as the group provides assistance to more young people. Crisis specialists with the nonprofit have more than 7,000 text-message exchanges with troubled youths each month. The organization plans to update its datasets at least weekly. Mr. Filbin thinks more nonprofits need to weigh whether they can expand the impact of their work by making their data available to others: “The idea behind the public data project is that as an organization trying to create social change in the world, this data can create more of that value if we share it with other people.” [HEAL Note: The problem here is that the kids are looking for real help and someone they can trust. When you turn that data over to others (i.e. abusive behavior modification programs) so they can market their fraudulent and abusive services to youth and families, it becomes a real crisis and a serious ethical breach and breach of trust. Making it even less likely for individuals who truly need mental health services to seek them out because of the lack of oversight and rampant fraud and abuse in the industry.] Source: http://philanthropy.com/article/Nonprofit-Shares-Data-About/148399/

Sherburne foster care provider loses license Kirsti Marohn, kmarohn@stcloudtimes.com 11:05 p.m. CDT August 17, 2014 Watchdog(Photo: Times graphic) 73 CONNECT 1 TWEETLINKEDIN COMMENTEMAILMORE ELK RIVER — A Sherburne County foster care provider's license has been revoked after she was found responsible for abusing a foster child last year. The Minnesota Department of Human Services on July 17 ordered that the license of Sheila Noelle Scharber, 48, also known as Sheila Bower, of Big Lake, be revoked. Scharber has appealed. A hearing is scheduled for later this month. According to the DHS order, Sherburne County Health & Human Services investigated a report and determined that a foster child in Scharber's care had been physically abused. Scharber admitted that as a means of discipline, she kicked the foster child, causing a red mark on his shin; plucked hair from the child's head with a pair of tweezers; and, with another person, had the child hold two heavy olive cans with arms outstretched, the order states. When the child could no longer hold the cans, Scharber suggested the child stand with bare feet on top of the cans so the edges of the cans would hurt his feet, the order states. In November, Scharber was criminally charged in Sherburne County District Court with malicious punishment of a child, a gross misdemeanor. She pleaded guilty in April to a lesser misdemeanor charge of disorderly conduct and was given a stayed sentence of 90 days in jail. According to a court statement, the child reported that his foster mother had kicked him on the leg and pulled out his hair as punishment for his mistreatment of her pets. A message left Friday on the phone number DHS listed for Scharber was not immediately returned. Jodi Heurung, Sherburne County social service supervisor, said Scharber had received a foster care provider license in August 2013. This was the first and only child placed in her home, Heurung said. The child is now in a different home. “We hate these situations,” Heurung said. “They're just ... really unfortunate.” Revoking a foster care license is rare, Heurung said. It's the first time in her more than six years with Sherburne County that a foster care provider license was revoked. The county followed normal procedure during the licensing process, Heurung said. The county provided the family a therapeutic social worker for additional support due to the child's needs, Heurung said. “In this case, we felt that we had done what we needed to do, what we could have done to make it the most appropriate, best placement for the child and for the provider,” she said. Heurung said the situation speaks to the need for more foster care providers. “We have very unique situations, very unique kids with significant behaviors, and so we're always trying to find the best match,” she said. “The more providers we have to choose from to make that match is just really critical.” Source: http://www.sctimes.com/story/news/local/2014/08/18/sherburne-foster-care-provider-loses-license/14216663/

Lawsuit: Pa. boy, 7, placed in foster home with abuser Comment Print Email Published: Tue, August 19, 2014 @ 3:09 p.m. SCRANTON, Pa. (AP) — A federal lawsuit says a child welfare agency in northeastern Pennsylvania knowingly placed a 7-year-old Scranton boy in foster care with a couple whose 18-year-old adopted son had a history of sexual abuse. The Times-Tribune of Scranton reports the boy was sexually abused by the adopted son five months after he came to live with the couple in Wilkes-Barre. The teenager was arrested and is serving a state prison sentence. The lawsuit says a caseworker with Lackawanna County's child welfare agency knew the teenager had a history of abusing other children but placed the 7-year-old in the home anyway. The lawsuit was filed Monday by the boy and his mother. - See more at: http://www.vindy.com/news/2014/aug/19/lawsuit-pa-boy-7-placed-foster-home-abuser/?nw#sthash.PzT3E6SJ.dpuF

Teens Cited after Incidents at Treatment Center Permalink Posted Tuesday, August 19th 2014 @ 4pm Nine juveniles face charges after a pair of incidents at a residential treatment center for teenage girls. Fayette County Sheriff Vernon Stanforth said the first incident at the Ranch of Opportunity was reported Friday afternoon after a 17-year-old client got into an altercation with some of her peers and caused minor injury to some of the staff members who intervened. The Sheriff said one staff member was treated and released at a hospital, and the teen was cited with four counts of delinquency by assault. On Friday night, deputies were called back to the Ranch of Opportunity on a report of a large physical altercation involving 8 juveniles, ranging from ages 13 to 17. Authorities were able to peacefully return them to their living quarters. The clients involved were cited for delinquency by disorderly conduct. Sheriff Stanforth says all of the teens will appear before Fayette County Probate Juvenile Court Judge David Bender to answer to the complaints filed against them. Read more: <http://www.buckeyecountry105.com/articles/local-news-stories-226193/teens-cited-after-incidents-at-treatment-12685755#ixzz3BGgO3dGz>

Wichita group home closed due to numerous violations By: KAKE News Email Updated: Wed 5:08 PM, Aug 20, 2014 By: KAKE News WICHITA, Kan. — A Wichita group home has been shut down after a state agency found numerous violations. The Kansas Department for Aging and Disabilities Services has revoked the license of the Atishwin Institute, a group home and treatment provider for individuals with substance use disorders. On Tuesday, August 19, KDADS agency representatives conducted a site visit and survey of Atishwin. They observed numerous violations of state regulations, some major, that could "impact safety and quality-of-care provided to individuals receiving treatment there." The violations included improper storage of drugs, treatment being provided by unlicensed staff, unsafe conditions such as disconnected fire alarms, broken mirrors and glass, insect and rodent infestations and other unsanitary conditions. Inspectors also determined employee tuberculosis tests had not been completed, no biohazard waste disposal was available and the facility had no way to maintain controlled medications. They also found the licensee had failed to comply with the Alcohol or Other Drug Addiction Treatment act and said there was no evidence of a current fire inspection. The facility, located at 937 S. Bluffview, was required to close immediately. KDADS said the licensee may request a hearing regarding the closure within 15 days of the notice. Failure to do so would result in a waiver of their right to a hearing and the closure order will become final, revoking the licensee's order to operate a treatment facility. The facility has 35 beds. KDADS staff is assisting about 25 residents find alternate accommodations. Source: <http://www.kake.com/home/headlines/Wichita-group-home-closed-due-to-numerous-violations-272021221.html>

Md. agency failed to monitor placement of foster children, audit says Evidence of abuse or neglect found in more than a dozen cases Comments 5 Department of Human Resources Secretary Ted Dallas (left) and health secretary Dr. Joshua Sharfstein at a legislative briefing. (Doug Donovan / Baltimore Sun / July 24, 2014) Related Sun Investigates: LifeLine, Inc. Maryland agencies need to improve oversight of group homes, officials say Families of LifeLine residents plan to sue state Maryland group home where boy died had staffing shortage, nurse says By Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun 11:09 p.m. EDT, August 19, 2014 Some foster children were placed in the care of relatives with a history of alleged abuse or neglect because Maryland's social services agency did not properly monitor local agencies, according to a new audit. State auditors found that 16 children, ranging in age from 2 months to nearly 5 years old, were put in the care of relatives despite "credible evidence of abuse or neglect" by them before or during the placements. The Office of Legislative Audits, which released the report this week, reviewed records from July 2010 to January 2013. "We need to do better. The bottom line is, these placements need to be safe," said Melissa Rock, child welfare director for Advocates for Children and Youth, a nonprofit advocacy group. "When a child is abused or neglected in a DHR placement — be it a group home, a foster home, a kinship care home — we need accountability and there needs to be more public awareness to help hold everyone accountable." This is not the first time auditors have cited the foster care agency, overseen by the state Department of Human Resources, for failing to properly monitor such placements. A 2011 audit found the same problem. Department officials responded then by saying they would implement a quarterly monitoring process to make sure local agencies were not placing children in danger. But that process wasn't performed during this audit period, the report said. The audit comes after a recent investigation by The Baltimore Sun revealed that state officials were unaware of reports of abuse and neglect made to Anne Arundel County police on behalf of foster children living at a Laurel-area group home operated by LifeLine Inc. The state moved the children after it determined that a child there was receiving inadequate health care. A 10-year-old, Damaud Martin, died a day before the last of the children was removed. The state is investigating his death and whether inadequate care contributed to it, but officials have cautioned against drawing conclusions prematurely. The state continued to contract with LifeLine for the care of children even after it cited the company for inadequate care in three adult deaths in 2010 and 2011, and it shut down the adult facility. State and local government agencies jointly spend about $200 million to provide "out-of-home" placements for nearly 5,619 abused or neglected foster children either in group homes, foster care or with relatives, called "kinship" care. Placements with relatives with a history of alleged abuse or neglect are rare. State law prohibits placements with such relatives except when state officials provide evidence that there is no continuing risk. According to the recent audit of the social services agency, one relative who was known to have a history of physical abuse was allowed to care for a foster child for 41/2 months. In response to each audit, state officials said that no children had been harmed and that their placements were safe. The issue, they say, is that the Department of Human Resources did not maintain proper documents proving that children were not in danger. "In these very rare cases, the child is represented by an independent attorney, and each case is reviewed, approved and monitored by a judge," department spokesman Brian Schleter said Tuesday in an email. "To provide some context, a common example is a grandmother who has a relatively minor finding of neglect ... who the court and other parties involved believe is the most appropriate placement for her grandchild," he added. One example, he suggested, would be a decades-old finding of lack of supervision for a child. Regarding the kinship care placements cited by the audit, state officials said they knew of reports of abuse and neglect with the relatives but followed proper procedure. Maryland's secretary of human resources, Ted Dallas, disagreed with the audit in an official written response, stating that local agencies and judges relied on documented evidence that the placements were safe. "Safety assessments completed for each child indicated that there were no safety or risk issues relating to the placement with the kinship provider," the response stated. "At no time were any of the children harmed or placed at risk of harm by their placement with their relative." The department added that local agencies reviewed the histories of relatives and provided information to judges before children were placed with them. But Thomas Barnickel III, the state's legislative auditor, said Dallas' department never handed over the documentation to auditors despite being given "several months" to do so. "Maybe all these placements were appropriate, but they never provided the documentation," Barnickel said. Shelley Tinney, executive director for the Maryland Association of Resources for Families and Children, said the state was exhibiting a "double standard" by allowing placements with relatives with a history of abuse allegations while the group homes she represents would be "absolutely excluded" from caring for children if any of its employees had certain criminal histories. "It's different when it's family somehow," Tinney said. "The philosophy is, if the child is not able to return to their biological parents, the next best option is kin — regardless of how far removed they may be or what the nature of the relationship may have been prior to the need for a placement." She said private group homes could never get paid without documentation, yet the state is allowed to make questionable placements without having to provide evidence that no risk exists. "The department says it's just a documentation issue," she said. "In our world, if it's not documented, it doesn't happen." The audit also faulted the department for not seeking more reimbursement from the federal government for providing care to disabled foster children. Those children are eligible for both federal foster care money as well as supplemental funds from Social Security. The state says it prefers reimbursement under Social Security because the children are eligible for the funds after they become adults, unlike the federal foster care money. If children lose their Social Security eligibility because their care was reimbursed from both sources, state officials say, it would be to their "detriment to exit foster care and wait for reinstatement of SSI benefits." Read more: http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/bs-md-audit-20140819_0.4132122.story#ixzz3BGs85hld

Founder of boot camp for at-risk Montgomery youth accused of sexual abuse Print By Erin Edgemon | eedgemon@al.com AL.com Email the author | Follow on Twitter on August 21, 2014 at 10:42 AM, updated August 21, 2014 at 10:46 AM Glenn Veasy (MCSO) MONTGOMERY, Alabama -- The founder of a boot camp for at-risk youth in Montgomery is accused of sexually abusing one of the teenagers he mentored. Glenn Veasy, 43, was arrested by Montgomery police on Aug. 20 and charged with two counts of first-degree sexual abuse, Montgomery police say. He is being held in the Montgomery County Detention Facility on $30,000 bond. Veasy is the founder of Team Achievers Discipline Academy, which provides military-style training to at-risk youth from kindergarten to 12th grade, according to an interview Veasy gave to WSFA about the program. Veasy is accused of inappropriately touching one of the teenagers during boot camps at his residence from June 2013 through August 2014. Montgomery Department of Public Safety Spokesperson Martha Earnhardt said the investigation is ongoing. Source: http://www.al.com/news/montgomery/index.ssf/2014/08/founder_of_boot_camp_for_at-ri.html

DJJ closes Milton juvenile treatment center Kevin Robinson, Staff Writer 11:14 a.m. CDT August 21, 2014 The Florida Department of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) canceled the contract for a 40-bed residential youth commitment program in Milton because concerns over the safety and security of juveniles committed there(Photo: Special to the News Journal) 12 CONNECT 3 TWEETLINKEDINCOMMENTEMAILMORE The Florida Department of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) canceled the contract for a 40-bed residential youth commitment program in Milton because concerns over the safety and security of juveniles committed there, a news release from the DJJ said. The residential program, Santa Rosa Substance Abuse Treatment Center, is a low-to-moderate risk program operated by Youth Services International. The staff of the facility "failed to correct deficiencies and sustain those corrective actions in areas involving safety and security, effective behavioral interventions, and appropriate reporting of incidents for this program," the release said. Because of those failures, contract with Youth Services International was terminated effective as of midnight this morning. "DJJ takes very seriously the safety and welfare of the youth currently in our care and does not tolerate actions which could place the youth for whom we are responsible in harm's way, including those under the supervision of our contract providers," Interim DJJ Secretary Christina K. Daly said in a written statement. According to a report compiled in May by the Bureau of Quality Improvement, the facility was found to be in compliance with 135 of 144 state standards and in limited compliance with six of the standards. They failed three of the standards: Provision of an abuse-free environment, protective action response and timely completion of Residential Positive Achievement Change Tool assessments. The report said there were three substantiated reports of excessive force, nine complaints against staff under review by the DJJ and two complaints against staff under review by the Inspector General's Office. Reviews of personnel files indicated two of the employees who used excessive force were terminated, and one was provided with additional training. The 40 boys at the facility have been moved temporarily to four North Florida detention facilities. DJJ has prioritized admission of these youth to existing residential commitment programs that have vacancies and are designed to meet their substance abuse treatment needs. Youth Services International will be precluded from participating in the Intent to Negotiate process for any new contract with the agency for the next 12 months. Source: <http://www.pnj.com/story/news/2014/08/21/djj-closes-milton-juvenile-treatment-center/14387715/>

Social workers can now check if foster parents have criminal pasts Sen. Bob Huff Rich Pedroncelli / AP Senate Minority Leader Bob Huff, R-Diamond Bar, left, meets with Senate President Pro Tem Darrell Steinberg, D-Sacramento, during the Senate session earlier this month. Huff was the main sponsor of a foster care bill signed Thursday by Gov. Jerry Brown. Senate Minority Leader Bob Huff, R-Diamond Bar, left, meets with Senate President Pro Tem Darrell Steinberg, D-Sacramento, during the Senate session earlier this month. Huff was the main sponsor of a foster care bill signed Thursday by Gov. Jerry Brown. (Rich Pedroncelli / AP) By Garrett Therolf contact the reporter Laws and LegislationAccounting and AuditingHolly J. MitchellCriminal Minds: Suspect Behavior \(tv program\)Bob Huff Gov. Brown signs SB 1136 in response to @latimes reports that some foster parents had criminal backgrounds Calif. law gives county social workers access to criminal histories of foster parents and contract employees In response to a series of scandals involving mistreatment of children under state supervision, Gov. Jerry Brown on Thursday signed into law new rules giving county social workers access to the criminal histories of foster parents and employees at foster care contractors before abused and neglected children are placed in their care. The legislation, SB 1136, comes in response to Times reports documenting instances when children were harmed and taxpayer money was allegedly misspent by people with criminal backgrounds who had been granted special waivers from the state to receive foster children. Related story: Reform the private foster care system, right now The Times editorial board State and county governments can begin by scrutinizing the waiver process that allows convicted criminals to operate agencies or even become foster parents. State and county governments can begin by scrutinizing the waiver process that allows convicted criminals to operate agencies or even become foster parents. \(The Times editorial board \) In the past, county social workers, who have the responsibility to place at-risk children in safe homes, were unable to view criminal records of foster parents or workers at agencies that help find and train foster families. The law takes effect on Jan. 1. Related Local Private foster care system, intended to save children, endangers some See all related 8 Over the last year, The Times has reported on a convicted forger who auditors said mishandled tens of thousands of taxpayer dollars as a chief executive of a private, nonprofit foster care agency; a convicted thief who later was convicted of murdering a foster child; and a woman convicted of fraud who was later convicted of criminal charges for causing debilitating burns to a girl in her care. Each had received a special waiver from the California Department of Social Services to enter the foster care system. The state has granted more than 5,000 waivers currently in effect, 1,400 of them in Los Angeles County. "We should allow state and local agencies to work together and share information to protect innocent children from additional harm or danger. Our legislation will allow this," said Sen. Bob Huff (R-Diamond Bar), who co-sponsored the law with Sen. Holly Mitchell (D-Los Angeles). The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors sought the legislation earlier this year. We should allow state and local agencies to work together and share information to protect innocent children.... Our legislation will allow this.- Sen. Bob Huff, co-sponsor "It is possible for government to better protect children while cutting red tape. Today our colleagues have agreed that this is the right approach," Mitchell said. The Times also has reported that county workers had no reliable means to ensure that social workers at nonprofit, contracted agencies that recruit and supervise foster parents were complying with rules limiting them to oversight of 15 foster children at a time. The paper found that numerous private social workers violated the cap while supervising children who were injured by their foster parents, according to records filed with the state. eComments Got something to say? Start the conversation and be the first to comment. Add a comment 0 Some social workers got around the limit by working for multiple foster care agencies. L.A. county officials have sought to crack down on the practice by requiring foster care agencies to submit information on their social workers' outside employment. Additionally, state and county workers are imposing new requirements on nonprofit foster care organizations to obtain advance permission before entering into business and real estate transactions with their employees. Related story: Private foster care troubles in California lead to new scrutiny Garrett Therolf County auditors looking into one of Los Angeles' biggest foster care agencies in 2003 uncovered \$445,000 in ineligible or unsupported spending. County auditors looking into one of Los Angeles' biggest foster care agencies in 2003 uncovered \$445,000 in ineligible or unsupported spending. \(Garrett Therolf \) State records show that between 2007 and 2011 one foster care agency executive, Sukhwinder Singh, charged the taxpayer-subsidized organization she managed almost $1.8 million in rent for properties she owned. Auditors found that some lease payments for the properties were significantly higher than allowed market rates and totaled thousands of dollars in impermissible payments. Other efforts to improve the state's contracted-out foster care system have stalled. Some county officials and advocacy groups have called on the state to change the way it funds nonprofit foster care groups. Critics say the current system encourages the agencies to cut corners and retain children in foster care, and should be replaced with a so-called "performance based contracting" program. Under that system, agencies are rewarded when they serve children well and penalized when children in their care are abused or fail to make adequate progress developmentally. Brown's social services director, Will Lightbourne, said such a major realignment of financial incentives would be too difficult. Private agencies now care for 15,000 children statewide. They were paid hundreds of millions of dollars more than the government-run system they replaced and were meant to provide children with more intensive services and supervision. But a Times analysis found children in homes overseen by private, nonprofit agencies were about a third more likely to be the victims of serious physical, emotional or sexual abuse than those in state-supervised foster family homes. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/lanow/la-me-la-foster-parents-criminal-pasts-20140821-story.html>

Barbara Brooks: Former foster parent pleads guilty to raping children, gets 7 years behind bars WCPO Staff 9:53 AM, Aug 22, 2014 10:16 AM, Aug 22, 2014 Barbara Brooks Copyright 2013 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Copyright 2013 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Barbara Brooks CINCINNATI -- A Colerain Township woman accused of sexually abusing children she babysat pleaded guilty to rape charges Friday in a plea deal. Barbara Brooks, a 63-year-old former Hamilton County foster parent, pleaded not guilty in June 2012 to charges of sexually assaulting four different children she babysat between January 2000 and Feb. 27, 2007. Officials said the rapes occurred in her homes in Mt. Healthy and Springfield Township. She has been held at the Hamilton County Justice Center since her arrest. Brooks was charged with 15 counts of rape and three counts of gross sexual imposition. She faced the possibility of spending the rest of her life in prison before accepting the plea deal. She pleaded guilty to four counts of rape and was sentenced to seven years in prison. She has served two of those years since her arrest in 2012. She will be behind bars for about five more years. She is now classified as a tier 3 sex offender, meaning she will have to register her address every 90 days as a sex offender. Brooks was a foster parent from 1996 until 2008, according to Hamilton County Job and Family Services spokesperson Brian Gregg. Police arrested Brooks on June 7, 2012 after a relative of the alleged victims, who are now 18 and 23-years-old, reported to police that the babysitter had abused them between 2000 and 2003. In 2008, a child sex abuse complaint was made against Brooks, said Gregg. Cincinnati police investigated, but didn't file charges. Brooks resigned from the foster care program and Job and Family Services officials permanently terminated their relationship with her. "These cases are always difficult to comprehend," Deters said in a previous news release. "We are glad that the victims had the courage to come forward so that we can make sure that Brooks is never in a position to care for a child again." Source: <http://www.wcpo.com/news/crime/barbara-brooks-former-foster-parent-pleads-guilty-to-raping-children-gets-7-years-behind-bars>

Pueblo Foster Parents Accused Of Child Abuse By: KKTU Updated: Fri 11:40 AM, Aug 22, 2014 By: KKTU Home / Headlines List / Article From left: Paul Finn, Sara Finn (Credit: Pueblo Police Dept.) A 2-year-old child is in critical condition after falling down the stairs--and police believe her foster parents are responsible. Sarah Finn, 23, has been charged with child abuse resulting in serious bodily injury, and 36-year-old Paul Finn has been charged with withholding proper medical care. Both have been booked into the Pueblo County Detention Center. According to Pueblo police, fire and rescue personnel were called to a home on the 300 block of E. Orman Ave., where a little girl was unconscious after falling down the stairs. Police say she was suffering from head trauma, had facial and eye injuries, and bruising on her body. She was airlifted to a hospital in Colorado Springs, where she remains in critical condition. Police say they spoke to the Finns at the hospital, who said they were in the process of adopting the toddler through a foster program. During the course of an interview with the couple, police say their story changed several times. The couple was arrested after a search warrant was executed in their home. The investigation is still ongoing. Source: <http://www.kktv.com/home/headlines/Foster-Parents-Accused-Of-Child-Abuse-272309011.html>

Rosemont, a 112-year-old program in SE Portland for troubled girls, closes its doors citing funding shortfall Rosemont Treatment Center, a residential school and behavioral therapy program for troubled girls, closed on August 22, 2014. Morrison Child & Family Services will continue to use the facility in Southeast Portland for other programs. (Melissa Binder/The Oregonian) Print By James Reddick | Special to The Oregonian The Oregonian Follow on Twitter on August 27, 2014 at 8:00 AM, updated August 27, 2014 at 10:42 AM Reddit Email A Southeast Portland school that has housed and taught troubled teenage girls since 1902 has closed its doors. Rosemont Treatment Center, a 27-bed facility that provides mental health counseling, substance abuse treatment and schooling is terminating its contract with Oregon Youth Authority and the Department of Human Services due to a chronic lack of funding. Girls in the program have been sent to foster care, the custody of family members or other treatment facilities. Rosemont becomes the third state-funded provider of adolescent "behavioral rehabilitation" to contemplate closing or fundamentally transforming its focus this year. "We've tried and tried and tried to make this work, but most years in the past decade we've run at a loss," said Drew McWilliams, chief executive officer of Morrison Child & Family Services, the nonprofit organization overseeing Rosemont. "It's one of the most difficult decisions I've ever made," he said of the Aug 22 closure. The Pettygrove House in Southeast Portland is also terminating its contract with OYA. The 10-bed facility will shift its focus to abused teenage girls served by the Department of Human Services. According to Janet Arenz, president of an umbrella group that represents child welfare providers, an additional, non-residential program in Oregon is slated to close but hasn't made an announcement yet. She declined to name the program. "These are credible, longstanding organizations who have a clash between their mission and the resources to be able to get there," Arenz said. Christopher Drake, a spokesman for the state youth authority, said of the Rosemont closure: "We're sorry they made that decision, but it was their decision to make. Obviously, they have their reasons to stop doing business with us." One client's experience For some adolescents placed by OYA, treatment centers like Rosemont are a last chance before juvenile detention. Most have experienced trauma, and many are in the juvenile justice system due to violence or substance abuse. The rehabilitation services are designed to ready adolescents to return to their families or to foster homes. "These programs provide care for kids that need something more than standard foster care," said Kevin George, who oversees foster programs for the state human services agency. Rosemont was founded in North Portland by a Catholic organization called Sisters of the Good Shepherd. It moved to its current location near Mount Scott in 1995. Rebekah Tilahun, a 26-year-old from Oregon City, spent more than two years at Rosemont. She said she was taken from her mother when she was an infant and had lived in about 15 foster homes before ending up at Rosemont in her freshman year. "Walking into that place was pretty similar to an old person walking into a retirement home," she said. "You're treated like a child's child every second and being monitored and constantly controlled." Still, Tilahun got good grades and ended up graduating from high school a year early despite missing her freshman year. She took art classes and worked on her anger issues with a counselor. Over the course of two years, she noticed certain luxuries, like going on field trips, being cut. There were auctions and stage performances to raise money for programs. Staff members were constantly changing, she said, and rules shifted on a regular basis. Eventually, OYA and DHS residents were combined into one wing in 2009 as Rosemont reduced its capacity from 52 to 27 girls. Unstable funding Rosemont's decline reflects the struggles of child services providers statewide. Until 1998, providers were guaranteed money each month based on their size and services. "The state said, 'We want you to have a certain number of beds available for children,'" said Michael Balter, president of Boys & Girls Aid, which runs the Pettygrove House. "Every month they would keep buying that capacity," he said, "and if they weren't making referrals to us, they bore that responsibility." Under the new plan, providers are paid not based on capacity but on a daily rate for each resident actually served by the facility. They say they have very little control over whether or not beds are full because providers like Rosemont rely on DHS and OYA case workers for referrals. Yet Rosemont is also required to have enough staff to handle 27 adolescents, even when the facility isn't full. "All the risk for losses is on the service providers," Balter said. Further, providers say, the state's reimbursement rates have not kept up with costs. DHS' Kevin George doesn't disagree. He said providers need to rely on other sources of funding to reduce their risk. "State funding has never been able to keep up with market values," he said. "The longer you go without any right-sizing, the larger the gap." A group of 18 providers sued in 2011 over the state's reimbursement rates, settling out of court this summer on condition that the state will negotiate changes to the system with them. "The erosion of the system has been subtle and gradual," Balter said. "It reaches a point where it becomes so threatening that you have to do something dramatic." Closing Rosemont In the end, Rosemont officials said, the new financing system slowly made it impossible to continue serving teens held by the state agencies. Girls at the facility have all been placed in other homes or will return to their families. For Tilahun, the closing of the school is a reminder of the hardships facing foster youth. Although she said she was considered a "success case," she lost her job and ended up periodically homeless within months of reaching adulthood. "I'm far from a polished gem," Tilahun said. "But I'm probably better off because of Rosemont." --James Reddick Source: http://www.oregonlive.com/portland/index.ssf/2014/08/rosemont_a_112-year-old_facili.html

Charter Schools Don't Need An Ad Campaign, They Need Regulation This time of year, while classroom teachers and administrators in public schools are busy welcoming students back to a new school year and figuring out how they're going to cope with devastating financial constraints, advocates in the charter schools industry are propping up their image with an extensive new public relations campaign, called "Truth About Charters." That contrast alone pretty much tells you everything you need to know about where we are in the nation's parallel education narratives, in which a gritty documentary competes with what is essentially an advertising campaign for a shiny, new product. There are good reasons for charter schools advocates to feel they need an ad campaign. Recent polling results from the annual PDK/Gallup Poll of the Public's Attitudes Towards the Public Schools show that Americans generally have favorable opinions about charter schools but don't really know very much about them. That situation is eerily similar to what has befallen another education policy favored by influential private interests and federal and state authorities: the Common Core. Last year's PDK/Gallup survey found that the Common Core was pretty much a mystery to most Americans, although public support for national standards was high. However, as new standards rolled out, and people became more knowledgeable about them and all they entail, opinion gradually changed. According to this year's survey, over 80 percent of Americans have heard about the Common Core -- 47 percent indicating they have heard a great deal or a fair amount. And most Americans, 60 percent, now oppose them. A similar evolution may be occurring with charter schools. Because only about 6 percent of school children are enrolled in charters, the vast majority of Americans have had virtually no actual experiences with these schools. But in communities where charters are more prevalent, public opinion is more starkly divided. In school systems such as Philadelphia, Bridgeport, Pittsburgh, and Chicago, where charter schools are major providers, parents and local officials have increasingly opposed charter takeovers of their neighborhood schools. Probably even more concerning to charter school advocates is the news that credit rating agency Standards & Poor's recently down-rated the nation's charter sector to a "negative" outlook. What are the concerns? Apparently while charter advocates have their version of "truth," another version of the truth has been playing out in communities around the country. "A Racket" A recent article in the online news outlet The Progressive reported, "There's been a flood of local news stories in recent months about FBI raids on charter schools all over the country. From Pittsburgh to Baton Rouge, from Hartford to Cincinnati to Albuquerque, FBI agents have been busting into schools, carting off documents, and making arrests leading to high-profile indictments." Reporter Ruth Conniff found charter schools allegations range from "taking money that was meant for the classroom," to spending taxpayer dollars on "luxuries such as fine-dining and retreats at exclusive resorts and spas," to engaging in "bribes and kickbacks." Conniff couldn't help but conclude the special attention from the FBI is due to the likelihood these charter schools are "a racket." Recent news of charter school financial malfeasance abound. The Washington Post reported, according to a pending civil lawsuit, the District of Columbia financial officer "responsible for monitoring charter schools' business practices and ensuring their compliance with rules meant to prevent financial mismanagement" was instead allegedly receiving $150,000 to help three former managers of a local charter school chain "evade those rules and take millions of taxpayer dollars for themselves." Another report from The Post revealed that "about 25 percent" of the city's charter schools pay fees -- "ranging from 3 percent to 100 percent" of the schools' total revenue -- to nonprofit or for-profit management companies. Not surprisingly, several of the operating agreements with these management organizations prevent “the kind of transparency necessary to assure that schools are operating appropriately,” a DC school board review contended. In Florida, a local news outlet investigating charter school operations found millions of taxpayer dollars misdirected from classrooms and students to management companies. The report pointed to charter school chain Charter Schools USA that makes “tens of millions” by operating as, essentially, a real estate firm. CUSA uses tax-exempt bonds to build schools that it then rents to UCSA-affiliated schools. Then the CUSA schools are saddled with rent payments back to CUSA and its management company at rates considerably higher than those charged to other non-CUSA schools in the area. One CUSA school will pay “more than $2 million this year in rent” – a 23% share of its budget. “That’s money that won’t be spent in classroom resources or teachers,” the report noted. Education historian Diane Ravitch, writing on her personal blog, recently highlighted a report from the Florida League of Women Voters that explained how these charter school real estate schemes work across the state: After receiving a variety of grants, loans and tax credits for building a charter school, the for-profit chain charges ever escalating rents and leases to the school district, paid by taxpayer education dollars. The for-profit then reaps the profits when the building is sold in a few years. Meanwhile the properties with high, non-taxable, values based on claimed ‘commercial’ revenue streams from public taxpayer dollars are leveraged to borrow additional funds to build more school buildings. The League’s report noted, “The high per student management fees (around $450) plus rent/lease fees (at least 20 percent of the total school budget) mean that there is less funding available for ‘instruction,’ including teacher salaries, books, etc.” The charter school racket goes beyond real estate deals. The Arizona Republic recently “reviewed thousands of pages of federal tax returns, audits, corporate filings, and records filed with the Arizona State Board for Charter Schools” and found, “Board members and administrators from more than a dozen state-funded charter schools are profiting from their affiliations by doing business with schools they oversee. The deals, worth more than $70 million over the last five years, are legal, but critics of the arrangements say they can lead to conflicts of interest.” In Newark, NJ, the money making opportunity for the charter school chains when the federal government made available millions of dollars in school construction bonds for charter schools. Noticing the potential windfall, the administration of governor Chris Christie promptly withheld funds designated for repairing and renovating existing public schools. This created a bonanza for new charter school construction, while local public schools went deeper into disrepair. As Owen Davis reported for Truth Out, “By systematically underfunding the public sector while extending market incentives to private actors, the Christie administration has essentially placed its thumb on the scale for charters. The result: Some charters enjoy gleaming new facilities (bankrolled by the same financial milieu that spends its down time plugging them), while the public sector continues its decline.” The Gülen Factor An increasingly frequent target for scrutiny is the largest bricks-and-mortar charter-school chain in the United States run by the secretive Turkish cleric, Fethullah Gülen, who lives in exile from Turkey in rural Pennsylvania. In her Progressive article, Conniff pointed to an August 12 story in The Atlantic that found Gülen schools “don’t have a great track record when it comes to financial and legal transparency.” Reporter Scott Beauchamp found a Utah Gülen school that was $350,000 in debt while using much of it publicly provided funds to donate to Gülen-affiliated organizations and “pay the cost of bringing teachers to Utah from Turkey.” Beauchamp also linked to a report in The New York Times that found two Gülen schools giving $50 million to Gülen-connected contractors “even though other contractors had offered lower bids.” And in Georgia, a county audit found three Gülen schools “skipped the bidding process altogether and paid nearly half a million dollars to organizations associated with the Gülen movement. Federal investigations into Gülen schools across the Midwest have found similar shady practices. The Chicago Sun-Times recently reported that Chicago-area Concept Schools, also part of the Gülen charter chain, are subjects of an ongoing federal investigation. The enquiry is about nearly $1 million that has been paid to contractors for work at done at three Chicago-area charter schools run by Concept. The contractors, a management consulting firm, and a foundation – all with ties to the Gülen network – are wrapped up into the scheme. In California, state auditors are looking at the Magnolia network of charter schools, also affiliated with the Gülen charter network. The audit stems from a sampling of transactions from the charter campuses by the inspector general of the Los Angeles school district, who “found over $43,000 in duplicate payments to vendors.” Another review revealed, “the schools sent $2.8 million to the network’s management organization. The funds were poorly documented loans, and much of the cash was never paid back to classrooms.” Only a judicial intervention has prevented two of the Magnolia schools from being closed, and now the state has to intervene. In Ohio, charter schools operated by Horizon Science Academy, also part of the Gülen Concept network, are accused by the whistleblower website WikiLeaks of being covers for Turkish nationals to get into this country. According to a local news report, four former teachers from one of the Horizon schools, “accused officials at the school of possibly completing state tests for students, of unqualified teachers, of teachers showing videos day after day in class, of women being treated as second-class citizens and of teachers encouraging sexually harassing behavior toward female students.” Another Ohio press outlet reported that the Gülen schools involved in the scandal are also “related through membership, fundraisers and political giving to the nonprofit Niagara Foundation, which provides trips to Turkey for state, local and federal lawmakers.” Indeed, the influence of the Gülen network goes beyond the schoolhouse into the statehouse, by “making inroads in US politics,” according to a recent account at BuzzFeed. “Liberal Democrats like Yvette Clarke, Sheila Jackson Lee, and Al Green, and conservative Republicans like Ted Poe and Pete Olson have all benefitted from donors affiliated with Gülen,” reporter Rosie Gray found. “The patterns of giving suggest some level of coordination,” Gray discerned, and a number of the donations handed over to political campaigns from modestly paid classroom teachers are surprisingly large, the maximums allowed. A ‘Market For Lemons’ In his Atlantic article on the spread of Gülen-related charter schools, Beauchamp felt compelled to note, repeatedly, that it could seem xenophobic to single out the Gülen schools for their mysterious use of public funds. However, “it isn’t the Gülen movement that makes Gülen charters so secretive,” Beauchamp wrote, “it’s the charter movement itself.” Indeed, one of the supposed advantages of charter schools was their exemption to laws and regulations that some feel shackle public schools. But do these exemptions, in fact, lead to less transparency and accountability? For instance, as a post on the Ohio blog Plunderbund recently explained, charter schools in that state are exempt from over 150 laws required of public schools, including “minimum standards” covering such things as training and qualifications of personnel; public disclosure of instructional materials, equipment, and facilities; “organization, administration, and supervision of schools; and “reporting requirements.” The blogger, “Greg,” wrote, “If it wasn’t so appalling, we might be able to laugh at the continued insistence that Ohio’s charter (community) schools are held to the same level of accountability as are traditional public schools.” An article appearing on the website for the University of Connecticut reported the conclusions of a professor who found, “the phenomenal growth of charter schools nationwide has been aided by a canny legal strategy in which the schools claim to be public for the purpose of taking in tax dollars but private for the purpose of evading government oversight.” The article noted, for instance, “While public schools must provide due process to students when making decisions about suspensions or expulsions, most states exempt charter schools from school district discipline policies.” Another example of how charter schools evade public scrutiny: A recent law passed in North Carolina, supported by charter schools lobbyists, “allows private, for-profit charter school management companies to keep their employees’ salaries secret, even though they are paid with public funds.” Another example: When a Hartford, CT charter management group was recently rocked by scandals involving its leadership, the firm responded to media enquiries by simply closing its books. Another way charter schools organizations evade public scrutiny is by simply rebranding its services under another corporate name, as the online charter company K12, Inc. recently did with one of its product groups. The culprits behind all this lack of transparency are, of course, public officials, many of whom – fiercely urged on by powerful charter schools lobbying and public relations efforts – actively support charter schools. As Rutgers University professor Bruce Baker recently wrote on his personal blog, School Finance 101, “In theory, the accountability and efficiency advantage of charter schooling is driven by the market for choice of one school over another. Increasingly, state education agencies have moved from being impartial technical assistance agencies and accountability reporting agencies to strongly promoting the charter sector. This advocacy behavior corrupts the state agency role and creates what economists refer to as an ‘asymmetry of information’ – in the extreme case a ‘market for lemons.’” For ‘The Kids’? Faced with the expanding number of charter schools scandals (keep in mind, the above examples are just a sample of what’s been reported just in the past two months), some government officials are beginning to wake up and act. As Education Week recently reported, “Charter school authorizing, caps, and performance-based closures are among six policy areas getting growing attention in state charter school laws, according to a policy brief released by the Education Commission of the States this month.” One such measure got the attention of Diane Ravitch who noted on her blog, “The Massachusetts State Senate voted 26-13 not to increase the number of charter schools in the state. A similar bill cleared the House by a vote of 114-35 in May.” So how do charter schools proponents respond to this kind of legislation? By fighting it tooth and nail. As edu-blogger Jennifer Berkshire reported on her Edushyster blog, during negotiations on the bill, the positions of the Massachusetts charter lobby were, “any compromise was completely unacceptable.” And the decision was immediately made a matter of rhetorical overkill by Republican gubernatorial candidate Charles Baker, who according to Ravitch, “issued a statement suggesting the Senate ‘bowed to political pressure and handed urban families stuck in struggling schools a massive defeat by shutting down access to high performing schools.’” Other charter school proponents responded by comparing anyone wanting to put the brakes on charter school expansions to “George Wallace” declaring “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever.” Really? Indeed, when charter proponents aren’t engaged in a clever PR campaign, they resort to demagoguery, accusing any and all detractors of charter schools of being engaged in “politics.” And they say they do this “for the kids”? Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/charter-schools-dont-need-an-ad-campaign-they-need-regulation/>

Dept. of Corrections to shut down Camp Summit Boot Camp in LaPorte By: NewsCenter 16 Email Posted: Fri 5:45 PM, Aug 29, 2014 By: NewsCenter 16 Email Home / Headlines List / Article From the Indiana Department of Corrections Due to the continuous decline in the Indiana Department of Correction’s (IDOC) youth population, the IDOC is announcing plans to close the Camp Summit Boot Camp in LaPorte, IN. The 72 youth currently housed at Camp Summit will be transitioned to community-based programs or transferred to other IDOC juvenile facilities before the facility officially closes on or about October 1, 2014. Those who are not scheduled for release before then will be moved to either the Logansport or Pendleton Juvenile Correctional Facilities, where there is ample bed capacity available. To continue the boot camp model, Pendleton Juvenile plans to expand the facility’s current Future Soldiers Program, a paramilitary program that prepares youth as potential military recruits by teaching good citizenship, leadership, self-reliance and responsibility. Since 2009, when the IDOC Division of Youth Services (DYS) was created, DHS has utilized national best practices to improve treatment and services to the youth in our care. The agency has undertaken major efforts to reduce the length of stay of youth in secure facilities and to assign youth to the least restrictive setting based on their individual needs and risks. This has not only resulted in the dramatic reduction of the number of youth being held in Indiana’s juvenile correctional facilities, from more than 1,200 youth in 2007 to just over 400 today, but has also allowed that only those youth who pose the greatest public safety risk are being committed to a juvenile correctional facility. “Due to efforts of our youth services staff, at-risk youth are spending less time in prison and are returning to community programs as quickly as possible to reunite them with their families and provide them with the support they need to be responsible citizens. This move will enable our youth services staff to better serve the youth in our care, while making more efficient use of taxpayer dollars,” said Commissioner Bruce Lemmon. Approximately 50 Camp Summit employees will have the opportunity to transfer to other facilities or apply for vacant positions throughout the Department following the facility’s closure. The IDOC is working closely with the State Personnel Department to find placement options and minimize the impact on staff. “Our goal is continued State employment for every affected worker,” assured Commissioner Lemmon. About Camp Summit Camp Summit Boot Camp was established in 1995 and is situated on 60 acres in Northern LaPorte County between LaPorte and Michigan City. Camp Summit is Indiana’s only Para-military style boot camp which blends military components with a programs approach that addresses the needs of adolescents and affords the best possible environment for change and growth. Pelath: Camp Summit about to be sacrificed to Pence administration’s surplus worship Indiana House Democratic Leader Scott Pelath from Michigan City today issued the following statement upon receiving word that Gov. Mike Pence and the state Department of Corrections (DOC) intend to close the Camp Summit boot camp in LaPorte County: “It has come to our attention that the governor and his administration will announce in the next few days their intentions to close Camp Summit for budgetary reasons. In other words, they want to eliminate 70 LaPorte County jobs in the service of their increasingly bloated budget surplus. “If they follow through on this threat, it marks the latest indication that people and jobs don’t matter as much as politically crafted financial statements. “This decision would be particularly crazy because the state is shuttering a program that has a demonstrated impact in turning around the lives of troubled youths. At any time at Camp Summit, close to 100 youths across Indiana have the chance to resume their education, receive counseling, and gain the skills that will enable them to return to society and care for themselves and others. “But that apparently means nothing to an administration that has no problems with shuttling those youths to other locations around the state, and telling the dedicated staff at Camp Summit that they can either uproot their families or find other jobs. It also will wreak havoc on federal guidelines covering staffing at correctional facilities, leading to less rehabilitation and more wayward lives. “They only care about one thing: $2 billion in the bank. The havoc they wreak on schools, kids, and our health to get to that figure seemingly means little to them.” Camp Summit, established in 1995, is Indiana’s only para-military style boot camp. The five-and-a-half month program is designed for juvenile males (average age 16.7 years) from throughout Indiana who have been adjudicated delinquent by Indiana juvenile courts. The medium-security facility has a fully accredited high school and a GED program for some students who are 16 years of age or older. Programs include individual, group and family counseling, as well as substance abuse counseling and classes in parenting and anger management. Attached below is a copy of the letter that Leader Pelath sent to Indiana Gov. Mike Pence regarding the closure of Camp Summit Dear Governor Pence: It has come to my attention that your office and the Department of Corrections intend to close the Camp Summit Juvenile Correctional Facility in La Porte County. This is unacceptable. Camp Summit currently serves as the state’s only alternative form of juvenile rehabilitation. It provides an environment for at-risk youth to flourish in a structured, para-military environment. As a fully accredited high school, the facility offers students an opportunity to receive their diploma. When the students re-enter their communities, the facility works to ensure they have an opportunity to be productive citizens. But when Camp Summit closes, this positive benefit will end. The juvenile population currently housed at Camp Summit will be shifted to the Pendleton Juvenile Correctional Facility, and there will be no staffing increases to match the influx of new juvenile offenders. The increased staffing ratios will harm, not help, at-risk youth. I can only assume the State Budget Agency and Office of Management and Budget claim that a budget shortfall has involuntarily forced their hand. On the contrary, we have a sizable surplus that has been the subject of boastful press releases from state leaders. The infinitesimal savings from the closure serve no grand purpose. There is, however, a real human cost. Seventy La Porte County staff members and their families will be thrown into economic turmoil. The public was not consulted. I was not consulted. Camp Summit should remain open. It should continue to provide opportunities for the youth who made a mistake and simply need a second chance. Sincerely, Scott D. Pelath, House Democratic Leader cc: Commissioner Bruce Lemmon, Senator Karen Tallian, Senator Jim Arnold, Representative Tom Dermody Source: <http://www.wndu.com/home/headlines/Dept-of-Corrections-to-shut-down-Camp-Summit-Boot-Camp-in-LaPorte-273240961.html>

State at fault in fatal group home fire Judge rules New York is liable for death of woman in Wells blaze Rick Karli, Times Union By Rick Karlin Published 9:56 pm, Friday, August 22, 2014 0 Larger | Smaller Printable Version Email This Georgia (default) Verdana Times New Roman Arial Font Latest News Audit: Schenectady schools dipped deeply into surplus Gloversville shelter makes plans for 'Woofstock' 2 are injured in 4-car crash Joseph E. Persico, acclaimed historian and biographer, dies at 84 Page 1 of 1 Albany A state Court of Claims judge has found New York state to be “100 percent liable” in the March 2009 death of a developmentally disabled woman who perished in a fire that tore through her state-run group home in the Adirondack community of Wells. Judge Diane Fitzpatrick cited a variety of problems, including delays in contacting firefighters and the failure of the two staffers on duty to immediately evacuate Gloria Bonilla from the Riverview center. The facility was operated by the Office for People with Developmental Disabilities. Bonilla, 44, was one of the four disabled residents who died in the fire. “She lacked preservation skills,” said attorney Evan Foulke of Goshen, who is representing Bonilla’s family. “She was entitled to be protected from any form of danger.” The precise amount of damages is unclear, although it could be in the millions of dollars, Foulke said. Following the fire, investigations by the state as well as a Hamilton County grand jury found a number of oversights and lapses in safety procedures that contributed to the loss of life, such as a lack of realistic fire drills and the state’s failure to enforce a smoking ban, which likely led to the blaze in the first place. Bonilla, who could not express herself verbally and was unresponsive to fire alarms, endured a particularly gruesome fate, according to court filings. Those documents reiterated earlier reports that workers initially moved her to the house’s “mud room” and tried to extinguish the fire rather than immediately evacuate her. She was found alive but badly burned more than two hours later and died en route to the hospital. Other lapses cited in the court papers was the practice of workers at the center calling the alarm company rather than the local fire department right away. In this case, an assistant fire chief lived across the street, but he didn’t learn of the blaze until three minutes after the call had first gone out to the alarm company. Nine residents lived in the facility and two aides were working when the fire broke out at around 5:30 a.m. Foulke said the state is appealing the ruling, which could take nine months or more. After the tragedy, OPWDD toughened its fire drill and other safety requirements. Bonilla belonged to the “Willowbrook class,” people who had earlier lived in the former Willowbrook State School on Staten Island. After media exposes on bad conditions, Willowbrook was closed in 1987. People who resided there are afforded special oversight and protections, such as close monitoring of their care. rkarlin@timesunion.com • 518-454-5758 • @RickKarlinTU Source: <http://www.timesunion.com/local/article/State-at-fault-in-fatal-group-home-fire-5707020.php>

Mercury News editorial: California over-drugs --and fails --foster youth Mercury News Editorial Posted: 08/22/2014 05:19:15 PM PDT 4 Comments Updated: 08/24/2014 07:31:53 AM PDT Related Stories Aug 28: Mercury News editorial: Sen. Lieu to the rescue of overdugged foster kids Aug 27: Medical regulators to investigate risky psych drug prescribing to California foster youth Aug 26: Lawmakers call for end to reckless prescribing of psych meds to California foster kids Aug 23: Drugging our kids: Children in California's foster care system are prescribed risky medications Aug 15: Live Chat: Drugging our kids, August 26 at noon PT Will Lightbourne, head of California’s Department of Social Services, says there’s no simple way to end the pattern of thousands of

foster children spending much of their youth drugged into malleability -- the horror eloquently revealed by reporter Karen de Sá on Sunday's Page One. He says it has to be part of the holistic rethinking of the entire foster care system that's under way, giving doctors better options than prescribing psychotropic drug upon psychotropic drug to control children who act out. Really? Really? If this isn't a crisis, then what is? The abusive use of powerful medications on kids with formative brains cries out for action. Each child who grows up scarred by this is a human tragedy and, in many cases, a lifetime burden on society. Joymara Coleman, a 24-year-old Cal State East Bay student, displays two of the psychotropic medications she was prescribed while in foster care. She no longer takes Abilify or Trazodone, but keeps them in her apartment as a reminder of what she has overcome. (Dai Sugano, Bay Area News Group) Yes, the whole foster care system needs rebuilding, and yes, that could reduce the incentive to drug kids to alter behavior. But we can't write off the children in the system now. That's like declining to treat a cancer because the cure hasn't been found. It's time to act. There are things the state can do now to at least begin to control the damage to children's minds and physical health. Foster children are the most vulnerable of California's young. They are in state custody as a last resort because going back to their families is impossible. Thousands of them are given powerful psychotropic medications -- often two or four or more at a time, prescribed to deal with behavior and not to treat the mental illnesses for which the FDA has approved them. They can lead to lifetime health problems, such as obesity. De Sá relates story after story of young people who experienced over-medicating in foster care. One, Rochelle Trochtenberg, as a teen-ager was diagnosed, so to speak, with a laundry list of mental illnesses including bipolar and post-traumatic stress disorders. When she turned 18 and left the system to live on the streets -- don't get us started on that aspect of foster care -- she was on 10 medications. When she finally got real help, she came off drugs entirely and how is working on a master's degree. Anecdotes do not prove a problem; the data does that. But it's important to look at individuals' stories to understand why waiting for global solutions to the foster care system is not tenable. De Sá found 12.2 percent of California foster children who received a psychiatric drug last year were taking multiple drugs at the same time. System insiders say it's often in doses never determined to be safe for children, whose brains are still developing. How is this even legal? And how hard can it be to limit? There are simple rules that could help. As just one example, California appears to have cut the use of antipsychotic drugs in children under 5 a few years ago when it added an additional layer of documentation required of doctors. The Department of Health Care Services is looking at requiring the same for teen-agers. Why not immediately? Three years ago the federal government identified overuse of psychotropics on foster children as a national problem and ordered states to come up with plans to control it. The committee California set up has moved at a snail's pace, unable to get access to prescribing information, among other issues. Members are frustrated. They don't expect to finish their work until at least 2016. Frustration is no surprise. It took this newspaper nine months to get the data for these articles, and it's required by law to be public as long as identities are concealed. Lightbourne, who previously ran Santa Clara County's social services, might be able to pull off a holistic remake of the foster care system. We hope he does. But massive drugging of California's foster children is not a problem that can wait. The state needs to act now. Source:

http://www.mercurynews.com/opinion/ci_26389685/mercury-news-editorial-california-over-drugs-and-fails?source=rss

Drugging our kids: Children in California's foster care system are prescribed risky medications. By Karen de Sá, Bay Area News Group, kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 08/23/14, 7:40 PM PDT | Updated: 6 days ago # Comments For more coverage, visit <http://webspecial.mercurynews.com/druggedkids/>. They are wrenched from abusive homes, uprooted again and again, often with their life's belongings stuffed into a trash bag. Abandoned and alone, they are among California's most powerless children. But instead of providing a stable home and caring family, the state's foster care system gives them a pill. With alarming frequency, foster and health care providers are turning to a risky but convenient remedy to control the behavior of thousands of troubled kids: numbing them with psychiatric drugs that are untested on and often not approved for children. An investigation by this newspaper found that nearly 1 out of every 4 adolescents in California's foster care system is receiving these drugs — 3 times the rate for all adolescents nationwide. Over the last decade, almost 15 percent of the state's foster children of all ages were prescribed the medications, known as psychotropics, part of a national treatment trend that is only beginning to receive broad scrutiny. "We're experimenting on our children," said Los Angeles County Judge Michael Nash, who presides over the nation's largest juvenile court. A year of interviews with foster youth, caregivers, doctors, researchers and legal advocates uncovered how the largest foster care system in the U.S. has grown dependent on quick-fix, taxpayer-funded, big-profit pharmaceuticals — and how the state has done little to stop it. "To be prescribing these medications so extensively and so, I think, thoughtlessly, with so little evidence supporting their use, it's just malpractice," said George Stewart, a Berkeley child psychiatrist who has treated the neediest foster children in the Bay Area for the past four decades. "It really is drugging them." The state official who oversees foster care, Department of Social Services Director Will Lightbourne, concedes drugs are overused, but insists his department is wrapping its arms around the problem: "There's a lot of work to be done here to make sure we do things right." No one doubts that foster children generally have greater mental health needs because of the trauma they have suffered, and the temptation for caregivers to fulfill those needs with drugs can be strong. In the short term, psychotropics can calm volatile moods and make aggressive children more docile. But there is substantial evidence of many of the drugs' dramatic side effects: rapid-onset obesity, diabetes and a lethargy so profound that foster kids describe dozing through school and much of their young lives. Long-term effects, particularly on children, have received little study, but for some psychotropics there is evidence of persistent tics, increased risk of suicide, even brain shrinkage. Sade Daniels, of Hayward, became so overweight in her teens, that at age 26 her bathroom mirror still taunts and embarrasses her. Mark Estrada, a 21-year-old from Anaheim, said he felt too "zoned out" to focus on high school and so groggy he was cut from his varsity basketball team. And Rochelle Trochtenberg, now 31 and living in Eureka, still struggles to bring a glass to her lips because her hands are so shaky from the years she spent on a shifting mix of lithium, Depakote, Zyprexa, Haldol and Prozac, among others. When people ask, she tries to cover it up with remarks about a possible hereditary condition. The truth is too painful to explain, she said. "I don't want to tell people I have a tremor because I was drugged for my whole adolescence." Questionable prescribing revealed Despite the concerns, state officials have been slow to even reveal foster care prescribing patterns in California. This newspaper and its lawyers spent nine months negotiating with the Department of Health Care Services for data that is public under state and federal law, as long as individuals cannot be identified. The 10 years of data begins in 2004 and — even though the state continues to resist many of this newspaper's requests — provides the most comprehensive look yet at psychotropic medication use on California's foster kids. The newspaper also interviewed more than 175 people, including more than 30 current and former foster youth throughout the state. The findings, which will be examined here and in future stories, include:

- Growing use of antipsychotics to treat bad behavior: Of the tens of thousands of foster children placed on psychotropic drugs over the past 10 years, nearly 60 percent were prescribed an antipsychotic, the class of psychotropic medications with the highest risks. That figure stunned experts in the field and alarmed officials who oversee the state's foster care system. The Food and Drug Administration authorizes antipsychotics for children only in cases of severe mental illness, but evidence suggests doctors often prescribe them to California foster children for behavior problems — a legal but controversial practice that critics say should be limited.
- Multiple psych meds common but dangerous: In many cases, doctors piled on prescriptions: 12.2 percent of California foster children who received a psych drug in 2013 were prescribed two, three, four or more psychotropic medications at a time — up from 10.1 percent in 2004. These drug combinations often fall in uncharted medical territory, with no scientific evidence that young brains aren't being harmed. • Psych meds the norm in group homes for troubled kids: More than half of the foster kids who live in California's residential group homes — and as many as 100 percent in some counties with very small numbers in group homes — are authorized by juvenile courts to receive psychotropic drugs. These homes shelter some of the most troubled foster kids, about 3,800 annually, many of whom the system has been unable to place with families. Health care professionals say children are being medicated to sleep to keep them manageable. In these group homes, foster children who refuse medications are often punished, losing basic privileges such as visiting siblings or simply going outdoors.
- Very young kids also medicated: Hundreds of foster children 5 and younger have been prescribed psychotropics, although federal health officials say the drugs are not safe for the very young and other states actively discourage the practice. In California in the last 10 years, an average of at least 275 of these very young children each year have been prescribed psych medications.
- High cost to kids, and taxpayers: California spends more on psych drugs for foster children than on any other kind of medication. This newspaper analyzed Medi-Cal spending on the 10 most costly groups of drugs for foster kids over the last decade. The state shelled out more than $226 million on psych meds for foster children — an astounding 72 percent of the total.
- Illegal marketing drives sales: Company documents show how drug manufacturers misrepresented scientific evidence to maximize the national market for the antipsychotics that are the top five such drugs prescribed to California foster children. The companies eventually agreed to $4.6 billion in settlements with federal prosecutors. Lawsuits revealed that some of the companies' sales reps pitched doctors to broaden the use of their drugs among children while downplaying side effects, such as massive weight gain and breast growth in boys. Eli Lilly, for example, advised its sales force: "The competition wins if we are distracted into talking about diabetes."
- State is slow to act: California has done little to address psychotropic drug use among foster children. Three years ago, the federal government called on states to develop plans to monitor the use of psychotropic medications prescribed to foster youth.

Many states, including Illinois, Texas and New York, have formal plans. Yet California, with more than 60,000 foster children, has a target date for its policy of no sooner than 2016. State says it's hard at work Officials with the Department of Social Services say they are working hard on improvements. Two years ago, they assembled statewide experts to act on the federal mandate, and they say that group is making good progress. Lightbourne said the real story behind the numbers is more positive: As the state's foster care population plunged in the past 10 years — part of a national trend to keep families intact — so has the total number of foster youth prescribed psych medications, dropping by thousands of kids. In a sharp defense of his department's oversight, Lightbourne insisted those numbers represent progress, even though the percentage of foster children on psych meds has remained roughly the same — ranging from 14 to 16 percent annually — for the past decade. "Clearly there are some situations in which psychotropic prescriptions may be appropriate," Lightbourne said. "We have to know that something is being done because it's absolutely necessary, not because it's convenient — that it's not simply behavior management. "There are things that are much better handled through therapies," he said. "Psychotropics should be the end, not the start." Many on the front lines, however, defend the prescribing, saying the risks are weighed against the benefits and that there are often no alternatives to treating kids with such deep emotional scars. Foster parents and group home directors tend to cast out kids with the most anti-social behaviors, and no one wants them to end up in juvenile halls, psych wards or treatment facilities. "The goal is to deinstitutionalize the child so he can live safely in the community," said therapist Randall Ramirez, director of behavioral health for San Jose-based residential treatment provider Unity Care Group. "If one of the drawbacks is they have to be medicated because we don't want to raise kids in orphanages, that's the trade-off." To be sure, California is not alone in its questionably high prescribing rates. Growing evidence has revealed alarming rates of psychotropic medication use on foster youth across the country, and particularly antipsychotics. The numbers are difficult to compare from state to state because of differences in methodology, but one recent survey found that in 2009, some states, including Texas, Colorado and Missouri, prescribed antipsychotics at an even higher rate than California. Overuse concerns date back decades The state has known about the overuse of psychotropic medication on foster children for years. Legislators first tried in 1999 to address the concerns, passing a law that made California the only state requiring juvenile courts to approve all psych med prescriptions, with reviews every 180 days. But this newspaper's analysis of a decade of prescribing data shows the court oversight has done nothing on a statewide level to lower prescribing rates. A UCLA study in 1998, cited in the legislation, found that 13 percent of school-age foster children in Los Angeles were receiving psychotropic medications. While the state failed to provide data that would allow an updated look at Los Angeles school kids, this newspaper's study revealed high prescribing rates have persisted statewide for all foster kids and all age groups. "I don't think there's one substantive thing that we can point to that has ensured that foster children in California today are only receiving psychotropic medications appropriately," said Bill Grimm, an attorney with the Oakland-based National Center for Youth Law. Grimm's organization is a central part of the state effort — along with public health nurses, state pharmacists and child welfare directors — to comply with the federal mandate to better monitor psychotropic medications. But he is frustrated that the group has been meeting for two years without producing any reports or policy recommendations, and said it has been hamstrung in part by the state's refusal to provide good data on prescribing patterns. Doctors' orders rarely questioned A foster child's path to psych medication can begin innocently enough — for example, when a child can't sit still in class and receives an attention-deficit diagnosis and a prescription for stimulants. But like so many other painful experiences in these children's lives, the drugs are often ramped up during a crisis. Sometimes, kids end up in the hospital after harming themselves or threatening suicide. Often, though, the prescriptions for stronger drugs come after a child lashes out. In dozens of interviews with this newspaper, foster youth freely recounted their rash behavior, which they attributed to anger and frustration: They broke furniture, punched people or trashed their rooms. Sade Daniels, the Hayward resident, said she threw a chair at a teacher who had deeply humiliated her — and betrayed her confidence — by telling the class she was in foster care. Mark Estrada, the former Orange County foster youth, depressed and defiant in his late teens after being separated from his siblings, said he had his behavior subdued by the antipsychotic Seroquel, which is approved only for manic episodes associated with bipolar disorder and schizophrenia. "They'd make me take it anytime I'd have a tantrum or felt rebellious," Estrada said. "I felt like I was being controlled. They gave it to me in the morning, and I'd fall asleep all day." A juvenile court authorizes each prescription, but the forms the courts use often lack critical details and a doctor's expertise is rarely questioned. Nash, the Los Angeles judge, acknowledges the resulting challenges — even in Los Angeles, where mental health experts now review all applications for prescriptions and in 2013 officials created protocols to curb prescribing of multiple psych meds. "The last time I looked around, there aren't too many psychiatrists or psychologists on the bench," the judge said. "So how in the heck are we able to make good decisions about these meds?" How overprescribing happens The progression from medication to overmedication is also surprisingly routine, said child psychiatrist Tony Stanton. At first, psych medications can stabilize moods and dangerous behaviors. Yet once the immediate crisis is over, foster children often remain on a high-dose pharmaceutical course that future doctors are reluctant to reverse. The drugs "might stun them for a while," said Stanton, who treated Bay Area foster children for 24 years. "But after two or three weeks they'd stop working." Then, if the child seems depressed, they add an antidepressant. "And when that got worse, they'd change the diagnosis — they'd say it's actually bipolar," Stanton said. "Then, if they said they heard a voice telling them they were bad or something, then they'd say: 'Oh, they're psychotic.' Then an antipsychotic would be added." Aggressive behavior? A second antipsychotic may get added to the mix. "Usually in my report I'd say, if in fact any of this had been successful, the child should not be in our care," said Stanton, whose San Leandro group home typically received the most difficult-to-place foster children. "So I think we can safely say this does not work." Stanton's reports in recently published articles summing up his work with 450 children ages 5 through 13 are startling: Most children arrived at residential homes run by the Seneca Center for Children and Families on at least four or five — and as many as eight or nine — different psychotropic medications. One 9-year-old shuffled into a Seneca home on a medication dose that was 10 times the amount recommended for a psychotic adult. "It's a story I've gotten used to," said Robin Randall, medical director of San Francisco's Edgewood Center for Children and Families, which also offers residential treatment programs for troubled foster youth. "I used to say when I saw kids walk in on eight or nine different medications that I was shocked and appalled — now I'm just appalled." Randall said children "stay on the meds for reasons that are not necessarily heinous. It's not that doctors want to get kids on a ton of meds. They're putting out fires, and not allowed the time. The system is set up in a way that everyone is adding, adding, adding, and doesn't allow for a space to safely take them off." "They'd make me take it anytime I'd have a tantrum or felt rebellious," said Estrada. "I felt like I was being controlled. They gave it to me in the morning and I'd fall asleep all day." A juvenile court authorizes each prescription, but the forms the courts use often lack critical details and a doctor's expertise is rarely questioned. Nash, the Los Angeles judge, acknowledges the limitations — even in Los Angeles, where mental health experts now review all applications for prescriptions and in 2013 officials created protocols to better monitor psych meds. "The last time I looked around there aren't too many psychiatrists or psychologists on the bench," the judge said. "So how in the heck are we able to make good decisions about these meds?" "I wanted to take the pill" When a psychiatrist told Joymara Coleman that medication could help her enjoy life more, "it sounded like magic to me at first, honestly." She had been searching for some peace after a decade in and out of foster care in Alameda County. "It was pretty clear that I was depressed because of all the things that I went through," said Coleman, now 24 and a senior studying sociology at Cal State East Bay. "I was in the foster care system with folks who weren't very loving. I had a lot of things I needed to heal from — from losing my mom, losing my siblings, from witnessing my mom smoking crack. I was depressed because my father was incarcerated." Coleman had seen her roommate in a home for troubled teens wet the bed while on the medications, and she surely didn't want that. "But after experiencing so much tragedy and so much confusion and chaos in my life, when the psychiatrist told me that it would make me happy, I wanted to take the pill." She was 17 when a doctor prescribed the antidepressant Prozac for depression and panic attacks, but the list of medications grew to a series of overlapping trials of psych meds, according to court records she shared with a reporter: There were antipsychotics Risperdal and Abilify and mood stabilizers such as Depakote and lithium. Court files show that when Coleman was 18, she "was put on 300 mg of lithium to help her control her anger; however, it was stopped after client felt dizzy and nauseous." Psychiatrists who reviewed that diagnosis for this newspaper called it disturbing that lithium, a powerful treatment for bipolar disorder, would be prescribed for anger management. The cocktail of drugs left her exhausted and "spaced out," dulling her spunky personality. "When I was on the medication I just didn't act like Joy," she said. She said her nurse practitioner seemed to really care about her. But when the self-conscious teen complained about weight gain — she added 35 pounds to her 4-foot-8-inch frame — the nurse simply encouraged her to avoid sugary drinks. "They were really adamant," Coleman said of her case workers' insistence that she take medications. "Initially I bought into it, that I needed this because these are professionals — these are all white professionals, with degrees and they're older and they're telling me that something's wrong with me, and they just know this." "It's the behaviors they want treated" From all quarters, the pressure in favor of the drugs can be intense. Estrada recalls the consequences at his group home when he refused to take his Seroquel: He couldn't go on field trips, play video games, watch TV or go outside. But the pressure starts elsewhere, said longtime public health nurse Carol Brown, with the caregivers struggling to control troubled kids. Many of those caregivers are loving and committed, genuinely trying to do the right thing; others are simply overwhelmed. "Very often, there's pressure on the doctors from the foster parents and the group homes to provide medication to deal with the behaviors that the foster youth are exhibiting,” Brown said. “The foster parents won’t take the kids with the behaviors, and it’s the behaviors they want treated.” Child psychiatrist Edgardo Tolentino, a doctor with Pathways to Wellness, a medication clinic that serves foster children in Alameda and Contra Costa counties, conceded he has felt that same pressure from caregivers. “The expectation is that they’ll be given some type of medication,” he said. “If they are already on medications, the only thing I can do is continue them.” Psych meds indispensable for some kids Pressure or no, many who are part of the system — while insisting they avoid overmedicating kids — say some use of drugs is essential. “I wouldn’t want people to think as caregivers we are medicating them so they are comatose, or putting them to sleep so we don’t have to deal with them,” said Barbara Leiner, who fostered more than 300 children in Los Angeles County over 24 years and runs online training forums for foster parents. On the contrary, she said, in her experience medications benefited a significant number of her children. “They’re better in control of their behaviors. When they’re not on psychotropic drugs, they have a tough time in school, the other kids don’t like them, they’re out of control.” Psychiatrists concerned about overprescribing acknowledge there are legitimate reasons for some children to take psychotropic medications, and even the riskiest drugs can be lifesaving for the small sliver of kids with psychoses that are clearly diagnosed. Studies show that’s no more than 1 to 2 percent of children, depending on the illness. Marjorie, an Oakland special-education teacher who uses only her first name, adopted two of her students from the foster care system and said antipsychotics have been indispensable in their care. The two boys, Jakeel, 18, and Smith, 11, take one antipsychotic medication daily to treat symptoms of severe autism. Off the meds, Jakeel tried to leap out of a moving car because he didn’t get a toy he wanted. Smith killed a family pet and once tried to climb out a third-story window. “He talks about the ants in his head without the Abilify,” said Marjorie, who approaches her mothering with a cheerful practicality. “So I say, ‘OK, we don’t want ants in your head!’” Still, when her sons first came to live with her, Marjorie quickly discovered they were on more medications while they were in foster care than she felt were necessary. So she lowered the dosages and limited the multiple antipsychotics to just one. That kind of attention can be lacking in the foster care system, and that adds another layer of concern for often-displaced kids on such powerful drugs. More than 60 percent of the children who have been in foster care at least two years have moved two or more times in the system. So even their prescribers — who may be private practitioners or work at public clinics — often know little about them or their family histories when they meet during office visits. Nash recently reviewed 150 requests for medication in the Los Angeles juvenile court and said he found cases in which doctors prescribed with no medical records or drug history. The dangers are real. For example, some antidepressants carry a “black box label” proclaiming a high suicide risk for young patients. The FDA advises that children be closely monitored for worsening depression and sleeplessness. Yet for foster kids without parents, the medications are often prescribed even when a watchful eye is absent, said attorney Jennifer Rodriguez, a former foster youth who is now executive director of the San Francisco-based Youth Law Center. “As a parent, when your child goes on something that’s dangerous, the most dangerous drugs that are out there,” she said, “your doctor is relying on you — someone who knows that child, who watches over time.” ‘Treatment for a broken heart’ Many of the foster youth interviewed for this story shared another theme: There was no need for medication when they got the emotional support they needed all along. Often it was an adult who vowed to stick by them no matter what — a long-lost relative, a teacher, a volunteer advocate, an exceptionally devoted nurse, or the foster parent who seemed to see through the raucous behaviors to the kid inside. Those key relationships — not medications — are what most helped them eventually calm down and start to feel better, the youth said. “I cannot count the number of times I have seen children on multiple medications who are really suffering from a broken heart,” said Menlo Park child psychiatrist David Arredondo, who has worked with foster youth for 30 years. “And the treatment for a broken heart is not another medication.” Today, Rochelle Trochtenberg doesn’t take a single psychotropic medication. She works with troubled youth in Humboldt County and is working on a master’s degree in social work. But in foster care in Los Angeles, she was diagnosed with a host of mental illnesses, including bipolar, schizoaffective and post-traumatic stress disorders, major depression, bulimia and generalized anxiety. “They attach all these labels to you in foster care,” she said, “but the bottom line is I come from a home where physical and sexual abuse were my daily norm, where I lived in fear every day, where I felt responsible to protect my younger sister from the abuse.” Trochtenberg knew she needed help with depression at age 13, when she was removed from her family home in Los Angeles. After suffering years of physical and sexual abuse that drove her to attempt suicide in the seventh grade, she was grateful when social workers rescued her. Yet while the state freed her from one type of abuse, it delivered her into a life of so many temporary homes and psych meds that she lost count. When she aged out of foster care with a list of 10 medications and nowhere to stay, she lived on the streets until a friend’s family took her in. Then she met Nicoli Tucker, a therapist who helped her see beyond her medicated self to a girl who had simply been failed by her family and by the foster care system. Tucker treated the troubled teen for six years. It took a year to build up trust, she said, but only a single counseling session to see that Trochtenberg had been horribly misdiagnosed. “My professional answer is I think that was overboard,” Tucker said of Trochtenberg’s drug regimen. “My personal answer is: Big Pharma and Wall Street. There’s big money in keeping these kids drugged, and I think it’s a travesty.” Daniels also looks back on her medication history as a terrible miscalculation. In a six-week span when she was 14, social workers moved her to three different group homes in Alameda County, where she spent much of the time worrying about her stuff being stolen. The antidepressants and antipsychotics used to subdue her during that time didn’t work for what was really hurting, she said. “When I look back as an adult at who I was when I was initially diagnosed and given the medication — I needed love,” Daniels said. “Nobody really sees that hurt girl, or the one who truly just wants her mom to get her act together and to get off drugs, or who wants a family, something stable. “The system relies heavily on medication to do a job that parents are supposed to do.” Source: <http://www.dailynews.com/health/20140823/children-in-californias-foster-care-system-are-prescribed-risky-medications#we-recommend>

Long Beach family told by county: Medicate foster kids or lose $900 a month By Phillip Zonkel, Long Beach Press Telegram Posted: 08/23/14, 7:56 PM PDT | Updated: 1 week ago 5 Comments long beach >> Leslie May and her spouse, Anita, receive $2,400 a month in county assistance for their three adopted foster children, but that money may be cut by $900 if they refuse to medicate their children with psychotropic drugs. The potential cut would hit the Long Beach couple hard. Leslie, 54, is a hospice nurse, but Anita, 52, has reduced her work hours as a licensed vocational nurse to less than part time so she can stay with the kids and home-school them. Anita’s cut in hours means the family income has dropped about 60 percent. Their children, ages 9, 10 and 13, have been diagnosed with various behavioral disorders, and the drugs are aimed at treating them, though May doesn’t like the idea of putting the kids on drugs. She would prefer more emphasis on therapies dealing with attachment disorders. “You have these young brains not fully developed, and you’re giving them these drugs they may or may not need,” she said. “It’s horrible to put kids on drugs because of money.” The Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services could not be reached for comment. A 10-month investigation by this news organization has found that over the past decade nearly one of every four adolescents in California’s foster care system received prescribed drugs, or 3½ times the rate for all adolescents nationwide. May said the couple’s kids were on some medication for a 16-month trial period that ended about a year ago. When their son stopped taking the drugs, they noticed a stark difference. “It helped their lives and ours, but our son’s personality was blunted,” she said. “When he got off the meds, he was funny with a great sense of humor. We were missing out on that.” Mary Artino, now a hospice social worker, was a social worker for seven years with two Long Beach-based foster care agencies overseen by the county. She worked with children who experienced extreme violence in the home or whose mothers abused drugs and alcohol during pregnancy. Artino, who became frustrated with the system and quit her job in 2008, said the issue of overmedicating foster care children with drugs goes back almost 15 years. “I saw medications prescribed for a number of children, but there was very little information on how to prescribe medications for children with serious psychiatric and behavioral disturbances, who were in a constant state of rage from extreme trauma,” she said. “The county officials who oversaw these kids didn’t understand what was going on with these children. They couldn’t access tools or tools weren’t made available to them to understand the children,” she said. “Therapy takes a long time and is expensive for kids who have been through extreme trauma. The reaction was the child needs medication.” Some people, however, are advocating a long-term, holistic approach instead of drugs to helping foster care children cope with and heal from their trauma. Brandon Gamble, an assistant professor of school psychology at Cal State Long Beach, said the community has to be a part of the solution. “We have to create a sense of community, encourage people to mentor foster care kids,” said Gamble, who worked with foster care youth while he was a school psychologist in the Long Beach Unified School District from 1998 to 2008. “We have to help foster youth bond with people. It will help them heal from their trauma and alleviate the need for so many medications.” Jim Schrage, executive director with the Long Beach-based Families Uniting Families, said the foster care agency takes a team approach in trying to reunite kids with their birth families or adoption, collaborating with social workers, doctors and family members. Diet and self-care, including exercise and yoga, are also important. “Getting kids on a structured sleeping and eating habit can change things,” he said. “It’s so much more than get the kids some meds. We are emotionally invested. We want to see these kids succeed.” Contact Phillip Zonkel at 562-714-2098. Source: <http://www.presstelegram.com/general-news/20140823/long-beach-family-told-by-county-medicate-foster-kids-or-lose-900-a-month>

Los Angeles County caregivers working to get foster kids off psychiatric drugs By Sandy Mazza, Daily Breeze Posted: 08/23/14, 7:37 PM PDT | Updated: 6 days ago 0 Comments Psychiatric drugs like lithium, Depakote and Prozac remain a popular choice for care providers trying to calm angry, depressed or anxious children in the Los Angeles County foster care system, but the pills are losing fans amid concerns about side effects and long-term consequences. Still, in the South Bay and across the county and state, there isn't an immediate replacement for the quick, easy and cheap answers provided by psychotropic drugs, though efforts to develop more comprehensive therapeutical solutions are in the works. Optimist Youth Homes and Family Services prescribes such drugs to roughly one in five children who cycle through its group homes in San Pedro and Harbor City needing treatment for hyperactive behavior, thought disorders, depression and other psychiatric issues, said Frank Hunter, director of health services for the nonprofit corporation. Optimist works with teenagers on parole or in foster care. "Our kids come to us with a variety of behavior problems," Hunter said. "We have a lot of depression and adjustment disorder because of what's happened in the past. I see a value in psychotropic meds, and I do know that there's abuse and over-prescription in the private sector. "But what we're doing here is to socially correct things so that these kids can function in groups, therapy and group living situations." A 10-month investigation by this news organization has found that over the last decade nearly one of every four adolescents in California's foster care system received prescribed drugs, or 3½ times the rate for all adolescents nationwide. While children in the foster care system generally have a high rate of mental health problems, the side effects associated with psychotropics have caused alarm. Problems include obesity, diabetes, lethargy, persistent tics and increased depression. Though Hunter acknowledged that about 20 percent of children in Optimist facilities are given the drugs, he said that figure once was closer to 50 percent. "There's an awareness to try other things possible," Hunter said. "But if a kid really does have a clear ADHD diagnosis, I would honestly say that medications are helpful." Superior Court Judge Michael Nash, who has presided over Los Angeles County's Juvenile Court system since 1995, has worked for years to revolutionize the way medication is distributed to youths in the system. "We started looking at these medications eight to 10 years ago, and it's really been Judge Nash leading it," said Dr. Charles Sophy, medical director for the county Department of Children and Family Services (DCFS). "In Los Angeles County, we have 30,000 to 35,000 kids under our watch at any given time. Of that, we have 5,000 to 6,000 on meds at any one point, which is really not a lot." Under Nash's leadership, the DCFS has implemented a psychotropic medication authorization process to ensure that children in the system are closely monitored, Sophy said. Past problems with children receiving multiple prescriptions from multiple doctors as they moved among different foster homes have been ameliorated in recent years, but Sophy said he still struggles to find enough funding to provide needed therapy for foster children. "I've been implementing more one-on-ones with a behavioralist," Sophy said. "With the high cost of what they charge, I have to take it out of county money but what's the point (of treating children with mental health concerns) if we don't treat what they have? "A lot of people don't take the time because they're not paid to do it, but somebody needs to take it apart to understand it and treat it. We need trauma-focused kinds of treatment specifically based on the needs of these kids." Peggy Stewart, a clinical social worker at Children's Hospital Los Angeles and an adjunct professor at USC, said the biggest problem she encounters is a lack of quality foster homes in the county. Often, foster parents seek drugs to treat a child with behavioral issues before they are adequately diagnosed, she said. "When a child has a mental health diagnosis, there's a bigger government benefit attached to it, so it's almost to their advantage to have a foster child diagnosed with some sort of mental disorder," Stewart said. "We see a move toward getting children diagnosed with a mental disorder even if they might just have anger issues or are acting out and could be treated with therapy. There's also a tendency to overmedicate because we have a lack of good programming where therapy can be the treatment modality." Source: <http://www.whittierdailynews.com/health/20140823/los-angeles-county-caregivers-working-to-get-foster-kids-off-psychiatric-drugs> (HEAL Note: One HEAL volunteer was prescribed Depakote for depression in the 1980s. Before taking Depakote, their IQ was over 135. While on Depakote, it went down to 80. While 80 is still in the "normal" range, every 10 points is an intelligence grade. These medications stupefy and do not heal.)

'They've Got Him in This Corrupted Environment': Mother of Missouri Teen Held in Illinois Foster Care Blasts Neighborhood as Unsafe Aug. 24, 2014 8:15am Liz Klimas 176 Shares Email this story to a friend With a juvenile court judge denying a motion that could have sent home the Missouri teen being held in the Illinois foster care system after his parent was accused of medical child abuse, his mother is now speaking out against the school and community where her son is currently residing. "He's basically in the ghetto. He's in [an] environment he's not used to. I didn't realize how bad it was," Michelle Rider, the mother of 16-year-old Isaiah Rider, told TheBlaze, explaining that in supervised visits with her son he told her he has been exposed to marijuana and was jokingly shown a gun by a peer he met while living in a Chicago suburb with a foster family for the last few months. "He reported all this information to me and his case worker who was there." Isaiah Rider and his mother Michelle Rider. (Image source: Team Isaiah/Facebook) City-Data.com, a website that tracks various metrics like crime statistics based on what's available from the public record, lists Dolton, Illinois, which is south of Chicago and is where Isaiah's foster family lives, according to Isaiah's mother, as having "high" crime. Liberty, Missouri, where Michelle Rider lives, is rated as having "low" crime. Rider also pointed a finger at the school her son would attend if enrolled for the start of the fall semester. Image source: vixla/Flickr Thornridge High School, according to Great Schools, a website that rates academic institutions, is given a score of one out of 10 overall. Stanley High School in Kansas City, Missouri, the school Rider said her son would otherwise attend, on the same rating scale achieved an overall 8/10 score. "This has been going on for four months and I have not seen any ... there's not been any justice," Rider said of the situation, which began after she took her son to Lurie Children's Hospital in Chicago for surgery to remove tumors from his legs. "We've been waiting for them to do the right thing. It just seems like it's a very corrupt system." The Illinois Department of Children and Family Services told TheBlaze it could not comment on questions regarding the safety of foster families' neighborhoods or school conditions. When pressed with general questions about this topic, the spokeswoman said she was unable to comment because they were in relation to Isaiah's case. Isaiah, who has neurofibromatosis, and his mother visited multiple hospitals and doctors within the last year, looking for treatment for pain and uncontrollable tremors in a leg that he had partially amputated nearly two years ago. It was this hopping from hospital to hospital and other factors that led doctors at Lurie Children's to get state workers involved, accusing Rider of medical child abuse. The Chicago Tribune, earlier this summer, obtained a medical report that said Isaiah showed a "a clear pattern of patient improvement when the mother is not around, deterioration when mother is present and continued conflict regarding mother's insistence that only pharmacological means can be used to treat [the boy's] pain." "All attempts to ... have [the] mother voluntarily partner with us in [the boy's] care have been futile and met with resistance," the Tribune reported of one of the records. "In order to best develop a therapeutic medical plan for [the boy], we need to remove the mother from his care at the moment." Rider rejected at such accusations, saying she only wanted to get the right care for her son. Isaiah also told TheBlaze in an earlier interview that he doesn't understand why he was taken out of his mother's custody. Randy Kretchmar, Rider's attorney, argued in court last week that a federal law was violated in Isaiah's custody case, trying to convince the judge to grant a motion that would send Isaiah home. The Indian Child Welfare Act, which was passed in the late 1970s, "establishes burdens of proof that are higher than those applied in non-Native cases" to remove custody. The judge did not grant Kretchmar's motion, the lawyer said, because ICWA, at the time, did not envision the complexity of procedures that now currently exist in the child welfare system to take temporary custody, the lawyer said. "What the judge decided with regard to ICWA is that procedural standards do not apply to the initial temporary custody hearing," which is where Kretchmar argued the violation had occurred. A group of people gathered outside of the juvenile courthouse on August 11 to encourage the judge and DCFS to agree to send Isaiah Rider home. (Image source: Team Isaiah/Facebook) While Kretchmar said he thinks this decision could be appealed, he is working on other angles for their next court date on Sept. 19, which will include several witnesses for Rider and Isaiah's case. Ahead of this most recent hearing though, Kretchmar filed an emergency motion to have Isaiah removed from his current placement with the foster family in Illinois. The crux of his argument, Kretchmar told TheBlaze, was that Isaiah's environment in Dolton was "worse than any conceivable danger even if you find state's allegations [against his mother] credible. Get him out of there, give him back to Michelle, get it over with." The judge denied this emergency motion, but agreed to grant a second motion, which was a cease and desist for any DCFS workers to use their position to interfere with Rider's due process rights. Kretchmar accused a case worker of trying to discourage Rider from opposing some of the state's case against her and of trying to obtain information about her own legal strategy. "He's attempting to demoralize her," Kretchmar said of the alleged actions by the case worker. "It's an abuse of that position." Michelle and her 16-year-old son, Isaiah, who was removed from her custody four months ago when she was accused of medical child abuse. (Image source: Team Isaiah/Facebook) Kretchmar and Rider also said that the Missouri Department of Social Services conducted their own investigation and background checks into Rider and her family. "They are not in agreement with any of this. They have written up [a] report, saying they recommend Isaiah be returned to me at home," Rider told TheBlaze. The Missouri department did not return TheBlaze's request for confirmation or comment regarding their own investigation. Next month, a judge will begin hearing the reports of witnesses brought in on behalf of Rider and a case made by Illinois DCFS. A date is already set for another hearing in October, Kretchmar said, because it will likely take that much time to continue going through all the information in court. A document obtained by TheBlaze has DCFS asking that Rider comply with a mental health assessment, any therapy that might be recommended and a parenting assessment. The document ultimately states that DCFS's ultimate goal is for Isaiah to return home.

Source: <http://www.theblaze.com/stories/2014/08/24/theyve-got-him-in-this-corrupted-environment-mother-of-missouri-teen-held-in-illinois-foster-care-blasts-neighborhood-as-unsafe/>

Eight in Adoption Abuse Case Agree to $17.5 Million Settlement With Foster Agencies By BENJAMIN WEISER AUG. 27, 2014 Inside Continue reading the main story Continue reading the main story Continue reading the main story Continue reading the main story Share This Page email facebook twitter save more Continue reading the main story Continue reading the main story Eight young adults with disabilities who were fraudulently adopted by a Queens woman and subjected to years of abuse have agreed to a $17.5 million settlement of their lawsuit against three private New York foster care agencies that had placed them with the woman, a new court filing shows. The woman, Judith Leekin, 69, who adopted the children in the 1980s and '90s, was arrested in 2007 in Florida, where she had moved with them. She was later convicted of fraud and abuse charges and is serving a lengthy prison sentence. The case has long been seen as a horrific breakdown in the city's foster care system. The authorities said Ms. Leekin used false names to adopt 11 children — one disappeared while in her care and is presumed dead — and she collected $1.68 million in subsidies from New York that were intended for their care but went to support her own lavish lifestyle. Continue reading the main story Related Coverage 10-Year Sentence in Scheme to Bilk Adoption System JULY 16, 2008 New York City Settles Suit by Abused Foster Children DEC. 6, 2012 In December 2012, New York agreed to pay \$9.7 million to settle its portion of the 2009 lawsuit, including claims by two of the children; they had been placed with Ms. Leekin through a city-run adoption unit. The city denied liability in the case. The combined settlements in the case now total just over $27 million, including legal fees and costs. The children, most of whom are now in their 20s, had physical, emotional or developmental disabilities, including autism and blindness. In a January ruling that allowed the lawsuit against the private agencies to proceed, Judge Eric N. Vitaliano, of Federal District Court in Brooklyn, offered what he called "a glimpse of life in Leekin's house of horrors." "The story is undisputedly sad and tragic," the judge wrote, citing findings by Peg McCartt Hess, a former Columbia University social work professor who had been retained by the plaintiffs to review the cases. The judge said Ms. Leekin had routinely denied the children access to food and a toilet; handcuffed and restrained them for hours; trapped them in cribs that were held shut with boards and heavy objects; beat them with a belt, a nightstick and other objects; forced them to stand for hours, sometimes with their hands above their heads; failed to protect them from sexual abuse; and repeatedly threatened them with a gun or with being beaten to death. When they were removed from her care in 2007, only three could read (at a third-grade level), and six were declared either "totally incapacitated" or "vulnerable adults," the judge noted, citing Dr. Hess's findings. The latest settlement, detailed in the court filing on Monday, covers the eight children who were placed with Ms. Leekin by the private agencies. Judge Vitaliano must still approve the deal, which was reached in June with the assistance of a mediator, the filing said. A vast majority of the net proceeds, said Howard M. Talenfeld, a lawyer for the plaintiffs, will be paid through annuities or trusts "to ensure that these children will have the support and therapeutic services necessary to address the lifetime of challenges they face after surviving their appalling abuse by Judith Leekin." The private agencies that were defendants in the suit are HeartShare Human Services of New York, SCO Family of Services and the now-closed St. Joseph Services for Children and Families. The agencies denied liability. HeartShare said it "chooses not to make any comment" about the settlement, while SCO referred a reporter to the city's Administration for Children's Services, which oversees the foster care system. The two private agencies still have foster care contracts with the city. A Children's Services spokesman declined to comment on Wednesday, but when the city settled in 2012, the agency said, "There are much more sophisticated systems in place today that would never allow this kind of fraud to be perpetrated on the city or our children." Source: http://www.nytimes.com/2014/08/28/nyregion/eight-in-adoption-abuse-case-agree-to-17-5-million-settlement-with-foster-agencies.html?_r=0

Nurse charged with molesting foster baby By Kristina Davis 2:04 p.m. Aug. 27, 2014 Updated 5:51 p.m. Print Comments 16 Reddit 16 Comments SAN DIEGO — A pediatric nurse was charged Wednesday with sexual exploitation of a child after FBI agents found numerous videos and photographs of him repeatedly molesting a 2-month-old premature foster baby who had been placed in his care, authorities said. Booking photo of Micahel William Lutts FBI San Diego Share Photo Reddit Print Booking photo of Micahel William Lutts Michael William Lutts, 50, was arrested Tuesday after agents served a search warrant at his College Area home. The investigation began in April, when the FBI came across a person who was distributing child pornography and had apparently received images from Lutts' email account, according to the complaint filed in San Diego federal court. Agents learned Lutts, who worked as a pediatric nurse at Kaiser Permanente, was also a foster parent who began caring for a baby Aug. 4. An iPhone seized during Tuesday's search showed numerous videos and images of Lutts committing various sexual acts on the baby boy, apparently beginning on the first day he gained custody, court records say. One video showed the baby crying throughout the molestation, the FBI said. At one point, Lutts is seen urinating on the baby in a bathtub, the records say. Agents also seized numerous hard drives, computers and hundreds of CDs, which revealed several hundreds images and videos of child porn, the FBI said. Lutts pleaded not guilty in court Wednesday and will remain in jail until potential bail can be discussed at a hearing Friday. An official with the county's Health and Human Services Agency, which oversees the foster system, said he could not comment on Lutts' case because of the ongoing criminal investigation. He said potential foster parents go through a rigorous background investigation, including home visits, fingerprinting and a health report. Foster parents then must complete 27 hours of training. It was not known how long Lutts had been a foster parent or if he cared for any other children previously. Kaiser Permanente officials said there is no indication from law enforcement at this time that patients were involved, and that they are fully cooperating with the investigation. Lutts will not be returning to work while the criminal case is underway, the officials said. "We hold sacred the trust our patients place in Kaiser Permanente. We will not tolerate any employee or physician abusing that trust," Kaiser officials said in a statement. State nursing board records show Lutts was licensed in 2002 and has no disciplinary action on his record. The FBI is asking anyone with information on the case or about any potential victims to call investigators at (858) 320-1800. Source: <http://www.utsandiego.com/news/2014/aug/27/nurse-charged-molest-foster-baby-child-porn/>

Nashville youth detention centre had troubled history prior to mass escape Eight teenagers still at large after 32 managed to escape Woodland Hills, the latest scandal to hit the beleaguered facility Share 38 inShare0 Email Amanda Holpuch in New York theguardian.com, Tuesday 2 September 2014 14.15 EDT Jump to comments \(8\) n. Thirty-two teens escaped from the youth detention center by crawling through a weak spot in a fence. Photograph: Mark Humphrey/AP A Nashville detention center, from which nearly half of the inmates escaped on Monday night, has a troubled history that includes allegations of sexual abuse and a wrongful death lawsuit. Eight teenagers were still at large on Tuesday, after 32 youngsters got into the yard at Woodland Hills Youth Development Center late on Monday, then escaped through a weak spot in the facility's fence. This breakout is the latest blemish for Woodland Hills Youth Development Center and the beleaguered agency that operates it — Tennessee's department of children's services (DCS). Woodland Hills, which holds 78 teen boys between the ages of 14 and 19, has in recent years been the subject of a wrongful death lawsuit, sex abuse allegations and a smaller breakout attempt earlier this year. "Right now, it's not clear if this is a clear breakout, or if some kids just saw the opportunity to do something and did it rashly," DCS spokesman Rob Johnson told the Guardian. Tennessee highway patrol and metro police helped the department of children's services (DCS) with the round-up, as did some of the escaped teens' parents, who turned their children in. Johnson said internal affairs is looking into the circumstances of the breakout. Six or seven teenagers broke out of their bedrooms in May before staffers convinced them to return to their rooms. In May 2013, Nashville news station WSMV published videos and photos of Woodland Hills guards sleeping on the job. Tennessee agreed to pay a $250,000 settlement in May for a wrongful death lawsuit brought by the father of Kendall Oates, an 18-year-old who died in May 2012. Oates suffered from a seizure disorder and may have lain sick or dead in his room for hours before security noticed him, according to an investigation into the facility by The Tennessean. A 2010 investigation by the paper showed that sex abuse allegations have plagued the facility, which had some of the highest rates of sexual victimization of any US juvenile center, according to a Department of Justice 2010 report. State lawmakers wrote a scathing audit of the DCS in January, though new head Jim Henry insists the agency is making tremendous progress since the former commissioner, Kate O'Day, resigned in a wash of controversy. Attorney Everette Parrish has represented youngsters at Woodland Hills, as well as the state's other two youth development centers, in constitutional and civil rights cases since 2008. Parrish believes DCS needs more resources to improve the juvenile justice system and said the agency is doing all it can to provide treatment and security for the teenagers. "I know what the problem is. It is the guards, and the structure in which the guards are either not trained or insufficient or not attentive — not aware," said Parrish. "That's obvious, it doesn't take an attorney to figure that out. They are not mistreated in the center. If they were, that's what I hear about and what I address." He said that the decades-old facility should have known how to keep kids secure in the facility. "Here are the facts: if you want to improve the system, give DCS more resources," said Parrish. Woodland Hills is a level four facility, the highest level of security possible for juveniles besides adult prison or jail. Laurence Steinberg, author of Age of Opportunity: Lessons from the New Science of Adolescence and a psychology professor at Temple University, said in an email that adolescents are more more focused on the immediate potential rewards of things like an escape and are less likely to think about the long-term consequences of such an act. “I think, based on our research on risky decision-making, that adolescents would generate a much shorter list of possible risks than adults would, so their assessment is more likely to be incomplete,” Steinberg said. “Adolescents also make decisions more impulsively, so they probably would not spend as much time thinking through the risks and, more important, thinking about how best to avoid them.” Source: <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/sep/02/nashville-mass-escape-youth-center-troubled-history>

On My Son's First Day of Kindergarten: OurSchoolsAreNotFailing.org organizes communities to defend their schools from NCLB By I AM AN EDUCATOR on September 3, 2014 Today is the first day of school in Seattle. I have never been more excited and nervous for the first day because, not only do I start teaching, but my 5-year-old starts kindergarten! My son is so thrilled for his first day of school and our family feels so fortunate to have such a wonderful public school to send him to. Unfortunately, the irreparably flawed No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB) has cast a shadow on what should be a joyous start to the year. As explained below, Secretary of Education Arne Duncan revoked the NCLB waiver for Washington state because our legislature would not tie teacher evaluations to test scores. Revoking the NCLB waiver then labeled nearly every school in the state a failure and mandated that districts notify parents that their child attends a failing school. My son's school is not a failure. The school where I teach is not a failure. It is the test-and-punish policy of NCLB that is failing. Thankfully, a new initiative from parents, students, educators, and community members has formed to stand up to Arne Duncan's bullying of our schools called OurSchoolsAreNotFailing.org. Be sure to sign the petition in support Washington state's schools, share your story on the website about the great work that occurs in your school, and read the following statement from the OurSchoolsAreNotFailing.org website: Our Schools Are Not Failing: NCLB is Failing Us This year, most school districts across Washington state were forced by Secretary Arne Duncan's selective enforcement of the No Child Left Behind Act to send letters to all parents that labeled our schools as failures. We are parents, teachers, students and community members who reject this label that has been placed on our schools. We know that our schools are not failures. In fact, our schools' accomplishments have been remarkable, especially given the deeply flawed policy imposed on them by the federal No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB). While there are certainly changes needed for our schools—many due to the legacy of racism, class inequality, and lack of equitable funding for our schools—we believe that those changes should be directed by communities that make up local school districts, not from top-down mandates. This website will share stories and testimonials about the great things that are happening in our schools that should be supported and connect our communities so that we can organize opposition to Arne Duncan's policies and No Child Left Behind. According to NCLB, our schools should have had 100% of students test at proficient levels in reading and math by 2014. No county, no state, and no school district has ever achieved 100% proficiency on standardized tests and, in fact, the way the tests are designed make it statistically impossible to achieve that goal. Washington, like many other states, originally had a waiver in place that would have exempted it from this absurd NCLB mandate. However, when the state legislature refused to pass bills tying teacher evaluations to test scores (following overwhelming evidence that this would not improve teaching or learning), Arne Duncan chose to punish Washington state by revoking the waiver. With the waiver gone, nearly all of Washington's schools have been labeled failures, we may lose control of millions of dollars in federal money, and some schools will be at risk of state takeovers and mass layoffs of teachers. This kind of political game-playing has no place in our schools. Our schools and teachers should not be labeled as failures simply because we have rejected extremely flawed education policies. In August 2014, 28 school superintendents from around the state authored a letter criticizing No Child Left Behind and declaring that their schools' successes are not reflected in these ratings. We agree. It's time for the voices of parents, teachers and students to be heard and respected. If you have a story to share about why your school is not a failure, tell us here. Also, sign our petition to reinstate the NCLB waiver for Washington state. Source: <http://iamaneducator.com/2014/09/03/on-my-sons-first-day-of-kindergarten-ourschoolsarenofailing-org-organizes-communities-to-defend-their-schools-from-nclb/>

The Education Conversation 'Reformers' Want Versus The One They Get What will $12 million get you? How about a “conversation about education?” That's what a new organization Education Post aims to get for its “initial grants,” courtesy of, according to education reporter Lindsay Layton of The Washington Post, “the Broad Foundation, Bloomberg Philanthropies, the Walton Family Foundation, and an anonymous donor.” In a debut post, the organization's leader Peter Cunningham — a former “communications guru,” according to Layton, for U.S. Education Secretary Arne Duncan — called for a “new conversation.” That “new conversation” Cunningham wants, is less “screaming at each other from across the aisle ... an honest, open conversation ... based on the facts.” Layton also quoted Bruce Reed — former chief executive of the Democratic Leadership Council and now president of the Broad Foundation that “originated” the new site — who said the idea for Education Post came from “a shared disappointment in the tenor of the debate.” Education Post is not being terribly original here. Recent calls for more “civility” in discussions about education and for taking “the politics” and “partisanship” out of policy debates are suddenly all the rage among the edu-policy crowd gravitating around Washington, D.C. There are reasons why Beltway-inspired education wonks are calling out the tone police — but it's got very little to do with honesty and “facts.” Instead, read a little more deeply into these calls for taking “the politics” out of the debate, and what you find is itself a rather political agenda. Bipartisan Banality Echoing the Education Post's zeal for making nice over differences on education policy, two right-wing think tank operatives who have differed in public over the Common Core Standards recently declared their determination to overcome the acrimony of that debate. Writing in The Washington Times, Mike Petrilli of the Thomas B. Fordham Institute and Neal McCluskey of the Cato Institute's Center for Educational Freedom endeavored to lay out “the facts on which we think everyone should agree.” Looking past the hubris of a claim to overcome differences that include only those held by conservatives, their facts are “technically” — a word they use in describing the process used to adopt the “voluntary” standards — true. Yet the facts they put forth are very carefully chosen, ignoring, for instance, the fact that the standards are by-and-large a product of the testing industry, without much influence from educators and parents. From another conservative corner, columnist Juan Williams, writing for The Hill, came the similar call for “getting beyond the tired old fights” in education policy. His preference was to declare a “crisis in the nation's schools” and steel political leaders to direct federal money to school voucher programs and do something about all those “bad teachers” that plague the system. Unfortunately for Williams, his arguments happen to be the oldest and “tireddest” of all. School vouchers, Greg Anrig has reminded us, were originally conceived by the economist Milton Friedman in 1955 and have been a cornerstone of Republican education policy since the presidential administration of Ronald Reagan. And education journalist Dana Goldstein, in her new book The Teacher Wars: A History of America's Most Embattled Profession, reminds us that as far back as the early 1800s, “the history of education reform shows ... recurring attacks on veteran educators.” In his review of Goldstein's book appearing in The Atlantic, Noah Berlatsky equated current calls for weeding out America's “bad teachers” Reagan-era claims about a scourge of “welfare queens.” He wrote, “If welfare mothers are the cause of poverty, then you can solve the problem of poverty with tighter restrictions on welfare mothers. If teachers are the problem with education, then you can solve the problem of education with ever more vigorous control, and ever more constant evaluation, of teachers.” (Interestingly, Williams also conflates vouchers and teacher tenure with renewing No Child Left Behind, which has nothing to do with either of those issues.) Outside of conservative circles (sort of), former press secretary for the Clinton White House, Mike McCurry recently lamented “an American political system ripped apart by partisanship.” The salve to apply to the bitterness — indeed, “the antidote to the poison that's now invaded our political system” — McCurry believes is to rally around the “the school choice movement.” Interestingly, McCurry's remarks were carried by a conservative education policy outlet RefinedED, illustrating the absurdity of calls for consensus between right and left on education policy that is absent of any representation from what is truly “left.” “The school choice movement's appeal to all points on the political spectrum is a source of pride, McCurry said. The movement needs to continue doing the hard work of making the center hold, of putting aside differences on other issues to find common ground on kids and education.” No doubt, McCurry has not been to Newark, N.J. lately where a new plan for district wide “school choice” is not being opposed by “partisanship,” but by the parents and students in that community. In a similar vein, New America's Conor William, writing at the online news outlet The Daily Beast, recently hailed the achievement of charter schools, no doubt part of the “bipartisan” composition of the “school choice movement.” Noting that three charter schools were in the top echelon of an annual ranking of best performing American high schools, Williams declared there was “growing evidence — borne out by this year's rankings — that the charter approach can make an extraordinary difference for students.” Williams may want to look a little more deeply to notice that the charter schools he recommended for the rest of America have “student bodies that are disproportionately affluent and white.” They also experience very high student attrition and graduate very small numbers of students. The Outsiders Want To Be Heard In an attempt to clarify the standoff over education policy, Rick Hess from the American Enterprise Institute (yet another conservative Beltway think tank) recently wrote that the divide over education policy was between two easily delineated factions that are bent on “reform.” On the one hand, you had “progressive” reformers who “have historically been wedded to a technocratic vision ... and a belief that the right policies and programs can cure society's ills." And on the other hand, there are "conservative" reformers who "respect the limits of government." In this mutually held "reform" agenda, the "points of traditional agreement" – charter schools, incentivizing/ punishing teachers, Teach For America, and so forth – seem unchangeable, while oppositional lines are drawn only over the issues of "means and ends." This analysis may all be well and true. It just leaves out the vast majority of Americans. Surveys show that what Americans have a problem with are more than just issues of means and ends of "reform." They're increasingly disturbed by what's being posed to them as "reform" altogether. What Hess described is really just a view from the "inside" of the debate. Now the "outsiders" want to be heard. Score One For The Education Spring The tables didn't start turning just last week. Let's go back in time to a white, hot moment that illustrates what's really happening today. It was June 2011. It was Madison, Wisconsin. Republican legislators had come prepared to ram through a radical education agenda that included taking away teachers' collective bargaining rights, rolling out Milwaukee's deeply flawed voucher program to the rest of the state, expanding charter schools, and drastically cutting public school budgets. At the time, teachers were clamoring from the state house rafters, parents and students pitched tents and carried signs in protest to what was befalling their communities, and public school activists were banging drums of resistance to seeing the common good stolen away from them. What did the "insiders" think then? At the time, a field operative for the Democrats for Education Reform observed that the "worst part" of the conflagration was not the drastic harm being done to Wisconsin communities and their school children. No, the "worst part" was the "fall of bipartisanship on education." That bipartisanship, I wrote at the time, consisted chiefly of declaring education "a crisis, blame the teachers, bring in the privatizers, and muster financial backing from Wall St. to push it through." What's changed since then is that the Wisconsin stirrings erupted into an Education Spring sweeping the nation, and the voices of those on the outside, who reject the education bipartisan agenda crafted by insiders, have increased in volume and intensity. The outsiders are now becoming more organized too and have started to reach into the confines of Beltway think tanks and foundation boardrooms. Recently, the group Democrats for Public Education formed to counter the weak complicity represented by Democrats for Education Reform and other groups whose views completely fail to include the progressive majority. One of that group's chief leaders, Democratic Party strategist Donna Brazile, decried those "under the guise of 'education reform,' undermining America's public schools." In sharp contrast to the insider consensus that has ruled education policy for years, Brazile observed "Here's what dedicated parents and seasoned educators all across the country see: stalled reform efforts, poor implementation of programs, and nervous students spending 30 percent of their school year on test preparation. By speaking out about this troubling pattern, teachers are exemplifying what it truly means to be answerable to and responsible for the well-being of children..." No one benefits when 'education experts' – many with only a couple years in the classroom and some with none at all – tell teachers that their expertise doesn't matter and they don't have the best interests of children at heart. When you peel back the onion, it's clear these well-orchestrated attacks are coming from nothing more than a few well-funded, vocal groups intent on cherry-picking statistics and warping facts." She concluded, "Enough is enough. It's time we collectively push back against efforts to undermine America's education system, our teachers, and the kids themselves." This may not be the education conversation the reformers want. But it's the one they're going to get. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/the-education-conversation-reformers-want-versus-the-one-they-get/>

Former group home employee pleads no contest to sex abuse Print Font [\[+\]](#) [\[-\]](#) Leave a comment > By Pat Reavy, Deseret News Published: Thursday, Sept. 4 2014 8:10 p.m. MDT Updated: yesterday A former employee at a group home for troubled teens pleaded no contest Thursday to multiple counts of abusing a 14-year-old girl. Shutterstock Sat Sep 06 19:32:14 2014 SPANISH FORK — A former employee at a group home for troubled teens pleaded no contest Thursday to multiple counts of abusing a 14-year-old girl. Wade Russell, 60, pleaded no contest to 12 counts of forcible sexual abuse, all second-degree felonies. Each count carries a potential sentence of one to 15 years in prison. Russell was scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 16. By pleading no contest, Russell avoids a six-day trial that was scheduled to begin at the end of the month. Russell worked for Extended Family Services, which houses troubled teens who are in the custody of the state, according to court documents. Between February and November of 2013, Russell inappropriately touched a 14-year-old girl on at least 12 different occasions, according to court documents. As part of the plea deal, Russell acknowledged in court records, "I know that if I enter a no contest plea, a judgment of conviction will be entered by the court and I will be sentenced the same as if I had entered a guilty plea." — Pat Reavy Source: <http://www.deseretnews.com/article/865610265/Former-group-home-employee-pleads-no-contest-to-sex-abuse.html>

Mass escape, violence at juvenile jail leading to review by Department of Children's Services Article by: LUCAS L. JOHNSON II, Associated Press Updated: September 4, 2014 - 5:05 PM 0 comments resize text print buy reprints Share! NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Despite its idyllic-sounding name, the Woodland Hills Youth Development Center had seen a decade of violent clashes, breakout attempts and attacks on guards. Then, on Monday night, 32 teens escaped. Just two days later, two dozen detainees broke into the yard wielding sticks and spraying a fire extinguisher. The problems shed light on the difficulty of maintaining order at a center where most of the 14- to 19-year-olds have committed at least three felonies, and the challenges faced by Tennessee's Department of Children's Services in trying to fix the issues. In an interview Thursday, DCS Commissioner Jim Henry said policies will be reviewed to see if guards could be given weapons such as stun guns to help control unruly detainees. Currently, guards do not carry weapons and must rely on talking with the inmates to quell disturbances. Henry also said parts of the facility's structure are being looked at, and officials will try to figure out how to better help detainees who suffer from mental illness or drug addiction. Despite being perceived as tough, most of the youths are "damaged when they come to us ... They're angry." "What we're going to go less to is a correctional mentality," said Henry, who plans to give a report to Gov. Bill Haslam next week. However, some lawmakers say that's not enough. They want Haslam to reopen a facility closed in 2012, Taft Youth Development Center, which primarily housed older, more violent offenders. The inmates there were transferred to Woodland Hills, which then saw a spike in assaults. In a letter to Henry, some state lawmakers said they felt "very confident if Taft was still open, these incidents would not have happened." Republican state Rep. Cameron Sexton said the Taft facility was better equipped to handle problem cases and its staff more experienced and better trained. "We always thought it was a bad idea to put these more violent offenders back in general population with younger offenders," he said. Between July and September of 2012, police had to be called at least 47 times for assistance, which surpassed total police visits for the previous two years combined. Among the acts of violence listed in police records is a guard trapped in a headlock and repeatedly punched by a young man. Another assault involved four youths ambushing a staff member and beating him until he was rescued by colleagues. In 2010, the U.S. Department of Justice ranked Woodland Hills as 13th in the country among juvenile facilities with reports of sexual abuse by staffers. In a 2004 breakout attempt, more than a dozen teens armed with broom handles and hurling bricks injured 16 staffers before they were dispersed by police in riot gear. Everett Parrish, an appointed attorney for juveniles housed at Woodland Hills, said the state had dialed back the population at Woodland Hills from 140 to 80 this year because of a shortage of guards. "That was a good example of DCS responding in a way they could control the kids — so they thought," he said. Instead, some teens at the facility found ways to exploit security flaws, he said. Parrish also noted the unarmed guards are not trained to be aggressive. "To me that's a good thing. It keeps the kids out of harm," Parrish said. Officials are considering improvements to the facility itself. In this week's violence, inmates kicked through foam panels surrounded by metal to get into the yard. Those may be replaced with solid metal panels, Henry said. Furthermore, Henry said, officials may rethink allowing teens free access to common areas. According to officials, the 32 teens who escaped Woodland Hills on Monday found a weak spot in the fence surrounding the yard and broke out. Six remained at large Thursday. Wednesday night, about 24 teens — some of whom were part of the breakout — reached the yard. This time, police formed a ring around the center's fence, and no one escaped. Video showed teens chasing and assaulting a man who appeared to be a staff member. Ten ringleaders were brought to another detention center in Rutherford County for questioning, Department of Children's Services spokesman Rob Johnson said. The rest were returned to their dorms. People who live nearby are hoping for swift changes to head off further problems. "It's kind of scary to wake up to helicopters flying over your house," said Nichole Sherman, who lives about a mile from the facility with her two children. "Something major has to change," she said. "This is the second time in a week. That's ridiculous. And to be a parent, that's scary." Source: <http://www.startribune.com/nation/273893571.html?page=1&c=y>

Owatonna woman's family child care, foster care licenses revoked after infant death Story Comments Share Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Posted: Thursday, August 28, 2014 5:30 pm | Updated: 9:57 pm, Thu Aug 28, 2014. Owatonna woman's family child care, foster care licenses revoked after infant death By ASHLEY STEWART astewart@owatonna.com Southernminn Posted on Aug 28, 2014 by ASHLEY STEWART OWATONNA — An Owatonna woman's child foster care and family child care licenses have been revoked by the Minnesota Department of Human Services after an infant death occurred in her home last November. According to documents from the Department of Human Services, Joleen Anderson of Owatonna was found responsible for serious maltreatment or neglect of a child after Steele County Human Services, Rice County Social Services and law enforcement investigated an incident last year. The documents state that on Nov. 15, 2013, Anderson placed an infant on its stomach with a blanket in a mesh-sided crib with a sheet that wasn't tight-fitting. She then left the infant on the lower level of the home and went to the upper level, and left the infant's supervision to another individual for about 15 minutes. When Anderson went to wake the infant about 30 minutes later, she found it face down and unresponsive. Anderson immediately began CPR and called 911, but emergency responders were unable to resuscitate the infant, and the child died. Rice County Human Services determined Anderson failed to follow Sudden Unexpected Infant Death (SUID) reduction requirements when she placed the infant on its stomach in the crib, and she left the infant in the care of another individual, who was not an approved caregiver and didn't have SUID and Abusive Head Trauma (AHT) training as required, the documents said. On Nov. 18, 2013, the Commissioner of the Department of Human Services determined that the health, safety and rights of children in Anderson's care were in "imminent risk of harm," and her family child care and child foster care licenses were immediately suspended temporarily. But because of these violations, the Department of Human Services revoked Anderson's family child care license as well as her child foster care license — a license she shared with her husband, Michael — on Aug. 20. Attempts to reach the Andersons for comment were unsuccessful. Karen Smigielski, a spokesperson with the Minnesota Department of Human Services, said Joleen Anderson was licensed for family child care in November 2003 and licensed for child foster care in November 2010. Smigielski said the Andersons have 10 days to appeal the license revocations. However, if they don't, they will be disqualified from receiving licenses for seven years under state law. But Anderson also has charges pending against her in Steele County District Court. In June, Anderson was indicted by a grand jury in court on charges of child endangerment, including one gross misdemeanor and one felony. Because of the indictment, details on the proceeding are sealed. Smigielski said if Anderson is convicted at the felony level, she would be disqualified from receiving child foster care and family child care licenses for 15 years, and if convicted at the gross-misdemeanor level, she will be disqualified for 10 years. She added it is possible that the Andersons could be licensed again in the future, but it isn't likely. In an unrelated case in Steele County, the Minnesota Department of Human Services completed an investigation of Steven and Rita Dornquast Adult Foster Care in Owatonna and concluded neglect of an individual by staff and the facility. According to a document from the Department of Human Services, on June 21 a "vulnerable adult" left the Dornquasts' facility without supervision and was gone for about two hours before he or she was found by a community member who called 911. Although facility staff weren't disqualified as a result of the maltreatment determination, the Dornquasts were fined $1,000. Reach reporter Ashley Stewart at 444-2378 or follow her on Twitter.com @OPPashley

Source: http://www.southernminn.com/owatonna_peoples_press/news/article_3316e0eb-d726-5993-8832-2af22928fb43.html

DOC plans to close Camp Summit Boot Camp Story Comments Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size 2 Posted: Friday, August 29, 2014 6:02 pm DOC plans to close Camp Summit Boot Camp STAFF REPORTS TheNewsDispatch.com | 0 comments La PORTE — The Indiana Department of Correction has announced plans to close Camp Summit Boot Camp, 2407 North 500 West, La Porte, due to the continuous decline in the IDOC's youth population. With plans to close on or about Oct. 1, the 72 youth currently housed at Camp Summit will be transitioned to community-based programs or other IDOC juvenile facilities. Those not scheduled for release will be move to Logansport or Pendleton Juvenile Correction Facilities, where there is reportedly bed capacity available. To continue the boot camp model, Pendleton Juvenile plans to expand the facility's current Future Soldiers Program, a paramilitary program that prepares youth as potential military recruits by teaching good citizenship leadership, self-reliance and responsibility. Since 2009, when the IDOC Division of Youth Services was created, it has utilized national best practices to improve treatment and services to youth in IDOC care, resulting in the reduction of the number of youth being held in Indiana's juvenile correctional facilities. "Due to efforts of our youth services staff, at-risk youth are spending less time in prison and are returning to community programs as quickly as possible to reunite them with their families and provide them with the support they need to be responsible citizens," IDOC Commissioner Bruce Lemmon said. "This move will enable our youth services staff to better serve the youth in our care, while making more efficient use of taxpayer dollars," he said. State Rep. Scott Pelath, D-Michigan City, issued a statement regarding the closing of this facility. Included in his statement was a letter he addressed to Gov. Mike Pence's office stating the facility should remain open. Pelath's primary concerns were the loss of jobs and the loss of services for Indiana youth. "(Pence and his administration) want to eliminate 70 La Porte County jobs in the service of their increasingly bloated budget surplus," Pelath said. "If they follow through on this threat, it marks the latest indication that people and jobs don't matter as much as politically crafted financial statements." Approximately 50 employees will have the opportunity to transfer to other facilities or apply for vacant positions throughout the department following the closing of Camp Summit. The IDOC is working closely with the State Personnel Department to find placement options and minimize the impact on staff. "Our goal is continued state employment for every affected worker," Lemmon said. Pelath, the House minority leader, also voiced his concern about the impact closing Camp Summit would have on the youth in the state. "(The idea to close Camp Summit) would be particularly crazy because the state is shuttering a program that has a demonstrated impact in turning around the lives of troubled youths," he said. "At any time at Camp Summit, close to 100 youth across Indiana have the chance to resume their education, receive counseling and gain the skills that will enable them to return to society and care for themselves." Opening in 1995 on 60 acres between La Porte and Michigan City, Camp Summit is Indiana's only paramilitary style boot camp that blends military components with a programs approach that addresses the needs of adolescents and affords the best possible environment for change and growth. Source: http://www.thenewsdispatch.com/news/article_95aa30d6-2fd0-11e4-b415-001a4bcf887a.html

Prosecutor: Idaho worried about money before releasing FLDS boys Polygamy » The state wanted to send them home to save on foster care, prosecutor says. By nate carlisle | The Salt Lake Tribune First Published Sep 01 2014 01:01 am • Last Updated Sep 01 2014 04:53 pm The agency responsible for child protection in Idaho wanted to send eight boys from the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints home with their parents to save the state money, a prosecutor said last week. Ian Service, a deputy Bannock County prosecutor, said he wanted the boys to remain in foster care. Tweet Photos View photo gallery \(10 photos\) Join the Discussion Post a Comment The disagreement was so great, Service said, that the Idaho Attorney General's Office petitioned to join the juvenile court case and represent the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare. Normally, Service said, the county prosecutor would represent the department. A deputy attorney general later said he would appeal any ruling keeping the boys in foster care, Service said. "It's the first case in my career where I had such a juxtaposition between the county and the state," Service said. A judge returned six of the boys to parents earlier this month. Two boys remain in foster care because they did not want to return to their mother or the FLDS, a polygamous sect. Service said money was discussed from the day a judge granted a petition to remove the boys from the home of an FLDS caretaker in Pocatello. Service said he and a social worker were with police at the home. The social worker "was like, 'Where am I going to place these kids? And my boss is going to throw a fit about the costs,'" Service said. Health and Welfare and law enforcement removed eight boys from the Pocatello home on July 10. A sheriff's report indicates their ages ranged from 12 to 17. A ninth boy had been living there but was not located. At a hearing on Aug. 11, a judge dismissed the custody cases for six of the boys, ordering two teenagers to remain in state custody. Source: <http://www.sltrib.com/sltrib/news/58351926-78/service-parents-health-welfare.html.csp>

Allegheny County puts on campaign for more foster parents September 1, 2014 12:00 AM John Heller/Post-Gazette Foster mom Wendy Stephens talks about foster care at Pressley Ridge. Share with others: 16 inShare By Kaitlynn Riely / Pittsburgh Post-Gazette More than two years ago, a teenager arrived at the Knoxville home of Wendy and Mary Ann Stephens, two sisters who took him in as a foster child. He called them Ms. Wendy and Ms. Mae. A year later, he asked if he could call them his aunts. "He said, '[you] are my extended family,'" Wendy Stephens said. "That really touched me, how he said it." The teenager, who now is 16 and whose biological mother requested that he not be named in this story, said he plans to take the Stephens name as his middle name when he becomes an adult. "Even though I call them aunts, I do consider them moms," he said. In Allegheny County, there is a need for more people to fill the role of foster parents to teenagers. In July, the county Department of Human Services issued a request for proposals to develop a marketing and public relations campaign to increase foster care awareness and to recruit potential foster parents for children ages 14 to 17. The department expects to award a contract not to exceed $60,000 later this fall, with an estimated start date of early 2015. "We don't have enough foster families stepping forward willing to work with teens," said Katie Stoehr, manager of program operations for the Office of Children, Youth and Families within Human Services. There are about 1,400 Allegheny County children in the foster care system, according to county Human Services data. More than half of the children and teens in the foster care system are placed with a relative who is licensed to be their foster parent; others are placed with non-relatives who have undergone foster-parent training. There are more than 200 children and teens in congregate care such as a group home for youth. That's the number the county wants to see reduced. According to county figures, 169 of the children in congregate care are 15 or older, with 60 children ages 12-14 and just 16 younger than 11. "There has been some research in recent years that shows there's no real benefit to being placed in a congregate, as opposed to a family setting," Ms. Stoehr said. The county is interested, instead, in placing children with families. "Children really do better, on the whole, when they are able to live with a family," she said. Foster parents come from "all walks of life," Ms. Stoehr said. Some are empty nesters who want to have children in their home again. Some want to add more children to the family they have. Some can't have children but still want to take on a parental role. Others are fostering because they want to give back to their community. Foster families usually take care of children who are no longer able to live in their biological family homes, often for reasons of neglect. The goal is always to reunify children with their families. If that's not possible, adoptions can be pursued, with the foster family or others. The average length of time a child stays with a foster family is nine months, according to county figures. During that time, foster parents, who receive a stipend, take on the typical duties of parents, such as taking them to the doctor, making sure they are involved in activities. Many children in the foster care system have gone through a traumatic experience, and foster parents also might have to be involved in ensuring they receive mental health care. Foster parents receive training through organizations such as Pressley Ridge, which offers treatment foster care and adoption services. As for what the marketing campaign to recruit more people as foster parents will look like, the county is not yet sure. Typically, the most effective recruitment method is to find someone the young person already knows and see if that person is willing to be a foster parent, Ms. Stoehr said. The public relations drive about foster parenting, once it gets underway, will most likely focus on a targeted campaign to interested populations rather than serve as a general public service announcement, she said. Foster parents also are often the "best ambassadors" in finding new people to sign up, said Ms. Stoehr. For Mary Ann and Wendy Stephens, foster parenting runs in the family. Mary Ann Stephens, who is retired from her nearly 40-year career at BNY Mellon, and Wendy Stephens, a clinic coordinator for the Kane Regional Center at Glen Hazel, have been foster parents for more than 20 years. Both are single and without biological children, though between them they've been foster parents to 15 children. Their sister, Elva Dorsey, who lives near them in Knoxville, also is a longtime foster parent. The sisters grew up in South Fayette, part of a family that included a mother, a father and 16 children. Their positive family experience contributed to their decisions to become foster parents. "I got to think about how fortunate we were growing up, having both our families," Wendy Stephens said. She decided to become a foster parent, like her sisters, because she wanted to give children in less happy homes good memories. One afternoon last week, the Stephens sisters and the 16-year-old foster child met at Pressley Ridge's Perry South office. The organization offers treatment foster care and adoption services. It was through Pressley Ridge that Wendy Stephens became foster parent to the teenager, whom the county Office of Children, Youth and Families removed from his home due to concerns about economic hardship, according to Rhonda Sullivan, program director for Pressley Ridge. Although Wendy Stephens is his primary foster parent, all three sisters are involved in his life, especially Mary Ann Stephens, who lives with her sister. Being a foster parent has not always been easy, the three sisters each said. The teenage years are particularly difficult and require a strong person as a foster parent, Wendy Stephens said. Both women said the experience has been worth the trials. It's brought them a lot of joy, Wendy Stephens said. "It was worth it, all the sleepless nights I went through," said Wendy Stephens, about a foster child who was particularly difficult but with whom she still keeps in touch several years later. As for the teenage boy, all three sisters spoke fondly of him. "He's just exceptional," Mary Ann Stephens said. "He's smart. He's witty. He respects us." The teenager, who is starting his freshman year of high school, said he is happy. He hopes to attend Carnegie Mellon University then work in cyber security. He wants to get married, have children and to be a good father, and he wants to "help these two out," he said, gesturing to Wendy and Mary Ann Stephens, "and help my mom." "Not every teen is going to be bad," he said, referring to teenagers in the foster care system. "There are some really good teens out there who just want homes, who just want people to love them." Kaitlynn Riely: kriely@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1707. Read more: <http://www.post-gazette.com/local/city/2014/09/01/County-puts-on-campaign-for-more-foster-parents/stories/201409020026#ixzz3Cgj53RML>

STUDY: LGBT Youth Face Worse Treatment in Foster Care Than Peers A new study discovers that LGBT youth face twice as much mistreatment in the foster care system as do their non-LGBT peers. BY Mitch Kellaway September 03 2014 4:10 PM ET 16 According to a new study, LGBT children are, on average, twice as likely as their non-queer peers to report being treated poorly in the Los Angeles foster care system, reports the Los Angeles Times. The findings and research method employed by fellows at the Williams Institute, based at the University of California Los Angeles, may help other cities conduct similar research on an issue that L.A. officials say is largely overlooked. "People refer to it as the 'dirty little secret' that there are so many LGBTQ kids in foster care," Lorri L. Jean, chief executive of the Los Angeles LGBT Center, told the Times. "But nobody's been able to document it." The Williams Institute study also found that LGBT adoptees experienced more foster placements, were more likely to live in a group home, and were hospitalized for emotional reasons three times more often than peers. Despite overrepresentation in state systems — comprising an estimated averaging 19 percent of Los Angeles' foster care population — LGBT youth remain largely "invisible," according to the study's authors. Social workers often wait for children to initiate discussions about their own sexuality or gender identity because they are unsure of how to protect the child's privacy, notes the Times. Furthermore, many LGBT youth do not feel safe coming out to their foster parents. In addition, the study notes, 83 percent of adoptees in the Los Angeles foster care system are black or Latino. Youth of color who are also LGBT face added discrimination, researchers said. Source: <http://www.advocate.com/youth/2014/09/03/study-lgbt-youth-face-worse-treatment-foster-care-peers>

No contest plea entered by former group home employee in sex abuse case No contest plea entered by former group home employee in sex abuse case Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email » Wade Russell Daily Russell 2014-09-05T12:25:00Z 2014-09-05T20:35:10Z No contest plea entered by former group home employee in sex abuse case Billy Hesterman Daily Herald September 05, 2014 12:25 pm • Billy Hesterman Daily Herald \(3\) Comments Trial date set for man accused of sexually abusing teens at group home PROVO -- A trial date has been set for a man accused of sexually abusing two teen girls at a group home for troubled youth in Spanish Fork. Read more Man accused of sexually abusing teens at group home bound over for trial PROVO -- A man accused of sexually abusing two teens at a group home for troubled youth in Spanish Fork has been bound over for trial. Read more A former employee at a Spanish Fork group home for troubled youth has pleaded no contest to 12 counts of forcible sexual abuse. Wade Russell, 60, entered the motion Thursday with the Fourth District Court, which resulted in the cancellation of his jury trial. According to court records, Russell could be sentenced to 1-15 years in prison for each count. He also faces a $10,000 fine, plus a 90 percent surcharge for each count. It has not yet been determined if he will serve his prison time consecutively or concurrently for each count. Russell was arrested in November 2013 after a 14-year-old female at the Extended Family Services youth center told a state worker he had inappropriately touched her and another female at the home. Police reports at the time stated Russell had entered the room of one of the individuals and touched her inappropriately over her clothing. One of the victims also told authorities they had been assaulted by Russell on multiple occasions at the home, including an event in the laundry room of the center. Police reports also stated Russell agreed to be interviewed by police and told the officers he "showed poor judgement" in going into the girls' rooms, but he denied any touching. Security footage obtained by police showed Russell entering the girls' rooms and the laundry room. One of the videos showed Russell entering one of the girls' rooms and emerging nine minutes later. Court records show that abuse took place 12 separate times from February 2013 to November 2013. Russell will be sentenced in October. Daily Herald reporter Billy Hesterman can be reached at bhesterman@heraldextra.com or (801) 344-2559 or on Twitter @billyhesterman. Source: http://www.heraldextra.com/news/local/crime-and-courts/no-contest-plea-entered-by-former-group-home-employee-in/article_f45e2f86-a9b8-55ae-ae00-e9197e50177a.html

Recognizing Real Leadership For Education Progress: Mayor Bill de Blasio What's wrong with this picture? During the nation's Back-to-School Season, U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan has been touring states in a bus to "highlight the champions of reform." At one stop, where he spoke to an audience of parents at a Nashville, Tennessee middle school, he challenged the National PTA, according to reporters for Education Week, to "make education a presidential campaign issue." Good idea. But when the Secretary offered to the audience an example of an ideal candidate, he pointed to a Republican. "Duncan pointed out that Tennessee Gov. Bill Haslam, a Republican, is one of the few politicians who has followed through on promises of being 'the education candidate,'" reported Lauren Camera. Sadly, there are too few leaders in the Democratic Party who would qualify as education champions. But there is one very clear example. Not only is he a Democrat, but he is an unabashed progressive. And if Arne Duncan really wants to find politicians who "walk the walk" of real education reform, he can find an example of authentic progress coming not from Republicans, but from the left wing of his own party. But first to dispense with the Haslam-hysteria that has overcome the Secretary. Haslam Is No Education Hero Duncan's proof of Haslam's supposed accomplishments and ability to "walk the walk" (Duncan's words) of education progress is the "state's recent academic gains. Tennessee's students made the biggest improvements in the country in math and reading on the 2013 National Assessment of Educational Progress. Duncan said the increased scores are a direct result of the state implementing the Common Core State Standards." Crediting Tennessee's NAEP scores to adoption of the Common Core is a huge leap of faith for sure, especially since the state has backed out of using Common Core aligned tests created by one of the two national consortia endorsed by Duncan. Also, Tennessee is chronically one of the nation's poorest performers on NAEP, so it had the most ground to gain in comparison to other states. And for every state Duncan can identify as a "top performer" on the NAEP assessment, one can find at least one state or more that has excelled in NAEP score gains without adopting the measures Tennessee has exemplified. A more recent and comprehensive gauge on Tennessee student achievement – the state’s own assessments – shows that student performance levels have barely budged at all, even decreasing slightly in grades 3-8 reading. Rutgers University professor Bruce Baker recently looked at Tennessee’s support for education and found the state to be woefully lacking: Tennessee is persistently among the lowest spending states in the country on its public education system. Tennessee is not only one of the lowest spenders, but Tennessee spends less as a share of gross state product than most other states. Tennessee has one of the largest income gaps between public school enrolled and private school enrolled children, and has among the higher shares of private school enrolled children. Tennessee has relatively non-competitive teacher wages with respect to non-teacher wages. Baker contended that regardless of how you feel about any of the “reform” measures Tennessee has adopted – Common Core, charter school expansion – “none can succeed in a system so substantially lacking in resources, and none can improve the equity of children’s outcomes unless there exists greater equity in availability of resources.” Speaking of charter schools, in addition to adopting Common Core, Tennessee’s Governor Haslam has been eager to expand the presence of privately operated, even for-profit, charters. As education historian Diane Ravitch noted on her personal blog, “The Governor and the legislature enacted legislation in 2011 authorizing the Tennessee Virtual Academy, an online charter school run by K12 Inc.” K12, a for-profit company traded on Wall St, is infamous for its bad reviews in the New York Times and the Washington Post and the atrocious academic results it has achieved in Pennsylvania. Nevertheless, Tennessee state leaders are determined to inflict K12 schools on their own state’s students, even though those schools continue to be “one of the lowest performing schools in the state,” according to Ravitch. So, sorry Arne, Governor Haslam is hardly an education “reform champion.” What’s even sadder than the fact that you think he is an example of one, is the fact there is a leader on the national stage who has championed a real education reform. But you’ll need to look further left to find him. A Real Education Reform Rolls Out In New York City While Duncan was touring Tennessee, praising Republicans, a genuine reformer was leading positive change in New York City. As The New York Times reported, “Mayor Bill de Blasio, elected on promises of fighting income inequality, trumpeted the expansion of prekindergarten as a crucial step in leveling the playing field among children and declared it his first priority. His push to expand the system so rapidly, more than doubling it in eight months, is seen as a crucial test for his young administration. On Thursday, all that planning sprang to life as tens of thousands of 4-year-olds poured into freshly painted classrooms adorned with letters and numbers.” Now, that’s real education progress! As the editorial board of the Times noted, “It’s worth pausing to note what an accomplishment this is. Fifty thousand is a small city’s worth of children, each getting a head start on a lifetime of learning. It is so many families saving the cost of day care or private prekindergarten. It is a milestone of education reform.” As I wrote earlier this year, “There is definitive evidence that expanded pre-k programs can benefit poor children socially, emotionally and academically.” Research has shown that high quality education programs for three- and four-year olds who can be viewed as being academically at risk can “produce strong economic returns ranging from about $4 per dollar invested to over $10 per dollar invested.” Expanding education opportunity to more little kids also happens to be very, very popular. As the new pre-K program was rolling out in New York City, a new survey from Gallup found, “Seven in 10 Americans say they favor using federal money to make sure high-quality preschool education programs are available for every child in America.” Even most Republicans (53 percent) are in favor of federal dollars going to early childhood education. Despite all the interest, “access to high-quality early education opportunities for every child who needs them – especially for every child in low-income working families – remains elusive,” as a report from the New America Foundation found this summer. The hang-up has always been finding a way to pay for it. As folks at New America point out on their foundation’s blog, funding for early childhood programs has become a new “third rail” in policy discussions. As more children living in poverty are added to waiting lists to get into programs like Head Start, politicians seem incapable of coming up with the money. Mayor de Blasio is the exception. Not only did he make campaign promises to expand pre-k programs, but he has proven that a capable leader can make those promises reality. Of course there was resistance to his initial proposal, which was to find the money for pre-k in rich people’s pockets. As Sarah Jaffe reminded in Truth Out, “Once elected, the mayor seemed to be a step behind Governor Cuomo when it came to negotiating in Albany. The struggle began shortly after he took office in January, and it seemed to reach a rather nasty peak in early March when Cuomo appeared at a pro-charter schools rally held in Albany by charter school entrepreneur Eva Moskowitz on the same day as de Blasio’s rally for his pre-K plan.” Then came a deal – “the result of de Blasio’s heavy lobbying,” according to Jaffe – with $340 million in the budget for a statewide pre-K program. The Times agreed, writing in its editorial, “Mr. de Blasio’s dogged lobbying worked. Noted WNYC on its School Book blog, “The mayor said there were no glitches on the first day of the 2014-15 school year,” despite the negotiating tactics from the governor that delayed money until April and made the City ramp up its program in less than six months’ notice.” De Blasio’s determination in the face of resistance should be held up as an example to follow across the country. In addition to championing universal access to pre-k, his administration opened afterschool programs to more than 70,000 middle-school children. And instead of reflexively opting for more unproven charter schools, he recently outlined a plan to “set a ‘clear standard’ for charter schools” that includes “how they serve high-needs students, their student retention rates, and even how much they ‘teach to the test.’” This is what real education reform looks like: increasing children’s opportunity to learn and demanding authentic accountability from schools, not mere test scores. Recognizing Real Progress Mayor de Blasio’s accomplishments in New York City make Secretary Duncan’s praise for Governor Haslam look all the more ludicrous. In fact, when Haslam was recently given opportunities to support expanded access to pre-k, he balked. As Chalkbeat Tennessee recently reported, “Both of Tennessee’s largest school districts, in Nashville and Memphis, are not only pushing to expand pre-K, but to also make it more effective.” Where is Haslam’s support for this effort? He is waiting for a study, “according to a spokesman.” While we’ve yet to see any recognition of de Blasio’s achievement coming from the Department of Education, others are noticing. Next month, the progressive group Campaign for America’s Future (disclosure: a partner of the Education Opportunity Network) will honor de Blasio – along with Saru Jayaraman, Co-Founder and Co-Director of the Restaurant Opportunities Centers United and Lee Saunders, President of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees – as “progressive champions.” Perhaps Secretary Duncan will consider attending. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/recognizing-real-leadership-for-education-progress-mayor-bill-de-blasio/>

Boy at Queens school for troubled teens was sexually assaulted, suit says The assault allegedly took place at Martin De Porres Residential Group Home and school in Ozone Park, Queens. The boy’s mom, whose name is being withheld, says a staffer encouraged the boy to perform a sex act on another resident. BY Dareh Gregorian NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Thursday, September 11, 2014, 1:05 AM A A A 6 10 Share this URL Anthony DelMundo/New York Daily News The Martin De Porres Residential Group was where a boy was sexually assaulted, a suit claims. A student at a Queens school for troubled teens was repeatedly sexually assaulted by a staffer, the boy’s mom says in court papers. The assaults took place at the Martin De Porres Residential Group Home and school in Ozone Park, “a residence for people/children with special needs and/or disabilities,” between June and August of 2013, the suit says. In court papers filed Tuesday, the mom, whose name is being withheld to protect her son’s identity, says the unidentified staffer encouraged the boy to perform a sex act on another resident, and on another occasion, got into bed with him and touched him, the suit says. The suit says the abuse never should have happened because the school was aware he inappropriately touched other residents, the filing says. The suit doesn’t identify the staffer, said the family’s lawyer, Charles Gayner. In a statement, Martin De Porres executive director Edward Dana said the school reported the incident to authorities and the staffer was later fired. “We were shocked and saddened by the allegations,” Dana said. Read more: <http://www.nydailynews.com/new-york/nyc-crime/boy-queens-school-troubled-teens-sexually-assaulted-suit-article-1.1935739#ixzz3DFO6xOy0>

Ex-daycare CEO gets prison time for stealing $1.9 million | www.ajc.com Ex-daycare CEO gets prison time for stealing $1.9 million 9 87 9 130 Sponsored Links Find a great place to board your pet on Kudzu By Alexis Stevens The Atlanta Journal-Constitution A former CEO of an Atlanta-based daycare chain will spend two years and a month in federal prison for stealing nearly $2 million in nutrition funds used to feed needy children, the U.S. Attorney’s Office said Friday. Antonio T. Hurt, 39, of Macon, arranged for Bright Star Early Learning Center to participate in the Child and Adult Food Program, which is funded by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The federal program partially reimburses day care centers for serving breakfast and lunch to children from low-income families. But prosecutors said Hurt submitted fraudulent claims that misstated the number of eligible students in the program. “Hurt used the child nutrition funds to expand his day care business, lease cars, buy jewelry, and pay for other personal expenses,” U.S. Attorney Sally Quillian Yates said in an emailed statement. “Stealing almost $2 million in taxpayer money is bad enough, but stealing funds intended to feed underprivileged children is outrageous.” Between 2007 and 2010, Hurt served as the chief executive officer of Bright Star Early Learning Center, which owned and operated multiple daycare centers throughout metro Atlanta, and in other parts of north Georgia under the name Bright Star. Hurt, a former high school principal Georgia and Maryland, was also ordered to pay back nearly $1.9 million. “We hope this conviction sends a strong warning to anyone who might consider taking advantage of this program through fraud or deception," Amy M. Jacobs, interim commissioner for Bright from the Start, said Friday afternoon in an emailed statement. Source:

<http://www.ajc.com/news/news/former-daycare-ceo-gets-prison-for-stealing-nutri/nhG46/>

Editorial Don't miss out on this foster care fix, L.A. Children's Court Los Angeles Times Children play a computer game at Edmund D. Edelman Children's Court in Monterey Park. Children play a computer game at Edmund D. Edelman Children's Court in Monterey Park. (Los Angeles Times) By The Times Editorial Board contact the reporter Laws and Legislation L.A. County must act before Oct. 1 or lose millions of dollars to keep kids with relatives Thousands of California children who have suffered abuse or abandonment are sent to live with strangers in foster homes. That often happens even if there are extended family members ready and willing to take them in, despite California laws requiring placement with relatives when possible, and even in the face of countless studies that show the kids do better in the long run after stays with relatives rather than strangers. So why do we keep doing it? Because so many of those relatives, retired or with their budgets maxed out raising their own kids, need a bit of financial assistance to be able to take in their nieces and nephews, siblings or grandchildren — and because under a complicated and outdated set of state, federal and local laws and rules, they can get only a tiny fraction of the funding that non-related foster parents get. Worse yet, there is a shortage of foster parents, so the children often end up being sent to group homes, which are the most expensive option and produce the least desirable outcomes. Government foolishly requires itself to pay more to get worse results. Family members taking responsibility for relatives in the foster care system are expected to use money available under CalWORKS. But those poverty-level funds represent a small fraction of what other foster families get to ensure children are adequately fed and clothed. This year's California budget goes a long way toward fixing the problem. It provides money that counties can use to bring financial aid for many eligible relative caregivers up to the same level they would receive if they were non-relative foster parents. All the counties have to do is opt in by Oct. 1 to be in line for 2015 funding. Why wouldn't they? Government foolishly requires itself to pay more to get worse results. - A few counties may be skittish because they know that if they opt in, they are in all the way: They must pay all relative caregivers who take in children even after the state funding runs out. It stands to reason that they'd want to know how many families will seek the funding. But counties always have the option to change their minds and opt out, even mid-year. Besides, Los Angeles County, which has the largest number of children who need places to go after abuse or neglect, and the largest number of relative caregivers ready to step up if only they had some assistance, has a federal waiver that gives it even more flexibility than other counties have to allocate money for just such a purpose. Yet Los Angeles County has yet to act. The clock is ticking. The county has just over three weeks left to act or lose by far the largest chunk of the state's $30-million fund for relative care for a year. It's time to opt in. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/opinion/editorials/la-ed-foster-care-kinship-opt-in-20140907-story.html>

San Antonio man who led Bible study gets prison for child porn An inside look at a jail cell. (AP Photo/Rich Pedroncelli) Saturday, September 06, 2014 SAN ANTONIO, TX -- A former Bible study instructor for children at a South Texas church has been sentenced to 20 years in federal prison for distributing child pornography online. Jacob Robert Holguin was sentenced Friday in San Antonio. Prosecutors say the 42-year-old Holguin in June 2013 pleaded guilty to the distribution charge. An undercover officer who was operating online helped track shared child pornography that led to Holguin. Federal agents raided Holguin's home in November 2012 and recovered nearly 3,000 images and videos of child pornography on computer equipment. Court documents indicate Holguin taught a Bible study class to children at Calvary Chapel of San Antonio in Universal City. Investigators do not believe Holguin molested any of those children. Source: <http://abc13.com/news/man-who-led-bible-study-gets-prison-for-child-porn/297321/>

Atlanta school cheating trial has teachers facing prison Atlanta schools cheating scandal Kent D. Johnson / Associated Press Defendants in a school cheating case and their attorneys listen during a hearing in Fulton County Superior Court this month. Twelve former Atlanta Public Schools employees are accused of boosting students' scores by altering answers in standardized tests. Defendants in a school cheating case and their attorneys listen during a hearing in Fulton County Superior Court this month. Twelve former Atlanta Public Schools employees are accused of boosting students' scores by altering answers in standardized tests. (Kent D. Johnson / Associated Press) By Jenny Jarvie An Atlanta school cheating case highlights what many say is the mounting pressure to meet testing targets Amid school cheating scandals across the country, teachers are facing decades in prison in an Atlanta trial Amid a wave of school cheating scandals across the country, a landmark trial here is set to begin with school teachers facing up to 35 years in prison in one of the biggest academic misconduct cases in American history. Opening statements are expected to start this month in the trial of 12 former Atlanta Public Schools employees accused of boosting students' scores by altering and falsely certifying students' answers in standardized tests. The state's investigation implicated more than 180 teachers and administrators in 44 schools. The case highlights what many educators say is the mounting pressure to meet testing targets in the data-driven era of No Child Left Behind and Race to the Top. This scandal is a cautionary tale. If we continue to overemphasize test scores, there will be more bad apples.- Tim Callahan, Professional Assn. of Georgia Educators spokesman "This scandal is a cautionary tale," said Tim Callahan, a spokesman for the Professional Assn. of Georgia Educators, the state's largest organization for professional teachers. "If we continue to overemphasize test scores, there will be more bad apples." The trial also has opened wounds among some residents who say that teachers and administrators on trial — all African Americans who worked in low-income neighborhoods — are being unfairly prosecuted under Georgia's Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute. "This is a witch hunt against black teachers," said the Rev. Timothy McDonald III, pastor of First Iconium Baptist Church in southeast Atlanta. Like many African American leaders here, he said the state's investigation is a politically motivated attempt to discredit Atlanta's public schools. "Yes, there should be some punishment — suspensions, fines, even loss of jobs — but 35 years in jail?" McDonald said. "The community did not ask for this kind of prosecution." Atlanta Public Schools was once hailed as one of the highest-performing urban districts in the nation. Test scores climbed so rapidly that its chief, Beverly Hall, was named National Superintendent of the Year in 2009 by the American Assn. of School Administrators. Just a few months later, however, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution published a series of reports on suspicious jumps in that year's state-mandated test results. Then-Gov. Sonny Perdue launched an inquiry, sending more than 50 investigators to elementary and middle schools to interview more than 2,100 teachers, administrators and students. Investigators found "organized and systemic misconduct" in 44 of 56 schools and said administrators created a "culture of fear, intimidation and retaliation." The administrators used data as an "abusive and cruel weapon" to coax employees into crossing ethical lines, investigators said. Atlanta schools cheating scandal John Bazemore / Associated Press Students at Emma Hutchinson School in Atlanta leave after a day of classes in 2011. Hutchinson was one of 44 schools involved in a test cheating scandal at Atlanta Public Schools. Students at Emma Hutchinson School in Atlanta leave after a day of classes in 2011. Hutchinson was one of 44 schools involved in a test cheating scandal at Atlanta Public Schools. (John Bazemore / Associated Press) Teachers received bonuses when schools achieved 70% or more of their annual progress goals — mostly based on students' performance on standardized tests — but their jobs were threatened if they fell short. More than 80 educators confessed to test tampering. In some schools, they huddled together in offices to correct multiple-choice papers. In one case, a principal was reported to have held "erasure parties" at her pool. In March 2013, a Fulton County grand jury returned a 65-count indictment charging 35 teachers and administrators with taking part in a racketeering enterprise and other charges, such as making false statements and influencing witnesses. As scores of educators were paraded in a televised "perp walk" to Fulton County Jail, former Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin publicly questioned the "lynch mob mentality." Another former mayor, civil rights leader Andrew Young, later appeared in court to plead for leniency for Beverly Hall: "It would be merciful for this court, these prosecutors, this whole city, if this trial never took place." Hall, who is charged with racketeering, making false statements, theft and influencing witnesses, has denied any knowledge of cheating. Her trial has been postponed as she receives treatment for breast cancer. Another defendant has passed away, and 21 others have agreed to assist prosecutors in exchange for probation. The trial for the remaining 12 teachers and administrators is almost certain to be one of the most scrutinized in Georgia history. "Will the jury want to send ordinary teachers to prison on felony convictions?" said Ronald Carlson, chair of law emeritus at the University of Georgia. He noted that it was rare, if not unprecedented, for teachers to be prosecuted using the racketeering statute. Prosecutors, he said, will attempt to show a conspiracy to achieve ill-gotten gain — in this case, the bonuses. Carlson said he expects to hear two major lines of defense: Some will deny cheating occurred under their watch or by their hand, while others may admit to cheating but claim they were pressured by superiors. Going into the trial, Gerald Griggs, a defense lawyer representing Angela Williamson, 48, a former elementary teacher, said defense attorneys would try to present a united front. "The state cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that my client cheated," Griggs said. "The state doesn't have the level of proof against all these teachers, and labeling Atlanta Public Schools a corrupt enterprise is overreaching." The Atlanta educators are not the first to face criminal prosecution for cheating. Last year, the former schools chief in El Paso became the nation's first superintendent to be convicted of manipulating test scores for financial gain. Last year, a report by the U.S. Government Accountability Office said that officials in 40 states detected potential cheating in K-12 tests given to public school students between 2010 and 2012. In California, the state Department of Education stripped 27 schools of their academic ratings last year because of testing irregularities. A growing number of critics question whether the emphasis on testing leads to a better education. "Endless practice tests and work sheets — that's not the kind of education most of us want for our children," said Robert Schaeffer, public education director at the National Center for Fair and Open Testing, which is critical of standardized tests. In Atlanta, the new schools chief, Meria Carstarphen, has vowed to usher in a culture change to restore faith in the system. After establishing a special cabinet to ensure more accountability, the district will continue to measure teachers according to students' tests. Though Georgia has overhauled its state-mandated tests this year — they now rely less on multiple choice and include more open-ended questions — it is also expanding the stakes for teachers, basing 50% of their assessment on students' test results. After receiving a $400-million grant from the federal Race to the Top program, the state will also introduce one-time merit bonuses for teachers in certain districts whose students perform well on standardized tests. "I'd like to say we've learned that when we focus too much on testing, and not on quality teaching, we get off track," said Callahan, of the Professional Assn. of Georgia Educators. "I'm not sure that everyone has learned that lesson." Source: http://www.latimes.com/nation/la-na-cheating-trial-20140907-story.html?track=rss&utm_source=feedburner&utm_medium=feed&utm_campaign=Feed%3A+latimes%2Fnews%2Fnationworld%2Fnation+\(L.A.+Times+-+National+News\)#page=1#page=1)

City Council passes legislation requiring reports on foster care The City Council passed legislation on Wednesday that requires increased reporting about the city's foster care programs. (Staten Island Advance/Jan Somma-Hammel) Print By Anna Sanders asanders@siadvance.com Staten Island Advance Email the author | Follow on Twitter on September 10, 2014 at 10:03 PM Reddit Email CITY HALL -- The City Council passed legislation on Wednesday that requires increased reporting about the city's foster care programs. "We spend a great deal of time focusing on how to best serve youth and prepare them for adulthood, but the foster care system is too often neglected," Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito said. In June, there were 11,386 children in foster care, according to the Administration for Children's Services (ACS). The number of current foster care children on Staten Island wasn't immediately available, but there were 815 in the borough as of April 2012. The package of three bills aims to help legislators examine issues facing the system, requiring ACS to provide yearly reports on certain aspects of foster care. Under the laws, ACS would have to disclose the number youth in foster care over age 17 who have government-issued identification or got an ID with the help of the agency. The number of youth leaving the foster system with IDs would also have to be reported. Another bill would require a report on high school graduation rates of foster children. ACS would also have to track where those in foster care go when they are discharged under a third bill introduced by Public Advocate Letitia James. "There are significant laws and regulations in both the state and city level to try to prepare young adults before they age out," Ms. James said. "There is no data to say that these interventions are working for our young people." In a statement, ACS said the agency worked with Ms. James and the Council to negotiate the legislation. "These bills will further deepen citywide collaboration to ensure improved outcomes for our young people," the statement read. The package passed 46-0. All bills were co-sponsored by Councilwoman Debi Rose (D-North Shore), who was unable to attend the City Council meeting because of a fall. Both Councilmen Vincent Ignizio (R-South Shore) and Steven Matteo (R-Mid-Island) voted for the legislation. They said providing oversight of city agencies is a key responsibility of the Council. "This information is critical in evaluating whether the city's foster care program is providing a quality education and a path to adoption for children in foster care," Ignizio said. Graduation and adoption rates, as well as other statistics that would be required annually, could also help develop the foster care system, Matteo said. "These reports help demonstrate where we are succeeding and where we are not," Matteo said. "Often, they help clarify how and where we need to make improvements." Source: http://www.silive.com/news/index.ssf/2014/09/city_council_passes_legislatio.html

Volunteer Your Time to Change a Child's Life Nobody longs for a safe and loving family more than a child in foster care. As a CASA volunteer, you are empowered by the courts to help make this dream a reality. You will not only bring positive change to the lives of these vulnerable children, but also their children and generations to come. And in doing so, you will enrich your life as well. What Do CASA Volunteers Do? CASA volunteers listen first. Then they act. Volunteers get to know the child by talking with everyone in that child's life: parents and relatives, foster parents, teachers, medical professionals, attorneys, social workers and others. They use the information they gather to inform judges and others of what the child needs and what will be the best permanent home for them. Who Can Be a Volunteer? You do not have to be a lawyer or social worker to be a volunteer. We welcome people from all walks of life. We are simply looking for people who care about children and have common sense. As a volunteer, you will be thoroughly trained and well supported by professional staff to help you through each case. You must pass a background check, participate in a 30-hour pre-service training course and agree to stay with a case until it is closed (a year and a half on average). Read more about the requirements and role of being a CASA volunteer. Interested in helping children but not ready to commit to becoming a volunteer advocate? Learn about other volunteer opportunities. For more information, visit: <http://www.casaforchildren.org/site/c.mtJ5J7MPIS/b.5301309/k.9D58/Volunteering.htm>

Colorado foster care youth less likely to graduate than homeless kids By Eric Gorski The Denver Post Posted: 09/14/2014 12:01:00 AM MDT 3 Comments Updated: 09/15/2014 10:10:48 AM MDT Latisha Alvarado Barrington, a psychology major at the University of Colorado Denver, prepares to leave the Auraria Campus on Wednesday. Barrington faced a lot of hurdles growing up in the foster care system. (Craig F. Walker, The Denver Post) Each morning before school, Latisha Alvarado Barrington and her younger brother packed an extra set of clothes in their backpacks because they were unsure where they would sleep that night. Often, they would not want to go at all for fear of being taken again. Latisha guarded her identity as a foster child. She was fearful of the stigma as she bounced among a dozen placements, at times because her foster parents thought she was too much to handle. The despair of falling behind caused her to lay her head on the desk and think of school as pointless. Public officials and child advocates in Colorado have long known that students in foster care lag behind academically but have lacked the data to quantify it, a necessary step for finding solutions. Colorado Classroom Read: The voices of former foster care youths who beat the odds. Now, new research involving an unusual merging of information from two state agencies paints a distressing picture: Children in Colorado's foster care system are far less likely to graduate from high school than other at-risk populations — including homeless students. Just 27.5 percent of public school foster care students in the class of 2013 graduated on time, compared with 77 percent of all students, according to statistics from the state Department of Education and Department of Human Services published last week. About half of homeless students graduated with their class. Advertisement A deeper look at five years of data by University of Northern Colorado researcher Elysia Clemens found persistent problems: • Fewer than 1 in 3 Colorado students who were in foster care during high school graduated within four years of starting. Click to enlarge (The Denver Post) • The gap between foster care children and the overall population is widening as the graduation rates of all Colorado students have grown and foster care students' rates remain flat. • About 1 in 11 students in foster care drop out of school at least once, but dropout rates are declining, a rare bright spot in the research. • Foster care students dropped out earlier than students facing other challenges, an indication that earlier intervention could help. The hope is that the bleak statistics will offer clues for helping students who not only must overcome tough backgrounds — most are in the system because of abuse or neglect, and many are poor — but also a flawed system that forces them to move constantly and doesn't provide the support given to other high-risk students. "We have a lot of work to do," said Julie Krow, director of the Department of Human Services' Office of Children, Youth and Families. "I'm glad we have the data we have now. With that baseline, we can seek to work together to move the needle in the right direction." About three years ago, Mile High United Way began a conversation with the state agencies to better address educational needs of foster youth. That led to a $1.5 million commitment from the Morgridge Family Foundation, the hiring of a state coordinator for foster child education and an agreement to share the data. There's no way to measure how Colorado ranks nationally because apples-to-apples comparisons don't exist, said Clemens, the UNC professor. Very few states have conducted such research, she said. Former foster care youth and advocates say instability is perhaps the greatest barrier to academic success. The study found foster children had the state's highest mobility rates, meaning they moved in or out of school outside of the normal rhythm of the academic calendar. The mobility rate for foster care students was 42 percent, compared with 16 percent for all students. "That is one of the greatest policy implications," said Rebecca Holmes, an associate commissioner for the Education Department. "What can be done to help students in foster care have more continuity of school settings? And when that can't happen, what can we do to address transfers and credits?" Click to enlarge (The Denver Post) At age 4, Emily Samora was taken from her drug-addicted birth mother and put into foster care. So began a rocky path. She was adopted and given up again, placed back in the system. She was expelled from school after getting busted for possession of marijuana with the intent to distribute. She graduated from an all-girls high school that doubled as a residential treatment home. "One of the biggest struggles in my journey was it was really choppy, getting transferred from place to place, trying to go from one subject to another subject and not knowing what they are teaching you," Samora said. "You could go from pre-algebra in one school and you go to another school and they'll be on something like advanced algebra." Samora is now 26, raising a 3-year-old daughter, living in an apartment subsidized by a United Way voucher and starting work for a program helping foster care youth. Foster care children also lack the transportation help given homeless children through federal law, said Brian Brinkerhoff, executive director of Denver CASA, which advocates for children in the court system. SPECIAL REPORT: Trying to live, trying to learn The McKinney-Vento Act of 1987 requires schools to enroll homeless children immediately, even if they lack normally required documents, and ensures that youth have transportation to school. Fostering Connections, federal legislation approved in 2008, puts the obligation of providing school transportation to foster care youth on counties. But Brinkerhoff and others say the law is not as strong as it could be and vague about who is responsible for paying the bill. More broadly, Brinkerhoff said agencies and advocates tend to naturally focus on emergency needs for such high-risk kids — housing, clothing and food. "What happens is education is sometimes not always as front and center because the basic needs are so demanding and important," he said. The research has yet to look at whether students do any better or worse academically in different settings. For instance, Colorado ranks near the top nationally in percentage of foster care children in group homes. Advocates say that could hurt academic results because it's generally ideal to put children in homes with loving parents. The data also could signal a need for more foster homes. According to the latest figures, Colorado has 2,173, down from 2,573 in 2011. Looking more closely at the numbers is among the next steps. There are also plans to involve foster care youth in developing strategies to improve academic achievement, officials said. For Latisha Alvarado Barrington, the girl who thought school was pointless, the barriers did not prove insurmountable. She was placed in foster care at age 8 after authorities found her and her siblings home alone in a filthy house with rotten food. From ages 8 to 12, she drifted through 12 foster homes before being adopted. All the while, she kept her foster care status to herself. "It was bittersweet," said Barrington, now 21. "I didn't want them to lower the bar for me. All the different stigmas that come with being a foster kid, I wanted nothing to do with. For other kids, they might benefit." The state does not require school districts to collect information on foster care status, said the Education Department's Holmes. Some counties report that information to school districts, but district policies on who gets access to that vary or policies are nonexistent, she said. Barrington got a big boost from finding stability in a single home and a solid college-preparatory program. Now a student at the University of Colorado Denver, she has plans for nursing school. "Education is obviously important, and it changed my path in life," she said. "If it wasn't for school, I wouldn't be as well-rounded as I am. Or as successful or articulate. Or wanting to be better than my past." Eric Gorski: 303-954-1971, egorski@denverpost.com or twitter.com/egorski Source: http://www.denverpost.com/news/ci_26528734/colorado-foster-care-youth-less-likely-graduate-than

Plan Commission skeptical of East Waco youth treatment center S— Rod Aydelotte, file snugg harbor ra Rosalyn Ruffin, shown here at a state public hearing in July, is seeking a special permit for a treatment center for boys with mental and emotion problems. If you go What: Waco City Plan Commission meeting When: 7 p.m. Sept. 23 Where: Waco Convention Center's Bosque Theatre, 100 Washington Ave. On the agenda: Public hearing and vote on a special permit for Snugg Harbor residential treatment facility, 1916 Seley Ave. Posted: Wednesday, September 17, 2014 8:01 pm Plan Commission skeptical of East Waco youth treatment center By J.B. SMITH jbsmith@wacotrib.com Waco Tribune-Herald The applicant for a special zoning permit for a 90-bed treatment facility for troubled boys in East Waco faces an uphill climb at next week's Plan Commission meeting. City planners Wednesday recommended against the permit for Snugg Harbor Inc. during a Plan Commission work session. Commission members, who will vote at a public hearing Tuesday on whether to recommend the permit to Waco City Council, expressed strong reservations about the project. The application already has drawn fierce opposition from neighbors of the proposed facility at 1916 Seley Ave., as well as Councilman Wilbert Austin and officials of La Vega Independent School District, which would educate the boys with severe mental and emotional disorders. Plan Commission members Wednesday reviewed an Aug. 5 letter to state licensing officials from Waco Police Chief Brent Stroman, who cited a "lack of transparency" on the part of operator Rosalyn Ruffin. "When the chief of police says, 'I have concerns about it,' that kind of shuts the book for me," said Josh Carter, outgoing chairman of the commission. Plan Commission member LaRaine DuPuy said Ruffin hasn't made a serious effort to answer the project's critics. "I realize there's a need, but the way they are not addressing the concerns and issues, that concerns me greatly," she said. "Until they do that to the satisfaction of the police chief and city, I have great concerns even about a temporary special permit." Zoning laws require a special "transitional shelter II" permit for residential treatment centers such as Snugg Harbor. The council has no obligation to grant that permit if it deems the use to be incompatible with the neighborhood. Planning Director Clint Peters said the staff isn't necessarily opposed to that kind of use in the vacant former nursing home on Seley Drive, but Ruffin hasn't presented enough evidence that her project fits the neighborhood. Ruffin became defensive when neighbors and school officials asked for more information during a four-hour state hearing in July that drew about 60 people. She declined La Vega Superintendent Sharon Shields' invitation to discuss the matter with her school board. Peters said Ruffin has not been willing to meet with city staff to address concerns about the project. Tuesday meeting In a phone interview Wednesday, Ruffin acknowledged that she has not met with opponents of the project in recent weeks and said she doesn't plan to do so before Tuesday's Plan Commission meeting. "I'm just going to wait and go before the Plan Commission," said Ruffin, a marriage and family counselor from Katy. She said she doesn't have a Plan B if the city doesn't grant her permit. "I don't know," she said. "I'm hoping they do. I love working with children. I can't see beyond that." Source: http://www.wacotrib.com/news/nonprofits/plan-commission-skeptical-of-east-waco-youth-treatment-center/article_1c465fe5-1026-5795-84b9-597f6d5e39fa.html

Group home employee arrested for child cruelty Tyler H. Jones tjones@civitasmedia.com September 19, 2014 An employee of a Hogansville group home was arrested this week and charged with battery, terroristic threats and child cruelty in the first and third degrees. Terri Canady, 25, of Dream House Youth Services, a Hogansville-based group home management company, was taken into custody Monday after a cell phone video emerged of her allegedly abusing a child in her care at a Granite Street group home in Hogansville. The owner of the group homes, Jimmy McCamey, called the video "horrific" and said Canady has been terminated from her job. The Georgia Division of Family and Children Services (DFCS) has since terminated its contract with Dream House and children from all three of Dream House's group homes have been removed and placed in other facilities. The incident is under investigation by the Hogansville Police Department and DFCS. This isn't the first time Dream House has been under scrutiny. Formerly known as the Center for Creative Growth, the company owns one group home in Hogansville and two in LaGrange. In October 2009, a youth from their group home on Ridley Avenue in LaGrange ran away, and one month later shot and killed a gas station attendant at the Shell Mart on Vernon Road. The shooter plead guilty and was sentenced to life in prison. In 2011, DFCS and the Department of Juvenile Justice also pulled their youths from the Center for Creative Growth, the precursor to Dream House. Also in 2011, a 45-year-old female employee of the Center for Creative Growth was accused of having a sexual relationship with a 17-year-old boy under her supervision. In March 2012, two boys from one of the homes stole a van from the program — one of them made it all the way to an Atlanta MARTA station before being picked up by police. The string incidents prompted city officials in both Hogansville and LaGrange to draw up new ordinances pertaining to the management and licensing of group homes. LaGrange passed its ordinance after the shooting death of the gas station attendant — and Hogansville followed suit in November of 2011. The homes have been plagued by allegations of poorly trained staff, uncontrollable boys and frequent disruptions to the communities in which the homes sit. According to a former employee of Dream House, staff members are paid between $8 and $10 per hour, depending on their level of education. McCamey said there are two staff members with the boys during the day and one overnight. Dream House receives a per day payment of between $100 and $170 for each boy in the group home, according to McCamey. The homes can house up to six boys at a time — doing the math, that's more than $30,000 each month in payments from the state government to Dream House, assuming the house is at capacity and Dream House is receiving the maximum per day for each boy. Operating all three houses at capacity with the maximum per day, that's nearly $370,000 yearly. A woman who lives near the Granite Street group home in Hogansville told the Daily News she's observed staff member harassing the boys in the street and said the boys "roam the streets" at all hours unchecked. "I have seen one of the staff members beat up on the kids — not real bad, but slap them down, you know? I saw him body slam him," another neighbor said. McCamey said the staff members go through a 40-hour training before beginning work at the group homes. They are trained in a curriculum known as "Mindset," which teaches de-escalation and restraint techniques. Staff members also receive training in medication administration, McCamey said. Staff member also receive training in first aid, including CPR. The Granite Street group home first opened in 2007. The dilapidated house was originally purchased as a project for the boys to fix up. Source: http://www.lagrangenews.com/news/home_top-news/50338168/Group-home-employee-arrested-for-child-cruelty

Foster care agency directors charged with embezzlement District Attorney Jackie Lacey Al Seib / Los Angeles Times Los Angeles County Dist. Atty. Jackie Lacey, shown in 2012, has charged husband-and-wife foster care executives with misuse of public funds. Los Angeles County Dist. Atty. Jackie Lacey, shown in 2012, has charged husband-and-wife foster care executives with misuse of public funds. (Al Seib / Los Angeles Times) By Garrett Therolf contact the reporter TheftAccounting and Auditing Prosecutors say couple took over $460,000 from Little People's World foster agency, hired by L.A. County Audit found directors of nonprofit foster agency used money on real estate, vacations, big salaries L.A. County kept using nonprofit foster agency despite troubling audit and extra staff to improve oversight A husband and wife have been charged with embezzling more than $460,000 from a taxpayer-funded nonprofit agency hired by Los Angeles County to help abused and neglected foster children, the district attorney's office announced Thursday. The couple, arrested at their Banning home Thursday, face 22 counts of misappropriation of public funds and embezzlement. Column Related story: The voice of foster kids Jim Newton Heather Whelan has been a foster mother to some 20 children. She has nurtured broken babies back to health and worked closely with parents to fix families. She has also cringed as social workers made life-changing decisions about her charges without consulting her. In one case, she says, the... Heather Whelan has been a foster mother to some 20 children. She has nurtured broken babies back to health and worked closely with parents to fix families. She has also cringed as social workers made life-changing decisions about her charges without consulting her. In one case, she says, the... (Jim Newton) A county audit in 2011 concluded that CSJ Kidogo, the executive director of the nonprofit Little People's World, and his wife, Hitaji Kidogo, assistant executive director, used agency money to purchase personal real estate in Northern California and Oklahoma. The couple also allegedly borrowed agency money without repaying it, funded personal vacations and collected salaries totaling $269,000, according to the audit, which formed the basis for the criminal case. "Money intended to care for children in foster homes instead lined the pockets of the executives who ran the programs," said Los Angeles County Dist. Atty. Jackie Lacey. The couple did not respond to messages left at their home and business. Related Local California not investigating foster care complaints promptly See all related 8 In recent weeks, the county's Department of Children and Family Services has declined to answer The Times' questions about Little People's World, which is paid higher rates than many foster home contractors because it accepts children with more severe behavioral and mental health challenges. The nonprofit operates two group homes in Compton and two in Riverside County that normally care for a total of 28 children. In all, the agency receives about $2.5 million annually from the two county governments. The bottom line is that we didn't think safety was an issue.- Philip Browning, child welfare department director, on why the county kept using Little People's World for foster care after a troubling audit The district attorney's office said the 2011 audit wasn't referred to prosecutors for possible criminal investigation until last year. The county auditor-controller's office did not immediately respond to a request for comment on the delay. Prosecutors said the misuse of funds began in 2008 and continued into 2013. However, the county's child welfare department continued to contract with Little People's World despite the earlier critical audit and a pledge last year by the department's director, Philip Browning, to take financial improprieties at contracted foster agencies more seriously. His department also received additional funding from the Board of Supervisors to increase oversight staffing. Following Thursday's arrests, Browning said he continued to use Little People's World because he believed the children were receiving an appropriate level of care. "The bottom line is that we didn't think safety was an issue," Browning said. A DCFS operational audit completed earlier this year found Little People's World met standards in most categories. But the audit noted concerns, including buildings in disrepair and insufficient planning to ensure children's needs were being met. And it noted that some problems, including at least one child injury, weren't properly reported. DCFS has been criticized in recent years for poor fiscal oversight of its foster care contractors. Only about one-tenth of the more than $11 million in inappropriate expenditures identified by auditors at foster care nonprofits between 2000 to 2010 has been recovered, The Times reported earlier this year. County auditors found that one agency, Teens Happy Homes in Los Angeles, spent funds on cigarettes and beer — 30 cases of the latter in one instance. Another foster care contractor, America Care, spent taxpayer dollars on alcohol, clothing from Nordstrom, tobacco, jewelry boxes, fine china, perfume and a martini set, according to county auditors. In recent weeks, social workers began to remove children from Little People's World homes, but at least seven children remain in the agency's care. The district attorney said the agency would be closing soon. Both defendants are scheduled to be arraigned on Monday. Prosecutors said they would ask that their bail be set at $550,000 each. If convicted, each defendant faces up to 14 years in state prison. Follow @gtherolf for breaking news about the foster care system. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/countygovernment/la-me-foster-care-embezzle-20140919-story.html>

... Former Counseling Center Head Sentenced to Prison | KCRG-TV9 | Cedar Rapids, Iowa News, Sports, and Weather Former Counseling Center Head Sentenced to Prison Associated Press Photos Gavel. (MGN) Story Created: Sep 19, 2014 at 12:56 PM CDT Story Updated: Sep 19, 2014 at 12:56 PM CDT DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — The former owner of a mental health counseling center has been sentenced to a year in prison and more than $700,000 in restitution after pleading guilty to charges of health care fraud and money laundering, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Friday. U.S. District Court Judge Stephanie Rose on Monday sentenced Angela Shae Ellison, 47, of Centerville, to a year and one day in prison. She also was ordered to pay $724,359 in restitution. Ellison had earlier pleaded guilty to carrying out a fraudulent billing scheme at Cornerstone Counseling Center in which Medicaid and health insurance companies were billed more than 6,000 times using names and identification numbers of doctors who didn't perform services as claimed on the bills. The Centerville counseling center submitted more than $1 million in false bills and the insurance organizations paid over $700,000 in claims. Read more at <http://www.kcrg.com/subject/news/former-counseling-center-head-sentenced-to-prison-20140919#AxBCiBKuRlStOFZv.99>

MERCER: Death changed juvenile system MERCER: Death changed juvenile system | Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2014-09-21T07:30:00Z MERCER: Death changed juvenile system Bob Mercer Journal columnist Rapid City Journal September 21, 2014 7:30 am • Bob Mercer Journal columnist \(0\) Comments PIERRE | South Dakota traveled a long way since Gina Score. The teenager's death came 15 years ago, during a forced run, at the State Training School for juvenile offenders at Plankinton. Boot camps were the fad then for dealing with many of the teenagers in trouble. Bill Janklow was governor. It took several very hard years to realize the mistake he made. Yes, there were letters from parents who saw improvements by their children. There were also many days when teenagers caused violent incidents while they were in the state system. Janklow went to the Marines as a teenager in trouble rather than finish high school. He thought the same treatment might make the difference for others. The boot-camp approach erupted into a fierce political war in South Dakota that went for years. If you looked into the faces of mothers and grandmothers at meetings where Janklow spoke, you could see he wasn't reaching many of them. In the end, he listened to his wife. Mary Dean said Plankinton's camp should be closed. After he finished his fourth and final term as governor, a new era gradually took root. The Legislature in 2003 revived an old panel and renamed it the Council of Juvenile Services. The purpose was to bring South Dakota into federal compliance. One of the first appointees was Carol Twedt of Sioux Falls. She was savvy and seasoned in politics, proven by 20 years on the Minnehaha County Commission. Twedt is still a member of the state council. At a recent meeting, she mentioned in passing that she wouldn't seek another year as the chairman, but she would like to be reappointed to one more term. She is a close friend of Mary Dean Janklow and was a big political supporter of Bill Janklow. That was Twedt on stage in Flandreau on a snowy night in 1998 when he announced he would seek a third term as governor. Another believer in the council is Arlene Ham Burr of Rapid City. She was a Republican senator in 2003 when the law was passed. She currently serves on the council. Another is Karen Jefferies, a Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe judge, who was appointed in 2005 to the council. Another is Doug Herrmann, who was at the Custer youth facilities during Janklow's time and now heads juvenile corrections. The council connected with the Annie E. Casey Foundation to bring the JDAI (Juvenile Detention Alternatives Initiative) to South Dakota. Recently the state court system took over responsibility for JDAI. The council is helping start-up programs on prevention in Aberdeen, Watertown and Sturgis. It's also sending money for researching why disproportionate percentages of minority youths are in contact with law enforcement in Rapid City and Sioux Falls. Youths in state facilities are on a gradual, long-term decline, as the state court system and prosecutors divert more kids in trouble into other forms of help and care. Numbers tell the story. Ham Burr leaned over to Jefferies as the latest meeting ended. "It's working," she told her. "It's working." Source: http://rapidcityjournal.com/news/opinion/mercer-death-changed-juvenile-system/article_94b663d7-c114-52e3-8907-3fcb4d72523.html (HEAL Comment: The question is: Are the changes that have been made enough to stop the exploitation and abuse of children? The answer is likely no because not all "boot camp" style facilities call themselves "boot camps". Many are called "wilderness programs." And, South Dakota refers to treatment as "correctional health" and "behavioral correctional health". The current system under which youth are adjudicated includes state run programs such as STAR Academy. "On December 21st, 2013, Dawn Folkens drove to STAR Academy in Custer, South Dakota to see her son Brady. It was almost Christmas and she wanted to surprise him, talk with him, and hug him. But when she arrived at STAR, Brady was in a hospital: jaundiced, with blood clots blocking a vein going to his liver, and on the way to shock. Nobody had told Dawn that he was sick before she arrived in Custer. She just wanted to see her son. Within 24 hours Brady was dead." Source: <http://dakotareporter.com/category/crony-connections/> No, this is not good enough, South Dakota!)

Data reveals problems at youth detention center in Middle Tennessee Associated Press 6:23 PM, Sep 22, 2014 6:29 PM, Sep 22, 2014 southeast Teenagers try to break into a building at Woodland Hills Youth Development Center in Nashville, Tenn., Thursday, Sept. 4, 2014. More than two dozen teens created a large disturbance Wednesday night in the yard of a detention center with a long history of violence, escape attempts and sexual-abuse allegations. Two days earlier, 32 teens escaped from the facility. (AP Photo/The Tennessean, Jason S. Lee) Jason S. Lee Copyright 2014 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Copyright 2014 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. Teenagers try to break into a building at Woodland Hills Youth Development Center in Nashville, Tenn., Thursday, Sept. 4, 2014. More than two dozen teens created a large disturbance Wednesday night in the yard of a detention center with a long history of violence, escape attempts and sexual-abuse allegations. Two days earlier, 32 teens escaped from the facility. (AP Photo/The Tennessean, Jason S. Lee) Jason S. Lee NASHVILLE — A troubled youth development center in Middle Tennessee was having problems in the months leading up to 32 teens escaping from the facility, according to recent data. The information obtained by The Tennessean newspaper shows that between January and early September, there were 145 reported incidents of violence at Woodland Hills. That included 39 assaults by teens on other teens, 51 assaults by teens on staff and 55 fights between the youths, who typically range in age from 14 to 19 and come from around the state. The teens who escaped on Sept. 1 did so by crawling under a weak spot in the perimeter fence. Two days later, riots broke out on the grounds of the facility, with teens brandishing fire extinguishers and sticks. All but two of the teens who escaped have been recaptured. Everett Parrish, an attorney appointed to represent the civil rights of youths at the facility, said he has received several reports from youths who escaped and returned, or were captured, that physical abuse had factored into their decision to flee. "I'm hearing enough consistent stories by enough youth that I'm deeply concerned about a very small number of guards at the facility," Parrish said. A special unit within the Department of Children's Services has opened investigations into abuse and neglect of teens at the center, officials said last week. Since the incidents, security officers have lodged complaints with the Tennessee State Employees Union about violence and chronic understaffing at the facility, according to executive director John Summer, who plans to reach out to DCS Commissioner Jim Henry and legislators with the security officers' concerns. "All assaults are concerning," said Monica Middlebrooks, DCS deputy commissioner for juvenile justice. Joel Player, DCS superintendent of facilities, said officials are working to rectify problems at Woodland Hills, but he cautioned the assault numbers alone don't tell the whole story. "Just so the numbers aren't misleading, a lot of those may not be as major as it seems," Player said, noting his department's policy requires reporting even non-injury incidents, such as teen placing his hands on a guard. Steps to make improvements at the facility include retrofitting all the doors to provide more security, adding additional metal plates to doors, and installing a low concrete buffer to surround the perimeter fence. The department has also requested a security audit be performed on all three of its youth development centers. The other two are in West and East Tennessee. The audit is part of a report that was sent to Gov. Bill Haslam earlier this month about improvements being made at the centers. Haslam spokesman Dave Smith told The Associated Press at the time that the governor had received the department's information and visited Woodland Hills. "The department is working hard at our youth development centers to get the balance right between helping young people to be able to re-enter the community ... and making sure the environment is safe and secure," Smith said. Source: http://www.commercialappeal.com/news/local-news/southeast/data-reveals-problems-at-youth-detention-center-in-middle-tennessee_24102026

Focus more on environments of young children Focus more on environments of young children By Bob Pringle, The StarPhoenix September 20, 2014 Pringle is Saskatchewan's Advocate for Children and Youth. I released an investigation this week into the life and death of a toddler in foster care. After he was apprehended when he was five months old, "Jake" was moved 11 times, ending up in a foster home with 11 other children under the age of five. He was slow to crawl and walk and had not learned to talk when he died just before his second birthday. Although health professionals and a foster parent expressed concerns about Jake's development, he was never properly assessed. The coroner was not able to determine how or why Jake died in December 2009. When I released the Two Tragedies report last May on the death of another child in foster care, I called on the government to develop comprehensive early childhood development and poverty-reduction strategies to advance the goals of its Child and Family Agenda. Extensive research on how children's brains develop, particularly from birth to the age of three, makes it clear that children do best when surrounded by stable, loving caregivers, be they parents and other family members, foster parents, childcare providers, teachers or others. Government spending on family support and early childhood programs benefits society as a whole, as extensive research has shown that investments in these areas are the most cost-effective way to reduce poverty and encourage economic growth. In Lost in the System, my report this week, I wrote about toxic stress and its effect on children's development. Coping with some stress is a normal part of life. If children have supportive caregivers, they can handle stressful situations, such as being immunized, and can bounce back without lasting damage from more stressful events such as a serious injury or a parent's death. Stress turns toxic when children are exposed to adversity and the adults in their lives are unresponsive, inconsistent or absent. This could be the case when parents struggle with mental illness, addictions or family violence, or when caregivers keep changing as children ping-pong through the foster-care system. Such stresses weaken the architecture of developing young brains, with effects lasting long after the children have been removed from stressful environments. That's why it's critical that we pay more attention to our children's early environment. As noted in our 2013 annual report, we know that one in three Saskatchewan children arrive at kindergarten "not fully ready to learn," according to the Early Development Instrument. Children who lag at the age of five may never catch up. Too many of our children live in poverty, which is highly detrimental to their development. A study based on 2006 census data found that two-thirds of status First Nation children in Saskatchewan live in poverty. This is a crisis. We need to take a good, hard look at where our youngest citizens are spending their formative years. Are they in unsafe foster homes, clamouring for attention? Are they being cared for by parents and other adults who are struggling with issues that render them unable to meet the considerable demands of caring for little children? Are they in unlicensed childcare homes, with little support for caregivers and accountability for parents? Most of our children are in such facilities. Despite increases in the past few years, we still only have licensed spaces for one in five young children. That's why I am recommending that the government license foster homes and establish overarching strategies to support children's development and reduce poverty. An early childhood strategy could help us address shortages in prevention and early intervention services for vulnerable children and provide more childcare, pre-kindergarten and other early-learning programs. We have a good beginning in the government's Child and Family Agenda and its goals: Children get a good start in life; youth are prepared for their future; families are strong; and communities are supportive. However, without a more comprehensive plan to accompany the agenda, sufficient resources and greater community buy-in, we cannot meet these goals. We all need to roll up our sleeves and do better. Source: <http://www.thestarphoenix.com/opinion/Focus+more+environments+young+children/10221203/story.html>

Plan to privatize Missouri youth psychiatric facility brings more uncertainty News Plan to privatize Missouri youth psychiatric facility brings more uncertainty Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2014-09-26T00:15:00Z 2014-09-26T09:10:06Z Plan to privatize Missouri youth psychiatric facility brings more uncertainty By Nancy Cambria nancy.cambria@post-dispatch.com 314-340-8238 stltoday.com September 26, 2014 12:15 am • By Nancy Cambria nancy.cambria@post-dispatch.com 314-340-8238 2 Fate of youth psychiatric center is tied to veto politics Supporters are also pushing cost-savings plan to spare the Cottonwood Residential Treatment Center. Read more Missouri psychiatric treatment center for youth closing under state budget woes State will lose 38 beds for long-term treatment, but save $2.4 million a year. Read more Editorial: The collateral damage of Missouri's race to the bottom This is what we have become. A low-tax (and get getting lower), state that doesn't take care of its neediest citizens, even as it contemplates... Read more It was not the rescue plan supporters of Cottonwood Residential Treatment Center had in any way hoped for. Employees say a new state plan to privatize and restructure the youth psychiatric facility may be better than a previous one to shut it down. But many suspect the cost-cutting plan will leave children and youth without appropriate treatment. This week, more than 90 employees at the facility in Cape Girardeau, Mo., began to digest a 17-page presentation released by the Department of Mental Health. It detailed Cottonwood's planned transition from a state-owned facility to one run by Community Counseling Center, a state contracted agency in the region that currently provides behavioral health services and referrals. The director of the Missouri Department of Mental Health said Tuesday the measures provide a greater array of treatment options and would cost about $2 million less than the $5.7 million the state spends annually to run Cottonwood. "The governor indicated he would really like to see Cottonwood and the services for those children to stay open, but it really had to be done in a more efficient way," said Keith Schafer. "I think it has tremendous implications for kids." But employees — most of whom expect to lose their jobs — said they are devastated for themselves and for the children. The restructuring proposes cutting the residential center's capacity by half while increasing home-based options. "I'm concerned there may not be enough beds for kids who need them," said Jeanie Dale, a Cottonwood therapist. Cottonwood had been in limbo since June when state officials announced they were closing the facility by year's end amid $100 million in cuts and budget withholdings ordered by Gov. Jay Nixon. At the time, Schafer said the state had no hope of keeping the center open, due to the budget constraints and projected future revenue losses from tax cut bills passed in the last legislative session. But by August, a Nixon official said Cottonwood could potentially remain open if it reduced costs and if the Republican-led Legislature allowed Nixon's tax-cut vetoes to stand. Cottonwood employees and state Rep. Kathy Swan, R-Cape Girardeau, each submitted cost-cutting plans to the state. They grew more optimistic earlier this month when the Legislature failed to override the vetoes. Within days Nixon released $241,404 in funding for Cottonwood. Yet, nobody expected privatization would be the state's final move. "We were really blindsided by that one," said Candy Ank, a psychiatric technician at Cottonwood. "It's not what we fought for." Under the plan, all of the facility's employees will lose their jobs. Some with longer tenure will be given priority to fill jobs at other state facilities. Others will be encouraged to apply for jobs at the private facility, though it appears pay and benefits are lower. Some employees are even being encouraged — by Schafer — to open their homes to young patients and work as "professional parents" who are paid a daily rate to care for the children as they receive outpatient therapies. In the plan, the residential facility will be downsized to 16 treatment beds — half the number of children it can currently accommodate. The state will further contract with individuals to run six home-based facilities. Some will operate "professional parent homes," where individuals are paid to care for one child while the child undergoes intensive outpatient behavioral therapies. The others will be called "treatment family homes," where up to three children can be placed. Schafer said these are more beneficial to the youngest patients who should remain in a home setting. Cottonwood accepts children, 6 through 17. The facility has been increasingly accepting children 8 and under. But Ank said most of the kids, particularly the younger ones, have severe behavioral issues that require multiple staff to manage. "Treatment homes are so hard to find across the state, period. I don't see how we're going to establish six in this county," Ank said. Swan said everyone needs to stay positive. "We didn't get the 32-bed facility back, but there are the professional parent homes and the family treatment homes," she said. "The potential is there possibly to treat 34 children. While it may not be the ultimate result of what we hoped, we're still here." The state reopened Cottonwood admissions last week. Dale said there were 15 children already in care. Under the new 16-bed system, the facility could accept one more child. Source: http://www.stltoday.com/news/local/state-and-regional/plan-to-privatize-missouri-youth-psychiatric-facility-brings-more-uncertainty/article_4741ceb5-26a8-5de5-b4af-0b25fb735a21.html

Foster Care Task Force Working to Close System Gap By: Mitch Goulding 09/25/2014 03:59 PM Text size: + - TWC News: Foster Care Task Force Working to Close System Gap Play now Time Warner Cable video customers: Sign in with your TWC ID to access our video clips. Sign in Get my TWC ID Get TWC service Read the FAQ To view our videos, you need to enable JavaScript. Learn how. install Adobe Flash 9 or above. Install now. Then come back here and refresh the page. Williamson County Commissioner Lisa Birkman says recent deaths like that of toddler Colton Turner show kids are falling through gaps in foster care and child protection. "There have been unfortunately a series of deaths of kids either in foster care in Williamson County or from other places that are placed here," she said. After four foster care deaths in 18 months, Birkman sent out a call to attorneys, judges, and child advocates. The result a new task force, charged with identifying problems and creating solutions to send to state legislators, like State Rep. Tony Dale. Dale serves on the House Select Committee on Child Protection, created in May to address child abuse and neglect in the state. "Where the biggest problems lie are in broken homes, out of wedlock births, drug abuse and alcohol abuse," Dale said. "I've had people at CPS tell me if we could tackle those issues in a positive way, you can eliminate 90 percent of the calls that they make." Dale has already worked with CPS to streamline the court process. Williamson County will be the first in the state to pilot a program that gives county attorneys full access to CPS' case files. "We could rally the troops to address whether a placement is about to break down," Williamson County Attorney Dee Hobbs said. "Maybe we can keep it from breaking down. We can make sure that we get the best and most current information to the court." Dale hopes smarter policies will mean safer homes for kids. "Case workers are only spending about 29 percent of their time with children and families. It's too little," Dale said. "We need to peel back some of those policies and make sure we free up as much of the existing time as possible." In May, the Sunset Advisory Commission created the House Select Committee on Child Protection to look deeper into the issue of child abuse and neglect. Recommendations from the Williamson County task force will be submitted to members on that committee in November. The committee will then report back to the House in January with suggested changes to the foster care and child protection systems. Source: <http://austin.twcnews.com/content/news/305069/foster-care-task-force-working-to-close-system-gap/>

Student Protests Are A Bigger Deal Than You Think When hundreds of high school students across a suburban school district outside of Denver, CO recently walked out of classes to protest a history curriculum, it quickly became national news. According to a local reporter, the students took to the streets multiple days in a row "to voice their concerns over a proposed curriculum review panel they believe could stifle an honest teaching of U.S. history." But the story has now widened into a much larger controversy. The students' teachers got involved as well, staging a "mass sick-out" in support of the students. The national outlet for Fox News has since chimed in with an alarmist interpretation of the events, which prompted an immediate response from liberal news watchdog Media Matters. Now, prominent national political leaders, like potential Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson, are voicing their interpretations of the events, and even organizations as well known as The College Board have seen fit to take a stand. So this is a big story. But it's even bigger than you think. Protesting A 'Patriotism' Curriculum What's driving events in the Denver suburb of Arvada for sure is a controversial move by the local county school board to, as the Associated Press reported, "Establish a committee to review texts and coursework, starting with Advanced Placement history, to make sure materials 'promote citizenship, patriotism, essentials and benefits of the free-market system, respect for authority and respect for individual rights' and don't 'encourage or condone civil disorder, social strife or disregard of the law.'" Students who are alarmed to know they're not allowed to learn about civil dissent and protest have quite rationally chosen to protest. As other reports have noted, the controversy goes way beyond the borders of Colorado. The AP course that's causing controversy has become a favorite target of right-wing extremists on a national level. Valerie Strauss at The Washington Post explained, "Conservatives have said that the new history framework — being used this fall in classrooms around the country — does not highlight American achievements or mention key American historical figures but spends a lot of time talking about America's worst period. Top officials at the College Board, which owns the Advanced Placement program, have said there is nothing anti-American about the document." An analysis at The Hechinger Report meticulously explained what exactly had been changed in the course. Apparently, most of the changes are the result of a shift from giving teachers "a list of suggested topics" — without telling them which ones will be covered on the exam — to a "curriculum that outlines specific concepts that must be covered," such as, "Africans developed both overt and covert means to resist the dehumanizing aspects of slavery." These changes are likely related to new Common Core Standards, the Hechinger analysis concluded, that Colorado and most other states have adopted, at the federal government's urging. "The College Board has acknowledged that elements of the new course align with the goals of the new standards," and the course's emphasis on "developing students' ability to analyze historical texts ... dovetails with the Common Core." But there's more to the students' protests than just an extension of the War Over the Core between conservatives and education technocrats. More Than The Core In a news program broadcast by MSNBC, host Melissa Harris-Perry interviewed two student leaders of the protest, Ashlyn Maher and Kyle Ferris. When Harris-Perry asked the students to explain their motivation to walk out of school, Ferris explained, "We wanted to get the school board's attention. They're not really listening to the concerns of the community." In the story's video footage, the protest signs the students brandished proclaimed, "Keep public schools public," and "Support our teachers." Commenting on this, Harris-Perry correctly jumped to the assumption that the issues might be broader than just the curriculum, and asked the students, "What else is all of this about?" Ferris replied there were indeed other issues including "teachers' wages, which they're messing with," and "funneling funds away from public into charter schools." Indeed, student protests around the country for some time have been nearly unanimous in their raising of specific issues: lack of student voice in school governance, mistreatment of classroom teachers, and funding austerity, including lack of resources and the redirection of public funds to private interests such as charter schools. Beginning last school year, students in metropolitan school districts across the country began speaking out in prominent, headline-earning protests, using their social media and organizing skills to send hundreds of their peers into the streets to protest — including previous actions in Denver. To spur the protests, students in Philadelphia, Providence, Rhode Island, Portland, Oregon, and elsewhere have formed student unions that have developed attention-getting tactics, which have spread to a national scale. The issues students continue to rail against are school closures and budget cutbacks, widespread teacher firings and wage reductions, and top-down implementations of mandated standards and high-stakes testing. The rapid scaling up of student unrest prompted activist Hannah Nguyen to write at the time, "Students all over the United States, from Portland to Chicago to Providence, are tired of feeling powerless when it comes to decisions that affect their education ... They've begun to organize together, forming student unions and fighting back against threats to their education, such as budget cuts, high stakes testing, and school closings. From mass walkouts and sit-ins to creative street theatre and flash mobs, these students are demanding that their voices be heard." Student Protests Are Not Going Away As the current school year rolls out, the protests are likely to continue and to build in intensity as school "reform" — including resource deprivation, top-down standardization, and autocratic rule — continues to plague the public education system. As the news site at The Nation devoted to student activism documented at the beginning of the school year, the slaying of Michael Brown, an unarmed African American teen, by a white police officer in Ferguson, Missouri set off a wave of student led actions in schools calling for racial justice in both the education system and society at large. "On August 18," The Nation reported, "more than 100 members of the Chicago Students Union, alongside parents, teachers and elected officials, marched on

Chicago Public Schools headquarters demanding the fair funding of schools and a democratically elected board of education." In September, Newark, NJ students organized a two-day boycott, demanding the resignation of Superintendent Cami Anderson's who is installing a school "reform" plan that "disguises itself" as a means of giving students more school choices while eliding lack of funding, accountability from the state and the voices of students." The students "shut down Broad Street, the busiest street in New Jersey's biggest city, laying down and chanting for nine hours." More recently, The Guardian reported about "a spate of revolts against school dress codes appears to be gaining momentum across the United States, with students staging walkouts and other protests to complain at the way girls have been 'humiliated' and forced to cover up. A vocal campaign has emerged after recent incidents angered students in New York, Utah, Florida, Oklahoma and other states, with some accusing schools of sexism and so-called 'slut shaming'." What's at the core of all these student actions is their call to have some say-so in how they are being educated in a system that increasingly imposes "sameness" and rigid "accountability" from remote authorities who seem unanswerable to anybody. The Adults Don't Get It The controversy over a history curriculum in Colorado is an argument over a very much bigger issue. It's about how we're treating our nation's youngest citizens with a substandard form of education that emphasizes fiscal efficiency over learning opportunity and standardization over individual needs and interests. And it's about how we treat students as learners, imposing education as something done to them rather than with them. Indeed, the arguments back and forth over the Denver-area high school protests treat the students as if they were inert objects rather than active agents in their own learning. For example, in trying to sort out the curriculum controversy, Jonathan Cohn at The New Republic wrote, "Conservatives want schools to emphasize faith and obedience, while liberals are more likely to care about teaching tolerance and curiosity. You can guess how each group would react to a curriculum that asked some hard questions about U.S. history." In other words, students are passive recipients waiting to be filled with right-ways of thinking, and it's up to the adults – liberal or conservative – to decide what to populate their empty minds with. That's so wrong. Students are not empty vessels waiting to be filled with prescribed content vetted by technocrats in government and well-funded think tanks. To treat them that way is both disrespectful to their humanity and bad education that doesn't reflect the ways we know that human beings learn. You call your "reform" a "patriotism curriculum." You can call it "college and career ready." Either way, you're leaving the students out of the matter. And until we start putting the interests of students at the center of any type of "reform," we're getting our education policies all wrong. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/student-protests-are-a-bigger-deal-than-you-think/>

Sense of invalidation uniquely risky for troubled teens Enlarge Doctors and psychologists may find the measure of invalidation helpful in identifying a higher suicide or self-mutilation risk within a group of teens already understood to be very troubled. Among the negative feelings that can plague a teen's psyche is a perception of "invalidation," or a lack of acceptance. A new study by Brown University and Butler Hospital researchers suggests that independent of other known risk factors, measuring teens' sense of invalidation by family members or peers can help predict whether they will try to harm themselves or even attempt suicide. In some cases, as with peers, that sense of invalidation could come from being bullied, but it could also be more subtle. In the case of family, for example, a teen who is gay may feel a strong degree of invalidation if he or she perceives that parents would either disapprove or be disappointed upon finding out, said study lead author Shirley Yen, associate professor of psychiatry and human behavior in the Warren Alpert Medical School of Brown University. For the study, which appears online in the Journal of Child and Adolescent Psychopharmacology, Yen and her colleagues followed a group of 99 teens, each admitted to a psychiatric facility because they had tried to kill themselves or presented a serious risk of doing so, for six months of follow-up. Along the way they assessed the teens' sense of family and peer invalidation as well as other demographic and psychiatric data. They also tracked whether the teens (or their parents) reported new suicide attempts or related events by the teen, or whether the teen was engaging in cutting or other forms of self-harm. Assessing family invalidation involved asking questions such as, "Were there times when you did not feel accepted by your family? Or that you could not express your true thoughts and feelings? Or that if you did express your thoughts and feelings that you would be dismissed, punished, ignored or made fun of?" There were similar questions about peers. The researchers assessed invalidation upon hospital admission. Then, at the six-month mark, the teens were asked to recall the degree of such feelings anchored in notable events. Ratings were assigned for each week of that past half-year. After statistically accounting for other known risk factors such as low positive affect or high levels of aggression, Yen found that a moderate to high perception of family invalidation proved a statistically significant predictor of a later suicide event among boys. A strong degree of peer invalidation, meanwhile, predicted engagement in self-harm behaviors in the overall group (boys and girls). "What this points to is the importance of assessing for the teen's individual feelings of invalidation," Yen said. "This is different than a lack of social support." Yen said doctors and psychologists may find the measure of invalidation especially helpful in the context seen in the study: identifying a distinctly higher suicide or self-mutilation risk within a group of teens already understood to be very troubled. Yen has worked for years to understand the different risk factors of suicide and self-mutilation among troubled youths. Her goal is to understand the key risk factors, such as family and peer invalidation, well enough to produce new, effective clinical interventions or inform existing ones. Explore further: Practicing Judaism could protect against suicide, study claims More information: Journal of Child and Adolescent Psychopharmacology, online.liebertpub.com/doi/abs/.../0.1089/cap.2013.0132 Provided by Brown University Source: <http://medicalxpress.com/news/2014-10-invalidation-uniquely-risky-teens.html>

Lawsuit: DSS placed girl with man who raped her By MEG KINNARD Associated Press By MEG KINNARD The Associated Press Posted: Saturday, Sep. 27, 2014 Modified: Saturday, Sep. 27, 2014 COLUMBIA, S.C. A South Carolina couple are suing the state's social services agency, claiming that case workers negligently placed their teenage daughter in the care of a male neighbor and that she was repeatedly raped over months. The federal lawsuit filed earlier this month in Charleston accuses the Department of Social Services of negligence in placing the girl with a man who wasn't a relative and had not been certified by the state as a foster parent. The girl, named in the lawsuit as Jane Doe, was 13 years old when she was removed from her family's Georgetown County home in June 2011 after an abuse allegation, according to the lawsuit. That allegation isn't spelled out in the lawsuit, and Bill Luse, an attorney for the girl and her family, declined to comment on it. At the time, the lawsuit says, social services workers "did not make any effort" to place the girl with a relative or someone who had been certified as a foster parent. Instead, her lawyer writes, the girl was sent to live with Rhett Tison, a neighbor who was 42 at the time. According to the lawsuit, the agency did not follow its own procedures, failing to run background checks on Tison or inspect his home. At the time of the placement, Georgetown County court records show that Tison had a series of debt collection judgments entered against him but had been charged with no criminal offenses. Over the year and a half that the girl lived with Tison, her lawyer says she was repeatedly sexually assaulted and, at times, locked in a bedroom to which only Tison had the key. Tison's attorney declined to comment. In a statement Saturday, DSS spokeswoman Marilyn Matheus said DSS only recently received the lawsuit. "We are in the beginning stages of the legal process, and we will respond to the allegations in the lawsuit in court," she said. In addition to DSS and local social services workers, the girl is also suing Tison, now 45, who was charged in September 2012 with several sex-related offenses, including criminal sexual conduct with a minor and lewd act on a minor. Police papers don't specifically tie those charges to Jane Doe, but they occurred during the time she was living with Tison, and Luse said they are related to the girl. The case is still pending. The lawsuit is one of several now ongoing against the embattled South Carolina agency, whose director resigned earlier this year amid escalating, bipartisan calls for her ouster. A Senate panel investigating the agency has told its acting director to create a plan within two weeks for getting certified and trained caseworkers on the job as soon as possible. Earlier this year, a girl, now 19, sued DSS for repeatedly placing her in the same foster homes as her brother, even though, she said, agency officials knew he was abusing her. In court papers, DSS and the youth homes where the children lived denied the allegations, saying they could not have anticipated the "alleged intentional and criminal conduct" of the girl's brother. Another lawsuit pending in Richland County accuses DSS of failing to protect a 6-year-old girl from a teenage foster child with known behavioral problems who was HIV-positive and admitted to sexually assaulting her. In that case, DSS officials say the agency investigated the situation, determined that treatment plans had not been followed and had subsequently disallowed the foster parent involved from having future foster children. The statement also said the foster child was regularly monitored and was in a "therapeutic" foster care home designed to meet his needs. In the new litigation, attorneys for 13-year-old Jane Doe say her mother complained to DSS that "something was not right" with her teenage daughter being placed in a home with a male nonrelative in his 40s, and asked that the girl be placed with an uncle in Michigan. The mother, according to the lawsuit, told the agency that her daughter and Tison "were acting like boyfriend and girlfriend." The lawsuit also accused Tison of repeatedly refusing to drop the girl off for scheduled visits with her mother. Luse said the girl is living with her parents again but is having difficulties trusting authority figures and is fearful of developing relationships with anyone. "It's a horrible thing, and I feel horrible about what happened," Luse said. Copyright 2014 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. Kinnard can be reached at <http://twitter.com/MegKinnardAP> Source/Read more here: <http://www.charlotteobserver.com/2014/09/27/5203258/girl-says-dss-placed-her-with.html#.VDNGucl0y1s#storylink=cpy>

Brown signs bills to help foster children September 30, 2014, 05:00 AM The Associated Press SACRAMENTO — Gov. Jerry Brown announced Monday that he signed a package of bills to help foster children in California by encouraging early placement with relatives and extending support to finish college. Among the bills Brown announced signing is AB1658 by Assemblyman Reginald Jones-Sawyer, D-Los Angeles. The bill is designed to protect foster youth from identity theft by requiring county child welfare agencies to request credit reports for children 16 years and older. AB1761 by Assemblyman Isadore Hall, D-Compton, encourages social workers to keep children with relatives when they enter the foster care system. Hall's office said the current law is not clear about placing abused and neglected children with a relative during the initial stages of an investigation. Such a move could help children avoid having to be placed in shelters or group homes. According to the Department of Social Services, there are currently 62,545 children in foster care in California. That figure is down from more than 100,000 in 2000, according to kidsdata.org, a program of the Lucile Packard Foundation for Children's Health. The decline has been attributed to policies that emphasize keeping families together and finding permanent placement. SB1252 by Sen. Norma Torres, D-Pomona, allows counties to extend housing to foster youth up to age 25 for up to three years if they are completing college. The current eligibility cut-off age is 24 for up to two years, according to the senator's office. The Stuart Foundation, a San Francisco-based trust dedicated to the development of children and youth, found that 70 percent of foster children expressed interest in attending college but only 10 percent enroll. Just a projected 3 percent would graduate with a degree. Brown also signed bills that would help homeless youth. One bill, AB1733 by Assemblywoman Sharon Quirk-Silva, D-Fullerton, allows a homeless person to obtain an identification card from the Department of Motor Vehicles without a fee. Source: <http://www.smdailyjournal.com/articles/news/2014-09-30/brown-signs-bills-to-help-foster-children/1776425130868.html>

Foster Baby on Life Support After Choking Under Care - KWES NewsWest 9 / Midland, Odessa, Big Spring, TX: news9.com | Foster Baby on Life Support After Choking Under Care Posted: Sep 30, 2014 8:23 PM PDT Updated: Sep 30, 2014 8:44 PM PDT _Anum Valliani NewsWest 9 MIDLAND - Shock and grief surround a Midland Foster Home as a baby battles for his life after nearly choking to death. Executive Director at High Sky Children's Ranch Jalynn Hogan said it happened Thursday night as the foster parents were getting the child ready for bed. The one-year-old began to choke on a baby wipe. "Despite foster parents efforts to provide life saving measures and resuscitate the baby, he could not breathe," she said. EMS were called and the baby was taken to Midland Memorial Hospital. Afterwards it was determined the baby needed to be transferred to Covenant Hospital in Lubbock where the child now remains on life support, "and barring a miracle probably will not survive," Hogan said. In the agency's 51-year history, this is a first. "You're taken off guard when something that's common in your home can cause such a serious life altering event," Hogan said. Now we're told both the foster parents and High Sky are under the microscope. According to CPS a Residential Child Care Licensing (RCLL) investigation on possible abuse or neglect is underway. Any action needed will be determined after the investigation. It's unknown if the guardians were veteran or new foster parents. But Hogan claims based on what they know at this time, there was no foul play by the them. "They are shattered as you might imagine to have something like this happen," she said. "It's a struggle for all of us here. Whether you're at fault or not you know that is a concern that somehow people will perceive that you are." Now officials are just asking for some prayers for the child and his families. Source: <http://www.news9.com/story/26671854/foster-baby-on-life-support-after-choking-under-care>

Psych Meds and Foster Youth: Alameda County California Takes on a National Issue By Daniel Heimpel, October 1, 2014 Share on Tumblr PRINTER FRIENDLY On September 29, around 50 foster youth advocates and mental health professionals crowded into a conference room in Alameda County California's Behavioral Health Care Services (BHCS) building to discuss the steps the county can take to reduce the overmedication of children in foster care. Of the 1,346 foster children in Alameda County in 2014, 290 had been authorized by the juvenile court to take psychotropic medications as of July 1, according to data presented by Anna Johnson, the lead consultant on the county's project to assess psychotropic use by youth in foster care or juvenile custody. More than one-third (108) of these youth have three or more prescriptions, according to a report Johnson released along with the presentation. The data being presented did not count those children who had those prescriptions filled, but points to a common theme in Alameda County, across the state and throughout the country. Foster youth are being told to take psychotropic medications at questionably high rates. "There seems to be something bizarre about using this mode of treatment," said Dena Proctor, a public health nurse with the county. Proctor questioned whether or not such heavy reliance on medication amounted to "malpractice," and pointed to medical training that would allow psychotropic medications to be so prevalent. "My mouth is just kind of hanging open," she said. Three youth advocates who work for WestCoast Children's Clinic, based in Oakland, joined the presentation and made it clear that there are alternatives to medication, including mentorship, healthy eating and exercise. Normal, everyday things that keep us all sane. Tamar Thomas, who experienced foster care and now works as a youth advocate, said that the young people she works with often say that when they take medications, "they feel off, or different. And that they were looked at differently." Thomas added that medication should not be the first response. "It's not always an illness," she said. "Just young people acting out." Among the attendees was Karen de Sa, an investigative reporter for The San Jose Mercury News, who has ratcheted up statewide attention on this issue through her reporting on the startlingly high rates of psychotropic medication for foster children. The newspaper's investigation found that one in four adolescents was receiving psychotropic drugs, "more than three-and-a-half times the rate for all adolescents nationwide." During the presentation, Johnson pointed to one possibly substantive step towards reducing the over-prescription of foster youth. She said that The Medical Board of California will start investigating whether or not Medi-Cal providers are writing prescriptions to foster youth based on a reasonable standard of care or are foregoing appropriate tests and a minimum of monitoring before doing so. This was prompted in August, after de Sa's stories started breaking, and State Senator Ted Lieu (D-Sacramento) sent a request to the medical board asking for more information on how judiciously subscriptions were being administered. "Yes, we are working with the agencies, and will be investigating the issues," said Cassandra Hockenson, public affairs manager for the medical board. "We will be looking into the physicians involved." The overuse of psychotropic medication has been gaining steady national attention. Last May, the Congressional Caucus on Foster Youth hosted a briefing on the issue on Capitol Hill, where TV celebrity Dr. Phil emphasized the need for alternatives to medication in dealing with mental health issues. Shortly thereafter Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) said the Senate Finance Committee – which he chairs – would "play offense" on the issue. Daniel Heimpel is the founder of Fostering Media Connections and the Publisher of The Chronicle of Social Change. Source: <https://chronicleofsocialchange.org/news/psych-meds-and-foster-youth-alameda-county-california-takes-on-a-national-issue/8235>

Mayor Bill de Blasio Signs a Series of Bills Into Law, Related to Youth in the Foster Care System, Tenant Protection, The City's Building Code, And Traffic Safety September 30, 2014 Mayor enacts Intros 104-A, 137-A, 187-A, 48-A, 129-A, 371-A, 472-A and 474 NEW YORK—Mayor Bill de Blasio today signed eight bills into law, related to youth in the foster care system, tenant protection, the City's building code, and traffic safety. "Each of these eight bills will help improve the quality of life in New York City," said Mayor Bill de Blasio. "From protecting tenant rights and ensuring positive outcomes for children in foster care, to raising the bar for our City's building codes and beefing up our Vision Zero efforts for safer roadways and streets, today we take a decisive step forward in increasing accountability across this administration and commit to lifting up more New Yorkers. I applaud the City Council, under the leadership of Speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito, for the swift passage of these critical pieces of legislation." The first set of bills requires the Administration for Children's Services (ACS) to report information related to youth in the foster care system on an annual basis. Specifically, Intro. 104-A, sponsored by Public Advocate Letitia James, requires ACS to submit information on youth aging out of foster care, including housing, education, and employment outcomes. Intro. 137-A—sponsored by Council Member Daniel Dromm—mandates ACS to report on its efforts in obtaining government-issued personal identification for foster care youth. Lastly, Intro. 187-A, sponsored by Council Member Laurie Cumbo, requires that ACS provide information regarding high school enrollment and graduation rates for youth in foster care. "Today, there are nearly 12,000 children and youth living in foster care throughout New York City. Nearly 1,000 young adults age out of foster care, only to enter back into City services because they weren't given the tools to succeed. Today, we take a definitive step towards improving the lives of those young adults through tracking them as they transition out of foster care, in order to better understand the problems that they might encounter, and provide them with the support they need to thrive," said Public Advocate Letitia James. "I thank Mayor de Blasio for signing this vital bill into law, and I look forward to continuing to work with our City agencies to improve the lives of New York's at-risk youth." "The enactment of Intro 187-A, my first piece of legislation, demonstrates our collective commitment to education and the success of all youth in foster care. Through increased transparency and accountability of the Administration for Children's Services, we can monitor the academic progression of our City's most vulnerable population to ensure that these young men and women will excel beyond their circumstances," said Council Member Laurie A. Cumbo, Chair of Women's Issues Committee. "Getting identification for youth in foster care is a step in the right direction for setting individuals up for a life on their own," said Council Member Daniel Dromm. "Government-issued personal identification opens doors to do all of the things many people take for granted, including accessing buildings and schools, driving, crossing international borders and dealing with immigration authorities, interacting with law enforcement, opening bank accounts, and so on. I am particularly excited that the City's recently established municipal identification card program is included in this bill. Thank you to the many advocates, Speaker Mark-Viverito and Mayor de Blasio." "With thousands of New York's youth living in the foster care system, it is essential for us to ensure that the City provides the fullest possible array of support services for youth who are striving to overcome the barriers to achievement that they face every day," said Council Member Vanessa L. Gibson. "By expanding the data that's available to policymakers, the pieces of legislation being signed into law today by Mayor de Blasio will open the door to the development of an innovative mix of programs and services that will make a real difference in the lives of countless New Yorkers. Additionally, I want to thank Mayor de Blasio, Council Speaker Mark-Viverito, and Council Member Cumbo, the lead sponsor of the legislation, for their support of this important legislation." The second group of bills relates to tenant protection. Namely, Intro. 48-A, sponsored by Council Member Fernando Cabrera, requires the Housing and Preservation Department to create an information guide for tenants and owners of buildings that contain multiple housing dwellings. This guide—which would be offered by owners for tenants in their buildings—will include responsibilities of landlords related to heat, hot water, pest management, repairs and maintenance, tenant organizations, rent-regulated leases, rental assistance for elderly or disabled tenants, and housing discrimination. Intro. 129-A, sponsored by Council Member Margaret Chin, increases civil penalties against owners that harass tenants from between $1,000 to $5,000 to between $5,000 and $10,000, in addition to posting the violator's information online. "I am proud to join my colleagues and Mayor Bill de Blasio to sign these important bills into law," said Council Member Jumaane D. Williams, Deputy Leader and Chair of the Housing and Buildings Committee. "Two of these bills I sponsored at the request of Mayor de Blasio will make adjustments to the 2014 Building Code to ensure the code is solid and sound before implemented. In an effort to show how serious the Council is on tenant harassment, I also cosponsored a bill with Council Member Chin to combat harassment from landlords and will reduce the financial incentive to displace tenants out of their homes by raising violations. Though this bill is not meant to fine landlords the maximum penalty for every violation, it will give judges the discretion to levy the fine against the most egregious bad actors." "Today's signing of the Tenants Bill of Rights provides another important tool in the arsenal of protection for all New York City tenants," said Council Member Fernando Cabrera. The third series of bills, both sponsored by Council Member Jumaane Williams, relates to the 2014 Construction Code. Intro. 472-A will fix 33 minor non-substantive typographical errors and drafting inconsistencies in the 2014 New York City Construction Codes. Intro. 474 extends the effective date of the 2014 Construction Codes from October 1, 2014 to December 31, 2014, allowing design professionals additional time to prepare plans and specifications in compliance with the new provisions. The last piece of legislation—Intro. 371-A—allows for civil penalties for drivers who leave the scene of a crash without reporting their name, residence, license, and insurance information to the victim or a police officer. These penalties could be in addition to any other criminal or civil penalties under the State Vehicle and Traffic Law. Increased penalties for fleeing the scene of a crash are a key component of Mayor de Blasio's Vision Zero plan to eliminate traffic fatalities. "The Justice for Hit-and-Run Victims Act will save lives by deterring those who would even think of fleeing the scene of a collision and leaving a fellow New Yorker to die on the street," said New York City Council Majority Leader Jimmy Van Bramer. "By introducing civil penalties of up to $10,000 for the first time to drivers found guilty of fleeing the scene of a hit-and-run collision, we are sending a strong message—if you break the law, we will track you down and bring you to justice. No family should ever suffer the loss of a loved one to a hit-and-run driver, and the signing of this bill will bring our City closer to ending this epidemic and making Vision Zero a reality." "This weekend we witnessed another callous and despicable hit and run in our city. Today we say no more, not in our city. The Justice for Hit and Run Victims Act will save the lives of thousands of New Yorkers by causing drivers to think twice before they abandon the victims of their reckless actions," said Council Member Ydanis Rodriguez, Chair of the Transportation Committee. "We commend Mayor de Blasio and his administration's commitment to keeping our streets safe by signing this bill into law today." Learn more about each bill: Youth in Foster Care Intro. 104-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the City of New York, in relation to collecting and reporting data related to youth and foster care. Intro. 137-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the City of New York, in relation to requiring the Administration for Children's services to report on their success in obtaining government-issued personal identification for youth in foster care. Intro. 187-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the City of New York, in relation to requiring the Administration for Children's Services to provide information regarding high school graduation rates of youth in foster care. Tenant Protection Intro. 48-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the City of New York, in relation to a rights and responsibilities guide for tenants and owners. Intro. 129-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the City of New York, in relation to remedies for breach of the duty of an owner to refrain from harassment of tenants. Building Code Intro. 472-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the city of New York, the New York city plumbing code, the New York building code, the New York city mechanical code, the New York city fuel gas code and local law number 71 for the year 2011, in relation to technical corrections and clarification of provisions of the New York city construction codes and, in relation thereof, repealing section 1107.5.6 of the New York city building code and section 7 of local law number 71 for the year 2011 and repealing and replacing section 301.6 of the New York city plumbing code, item 4 of section 314.2.3 of the New York city plumbing code, section 907.2.2 of the New York city building code, item 3 of section 1109.2 of the New York city building code, section 1609.7.3 of the New York city building code, section 1613.5.3 of the New York city building code, section 1613.5.4 and 1613.5.5 of the New York city building code, table 1704.3 of the New York city building code, table 401.5 of the New York city mechanical code, Section 304.4.1 of the New York City fuel gas code and section 504.3.20 of the New York City fuel gas code. Intro. 474 – A Local Law to amend local law number 41 for the year 2012, local number 79 for the year 2013, local number 108 for the year 2013, local law number 110 for the year 2013, local law number 100 for the year 2013, local law number 101 for the year 2013, local law number 130 for the year 2013, local law number 141 for the year 2013, local law number 10 for the year 2014, local law number 12 for the year 2014, local law number 13 for the year 2014, local number 17 for the year 2014 and local law number 18 for the year 2014, in relation to extending the effective date for the 2014 revisions to the New York City construction codes. Traffic Safety Intro. 371-A – A Local Law to amend the administrative code of the City of New York, in relation to civil penalties for leaving the scene of an incident without reporting. pressoffice@cityhall.nyc.gov (212) 788-2958 Source: <http://www1.nyc.gov/office-of-the-mayor/news/461-14/mayor-bill-de-blasio-signs-series-bills-law-related-youth-the-foster-care-system-#>

Sense of invalidation uniquely risky for troubled teens 07/10/2014 10:46:00 A study of 99 teens hospitalized out of concern about suicide risk found that a high perception of family invalidation – or lack of acceptance – predicted future suicide events among boys, and peer invalidation predicted future self harm, such as cutting, among the teens in general. PROVIDENCE, R.I. [Brown University] — Among the negative feelings that can plague a teen's psyche is a perception of "invalidation," or a lack of acceptance. A new study by Brown University and Butler Hospital researchers suggests that independent of other known risk factors, measuring teens' sense of invalidation by family members or peers can help predict whether they will try to harm themselves or even attempt suicide. In some cases, as with peers, that sense of invalidation could come from being bullied, but it could also be more subtle. In the case of family, for example, a teen who is gay may feel a strong degree of invalidation if he or she perceives that parents would either disapprove or be disappointed upon finding out, said study lead author Shirley Yen, associate professor of psychiatry and human behavior in the Warren Alpert Medical School of Brown University. For the study, which appears online in the Journal of Child and Adolescent Psychopharmacology, Yen and her colleagues followed a group of 99 teens, each admitted to a psychiatric facility because they had tried to kill themselves or presented a serious risk of doing so, for six months of follow-up. Along the way they assessed the teens' sense of family and peer invalidation as well as other demographic and psychiatric data. They also tracked whether the teens (or their parents) reported new suicide attempts or related events by the teen, or whether the teen was engaging in cutting or other forms of self-harm. Assessing family invalidation involved asking questions such as, "Were there times when you did not feel accepted by your family? Or that you could not express your true thoughts and feelings? Or that if you did express your thoughts and feelings that you would be dismissed, punished, ignored or made fun of?" There were similar questions about peers. The researchers assessed invalidation upon hospital admission. Then, at the six-month mark, the teens were asked to recall the degree of such feelings anchored in notable events. Ratings were assigned for each week of that past half-year. After statistically accounting for other known risk factors such as low positive affect or high levels of aggression, Yen found that a moderate to high perception of family invalidation proved a statistically significant predictor of a later suicide event among boys. A strong degree of peer invalidation, meanwhile, predicted engagement in self-harm behaviors in the overall group (boys and girls). "What this points to is the importance of assessing for the teen's individual feelings of invalidation," Yen said. "This is different than a lack of social support." Yen said doctors and psychologists may find the measure of invalidation especially helpful in the context seen in the study: identifying a distinctly higher suicide or self-mutilation risk within a group of teens already understood to be very troubled. Yen has worked for years to understand the different risk factors of suicide and self-mutilation among troubled youths. Her goal is to understand the key risk factors, such as family and peer invalidation, well enough to produce new, effective clinical interventions or inform existing ones. In addition to Yen, the paper's other authors are Kevin

Kuehn, Katherine Tezanos, Lauren Weinstock, Dr. Joel Solomon, and Anthony Spirito. The National Institute of Mental Health supported the study (grant K23 MH06990). Source: <http://www.healthcanal.com/mental-health-behavior/55899-sense-of-invalidation-uniquely-risky-for-troubled-teens.html>

Concerned Silver Lake community gets answers at meeting with Vil - KTTC Rochester, Austin, Mason City News, Weather and Sports Concerned Silver Lake community gets answers at meeting with Village Ranch officials Posted: Oct 06, 2014 7:47 PM PDT Updated: Oct 07, 2014 6:27 AM PDT By Ali Killam, Reporter Email_Connect_akilam@kttc.com ROCHESTER, Minn. (KTTC) -- A community shaken by the news of a new troubled youth facility being constructed in their neighborhood fired their questions at program officials on Monday. The main concern from community members was the lack of communication leading up to Monday night's meeting, and the lack of trust they have moving forward. However, it's clear this is an issue that Village Ranch officials want to amend in the future. It was quite the surprise when Silver Lake residents learned what was being constructed just feet away from their yards. "When I heard that there was going to be a group home in town, for troubled teenagers, how much supervision they were going to have, what it was going to do to our property value?" said concerned resident, Cindy Grenier. Outrage quickly ensued after the discovery -- leading to Monday night's community meeting with Village Ranch Child and Family Services officials. Many voiced concerns over the small lot housing 12 teens plus staff being too close for comfort. "Can you imagine what all of us people are going to do around here?" voiced resident and former Rochester mayor, Dewey Day. In the end, it all came down to trust for residents, who were frustrated with the delay in receiving any information on the project. It's something Village Ranch pledges to work on. "Yes, you have a legitimate beef that this meeting didn't happen before now," said Village Ranch executive director, Scott Bakeberg. "All I can say is I'm sorry, I was wrong and I'll do whatever I can do to make sure this never happens again." Chuck Solseth, whose front yard is just strides away from the future troubled youth facility, admits the unknown is what worries him. "I just want to make sure my kids are safe in the neighborhood," he said. "I want to be able to walk up and down my streets without having to worry about, you know, thugs." After getting more information, he is increasingly receptive to his future neighbors. "I feel much more at ease now that I've heard a little bit more on how they operate," said Solseth. Still, some remain skeptical to the development and what it means for the community. "I feel like we didn't have a choice, it was kind of, here you are, deal with it," said Grenier. Those residents are planning to meet with city planning and zoning to discuss that future. Village Ranch has abided by all zoning laws. City and state officials have approved the group's plans to build on the lot they have selected. Bakeberg brought with him multiple copies of kind letters written by residents and organizations in the facility's other two locations in Cokato and Hutchinson. He said the teens housed in the facility would be there from a couple of weeks to nine months. Officials hope to open the facility by mid-February, which will have security cameras, alarms and round-the-clock supervision of clients. Village Ranch said the teens they house are very low-risk to the community, but have been either charged criminally, or been recommended by social services to the program. Source: <http://www.kttc.com/story/26719933/2014/10/06/concerned-silver-lake-community-gets-answers-at-meeting-with-village-ranch-officials>

Rikers Island is Eliminating Juvenile Solitary Confinement. Now What? By: Trey Bundy and Daffodil J. Altan | October 7, 2014 View as "Clean Read" ShareEmail Print Russ Nelson / Flickr At times, more than a quarter of Rikers' adolescent population (numbering in the hundreds) was held in prolonged solitary confinement — nearly always before being convicted of any crime. From The Center for Investigative Reporting: For years, New York City's Department of Correction has worked to conceal its practice of putting adolescent inmates in solitary confinement. But last week, the agency announced plans to eliminate such confinement for 16- and 17-year-old inmates. The swift action indicates that juvenile solitary confinement has become a human rights issue that officials nationwide can no longer ignore. The changes come after several months of media scrutiny and a critical U.S. Department of Justice investigation calling on the agency to revamp its treatment of adolescents. The Center for Investigative Reporting was the first to report on the issue earlier this year. Here are some key things to understand about juvenile solitary confinement in the U.S. and the efforts to reform it. Most youth detention facilities in the United States use some form of prolonged isolation for teens. Solitary confinement often is the default intervention used for teenagers in lieu of adequate staff training and supervision and mental health services for inmates. While correction officers say solitary confinement is needed to control violent young inmates, our reporting found that teens are routinely sent for minor infractions. At Rikers Island, guards are permitted to isolate inmates for days or weeks for talking back, horseplay and possession of "unauthorized amounts" of clothing or art supplies. We know little about how many young inmates get placed in solitary, why and for how long. This is what Juan Méndez, the United Nations' special rapporteur on torture, called "a chaos of information." Juvenile solitary confinement is torture, he said, and no one knows how common it is. Because most U.S. facilities are not required to track or report their use of isolation for juveniles, the practice has flourished in the shadows. And because no federal laws prohibit isolating teenagers indefinitely for 23 hours a day, young inmates can spend months alone in their cells without anyone outside their facilities noticing. Many facilities suppress information and close their doors to scrutiny. New York City Councilman Daniel Dromm sponsored a recently passed bill requiring corrections officials to report detailed data about who is held in solitary, why and for how long, after officials refused to provide him with data he requested. His legislation could be a model for other jurisdictions seeking the access and information required to understand what is happening to teenagers in local facilities. CIR made dozens of requests to visit the isolation units in facilities that hold juveniles across the country, but only one, in Santa Cruz, Calif., opened its doors and talked openly about efforts to reduce the use of solitary confinement. Officials at the Santa Cruz County Juvenile Hall have kept isolation data for years, tracking a decline in the practice so drastic that officials from jurisdictions all over the country travel to California to see how they did it. Most corrections officers are trained to take a law enforcement approach to what often is a mental health problem. The fact that so many facilities refuse to open their doors to scrutiny points to an institutional awareness that troubled teens are not being treated for the root causes of their problems, but merely controlled until they are inevitably released back into their communities. Norman Seabrook, president of New York City's powerful correction officers union, told CIR last year that teenagers did not belong at Rikers because guards there were not trained to manage young inmates, about half of whom have mental health diagnoses. Seabrook also said punitive segregation, Rikers' term for solitary confinement, was the only tool his officers had to control young inmates. "We don't use punitive segregation enough," he said. What we found in New York City was particularly alarming. At times, more than a quarter of Rikers' adolescent population (numbering in the hundreds) was held in prolonged solitary confinement — nearly always before being convicted of any crime. The Department of Correction tried to deflect CIR's questions for a year, claiming that Rikers was not suitable for a story about juvenile solitary confinement because the facility is an adult jail, even though it continues to hold hundreds of teens younger than 18. Agency officials also said that the department had nothing to hide in its adolescent units and that young inmates were flush with rehabilitative services. In truth, Rikers, like many jails, prisons and juvenile halls, has long been a dangerous place for teenagers. Young people there often are stabbed, beaten by inmates and guards, and locked alone in 6-by-8-foot cells for weeks or months at a time. The Department of Justice's report in August concluded that Rikers' treatment of its teen population was unconstitutional and gave the department 49 days to make changes. Now that Rikers Island, the nation's second-largest jail, is saying it will ban juvenile solitary confinement, it's possible that other jurisdictions will follow suit. A growing chorus of mental health experts claims that isolating teenagers makes them more violent, and more relationship-based and trauma-informed approaches to managing teens will lead to safer facilities and safer streets. Although Rikers Island officials have been privy to such perspectives for years, it took months of media scrutiny and a federal investigation for them to acknowledge the damage their practices have caused and commit to changing them. The question now is whether others will voluntarily work to find new ways to manage troubled teens, like officials did in Santa Cruz, or whether they will wait for government probes and media attention. This story was produced by The Center for Investigative Reporting, a nonprofit news organizations based in the San Francisco Bay Area. More at cironline.org. Reach the reporters at tbundy@cironline.org and daltan@cironline.org. Follow CIR on Twitter @CIRonline. Source: <http://jije.org/rikers-island-is-eliminating-juvenile-solitary-confinement-now-what/>

Lawsuit filed against former Jacksonville group home owner and employee after patient found injured | members.jacksonville.com Lawsuit filed against former Jacksonville group home owner and employee after patient found injured By Dan Scanlan Wed, Oct 8, 2014 @ 2:51 pm The family of a 29-year-old mentally handicapped man has filed a lawsuit against a Jacksonville group home, its owner and an employee for criminal neglect, according to attorney Curry Pajcic. Michael Rodriguez was severely injured Feb. 13 at Herlea's Residential Care Facility at 3334 Sheridan Road. Owner Leathia Bonner and employee Linda Pickens Ginn left Rodriguez with a broken elbow and severe road rash for 14 to 18 hours without treatment, according to the lawsuit filed Wednesday. Another caregiver found him the next day in his bed, unable to move and covered in urine, blood and pus. Police charged Bonner and Ginn with culpable negligence of an elderly person, and the facility on Sheridan Road was closed down. Rodriguez was hospitalized and underwent surgery to repair his broken elbow. Bonner pleaded guilty in September and was sentenced to one year of probation, 50 hours of community service and a mandate that she not be employed in any facility that cares for the elderly or disabled, court records show. Ginn also pleaded guilty and is scheduled to be sentenced Friday. Source: <http://members.jacksonville.com/news/crime/2014-10-08/story/lawsuit-filed-against-former-jacksonville-group-home-owner-and-employee>

State suspends Troy group home's license Charles E. Ramirez, The Detroit News 1:24 p.m. EDT October 10, 2014 2 State officials have suspended services at an Oakland County group home for adults and plan to revoke its license. Michigan's Department of Human Services Bureau of Children and Adult Licensing issued the suspension order against Pioneer Rehabilitation Specialists Inc. in Troy earlier this week, officials said Friday. The move comes after the agency investigated the home, on Tutbury Lane near North Adams and East Square Lake roads, and found violations of the state's rules regarding the care of residents at adult care facilities. Bob Wheaton, a spokesman for the department's licensing bureau, said the agency can't divulge specifics about the allegations. However, he said the violations didn't result in death or serious injury. After an on-site inspection in February of this year, the bureau of children and adult licensing cited the group home for 10 violations. Among them: ■Staff failed to take universal precautions when passing out residents' medications. ■Staff failed to dispense one patient's medication as prescribed. ■Bleach and other cleaning supplies were stored under a kitchen sink and were unsecured from the residents. ■Two residents of the opposite sex, identified as brother and sister, shared a room. ■The door to the home's fuse box was broken. Imran Khan, who is listed as the licensee for Pioneer Rehabilitation Specialists, was not available for comment Friday. Under the order, Pioneer Rehabilitation is banned from operating the group home and from accepting new residents. It also had to inform all guardians of the adults in its care that its license was suspended and it could no longer provide services at the facility as of 6 p.m. Wednesday. State officials said Pioneer has had its license since August 2011 and was authorized to care for six adults. At the time of its license suspension, five adults were being cared for at the facility, Wheaton said. He also said the department's Adult Protective Services division helped place those adults in other licensed residential facilities. In the meantime, the agency will forward the case to the state's Administrative Hearing System. Pioneer has the right to appeal the suspension. cramirez@detroitnews.com Source: <http://www.detroitnews.com/story/news/local/oakland-county/2014/10/10/troy-group-home-license-suspended/17037961/>

Major Firm Closing Group Homes In State By Josh Kovner contact the reporter Finance Dispute over finances, quality of care leads firm to shut group homes. A major player in the business of providing housing and health care to people with intellectual disabilities is leaving Connecticut, saying the state isn't paying enough to do a difficult, labor-intensive job in an industry characterized by sub-par wages and high turnover. REM Connecticut also has been cited for lapses in nursing care and other services, and has been accused of over-billing the state by at least $879,000. REM, which denies the billing accusation, was paid $11.6 million in fiscal year 2014 to manage 28 group homes and apartments for the Department of Developmental Services. It wasn't enough, the company says, and it had to operate at a financial loss to serve about 85 DDS clients. REM is a for-profit company in a field dominated by nonprofits, but the bottom line is the same, say other operators and industry lobbyists: In an era of heightened public scrutiny of group-home staff and a large list of families waiting for openings in group homes and other programs, the lack of annual cost-of-living increases forces companies to operate on the very margins of their budgets, or beyond. REM, part of a national company that operates in 36 states, says it is leaving only because of DDS' rate structure, and that the departure after 15 years "is a last resort." But a fair number of group-home providers, large companies and small, have been able to function within the constraints. And there has been no shortage of interest from other operators in picking up where REM is leaving off — provided the rates will cover staff, training, supplies and other expenses, said Julia Wilcox of the Connecticut Association for Nonprofits. REM's departure will be complete by the end of the year, and REM workers are still staffing group homes during the hand-off. Comments Got something to say? Start the conversation and be the first to comment. Add a comment 0 An industry source confirmed that about dozen operators have expressed interest in REM's sites, although DDS declined to discuss the selection process. The money that the operators receive is based on the needs of the clients. DDS establishes a budget for the annual care of each person. The more medically needy, the higher the individual budget — but also the more staff and specialized care the group-home operators must provide. Given adequate funding, "there is absolutely the desire and capacity in the provider network" to take on new work, Wilcox said. DDS spokeswoman Joan Barnish did say that several companies will be chosen to take over the homes that were managed solely by REM, and that no one company will have more than a few of the homes. REM managed sites in Winsted, Middletown, Lebanon, Haddam, Windsor, Stafford Springs, North Granby, Manchester, and Bloomfield, among other places. Ron Cretaro, executive director of the association for nonprofits, said many group-home workers haven't had a raise in five or more years, and that some companies have stayed afloat by cutting benefits. The development director of one large provider with a successful track record in Connecticut said the company couldn't stay in business without private donations to supplement state funding. In a series last year on preventable deaths of developmentally disabled people in group homes and other facilities, The Courant reported on the high turnover of workers, a disparity in the quality of group homes across the state, and gaps in training, medical oversight, nursing care and other specialized services. After a group-home worker in East Hartford was caught on videotape abusing a client in July 2012, many members of the public wondered aloud about the hiring and screening of workers, and the supervision inside group homes. There have also been instances of a worker fired for sexual abuse or other transgressions being hired by another group-home operator. Terrance Macy, the DDS commissioner, has said on several occasions over the past two years that he wants to see the emphasis shift from the classic group-home model to family-based services, in which a family or several families could receive the funding to hire caregivers and specialists. But the demand by parents and relatives for well-run groups for their loved ones remains high. There are 686 people on a waiting list for immediate group-home placements or other services, and another 1,157 who are expected to need the placements or other services within the next two or more years. Vacancies in the homes are filled as soon as they open. So REM is leaving an atmosphere of high demand, but precarious funding. In a letter to REM Connecticut dated Sept. 19, DDS officials said the state would withhold about $879,000 from REM's 2015 funding for what the state called improper charges by the company. Asked what DDS was prepared to do to recover the money since REM is leaving, Barnish said the department "is continuing to review prior-year expenditures and, until the reviews are complete, we will not comment on potential actions." REM officials said they have been using the same accounting and auditing procedures for 15 years with no issues before now. Paul Cataldo, executive director of REM Connecticut, said the company hasn't "received a request from DDS for a payback related to prior fiscal years, but we remain confident that we have consistently complied with state reimbursement rules." Company officials acknowledged that REM was placed on "enhanced monitoring," or a heightened level of scrutiny by DDS, over lapses in nursing service one year ago. But the company said the matter was quickly addressed. "While we had successfully served very complex individuals for many years, we experienced a brief period during which our nursing services did not meet either our own internal standards or the department's," said a statement issued by company spokeswoman Sarah Magazine. She said REM tapped into expert services from the national company and partnered with a contract nursing service. "We are confident that our collective efforts have resulted in significant improvements in the caliber of nursing services we provide," the statement said. But Barnish said "enhanced-monitoring decisions are drawn from a broad overview of supports. Nursing is only one facet of a much larger support system." Barnish said REM remains on enhanced monitoring, which means DDS case managers, financial experts and other personnel have been visiting REM group homes and apartments on a frequent basis, and are continuing to examine company operations. Several state committees are working to reduce the DDS waiting list and help program providers cope with more than $15 million in additional cuts and Medicaid adjustments that are coming soon. Wilcox, who is serving with two of the groups, said for years some group-home providers have received lower rates than others. She said one of the committees is trying to devise a way to equalize the rates, which would help some of the providers. Source: <http://www.courant.com/news/connecticut/hc-group-homes-disability-violations-1011-20141010-story.html#page=1>

How to Turn Around Troubled Teens Research reveals that get-tough tactics may worsen rates of juvenile delinquency Oct 16, 2014 |By Scott O. Lilienfeld and Hal Arkowitz ISTOCKPHOTO More In This Article Parent Training Can Improve Kids' Behavior Mike S. (not his real name) was 13 years old when one of us (Lilienfeld) met him on an inpatient psychiatric ward, where Lilienfeld was a clinical psychology intern. Mike was articulate and charming, and he radiated warmth. Yet this initial impression belied a disturbing truth. For several years Mike had been in serious trouble at school for lying, cheating and assaulting classmates. He was verbally abusive toward his biological mother, who lived alone with him. Mike tortured and even killed cats and bragged about experiencing no guilt over these actions. He was finally brought to the hospital in the mid-1980s, after he was caught trying to con railroad workers into giving him dynamite, which he intended to use to blow up his school. According to psychiatry's standard guidebook, the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (now in its fifth edition), Mike's diagnosis was conduct disorder, a condition marked by a pattern of antisocial and perhaps criminal behavior emerging in childhood or adolescence. Psychologists have long struggled with how to treat adolescents with conduct disorder, or juvenile delinquency, as the condition is sometimes called when it comes to the attention of the courts. Given that the annual number of juvenile court cases is about 1.2 million, these efforts are of great societal importance. One set of approaches involves "getting tough" with delinquents by exposing them to strict discipline and attempting to shock them out of future crime. These efforts are popular, in part because they quench the public's understandable thirst for law and order. Yet scientific studies indicate that these interventions are ineffective and can even backfire. Better ways to turn around troubled teens involve teaching them how to engage in positive behaviors rather than punishing them for negative ones. You're in the Army Now One get-tough technique is boot camp, or "shock incarceration," a solution for troubled teens introduced in the 1980s. Modeled after military boot camps, these programs are typically supervised by a drill instructor and last from three to six months. They emphasize strict rules and swift punishments (such as repeated push-ups) for disobedience, along with a regimen of physical work and demanding exercise. According to the National Institute of Justice, 11 states operated such programs in 2009. Indeed, Mike S. was sent to a boot camp program following his discharge from the hospital. Even so, research has yielded at best mixed support for boot camps. In a 2010 review of 69 controlled studies, criminologists Benjamin Meade and Benjamin Steiner, both then at the University of South Carolina, revealed that such programs produced little or no overall improvement in offender recidivism. For reasons that are unclear, some of them reduced rates of delinquency, but others led to higher rates. Boot camps that incorporated psychological treatments, such as substance abuse counseling or psychotherapy, seemed somewhat more effective than those that did not offer such therapies, although the number of studies was too small to draw firm conclusions. Another method is "Scared Straight," which became popular following an Academy Award-winning documentary (Scared Straight!), which was filmed in a New Jersey state prison in 1978. Typically these programs bring delinquents and other high-risk teens into prisons to interact with adult inmates, who talk bluntly about the harsh realities of life behind bars. Making adolescents keenly aware of prison life is supposed to deter them from criminal careers. Yet the research on these interventions is not encouraging. In a 2003 meta-analysis (quantitative review) of nine controlled studies of Scared Straight programs, criminal justice researcher Anthony Petrosino, now at the research agency WestEd, and his colleagues showed that these treatments backfired, boosting the odds of offending by 60 to 70 percent. The verdict for other get-tough interventions, such as juvenile transfer laws, which allow teens who commit especially heinous offenses to be tried as adults, is no more promising. In a 2010 summary, psychologist Richard Redding of Chapman University found higher recidivism rates among transferred adolescent offenders than among nontransferred ones. Perils of Punishment Psychologists do not know for sure why get-tough treatments are ineffective and potentially harmful, but the psychological literature holds several clues. First, researchers have long found that punishment-based strategies tend to be less effective than reward-based strategies for lasting behavioral change, in part because they teach people what not to do but not what to do. Second, studies indicate that highly confrontational therapeutic approaches are rarely effective in the long term. For example, in a 1993 controlled trial psychologist William Miller of the University of New Mexico and his colleagues found that counselors who used confrontational styles with problem drinkers—for example, by taking them to task for minimizing the extent of their drinking problem—had significantly less success in helping their clients overcome their addictions than did counselors who used supportive styles that relied on empathy. Similarly, a 2010 review by criminal justice researcher Paul Klenowski of Clarion University and his collaborators found that delinquency programs that involved confrontational tactics, such as berating children for misbehavior, were less effective than programs that did not use them. What is more, adolescents with conduct disorder often enter treatment angry and alienated, harboring feelings of resentment toward authority. Get-tough programs may fuel these emotions, boosting teens' propensity to rebel against parents and teachers. Finally, some programs may inadvertently provide adolescents with role models for bad behavior. For example, some of the at-risk teens exposed to prisoners in Scared Straight programs may perceive them as cool and worth emulating. These results show that merely imposing harsh discipline on young offenders or frightening them is unlikely to help them refrain from problematic behavior. Instead teens must learn enduring tools—including better social skills, ways to communicate with parents and peers, and anger management techniques—that help them avoid future aggression. Several effective interventions do just that, including cognitive-behavior therapy, a method intended to change maladaptive thinking patterns and behaviors, and multisystemic therapy, in which parents, schools and communities develop programs to reinforce positive behaviors. Another well-supported method, aimed at improving behavior in at-risk children younger than eight years, is parent-child interaction therapy. Parents are coached by therapists in real time to respond to a child's behavior in ways that strengthen the parent-child bond and provide incentives for cooperation [see "Behave!" by Ingrid Wickelgren; Scientific American Mind, March/April 2014]. The negative data on get-tough programs remind us that we should be wary of our subjective impressions of strategies that simply seem right or that we feel ought to work. Although we lost track of Mike S., we now know that a concerted effort to teach him more adaptive behaviors would have been more likely to put him on a productive path than would any attempt to scare him straight. This article was originally published with the title "Kid Gloves for Young Offenders?." Source:

<http://www.scientificamerican.com/article/how-to-turn-around-troubled-teens/>

Shelters too often home for Tucson's abused kids Shelters too often home for Tucson's abused kids Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email Respond: Write a letter to the editor | Write a guest opinion » 2014-10-11T20:00:00Z 2014-10-11T23:10:37Z Shelters too often home for Tucson's abused kids By Patty Machelor Arizona Daily Star Arizona Daily Star October 11, 2014 8:00 pm • By Patty Machelor Patty Machelor pmachelor@azstarnet.com Loading... Abused and neglected children in Pima County are placed in group homes and emergency shelters rather than foster families at the highest rate in Arizona and more than twice the national average. Group care, where several children live in a home run by a staff, should be used only for children who need therapy or rehabilitation, said Tracey Feild, director of the Annie E. Casey Foundation's Child Welfare Strategy Group. "You can paint the walls as brightly as you want, but it's not a family and it's not a home," Feild said. "If they don't need therapy, they shouldn't be in a group home. They should be with a family." Putting a child in a group home should be temporary — a transition to returning home or to foster care, for example. But in Arizona, records show that 90 percent of children and teens in group care aren't there because they need these extra services — they're there because of the state's critical shortage of foster homes. As of May 2014, an average of 2,101 children and teens were being placed in group care each month statewide, with only 10 percent in therapeutic group homes or residential treatment. Pima County, as of March, had 741 licensed foster families with 1,709 total beds — and 3,356 children in out-of-home care, state records show. Some relief could be coming. The Arizona Department of Child Safety in August asked for greater flexibility with its foster-care funds from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and the waiver was approved last week. ADCS Director Charles Flanagan applied for the waiver in order to reduce the state's reliance on group homes and shelters. He'll do that by focusing on recruiting and retaining more foster families, he said, as well as improving services that help children stay home while the family gets help. Keeping more children and teens out of group care would be a critical step for Arizona, experts say. A glance through just about any scholarly piece on the topic shows the disturbing variety of things that can, and do, happen to children at higher rates in group homes: sexual abuse, sex trafficking, physical or emotional abuse by staffers or other children. Studies have also shown a higher risk for delinquency as well as over-reliance on psychotropic medication to keep children from acting out. Pima County leads the state in group placement, with 31 percent of children here winding up in group care the first time they are taken into state custody. In Maricopa County, the rate is close to 20 percent, and in Pinal County, it's about 12 percent, records show. Nationally, the average number of displaced children in group care is 15 percent, the Casey Foundation reports. "There are plenty of states that have gotten that number down much lower, and plenty are at 5, 6, 7 percent," Feild said. Of those children in group care statewide as of May, 8 percent were younger than a year old, 11 percent were ages 1 to 5, 20 percent were ages 6 to 12, and 50 percent were ages 13 to 17. When a state relies on group care at such high rates, Feild said, it's usually because it has "greatly underinvested in their foster-care system or their kinship care." That's what happened in Arizona, where a lack of foster homes has led to a reliance on group care. Crushing workloads for child-welfare workers coupled with a stressed system often result in foster parents and adoptive parents being poorly supported and taken for granted, said Flanagan, who has headed the child-welfare agency for less than a year. "We're all focused on producing better outcomes. Is it fast enough for me? No," Flanagan said. Source:

http://tucson.com/news/local/tucson-s-abused-neglected-kids-being-put-in-shelters-not/article_6afbc558-df90-52ab-887f-00dc56181d4a.html

Families Discuss How Child Welfare System Has Failed Them Posted: Oct 15, 2014 3:46 PM PDT Updated: Oct 15, 2014 4:37 PM PDT By Lacie Lowry, News 9 BioEmail Connect Biography lacie.lowry@news9.net You need to download the latest version of flash player to use this player Need Help? The report came out the same day several Oklahoma families gathered at the state capitol to explain how the state's child welfare system has failed their families. OKLAHOMA CITY - A new report released Wednesday from three experts slams Oklahoma's Department of Human Services. DHS promised to make changes after settling a class action lawsuit two years ago involving the welfare of children in state custody. The new report stated DHS is getting worse in some areas. The report came out the same day several Oklahoma families gathered at the state capitol to explain how the state's child welfare system has failed their families. "I'm very frustrated, I'm hurt and I have no faith in the Department of Human Services," Victoria Ransom said. Ransom said she was not allowed to adopt her three nephews, and instead, a foster family adopted the boys. She said the reason was lack of income, although she was never told there was an income requirement and therefore did not have a chance to better her financial situation to meet an income requirement. 3/30/2012 Related Story: Oklahoma

Leaders Announce Plans To Improve DHS, Child Welfare “The Department of Human Services is not interested in keeping children connected to their family whatsoever,” Ransom added. When children are removed from their homes, DHS said the majority are placed with relatives or people the kids know. However, Leslie Lambeth said she was not allowed to adopt her grandson after she said she passed all the requirements and background checks. “It hurts, it really does,” said Lambeth. “I could understand if I was a person who wasn’t qualified, but I’m overqualified,” the former prison guard and corrections officer said. “Very frustrated being allowed to do things for the state of Oklahoma and not for my own family, it really took a toll on me,” Lambeth added. DHS was further criticized in a new report by the three experts appointed to monitor DHS’s improvement. The state has devoted more than $93 million so far to the DHS reform plan, called the Pinnacle Plan, but the agency’s performance was poor in several areas like: very high caseloads inadequate supply of foster homes backlog of abuse/neglect investigations long delays responding to abuse/neglect calls overuse of shelters for kids over six The DHS Director, Ed Lake, said the agency still has a long way to go before it is completely satisfied with its services, but points to progress like: decreasing shelter placements for kids under six more caseworker visits with children better trained abuse/neglect investigators DHS also said it has seen a 40 percent increase in the past two years in the number of children coming into the foster care system. Abuse and neglect calls have also increased, all of which stresses resources, but the agency said it is confident it can keep making the necessary improvements to ensure the safety of Oklahoma children. The Department of Human Services released the following statement: The Oklahoma Department of Human Services received the third commentary from the “co-neutrals” overseeing the Department’s implementation of the Pinnacle Plan, a five-year improvement plan for its foster care system. DHS settled a class-action lawsuit in January 2012 by agreeing to make good faith efforts to achieve targeted improvements in a range of areas to improve services for children in its care. Under the settlement agreement, the co-neutrals are required to provide commentary twice a year on DHS’s overall progress and good faith efforts to achieve substantial and sustained progress toward the outcomes identified in the settlement agreement. “We are absolutely committed to implementing the Pinnacle Plan in order to improve the way we care for the children in our custody,” said DHS Director Ed Lake. “We have a myriad of efforts underway which are already showing positive results. (See Child Welfare Services Efforts to Improve Services to Children and Families). “While we still have a long way to go before we can be completely satisfied with our services, we are making progress to make this system better for kids and families,” said Lake. “We have increased in-home services to families in lieu of foster care. When children must be removed from their homes, the majority are placed with relatives or people the children know. Younger children are being kept out of shelters. Our workers are making required visits to the children in their caseloads and kids are moving less frequently between placements. “As we continue to make improvements, it is important to remember that we have seen a 40 percent increase in the past two years in the number of children coming into the foster care system,” Lake said. “Abuse and neglect calls to the agency have increased as well as the numbers of children involved in those calls. This demand has stretched DHS’ available resources and slowed the implementation of our plans for improvement. Despite these challenges, we are confident we can continue to move forward and make the kind of improvements Oklahoma needs.” DHS is making smart investments of taxpayer resources and laying a strong foundation that will be sustainable over time. Working with national child welfare experts, DHS is building services and partnerships with private contractors, community partners, and other state agencies--partnerships that did not exist two years ago. (See list of Child Welfare Partnerships – Pre and Post Pinnacle Plan) Accomplishments and Progress: Shelter placements for children under the age of six have nearly been eliminated. The number of youth ages 13-18 years old who have been kept out of shelters is increasing (See chart – Youth Age 13-18 Years with a Shelter Stay during SFY) More than 50 percent of all the children being served are in kinship homes with family members and people with whom children already have established relationships. (See charts – Percent of Children by Placement Type on Last Day of SFY and Number of Children by Placement Type of Last Day of SFY) More children and families each year are receiving in-home services in lieu of foster care placements (See chart - Number of Children in Family Centered Services cases) Children are being visited by their caseworkers as required and most are being seen by their primary workers. (See charts – Frequency of Worker/Primary Worker Contacts) Children are moving less. The placement stability of children in foster care is improving. (See three charts – Placement Stability Measures) Significantly improved Office of Client Advocacy (OCA) investigative practices. OCA has made a number of changes to its investigations of abuse and neglect allegations of children in residential settings such as group homes, shelters and treatment facilities (does not include foster homes). OCA now follows the same time frames and criteria as other child protective services investigations, and these are now tracked and reported in the same system as other abuse and neglect investigations. DHS provided Child Welfare Specialists two pay raises and foster parents with two rate increases in 2014--three increases respectively since state fiscal year 2013. DHS has also significantly streamlined the hiring process for child welfare specialists. (For current pay and rates, see Rate Increases - Pinnacle Plan page, okdhs.org website) Although the number of foster homes recruited by the private partners has not met Pinnacle Plan targets, the quality of the homes is high. Foster families are being better supported and the children are experiencing positive placement changes. Challenges: Adequate supply of foster homes – Contracts with private foster care partners have been in effect since August 2013; however, agencies were not able to begin recruitment efforts in earnest until November 2013. (DHS did not send referrals to foster care partner agencies until they were ready to begin work, contrary to the commentary.) The agencies have reported facing similar challenges DHS faces in recruiting and hiring high-quality staff. Foster care partners report a collaborative working relationship with DHS as well as frequent and high quality communication. DHS has worked continuously with agencies to quickly remove any barriers and solve problems as they are encountered. High caseloads for staff – Increased demands on the child welfare system have made it more difficult to reduce workloads. However, several significant initiatives are underway to reduce entries to foster care and help children already in care to reunify with their families or reach adoption faster. Since 2012, 772 additional child welfare specialists and assistants have been added to the workforce. In addition, supervisor to worker ratios have been reduced to 1:5, experienced specialists have been trained to mentor new employees, and smaller caseloads are being assigned to new workers. The hiring process has been dramatically streamlined and overtime compensation widely approved to support staff in handling cases. Child Welfare Services has also recently engaged the Children’s Mental Health Services Research Center of the University of Tennessee to implement research-based methods to improve service quality, child outcomes, and organizational support of its front line employees. (See line graph showing the increase in numbers of CWS staff). Shelter use for children older than six years old – DHS agrees that all children need to be in family-like settings. DHS has several initiatives to address this including the expansion of intensive in-home prevention and reunification services to keep more children home safely with their families in lieu of foster care placements; continuing to work with foster care partner agencies on the recruitment of more foster homes. Backlog of child abuse investigations – DHS, along with the assistance of Eckerd, reduced the backlog of Child Protective Services assessments and investigations from almost 3,600 a year ago to 1,200 today and the work continues. Source: <http://www.news9.com/story/26797780/families-talk-about-how-child-welfare-system-has-failed-them>

Group-care trend worries Arizona auditor general Group-care trend worries Arizona auditor general Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email Respond: Write a letter to the editor | Write a guest opinion < > 2014-10-16T00:00:00Z 2014-10-16T13:59:51Z Group-care trend worries Arizona auditor general By Emily Bregel Arizona Daily Star Arizona Daily Star October 16, 2014 12:00 am • By Emily Bregel Emily Bregel ebregel@azstarnet.com Follow @emilybregel Loading... Related Documents Auditor General report Tennessee’s experience Tennessee reduced its congregate care use from 22 percent in January 2001 to 9 percent in January 2009 in part by requiring providers with congregate care contracts to maintain an array of placement options to best meet children’s needs. The state paid the providers the same no matter where they placed the child, giving an incentive to place children in family-based settings because they are less expensive. SOURCE: “A Special Report to the Department of Child Safety,” Arizona Office of the Auditor General Spending on congregate care in Arizona has nearly doubled since 2009, with the state spending $79 million to care for children in group homes, emergency shelters and residential treatment centers in fiscal year 2013, a new state report says. “Not only is congregate care expensive ... but it may adversely affect the children because it delays permanency and may pose threats to a child’s safety and well-being,” said the report, released Wednesday by the Arizona Office of the Auditor General. Arizona’s increased reliance on congregate care is due to a shortage of foster homes, as well as systemic problems at the Arizona Department of Economic Security, or DES, said the report. Up until this year, the DES oversaw Child Protective Services until details emerged of 6,600 reports of abuse that were never investigated. This year, the Department of Child Safety was created to oversee child welfare, and much of the DES staff transferred to the new department, overseen by Charles Flanagan. The report noted systemic departmental problems over the past five years, including: Inadequate planning for how to get children into permanent placements with adoptive families; Assumptions that older children in care may not be adoptable; Poorly matched children and foster homes; Overuse of congregate-care placements, suggesting that the CPS staff was overwhelmed by a surge in kids coming into state custody. That resulted in “high staff caseloads, caseload backlogs, high staff turnover, ineffective management practices, insufficient staff training and a culture that allowed individual judgment to substitute for standardized processes,” the report said. Smaller caseloads would allow employees to be more successful in finding permanent homes for children, the report said. The report recommends that Department of Child Safety learn from the experience of other states to reverse

these worrisome trends. The agency did not respond to a request for comment Wednesday afternoon. ARIZONA IS AN OUTLIER While most other states have seen reductions in the number of children in state custody, the foster population in Arizona has exploded, including in congregate care, said the report, which was conducted in response to a legislative request issued last year. Arizona's foster-care population has surged by 56 percent, from 10,100 in late 2009 to 15,750 in March 2014. In that time, the population in congregate care grew by 73 percent. Children are also staying in these group settings for longer, the report found. As the Star reported Sunday, Pima County places more children in congregate care than any other county in Arizona. In Pima County, 31 percent of children are put in group care the first time they are taken into state custody — more than twice the national average. Group homes are the least ideal placement for vulnerable children who have been removed from their families due to abuse and neglect, child advocates say. "Kids do not belong in congregate care. It's not a family. It's an institution in a neighborhood," Kris Jacober, foster parent and executive director of the Arizona Association for Foster and Adoptive Families, said Wednesday. Congregate care can cause lasting damage to children, the report said. "Studies indicate that children who were cared for in congregate-care settings were more likely to be arrested, continue problematic behaviors and have lower levels of education and more substance-abuse problems than children cared for in foster homes," the report said. They are also more vulnerable to being abused by staff members or other children, studies show. Congregate care is also much more expensive than foster care. A congregate-care placement can cost the state $40 to $327 per day, depending on the placement type, the report said. Regular foster families now get less than $20 per day, following 2009 budget cuts. About 15 percent of the Department of Child Safety's annual budget is eaten up by placements in congregate care, says the state's application for a waiver from some funding guidelines, which was recently approved by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. The waiver gives the state more flexibility in its use of federal foster-care funds, allowing the state to redirect money to prevention and interventions, the Star reported Sunday. The goal is to reduce the flow of children into the system and keep more families intact. CUTS TO PREVENTION The Legislature's deep cuts to preventive services and support for families, like child-care subsidies, has resulted in a surge of children coming into state custody, Eric Schindler, CEO of Child and Family Resources in Tucson, said Wednesday. Most of the new CPS cases following the budget cuts were reports of neglect, not physical abuse. "You reap what you sow," Schindler said. "There's nothing new here (in the report). We're just finally getting more media attention and more appropriate shining of the flashlight on what happens when you slash prevention, early intervention and the support services that used to be part of our social safety net." FOSTER-HOME SHORTAGE The shortage of foster homes is directly related to the increase of kids ending up in group homes, the report says. While Arizona's population of kids in state custody has grown by 56 percent since 2009, the number of Arizona foster families has only increased by 9 percent, the report said. Foster families are not well-supported — financially or otherwise — by the state, Jacober says. In 2009, foster-family reimbursements rates and allowances for clothing and other needs were put on the chopping block. The budget cuts strained foster families, who also struggle with getting timely responses from overwhelmed or inexperienced CPS caseworkers, Jacober said. Many struggle to secure behavioral health care for their troubled foster kids. Annual allotments for emergency clothing were cut from $300 to $150 a year in 2009. "You can't make that happen without going into your own pocket," Jacober said. Last year the Legislature restored some funding for preventive and family support services, but it wasn't nearly enough, said Linda Lopez, director of Child and Family Services for the Easter Seals Blake Foundation in Tucson. "It was a band-aid for a gaping wound," she said. "It's absolutely imperative that they get that funding restored for prevention services. Otherwise, we will never get ahead of this problem." Contact reporter Emily Bregel at ebregel@tucson.com or 807-7774. Source: http://tucson.com/news/group-care-trend-worries-arizona-auditor-general/article_2e3f36b7-d46f-511a-9a18-2d6dda4e78d9.html

Blue Sky group home now facing backlash in Botwood CBC News Posted: Oct 17, 2014 3:49 PM NT Last Updated: Oct 17, 2014 3:49 PM NT Blue Sky CEO Anne Whelan, seen here in a file photo, hopes a new location can be found in the Town of Botwood to operate a group home for children and youth. (CBC) Related Stories Stephenville taking Blue Sky appeal decision to Supreme Court Blue Sky application back with Stephenville council Blue Sky wins appeal for Stephenville youth home The Blue Sky group, which operates group homes for children and youth in the province, is facing criticism in yet another municipality. This time it's the Town of Botwood, which has ordered the private company to end its operations at a group home in town. This follows similar disputes in Stephenville and Marystown. In May, the company set up an emergency placement group home on a quiet street in Botwood, but shortly after the first youth began arriving, so too did the conflict with area residents. Mayor Jerry Dean said there have been instances of vandalism, and people in the neighbourhood feel unsafe. "We find ourselves here today, just one too many times, seeing the RCMP called up there, for things just not going well, and for that operation not settling in as we had hoped it would," said the mayor. The town council agreed the home could operate on a six-month provisional permit, but the town has now revoked the permit. Officials with Blue Sky chose not to appeal the decision. CEO Anne Whelan acknowledged that all has not gone well, referring to what she described as "significant incidents in recent weeks that were unusual in their severity." Whelan said she is in talks with town officials, and hopes to find another suitable home in a different part of the town. Meanwhile, Mayor Dean lashed out at the provincial government for its handling of the situation. He said the government awarded a contract to the company to establish groups homes in the province, and required that the company sign a "non-disclosure agreement" that prevented it from revealing its plans until the just before the home was ready to go into operation. "Government made no effort to engage us," he said. "It's so very disappointing for a government that has always talked about transparency. "I'm at a loss as to why they didn't see it coming," added Dean, who has publicly stated his intention to seek the Liberal nomination in the riding of Exploits for the next provincial general election. In a statement issued to CBC News, the Progressive Conservative government said the company and municipalities must work together to obtain the necessary permits. According to its website, Blue Sky employs 300 people, and is the first accredited child and youth care residential program provider in the province. Source: <http://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/newfoundland-labrador/blue-sky-group-home-now-facing-backlash-in-botwood-1.2803689>

Disabled child's July death due to injuries from 2008, official rules By Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun contact the reporter Trials and Arbitration Shootings Child Abuse Johns Hopkins Hospital Death of disabled foster child under care of LifeLine group home caused by severe abuse more than 6 years ago. The state medical examiner has ruled that the death of 10-year-old Damaud Martin in a state-regulated group home in July was caused by complications from cerebral palsy and past head trauma — severe conditions stemming from abuse the Baltimore boy suffered more than six years ago. With the medical examiner's autopsy complete, Baltimore police and prosecutors are investigating the disabled foster child's death as a homicide. The findings, which were released this week, will also factor into a probe by Maryland health regulators into the death. Related story: Disabled foster child's death ruled a homicide Doug Donovan The July death of a 10-year-old disabled foster child has been ruled a homicide / six years after the Baltimore city boy's mother was accused of shaking him into a coma-like state, Baltimore police announced Monday. The July death of a 10-year-old disabled foster child has been ruled a homicide / six years after the Baltimore city boy's mother was accused of shaking him into a coma-like state, Baltimore police announced Monday. (Doug Donovan) While it is not unusual for a medical examiner to say a recent death was caused by injuries suffered years earlier, most of those cases in Baltimore involve shooting victims. In a similar high-profile case, the death of James Brady in August was ruled a homicide, even though the shooting occurred during the assassination attempt on President Ronald Reagan in Washington in 1981. Allie Phillips, deputy director for the National Center for Prosecution of Child Abuse, said there is no data on how many cases like Damaud's are investigated and prosecuted as homicides. "It certainly doesn't happen very often," Phillips said. "It's difficult to match what happened when the child was 3 to what has happened now seven years later." But "it absolutely can be done" based on good medical testimony, she added. The Baltimore state's attorney's office, the medical examiner and city police declined to comment because of the ongoing homicide investigation and the probe by health regulators. Damaud's mother, Tamekia Martin — who was convicted in 2009 of child abuse that led to her son's injuries — continued to maintain her innocence Thursday. "I didn't do it," she said. Related Sun Investigates Sun Investigates: LifeLine, Inc. See all related 8 Police have made no arrest in the new investigation, and Martin, 34, said authorities have not informed her about the homicide determination. If they do, she said, she'll be ready to name the person who is responsible for the boy's injuries. "Everybody's coming after me, but I didn't hurt him," she said. Cerebral palsy is typically a condition children are born with, but it can be triggered by child abuse that causes severe brain damage, as in shaken baby syndrome, medical experts say. A doctor at Johns Hopkins Hospital who cared for Damaud in 2008 told police and prosecutors then that the boy's "brain injury and the bleeding on his brain were consistent with child abuse [and] shaken baby syndrome," according to a police report. The boy was 3 years old. Damaud Martin MARTIN FAMILY PHOTO / Baltimore Sun The death of Damaud Martin, shown in this 2008 photo, was caused by injuries sustained years ago, according to the state medical examiner. The death of Damaud Martin, shown in this 2008 photo, was caused by injuries sustained years ago, according to the state medical examiner. (MARTIN FAMILY PHOTO / Baltimore Sun) In May 2009, Martin agreed to an Alford plea, which means she did not admit guilt but acknowledged there was enough evidence to convict her. Court documents show that she and her daughter, then 7, told police that Martin's friend pushed Damaud down the stairs at their Northeast Baltimore rowhouse near Clifton Park. Martin, who was jailed for 13 months after being arrested, said she agreed to the plea deal to end her incarceration. Her conviction resulted in a suspended 15-year sentence. "I didn't know it was going to cost me my life," she said, referring to losing custody of her children. She and her mother, Rosita Martin, hired an attorney in August and he has notified the state of their intention to take legal action against the government and LifeLine, the state contractor that ran the group home. cComments Got something to say? Start the conversation and be the first to comment. Add a comment 0 At the time of Damaud's death July 2, regulators were in the process of removing 10 disabled foster children from LifeLine's care. Weeks earlier, state inspectors had told LifeLine that they were going to revoke its license because of problems with care. The company's chief executive responded by saying that she was closing the home because state payments were too low. One of the problems at LifeLine that inspectors found before Damaud's death was inadequate staffing. A Baltimore Sun investigation showed that the state awarded contracts worth millions of dollars to the company despite numerous issues: problems with medical care, a founder imprisoned for arson, unpaid taxes, and police reports of abuse and neglect unknown to regulators. Dr. Mary Case, chief medical examiner for four counties around St. Louis, has studied the issue of abusive head trauma for most of her four-decade career. "They're not very common," Case said. "We'll see four or five traumatic head injuries a year." Most result in death shortly after the injuries, she said. Case has seen three deaths similar to Damaud's in the past five years. The most recent — and extreme — came last week: She ruled a 21-year-old man's death a homicide stemming from a brain injury he suffered when he was 5 months old. "It's much less common to have them survive" for years, she said. "There's no time limitation. If the injuring event was done by another person it's considered a homicide." She said such injured children — who survive with feeding and breathing tubes — are vulnerable to pneumonia, seizures and other conditions. While those conditions might lead to death, she said, the cause still stems from the original injuries. Martin's comments about her son's injuries have changed over the years. At one point, she said in an interview that he hit his head on a curb after being pushed off a bike and that he also fell down stairs. She later said in court papers that someone who lived with her pushed him down the stairs. At her 2008 arraignment, she pleaded not guilty. Her public defender wrote in a motion for bail reduction that Martin's daughter, Sandoria, "gave four different versions of what happened to her brother" but that "all were consistent" in blaming another adult in the home for causing the injuries. The motion said Martin lied to police about being the only adult at home because she "was terrified" of the other person. On Oct. 15, 2008, she sent a handwritten letter to the court stating why her $850,000 bail should be reduced. "I didn't do any wrong to my son," she wrote. "I didn't hurt him so why do I have to pay for something that I didn't do." In August 2013, she asked the court to reconsider her conviction, writing that "the attorneys misrepresented my case. I am not guilty." The court rejected the motion. ddonovan@baltsun.com Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/bs-md-child-abuse-cause-20141016-story.html>

Troubles hit Maryland group home for disabled children Second Family Inc. CHIAKI KAWAJIRI, For The Baltimore Sun Joseph Labule, the executive director of foster care provider Second Family, stands in front of one of the company's group homes in 2004. In the fiscal year that ended June 30, 2013, Labule received total compensation of $187,000 for Second Family-related work. Joseph Labule, the executive director of foster care provider Second Family, stands in front of one of the company's group homes in 2004. In the fiscal year that ended June 30, 2013, Labule received total compensation of $187,000 for Second Family-related work. (CHIAKI KAWAJIRI, For The Baltimore Sun) By Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun contact the reporter Laws and Legislation Theft Homes Real Estate Charity Law Enforcement Prince George's County group home employees fired for abusing autistic child. "These children can't speak for themselves." More troubles at Maryland group homes for disabled children. A Prince George's Co. group home was cited 118 times in 2011, 2012 and 2014 and continued to operate. When state officials removed several disabled foster children from an Anne Arundel County group home in early July — after a 10-year-old boy died there — they placed most of the children with Second Family, a Prince George's County nonprofit that is Maryland's largest contractor for such care. Three weeks later, state lawmakers gathered to discuss findings of a Baltimore Sun investigation that revealed long-standing problems with the company that ran the troubled Anne Arundel facility. One lawmaker asked regulators if the children's new homes were better managed. "As far as I'm aware, we're certainly comfortable with the state of those providers," Maryland Health Secretary Dr. Joshua Sharfstein told the two dozen legislators. "This situation has led me to ask the inspection office to make sure, to take a much closer look." Related story: Group home for disabled children struggled to provide adequate care Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun LifeLine, which landed millions in state contracts, had been disciplined for inadequate care LifeLine, which landed millions in state contracts, had been disciplined for inadequate care \(Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun \) But The Sun's ongoing examination shows that the new homes, run by Second Family of Landover, have had their own problems — including neglect and abuse incidents that led to three employees being fired this year, before Sharfstein spoke. Two of those employees had hit and kicked a mute autistic child, according to a state inspection report. State officials say Second Family, which has been awarded about $69 million in state contracts since 2002, has generally complied with health and safety regulations. They also say they are still reviewing its performance "to identify new ways to promote high-quality services." After the review they plan to make recommendations to the General Assembly to strengthen oversight of all group homes for disabled foster children who require around-the-clock nursing care. Advocates for foster children say such a review is overdue. Related Readers Respond It takes more than money to care for vulnerable children and adults See all related 8 "These children can't speak for themselves," said Joan Little, chief attorney for Maryland Legal Aid Bureau's Baltimore child advocacy unit. "Once you know there's been a breach of confidence, the state shouldn't rely on the reporting of the [providers]. They should be digging deeper." The Sun's examination of inspection, police, licensing and other reports obtained through Maryland Public Information Act requests found: •In late January, two Second Family employees were captured on video slapping, kicking and pushing a "non-verbal" autistic child, an inspection report shows. After the workers were terminated, state regulators issued a citation to Second Family. Then, on July 16, another employee was terminated for an incident in which neglect resulted in a child's injury, state records show. These children can't speak for themselves. Once you know there's been a breach of confidence, the state shouldn't rely on the reporting of the [providers]. - Joan Little, chief attorney for Maryland Legal Aid Bureau's Baltimore child advocacy unit •Half of Second Family's group homes were owned by its three top executives even after a state rule prohibited lease-back deals as of January 2008. The properties were eventually sold to a Bowie firm with ties to the charity. After The Sun informed state officials about the real estate deals, the matter was referred to the Health Department's inspector general to "determine whether there is a violation of the regulation," an agency spokesman said. •In June, the state approved a Second Family budget that boosted salaries — the biggest raises went to three top executives — while maintaining decreased spending on food, clothing and other personal expenses for disabled foster children living at the nonprofit's homes. The charity acknowledged that spending on some personal expenses was below state guidelines. cComments CORRUPTION larrygr3 at 2:55 PM October 20, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 1 •Second Family's executive director, Joseph Labule — who earned $155,343 at the nonprofit last year — pleaded guilty in 2001 to theft for stealing $25,000 in workers' compensation pay. He received a one-year suspended sentence and repaid the money seven years later after a state agency garnished his wages. Labule did not disclose the conviction, as required by state rules, when Second Family applied for a $25 million state contract last year. Second Family executives did not respond to requests for comment, but Kimberly Tarver, a lawyer for the organization, said the state contractor has abided by all state rules and regulations. None of the charity's executives was personally benefiting from real estate deals, she said, and the nonprofit was reviewing whether Labule's conviction had been expunged. She also said spending cuts were driven by a reduction in the number of children Second Family was serving. Questions about state oversight of group homes for disabled foster children arose this summer, after The Sun revealed years of problems at LifeLine, formerly Maryland's second-largest provider. The Sun investigation showed that the state awarded contracts worth millions of dollars to LifeLine despite numerous issues — problems with medical care, a founder imprisoned for arson, unpaid taxes and police reports of abuse and neglect unknown to regulators. The state moved the children after it determined that a child at LifeLine's group home in Anne Arundel County was receiving inadequate health care. Damaud Martin, who was from Baltimore, died July 2, a day before the last of the children was removed. State and local authorities continue to investigate his death, which has been ruled a homicide. Last week, the state medical examiner ruled that Damaud's death was caused by complications from cerebral palsy and past head trauma — conditions stemming from abuse suffered more than six years ago, well before he arrived at LifeLine's group home. Last year the state Board of Public Works, which includes Gov. Martin O'Malley, awarded a total of $191 million in contracts for 794 group home beds, including those for foster children whose disabilities leave them entirely reliant on machines to breathe and eat. The group homes are only paid for beds that are occupied. Of that amount, the state authorized $35 million for two-year contracts with Second Family, LifeLine and two small operators to provide 62 beds for disabled foster children in apartments or homes with around-the-clock nursing care. With LifeLine's closure, Second Family is now authorized to oversee nearly 85 percent of the beds approved last year. Its 10 group homes for children are located in Capitol Heights and Bowie, state records show. Advocates acknowledge that moving medically fragile group home residents is not the best option — it can be physically dangerous and mentally taxing for juveniles who have little stability in their lives. And with only three providers in Maryland, regulators should do more to improve oversight because there are limited alternatives for the children, advocates say. Advocates said The Sun's revelations about LifeLine and Second Family illustrate lax state oversight that they have seen for years, even as the state has significantly reduced the number of foster children in group homes by emphasizing policies and programs that try to keep the children with their families. "You'd think with there being so few group homes left [regulators would] know exactly what's going on," said Melissa Rock, child welfare director for Advocates for Children and Youth. Second Family was founded in 1998 by Labule's wife, Shilda Frost Labule, who serves as president. Her sister, Marion Hailey, is clinical coordinator. Together the three registered nurses are the charity's top-paid employees — earning $488,000 for the year ending June 30, 2013, tax records show. Unlike the situation with LifeLine, state inspection reports do not indicate problems with medical care at Second Family, according to documents the state has released under the Public Information Act. Some inspection reports, including those from 2013, have not yet been released. Related Readers Respond It takes more than money to care for vulnerable children and adults See all related 8 Sharfstein and state Secretary of Human Resources Ted Dallas told lawmakers in July that their regulators need to improve oversight of health care providers to ensure that management problems do not jeopardize care. They are working with lawmakers to develop intermediate penalties that fall between written citations and the extreme step of closing facilities and transferring children. In an Aug. 28 letter to state Sen. Joan Carter Conway, a Baltimore Democrat who called for the July briefing about LifeLine, Sharfstein wrote that his department is reviewing all of its annual inspections, complaints and self-reported incidents for Second Family and the two smaller providers. He added that the multiple inspections over the years demonstrate his agency's "close oversight" to "protect the health and well-being" of the children. When testifying before lawmakers, Sharfstein said regulators rely on providers to police themselves. cComments CORRUPTION larrygr3 at 2:55 PM October 20, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 1 "It's not our job to inspect quality. The quality has to come from the providers," he said at the briefing. "And so we have expectations for what they do when they see a problem. Problems happen. But we want to see that they have identified it, they've studied it." But advocates have said the state relies too heavily on self-reporting and some lawmakers called for more surprise inspections, rather than the scheduled visits by inspectors from Sharfstein's Office of Health Care Quality. In inspections of Second Family's group homes for children in 2011, 2012 and 2014, regulators cited the nonprofit 118 times for various breaches of state rules. Inspectors examined records related to 24 of the 112 children who lived there during those years. State regulators did not conduct an annual inspection in 2013 but did investigate complaints and incidents reported by Second Family that year. The formal inspections cited Second Family for a range of issues. For example, the charity could not show that it had trained many of its employees in "approved forms of discipline," and in 2012 it was cited for failing to report an "abuse/neglect" incident that resulted in an emergency room visit for a "severe injury." Inspectors cited Second Family this year for not ensuring that "all medicine which is prescribed by a doctor is always available." The most serious incident in the reports was the Jan. 26 abuse of a child whom a Prince George's County police report described as being diagnosed with "severe autism and is non-verbal." "A staff person pushed the individual and then kicked the individual on his lower leg," the state health inspector wrote after reviewing video of the incident. "This same staff person hit the individual on his back and shoulder with an open hand. A different staff person pushed the individual and hit him multiple times. On the same day, later in the tape this same staff person was observed sleeping in the living room on a large ball. During this time the children were also unsupervised." Both workers were terminated by Second Family, according to the state's inspection report. Shilda Labule, the nonprofit's president, declined to answer questions when reached by phone. Tarver, the organization's attorney, confirmed the inspection report's findings. The state report cited Second Family for violating regulations prohibiting such abuse and accepted its response to "continue to monitor and supervise staff" and "review the Abuse and Neglect Policy every six months." It's unclear when Second Family learned of the abuse. Such incidents are supposed to be reported to regulators within 24 hours after providers learn of them. State officials said Second Family became aware of the incident while reviewing surveillance video on Jan. 31, five days after the abuse, and properly reported it to an inspector conducting a visit that day. A police report, however, states that the incident had been reported to child protective services on Jan. 28, three days earlier. Nancy Pineles, managing attorney for the Maryland Disability Law Center, which is formally alerted to such incidents along with regulators, said the incident had still not been logged into the state database nine months later. She also criticized the way the issue was addressed by state regulators, saying, "After one individual was victimized by more than one staff, reviewing the abuse and neglect policy every six months is not an adequate response." The Legal Aid Bureau's Little said that after such a serious incident, regulators should have placed monitors at the homes and checked videos every month. Advocates also questioned the Prince George's County Police Department's handling of the incident. The detective who watched the videos reported a different version from that of the state inspector. In the police report, the detective wrote that he "observed one of the workers smack the victim on the back of the head with an open palm one time. This investigator did not find the open palm strike to meet the criteria of physical child abuse." A state database shows Second Family has reported 11 incidents this year, including one in July in which an employee was terminated for neglect that led to a child's injury. The state has not yet provided details about those incidents except to say they were all "triaged and investigated, as appropriate," according to a Health Department spokesman. Conflict of interest Some Second Family executives have had an interest in properties used by the charity, a conflict of interest that the state forbids. A Sun investigation in 2005 revealed that many executives and board members of group home operators — including the Labules and Hailey — were earning rent from the homes. To eliminate "any circumstance which would create a conflict of interest, personal or financial," the state adopted a new rule prohibiting such arrangements, according to the Dec. 23, 2005, Maryland Register. Employees and board members of companies licensed by the state's developmental disabilities agency — including Second Family and Second Family Adult Homes — were prohibited from owning property "that is leased back to the licensee," the regulation states. The state gave contractors until Jan. 1, 2008, to abide by the new rule. Shilda Labule owned three of Second Family's group homes and Hailey owned one until January 2009. The sisters sold the properties to a Maryland company called MJ&S Enterprises. Joseph Labule owned another home, which he also sold to MJ&S Enterprises in August 2008. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 2008, Second Family spent $311,517 on "occupancy," which includes rent and utilities, tax records show. For the year ending June 30, 2009, the charity spent $402,992. Related Readers Respond It takes more than money to care for vulnerable children and adults See all related 8 Tarver said Second Family does not pay rent on property owned by any of the charity's executives. She said the Labules and Hailey are not shareholders of MJ&S Enterprises. In addition, she said, the corporate director of MJ&S Enterprises, Charles Ekoko, is not a Second Family employee. Ekoko is, however, a board member of Second Family Adult Homes, a for-profit arm that is a state-licensed contractor providing residential services to disabled adults. He did not respond to repeated requests for comment. State officials began looking into the real estate transactions last month, after The Sun alerted them to connections between MJ&S Enterprises and Second Family. cComments CORRUPTION larrygr3 at 2:55 PM October 20, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 1 For example, MJ&S Enterprises owns a sixth Second Family group home in the 1400 block of Lancaster Lane in Bowie. State real estate ownership records filed with the Department of Assessments & Taxation for the house show that the mailing address listed for MJ&S Enterprises is a property owned by Shilda Labule and Hailey. The property tax bill for the Lancaster Lane house is mailed to the same property owned by the sisters, according to Prince George's County tax records. MJ&S Enterprises paid $1.1 million to Shilda Labule for her three properties, $402,000 to Joseph Labule for his house and $371,000 to Hailey, mostly through bank loans, real estate records show. Sandra Miniutti, vice president of Charity Navigator, a national organization that rates charities, examined Second Family's tax records at the request of The Sun. She said in an email that there is no indication the charity reported in 2008 it was paying rent on properties that its executives owned. None of the organization's IRS forms listed such an arrangement in a section that asks for such information, she said. The sales of the homes also were not recorded on an IRS form detailing any business transactions that personally benefited executives or board members. "This definitely does not pass the 'smell test,'" Miniutti wrote. The Internal Revenue Service monitors the tax-exempt status of charities to make sure they are not operating for the personal benefit of executives. Experts in the field of nonprofits said the rental income, proceeds from real estate sales and salaries from an affiliated for-profit entity such as the adult homes company could call into question Second Family's tax exemption. "It is not consistent with best practices to have nonprofit leaders ever profit personally from the charitable activities of their organization," Greg Cantori, executive director of Maryland Nonprofits, said when asked about Second Family's operations. Questionable spending State inspections have raised no issues with Second Family's finances, but child advocates raise concerns about the charity's spending patterns. The state approved a $9.2 million spending plan for Second Family in the 2014 fiscal year, which ended June 30. That was a nearly 14 percent increase from the $8.1 million the state paid in fiscal year 2013. The biggest increase went to salaries and benefits, which jumped 18.5 percent. Meanwhile, spending on food, clothing and other personal needs for the children was cut 69 percent. In an email, attorney Tarver wrote that Second Family "had a substantial drop in its census (number of children in residence) which necessarily required across the board adjustments in all expenditures." Second Family served an average of 32 children in fiscal 2013, state documents show. The average for fiscal year 2014 was 35 children, a 9.3 percent increase, state officials said. In fiscal 2013, Second Family spent a total of $120,388 for the personal needs of 32 children, state documents show. For fiscal 2014, the state approved spending of $37,215 for 35 children, and the budget for the current fiscal year — which began July 1 and is calculated for 40 children — maintains the low spending rate while allowing for another salary increase. The charity explained some of the cuts in budget footnotes. It acknowledged that the amounts for clothes and personal needs were below "state mandated guidelines." It added, "The majority of our children are medically-fragile and non-ambulatory. While we keep them clean and well dressed, their wardrobe needs are minimal and, in many cases, met by family members." "That makes me very upset," said Ann Marie Foley Binsner, executive director of Court Appointed Special Advocates of Prince George's County. "It is true that the kids who are nonambulatory do not need a vast wardrobe; however they do need more than [that] for an entire year." She also took issue with Second Family's assertion that the disabled foster children receive significant support from family. "This information, combined with the pay that the leadership grants themselves, is very concerning," she said. Tax records indicate that Second Family paid Shilda Labule $159,868 for the fiscal year that ended June 30, 2013, the most recent available data. She was also paid $48,077 from Second Family Adult Homes. She received another $15,785 in other compensation from both — a total of nearly $224,000. She reported working 75 hours per week for the charity and eight hours at the adult facilities. Joseph Labule was paid $144,792 for working an average of 88 hours per week at the charity, tax records state. His additional five hours per week at the adult homes earned him $31,441, and another $10,551 in other compensation brought his total pay to nearly $187,000. Marion Hailey received $140,451 for working 99 hours per week for the charity, tax records show. She did not receive any money from the adult homes, according to tax records. Criminal conviction As for Joseph Labule's criminal theft conviction, Sharfstein and Dallas said they were not concerned because the charge is 13 years old and has nothing to do with harming individuals. Labule, 56, admitted to taking workers' compensation while he was working two other jobs, which is illegal. He fell behind in restitution payments and in 2001 the state garnished his Second Family wages until all of the money was repaid in 2008. [\[Related Readers Respond It takes more than money to care for vulnerable children and adults See all related 8\]](#) Labule signed an affidavit last September accompanying Second Family's application for a state contract that asserts he has never been convicted of various crimes, including theft. A Department of Human Resources spokesman said Labule told the agency his conviction was expunged and that its background check confirmed his claim. The spokesman added that the agency was double-checking the assertion about the expungement but later said it could not comment on such background checks. Tarver said Second Family was still reviewing the issue. Legal experts say such a conviction — which is still visible in online records of the Maryland court system — cannot be erased under the state's expungement rules. eComments CORRUPTION larrygr3 at 2:55 PM October 20, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 1 "A [theft] conviction cannot be expunged," said Michael Pinard, a professor at the University of Maryland law school. Child advocates say the state should have higher standards for an executive with a contractor that controls millions in taxpayer dollars for disabled children. The state should be awarding contracts to providers that have "respectable business histories," said Little, of the Legal Aid Bureau. "If someone steals money from the state, I don't think that's the kind of person you want to have taking care of vulnerable people." ddonovan@baltsun.com Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/sun-investigates/bs-md-second-family-20141018-story.html#page=4>

Group home director sentenced in abuse case RIVERSIDE — (INT) — The director of a Corona group home, who was initially charged with torture and abusing a 13-year-old boy, was sentenced Friday. Pastor Lonnie Remmers later pleaded guilty to two felonies, inflicting corporal injury on a juvenile and assault. A Riverside Superior Court judge ordered a 2-year prison term. Corona police said that the boy's mother had taken him to the home for 'guidance'. Story Date: October 20, 2014 Source: <http://www.inlandnewstoday.com/story.php?s=35272>

Little nice to say about foster care in L.A. County To the editor: I am somewhat surprised by the letter from Matty Nierenberg, who kindly bought a headstone for a 2-year-old girl beaten to death by a foster parent. I totally disagree with his support for the Los Angeles County Department of Children and Family Services. ("Helping foster kids before the unthinkable happens." Letters, Oct. 14) Submit a Letter to the Editor Read the story Of course there are many concerned social workers who do their best. But that is not the point. Rather, the system is dysfunctional and should be closed. Over 30 years I have seen so many children killed while in DCFS care. It is thoughtful to set up a fund to pay for the memorials of those who die destitute, but these kids should not be dying at all. William Brady, Sherman Oaks Source: <http://www.latimes.com/opinion/readersreact/la-le-1019-sunday-dcfs-20141019-story.html>

Former Phoenix foster parent pleads guilty to sexual abuse Jennifer Soules, The Republic | azcentral.com 10:28 p.m. MST October 20, 2014 Get the latest crime news on azcentral.(Photo: azcentral) A Phoenix man charged in the sexual abuse of seven foster children pleaded guilty Monday to some of the crimes in Maricopa County Superior Court, authorities say. The man pleaded guilty to one count of sexual abuse and one count of furnishing obscene materials to minors, a Superior Court statement says. The man also pleaded guilty to a reduced charge on two counts of child molestation. In all, the man faced 29 charges, including sexual conduct with a minor, kidnapping, molestation of a child, sexual abuse, aggravated assault, furnishing obscene material to minors and indecent exposure, court documents say. Authorities say the man and his wife fostered approximately 15 children, some of whom had mental handicaps, at their home near 19th Avenue and Union Hills Drive. The man was a licensed foster-care provider from 2005 to 2011, records say. The Republic is not identifying the couple to protect the identities of the children involved in the case. The investigation into the couple began in 2011 when one of their foster children, a 5-year-old boy, spoke up at a day care about claims of abuse, police say. Six additional victims, ranging from 5 to 17 years old, were identified during the investigation, police say. Multiple children told police that the man threatened them with harm if they told anyone, court documents say. The foster mother faced four counts of child or vulnerable-adult abuse, two of which were dismissed in a grand-jury indictment. She pleaded guilty to a reduced charge on the remaining two counts and was sentenced to 10 years of supervised probation, records say. The father's sentencing is Nov.20. Source: <http://www.azcentral.com/story/news/local/phoenix/2014/10/20/phoenix-former-foster-parent-charges-plea/17631359/>

GOP gubernatorial candidate Baker turns back money linked to owner of Fall River adult foster care provider Wife of man indicted on alleged kickback scheme co-hosted fundraiser in Medfield By Matt Murphy State House News Service The Herald News, Fall River, MA By Matt Murphy State House News Service Posted Oct. 20, 2014 @ 4:56 pm Updated Oct 20, 2014 @ 5:02 PM By Matt Murphy State House News Service Posted Oct. 20, 2014 @ 4:56 pm Updated Oct 20, 2014 @ 5:02 PM » RELATED CONTENT LINKS • Owner, operator of adult foster care company arraigned on... • Gabriel Care LLC ran a Medicaid kickback scheme, Martha C... » Social News By Matt Murphy State House News Service Posted Oct. 20, 2014 @ 4:56 pm Updated Oct 20, 2014 @ 5:02 PM BOSTON — Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Baker attended a fundraiser in Medfield on Sunday night co-hosted by the wife of a man indicted by his Democratic rival two years ago for Medicaid fraud. Dennis Etzkorn, the owner of the Fall River adult foster care provider Gabriel Care, was indicted in April 2012 by a Bristol County grand jury after allegedly paying kickbacks to clients and caregivers for referrals of new clients to his company who are MassHealth-eligible. His wife, Karen Etzkorn, co-hosted a fundraiser for Baker's campaign on Sunday night, according to an invitation obtained by the News Service. Baker's campaign said it was not aware of the case or Karen Etzkorn's relation to Dennis Etzkorn prior to the event. Queried about the charges against Dennis Etzkorn, Baker spokesman Tim Buckley said the campaign would not deposit a check collected from the couple on Sunday, but would keep other contributions made during the event. Buckley declined to say how much the Baker campaign raised at the fundraiser, which was held at AstraLuna, a craft distiller and distributor of vodkas and other spirits in Medfield, where the Etzkorns live. The fundraiser was co-hosted by Peter Biagetti, an attorney at Mintz Levin, Dover contractor Andrew McCabe, and Judith McDonough, the executive director of Edwina Martin House, a residential addiction rehabilitation facility for women in Brockton. Since the start of the general election campaign in September, Baker has enjoyed a sizable cash advantage over his Democratic opponent, Attorney General Martha Coakley. Both Baker and Coakley have been mixing small events like the fundraiser in Medfield with larger receptions such as the one hosted last Thursday for Baker when former Gov. Mitt Romney helped raise an additional $600,000 for the Baker campaign. Coakley had an event with former President Bill Clinton the same night that netted her about $200,000. Coakley's campaign declined to comment on Etzkorn's involvement in the fundraiser for Baker. Dennis Etzkorn pleaded not guilty in the spring of 2012 to charges that he and Gabriel Care program director Jennifer Nunes-Reid paid or offered to pay predetermined amounts of money to clients and caregivers for MassHealth-eligible clients referred to their company for at-home care. In a case publicized by her office in April 2012, Coakley alleged that, for at least 44 clients illegally procured by kickbacks, Etzkorn billed MassHealth for $1.2 million in care claims. The case is due back in court on Oct. 31 for a status hearing. Karen Etzkorn does not show up in Office of Campaign and Political Finance filings, but Dennis Etzkorn is listed as giving $500 to state Rep. David Nangle, D-Lowell, and $200 to House Speaker Robert DeLeo in 2014. Etzkorn in previous years had also given to state Reps. Carole Fiola and Alan Silvia, both of Fall River, and former Boston City Councilor Rob Consalvo. Etzkorn also gave $250 to Baker in 2010. Source: <http://www.heraldnews.com/article/20141020/NEWS/141029665/1994/NEWS>

State alters neglect case policy Tony Leys, tleys@dmreg.com 5:49 a.m. CDT October 21, 2014 Two-year-old Shelby Duis died in January 2000. Shelby's mother, Heidi Watkins, was convicted of child endangerment and sent to prison for up to 50 years.(Photo: File photo) 296 CONNECT 4 TWEETLINKEDIN 14 COMMENTEMAILMORE A Warren County mother figured she knew what it meant when she received a dreaded call from the Iowa Department of Human Services last spring. The agency was alerted that the woman had been charged with possessing a friend's prescription sedatives. The woman had a history of drug abuse. A state social worker would soon be visiting her home to talk about her 11-year-old son. "As soon as I heard 'DHS,' the fear and anger came through, and I got really defensive," she recalled later. The pills represented a brief relapse in several years of sobriety, she said, but she feared her son would be taken away. She was in for a surprise, thanks to a major shift in state policy. DHS social worker Sundi Smith determined in her first visit that there was no evidence the woman's son had been abused or was in danger. Smith made this determination after reviewing the woman's records and taking the boy aside for a private conversation. The woman said Smith told her that the state would not make a formal determination of abuse, and that the mother was not at risk of having her name placed on the child-abuse registry. Smith told her that instead of considering taking her son away, DHS wanted to help her get her life and family back on track. Smith and other state social workers are taking a new approach to such investigations. In many cases where there are questions about a family's parenting methods but no signs of abuse or imminent danger, the social workers don't launch formal investigations into the parents. Instead, they hook up parents with assistance, then step back from the cases. Examples can include a dirty house or a small child who slips away from a parent and is found wandering by a neighbor. The Warren County mother, who asked that her name not be published for fear of embarrassing her son, said she relaxed as soon as she realized Smith had no intention of taking him away. "The only thing I've ever really wanted to be was a mom," she said. Social worker can be helpful, not 'villain' In a report released this month, the Department of Human Services said its social workers used this approach 38 percent of the time when looking into concerns about children's well-being during the first six months of 2014. The idea, called "differential response," has been used in other states and became Iowa's policy this year after gaining legislators' approval. State officials say the gentler approach is not used if there is any sign that a child has been abused physically or sexually. It also is not to be used if there are signs that the child has been neglected to the point of danger, if there are signs that illegal drugs are being made or sold at the home, or if any child in the house is the subject of another open DHS investigation. Smith couldn't comment on the specific case involving the Warren County woman. But she said that in general, the new program lets her perform as a positive social worker instead of coming across as a villain. She said it can take some time for parents to understand that she's not intent on removing their kids from the home over relatively minor issues. "I think they're still nervous until we get out there and have the opportunity to explain it to them," she said. Hanging over all this is the specter that a child could be hurt after DHS officials decided to use their more informal method of interacting with a family. Smith said social workers can't say for sure that a parent accused of minor neglect won't wind up abusing a child later. "I'm not a predictor of human behavior. None of us are," she said. However, she said, she goes over each case with a supervisor to be sure it meets the standards. "I'm not some rogue person out there making decisions on my own." Smith said word has started getting around that state social workers are not always the enemy. A parent recently came to her office after hearing about the new approach. "They said, 'You helped my friend. Can you help me?'" she said. Child advocates vow to monitor change No one wants to see a repeat of the infamous case of Shelby Duis. The Spirit Lake toddler died of injuries in 2000 after several people warned DHS that she was being abused at home. The agency later said that it had tightened up its response to reports of abuse and neglect to ensure such a case did not slip through the cracks again. DHS leaders say the new approach would not affect the outcome of a case like Shelby's. Any allegations of abuse, as opposed to accusations of neglect, are still investigated the established way, and can lead to the removal of a child from a home and the listing of an adult on the state's child-abuse registry. Social workers also can still call police, who can file criminal charges. Two outside experts said they support DHS's new approach but will monitor it to ensure only appropriate cases are subject to the less confrontational approach. Both Stephen Scott, executive director of the group Prevent Child Abuse Iowa, and Charles Bruner, executive director of the Child and Family Policy Center, said the new approach should not lead to more cases like that of Duis. Scott said it wouldn't be right for state social workers to soft-pedal every report of neglect. "Many cases of child neglect can be as bad as physical abuse," he said. For example, he said, some parents have been known to leave young children with a caregiver who is too high or hung over to provide meaningful supervision. DHS leaders appear to understand that those situations pose imminent danger and should be handled the traditional way, he said. Scott said he agrees with the idea that DHS's less-confrontational approach to less-serious reports of child neglect could lead parents to be less defensive and more open to suggestions of services that could help them. The new state report indicates this is working. Nearly 1,400 more families accepted such services in the first six months of 2014 than in the same period a year earlier. Scott said the result should be more Iowa children receiving proper parenting. Bruner agreed. "In reality, a lot of these families are stressed and in need of services," he said. Bruner hopes the new approach leads to fewer children who are needlessly taken away from parents and placed in foster care. He said Iowa needs to keep addressing its relatively high rates of foster care, especially for African-American and Native American children. Foster care can be necessary if a child is in danger, Bruner said, "but it can cause harm to the child, too." — Shift in approach, by the numbers In the first six months of the Iowa Department of Human Services new "differential response" program, 38 percent of child abuse or neglect reports were addressed in the new, less-confrontational approach. -- 7,342 were investigated in the traditional way, known as "Child Abuse Assessment." -- 4,571 were investigated with the new "Family Assessment" approach. -- Of those, 532 were later switched to the traditional method, because of further concerns about the case. Source:

<http://www.desmoinesregister.com/story/news/2014/10/21/iowa-department-human-services-alters-neglect-case-policy/17646809/>

More transparency, oversight needed for Md. group homes Maryland must not let the death of Damaud Martin be in vain. Advocates for Children and Youth couldn't agree more with The Sun's view that there needs to be more oversight and transparency for facilities caring for Maryland's disabled foster youth ("More troubled group homes," Oct. 20). We are hopeful that the General Assembly will do its part to help reform the oversight of these programs and prevent future tragedies. Related Sun Investigates State proposes reforms to group home oversight See all related 8 Advocates for Children and Youth has been supporting legislation that allows disabled youth to keep the federal benefits that their disability entitles them to receive, rather than the current practice of the state keeping this money. We think that money is far more valuable as savings for when these young people transition out of the Department of Human Resources' care at age 21. We are encouraged if Damaud Martin's tragic death serves as a catalyst for important improvements in the care provided to Maryland's most vulnerable foster youth. Melissa Rock, Baltimore The writer is child welfare director at Advocates for Children and Youth. Source:

<http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/opinion/readersrespond/bs-ed-disabled-youth-letter-20141023-story.html>

South Windsor group home operator sued over boy's rape Story Comments ShareShare Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size

Larger font size Posted: Thursday, October 23, 2014 11:35 am South Windsor group home operator sued over boy's rape By Alex Wood Journal Inquirer | 0 comments The mother of a teenage boy who says he was raped by a fellow resident of a South Windsor group home is suing the nonprofit organization that operates the facility, alleging on her son's behalf that the rape occurred because of negligence by its staff members. Because of the nature of the allegations, Hartford Superior Court Judge Antonio C. Robaina has given the boy and his mother permission not to use their real names in court papers. They are referred to as John Doe and Jane Doe, respectively. The lawsuit says the rape occurred around Oct. 5, 2013, at the group home at 124 Woodland Drive in South Windsor, which is operated by Community Residences Inc., a Southington-based nonprofit. Source: http://www.journalinquirer.com/crime_and_courts/south-windsor-group-home-operator-sued-over-boy-s-rape/article_38bc2d00-5aca-11e4-ba25-2febdb10ba21.html

Former Marion Group Home Owners Arrested Updated: Wednesday, October 22 2014, 09:42 PM CDT MARION, IA (CBS2/FOX28) -- Police arrested the owners of Park Setting Elder Group Home after allegations of abuse. The owners, Donald and Peggy Berns are facing numerous charges, including neglect and abandonment of a dependent person, dependent adult abuse, and exploitation. In August, officials shut down the home after complaints that residents were locked in their rooms and given unauthorized medication. A report filed by state investigators and turned over to the Linn County Attorney indicated some residents were confined in their rooms by locks on the outside of their doors and that even after warnings the owners of the home still tried to confine one resident by using a board to block the door. Both Don and Peg Berns posted $25,000 bond and were released from jail Wednesday morning. When contacted by phone, Peggy Berns said they have no comment right now, but intend to fight the charges and eventually will speak out to make sure everyone knows the truth. Source: <http://www.cbs2iowa.com/news/features/top-stories/stories/former-marion-group-home-owners-arrested-31131.shtml>

S. Bronx Group Home Under Fire After Abuse Claims October 23, 2014 at 12:00 AM SEVENTEEN WORKERS FROM the Union IRA home in the South Bronx (pictured) have been ordered to stay home with pay, pending the outcome of widespread abuse allegations. Photo by David Greene By DAVID GREENE A 17th staffer at a South Bronx home for special needs adults has been told to stay home amid a state investigation of alleged chronic abuse by employees. Family members for residents at the Union IRA group home at 570 Union Ave. in Mott Haven claim their loved ones were being assaulted and deprived of food while staying at the supportive residence. During a meeting with family members on Sept. 20, Sheryl Minter-Brooks, the state operations director for the Office of People with Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD), the agency that oversees homes across the city, revealed that seven caregivers had been removed since the spring. "We are as sickened by this as everyone else is and we're working to get to the bottom of it," Minter-Brooks told an outraged crowd. "We have reason to suspect that something happened, it does not mean that it did happen." For now, staffers remain home with pay while the New York State Justice Center, an investigatory body, looks into the claims. A spokeswoman for the OPWDD declined to discuss specifics of the matter while it's under investigation. Anonymous Letter At least five family members received a two-page letter dated Aug. 20. The anonymous writer, claiming to be a worker at the home, detailed systematic beatings, food deprivation and one allegation of sex abuse by a female employee. According to the letter, claims of abuse were backed up by photos of staff members attacking residents. The letter claimed that one state employee was accused of assaulting a resident so bad it ruptured an eardrum. The whistleblower admitted to keeping silent on the assault, believing that speaking up or reporting assaults would "label me as a snitch." Families have remained vocal on the abuse charges, which they believed ran rampant at the home. Several family members of one resident accused staffers of refusing to stock a bathroom with toilet paper. Staffers believed the toilet would simply clog up. Zoraida's Case Before obtaining legal guardianship, Barbara Melendez was in limbo attempting to get her sister Zoraida out of the home. During Zoraida's stay at the home, Melendez claimed her sister suffered ongoing abuse that was brushed off by staff members. "They had all the power and I still needed my guardianship," recalled Melendez. On Oct. 2, Zoraida was discovered with bruises near her pelvis and breasts. She was later taken to an area hospital, where the NYPD was called. Officers took a report for an "unknown assault," but hospital officials told Melendez that there was a time-lapse in reporting, so a rape-kit wasn't performed. A history of abuse has followed Zoraida since last year, according to the letter. Some incidents involved a split lip requiring seven stitches while another incident involved staffers kicking Zoraida's legs until they swelled, according to the letter. Zoraida would be taken to local emergency rooms six more times between January and August this year for a bruise on her arm, a gash to her foot that required stitches and a black eye. "When I began to question it they would tell me, 'Oh she's accident prone,'" Melendez recalled. "So what could I say? They knew how to cover themselves." Searching for Closure Family members hope the investigation leads to arrests and dismissals even if they are cleared of all allegations. But Minter-Brooks of OPWDD said she "can't guarantee" any firings, citing the employees civil service contract. One family member recalled an incident involving her brother, telling the group, "We had an independent investigation that took many months and it's finally completed, but we're not allowed to get copies of the reports or know the results." Claiming that the safeguards are flawed, Melendez added, "If they are found guilty, they should never work with the disabled again." Despite apologies from Minter-Brooks, Melendez argued the sentiment was "a little too late to be sorry." Source: <http://www.norwoodnews.org/id=16017&story=s-bronx-group-home-under-fire-after-abuse-claims/>

City man convicted of sexually assaulting four boys under his foster care City man convicted of sexually assaulting four boys under his foster care By Daryl Slade, Calgary Herald October 23, 2014 A man who was chosen along with his wife as the local Foster Family of the Year in 2007 now faces a lengthy prison sentence after sexually assaulting four foster boys under his care. Court of Queen's Bench Justice Robert Hall on Thursday convicted Garry Dale Prokopishin, 56, of sexually touching the boys while in a position of trust between May 5, 1999, and Aug. 5, 2008. He also acquitted him of one charge and another count was earlier withdrawn by Crown prosecutor Gord Haight. Hall said the complainants' descriptions of 'Guys' Nights,' in which the teenage boys were taken to different towns outside the city, put up in a hotel, bought drinks, dinner and clothes and paid for sex, was a key part of the evidence. "The description of Guys' Nights by the complainants further corroborate the sexual nature of the relationship between the participants and the accused, even though these events occurred after the complainants reached the age of majority (18)," wrote Hall in his decision. One of the complainants testified that Prokopishin would usually pay him $20 after the event. Hall said the complainants and others who lived in the home and provided similar fact evidence supported each others' stories about what happened, and he accepted it for the most part, with no serious concern of collusion among them. "The court is aware of the potential for collusion among the complainants," said the judge. "They could all contact each other and many indicated that they have done so. Two of the complainants are plaintiffs in a lawsuit against the accused and the government, and the others are aware of the lawsuit. There is at least a 'whiff of profit,' "Notwithstanding this possibility for collusion, the Crown has satisfied me that it has not occurred in this case. The evidence of any one witness is not tailored to fit that of others; indeed, there are inconsistencies between them that one would not expect if intentional collusion had transpired. Unintentional collusion as to the acts that occurred to each of them is simply not a realistic possibility." One complainant, now 26, testified he agreed to allow Prokopishin to perform sex acts on him when he was between 16 and 18 years old, generally for $20 each occasion, and he would use the money to feed his crack cocaine habit. He told Haight the sex occurred regularly at the home, but also three or four times in hotels in Drumheller, Medicine Hat and Red Deer. After he moved to Kitimat, B.C., in 2008, the complainant said Prokopishin phoned him and said other kids had come forward and reporters were flooding around his house. He said he then went to Kitimat RCMP and reported the incidents. "They gave us drugs, cigarettes and money. There was always food on the table. It was a very good home. I didn't have an issue staying in the home," he said of the Prokopishins. Hall ordered a presentence report and a psychiatric report at the request of Haight and defence lawyer Ian McKay to be prepared for sentencing arguments on Dec. 19. The judge ordered Prokopishin into custody following a brief discussion, and he will remain there until sentencing. dslade@calgaryherald.com Source: <http://www.calgaryherald.com/news/calgary/City+convicted+sexually+assaulting+five+boys+under+foster+care/10319139/story.html>

Oct 23, 2014 5:48 AM Couple Sentenced to 1,500 Years in Prison ALABAMA - A federal judge sentenced a Lauderdale County couple to hundreds of years in prison for sexually abusing a minor child in their custody to produce images of child pornography. Patricia Ayers is sentenced to 1,590 years in prison. Her husband, Matthew Ayers, was sentenced to 750 years in prison. During the hearing the judge said, "I have been on the bench since 1998, and this is the worst case I have personally dealt with, including murders." Source: <http://www.kristv.com/news/couple-sentenced-to-1-500-years-in-prison/>

Big Money Taking Over Education Politics Most folks in the Democratic Party have a problem with the Citizens United ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court that permitted goo-gobs of corporate and private interest cash to be dumped onto our elections. The party's platform supports amending the Constitution to reverse the decision. President Obama has also called for such an amendment, and Hillary Clinton has said she would consider supporting it. Most Democrats are also alarmed by the enormous amounts of cash funneled into the electoral process by folks like Karl Rove and the Koch brothers who use corporate and private interest money to overwhelm citizen voice in elections and usurp democracy. But if you're a Democrat, you should know the influence buying unleashed by Citizens United and perpetrated by people like the Koch brothers are at work – with the blessing and participation of fellow Democrats – in education politics. Historically, elections that determine public education governance – from local school board races to contests determining state administrative leadership – have been fairly subdued affairs in comparison to mayoral and legislative races. That's not necessarily a good thing, because education has long been America's most collaborative public enterprise, affecting virtually everyone and determining how we nurture the next generation of citizens, workers, and leaders. But lately, these contests have grown more animated as a new element – money from big business and private individuals and foundations – is now altering the electoral process in new and fundamental ways. Examples of this new dynamic have surfaced in the upcoming 2014 elections at both the local school district level and at state level contests, and in each example, the big money often coming from people who associate with the Democratic Party. Further, these wealthy Democrats often collude with conservative Republicans in these school-related elections in ways they never would in other contests. This confluence of big money is often called "bipartisanship." But the results are apt to be the same we've seen in more popular elections – a distortion of democracy that leads to governance that is less progressive. Big Money Goes After School Boards As Valerie Strauss pointed on her blog at The Washington Post recently, "For several years now local school board races around the country have attracted big money from outside the state — and sometimes from across the country — as school reformers and their supporters seek to elect like-minded public officials. In 2013, for example, millions of dollars were spent on school board races in Los Angeles and in 2012, outsiders poured money into a New Orleans school board race." In that post, Strauss pointed to an article by Minneapolis-based writer and former teacher Sarah Lahm, published by In These Times, describing how big money is arm twisting the democratic process in her local school board election. Lahm explained how one of the candidates, Don Samuels, is benefiting from "extensive financing and canvassing support ... from several well-heeled national organizations, such as the Washington, D.C.-based 50CAN, an offshoot of Education Reform Now called Students for Education Reform (SFER)." Samuels has out-raised his main competitor, incumbent Rebecca Gagnon, by almost 4 to 1 including "tremendous support from outside of Minnesota. The D.C.-based 50CAN Action Fund filed a campaign finance report in Minnesota showing that it was devoting $14,350 in financial resources to the Minneapolis school board race, as well as in-kind donations valued in the thousands of dollars." Another report on who is influencing the Minneapolis school board race, from Beth Hawkins on the MinnPost website, described big donations coming into the race from former New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and, again, 50CAN and Students for Education Reform. That report also mentioned another recipient to the for 60 adult and 72 child patients, was one of the few places in the U.S. that could provide care for children who were both deaf and autistic. NDA attracted patients from around the country. But NBC News found that police, state regulators and disability advocates all said the number of complaints to officials and calls to police from NDA were “high.” Between 2008 and 2013, there were 506 “calls for service” from NDA to Mt. Dora police, which included everything from staffers reporting runaways to patients alleging abuse. A complete record of resolutions of the calls was unavailable, but of a list of 54 investigations between 2008 and 2014 provided by Mt. Dora police, 15 involved alleged battery, 10 involved alleged abuse, and three involved alleged sexual abuse. The only arrests listed, however, were for criminal mischief. advertisement Related Disabled Workers Paid Just Pennies an Hour More Disabled Workers Paid Just Pennies an Hour The Florida Department of Children and Families (DCF) launched 99 of its own investigations into alleged abuse or neglect between 2004 and 2014. The central allegation in 35 of the cases was “physical abuse,” while “sexual abuse” or “molestation” were the principal accusations in 15. Other allegations included “asphyxiation,” “bone fracture,” and “bizarre punishment.” DCF found that five cases of alleged physical abuse and one case of inadequate supervision were “verified,” meaning “a preponderance of the credible evidence results in a determination that the specific harm or threat of harm was the result of abuse, abandonment or neglect.” Fifteen other investigations yielded “some indicator” that the accusations were credible, including six cases of physical abuse and one allegation of sexual abuse. Follow NBC News Investigations on Twitter and Facebook. In June 2012, the Agency for Health Care Administration (AHCA), the licensing authority for health care facilities in Florida, made an unannounced visit to NDA and stated in an inspection report that the facility failed to report three out of six incidents of alleged abuse between April and June 2012 that were entered in its own internal “grievance log.” “Based on interview and record review (sic),” said the report, “the facility failed to report all incidents of suspected abuse.” advertisement There have been two deaths cited in lawsuits and one cited in a state report during the past five-and-a-half years at NDA. In 2009, according to a lawsuit, a developmentally disabled 18-year-old choked to death after she was allegedly left unsupervised during lunch. The suit has been settled, according to court records. A year later, a deaf patient on suicide watch fled the school grounds and was hit by a car. AHCA alleged that the Deaf Academy had failed to meet the “minimum criteria required by the level for which the facility is licensed, which is contrary to law.” NDA paid a fine of $6,000. Another lawsuit alleges that in 2012, a diabetic teen died because NDA was negligent and didn’t provide the care outlined for the patient. The case has been settled for an undisclosed amount. “We Are Not Saying the Crime Did Not Occur” When John and Hannah visited the National Deaf Academy in 2012 while looking for a treatment facility for their autistic and bipolar 10-year-old, the Georgia couple knew nothing about allegations of abuse. They said their insurance company was willing to pay for NDA, and the campus and the staff impressed them. “We were just excited to see what they were going to do with our son,” recalled Hannah. NBC News John and Hannah are filing suit against NDA Behavioral Health Systems in Mt. Dora, Florida over alleged abuse of their son. advertisement But on their son’s first overnight stay with his parents outside NDA, said Hannah, he told them a staff member punched him in the face. Later, when she called her son at NDA, she said she heard staff members trying to keep him from talking. Hannah called her insurance company and said a representative told her there had been allegations of abuse at NDA. “In my heart, I felt so guilty as a mom because of that time when he told us of them hitting him,” said Hannah. “Because who wants to believe that their son is being hit?” John and Hannah rushed to Mt. Dora to get their son, and said that when they arrived he had scabies and had lost 22 pounds. Even before they arrived back home in Georgia, they say they found evidence of possible abuse. The couple said that on the trip their son talked about a staff member who said their son gave “the best massages,” and that he seemed to be in pain. According to a medical report provided to NBC News by the family, medical personnel at a Georgia emergency room found rectal bleeding and an abrasion, and said the boy had reported pain in his penis and in “wrong place #2.” Courtesy of John and Hannah family John and his wife Hannah are filing a suit against the National Deaf Academy in Mt. Dora, Florida where they claim their son, right, was abused. advertisement The couple has filed suit against NDA, alleging inappropriate touching, physical abuse and exposure to pornography. At the family’s request, Mt. Dora police investigated their suspicion of abuse, but did not file charges because they were not able to identify a suspect or find forensic evidence. “We are not saying the crime did not occur. We are saying that we cannot prove it,” a Mt. Dora police spokesperson told NBC News. “I Would Scream Because It Hurt” Daniel’s parents didn’t find out about his alleged abuse at NDA until long after he’d left the facility. In 2013, Christine Ogden and her husband learned there was a deaf boy with OCD, ADHD and PTSD housed at a psychiatric facility in Washington state whom they might be able to adopt. But Ogden said staffers at the facility told them they thought 13-year-old Daniel might have been abused at the last place he’d been housed -- NDA. According to Ogden, the Washington facility said Daniel had been “overmedicated” and a “zombie” when he arrived in 2010. NDA records obtained by NBC News show that the facility said he had acted out sexually, assaulted staff and self-harmed. When Daniel came to live with her in Virginia, said Ogden, he started to open up about his experiences at NDA, where he’d lived for nine months. Via sign language, said Christine, he told her about injections of powerful drugs that put him to sleep, having his hair pulled and being dragged into the shower. advertisement Through an interpreter, Daniel told NBC News about the hair pulling, the shower and the injections. “I would scream because it hurt,” he said. “They would take me down and then they’d give me the shot.” John Brecher / NBC News Christine Ogden of Alexandria, Virginia is suing NDA Behavioral Health System of Mt. Dora, Florida, also known as the National Deaf Academy, alleging that her adopted son, Daniel, now 14, was abused while he was housed there. Ogden said that a mental health workers had described Daniel to her as a “scared, feral” child. Said Ogden, who is suing NDA, “It makes me very angry because I often feel like if we had gotten Daniel before all this ... we would not have the same types of challenges that we’re having now. He’s so joyful, but he’s so broken.” A third family pulled their deaf child out of NDA after a 14-month stay in 2012 and 2013 when his grandmother said she saw abrasions on his neck and a bruise on his arm during Skype conversations. All three families are suing NDA, alleging abuse and neglect, and are being represented by Jacksonville, Florida attorney Bruce Maxwell, whose severely handicapped daughter lived at a residential facility in Georgia until she died in 2012 – a facility he said was well-run. “I definitely have a spot in my heart for [special needs kids] and it drives my passion,” said Maxwell. advertisement “Mom, Please Help” Kyle Gilrain and Carol Savage, who worked at NDA as therapists in 2012, filed their suit against the Academy in 2013. They allege that they were fired after they reported abuse and neglect to corporate headquarters and to state officials. NDA denies all allegations and the case is pending. In a statement, an NDA attorney said, “Carol Savage and Kyle Gilrain were terminated because they were noncompliant with the obligations of their positions. They failed to follow procedures at the facility with respect to patient care as well as administrative duties and responsibilities. “NBC News Kyle Gilrain and Carol Savage say they were fired from the National Deaf Academy after reporting alleged instances of abuse and neglect. Gilrain went to work at NDA in 2012 because he knew then-CEO Deana Goldstein from another facility in Virginia where they’d both worked several years earlier. He told NBC News that after three or four months at NDA, patients started telling him they were being abused by the staff – physically restrained and coerced in ways, including chokeholds, Gilrain felt were excessive. advertisement “I had a patient that wrote home to his mother in a Mother’s Day card, ‘Mom, please help,’” recalled Gilrain. “And that was all the card said. [He was] severely autistic, deaf, and wasn’t able to communicate it to her any other way.” Gilrain said that he began to report alleged abuse, neglect and overmedication to the Department of Children and Families and the Agency for Health Care Administration. He provided information to Disability Rights Florida, a government-funded advocacy group for the disabled, and sent a letter to the compliance office at the headquarters of the company that has owned NDA since May 2010, Universal Health Services (UHS). He said his old friend from Virginia, Deana Goldstein, was upset that he was contacting the agencies. She told him via email that “All allegations of abuse are not reportable in FL as they are in VA,” and asked him to report the incidents on company forms instead of documenting them in the patient record. Not long after his letter to UHS, and nine months after he began work at NDA, Gilrain was fired. Carol Savage was coming in the door as Gilrain was leaving, and cared for some of the same patients. She said that within her first week, “they were telling me about being choked, being hit. Within the first week, I saw bruising.” She said that soon after that, she witnessed the use of brute force first-hand. “I’ve called the [DCF] abuse hotline before,” said Savage, who has worked at other treatment facilities. “I have never called the abuse hotline 12 times in a six-week period.” Savage said she was told specifically that she was not supposed to call the abuse hotline, and that Goldstein handed her a card with her cell number and asked her to call the number before she called the hotline. advertisement Carol said that two weeks after sending an email detailed alleged problems at the facility to an executive at UHS, and just six weeks after she was hired, she was fired. Savage and Gilrain made contact with each other after leaving NDA, and decided to file a whistleblower suit. Neither has landed a job since, and both have lost their homes to foreclosure. Gilrain said he doesn’t regret reporting the alleged incidents. “I’m not happy now because it’s hard to find a job and I really do like what I do. But I couldn’t have lived with myself.” Incidents “Isolated and Unacceptable” All of the incidents described by Gilrain, Savage and the three families suing NDA allegedly occurred while the Academy was being run by Deana Goldstein, who was CEO from 2009 to late 2013. Goldstein declined to comment to NBC News. In a statement, new NDA CEO Gregory Sizemore said that “the isolated and unacceptable” alleged incidents revealed in the NBC News investigation “are exceptions and do not reflect the high quality of care provided at NDA nor the hundreds of success stories of children whose lives have been enhanced by their time at NDA.” “Since becoming CEO in December 2013,” said Sizemore, “I have worked with our dedicated team to ensure that each patient receives the high quality, individualized care that he or she deserves.” advertisement “All employees receive training on their obligations to report any incidents to the facility and/or regulatory agencies,” he added, “and employees who do not make these required reports or whose conduct fails to meet our high standards have been disciplined and even terminated.” NBC News NDA Behavioral Health System in Mt. Dora, Florida. NDA’s corporate owner, UHS, said in a statement that the Academy is “independently operated” but “expected to meet the highest standards of patient care.” “NDA serves an otherwise underserved community and we are confident that NDA has responded appropriately to address the alleged incidents referenced. NDA has a successful inspection record in its last three surveys conducted in 2013-2014 and we are confident that this trend will continue under its new leadership.” The number of patients housed at NDA, however, has apparently dropped in recent years. The facility has a 132-bed capacity, but housed an average of 76.7 patients daily in 2012, which fell to 72.5 patients in 2013. NDA’s year-to-date average daily population for 2014 is 63.9. 'Mom, Please Help': FBI Probing Alleged Abuse of Deaf, Autistic Kids First published September 14th 2014, 2:55 pm Source: <http://www.nbcnews.com/news/investigations/mom-please-help-fbi-probing-alleged-abuse-deaf-autistic-kids-n193846>

Broomfield man found guilty of pimping girl in foster care system 12:27 PM, Oct 24, 2014 Copyright 2014 Scripps Media, Inc. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed. GOLDEN, Colo. - A Jefferson County jury this week found a Broomfield man guilty of prostituting a 14-year-old girl over a period of two years. The verdict was returned on Oct. 22. Robert Felix Gonzales, 40, was found guilty of 17 counts including pimping of a child, kidnapping, procurement of a child, and soliciting for child prostitution. Gonzales met the girl in 2011 through a foster home placement and began having sex with her, grooming her to believe that she was in love with him. Continuing into 2012 and 2013, Gonzales provided her with methamphetamine and alcohol and forced her to have sex for money or drugs with men she did not know. He arranged for the motel rooms in which she would have sex with strangers. Sometimes he would join, the victim said. The money and drugs from the Johns went to Gonzales. The jury heard that the teen had a history of running away from her grandmother’s house or other foster placements. When Gonzales was prohibited from seeing the teen by her guardians, he took active steps to hide her from her family and police. At times, he hid her in a crawl space at his house, prosecutors said. Following a 7-day trial, the jury returned guilty verdicts on the following 17 counts, including 13 felonies: pandering of a child second-degree kidnapping soliciting for child prostitution procurement of a child pimping of a child keeping a place of child prostitution inducement of child prostitution patronizing a prostituted child 5 counts of sexual exploitation of a child contributing to the delinquency of a minor possession of a controlled substance violation of a protective order harboring a minor "We are extremely pleased with the verdict," said District Attorney Pete Weir, "Sexually exploiting a young girl is unconscionable. These cases can be very difficult, but we were able to bring justice for this young victim and stop this criminal behavior." The investigation was conducted by the Arva Source: <http://www.thedenverchannel.com/news/local-news/broomfield-man-found-guilty-of-pimping-girl-in-foster-care-system>

DCS addresses why foster kids are sleeping in state buildings - CBS 5 - KPHO DCS addresses why foster kids are sleeping in state office buildings Posted: Oct 24, 2014 9:20 PM PDT Updated: Oct 24, 2014 9:30 PM PDT By Adam Longo PHOENIX (CBS5) - CBS5 was able Friday to get a first look inside Department of Child Safety offices where children as young as 2 years old are sleeping on some nights. MOREAdditional Links The CBS5 report Thursday night first exposed this stop-gap measure and the practice has apparently been ongoing. The foster care system in Arizona is overloaded, according to DCS employees and non-profit groups that work to help foster children. This year so far 11 percent more kids are being removed from unsafe homes. There are more than 16,000 kids statewide in foster homes or group homes right now. Because most of those homes are at capacity, some kids end up sleeping inside a dozen or so DCS office buildings throughout Maricopa and Pima counties. "In the 17 years I've been here the biggest shock to me is when we bought cribs," says DCS program manager Gene Burns. Burns supervises the DCS after-hours units. When kids are removed from unsafe homes they are initially brought to the closest DCS office. They stay until suitable foster families or group homes are found. However, if those are full, and that's been happening a lot, there's nowhere else for those kids to go. "It's not ideal. The most ideal place for a kid to sleep is with a family. We are not a family," Burns said. "We have tried to make do with what we have. We have volunteers that bring in and donate food. We have beds here. We have cribs. We have a washing machine and dryer. We have a shower. This is not the place to put a kid." Kids are sometimes sleeping on cots placed between cubicles in the office. The word is going out to potential foster families that the state needs more space for kids. There's been emergency solicitations out to expand the number of group home beds. "The last week we only had five kids. Five to six girls spending the night where we've had considerably more," Burns said. "We want kids in a family setting. We obviously need placements for children in the community." Burns says the situation has improved somewhat within the past month. Fifty to 60 more beds have recently opened up at group homes. Case aides and child protection specialists volunteer to work overtime to help look after these kids on weekends or after hours. The agency is desperate for more foster families to step up. Copyright 2014 CBS 5 (KPHO Broadcasting Corporation). All rights reserved. Source: <http://www.kpho.com/story/26889110/dcs-addresses-why-foster-kids-are-sleeping-in-state-office-buildings#ixzz3HrxRDkXI>

Foster care, trafficking examined By Kim Grizzard The Daily Reflector Monday, October 27, 2014 The first in a series of conferences aimed at preventing human trafficking features a film that is not about trafficking. "From Place to Place" — presented by Eastern North Carolina Stop Human Trafficking Now and Partners Against Trafficking Humans N.C. — is a documentary about a group of people who are aging out of the foster care system. Story continues below advertisement Children’s Home Society of North Carolina Senior Director of Business Development and Advocacy Matt Anderson, who began working on the film in 2008 when he was a graduate student in Montana, has never showed it at an event focused on trafficking. But he is not at a loss as to why he was invited. For the complete article, please pick up a copy of The Daily Reflector. Current home delivery and electronic edition subscribers may log in to access this article at no charge. To become a subscriber, please click here or contact Customer Service at (252) 329-9505. Source: <http://www.reflector.com/news/foster-care-trafficking-links-examined-2694537>

Group home counselor again charged with abuse Gary Lee Toft accused of abusing 2 vulnerable men in his care NEXT STORY Drivers scramble for cash from armored car Text Size: ASmall Text AMedium Text ALarge Text Gary Lee Toft View Large Photos Gary Lee Toft PARKVILLE, Md. —A residential counselor at a group home in Parkville has been charged with abusing two vulnerable adults who were in his care, and it's not the first time that's happened. Man charged in sex assault of disabled man City police say a 63-year-old assisted living facility employee has been arrested and charged in the sexual assault of a 24-year-old developmentally disabled man, and police believe there may be more victims out there. More Baltimore County police said Gary Lee Toft, 63, of Baltimore, was charged with vulnerable adult abuse, perverted practice and numerous sex offenses in a case connected to a group home in the 4100 block of Taylor Avenue. Detectives said they learned about the allegations of abuse in September. Investigators discovered that Toft had abused two men in his care over several months. No other details about the case have been revealed. Toft is currently being held at Central Booking in Baltimore because of previous sex offense and perverted practice charges against him, according to court records. In that case, Toft was charged in September with sexually assaulting a 24-year-old developmentally disabled man at Creative Options, where Toft also worked as a residential counselor. Anyone with information about the Baltimore County case or other possible incidents involving Toft should call police at 410-307-2020. Because city police said Toft admitted to preying upon and assaulting multiple victims, specifically young men, police created a hotline for any additional victims to call and report any assaults that Toft may have committed. That number is 410-396-2269. Source: <http://www.wbalv.com/news/group-home-counselor-charged-with-abuse/29403660>

Grand Falls-Windsor Revokes Group Home Permit Wednesday , October 29 2014 | 5:25:25 PM The Blue Sky group home has until the end of November to close down the operation after council voted last night to revoke the home's permit. Mayor Al Hawkins says the town has been dealing with numerous complaints since the group home opened in July. He says council has dealt with over 80 complaints filed over the last four months. Blue Sky operates the group home which can house up to five residents. Hawkins says many of the complaints have been filed with the RCMP. Most of the complaints were about curfew, but there were some related to assaults and thefts. Hawkins says a month ago council asked Blue Sky to try to correct the problems. The company now has two weeks to file an appeal; if they lose, they will have to close the residence by the end of November. Source: <http://www.vocm.com/newsarticle.asp?mn=2&ID=50371>

Kidnapped for Christ Screens After Kate Logan Talks About Her Horrific Teen Center Film By Matt Coker Published Fri., Oct. 31 2014 at 6:37 AM Kidnapped for Christ LLC Anti-gay therapy is the pits. Biola University student Kate Logan went to the Dominican Republic to make a movie about a troubled teen center. But once in Jarabacoa she discovered teens had been kidnapped at the behest of their parents to attend a school where they'd undergo behavior modification and anti-gay therapy. Thus, the theme of Logan's documentary changed, something she'll talk about at a panel discussion in Long Beach Saturday night before Kidnapped for Christ screens. Logan, whose Kidnapped for Christ is now a Showtime film, will be joined on the panel by Dwayne Walker,

California coordinator for Human, Earth, Animal Liberation (HEAL), a Seattle-based organization that exposes institutional abuse throughout the nation. As Logan talks about her experiences filming, Walker will discuss how HEAL's Teen Liberty Campaign is helping to shut down programs like the one the filmmaker exposed. The panel discussion begins at 8 p.m. Saturday at The Center, 2017 E. 4th St., Long Beach, and Kidnapped for Christ starts 9 p.m. across the way at the Art Theater, 2025 E. 4th St. Tickets are $11. Visit heal-online.org for more about the group and kidnappedforchrist.com for more about the movie. Source: <http://blogs.ocweekly.com/navelgazing/2014/10/kidnapped-for-christ-kate-logan.php>

Reform school survivors allege abuse of their personal files too Former students of controversial WWASP programs cannot locate documents needed for college, disability and legal action October 31, 2014 5:00AM ET by Justin Higginbottom @justinHhiggin SALT LAKE CITY — Ashley Astle left Spring Creek Lodge, a residential facility for troubled youths in Montana, over a decade ago. She has never been back. “I’m not sure how deeply you want me to go into my experience of the program, but I will give you the short version. Basically, it was terrible,” she said. Last winter she started to hear disturbing rumors that reopened old wounds. Spring Creek Lodge closed in 2009 after a wrongful death suit after a student hanged herself, and the school sat derelict in a Montana forest. According to another alum who allegedly returned to the facility, the abandoned school was still filled with fragments of past students’ lives — journals, progress notes, letters and medical and mental health records. The facility, part tough love and part behavior modification, had left a community of traumatized students connected through social media. So Astle organized a Facebook group she called Operation Spring Creek Lodge to galvanize former students in an attempt to retrieve their records or at least make sure they were properly disposed of. Many of those who heard about their efforts were disgusted that the school, which took so much from them emotionally, might retain a physical component as well. “The problem ... is that we have all been through so much trauma in and out of the program, and that’s a very private thing for most of us,” said Astle. “So for them not to properly dispose of these records is an incredibly low blow.” The for-profit residential youth treatment industry, often criticized for having lax regulation, has left former students seeking answers after dozens of programs have closed over the years. Schools that once operated under the umbrella of the World Wide Association of Specialty Programs (WWASP), with leadership and strong ties to the state of the Utah but with campuses around the world, have left a trail of shuttered programs and, for many students, unknown fates for academic and medical records. Former students seeking records for colleges, disability claims, lawsuits regarding past abuse or simply a sense of closure have had little recourse. Astle recalled spending time at Spring Creek in isolation in a room known as the hobbit hole, which was often covered in feces, urine and blood. She described the therapy seminars she was required to attend as brainwashing. She is now an active member of the online survivor community — which includes Facebook groups like WWASP Survivors, Stop WWASP and Spring Creek Lodge Survivors Community — made up of mostly former WWASP program participants critical of the industry. In July a member of another group, Cross Creek Survivors, posted a picture of a dumpster outside the Cross Creek Manor facility, another former WWASP school in southern Utah. The bin appeared to be filled with former students’ documents. Former students ignited the thread with requests for people to visit the area and confirm the documents — whatever they might be — were properly disposed of. Chaffin Pullan, a former administrator at Cross Creek, denied it was possible for students’ sensitive documents to end up in a dumpster. Recent academic records are stored off-site, and older records have been destroyed, he said. He acknowledged that hundreds of students have contacted him asking for their records, but he has been able to help only those who recently attended the school. Medical records, he said, including those for therapy sessions, are kept by the individual doctors. When asked about student concerns regarding records and documents left over from programs, former WWASP president Ken Kay said that what individual schools did with their records was not his organization’s responsibility. “I didn’t have any control over the schools,” he said, “how they stored their records or anything.” Academic records should have been forwarded to the Browning Academy, an online distance learning center, Kay said. A representative of Browning confirmed the academy sends out records when it has them. “There are many I do not have. It may take up to one month to process the request,” the person wrote in an email. The problem, according to Kay, is that some schools never forwarded their transcripts to Browning. “We weren’t responsible for [the schools], but we failed the responsibility to try to coach them,” he said. “We have all been through so much trauma in and out of the program, and that’s a very private thing for most of us. So for them not to properly dispose of these records is an incredibly low blow.” Ashley Astle former Spring Creek Lodge student Lilly Speerdecker spent three months at the troubled-youth facility Casa by the Sea, in Ensenada, Mexico, until it was closed by Mexican authorities in 2004. Now she runs the Safe Teen Schools website, which provides information on abuse at tough-love facilities like Casa by the Sea. She said former students from WWASP schools regularly contact her for advice on how to locate their transcripts in order to apply for college. “I don’t know how,” Speerdecker said. “I feel bad because there is nothing I can do.” In 2005, 34 states reported to the Health and Human Services Department’s National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System 1,503 incidents of abuse by government and private residential facility staffers — the majority alleging neglect or deprivation of necessities (44 percent), with physical abuse second (24 percent). Two years later, the Alliance for the Safe, Therapeutic and Appropriate Use of Residential Treatment (ASTART) testified on its findings of an online survey of hundreds of former students of residential youth programs. Forty-five percent of the surveyed students reported being emotionally, physically or sexually abused by staff. Over 90 percent had mail and phone calls monitored, and over 80 percent had letters or conversations restricted. More than half had experience in seclusion. The majority described feeling “a lot” of sadness, stress, anger, confusion, hopelessness and fear at their programs. In 2007 and 2008 there were several U.S. Government Accountability Office reports as well as hearings before Congress on abuse at youth residential treatment facilities. While there is no data on the exact number of children in residential programs, ASTART estimated there are hundreds of such facilities, with as many as 14,000 children in a peak year, with annual revenue of up to $1 billion. However, there is no federal regulation of for-profit troubled-youth programs (other than federal HIPAA regulations regarding medical files), leaving oversight of the programs up to individual states. The Department of Licensing in Utah, for example, has no rules regarding facilities’ keeping documentation, said licensing director Diane Moore. The Department of Education in New York, tasked with regulating the Academy at Ivy Ridge, another WWASP-affiliated school now closed, requires schools to store student records for 50 years and “take precautions to ensure the security of student academic records.” Some former students of residential facilities like the Academy at Ivy Ridge in New York want to see their records simply for a sense of closure after what they described as harrowing childhood experiences. Courtesy of former Ivy Ridge student But what Sean, a former Ivy Ridge student whose last name is withheld for his legal protection, said he found at his old campus was conflicting. In November of 2013, with help from urban explorers adept at sneaking into state asylums, Sean entered Ivy Ridge, which is off-limits but unguarded. In rooms with circled mold patches and Chinese characters (a Delaware corporation bought the building in 2009 to teach English to Chinese students) were rows and stacks of cardboard boxes and file cabinets. And inside those, he said, were copies of birth certificates, suicide watch forms, printed emails from students, records of medical visits, undelivered mail from families (including a set of family pictures he mailed back to its owner in Corpus Christi, Texas), DVDs of camera footage, documentation of what was known as the riot (which he referred to as “the uprising”) and his own records. Sean opened his files quickly, taking pictures of everything in case he couldn’t get them out. “I was able to get a lot of closure for myself,” he said, “but now I’ve taken on a new burden.” He wants to help other students get their records back too. Since then, he has returned, with others, to explore more rooms. “It’s like a big rock, and I’m trying to erode it down and disburse it out,” he explained. Not only does Nicole Booth not have school records from her attendance 22 years ago at New Beginnings, which is in Utah on the property of WWASP founder Robert Lichfield, but she also has no record of the school itself, she said. “It makes me nervous,” she said. “It’s almost like none of this ever existed.” Booth was sent to New Beginnings a month before her 18th birthday in order to finish high school. What she found when she arrived, she said, was nothing like what she had read in the brochure. In place of education was punishment, and the staff immediately degraded her verbally, she recalled. Shortly before her birthday in July, she said, she was chained to a log for hours in the Utah desert. Now 40 and diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder, which she said stems from her time at the program, Booth said she cannot find a trace of the program on the Internet. She considered seeking legal action eventually, when she was ready, but is not hopeful, with the program — and any record of her attendance — possibly extinct. “It affects me. I don’t think about it every day ... but it’s made me who I am today,” Booth said of her time at New Beginnings. “I’m very leery of people. I would never send my kids, ever, anywhere, just because I’m scared they would get sent to some place like I was at.” “‘Closure’ is a good word for it,” said Mathew Foley, who was unable to track down records of his attendance at Spring Creek Lodge for his disability application. “I’d like to see exactly what they have to say, what they were telling my parents ... that was getting my parents to agree to keep me there.” Source: <http://america.aljazeera.com/articles/2014/10/31/missing-records-wwaspreformschools.html>

States Are Prioritizing Prisons Over Education, Budgets Show The Huffington Post | By Rebecca Klein Posted: 10/30/2014 11:29 am EDT Updated: 10/30/2014 11:59 am EDT Chris Ryan via Getty Images Share 1148 Tweet 534 Email | 36 Comment 78 tumblr stumble reddit If state budget trends reflect the country’s policy priorities, then the U.S. currently values prisoners over children, a new report suggests. A report released this week by the Center on Budget

and Policy Priorities shows that the growth of state spending on prisons in recent years has far outpaced the growth of spending on education. After adjusting for inflation, state general fund spending on prison-related expenses increased over 140 percent between 1986 and 2013. During the same period, state spending on K-12 education increased only 69 percent, while higher education saw an increase of less than six percent. State spending on corrections has exploded in recent years, as incarceration rates have more than tripled in a majority of states in the past few decades. The report says that the likelihood that an offender will be incarcerated has gone up across the board for all major crimes. At the same time, increases in education spending have not kept pace. In fact, since 2008, spending on education has actually declined in a majority of states in the wake of the Great Recession. According to the brief, rates of violent crime and property crime have actually fallen over the years, even while incarceration rates have risen. Therefore, it appears that states' more aggressive incarceration policies are behind the higher prison rates. Michael Mitchell, a co-author of the report and a policy analyst with the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, suggested that education spending could actually help lower incarceration rates. "When you look at prisoners, people who get sent to prison and their educational levels, [the levels are] typically much lower than individuals who are not sent to prison," he told The Huffington Post. "Being a high school dropout dramatically increases your likelihood of being sent to prison." "Spending so many dollars locking up so many people, those are dollars that inevitably cannot be used to provide pre-K slots ... or financial aid for those who want to go to college," Mitchell added. The report suggests that states' spending practices are ultimately harming their economies, while not making the states especially safer. The authors ultimately conclude that if "states were still spending the same amount on corrections as they did in the mid-1980s, adjusted for inflation, they would have about $28 billion more available each year for education and other productive investments." "The types of investments to help people out of poverty and break that school-to-prison pipeline are investments in early education, helping youth stay in school and getting them college campuses," said Mitchell. Source: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2014/10/30/state-spending-prison-and-education_n_6072318.html

Former Utah youth home employee sent to prison for sexual abuse By STEPHEN HUNT | The Salt Lake Tribune First Published Nov 06 2014 10:00AM
 • Last Updated Nov 07 2014 10:30 pm Wade Russell Wade Russell ARTICLE PHOTO GALLERY (1) Crime » Judge orders one to 15 years on each of 12 counts. Share This Article A former employee of a Spanish Fork group home for troubled teens was sentenced to prison for up to 15 years Thursday for sexually abusing four teenage girls at the facility. Wade Russell, 60, had pleaded no contest in September to 12 counts of second-degree felony forcible sexual abuse. On Thursday, 4th District Judge James Taylor sentenced Russell to one to 15 years on each count, but ordered the sentences to run concurrently. The judge also fined Russell $228,396. Russell sexually abused the girls, ages 13 to 16, while employed at Extended Family Services between February and November 2013. According to court documents, one girl said that on Nov. 3, 2013, her third night at EFS, Russell went into her room, lay down next to her bed and fondled her over her clothing, according to charging documents. Source: <http://www.sltrib.com/news/1792654-155/russell-abuse-counts-degree-documents-sexual>

A New Rebellion for Lunch and Recess! By I AM AN EDUCATOR on November 6, 2014 The rebellion for lunch and recess is rocking Seattle! Photos by Sarah Lang The rally to defend lunch and recess time at the Wednesday Seattle school board meeting was an overwhelming success. A few dozen parents, teachers, and kids rallied and testified with one message: eating and playing—lunch and recess—are human rights. The school district began the meeting by announcing they would form a task-force that would make a recommendation on lunch and recess times within eighteen months. This absurdly long timeline to grant students their basic rights only inflamed the passions of the protesters. Families from a diverse geographical representation of Seattle schools presented moving stories and convincing research to make an unassailable case to expand lunch and recess times in the Seattle Public Schools. One parent revealed that an audit conducted by parents in the Lunch and Recess Matter group over the last couple of weeks found some 50 schools in Seattle do not adhere to their own policy requiring a minimum of 20 min of time to eat. Parents announced that at one school, students at the back of the lunch line only had five minutes to scarf down their food before the bell rang. Others connected the loss of recess time to the increase in high-stakes testing. One African immigrant parent gave a first hand account of what it feels like to be starving and told the school board it was unacceptable that his son didn't receive enough time to eat and is then asked to throw away his food. He told his son that he was not allowed to throw the food away and a teacher would have to do it for him—and demanded that the school district allow his son the time he needed not to waste food. A student from a south end elementary school talked about recess, the wiggles, and how much fun it is to play. Another parent delivered over 1,600 signatures that were collected on the "Save Recess" petition. This movement is at the very beginning but has already shown great spirit and convincing arguments, including this oped by two of the new parent leaders, Dayna Provitt and Jana Robbins. The Lunch and Recess group has the potential to launch a whole new parent and teacher coalition to transform the schools to make them responsive to the communities they serve. Parent leader Deb Escher and Jesse Hagopian rally for their kids to have time for lunch and recess Here then is a round up of some of the media this new movement received in its first major action: KIRO TV: <http://www.kirotv.com/news/news/seattle-parents-kids-dont-have-enough-time-eat-lun/nh26x/> KUOW: <http://kuow.org/post/lunches-too-short-seattle-schools-say-students-and-parents> KIRO radio: <http://mynorthwest.com/11/2638000/Seattle-parents-protest-shrinking-lunch-recess-times> KING 5: <http://www.king5.com/story/news/local/seattle/2014/11/05/seattle-parents-protest-length-of-school-lunch-period/18561847/> Seattle Times: <http://blogs.seattletimes.com/educationlab/2014/11/05/lunch-and-recess-too-short-say-some-seattle-parents-and-students/> Save Seattle Schools Blog: http://savesattleschools.blogspot.com/2014/11/highlights-from-board-meeting_ Source: <http://iamaneducator.com/2014/11/06/a-new-rebellion-for-lunch-and-recess/>

Supreme Court refuses to hear group-home case The decision sends Newport Beach challenge back to lower courts. Costa Mesa, Laguna signed on in support. Email Share 34 By Hannah Fry November 3, 2014 | 4:13 p.m. The U.S. Supreme Court has rejected Newport Beach's request for a hearing on its group-home law, a move that will effectively force the city back into trial court to defend its ordinance. Newport Beach submitted a petition to the Supreme Court in August, asking the justices to reverse a 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruling that a municipal ordinance governing group homes could be challenged for discriminatory intent. The Supreme Court announced Monday that it would not hear the case. Topics Courts and the Judiciary Trials and Arbitration U.S. Supreme Court "We are still analyzing the court's decision and its potential impact on our ordinance," City Atty. Aaron Harp said. "Obviously, this is not the outcome we had hoped for, but from the beginning we knew review by the United States Supreme Court is rarely granted." Steven Polin, an attorney representing the group homes, said the high court's refusal to hear the lawsuit will allow lower courts to issue a judgment based on the case's merits. "The ballgame is not over," he said. "We're back where we always thought we should be." In January 2008, the city adopted a law that placed strict limits on group homes. The homes had previously been operating freely in residential areas, which led to complaints from Newport Beach residents about traffic issues, cigarette smoke, loitering and noise. The group homes contend that the motivation behind the ordinance was to make it nearly impossible to provide housing for recovering addicts. The law effectively prohibited new group homes housing seven or more residents from opening in most residential areas and required existing group homes to complete the same permitting process required of new ones, including an extensive public review process, according to court documents. The ordinance forced out many of the group homes because they could not qualify for permits. Harp estimated that the city has spent roughly $4 million defending lawsuits from group-home operators since it implemented the law in 2008. Several other Orange County cities have also wrestled with limiting rehab homes in recent years. Costa Mesa and Laguna Beach, which have each dealt with their own issues, contributed funding toward the cost of filing amicus briefs, which are written arguments submitted by independent organizations, to the Supreme Court. They joined in support of Newport Beach. "If the Supreme Court would have given a ruling, it would have provided some legal precedent and feedback for communities that deal with this issue," said Costa Mesa city spokesman Bill Lobdell. Pacific Shores Properties, Yellowstone Recovery and Newport Coast Recovery first sued Newport in 2009. The organizations contend that the ordinance discriminates against recovering drug addicts and alcoholics, who are protected by the federal Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988. The act prevents discrimination against people who are in a "protected class," which courts have found includes recovering drug addicts and alcoholics, when they seek housing. Addicts and alcoholics in recovery are considered protected by the Americans with Disabilities Act. A U.S. District Court judge first ruled in 2010 that the nature of the ordinance was not discriminatory. The case was appealed by the group homes to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. In 2013, a three-person panel of the appeals court ruled that the ordinance may have illegally discriminated against group homes for people in recovery based on disability. However, other 9th Circuit judges maintained that the panel's decision inappropriately allowed a neutral law that was fairly enforced to be challenged based on an accusation of ill intent. The city agreed and appealed to the Supreme Court. "This case is and has always been about a city's right to enact non-discriminatory regulations to protect its residents from negative impacts associated with adjoining land uses," Harp said. "We remain committed to protecting our residents' quality of life and ensuring land uses are compatible and contribute positively to our community." Source: <http://www.dailypilot.com/news/tn-dpt-me-1105-newport-group-home-lawsuit-20141103.0.4226447.story>

Jury finds foster mom guilty of capital murder in 2-year-old's death Posted: Tuesday, November 4, 2014 12:26 pm Jury finds foster mom guilty of capital murder in 2-year-old's death By Jordan Overturf jordan.overturf@theeagle.com The Eagle | 1 comment UPDATE -- The jury found Sherill Small guilty of capital murder Tuesday afternoon for the death of her 2-year-old foster daughter, Alexandria Hill, in 2013. Small, 55, was immediately sentenced to life in prison without parole by Judge John Youngblood. Small's daughter, Amber Forester, cried and ran out of the courtroom when the verdict was announced. District Attorney Bill Torrey said he was confident that the jury would convict because "the evidence in this case was overwhelming." Defense attorney Shawna Roscom said Small's response was one of devastation. "I believe there is a tragedy any way you look at it," said Roscom, a Bryan-based attorney who assisted Norman Lanford, the court-appointed attorney representing Small. Roscom said an appeal will follow, though another attorney will handle that process. CAMERON -- The fate of a Rockdale foster mother charged with the July 2013 murder of Alexandria Hill is now in the hands of a Milam County Jury. Closing statements were heard Tuesday morning in the 20th District Court in Cameron, where Judge John Youngblood charged the jury with finding a verdict on three possible charges -- capital murder, criminally negligent homicide and serious injury to a child. If convicted of capital murder, the defendant, Sherill Small, 55, will face life in prison. The courtroom was half full on Tuesday, with Alexandria's family members present. Sherill Small's husband, Clemon Small, and daughter, Amber Forester, sat behind her as the attorneys made their final statements to the jury. Assistant District Attorney John Redington told jurors that Small didn't want to be a foster mom and that it was her sister-in-law's idea. "She was not doing this (fostering) for the right reasons. ... I think that Sherill Small murdered Alex Hill. Once you look at all the evidence and you listen to your oath as jurors, this case deserves a guilty verdict for capital murder," Redington said. Defense attorney Norman Lanford told jurors that Rockdale authorities rushed to judgment in their investigation of Small and by the end, they only had four-and-a-half pages of documents to prove the case. "As far as the authorities in this county are concerned, you can send somebody to prison for the rest of their life for four pages," Lanford said. He also said the prosecution failed to prove that his client caused Alex's injuries purposefully. "All you've got is an unexplained death and one person in the house when it happened. As far as Rockdale is concerned, if you're the only one present, then you committed capital murder," the former district judge said during his closing statement. District Attorney Bill Torrey told jurors in his final comments that the defense's medical experts admitted that some of Small's symptoms of dementia could have been faked. "This is an amazingly proved case. Sherill Small brutally murdered Alex Hill. And y'all know that," Torrey said. Jurors were set to begin deliberations after lunch. Source: http://www.theeagle.com/news/crime/jury-finds-foster-mom-guilty-of-capital-murder-in/article_7e07fb3a-644a-11e4-b84b-6f6d72e9392d.html

Lawsuit Claims "Kids for Cash" Foster Care Abuse | NBC Southern California Lawsuit Claims "Kids for Cash" Foster Care Abuse By Kim Baldonado Kim Baldonado reports for the NBC4 News at 5 p.m. Thursday, Nov. 6, 2014. (Published Thursday, Nov 6, 2014 • Updated at 8:50 PM PST One of California's largest private foster care agencies is under fire over allegations of torture and abuse that are outlined in a 76-page lawsuit. The suit alleges foster care children endured physical and mental abuse of a seven-year period, abuse allegedly covered up by the Rancho Cucamonga-based Interim Care Foster Family Agency, which recruited and supervised the foster parents. Police Seek Victims in Alleged Craigslist Sex Assaults "My old foster parents, they used to make special tools just to torture us, and I was under the age of 10 years old," former foster child Isaiah Sais said at a news conference Thursday. Sais is one of eight suing the agency, which is part of California's $400 million a year private foster care industry. 2014 SoCal Images in the News "I have been abused verbally, physically and sexually when I was put into foster care," former foster child Shawna Adams said. The suit claims the children were "caught in an illegal, abusive, violent, concealed, unconscionable 'kids for cash' operation from 2006 to 2013." It goes on to say the foster children "suffered ongoing, unrestrained, terror, torture, corporal punishment, physical and mental abuse and neglect" at the hands of the foster parents that was "covered up/ unchecked by defendant Interim (Care Foster Family Agency)." Tearful Families Welcome Marines Home "We're letting you hear our voices now because we were silent for too long," former foster child Saleena Galvan said. "The lawsuit alleges a kids for cash operation that has bilked the government of hundreds of thousands of dollars," attorney L. Wallace Pate said. Parents, Students Reportedly Fight at IE High School The state pays private agencies about $2,000 a month per child. The agencies are allowed to keep as much as 60 percent of the state money to pay for rent, supplies, and personnel to ensure foster children are being cared for, but Pate claims that was not the case with her clients. "The lawsuit alleges these children lived in seven different homes, none were certified," Pate said. "They were evicted from four facilities and were homeless." The two foster parents named in the lawsuit had their licenses revoked by the state, but Pate believes the same should happen to the agency which employed them. NBC4's requests for comment in person and on the phone to Interim Care Foster Family Agency about the lawsuit had not been returned as of Thursday night. Source: <http://www.nbclosangeles.com/news/local/Lawsuit-Claims-Kids-for-Cash-Foster-Care-Abuse--281880151.html>

Foster-care policy change modest given need for reform PTH 9:40 p.m. EST November 11, 2014 A foster father and son wash dishes. (Photo: TIMES HERALD) 70 CONNECT 2 TWEETLINKEDIN 9 COMMENTEMAILMORE A new policy for child foster care placements was recently announced. It requires consideration to the attachment of infants and toddlers to their parents and/or caregivers when making placement decisions. This is only the tip of the iceberg in repairing a system that is horribly broken. Michigan had a little more than 14,000 children in foster care in 2011. That year, St. Clair County had 347 children between the ages of 0-5 under Child Protective Services supervision. As of April 2012, the county had 292 children in foster care. The CPS supervision number does not include children ages 6-17 so the actual number of children under supervision is higher. While there are children in need of care, the basis on which children come under supervision and/or are removed from homes is questionable. Child Protective Services and Department of Human Services workers do not have to substantiate their findings. If they believe a child is abused or neglected, even if there are no witnesses or records to substantiate their claim, what the worker says is accepted by the court. This is wrong and detrimental to families. The term "Child Protective Services" might not be good enough. A better one would be "Career Protection Services." If workers find children to rescue or protect, their jobs are secure. Foster care is a money-making system. By pulling children out of the home the county receives IV-E funding. If the child is left in the home and/or returned to the home, the county loses funding. When Michigan's case load of IV-E-eligible children declined between 2001 to 2006 it put a strain on state and county budgets, reducing eligibility to only 29.5 percent. By 2012, Michigan increased eligibility to 37 percent by removing children from their homes and collecting IV-E funding. Are the best interests of each child being properly met? When a child is under the supervision of CPS/DHS, a legal guardian ad litem (LGAL) is assigned to represent the child's best interests. Here in St. Clair County, there is only one LGAL that appears in court on neglect cases, and you will also find her listed for delinquency proceedings. In a four-week period the LGAL was scheduled to appear in court on 87 child protective proceedings and 26 delinquency proceedings -- a total of 113 court appearances in a 4-week period. That does not represent an entire case load. The process is repeated week after week, month after month. Children are constantly being added to the system. Each case may have more than one child. Each case has a court review every three months. How well can one LGAL represent the best interests of each and every child she is responsible for with a case load that is so substantial? If you sit in court, you will find the LGAL rarely offers any information regarding the children. It is a cookie-cutter process where the CPS, DHS or adoption worker presents their report to the court, the LGAL agrees with their findings, adds none of her own and the court accepts the case worker's report as valid. Rulings are made against family members without their input, medical needs of the children are not brought to the court's attention, recommendations and orders are not followed. If the LGAL has made a phone call to the home where the child is located but does not speak to anyone that still meets her requirement of a quarterly contact with the child/family. This is not acceptable. The CPS/DHS destruction of families must be stopped. The manner in which such cases are handled must change. Public awareness of a broken system is the first step towards repair. Source: <http://www.thetimesherald.com/story/opinion/columnists/2014/11/11/foster-care-policy-change-modest-given-need-reform/18878057/>

Task force considers changes in foster care by Kate Morris November 12, 2014 5:04 AM Do you like this? RSS Print × 1 of 2 Expand Task force considers changes in foster care × 2 of 2 Expand Task force considers changes in foster care PrevNext Prev Next Deaths prompt leaders to seek local fixes to system Amid growing concern for the state's foster care system, a task force in Williamson County is considering improvements that can be made on a local level. According to the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services, in the past two years there have been four abuse- or neglect-related deaths of children who were placed in foster care in Williamson County or who were from the county. "There's around 500 kids in foster care in Williamson County at any given time," Precinct 1 County Commissioner Lisa Birkman said. "I think a lot of people hear the stories of children dying, and they're appalled by it like everyone else but they really don't know what to do. I'm hoping we can get the message out of things you can do." A task force set up by Birkman held its first meeting Sept. 25 to discuss the state of the foster care system in Williamson County and where gaps in care have developed. In its second meeting Oct. 10 the members identified how to close those gaps. The caseworker turnover rate was identified as a major issue in the foster care system, but the task force identified a lack of communication and collaboration among organizations to be the root of the county's problems. "There's a number of resources in the community that are all working parallel on a lot of public welfare issues, but there's not cross-talk," attorney ad litem Robert Maier said. "Recently my wife provided me a list of the services that are available here, be it mental health, medical, food banks, pantries—these resources are out there. But we were talking about consolidating this into some sort of a centralized list." Maier used himself as an example, admitting he learned about a valuable resource just by attending the first meeting. In 2013 the Texas Legislature put emphasis on attorney ad litem attorneys who provide legal services to children—to be responsible for the educational and medical needs of the children they are representing, in addition to their welfare and emotional needs, Maier said. Maier also said each school district is required by state law to have a foster care liaison to help with communication between a foster family and the school district. "[There] are foster care liaisons that are in the various school districts," he said. "From an attorney ad litem perspective, this is a resource. Now that we have a willing partner in the school district, we can have better communication." Other task force members include school district representatives, foster families and organizations that work with foster children—many whom were also meeting for the first time through Birkman's task force. "We have a lot of community resources just in Williamson County that we just don't know about," said Alisa De Luna, a task force member and executive director for the Williamson County Court Appointed Special Advocates, or CASA. "With the turnover in [DFPS Child Protective Services] sometimes the caseworkers just don't know [about available resources], and they don't make the requests of the child welfare board to get the assistance that a child or even sometimes the parents of the child need." Turnover creates care gaps. The Stephen Group is a consulting firm that was selected by the Texas Health and Human Services Commission and DFPS in February to review CPS. According to an assessment on CPS compiled by The Stephen Group, CPS sees more than one-quarter of caseworkers leaving annually. Additionally, more than 43 percent of new employees leave within the first two years. "One of the issues that the state has is that the CPS worker's average stay is nine months in CPS for a caseworker, and three months of that is training—so they're in the field six months before they leave," Birkman said. "If you had a list of all of those [resources] and keep it updated, that would be a huge help, and that's not something the state's going to do, but the county could host that on our website." DFPS also recently underwent a periodical review by the state legislative Sunset Advisory Commission. As part of the review, which was completed in June, the commission identified CPS caseworker turnover as high priority. The SAC is a means for the legislature to take a closer look at state agencies and assess the continuing needs of those agencies to exist. In addition to stating whether to continue or abolish an agency, SAC identifies problematic areas within the agency in a report that is released to the public. The SAC is putting together a bill based on its findings that will be presented in the upcoming legislative session, which begins in January. "Some of the critical issues are making sure that the coordination and education of resources and the coordination among the various entities involved in our foster care system—such as the CASA volunteers and the CPS caseworkers and, of course, our legal system and the interest groups—are concerned about the welfare of our children," state Sen. Charles Schwertner, R-Georgetown, said. Schwertner and state Rep. Larry Gonzales, R-Round Rock, serve on the SAC. The two have also been working with Birkman and said they welcome input from the task force. "I think it's helpful and critical that we get information from people on the ground," Schwertner said. "I'm keenly interested in the results of the task force and hearing from people ... that have to deal with this on a daily basis." State Rep. Tony Dale, R-Cedar Park, who serves as a member on the legislative Select Committee on Child Protection, has also been working with the task force. The committee was created last spring by House Speaker Joe Straus to study abuse and neglect fatalities in Texas and make recommendations for protection. "My perspective is our committee is encouraging the Sunset Commission on some of the things related to CPS and what they should adopt," Dale said. "That Sunset bill is likely to pass, and that's probably the best vehicle for these things that need to be done legislatively ... instead of having a bunch of individual bills over here from members like me; it's basically a have-to-pass bill." Although he said some of the task force's proposed changes do not require new laws, he still welcomes input at the task force meetings. "Part of what I've learned from these meetings, I look at [the recommendations] and I can incorporate that into what I think needs to be done for CPS, so it's very helpful to me to get feedback, especially from people that are not just local but are directly involved," he said. "Unlike me—I'm at the policy level. I don't have foster kids; I don't have any interaction with the system, so it's different for me." Finding a fix One option being looked at to alleviate the problems in the Texas foster care system is the implementation of a computer program called Information Management Protecting Adults and Children in Texas. The IMPACT program was built in 1996, and modernization would allow for records and information to be centralized in a Web application. "IMPACT is very dated," said Jo Poenitzsch, executive assistant attorney to the county attorney. "The problem is that we don't have access as the county attorneys to this system, which would help tremendously in our cases if we could at any given point look into a case file [and] see what's been going on." According to DFPS, IMPACT would help caseworkers document cases faster and spend more time with foster families. Other gaps identified by the task force were a lack of mentor programs and resources to support foster and biological families as well as the state monetary reimbursement system for foster families. Birkman said the county has not done anything like the task force for the foster care system in the past, but it has had one for the mental health system. "Before I got on the court 10 years ago the commissioners decided the same sort of thing with mental health and formed a task force," she said. "That's been very successful. We're now one of the best mental health systems in the state." The task force meets again Nov. 17, and although it is scheduled to be its final meeting, Birkman said she hopes to make the meetings a regular occurrence. Additionally, she said she will continue to work with state officials to convey the messages of the task force, and interested parties are encouraged to email state representatives and senators or testify in person when the SAC bill is presented. "I think our role is to help define what is important to us in Williamson County," Birkman said. Source: <http://impactnews.com/austin-metro/georgetown/task-force-considers-changes-in-foster-care/>

Morristown group home complaints bring action Story Comments Share Share Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Related Documents Letter from Devereaux to Morristown Mayor Tim Dougherty This letter was sent to Morristown Mayor Timothy Dougherty by the Devereaux Foundation on Nov. 6 addressing issues involving the group Home on Headley Road in Morristown. Posted: Thursday, November 13, 2014 12:15 am Morristown group home complaints bring action 0 comments MORRISTOWN – Although the Morristown Council has taken the step to ask the state to revoke the license of the Devereux Foundation's group home for teens on Headley Road, additional steps are being taken by both sides to make changes to how the house is run. The Council on Tuesday, Oct. 21, passed a resolution to ask the state to rescind the group home's license following months of complaints from residents the nonprofit Devereux Foundation is letting poorly supervised teenage boys roam the street where they harass and intimidate neighbors. Although the vote was unanimous, Councilwoman Alison Deeb, the lone Republican on the governing body, complained she was being left out of the loop regarding the council's decision-making process. "I hate to think it's political," Deeb said Friday, "but the Devereux house is in my (Fourth) ward." Nevertheless she said she felt progress has been made in the time since the council passed the resolution. She noted a private meeting was held between the neighborhood and Devereux representatives last Friday in which Devereux was to have discussed remedial steps it plans to make. "I do think the situation is moving in the right direction," Deeb said. "It is apparent now that Devereux wants to make productive changes, which is a positive thing. The mayor's office is engaged which is good." Among the steps the council is taking, besides asking the state to rescind the license, is having town attorney Vij Pawar look into whether the town can charge for "excessive" calls out to town authorities. "It has been observed that Devereux lacks the appropriate level of security and should be held accountable," Deeb said. "Since we require bar owners to provide extra security a precedent has been set. Why can't Devereux provide their own security? If not, why shouldn't they pay for ours?" She added if the town charged for services, it would mean "we hold Devereux accountable and reduce taxpayer burden since Devereux does not pay any taxes yet has exorbitant demand for our municipal services." Joanne Farrell, who has lived next door to the group home for 20 years, said for the first 18 years there was no issue. "They were fine," she said. "It has only been in the last two years things have gotten out of hand." Farrell said the issue is not of being unwelcoming to the teens, all of whom are mentally disabled in some way. "We're not unwelcoming. I'm a teacher. I understand and am sympathetic to their needs. It's the lack of supervision and the physical deterioration of the building that is the issue." She noted one of the boys had smashed all the windows in the front of the house. "There was a time all the windows were boarded up," she said. She also noted the porch step railings had been torn out. "One boy was found wandering all alone," she said. Farrell said she attended the Friday meeting and said the residents and Devereux had discussed where things stand now. "No one seems to know," Farrell said. "We know the council wants the license revoked but the two sides seem to be talking with each other." Devereux supplied a letter Chief Executive Director Robert Krieder sent to Mayor Timothy Dougherty on Nov. 6 addressing the group home. It is attached to this article. Krieder notes the teens have behavioral issues but criticizes the community for not being welcoming to the teens. Farrell commented that because Krieder is not experiencing the issues doesn't really understand them. "Devereux may be a fine organization but the CEO is not here to see what is happening," she said. On its website it describes itself as "one of the oldest and largest nonprofit providers of behavioral healthcare in the country. Across its national network, Devereux partners with families, schools and communities in order to help some of our nation's most vulnerable individuals achieve happiness and personal fulfillment. We provide a continuum of care for children, adolescents and adults faced with intellectual and developmental disabilities, autism spectrum disorders and mental health challenges, including psychiatric hospitals, residential and day treatment programs, community-based group homes, respite care programs, supervised apartments, foster care homes, special education day schools, and vocational and pre-vocational training. These programs and services positively impact the lives of thousands of individuals, and their families, each year." Source:

http://newjerseyhills.com/morris_news_bee/news/morristown-group-home-complaints-bring-action/article_84aa6d5d-430b-596b-903c-c24bd83da380.html

Proposal for Intercept youth treatment facility in Roanoke County is withdrawn Intercept Youth Services shifted gears amid neighborhood opposition and an unfavorable planning panel decision. Story Comments Image \(1\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Previous Next ERICA YOON | The Roanoke Times ey interceptyouth 110314 p02 Chairman Martha Hooker of the Roanoke County Planning Commission speaks during a public hearing with a proposal from Intercept Youth Services. A public comment period was also undertaken during the meeting on Nov. 3. Related Documents Withdrawal letter 111014 Posted: Wednesday, November 12, 2014 8:41 pm Proposal for Intercept youth treatment facility in Roanoke County is withdrawn By Carmen Forman carmen.forman@roanoke.com 981-3334 roanoke.com A company proposing a residential youth treatment facility in Roanoke County has withdrawn its rezoning application in the face of neighborhood opposition. Intercept Youth Services, in a letter dated Monday, withdrew its application to create a residential treatment facility for at-risk kids ages 5 to 17 on Airport Road. Intercept purchased the land and the 49,000-square-foot building for $1.8 million, but it needed a high-intensity commercial designation and a special-use permit from the county government before it could become a treatment center. The proposed facility would have been office space and a 16-bed center that could expand in the future, and would provide counseling and treatment services to socially or cognitively impaired youth who do not have drug or alcohol addictions or display violent behavior. When the application went before the county planning commission in a public hearing Nov. 3, the commission recommended denial to the board of supervisors. The application was scheduled to go to a public hearing before the supervisors next week. "If there is neighborhood opposition to what we're doing, we don't want to operate that way," Intercept CEO Mark Bogert said. "We want to be a part of the community in a productive way, whatever it takes to do that." At the planning commission meeting, about a dozen neighbors spoke about why they were opposed to having Intercept in the area. Ultimately, the commission unanimously voted to recommend denial of the application for land-use reasons instead. Rezoning the property would take away some of the county's small amount of industrial-zoned property, Director of Economic Development Jill Loope said at the planning commission meeting. Less than 2 percent of county property is industrially zoned, which means it can accommodate machinery and equipment that are taxable and bring in higher revenue, she said. "It's really common for companies to re-evaluate zoning positions," Loope said. "A lot of time on the front end, they picture a project looking a certain way. They often refine that." The property was zoned industrially in the 1980s when it was first occupied by Stone Printing. Advance Auto bought the building in 1995 and vacated it in 2009. When it was most recently on the market, there was not a lot of interest in the property, Loope said. The planning commission overwhelmingly agreed the property was too valuable in its current zoning designation to rezone. Intercept officials are going to rethink the project and possibly reapply at a later point if and when the community feels at ease about the facility, Bogert said. If Intercept officials still want to create a similar facility, they will have to wait a year from the day they withdrew their application to reapply for rezoning and any special-use permits, Deputy Director of Planning Philip Thompson said. "It doesn't happen a lot, but it does happen," Thompson said. "This was controversial, and I guess they thought it was in their best interest to withdraw rather than keep going in the process." Neighbors had concerns about Intercept from the beginning because the zoning application said the facility would be a halfway home. That inaccurate designation was the closest description the county had for the facility that would encompass the residential part of the treatment center. People showed confusion and fear of the proposed facility at a community meeting and at the planning commission meeting. Misinformation is something Bogert hopes to correct and in doing so, he hopes the community will warm to the facility. "We could have pursued passing it with the supervisors because I think the justification of what we request to do is absolutely valid," he said. "But, I thought it might be much better to spend some time in the community so they understood better what we are and what we're trying to do. We don't have to do this now." In the meantime, Intercept will use the current office space in the building and may rent out some of the space for storage, Bogert said. Source: http://www.roanoke.com/news/local/roanoke_county/proposal-for-intercept-youth-treatment-facility-in-roanoke-county-is/article_8f22c702-4ffc-54fe-8057-93e998397752.html

2 group home counselors indicted in abuse of disabled resident Published 5:43 pm, Thursday, November 13, 2014 1 of 2 Yosmarvi Tovar (New York State Justice Center) Yosmarvi Tovar (New York State Justice Center) Dominique Mortimore (New York State Justice Center) Dominique Mortimore (New York State Justice Center) Page 1 of 1 NISKAYUNA — Two counselors working for a group home operated by the Center for Disability Services are accused of abusing a man with developmental disabilities, according to the state Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs. While trying to compel the man to take his daily shower, Yosmarvi Tovar, 43, and Dominique Mortimore, 21, allegedly opened a window and let cold air into the room. When that failed to get him off the couch, the counselors tipped it forward and the man fell to the floor on his hands and knees, according to the Justice Center. The date of the incident could not be determined. Special Prosecutor Patricia E. Gunning said a Schenectady County grand jury handed up a two-count indictment against Tovar and Mortimore. They were arraigned on one felony and one misdemeanor charge of endangering the welfare of an incompetent or physically disabled person. Tovar and Mortimore, who were fired from their jobs, pleaded not guilty and were released under supervision, officials said. The case is being prosecuted by Justice Center Assistant Special Prosecutors Christina Calabrese and Renee Behrens. The Niskayuna facility is certified by the state Office for People With Developmental Disabilities. The incident came to the attention of law enforcement officials when it was reported to town police and the Justice Center's Vulnerable Persons Central Register hot line, which is 1-855-373-2122. The Justice Center has primary responsibility for tracking, investigating and prosecuting serious abuse and neglect complaints for facilities and provider agencies that are operated, certified or licensed by six state agencies — the Office of Mental Health, Office for People with Developmental Disabilities, Office of Children and Family Services, Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services — and for certain adult homes operated by the Department of Health and residential schools and programs certified or operated by the state Education Department. Source: <http://www.timesunion.com/local/article/2-group-home-counselors-indicted-in-abuse-of-5891398.php#photo-7139834>

Brooklyn man sentenced to 16 years for group home sex assaults By John Penney jpenney@norwichbulletin.com (860) 857-6965 The Bulletin By John Penney jpenney@norwichbulletin.com (860) 857-6965 Posted Nov. 14, 2014 @ 12:46 pm Updated Nov 14, 2014 at 10:20 PM Ellis K. Hagstrom File/ Connecticut Department of Correction By John Penney jpenney@norwichbulletin.com (860) 857-6965 Posted Nov. 14, 2014 @ 12:46 pm Updated Nov 14, 2014 at 10:20 PM Zoom Ellis K. Hagstrom File/ Connecticut Department of Correction » RELATED CONTENT • Chinese food delivery driver robbed and assaulted in New ... • Police: Willimantic man "naked from waist down" with juve... • Police charge R.I. man in pair of Davville bank robberies • Police: Heroin dealer kept drugs in cars • Police: Man stopped in Danielson had stun gun in car Local Social Network Tweets related to this article Local NewsNation & WorldBusinessLocal Life & EntertainmentEntertainmentLocal SportsSports D Kramer DesireeSeattle @Nero Milo have you ever been sexually harassed at work? Do you think that shirt might make women feel unsafe to be near this man at work? Nov 15 Wopjob wopjob @Warchant Another great win for police departments seeking to aggressively cover up sexual assault cases everywhere. 1/5 young women will be a victim of sexual assault while they are in college. Here are resources to prevent/respond Police searching for man who sexually assaulted woman on Biloxi Bay Bridge | Crime | The Sun Herald sunherald.com/2014/11/15/591... Nov 15 By John Penney jpenney@norwichbulletin.com (860) 857-6965 Posted Nov. 14, 2014 @ 12:46 pm Updated Nov 14, 2014 at 10:20 PM DANIELSON - A 60-year-old former Brooklyn man was sentenced on Friday to 16 years in prison for repeatedly sexually assaulting two mentally challenged women while working in a state-run group home in Killingly. Inside Danielson Superior Court, Ellis Hagstrom was sentenced to four years in prison for each of the four second-degree assault charges he pleaded guilty to last month. Hagstrom entered the plea under the Alford Doctrine, which means he disagrees with the prosecutors' version of events, but acknowledges there is enough evidence to convict him at trial. The individual sentences were ordered to be carried out consecutively and will be followed by 20 years of probation. Windham County State's Attorney Patricia Froehlich called Hagstrom's crimes "horrible, despicable, wicked, inhumane acts" that justified the previously agreed on sentence. "For what he did to these vulnerable women, he should serve every minute of those 16 years," she said. Police began investigating Hagstrom after workers at a state Department of Developmental Service group home noticed a bruise on the inner thigh of a patient Hagstrom was responsible for bathing and dressing. Hagstrom confessed to police he developed a "sexual attraction" to two patients under his care, both who have severe mental and physical challenges — one victim is legally blind and the other a quadriplegic. Police determined the assaults began in 2000 with one victim and again in 2003 with the second woman. Hagstrom has been incarcerated since his arrest in 2011. Froehlich said Hagstrom, who worked at the group home since 1987, had sex with the victims repeatedly, sometimes using a condom. The victims were not identified in court proceedings and case file is sealed. "These victims were so totally helpless and the defendant was supposedly there to help them," Froehlich said. "And he purposely created a situation in order not to be caught. His conduct invokes a strong feeling of disgust and physical feeling of nausea. This is one of the most horrific case of sex assault in the region." Martin Weiss, Hagstrom's lawyer, said his client had cooperated with police and investigators, offering a confession to police shortly after first being interviewed. "He was not trying to be duplicitous," Weiss said. He said a civil lawsuit had been filed against Hagstrom and the state by one victim's family. Hagstrom, wearing an orange jumpsuit and leaning on a walker, declined to address the court on Friday. Froehlich said the state's case was complicated by a lack of sufficient DNA evidence and the victims' inability to testify. In imposing the sentence, Judge Michael Riley also ordered Hagstrom to register as a sex offender for the rest of his life. "This case is well beyond most types of sexual assault cases this court sees," Riley said. Source: <http://www.norwichbulletin.com/article/20141114/NEWS/141119713/1994/NEWS>

Monticello group home counselor indicted on sex charges MONTICELLO – A Sullivan County grand jury handed up a 13-count indictment against a Monticello group home counselor for allegedly having a sexual relationship with a female resident in his care while employed by the Orange/Sullivan Division of Rehabilitation Support Services. The group home is licensed by the State Office of Mental Health. Michael Cubero, 36, of Monticello, was charged with two counts of felony rape; three counts of felony criminal sexual act; two felony counts of endangering the welfare of an incompetent or physically disabled person; as well as two counts each of sexual abuse and sexual misconduct, as misdemeanors. He pled not guilty to the charges and was sent to the Sullivan County Jail in lieu of $25,000 cash bail. He was fired from his job. The arrest was made following an investigation by the New York State Justice Center for the Protection of People with Special Needs with assistance from the Monticello and State Police. Source: http://www.midhudsonnews.com/News/2014/November/14/Cubero_indict-14Nov14.html

Scotts Valley home for developmentally disabled youth to close 1/4 Cole Lawson's family was given two weeks notice that the group home for young people with autism he is living in would be shuttered. (Shmuel Thaler -- Santa Cruz Sentinel) Cole Lawson works on a spelling exercise with his instructor Jessica Kuhn at the Bay School this week. (Shmuel Thaler -- Santa Cruz Sentinel) Cole Lawson, 16, who has autism, is among the young people who have lost their place to live in a Scotts Valley group home that is closing, leaving the parents to scramble to find housing amid a housing crisis for people with developmental disabilities. (Shmuel Thaler -- Santa Cruz Sentinel) See larger or additional photos here Care provider Kat Steffen guides Cole Lawson on a bike ride near the group home he has been living in on Lockwood Lane in Scotts Valley Tuesday. (Shmuel Thaler -- Santa Cruz Sentinel) By Samantha Clark, Santa Cruz Sentinel Posted: 11/12/14, 7:59 PM PST | Updated: 4 days ago # Comments Cole Lawson, 16, who has autism, is among the young people who have lost their place to live in a Scotts Valley group home that is closing, leaving the parents to scramble to find housing amid a housing crisis for people with developmental disabilities. (Shmuel Thaler -- Santa Cruz Sentinel) Lockwood House WHAT: A Scotts Valley Group home on Lockwood Lane for young people with developmental disabilities is closing Saturday after 20 years. WHY: NorCal Vocational Inc., the provider that managed the house, is shuttering business due to financial reasons. WHO: The house is home to five children and young adults. SCOTTS VALLEY >> Sixteen-year-old Cole Lawson was diagnosed with autism when he was 2. For the past year and a half, he has lived in the Lockwood House, a Scotts Valley group home for five children who are developmentally disabled. He shops for groceries, works out at the gym and attends the Bay School in Santa Cruz for young people with autism. His life now is a far cry better than before, when he lived with his family who feared his outbursts of aggressive behavior. "His mood is generally happy," said Christine Kiebert-Boss, Cole's mom and a single working mother who splits her time between the East and West coast working as a freelance home product designer. "But he has broken windshields and gone after me. He's just a wildcard. It just colors your whole life. If he falls apart, everything falls apart." Seventy percent of Californians with autism live with their families. But not living at home may be best, especially if they need around-the-clock care like Cole. "If you're an aging parent and your son or daughter is getting older, your ability to take care of them at the family home becomes more difficult," said Eileen Richey, director of the Association of Regional Center Agencies, which represents California's 21 nonprofit agencies funded by the state to provide housing, treatment and habilitation services to people with developmental disabilities. But with two weeks notice to families, Lockwood is closing Saturday after 20 years due to financial reasons. The provider managing the house, NorCal Vocational Inc., is shuttering all of its programs, which serve more than 150 people with developmental disabilities in the Bay Area. NorCal has not returned calls seeking comment. "The rug has been pulled out from under us, and we're really scrambling," Kiebert-Boss said. "I'm in such a panic during the weekdays on the phone, trying and trying to figure it out." Advertisement Her efforts and those of the state to find Cole a new home have been fruitless. Even if she finds a place by Saturday, the long process can take weeks, and Cole, like the other Lockwood residents, will move back with his family and a caregiver provided by the state. His mother often travels to New York City for work, which would leave Cole potentially alone with his 84-year-old grandmother, physically no match for the nearly 6-foot-tall teenager. "I'm scared to be alone with him. I really don't want him to be alone with my mom," Kiebert-Boss said. Cole cannot move back to chaotic New York City, where he grew up, and his mother does not want him to change schools. His father is out of the picture. "He's got to stay here because he's doing so well," she said. "Cole doesn't speak and is cognitively at the level of a 3-year-old. He can't be placed anywhere." Kiebert-Boss and other parents are rallying to keep the house open until all of Lockwood's five residents find new homes. But waiting lists at other facilities run long. Programs serving the developmentally disabled statewide are closing due to shrinking budgets amid exploding demand for lifelong care. Cole, who turns 17 next month, is part of the wave of children diagnosed with autism in the 1990s starting to move out of the school system into the adult system. The number of people with severe autism eligible for state services grew from 3,900 in 1982 to 72,000 in 2014. At the same time, the $5.2 billion budget for state developmental services has been cut more than $1 billion since 2009. "We are facing ever-increasing numbers of disabled, very dependent adults who cannot take care of themselves," said Jill Esher, president of Autism Society San Francisco Bay Area. "Hardly any new group homes are opening. Many that are opening are in the constant threat of closure due to lack of funding." NorCal was a contracted vendor with the San Andreas Regional Center, one of the 21 regional agencies that serves Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, Monterey and San Benito counties. "They didn't have the capital to run," said Javier Zaldivar, director of the center. "We are disappointed to lose another children's home in Lockwood." While five homes opened, 13 for adults and two for children locally have closed in the past two years because of funding. Zaldivar said service providers such as NorCal say rates the state pays for service have not kept up with inflation and California's high costs and new legislation are unfunded mandates from the state and federal government, creating the housing crisis for the developmentally disabled. Through the Lanterman Act, California guarantees care for people with developmental disabilities and must soon grapple with the impending public costs. Source: <http://www.santacruzsentinel.com/health/20141112/scotts-valley-home-for-developmentally-disabled-youth-to-close>

Kelli Yanuzzi: Fort Pierce foster-mother arrested for breaking foster child's leg - wptv.com Kelli Yanuzzi: Fort Pierce foster mother arrested for breaking foster child's leg Meghan McRoberts 6:20 PM, Nov 13, 2014 6:19 PM, Nov 13, 2014 Foster care mother arrested on child abuse WPTV FORT PIERCE, Fla. -- A Fort Pierce mother is facing an aggravated child abuse charge after her two-year-old foster daughter was rushed to the hospital with a broken femur. St. Lucie County deputies arrested 29-year-old Kelli Yanuzzi after they say she threw her foster daughter to the ground when she wouldn't take a nap. An arrest affidavit says Yanuzzi told deputies "If the victim had taken a nap like she was supposed to, none of this would have happened." A spokesperson for Devereux says Yanuzzi became a licensed foster parent this summer, and was also caring for the two-year-old's 9-month-old brother. Both children have been placed in a different home. Yanuzzi has posted a $20,000 bond and has been released from the St. Lucie County jail. This is the second case of foster care abuse on the Treasure Coast in less than two months. Port St. Lucie resident Michael Beer is currently in jail on no bond after being charged with killing his 2-year-old foster son, Trystan Adams. Police say the boy died from injuries inflicted by Beer. "It's hard to see who's going to be a good parent and who's not going to be a good parent," said Ken Frederick with New Horizon's on the Treasure Coast. Frederick has spent years working with children and families. "Sometimes foster parents have this impression that they're going to get this perfect child," Frederick said. Yanuzzi and Beer were both screened by DCF. "What stress may be on that foster parent now may not have been there when they were tested." Frederick is stressing the importance for foster parents to reach out for help when times get tough, rather than becoming physical with children. Frederick says many organizations, such as his, offer services and training to parents, both foster and biological. He also recommends calling 2-1-1. "A 2-year-old, if someone knows children, they know that's a difficult age. The terrible two's is a well known fact." Source: <http://www.wptv.com/news/region-st-lucie-county/fort-pierce/kelli-yanuzzi-fort-pierce-foster-mother-arrested-for-breaking-foster-childs-leg>

The Tulsa Test-defyers: We won't give tests that "rob children of their educational liberties." By I AM AN EDUCATOR on November 22, 2014 "It's about watching kids cry. And throw chairs. And pee their pants. And scratch their face until it turns red or they bleed. That's what it's about. That's all that it's about.” —Nikki Jones, on the impact of high-stakes tests on children and why she won’t administer them. Karen Hendren and Nikki Jones Karen Hendren and Nikki Jones teach first grade at Skelly Elementary School in Tulsa, Oklahoma—and they are refusing to trade in their job titles for “test prep tutor.” Declaring that they will refuse to administer a battery of tests (including the infamous MAP test, the same test I helped to organize a boycott against in Seattle), these educators have become the most recent test-defiers in a growing movement of conscientious objectors to standardized tests. The “testocracy” is determined to reduce the intellectual and emotional process of teaching and learning to a single score that they can use to deny students promotion, destabilize the teaching profession, label schools as failing, and turn them into privatized charter schools. Karen Hendren and Nikki Jones were quickly threatened with disciplinary measures by their Superintendent. If you have a message of solidarity for them, please send it to me and I will pass it on to them. The brave actions of Karen Hendren and Nikki Jones are sure to inspire other educators around the nation who believe that education has to be about more than eliminating wrong answer choices. The civil rights movement to reclaim and redefine education has only just begun. Below is the letter they sent home to families explaining why they refuse to administer these exams. — To the Families of the Children in our Classrooms, First of all, we want to thank you for the opportunity to work with your children. We understand that it is difficult to drop your most precious belongings off in the hands of someone else. We understand that you are trusting us to use the best practices in teaching in order to ensure the most success for your child. Our number one goal in teaching is to keep the best interest of your child at the heart of all we do. We hope our passion, education, and dedication is evident daily. Quickly, we want to take a moment and talk about ourselves. While we don’t want our bios to be the focus, we do want our parents and the community to have an understanding of our behind-the-scenes work and passion that we put into our jobs. We want you to know about our accomplishments, research, and experiences in order for you to have an understanding of our background and professionalism. My name is Karen Hendren and I am currently a 1st grade teacher at Skelly Elementary. I graduated from Oklahoma State University with a degree in Elementary Education. I have teaching experience at Educare, Sand Springs Early Childhood Center, and overseas at Feltwell Elementary in England on the military base. I was assigned the Lead teacher position for First Grade. The District has entrusted me to teach Professional Development over both Reading and Math. My evaluations have always shown me to be an effective teacher. My name is Nikki Jones and I am also a first grade teacher at Skelly Elementary. In addition to first grade, I have taught Pre-K and K for the district. I graduated from the University of Oklahoma with a degree in Early Childhood Education. Recently, I was recognized on the cover of NAEYC’s magazine, The Young Child, as the feature teacher. Last spring, I was utilized by TPS as a model for Early Childhood in an NPR story airing over Tulsa success in implementing Early Childhood Programs. Most recently, I received the national award for Outstanding Classroom Practitioner by the organization, NAECE, and Cengage Publishing. I serve as the State Rep for UOO as an advocate for children and their families in diminishing the High Stakes Testing monster. All of my evaluations have shown me to be an effective teacher. Both Karen and I continually pursue knowledge and understanding and have been trusted by the district to lead and represent multiple aspects of Early Childhood Education throughout our years of service. Unfortunately, in the recent years, the mandates have gradually squelched the creativity and learning from our classrooms. The problem is that we are having to spend WAY too much time on formal assessments. All of the testing is required and some of it is classified as High Stakes Testing (HST). A high-stakes test is any test used to make important decisions about students, educators, schools, or districts, most commonly for the purpose of accountability—i.e., the attempt by federal, state, or local government agencies and school administrators to ensure that students are enrolled in effective schools and being taught by effective teachers. In general, “high stakes” means that test scores are used to determine punishments (such as sanctions, penalties, funding reductions, negative publicity), accolades (awards, public celebration, positive publicity), advancement (grade promotion or graduation for students), or compensation (salary increases or bonuses for administrators and teachers). (Glossary of Education Reform, 2014) This year, in first grade, your child is being asked to participate in the following assessments: Literacy First Assessment: This takes anywhere from 40 minutes to over an hour per student to administer. This is a one-on-one assessment that is to be conducted quarterly or more for progress monitoring. “Where to Start Word List”: This assessment correlating to the F&P screening. The purpose of this screening is to level each child and ensure they are given reading instruction on their level. After going through the word lists, then the child is screened using a book on the assigned level. This assessment is done quarterly or as needed to progress monitor. It takes 20-30 minutes per child is also a one-on-one assessment. Eureka Math: Children are to be given a whole group, 60 minute math lesson that has an “exit ticket” assessment at the end of each lesson. Yes, they want first graders testing daily over the lessons. This exit ticket is not long, but it still takes time. It equilibrates to daily testing for 6 and 7 year old children. This math curriculum also had a mid-module assessment and end of unit assessment. iRead: iRead is a software program that the district requires children to be on for 20 minutes a day. It comes with an abundance of software issues and frustrations. The district has been working diligently on trying to get this programming to run successfully, but so far, to no avail. Part of this computer based program is a literacy screener. This screening takes place at the beginning of the year, and last 30-45 minutes per child. MAP: Map is a computer based test that was designed as a tool for progress monitoring students in both math and literacy. This is the High Stakes Test that the district also utilizes for our teacher evaluations. It is completely developmentally inappropriate and does not provide valid data in the early childhood domain. All of these tests, plus assessments that we utilize to document their understanding of certain content, are going on in your child’s first grade classroom. I believe you are getting the point... assessments, assessments, assessments! In our classrooms the children spend, on average, 1,510 minutes (25 hours) completing assessments. 720 minutes of those assessments are one-on-one. That means that we are tied up assessing students for at least 17, 280 minutes a school year. Your children are losing 288 hours of time with their teacher because of mandated testing. When you break down our days and count for specials, lunch, and recess, we end up with about 4 hours of instruction time. So, 288 instructional hours, or 72 days... yes, 72 days of our school year we, as teachers, are tied up assessing students with the mandated assessments. Why are our schools failing? Why are children not learning how to read? We think the numbers above answer those questions. We understand the need for assessments. We want to progress monitor our students in order to meet their differentiated teaching needs. We value data. However, we went to college for an understanding on how to do this. We both build in-depth, all-encompassing portfolios that are a TRUE picture of the growth of our students. These portfolios do not just show math and literacy, they also show growth in cognitive development, writing, understandings of every state standard, art, identity of self, science, social studies, social-emotional development, and more. We do these portfolios so that we can have an accurate measure of each child across every domain. We have authentic assessments, off-the-shelf scholarly assessments, summative assessments, and formative assessments; all of which are paired with some sort of work sample or media documentation. Believe us, we know where our students are. We want to share with you 4 experiences of children in our classroom during the implementation of MAP testing. The names and descriptions of these children have been changed to uphold their rights to privacy. They will all be referred to in the masculine form, but not necessarily male. The reference is strictly utilized for the flow of speech. Student 1: This is one of the sweetest students a teacher could ask for. This student is gentle, calm, and collected. This student is learning English, but does not yet have any academic English. The student sat in front of the computer screen and tried his very best. We watched his eyes well up with tears. We watched the student nervously pull at his hair. Eventually, the student scratched red marks down his face in distress over the test. He is the oldest of the siblings. He can cook, clean, and take care of a baby better than some adults. The student knows all of his alphabet and the letter sounds in English now. This student loves writing books and can dance like no other. He is now comfortable enough to get up in front of the class and perform a talent or recite a poem. This student scored in the 1% range. Student 2: This student has special needs and should be allowed accommodations. He looked around the room and noticed everyone clicking away even though he was still on question 6. He raised his hand and said “Why am I counting apples and he has math with lots of numbers?” He then stood up and threw his chair. I have NEVER seen this child upset to a point of acting out in this manner. This student likes Minecraft because he loves to build and is a problem solver. This student can tell you descriptive details about all characters in a story. His comprehension is far above grade level. If I give him a project over something of interest, he produces the work and utilizes problem solving skills across all content areas. He can fold paper into anything. This student scored in the 1% range. Student 3: This student struggles with confidence in himself and because of this, is a pleaser. This student is smart; but, the test is smarter. The test is designed to adjust with the learner to meet their zone of proximal development (ZPD). However, it increasingly gets harder and harder until eventually, the student cannot answer the questions. The test is designed to reach a failing point for each child. This particular student quickly noticed that each question he answered correctly generated a more challenging question. Once out of his ZPD, the student laid his/her head down in tears and clicked through the test randomly selecting an answer, then clicking the arrow to proceed. We are talking about a student that is funny and happy. He can tell us jokes all day long. He takes care of the classroom and is in tune with peoples feelings. This student knows when he is respected and when he is not. He loves having his own personal whiteboard. He writes on it almost all day long. In doing so, he recently took what we had taught him about numbers and addition and figured out multiplication all on his own. He constructed his own knowledge of numbers to go beyond the standards. He is wise beyond his years. I believe he scored in the 11% range. Student 4: This is a child that could be considered gifted and talented. He is reading above grade level. He does not care about a test on the computer screen. He is six years old.

Ask him about nocturnal animals. Ask him about the elements in the Earth. Ask him about outer space. Ask him about anything interesting to him. Do not grade him on one test. Do not track him on one test. He takes care of all the pets in our classroom. (Rat, birds, turtle, and fish) He researches their needs and meets them on a daily basis. He teaches other students about how to care for them. He can teach over us in the content of certain animals, no doubt. He scored in the teens percentile range. Over 85% of our students failed the MAP test. We had to meet with most of you to discuss your child's "at risk" path and the retention they will face in third grade if they do not begin to show higher test scores. Was that a constructive meeting? No. Here is why we feel that way. The data is not valid in an early childhood setting, especially with the demographics of our community school. The test is 55 questions long in both math and reading. Our state and district want your child to be able to sit through a 55 question test that is designed to be frustrating. They make no accommodations for language or IEP's. How can they say the data is valid when they are not even tested in the language they speak? How can they say the data is valid when they ignore what the research says about early childhood developmental capabilities? Is the data provided from MAP ever going to surpass the data that we collect, as the professionals, in our classrooms? Should we allow a child to scratch their face, throw a chair, pee their pants, lay their heads down in defeat... all over taking a test that is designed to make them fail? Nobody feels successful after taking this test because of the nature of it. Should the results of that test be an evaluating measure for how effective we are as teachers? Then, there are the student surveys we recently were told to administer. We switched classrooms with each other and spent 2 and 1/2 hours proctoring student surveys. That looks like reading every single question aloud to every single student and instructing them on to complete a bubble sheet. There are SEVERAL questions that are unreasonable and irrational. One of the student survey questions that really got to me was "are you sleepy at school". Yes, some of our students have erratic home lives. It's not your fault, as parents. We are all doing the best we can do. But, life happens and sometimes children come to school after a rough night and are sleepy. The children have no time for daily naps or opportunities to rest and their bodies are growing and tired. So, what are the supposed implications of this question about being tired? Then, the surveys have an entire back page that appears to be for data collection purposes only and violates the privacy of your family. Parents, you deserve a say in whether or not your children take the surveys. Well, its actually your right as a parent under HB 1384 and COPPA. The surveys are disrespectful to the student- teacher relationship. We don't want our students to question our relationship or dedication to them. Putting them on the grading side does just that. It trivializes our interactions into three narrow categories: yes, no, and sometimes. How did that child feel right then in the moment? That's what those are taking a gauge of. A "precise estimate" in the words of MAP testing. Well, a precise estimate doesn't carry much clout with us. We know extensively what happens in our rooms, and we trust our administrators (the ones who hired us) to do the job they are trained to do and tell us if we are doing well or not. Why doesn't the system trust the administrators? Why are we doing Student Surveys in 1st grade? Why do we feel these surveys are valid and not a complete waste of time with negative implications on the teacher-child relationship? Why are parents not informed of the private questions their child will be asked to answer? We have so many unanswered questions about WHY we are forced to utilize MAP and Student Surveys. Last week, in search of some clarification, we submitted a letter to Dr. Ballard. He never responded personally; but, we do appreciate that he sent someone to meet with us about our concerns. However, the resolution was that we really work together to study MAP deeper. The suggestion was that we teach the test to the students. The advice was that in order to make the test less stressful for the students, we should run them through practice tests and mini computer based MAP lessons that will aid them in being more successful in taking the MAP. We are not sure how in doing so we would have a true picture of the students growth. But, moving on, basically, the districts answer was to take away more high-level learning experience and replace us, the professionals, with a computer program. The district did not address our concerns with the surveys at all. So, families, here we are. We want you to know that we whole-heartedly love your children. We value and respect them. Your children are more than a number to us. They deserve more time in a rich learning environment, interacting with others, and growing deeper across academic and developmental domains. They do not deserve to be plugged into computers like robots. We, in keeping with best practices, are unable to administer the MAP and student surveys to your children. They simply deserve a better educational experience than what either of those elements bring to the table. We informed the district of our decision last week. However, we felt like you had the right to know as well. Education is about finding the deeper meaning. Education is about acting upon curiosity and utilizing creative attributes to figure something out. Education is about highlighting multiple intelligences and valuing uniqueness. Education is not squelching. Education is not standardization. We realize that we are just two teachers in a sea of many. In being conscientious objectors to these two items, we realize we are a number, just like the students in our classroom where the SDE is concerned. We realize that we are jeopardizing our jobs. But, if keeping our jobs means harming children and squelching them during a prime developmental span, then we want no part. When we walked across the stage and accepted our diplomas, when we received certifications from the state to teach, when we signed contracts with TPS, when we represented the model for early childhood education for the nation, when we accepted awards and recognition, we simultaneously accepted responsibility to uphold ethical practices and do what is in the best interest of children. The SDE has robbed us of our ethics. They are robbing children of their educational liberties. Thank you for the opportunity to work with your children. Thank you for trusting us and valuing us as professionals. This is about what is in the best interest of the child. When education steps away from the child, all purpose is lost. It saddens us to put these experiences into words. It is with a heavy heart that we address our families in this way. However, we are hopeful that the district will understand the concerns and look at the research on standardized, high stakes testing in early childhood. We are hopeful that the district will stand with us in doing what is best for your children. Sincerely, Miss Karen Hendren Mrs. Nikki Jones Source: <http://iameducator.com/2014/11/22/the-tulsa-test-defyers-we-wont-give-tests-that-rob-children-of-their-educational-liberties/>

Children Strip-Searched At New Philadelphia Family Courthouse November 21, 2014 4:05 PM Share on email 43 View Comments (Artist's rendering of the new Philadelphia Family Court building, at 15th and Arch Streets. Image provided) Related Tags: Cherri Gregg, Jodge Kevin Dougherty, KYW Newsradio 1060, Philadelphia Family Court, Strip Searches Cherri Gregg Cherri Gregg is the community affairs reporter for KYW Newsr... Read More By Cherri Gregg PHILADELPHIA (CBS) — Multiple sources involved in cases in Philadelphia Family Court say sheriff's deputies improperly strip-searched juveniles in both criminal and DHS custody cases who were appearing at the court for hearings earlier this week. And once court administrators discovered what was going on, they put a stop to it. According to multiple sources, juveniles in county custody for both criminal and non-criminal matters who were making courtroom appearances at the new Family Courthouse, at 15th and Arch Streets, were first strip-searched by sheriff's deputies as a security measure all day Monday of this week and possible part of Tuesday. These sources say the searches occurred individually and in small groups, and that the juveniles were asked to remove all their clothes, to squat, and to cough. Multiple sources tell KYW Newsradio that the juveniles complained about the practice and, when court administration learned what was going on, administrative judge Kevin Dougherty put a stop to it. The new courthouse officially opened on Monday. A spokesman for Philadelphia Family Court issued a statement today that said, "On Tuesday morning of this week, in response to concerns raised by child advocates over allegations of strip searches of juveniles, the leadership of Philadelphia Family Court directed the Sheriff's Office to cease and desist all strip searches pending further notice. Today, Family Court issued new rules governing the screening and detention of juveniles that the Court developed in collaboration with the Sheriff's Office." Our sources were unable to say how many juveniles were searched and/or whether any practice of this sort was in place at the old courthouse. But they did tell us that not all of the young people searched were in custody on a criminal matter — some were in group homes and others in dependency care because their parents were in custody. The sources said the main concern of adults who complained about the procedures was ongoing traumatization of the children, since some of these juveniles may have already been victims of physical, sexual, or other abuse. Source: <http://philadelphia.cbslocal.com/2014/11/21/sources-children-strip-searched-at-new-philadelphia-courthouse/>

At least 4,000 aboriginal children died in residential schools, commission finds Truth and Reconciliation Commission officials expect toll to rise as more records reviewed Kimberly Murray, executive director of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission on Parliament Hill. The commission has confirmed the deaths of at least 4,000 aboriginal children died in residential schools. Photo: Dave Chan/Postmedia News Mark Kennedy Published: January 3, 2014, 12:00 pm Updated: 11 months ago A A A A A OTTAWA — Thousands of Canada's aboriginal children died in residential schools that failed to keep them safe from fires, protected from abusers, and healthy from deadly disease, a commission into the saga has found. So far, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission has determined that more than 4,000 of the school children died. But that figure is based on partial federal government records, and commission officials expect the number to rise as its researchers get their hands in future months on much more complete files from Library and Archives Canada and elsewhere. The disturbing discovery has cast a new light on the century-long school system that scarred the country's First Nations peoples. Residential school students at Fort George cemetery, November 3, 1946. HANDOUT/Truth and Reconciliation Commission Evidence has been compiled that shows residential school children faced a grave risk of death. "Aboriginal kids' lives just didn't seem as worthy as non-aboriginal kids," Kimberly Murray, executive director of the commission, said in an interview. "The death rate was much higher than non-indigenous kids." The commission has spent the last several years studying a scandal considered by many to be Canada's greatest historical shame. Over many decades — from the 1870s to 1996 — 150,000 aboriginal children were taken from their families and sent by the federal government to church-run schools, where many faced physical and sexual abuse. A lawsuit against the federal government and churches resulted in a settlement that included payments to those affected and the creation in 2008 of the commission. Its job is to hold public hearings so people can tell their stories, collect records and establish a national research centre. Students pose for photo outside Metlakatla Indian Residential School in Metlakatla, B.C. Commission. HANDOUT/Truth and Reconciliation The commission has also established "The Missing Children Project" to assemble the names of children who died, how they died, and where they were buried. The list of names will be contained in a registry available to the public. Murray said the exact number of deceased children will never be known, but she hopes more information will come from churches and provincial files. "I think we're just scratching the surface." Many perished in fires — despite repeated warnings in audits that called for fire escapes and sprinklers but were ignored. "There was report after report talking about how these schools were firetraps," said Murray. She said it was well known that schools were "locking kids in their dormitories because they didn't want them to escape. And if a fire were to break out they couldn't get out." Many schools refused to spend money on fire escapes. Instead, they built poles outside of windows for children to slide down. But the windows were locked, and children were unable to reach the poles. "It's amazing that they didn't make those corrections in those schools. There are just so many deaths that I think could have been prevented if they had done what they were supposed to do." Some children died as runaways and were found frozen to death in snowy fields; others who tried to escape their abusers drowned in nearby rivers. Among the most famous incidents involved the deaths of four boys — Allen Willie, Andrew Paul, Maurice Justin, and Johnny Michael — who fled the Lejac residential school in British Columbia on New Year's Day, 1937. It was 30 degrees below zero. They were found frozen to death on a lake. An inquiry at the time found one boy, wearing summer clothes, had "no hat and one rubber missing and his foot bare." Murray said these types of deaths were far from rare. "There were quite a few examples of children who ran away and died." Many died from tuberculosis because they were malnourished and were housed in poorly-ventilated buildings. Some died of suicide, unable to bear the brutality of the schools. The commission has even heard allegations — unproven by the commission — of manslaughter and murder. "There are people who have been speaking out who say they've seen a child who was beat so brutally that they died. So there is that unanswered question: Whether the abuse was to the extreme that they were coming to their deaths at the hands of their abusers." "We have not found any records of confirmed manslaughter or murder but we have had people speak to that. Whether you are going to find that in a document is questionable." Residential school students at confirmation class at St. John's Indian Residential School in Wabasca, Alta. HANDOUT/Truth and Reconciliation Commission What happened to the thousands of children who died? Schools and the government would not pay to have bodies shipped back to their families. And so they were placed in coffins and buried near the schools — some in marked graves, some in unmarked graves. Often, their parents in far-away reserves were never told what happened. Murray said that although many of the deaths occurred up until the 1950s, children were continuing to lose their lives in more recent years. "I think people can make it OK in their minds when they tell themselves it happened a really long time ago. I think it makes it easier for them to accept. But that's not the reality." When the commission releases its report — likely by June 2015 — the massive document will chronicle the saga of deceased children. Murray said the saga has left an "open wound" with First Nations communities. "We hear from survivors and family members how important it is that they know what happened to their loved ones and to know where their remains are located." On Friday afternoon, a spokesperson for the federal government issued a written statement through email pertaining to the issue. Andrea Richer, director of communications to Aboriginal Affairs Minister Bernard Valcourt, made reference to Prime Minister Stephen Harper's 2008 apology in the House of Commons on residential schools. She wrote that this apology "recognized that the Indian Residential Schools policy is a dark chapter in Canada's history." "These are abhorrent examples of the dark pages in that dark chapter, and that is why we must continue the important work of reconciliation," wrote Richer. mkenedy@postmedia.com Twitter.com/Mark_Kennedy Read more Articles from Mark Kennedy Source: <http://o.canada.com/news/national/at-least-4000-aboriginal-children-died-in-residential-schools-commission-finds>

Foster care in need of better inter-agency communication Brian Rash Posted: 11/14/2014 09:00:00 PM CST Editor's note: The following is part two of a multi-part series examining the state of foster care in Young County through several different perspectives. Graham resident Erin Harvey said recently that, at least as the system functions now, she's done fostering children. She would love to do it again, but after a heartbreaking experience in 2010 fostering a teenage girl that she hoped to make a permanent member of her family, she's lost faith in any kind of support offered through agencies charged with placing foster children in homes and assisting foster families. It hurts her even more, she said, because her own mother grew up in a foster system, a piece of her family history she said currently informs her desire to help children in need of homes. When Harvey began fostering kids, she had to go to Wichita Falls to be trained in procedures such as CPR and other mandatory health certifications. This was in 2002, when she fostered 10-year-old Joey Davis, who eventually became her adopted son. Now, she said, there are still no training programs in Graham for those wanting to foster children. Adding to the difficulties, Harvey said that when she reapplied to foster children in 2010, all of her files were lost. "The second time around, I had to get re-certified," she said. "They (CPS) lost all of my files, so all of my criminal history checks, everything, it all had to be completely redone, which took three times longer than the first time. So, I had a foster child in my home with no financial aid for eight months because they couldn't find any of my files." According to many who count foster care as at least some aspect of their profession, Harvey's represents a growing complaint among foster parents. Administrators at Virginia's House in Graham, for example, say that foster care in Young County is in dire need of foster homes. Virginia's House CASA Coordinator Heather Graham pointed out that a looming communication barrier exists between agencies that work to advocate for and place foster children, as well as those agencies and the foster parents. It's a problem, local experts say, that contributes to an overarching problem of foster parent retention. Read the entire story in this weekend's Graham Leader. Source: http://www.grahamleader.com/ci_26939020/foster-care-need-better-inter-agency-communication

Clark County may settle child welfare lawsuit for $2 million Clark County may settle child welfare lawsuit for $2 million (Thinkstock) image By YESENIA AMARO LAS VEGAS REVIEW-JOURNAL Seven former foster children alleging abuse and neglect in the child welfare system may soon receive a settlement in excess of $2 million from Clark County. Clark County has spent $1.4 million on attorney fees, which covered outside counsel, and other costs in defending the case, according to Clark County spokesman Erik Pappa. The $2.075 million settlement will go before the Clark County Commission for approval during its Tuesday meeting. "These children and youth, who are subject of the settlement, were injured physically and mentally," Bill Grimm, the attorney representing the children, said Friday. "Every single one of them went down this long road because they entered (the lawsuit) to improve the system for the children that came after them. They certainly remain hopeful that they will send a message to the system." The federal civil rights lawsuit aimed at improving Clark County's child welfare system had dragged on since 2010. Grimm is a senior attorney at the Oakland, Calif.-based National Center for Youth Law, which filed the lawsuit. The lawsuit alleged the county's child welfare agency failed to provide adequate care and safety for its foster children. A federal judge threw out the case a few months after it was filed, saying it failed to show why county and state officials should be held liable for the problems, which included over-medication of children with psychiatric issues and physical abuse while in foster care. In 2012, a federal appeals court reinstated the suit. Thirteen children were originally part of the lawsuit, which has undergone several changes and no longer names the state as a defendant. Six plaintiffs were dropped and the remaining seven plaintiffs range in age from 5 to 20. Four of them are under 18, Grimm said. Of the settlement, $1.6 million will directly benefit the seven former foster children, while $500,000 will cover attorney's fees and costs for plaintiffs' counsel, according to the agenda item. "It's a very positive outcome for our clients and we think it will make a meaningful difference in their lives," Grimm said, adding that the former foster children will have resources many of them never thought they would have available to help them recover. Some of the claims date back 20 years, which includes 10 years when the state of Nevada was responsible for providing foster care, according to a summary of the settlement from Clark County officials. The county has made policy and procedure changes to address deficiencies in the system as transferred to the county from the state in 2004. Some of the seven foster children were on multiple psychotropic drugs and some of the younger children were abused in their foster homes, Grimm said. When the lawsuit started, it sought injunctive relief that would make system changes to benefit all foster children. Grimm said he hopes county officials have learned from this case and added that the National Center for Youth Law will keep a close eye on what comes out of the recently formed blue ribbon committee to examine problems in the county's child welfare system and courts. Nevada Supreme Court Justice Nancy Saitta appointed the committee. "We'll be watching closely ... with the hope that it will provoke further changes in the system," he said. Contact Yesenia Amaro at yamara@reviewjournal.com or 702-383-0440. Find her on Twitter: @YeseniaAmaro. Source: <http://www.reviewjournal.com/news/las-vegas/clark-county-may-settle-child-welfare-lawsuit-2-million>

Group home counselor charged with rape of resident By Heather Yakin Times Herald-Record recordonline.com By Heather Yakin Times Herald-Record Posted Nov. 14, 2014 @ 8:28 pm Cubero By Heather Yakin Times Herald-Record Posted Nov. 14, 2014 @ 8:28 pm Zoom Cubero » Social News By Heather Yakin Times Herald-Record Posted Nov. 14, 2014 @ 8:28 pm MONTICELLO – A Sullivan County grand jury has handed up an indictment on rape charges and other felony sexual offenses against man who worked as a counselor at a group home in Monticello. According to the New York State Justice Center, which oversees facilities and programs that care for people with special needs, Michael Cubero, 37, of Monticello subjected a woman resident in a group home licensed by the Office of Mental Health to a sexual relationship. Cubero was indicted Thursday on two counts of third-degree rape, three counts of third-degree criminal sexual act and two counts of first-degree endangering the welfare of an incompetent or disabled person, felonies; and misdemeanor counts of sexual abuse and sexual misconduct. Cubero, who worked as a counselor for the Orange/Sullivan Division of Rehabilitation and Support Services, has been fired. The abuse was reported via the Justice Center's hotline. The Justice Center, along with Monticello police and New York State Police, investigated the case. The Justice Center said investigators discovered Cubero engaged the woman in an ongoing relationship from June to December 2013. Cubero was arraigned in Sullivan County Court, where he pleaded innocent. He is being held at Sullivan County Jail in lieu of $25,000 bail pending further court action. Justice Center spokeswoman Diane Ward said the Justice Center took on the prosecution because the agency got the initial report and its staff members are specially trained to deal with vulnerable people. The Justice Center oversees certain facilities and programs run, licensed or certified by the Office of Mental Health, the Office for People with Developmental Disabilities, the Department of Health, the Office of Children and Family Services, the Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services and the State Education Department. The Justice Center's toll-free 24-hour, seven-day-a-week hotline for reports of abuse or neglect of people with special needs is 1-855-373-2122. hvakin.com/th-record.com Source: <http://www.recordonline.com/article/20141114/NEWS/141119581/101019>

Adult home caregiver arrested for rape of 83-year-old resident BY Tim Haack on November 14, 2014 @ 11:29 am (Updated: 12:54 pm - 11/14/14) inShare0 Family members were concerned about the possible abuse of their 83-year-old relative at an Auburn group home. They called police after reviewing images on a surveillance camera they set up in her room. "They were actually able to capture sexual abuse of their family member on camera," said police commander Mark Caillier. Police arrested a 67-year-old caregiver at Auburn Adult Care Thursday. He's jailed on suspicion of second degree rape. Caillier said the elderly woman suffers from dementia or a similar problem. With nobody left to run the business, the woman and eleven other residents were moved out of two adjacent buildings Thursday night. It's not known if other residents were abused. "You can't overburden one hospital with 11 new patients and so we arranged for their care at several different facilities in the area," said Caillier. The state Department of Social and Health Services, which is responsible for licensing and regulation of group homes, is investigating. Source: <http://mynorthwest.com/11/2643869/Adult-home-caregiver-arrested-for-rape-of-83-yearold-resident>

Complaint filed against LMPD officers involved in troubled boy's - wave3.com-Louisville News, Weather & Sports Complaint filed against LMPD officers involved in troubled boy's summer camp Posted: Nov 14, 2014 1:26 PM PST Updated: Nov 14, 2014 2:09 PM PST By Katie Bauer BioEmail Connect Biography kbauer@wave3.com LOUISVILLE, KY (WAVE) – A few months after two employees of a summer program for troubled young men blow the whistle on alleged abuse, a new complaint against Louisville Metro Police Department was filed by a teenager and his mother. According to LMPD the mission of the Gentleman's Academy is assisting young men to be more responsible by teaching skills that will empower them, but the complaint states the program wasn't as advertised. "Somebody needs to comment on this, somebody needs to be held accountable for it and if the only way we could do it is take them to court than that's what we are here to do," said Thomas Clay, attorney. [\[VIEW: Complaint filed against Gentleman's Academy\]](#) In a more than 10 page complaint, Clay filed suit against Louisville Metro Police Deputy Chief Yvette Gentry and two other officers on behalf of a 14 year old boy, his mother, and her friend. The teen was enrolled in the summer of 2014 Gentleman's Academy. The program is sponsored by LMPD and U of L. Clay says that six week program has affected him to this day. "He is scared to death to the point where he is sleeping under his bed and in his closet and one of these officers is assigned to the school where he is enrolled currently and he is terrified of him," said Clay. [\[PREVIOUS STORY: Gentleman's Academy employees suing over alleged abuse\]](#) The complaint alleges Officer Clayton Reeves grabbed the teen by the neck and woke him at 3 in the morning to do pushups for hours and refused the boy water. Officer Johnathan Harden is also named in the complaint. "They were exercised to an extent that I think was highly inappropriate and there was never supposed to be any kind of boot camp atmosphere in this academy," said Clay. Erica Buckner and Alexis Keen worked at the Gentleman's Academy while they were students at UofL. They said they were punished after they tried to expose the alleged abuse earlier this year in a separate lawsuit against LMPD and UofL. "This is about power and control and feeding that and having that power and control over someone who is weaker than you and doesn't have a voice," said Buckner. LMPD says they are unable to comment due to pending litigation. Child Protective Services was called in to investigate, but at this time their findings are still unclear. Copyright 2014 WAVE 3 News. All rights reserved. Source: <http://www.wave3.com/story/27389104/complaint-filed-against-lmpd-officers-involved-in-troubled-boys-summer-camp>

DHS on notice to make good-faith improvements in foster care Story Comments \(3\) Print Create a hardcopy of this page Font Size: Default font size Larger font size Related Documents Pinnacle Plan report The Oklahoma Department of Human Services has not made a "good faith effort" at attracting new foster homes, bringing down caseloads for workers, reducing shelter use for children older than 6 and finding permanent homes for foster children, according to a report issued Oct. 15 by an independent oversight panel. Posted: Tuesday, November 18, 2014 12:00 am DHS on notice to make good-faith improvements in foster care By GINNIE GRAHAM News Columnist TulsaWorld.com | 3 comments The monitors overseeing the state's agreed-upon improvement plan for the care of foster children have issued a written warning to the Oklahoma Department of Human Service to start meeting its goals. A three-person panel released a remedial order taking DHS to task for not making good-faith efforts in several areas of the Pinnacle Plan, which is the settlement agreement in a federal class-action lawsuit alleging abuses in foster care. The order focuses on attracting new foster homes, lowering worker caseloads and reducing the backlog of investigations. Of those, the caseload goals received the most detailed directions. This includes the production of a weekly report containing data such as caseloads for every worker and vacancies available. The monitors — Kevin Ryan, Kathleen Noonan and Eileen Crummy, all of whom live out-of-state — were appointed by agreement of both sides and are considered experts in the field. The panel releases opinions periodically about how DHS is progressing in the improvements of 15 areas of the plan. This includes target dates for benchmarks toward the overall goal. It is a five-year plan. The monitors, also called co-neutrals, have released three commentaries — in October 2013, April 2014 and October 2014. The last report used strong language stating DHS "must confront immediately" five areas where it was not making "good faith" effort. The agreement gives the monitors the legal power to issue these types of orders. If DHS does not comply, the monitors can return the case to federal court for sanctions, which could range from fines to individual contempt of court findings. "It is unfortunate that even after being sued and entering into a court order to address the problems that led to the lawsuit, Oklahoma continues to fail its most vulnerable children," stated Tulsa attorney Fred Dorwart, co-counsel for the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. "Fortunately, the settlement of the lawsuit gives the co-neutral experts the authority to hold the state accountable, to direct further specific action, and to obtain further court orders against the state which the plaintiffs can then enforce." The three-page order instructs DHS Director Ed Lake to appoint a person by Nov. 30 to be a liaison between the agency and the monitors in each of the three areas of concern. It asks for remediation plans to bolster what is being done to meet the goals. The Pinnacle Plan started implementation in 2012 after the New York-based nonprofit Children's Rights filed a federal lawsuit in 2008. The plan is an ambitious, long-term strategy for protecting children taken into custody due to abuse and neglect. After the plan started being put into place, director Howard Hendrick resigned. Then voters abolished the state oversight commission in favor of a governor-appointed director. The child-welfare section of DHS underwent a transformation of structure and staff. In the middle of the changes, a sharp increase in foster care placements began. About 8,500 children were in foster care when the Pinnacle Plan was written. That number has now reached more than 11,500. A written statement provided by DHS spokeswoman Sheree Powell said: "DHS recognizes the importance of the objectives addressed in the remedial order and will work to implement these specific processes which we also believe will be helpful to our efforts. For almost two and a half years DHS has been working diligently to achieve progress with its Pinnacle Plan. "The agency welcomes the experience and input of the co-neutrals and appreciates their guidance to help DHS progress in its efforts to recruit foster homes and reduce worker caseloads." Ginie Graham 918-581-8376 ginnie.graham@tulsaworld.com Source: http://www.tulsaworld.com/news/state/dhs-on-notice-to-make-good-faith-improvements-in-foster/article_36d28c5a-40b8-592e-baa4-b65d70c6fa34.html

Oklahoma DHS must make overhauls, improvements, say monitors of foster care safety plan THE ASSOCIATED PRESS First Posted: November 17, 2014 - 4:14 pm Last Updated: November 17, 2014 - 4:16 pm AAA We also have more stories about: (click the phrases to see a list) Subjects: Legal

proceedings (3263) Law and order (4733) Places: Oklahoma (553) TULSA, Oklahoma — The Oklahoma Department of Human Services must review plans to develop new foster homes, prepare weekly caseload reports and develop a remediation plan to reduce a Child Protective Services backlog, a new report released Monday states. Those are among the improvements ordered by neutral monitors charged with supervising Oklahoma's settlement of a class-action lawsuit. The lawsuit alleged DHS victimized foster children by failing to find safe homes for them and inadequately monitored their safety because employees were overworked and poorly managed. The so-called Pinnacle Plan is Oklahoma's $153 million blueprint for remaking the system over the next five years. The requirements, listed on a report dated Friday, come after a progress report issued last month by the monitors found that the department's shortcomings included more than 1,000 child abuse and neglect investigations that were overdue, among other alleged faults. "It is unfortunate that even after being sued and entering into a court order to address the problems that led to the lawsuit, Oklahoma continues to fail its most vulnerable children," Marcia Robinson Lowry, an attorney for the plaintiffs and the director of a national children's advocacy organization, A Better Childhood, said in a statement. "Fortunately, the settlement of the lawsuit gives the co-neutral experts the authority to hold the state accountable, to direct further specific action and to obtain further court orders against the state which the plaintiffs can then enforce." A spokeswoman for the agency says the objectives in the order will be addressed. "DHS recognizes the importance of the objectives addressed in the remedial order and will work to implement these specific processes which we also believe will be helpful to our efforts," agency spokeswoman Sheree Powell said in a statement Monday. "For almost two and a half years, DHS has been working diligently to achieve progress with its Pinnacle Plan. "The agency welcomes the experience and input of the (monitors) and appreciates their guidance to help DHS progress in its efforts to recruit foster homes and reduce worker caseloads," she said. Source: <http://www.dailyjournal.net/view/story/e0ac59554eeb4137ab4e45d96880ae29/OK--Oklahoma-DHS-Settlement/>

Judge gives state final order to complete Braam reforms Superior Court Judge Charles Snyder told DSHS last week that the agency has to actually complete all 21 required foster care reforms before claiming compliance. Print Email Whatcom County Superior Court Judge Charles Snyder tells state to finish foster care reforms. Credit: voting forjudges.org Related Stories Mon, Jul 21, 4:31 p.m. Judge wants court to keep supervising state on Braam foster care reforms. The court will monitor foster care reform until the state meets all the requirements from the '98 Braam v. Washington suit. Tue, Jul 16, 10:07 a.m. Protecting kids through transparency How are Washington State's foster kids doing? Thanks to the 10-year-old Braam class-action settlement, we can all find out. To follow our at-risk youth series, visit the Kids at Risk page. By John Stang Close isn't good enough. That was the message from Whatcom County Superior Court Judge Charles Snyder last week, when he signed a final order giving the state 12-14 months to finish its work on foster care reforms. Judge Snyder's Nov. 7 order ruled that Washington State's Department of Social and Health Services (DSHS) cannot claim that nine of its 21 required foster care reforms are legally completed just because it has come close to complying. This written order echoes Judge Snyder's verbal ruling on July 20 of this year. Judge Snyder's decision is the latest action in the 1998 Braam v. Washington lawsuit, which accused DSHS of failing to meet its constitutional duties to provide proper foster care. Jessica Braam, one of the 13 plaintiffs, and the impetus for the original suit, had lived in 15 foster different homes between the ages of 2 and 12. (Plaintiffs in the Braam case are represented by the National Center for Youth Law and Columbia Legal Services.) As part of the 2004 settlement, both sides agreed to set up a panel of child welfare experts, which would oversee reform of the state's foster care operations. The panel supervises efforts by DSHS to implement 21 improvements. In a Sept. 30, 2013 report, DSHS claimed that 13 of the 21 are in place and that at least four more of the required improvements are within 15 percent of completion. Plaintiffs argue that the agency has not met nine of the Braam requirements, and that coming close to a target is not the same as hitting it. The dispute involves caseload sizes, the frequency of state visits to foster children, training upgrades and a reduction in the number of children who run away from foster homes and how long they remain missing. Columbia Legal Services estimates that the Braam ruling affects some 10,000 children and that the state is obligated to implement all aspects of its mandated reforms. "The Court's order affirms that the clear promises made to foster children to improve care must be kept," said Columbia Legal Services attorney Mary Van Cleve in a press release. "While the State has made some significant improvements under this case, key areas still need fixing. As a result of the court's order, the State should redouble its efforts." According to the Columbia Legal Services press release, the state recently announced that it will need an additional $10.1 million over the next two years in order to fully comply with the Braam reforms. DSHS plans to ask lawmakers for that funding in the 2015 legislative session. "The Department has achieved 13 of the 21 outcomes in the Braam revised settlement and exit agreement," said DSHS spokeswoman Mindy Chambers, including reducing the number of placements for foster children and keeping siblings together when possible. "We remain committed to achieving the remaining eight [improvements] enforced by the Court and to continuing our good performance in the ones we already have met." Chambers also notes that the Department "has been able to make these improvements to the state's foster care system despite substantial budget cuts over the years." DSHS won't be the only state agency asking for more funding in 2015. Braam reforms will join public education, transportation and a host of other pressing — and in cases such as Braam, court-mandated — demands awaiting state lawmakers when the legislature reconvenes in January. Source: <http://crosscut.com/2014/11/17/Kidsatrisk/122821/judge-final-order-braam-reforms-john-stang/>

Group Home Closed: Residents Sexually Abused, Medications Missed Posted 10:39 pm, November 17, 2014, by Sonya Heitschusen. Updated at 06:01am, November 18, 2014 URBANDALE, Iowa — Sixteen-year-old Joe Buerckley didn't get a good start. His adoptive mother says his biological parents abused and neglected him, which left Joe with a brain injury and psychiatric problems. "He has an IQ of 63. He has reactive attachment disorder. He has borderline autism," says his mother, Suzie Buerckley. Buerckley and her husband began fostering Joe when he was four and adopted him two years later. They tried to care for him in their home, but three years ago they decided a group home, located at 3505 Hillsdale in Urbandale, would better serve his needs and help him live more independently. "Joe needs to know that at 8:10 every morning he brushes his teeth, at 8:20 he's going to have breakfast and now that he's in school, that at 8:30, the bus is going to come," said Buerckley. At school, Joe enjoys working with his rabbit. Cleaning out its cage is one of his chores. It gives him purpose and is part of his highly structured day. Suzie has never worried about Joe at school. In fact, she says the teachers and counselors at Urbandale High School were the first to alert her to potential problems at the group home Joe shared with two other young men. Suzie Buerckley recalls the time Joe came to school and said he didn't feel right. He told the teacher "they made me take a pill that wasn't mine." That pill turned out to be lithium, which isn't prescribed to Joe. "It was for another child that lived in that group home," said Buerckley. That was in January. Three months later, teachers told Buerckley her son was being placed in "time out" more frequently. His behavior was so erratic, counselors weren't sure he'd be able to remain in school. Buerckley soon realized why. "Twenty-six or 27 days out of April they mis-medicated my son. It was a schedule two medication... which is by law to be counted every eight hours," said Buerckley. "So, three times a day someone signed off saying that that med was given to my son and it was never given." The incidents were documented, but Buerckley says she didn't find out about the medication errors until the Iowa Department of Human Services contacted her. REM Iowa, the company in charge of Joe's group home, declined an on-camera interview but issued a statement, saying in part, "REM Iowa is committed to providing quality of life enhancing services to the individuals we are privileged to support. We take our obligation to ensure the safety and well-being of those we serve very seriously." But Buerckley says the situation only got worse. "The house just went out of control ... Joe would call me and say this child showed me his penis." Reports to the DHS show a resident at the home sexually abused Joe and another resident on at least three occasions. "And I went and I said, how are you going to guarantee that my child is not going to be sexually assaulted in this home. And they said, 'Well, we can't guarantee that.'" REM Iowa blames the staff at the home. "Despite our best efforts we faced a continual challenge in recruiting and retaining the caliber of staff we believed were necessary for meeting the unique needs of children served in this program." In August, REM Iowa decided to close the home. Buerckley received 30-days notice that she would have to find a new place for Joe to live. With a limited number of group homes in the state, Buerckley was forced to pull Joe out of school and bring him home, which for a child like Joe, is easier said than done. "Joe will try so hard," said Buerckley, tears welling up in her eyes. "He will try. He will try really hard. And he will try to be what he says is 'good' because he doesn't understand emotion ... he will try to be good, but at some point it won't be good and when it's not good, it's awful." Source: <http://whotv.com/2014/11/17/group-home-closed-residents-sexually-abused-medications-missed/>

Child Advocate: 'We Need All Hands on Deck' to Stop the Savagery of Child Sex Slavery Nov. 19, 2014 1:44pm Sara Carter 2.4K Shares Email this story to a friend By the time Kala was 8 years old, she had been repeatedly raped by her father and other members of her family in the Philippines. When her father would leave the house, she would sit for hours, naked and bound by her ankles and arms, like an animal. If she protested, her father would burn her with the tip of his lit cigarette, scarring her small arms and legs. It wouldn't be long before her father, who was a drug addict, sold Kala to a sex trafficking ring. For the next two years, Kala would continue to live in a special hell, raped repeatedly by older men seeking sex with children. AP She was forced to traffic narcotics for those who enslaved her. By age 10, she was pregnant. In her short decade of life, Kala had seen the worst of mankind and desperately yearned for something unknown to her: safety and love. Remarkably, Kala's will to survive was not broken. She had lost the baby, but before her 11th birthday, Kala escaped. She managed to slip the ties that bound her hands, broke through a window and ran for her life. She found a place of sanctuary with Unlikely Heroes, a nonprofit organization named for child survivors like herself. It began with a fighter named Erica Greve. Greve, a social worker and counselor from San Francisco, started Unlikely Heroes after a 2011 encounter at the hospital where she was working when she counseled an 11-year-old girl who had been kidnapped and raped by an older man. "There was no place I could find that had the resources necessary to deal with her type of trauma and emotional pain," Greve said. Unlikely Heroes helps get children out of brothels and prostitution rings around the world and establishes rehabilitation homes to provide food, medical care and teach life skills to victims of sex trafficking. The group has set up homes in Thailand, the Philippines and Mexico. Rescued children attend school and receive on-site tutoring; many have already graduated from high school. The organization has a list of therapists and counselors who work with the children to overcome the emotional, mental and spiritual hardships brought on by their traumas. "I focus on the success stories and I love to celebrate life," Greve said. "I love to celebrate our teams that are giving their lives to do this every day on the front lines of this war against children. We fight with love and every victory is worth it. That is what fuels me and keeps me going." Greve told TheBlaze TV's For the Record that she was stunned to find how few resources there were available for children of sex trafficking and slavery. "With all of our homes, we provide the kids with rehabilitation and the resources they need to survive," Greve said. "Knowing that more and more people are becoming aware of the horrors of child trafficking and wanting to do something about it gives us hope. We need all hands on deck. This is the biggest human rights violence that mankind has ever known. We need everyone to say, 'We're not going to tolerate children being violated.'" Unlikely Heroes founder Erica Greve sits with three Nigerian schoolgirls who escaped their captors earlier this year after being kidnapped from their school in Chibok, Nigeria. (Photo courtesy Unlikely Heroes) Greve frequently travels to the homes Unlikely Heroes has established to ensure the rescued children are being well cared for. Known as "Mama Greve" in the Philippines, she's hands-on with the survivors and enlists locals to take her into the seedy world of sex traffickers to let children know there is a place they can find help and safety. She traveled to Nigeria after the militant Islamist group Boko Haram kidnapped nearly 300 schoolgirls in Chibok in April and provided counseling to three young girls who managed to escape their captors. Most of the other abducted girls have not been found. Last year, a newborn baby boy was found wrapped in a plastic bag, his umbilical cord still attached, by the trash outside the Unlikely Heroes home in the Philippines. He was just 2 hours old. He was rescued by Bing, the woman who runs the home, and taken to the hospital for medical care. The boy had been left by a 14-year old girl who had been forced into a sex slave ring and was forced to abandon her baby. The women at the home named him Eric Joseph, in honor of Greve. Baby Eric Joseph was found abandoned last year outside the Unlikely Heroes group home in the Philippines when he was only 2 hours old. He had been left by a 14-year-old girl who had been forced into a sex slave ring. (Photo courtesy Unlikely Heroes) "I think what makes Erica Greve so effective is she loves the girls more than she hates the perpetrators," said Toure Roberts, pastor at One Church International in Los Angeles. "Love is the strongest force on the planet, love is stronger than anything." The nonprofit relies on private donations and proceeds from several fundraisers held throughout the year. Greve says the average annual cost to care for a rescued child is $5,000, though it can vary by location and the extent of the services a child requires; each home can house about a dozen children and costs approximately $50,000 a year to run. Unlikely Heroes founder Erica Greve with Eric Joseph on his first birthday. (Photo courtesy Unlikely Heroes) All of the organization's group homes are ready to be expanded, and there are plans to build another home in Thailand in order to provide long-term care for children who have already been rehabilitated, so they don't have to relive their trauma every time new children are brought in. The existing home in Thailand is a trauma center and serves as the model for the other homes: the facility provides intense therapy and has also provided workplace training and schooling for more than 700 underage girls. "It's a beautiful home and all the kids there go to the private school to better protect them from the traffickers they escaped from," Greve said. "All of the kids in our program go to high school, but the girls in Thailand are threatened many times and this school provides the appropriate protection. The youngest children are 6 and 8 years old." Greve said her work is far from done, and she hopes people around the world will join in the fight against child trafficking and sexual abuse. "The one thing that sticks with me is how grateful the victims are that have been rescued," she said. "There's such a gratitude for the help they're receiving. They want to go back and rescue other girls because they can't imagine other girls are living the way they were forced to live. They feel they can't move forward unless they help rescue others. That feeling is what keeps me moving forward. They want to see every child be free, and so do I." ♦ ♦ ♦ Facts About Child Sex Trafficking and Human Slavery • More than 35 million people are currently enslaved worldwide, according to the 2014 Global Slavery Index. • Thirty percent of all human trafficking cases involve children being sold in the sex trade. • The average cost of a human slave is $90. Human sex trafficking is a $150 billion annual business. • According to the U.S. State Department, 600,000 to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year. More than 70 percent are female and half are children. Source: <http://www.theblaze.com/stories/2014/11/19/child-advocate-we-need-all-hands-on-deck-to-stop-the-savagery-of-child-sex-slavery/>

Foster care in need of better inter-agency communication (part 3) Brian Rash Posted: 11/21/2014 09:00:00 PM CST Editor's note: The following is part three of a multi-part series examining the state of foster care in Young County through several different perspectives. Graham resident Erin Harvey considers herself someone who honestly cares, especially about children in need of foster care. She's fostered several kids, two of them through formal channels including Child Protective Services. Others she's fostered and continues to foster more informally, acting more as support. After her last experience fostering a child through CPS in 2010, Harvey said that she'd rather not legally adopt anyone until the gaping cracks in the system are repaired. "I took foster children in, and I would have gladly taken more in," she said. "I took older children in, which CPS desperately needed." But four years ago, after a distressing series of events that included a major relocation of CPS staff that left her feeling alienated from the agency she felt she was helping out, she decided she didn't want to do it anymore. "I started way back," Harvey said of her history as a foster parent. "My youngest son, Joey, he was my first. I got him when in 2002. They finally allowed single parents to take in foster kids. That was the first time I went through it." Harvey said that when she decided to adopt Joey, he was already 10 and she knew he was going to require much of her attention. She stopped taking foster kids after adopting him because he took a lot of extra energy. After Joey and her birth son grew up and moved out, she decided to try again, this time with a young girl who was already a teenager. The statistics on foster children in the U.S. show that their numbers are rising. One study from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services shows that the number of American children who were in, entering or exiting foster care grew from 399,546 in 2003 to 520,000 in 2012. More closely related to Harvey's situation, a study conducted for University Research Company by Lisa Hutton titled "The effects of Older Child Adoption on the Family" concluded, among many findings, that not only do problems within adoptive families increase the older the adopted child is, but the older the adopted child is, the more the foster parents need support and outreach. "A family that adopts an older child is affected by these problems faced by the child," the study says. "Though they may not realize it, the adoptive parents are also affected by their own childhood and past experiences, which may involve neglect, abuse, or hurt. All of these things must be taken into account when the adoption of an older child is being considered. However, in order to enable a greater number of older children to be adopted, measures should be taken and programs developed by counselors and therapists to further assist families and children through the many challenges involved in older-child adoption." When Harvey began fostering a 14-year-old girl in 2010, she said that she had at least some of the support Hutton refers to in her study. Her case worker lived in Olney and visited frequently. Even though her new foster daughter had behavioral issues, Harvey felt that her CPS case worker was doing a good job. But then, she said, CPS restructured its staff. Read the entire story in this weekend's Graham Leader. Source: http://www.grahamleader.com/ci_26986798/foster-care-need-better-inter-agency-communication-part

Watchdog calls for tighter regulation on foster care prescriber relationships with drug companies By Karen de Sá kdesa@mercurynews.com Posted: 11/24/2014 05:45:56 PM PST PST0 Comments Updated: 11/24/2014 08:12:23 PM PST Drugging Our Kids Read the Bay Area News Group investigation about psychiatric drugs in the California foster care system. Scrutiny of doctors who prescribe psychotropic drugs to California foster children intensified Monday, with growing calls for regulators to consider whether financial relationships with pharmaceutical companies may be driving the excessive use of medication. The outcry came from a leading consumer advocacy group as lawmakers stepped up their efforts to rein in reckless prescribing and the California Medical Board vowed to widen its investigation in response to this newspaper's ongoing series "Drugging Our Kids." On Sunday, the newspaper reported that prescribers in the foster care system received more than twice as much as the typical California doctor in payments from big drug companies for meals, gifts, travel, speaking and industry-sponsored research. The newspaper also found that last year doctors who prescribed the most to California foster youth, on average, accepted almost four times as much as those who fell in a lower-prescribing group. "We've known for years that the problem of drug manufacturer payments to doctors appears to have an out-sized influence in their prescribing practices," said Carmen Balber, executive director of the nonprofit group

Consumer Watchdog. "But this investigation was particularly disturbing because of the patients it affects. The conflict of interest is clear in these cases, and we think that action is long overdue." Advertisement In a letter to the California Medical Board sent Monday, Balber's Santa Monica-based organization called on the state licensing agency to expand its current investigation of doctors who may be overprescribing to foster youth "to determine if children are inappropriately being prescribed or overprescribed because of drug manufacturer payments to their physicians." Balber said the prescribing has not only cost taxpayers millions of dollars in payments for possibly unneeded drugs, but has also put the children's health at risk. The newspaper's report on industry ties, she added, "makes clear that the state has failed to take the steps necessary to protect children." Kimberly Kirchmeyer, executive director of the California Medical Board, noted there is no law prohibiting doctors from accepting drug industry promotional funds. The newspaper found pharmaceutical companies spent more than $14 million to woo foster care prescribers from 2010 to 2013. But the payments may constitute "unprofessional conduct," Kirchmeyer added, and that could warrant additional scrutiny. She said the agency plans to look into whether these doctors "have a reason to prescribe, are they appropriately prescribing, or are they prescribing medication inappropriately to support the pharmaceutical company?" The medical board has been looking into whether specific doctors are overprescribing psychotropic medications to foster youth since the newspaper published its first installment of "Drugging Our Kids" in August, which revealed that almost 1 in 4 foster teens are prescribed psych meds. Many of the drugs are being prescribed to control troublesome behavior instead of the severe mental illnesses they are approved to treat. They can have debilitating side effects, such as rapid weight gain, higher risks of diabetes and severe lethargy. The newspaper's original findings drove state Sen. Jim Beall, chair of the Senate Human Services Committee, to push for more detailed information from the state Department of Health Care Services on prescribing practices to foster youth. On Monday, Beall, D-San Jose, met with California's director of social services, Will Lightbourne, to discuss the request he and Los Angeles Democratic state Sen. Holly Mitchell submitted to health care officials last week. The two senators have called on Health Care Services Director Toby Douglas to release geographic and demographic information on prescribing patterns, including tallies of foster children on multiple medications and high doses, as well as those being prescribed drugs for conduct "disorders" -- more information than the state has been willing to release so far. Beall said he will use the data to draft legislation aimed at improving the oversight and monitoring of psych medication use in foster care. The bill could require regular reports and analysis of county-level prescribing trends and establish a hotline for lawyers, judges, doctors and other caregivers who need guidance on medication. On Monday, after the newspaper's latest report, Beall said he also wants doctors' interactions with drug companies to be better monitored. "The Social Services Agency should take all steps to ensure that there's no conflict of interest in medical care for any of our foster kids -- and if that's happening right now, we're going to take action in the Legislature to make sure that doesn't happen," Beall said. Marilyn Benoit -- the former president of the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry and current chair of the academy's task force that proposed guidelines on relations with drug companies -- said the newspaper's unique look at foster care prescribers' link to drug companies is "concerning." "This is a capitalistic country -- you're supposed to market and advertise the products you make -- there's nothing wrong with that," said Benoit, a child psychiatrist who oversees a Pennsylvania-based behavioral health center that treats foster youth. "But as prescribers, we have to be more scrutinizing and understand the difference between marketing and real scientific information about the medication we use." Yet Benoit cautioned that although "research clearly shows that doctors can be influenced by gifts," her organization is advisory only and has no enforcement capabilities. She said doctors must take personal responsibility to draw the line. "When you're tied to the pharmaceutical industry," Benoit said, "then there could be a conflict of interest in your prescribing behavior." Contact Karen de Sá at 408-920-5781. Source: http://www.mercurynews.com/breaking-news/ci_27005492/watchdog-calls-tighter-regulation-foster-care-prescriber-relationships

Tucumcari foster parent arrested for abuse, sex charges - KFDD - NewsChannel 10 / Amarillo News, Weather, Sports Tucumcari foster parent arrested for abuse, sex charges Posted: Nov 25, 2014 12:55 PM PST Updated: Nov 25, 2014 3:44 PM PST _Manuel Preciado, 64 Amarillo, TX - A foster parent in Tucumcari, New Mexico faces several charges involving abuses against children. 64 year-old Manuel Preciado is charged with kidnapping, criminal sexual contact of a minor in the 3rd degree, abuse of a child, false imprisonment, and enticement of a child, after New Mexico State Police say he inappropriately touched a 16 year-old boy. Reports show the incidents ranged from August to October of this year. Police confirm that all children who were under Preciado's care at the time have been removed and placed into homes with other foster care providers. Preciado was booked into the Quay County Detention Center. Source: <http://www.newschannel10.com/story/27481027/tucumcari-foster-parent-arrested-for-abuse-sex-charges>

Congressional priorities: The future of our nation's foster care system By Rita Soronen 6758116_0 Earlier this month, voters turned out to voice their opinion on the current state of our country. Issues of foreign policy and ISIS, the economy, health care and immigration were discussed at length. Largely ignored were the issues faced by our country's children. With more than 100,000 children waiting in the foster care system for adoptive families, a record number homeless and an alarming increasing number of children in this country going hungry, it is time to make positive, permanent changes on behalf of children. Two child welfare priorities need to be top of mind for policymakers: children continue to age out of care at alarming rates, and for those who are adopted, we continue to fail to provide adequate resources, services and connections for families in need of assistance once the adoption is finalized and to keep the family intact. ADVERTISEMENT As members of 114th Congress begin their initiation and develop their policy agendas, it is my hope that they will join the Congressional Coalition on Adoption (CCA) and the Congressional Foster Care Caucus to be a part of the solution. These caucuses work with organizations across the country that are dedicated to increasing the awareness of the vulnerable children living in the foster care system, addressing critical policy needs, tackling child welfare finance reform, and elevating foster care and adoption evidence-based best practices for our children and youth. The First Focus Campaign for Children recently recognized 100 Members of Congress for leadership on issues important to children during the 113th Congress. These Members have voiced their dedicated support for our country's most vulnerable children and families, introduced or supported legislation to meet children's needs and simply made an effort to understand and elevate children as a Congressional priority. They understand -- like many in our country -- that our children are the future. And now, with a new Congress in January, it is time to encourage every member of Congress to be a champion for children in their communities and across the nation. Last year, more than 23,000 children aged out of the foster care system without families. They were "emancipated" from the state, the only support they had was that of the government letting them go. We made a promise to the hundreds of thousands of children in the foster care system that the day they were permanently separated from their families, we would find them new ones. We are failing at a high rate -- not because lack of trying, there are thousands of dedicated and skilled social workers, adoption recruiters and agencies who have devoted their lives to care for these children, but because we lack the political leadership needed to drive the necessary policy, practice and financing reforms. We must, with the urgency that childhood demands, make significant and scalable changes to the foster care system to ensure that our country's children are not slipping through the cracks of an overwhelmed system. We need advocates and leaders in the 114th United States Congress who will make it their business to drive change so that this country stops failing on its promise to our children. A promise that every child will be cherished, safe and able to thrive in a family and a home. Soronen is the president and CEO of the Dave Thomas Foundation for Adoption. Since 2001, she has worked to find adoptive families for each of the more than 134,000 waiting children in the U.S. and Canadian foster care systems. The opinions expressed in this commentary are solely those of the author. Source: <http://thehill.com/blogs/congress-blog/civil-rights/225232-congressional-priorities-the-future-of-our-nations-foster>

11-year-old Milwaukee girl sexually assaulted in foster care —An 11-year-old girl placed in foster care for her safety wound up sexually assaulted and pregnant. Related School leaders to help students cope... Shoppers hunt for perfect Christmas... Packers defeat Patriots 26-21 Packers hold off Patriots 26-21 Weekend Thaw Ends WISN 12 News reporter Colleen Henry investigates how it happened and the larger concern about who's watching. VIDEO: WISN 12 News Investigates: 11-year-old sexually assaulted in foster care Last December, a mom got a stunning phone call from an urgent care clinic. "They were at urgent care because my daughter had been complaining about sore throat. She had been really sick," said the mom, who WISN 12 News is not identifying to protect the daughter. "She said, 'Well, your daughter's pregnant.' I said, 'What?'" The woman on the other end of the phone was the foster mother the state tasked with caring for her 11-year-old daughter. "They took my children away from me, saying I couldn't protect them. Then, she's placed in a home where something horrific like that was able to happen," the mom said. "I didn't know what to think. I didn't know which way to turn. I felt like my world was just coming down." State records show the state removed the 11-year-old from her home on Milwaukee's north side after allegations her mom abused her. It moved her to live with a foster parent trained to supervise kids with special behavioral needs. It was there prosecutors said the girl was sexually assaulted by that foster mom's 16-year-old grandson. WISN 12 News has learned he has special needs as well. "We took a child from a home where she was being physically abused, and put her in a home where she's now being sexually abused," state Rep. LaTonya Johnson said. Johnson sits on the Committee on Children and Families. She questioned why the girl was in that foster home. State records show two complaints against the foster mother. The one in 2008 was deemed unfounded. In 2013, the Wisconsin Department of Child and Families reported that "concerns existed related to the level of supervision provided by the treatment foster parent for the child." DCF said it addressed the concerns with the foster parent. "To me, that's an immediate red flag," Johnson said. DCF left the girl with the foster mom. Four months later, the 11-year-old was pregnant. As required by law, DCF posted a report of this so-called "egregious incident." When WISN 12 News asked for details, DCF said state law requires that "All reports be confidential" including "any document relating to the investigation, assessment and disposition of a report." "They tell you very little what the department did as a result. It doesn't tell you anything about whether the department messed up. If they dropped the ball. If they made the wrong call," Johnson said. "They claim that it's for the privacy and protection of the child," Johnson said the laws actually protect DCF. "We're protecting them from having to take the heat," Johnson said. "I couldn't imagine that. She's still a baby herself," the mom said. After the sexual assault, the state returned the 11-year-old to her mom's custody, and together they faced the difficult decision to terminate the pregnancy. "I didn't want her to have the baby and have the baby be a constant reminder of what happened to her," the mom said. She's speaking out in hopes no other family has to go through this. "I'm quite sure I'm not the only person they failed, and I'm quite sure I'm not the last person they're going to fail," the mom said. Last year, DCF reported 34 incidents considered "egregious" in Milwaukee County, including death. So far this year, there have been 15. The 16-year-old boy was charged with sexual assault but was never tried. The court found him mentally incompetent to stand trial. The biological mom was never charged with abusing the girl and went through parenting classes. She's relieved to have her daughter home. If you'd like to see the reports DCF makes public on egregious incidents in Milwaukee County and statewide, click here. Source: <http://www.wisn.com/news/1/yearold-milwaukee-girl-sexually-assaulted-in-foster-care/29934276>

Group home resident accused in attacks has violent past Steve Lieberman, slieberm@lohud.com 11:39 p.m. EDT June 27, 2014 Ethan Jimenez-Colon (Photo: Courtesy photo) 11 CONNECT TWEET LINKEDIN COMMENT EMAIL MORE A 23-year-old man accused of sexually attacking a fellow resident at a group home for people with mental illness then trying to blow the house up had other histories in his past. Ethan Jimenez-Colon, who described himself as a rapper named "Etho the Destroyer" online and in social media, spent four months in state prison for felony assault more than a year ago after violating his initial probationary sentence. Thomas Zimmerman, the chief operating officer for Loeb House, which operates the group home, said the placement of a parolee at a group home is not unusual and takes place after the person is evaluated by a team of mental health experts from the involved agency and law enforcement representatives like probation officials. In this case, the evaluators found Jimenez-Colon could live in a group home setting after being released from the Fishkill Correctional Facility, and he was placed at Lukens House at 78 Demarest Road in West Nyack. "We feel terrible about the whole situation," Zimmerman said. "Thank God, the most worst thing didn't happen." Zimmerman said he could not discuss Jimenez-Colon's specific case but agencies like Loeb House, which is licensed by the state Office of Mental Health and has a contract with Rockland County, face a juggling act when deciding whether to serve people with mental illnesses who have criminal histories. "This is where all providers struggle," Zimmerman said. "A lot of these individuals have histories from the legal system. We accept people who don't have a severe history of violence. They cannot be a threat to themselves or other people." Zimmerman said Jimenez-Colon's arrest has Loeb House re-evaluating its procedures with such placements. A state Office of Mental Health spokesman, Benjamin Rosen, said he could not discuss Jimenez-Colon's case, citing state and federal privacy laws. However, he said, the state Justice Center and the Office of Mental Health "may undertake investigatory actions and require a provider to take appropriate and immediate action to protect the safety of individuals under their care." In Jimenez-Colon's case, a Rockland County indictment handed up Wednesday accuses him of breaking into a female resident's bedroom through a window and attempting to rape her on May 28 between midnight and 5 a.m. The next night he is accused of sexually assaulting her, then turning on four stove burners and lighting the oven in an attempt to blow up the house. The 23-count indictment includes 13 counts of attempted murder because 10 residents and three Loeb House staff members were inside the house. Jimenez-Colon is being held without bail in the county jail. He was convicted of second-degree assault in Rockland in 2011 for punching another person during a fight and was placed on five years probation. He was sent to state prison Nov. 2, 2012, for a maximum of two years for violating probation on the assault charge and was released March 5, 2013, according to the state Department of Corrections. Jimenez-Colon boasted about his nine months of sobriety in an April 27 Facebook post. He wrote: "All i know is that I'm happy and thats all that matters. I haven't had this much control over my life in a while and i know I'm not above others for my choice but i don't plan on ever going back to the stupid decisions i did in the past." On May 10, he wrote that "shooting a gun is really fun." Source: <http://www.lohud.com/story/news/crime/2014/06/26/loeb-house-ethan-jimenez-colon-sexual-abuse-attempted-murder/11417813/>

Teen missing from North Carolina wilderness therapy camp found dead after breaking hip in stream: autopsy The body of 17-year-old Alec Lansing was found in a creek inside the Nantahala National Forest Saturday. Lansing was last seen alive by a Trails Carolina counselor on Nov. 10. BY Nina Golgowski NEW YORK DAILY NEWS Wednesday, November 26, 2014, 4:28 PM A A Facebook 3 Twitter Reddit Email Comments 3 Share Print Share this URL Alec Lansing, who had been missing from a southwest North Carolina wilderness therapy camp since Nov. 10, was found dead inside the Nantahala National Forest Saturday. A two-week search for a 17-year-old boy who wandered away from a North Carolina wilderness therapy camp has ended with the recovery of the boy's body, according to local reports. Alec Lansing's body was located in a creek inside the Nantahala National Forest Saturday after breaking his hip in a possible fall from a tree and dying of hypothermia, WYFF reported citing an autopsy's results. Because of his grave injury, authorities don't believe he was able to move. The teen, from Atlanta, had been a camper at Trails Carolina when he was reportedly last seen walking away from a counselor on Nov. 10. trailscarolina.com The 17-year-old had reportedly been a student at Trails Carolina in Lake Toxaway, N.C. before he wandered away. The camp describes itself as offering long-term help for troubled youth. The camp describes itself as offering long-term help for "troubled youth experiencing school failure or families looking for crisis intervention," according to its website. It's not clear how long Lansing was a student at the camp. A request for comment was not immediately returned by the camp or the Jackson County Sheriff's Department. Source: <http://www.nydailynews.com/news/national/teen-missing-n-therapy-camp-found-dead-article-1.2025238>

Ex-Group Home Employees Sentenced In Abuse Case By Hilda Muñoz contact the reporter Crime Two ex-employees at an East Hartford group home were sentenced for their roles in the abuse of residents. MANCHESTER — Two former employees at an East Hartford group home for developmentally disabled adults have been sentenced for their roles in the abuse of residents. Stephanie Jones, the former assistant manager at the home, was sentenced to six years in prison, suspended after 20 months and three years of probation. She pleaded guilty in September to two counts of inciting injury to a person. Jevaun Phillips was sentenced to six months in prison and two years of probation. He pleaded guilty to first-degree unlawful restraint and second-degree intimidation due to bias. A third worker, Angelica Rivera, was sentenced in March to 10 years, suspended after three, followed by three years of probation. She pleaded guilty in January to first-degree unlawful restraint, third-degree assault on a disabled person and cruelty to persons. The woman she abused has autism and mental disabilities that cause her to function at the level of a fourth-grader, police said. The assaults, at a home operated by Options Unlimited, were captured in cellphone videos recorded by Jones in 2011 and released to the company and a television station a year later after Jones and seven others had been fired for abusing patients. According to Jones' 2013 arrest warrant, Rivera tipped off investigators to the videos that Jones kept in computers at her home. Rivera said Jones was the leader of the employees who engaged in misconduct and recorded staff members abusing residents, the warrant states. In some of the videos, Jones is heard in the background laughing, yelling at residents and encouraging their abuse, according to the warrant. One of the videos is the one, shot in May 2011, that led to Rivera's arrest. In it, Jones laughs as Rivera strikes the victim and suggests that staff tie the woman up, according to the warrant. Jones also tells residents that they need a "whipping," the warrant states. In other videos Jones and Phillips taunt a male resident by threatening to pull out his toenail and his fingernails. Source: <http://www.courant.com/community/east-hartford/he-east-hartford-groupe-home-abuse-1127-20141126-story.html>

Accused told police he took in troubled teens KAT DUGGAN Last updated 09:12 02/12/2014 Share Relevant offers A Marlborough man accused of rape told police he used to take troubled girls in and put them back on the right track. The 66-year-old is on trial at the High Court in Nelson, facing 48 charges, including rape, sexual violation, indecent assault, making objectionable publications and the possession and supply of drugs. In a recorded interview in 2012, which was played to the court yesterday, Detective Constable Paul Soper asked the accused about two of the complainants. The man told Soper he could not remember much about his time with the first complainant, who he said he had a "short-lived" relationship with. The pair went on a road trip together, during which the complainant alleges the man raped her and took photographs of her naked while staying in a campervan in Kaikoura. She also claims the man twice supplied her with LSD, which she had asked for. "I don't know whether she was on drugs or not, I don't think so because I don't like girls having drugs . . . I don't understand why she said that I have drugged her because I'm absolutely against all that sort of stuff," the accused said in the interview. He told police he had confiscated drugs from people and told others to leave his property because they were taking drugs. He had fallen out with good mates and "ditched" many of his former girlfriends because they were using drugs, he said. He struggled to remember details of the road trip with the 16-year-old complainant, including whether they stopped at Maruia Springs. "Actually we did, we went to Maruia . . . It's just I have been there with quite a few girls, lots of girls so I can't remember if it was her or not," he said. After about two weeks in a relationship with the teenager, he dropped her back home in Nelson, and had not heard from her again, he said. The accused told police the second complainant had been a family friend, and had lived with him for about three months before being taken away by social services. She alleges the man raped, sexually violated and indecently assaulted her, and supplied her with cannabis. He denies the charges, and told Soper the complainant stayed at his house when she was having problems with her mother. "Something you probably don't know about me is, we take a lot of people in . . . I like to get these girls and put them on the right track." He had taken the complainant under his wing, providing her with a job to pay for her board and often took her for driving lessons, he said. The man's interview was to continue before Justice Alan MacKenzie and a jury this morning. Ad Feedback His trial began on November 17 and was expected to continue for up to four weeks. - The Marlborough Express Source: <http://www.stuff.co.nz/marlborough-express/63733689/Accused-told-police-he-took-in-troubled-teens>

EON Awarded For 'Questioning The Charter School Hype' The following article authored by Education Opportunity Network Director Jeff Bryant has been awarded one of the "top 25 most censored or underreported news stories of 2014." The award came from Project Censored, "a media research, literacy, and education organization established in 1976." The article originally appeared in Salon.com. Imagine your 5-year-old boy went to a school where he was occasionally thrown in a padded cell and detained alone for stretches as long as 20 minutes. Or you sent your kid to an elementary school where the children are made to sit on a bare floor in the classroom for days before they can "earn" their desks. Or your kid went to a school where she spent hours parked in a cubicle in front of a computer with a poorly trained teacher who has to monitor more than 100 other students. Maybe you don't have children or send them to private school? So how do you feel when you find out the local school that you pay for with your taxes is operating a scam that diverted millions of dollars through fake Medicaid billing? Or the school used your tax dollars as "grants" to start up other profit-making enterprises . . . or pay lavish salaries - $300,000, $400,000 or more - to its administrators . . . or support a movement linked to a reclusive Turkish cleric being investigated for bribery and corruption. Welcome to the world of charter schools. Are there wonderful charter schools doing great things for kids? Probably. Are all these cumulative anecdotes an unfair representation of the value that charter schools can bring to some communities? Maybe. But neither of those questions matters because of what the charter school movement has come to represent in the landscape of American education. Charter schools have been relentlessly marketed to the American populace as a silver bullet for "failed" public schools, especially in poor urban communities of African-American and Latino/a students. Politicians in both parties speak glowingly of these schools - which, by the way, their children seem never to attend. Opening charter schools has become the latest fad for celebrities including athletes and rap stars. Huge nationwide chains - called education management organizations (EMOs) - now run many of these charters. A recent study by the National Education Policy Center found, "Students across 35 states and the District of Columbia now attend schools managed by these non-government entities." These for-profit and nonprofit EMOs - such as K12 Inc., National Heritage Academies, Charter Schools USA and KIPP - now account for nearly half of the students educated by charter schools. Substantial, well-funded nationwide organizations have rapidly developed to lobby for these schools. One such organization, the Alliance for School Choice, recently received a $6 million gift from the Walton Foundation, of Wal-Mart fame. Slick marketing campaigns have been rolled out in communities across the country to tout the coming of new charters. The actual academic results of these schools seems to matter to hardly anyone, despite report after report showing that these schools tend to do poorly on state and national tests and fail at providing equitable education to underserved students. Yet lobbying for more of these schools continues unabated with more money funneled into the campaigns of politicians who support charters and more efforts to press state lawmakers to lift any provisions currently in place to regulate how these schools operate and are held accountable to the public. As a result, charter schools now serve one in 20 students nationwide, despite "mixed results" at best. Yet how much is really known about how most charter schools operate on a day-to-day basis? Most of the people who witness what these schools actually do are students, who have little voice outside the classroom; teachers, who need to hold onto their jobs; and charter administrators, who can't always be depended on to blow the whistle on shenanigans. But as these institutions proliferate, so are troubling reports of what the charter movement has unleashed. Turning Our Backs on Abuse Keeping a running tally of charter school scandals could amount to so much cherry-picking if it weren't for the fact the tree is so loaded there's practically nothing but fruit. Two of the anecdotes cited above surfaced recently in schools operated by a nationwide chain called KIPP, which has been acclaimed for doing "wonderful things" to poor kids that most middle-class parents would not want to see done to their kids. The incident where a 5-year-old student was confined in school to a padded cell prompted Chicago (where the incident occurred) blogger Mike Klonsky to write, "Brutal forms of discipline have become routine for KIPP. 'No divergence is permitted and deviants are quickly labeled, punished or expelled. KIPP has the highest student attrition rate in the nation. I recall one KIPP school where African-American children were made to sit on a bench with a sign around their neck that said, 'CRETIN.'" Klonsky noted the nationwide chain's practice of using a behavioral technique, called "Slant," that "instructs students to sit up, listen, ask questions, nod and track the speaker with their eyes." It's "military style behavior," renowned educator Debra Meier remarked on her blog at Education Week. Meier explained how these schools rely on "public shaming" as a form of behavior control, which often includes "children being 'exiled' to a special table at lunch, required to wear their KIPP shirts backwards, and other forms of public embarrassment." James Horn, who came across the incident where students had to "earn" their desks by sitting on the floor, wrote, "KIPP requires the poorest urban children, those who have received the least in life, to earn everything at KIPP." Horn interviewed a former teacher from that KIPP school who recounted, "[The children] would sit there and do homework on the floor. They would fill in forms and pass them. And they had to all do it correctly, otherwise, they'd do it again and again and again . . . It was 100 [students]. It was all the fifth-graders in a classroom." Horn noted, "This is not the first time such educational atrocities at KIPP have been documented," and he linked to a "series of incidents" in Fresno, Calif., where the school principal was accused of "slamming students against the wall, placing trash cans over their heads, forcing kids to crawl on their hands and knees while barking, and enforcing unreasonably strict bathroom rules, resulting in students having accidents and vomiting on themselves inside the classroom." "How long will we turn our backs on this kind of abuse?" Horn asked. Rocketship to Nowhere The questionable practices of many charter schools go beyond classroom management. The charter cited above where students spent hours stuck in cubicles, in front of computers, is part of a nationwide charter chain called Rocketship. According to ed-tech media outlet EdSurge, "Rocketship Education is a charter school network in hot demand, courted by urban school districts across the nation. Both Kaya Henderson, Superintendent of D.C. Public Schools and New York City's outgoing mayor Michael Bloomberg have publicly said they'd welcome Rocketship schools in their districts." (emphasis added) Tech market enthusiasts at EdSurge claim, "Rocketship has broken down the traditional factory school model, rethinking things like the bell-schedule, the role of teachers, the way kids are grouped, and even the physical space itself." What does all this "innovation" look like in practice? As Samantha Winslow explained in the article cited above, Rocketship's allure comes mostly from cost savings because so much of the "instruction" is delivered via computers. "The company says it saves half a million dollars a year by using fewer teachers, replacing them with non-certified instructors at $15 per hour . . . Half its teachers have less than two years' experience; 75 percent come from Teach For America." The chain "targets low-income students" with the claim it can raise their test scores by drilling them with computer-based instruction. "Instructors monitor up to 130 kids at a time in cubicles in the schools' computer labs. Rocketeers, as students are called, sit looking at computer screens up to two hours per day. "Skeptics say the Rocketship test scores just demonstrate the schools are focusing on test preparation at the expense of arts, languages, and real learning," Winslow noted. The Last Thing These Children Need In these types of high-tech-driven charters, where efficiency and driving down the costs of teachers are priorities, "there is never much time to actually teach," explained one teacher who had been employed at a virtual charter school run by the company K12. Writing recently at the blog site of Education Week edu-blogger Anthony Cody, the teacher, Darcy Bedortha, recounted, "Each class met for 30 minutes in an interactive-blackboard setting one day each week. Fewer than 10 percent of students actually attended these 'classes.' Other than that time and any one-on-one sessions a teacher and student might set up (which, in my experience, almost never happened), there is no room for direct instruction. "I was an English teacher," Bedortha explained, "so my students would write. They wrote of pain and fear and of not fitting in. They were the kinds of young people who desperately needed to have the protective circle of a community watching over them. They needed one healthy person to smile at them and recognize them by name every day, to say 'I'm glad you're here!' . . . The last thing these young people needed . . . was to be isolated in front of a computer screen." The educational malpractices committed by charter schools aren't confined to the tech-driven ones. A tutor who had worked at a "no excuse" charter school in Boston recently wrote a letter to her former students on the edu-blog site Edushyster. She confessed, "What I saw at your 'No Excuses' charter startled me and still troubles me deeply. I was trained on how to discipline you, but not on the best way to help you understand material. I was lectured on how to turn your learning into data points, but was never told who you are and where you came from. Your school forced me to do things that I don't believe are in your best interest." A recent report coming out of Ohio told of a charter management operation in Columbus where teachers failed to show for work because they hadn't been paid. There were bedbugs in the school, the food vendor stopped providing lunches, and an assistant principal was making less than minimum wage. The charter operator had two other charters it operated closed down by the state Department of Education in the previous month because "inadequate staffing led to fights among students and to lunch not being served on a set schedule." A "Perfect Storm" of Corruption In addition to questionable classroom practices, charter schools are dogged by corruption. The scandal cited above in which a charter chain defrauded taxpayers of millions of dollars in a Medicaid scheme presents a "perfect storm" according to one analysis, "of everything that might go wrong with private, for-profit 'educators' trying to make more than a buck from public education under the guise of charter school management." The D.C.-based firm Options Public Charter School managed to orchestrate a train wreck of corruption, including not only the Medicaid fraud scheme, but also payoffs of public officials and a local television news personality, diversion of funds meant for schools to personal accounts, business arrangements that siphoned funds to contractor partners, and bloated executive salaries. The charter scandal involving the Turkish cleric is especially bizarre. As the Washington Post's Valerie Strauss explained at her Answer Sheet blog, "The reclusive cleric is Fethullah Gulen, who has been linked to charter schools in some 25 states and to other schools in dozens of countries around the world." But Gluen is no mere charter operator. In fact, as Al Jazeera reported, he is the head of a powerful movement in Turkey involved in "the most extensive and sensational corruption investigations" of that country's recent history. "The public charter schools in what is unofficially known as the Gulen network," Strauss explained, "are believed to be operated by people – usually Turks – in or associated with the Gulen movement." Many of the schools have strong academic records, but have been the subject of frequent investigations of "whether some employees at some of these schools are 'kicking back part of their salaries' to the Gulen Movement." Strauss noted, "The New York Times and CBS News as well as PBS have reported on the Gulen charter network, citing problems such as whether these schools give special preference to Turkish companies when handing out contracts." No Scrutiny Please One doesn't have to dig deeply to find examples of charter school malfeasance. Indeed, all the above examples appeared in news stories and blog sites since the current school year began. In the meantime, charter promoters do all they can to avoid any external audits or legal consequences related to what they do. As education historian Diane Ravitch recently reported from her blog, when charter school operators in California were convicted of misappropriating over $200,000 in public monies, the California Charter Schools Association entered an amicus brief stating the defendants were "not guilty of any criminal offense because charter schools are not subject to the laws governing public schools. CCSA says that charter schools are exempt from criminal laws governing public schools because they are operated by a private corporation." In the same blog post, Ravitch told of a case in Arizona where another charter successfully argued that it was a private corporation, not a public school. And in Chicago, when the teachers at a charter school wanted to form a union, "the charter founder argued before the National Labor Relations Board that the charter was operated by a private corporation and not subject to state labor laws." Wait ... and you thought charter schools were public schools? Movement Interrupted If it weren't for the great marketing job the charter movement has employed, this education "innovation" would be a P.R. disaster. So far, only the most well-informed fans of charter schools, who aren't wrapped up in the movement ideology it has become, have changed their minds about what's baffling schoolchildren and communities across the country. An impartial observer of charter schools, Rutgers professor Bruce Baker, once hoped charters would be a possible source of "some creative, energetic leadership ... that might be associated with a mission-driven start-up school, coupled with an ounce or two of deregulation." Recently, however, his perception has changed. "This whole movement has gotten way out of control – it has morphed dramatically – especially the punditry and resultant public policy surrounding charter schooling. Sadly, I'm reaching a point where I now believe that the end result is causing more harm than good." Recently, Stan Karp of Rethinking Schools wrote, "Nearly every teacher dreams of starting a school. I know I did. 'But I also know the charter school movement has changed dramatically in recent years in ways that have undermined its original intentions ... The counterfeit claim that charter privatization is part of a new 'civil rights movement,' addressing the deep and historic inequality that surrounds our schools, is belied by the real impact of rapid charter growth in cities across the country.' His conclusion? 'It's time to put the brakes on charter expansion and refocus public policy on providing excellent public schools for all.' Amen. Source: <http://educationopportunitynetwork.org/eon-awarded-for-questioning-the-charter-school-hype/>

Mercury News editorial: Doctors have incentives to drug foster kids Mercury News Editorial Posted: 11/28/2014 02:10:12 PM PST Updated: 11/28/2014 07:41:10 PM PST Drugging Our Kids Read the Bay Area News Group investigation about psychiatric drugs in the California foster care system. "Follow the money" is the rule in politics for figuring out the real reason something not quite logical is happening. It appears to apply as well to the overdrugging of California foster youths, based on the latest in Bay Area News Group reporter Karen de Sá's ongoing series, "Drugging Our Kids" -- an analysis using both data and individuals' stories to illuminate the use of pharmaceuticals to control the behavior of foster children. Consumer advocates, lawmakers and the California Medical Board are taking this seriously. In earlier reports, de Sá exposed the use of powerful psychotropic drugs on foster children -- often to control kids' behavior rather than because of a clinical diagnosis. Side effects such as lethargy and massive weight gain can damage kids' lifelong health and their ability to get an education. Most doctors receive money or gifts from drugmakers for various reasons including travel, speaking engagements and drug trials. This is not illegal. But de Sá's investigation found that from 2010 to 2013, prescribers of psych medications in the foster care system received more than twice as much as typical California doctors. And last year, doctors who prescribed the most on average to foster youths accepted almost four times as much as those in a lower-prescribing group. The implication of preying on the most vulnerable of patients to boost drug sales is hard to discount. Advertisement State Sens. Jim Beall, D-San Jose, and Holly Mitchell, D-Los Angeles, have called on Health Care Services Director Toby Douglas to release more complete information about doctors prescribing and children taking psych drugs. It would include numbers of foster children on multiple medications and high doses, as well as children being given drugs for "conduct disorders." Consumer Watchdog's Carmen Balber told de Sá that her group has suspected that payments by drugmakers influence prescribing practices -- "But this investigation was particularly disturbing because of the patients it affects. The conflict of interest is clear in these cases, and we think that action is long overdue." The state medical board is investigating practices in treating foster youths exposed in de Sá's earlier reports. Now it will look at prescribing patterns to see if they are unethical. High prescribers have received more than $10,000 a year on average from drug companies. And some other excesses stand out. A Sacramento doctor received more than $310,000 in speaker fees over four years. Drug marketers know that doctors listen to other doctors. Foster children's lives are controlled by the state. The system is supposed to look out for them, but the human services agencies directly responsible for these children are failing them. Lawmakers and regulatory agencies need to step up. We will continue watching. Source: http://www.mercurynews.com/opinion/ci_27029973/mercury-news-editorial-doctors-have-incentives-drug-foster

State placed disabled children with nurses untrained in their needs By Doug Donovan, The Baltimore Sun contact the reporter Medical ResearchBankruptcyJohns Hopkins University Maryland placed disabled children in home with untrained nurses The disabled foster children removed from a troubled Laurel-area group home this summer were placed by Maryland regulators in facilities whose their nurses lacked training for their complex medical needs, inspection records show. Health regulators did not learn of the training lapses — including the inability of some nurses to change breathing tubes — until they conducted an inspection nearly three weeks after moving the children. Officials were also unaware that half of the eight children ended up in emergency rooms shortly after being placed at the Prince George's County facilities operated by Second Family, the state's largest contractor for around-the-clock residential care for such children. Sun Investigates: Lives on the lineOpen link The Landover-based nonprofit was cited for violating state regulations that require contractors to report such hospital visits, for failing to properly train nursing staff and for neglect of a disabled child, according to July and August inspection records obtained by The Baltimore Sun through a Public Information Act request. "These reports look terrible," said Nancy Pineles, managing attorney for the Maryland Disability Law Center. "These kids are depending on these staff for their lives." The problems raise new questions about state oversight of the children, who suffer from conditions that can require breathing and feeding tubes. A Sun investigation has highlighted problems at both the Laurel-area apartments run by LifeLine Inc. — where 10-year-old Damaud Martin died July 2 — and the Second Family homes. The investigation, which revealed that regulators were unaware of problems at the homes, sparked reforms and a continuing examination of the regulation of such homes. Related Politics State lawmakers call for committee probe of group home death See all related 8 Second Family's president, Shilda Frost Labule, did not respond to a request for comment. A routine inspection in September by the Department of Human Resources showed that the company had corrected most of the issues related to the "huge influx of new employees in July" that was "due to emergency transfers from a defunct provider," a report states. Still, some advocates questioned why the state moved the children before Second Family's homes were ready for them. State Sen. Joan Carter Conway also questioned why a contractor paid by the state to house medically fragile children employed staff who lacked proper training. "It wouldn't make sense," said Conway, a Baltimore Democrat who chairs the Senate committee that handles health issues. "If I'm providing the care and you're paying me millions, how did I get my license and certification if my personnel and staff don't have appropriate training?" Related story: Troubles hit Maryland group home for disabled children Doug Donovan

When state officials removed several disabled foster children from an Anne Arundel County group home in early July — after a 10-year-old boy died there — they placed most of the children with Second Family, a Prince George's County nonprofit that is Maryland's largest contractor for... When state officials removed several disabled foster children from an Anne Arundel County group home in early July — after a 10-year-old boy died there — they placed most of the children with Second Family, a Prince George's County nonprofit that is Maryland's largest contractor for... (Doug Donovan) Maryland Health Secretary Dr. Joshua M. Sharfstein released the inspection reports to Conway and Del. Peter Hammen, a Baltimore Democrat who chairs the House's health committee, along with a letter co-written with Department of Human Resources Secretary Ted Dallas. The health department licenses group homes and inspects health services; Dallas' agency awards contracts and evaluates providers. The two secretaries released the records as part of an ongoing review they announced at a July 24 legislative briefing in Annapolis. The meeting was spurred by the Sun's investigation, which revealed years of problems with LifeLine. The state had awarded about $18 million in contracts since 2010 to LifeLine despite deficiencies in medical care, a founder imprisoned for arson, unpaid taxes, a bankruptcy filing, and police reports of abuse and neglect unknown to regulators. In 2011, regulators shut down LifeLine's homes for disabled adults after three residents had died, but allowed the firm to continue operating homes for children. cComments Please continue to investigate vulnerable populations. Virtually any family dealing with the inept social services agency are vulnerable. VirgilforDante at 12:21 PM November 30, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 2 At the briefing on July 24 — the same day health inspectors were discovering the emergency room visits and lack of training at the children's new homes — Sharfstein and Dallas told lawmakers they were comfortable with Second Family and two other smaller contractors that provide such services. "As far as I'm aware," Sharfstein said at the time, adding that he had asked his inspectors to "take a much closer look." But The Sun revealed in October that Second Family had its own questionable management issues — none of which were mentioned at the hearing. The nonprofit, which has been awarded at least $69 million in state contracts since 2002, fired two employees in January for slapping, kicking and pushing a mute, autistic child. Another employee was fired July 16 after a disabled child rolled off a bed whose side rail had been left down; the child suffered injuries that required a hospital trip and inspectors cited Second Family for neglect in a July 18 report. The recently released inspection records from the Office of Health Care Quality raise questions about the thoroughness of the relocation process "and whether it was safe to move them all on that date," said Pineles, whose nonprofit organization is an official monitor of state care to disabled adults and children. Asked whether state officials realized before relocating the children that Second Family's nurses lacked training, health department spokesman Christopher Garrett wrote in an email: "This type of violation is determined after a child is admitted and a care plan is set. In this case, OHCQ cited the facility for gaps in training related to the nursing needs of the newly admitted individuals." Garrett said state officials and contractors "share the common goal of quality care for medically fragile children. Pursuing this goal has involved close follow-up since this summer." State inspectors found 16 regulatory violations in three inspections during July and August at Second Family, which cares for 34 children. One inspection, which took place July 23-25, "revealed that the staff had not been trained on the medical/nursing needs of the children," the report states. It found that nursing care plans for the eight LifeLine children "have not been updated." It also cited Second Family for failing to notify state regulators about the emergency room visits by four children. Providers are required to notify the state about incidents that require a response from police, fire or emergency officials. Two of the children were admitted to the hospital for treatment. The report did not include details about the emergency treatment or where it occurred. Second Family staff told inspectors that they had tried to report the incidents but that technical issues with the reporting system thwarted their attempts. An inspector following up on July 28 reported that "the incidents still had not been reported." Another incident on Aug. 8 provided a stark example of how a lack of training can lead to problems for children who breathe through tracheostomy tubes connected to ventilators. The "trach" tubes connect to a surgically created opening in the child's windpipe and periodically need to be changed and suctioned free of saliva and other fluids. A state inspection report says Second Family's chief executive told inspectors that two licensed practical nurses "froze" when a trach tube became dislodged, and were not able to reconnect it. "The staff then called 911," the report says. Related Politics
State lawmakers call for committee probe of group home death See all related 8 The inspector's detailed, eyewitness account showed how the two nurses fumbled their way through the patient's tracheostomy care: "Upon discovering that the Trach was not the correct size, the LPNs debated about using it until [a registered nurse] intervened telling them that using the incorrect sized trach was not appropriate," the report states. The nurses searched the entire house, including two emergency bags in a supply closet, but could not find any "extra trachs." "Both LPNs then gloved and attempted to perform trach care and broke the sterile field on several occasions," the report states. cComments Please continue to investigate vulnerable populations. Virtually any family dealing with the inept social services agency are vulnerable. VirgilforDante at 12:21 PM November 30, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 2 The inspector intervened to request that the registered nurse "immediately assign the task to another nurse to ensure the child's safety." The report states that the two nurses signed a form saying they had attended training on July 28 — a session held in response to the concerns of regulators. "Mandatory!! All-Staff Training, Monday, July 28" reads a Second Family flier detailed in inspection records. But direct observation of a second procedure revealed that the two "were not able to perform trach care safely," the inspection report states. "A conversation later with the executive director revealed that [the nurses] had not attended the agency's Trach and Ventilator training," the report states. Second Family was issued a violation for lack of staff training. Department of Human Resources inspectors wrote in September that six hospital visits had been reported in the July-to-September quarter. "Four were for reattachment of the J-Tube," the report states, referring to feeding tubes that are attached to children's stomachs. "This type of visit is routine for the medically fragile population." In their recent letter to lawmakers, Sharfstein and Dallas wrote that their agencies continue to work together to oversee group homes for disabled foster children. Inspectors with the Office of Health Care Quality continue to "maintain close oversight" of Second Family, "including unannounced on-site inspections," the letter states. The Nov. 21 letter noted that the agencies plan to hire a consultant to determine the training needs of Second Family and the state's two other contractors, and to ensure that the training is completed. Sharfstein is also hiring an additional employee to directly oversee group homes for disabled foster children. "We recently determined an independent consultant could enhance the delivery of services," Garrett wrote in his email. "The consultant will provide additional education, training, and support." State officials met with Second Family officials on Nov. 14 to discuss the organization's plans to correct the deficiencies cited in inspections. "These plans show that Second Family, Inc., is working to improve training and compliance in several areas," the letter states. Sharfstein submitted a five-point plan last month to the lawmakers, calling for ways to improve the oversight of group homes. He also started a task force that will report by late January on recommendations for more improvements. Dallas' agency created a form that all providers must fill out to alert regulators when significant financial problems such as bankruptcy and unpaid taxes arise. Both secretaries have acknowledged that their agencies must improve how they monitor financial problems before they affect quality of care. LifeLine experienced many of those problems throughout 2013 and this year. Sharfstein has announced that he is leaving in January to work at the Johns Hopkins University's Bloomberg School of Public Health, so the next health secretary will have to tackle the issue. Damaud's death may also have further legal ramifications. The state medical examiner last month ruled his death a homicide caused by head trauma that the boy suffered in 2008, before LifeLine began caring for him. His mother was convicted of child abuse after entering an Alford plea, which means she did not admit guilt but acknowledged that city prosecutors had enough evidence to convict her. The full autopsy has not been released because law enforcement officials are still involved in a homicide investigation. ddonovan@baltsun.com Source: <http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/sun-investigates/bs-md-second-family-inspections-20141129-story.html#page=2>

Food shortage, mold, rat droppings: Problems plague two Costa Mesa group homes BY JENNA CHANDLER 2014-11-28 21:58:34 COSTA MESA — The group home for adults with developmental disabilities on Knox Street seemed promising. It offered Katherine Slikker's adult daughter, who has epilepsy, a rare slice of independence: a bedroom to herself. So for the past two years, Slikker paid the standard monthly rate of $2,271 to the company running the Costa Mesa home, California Community Care Facilities Inc. The fee was to cover her daughter's rent and food and other services, such as around-the-clock care, transportation and medication management. But when the woman the company paid to coordinate those services left in May and the company's owner, Steven Ness, took on her responsibilities, Slikker said her 53-year-old daughter and other residents began missing appointments because they weren't getting rides. Utility companies disconnected the TV cable and phone line because the bills were not paid. Over the past several months, their monthly allowances weren't made available to them. "He would promise you the moon and do nothing," Slikker, 79, said. A second home operated by Ness about a quarter of a mile away on Magnolia Street also had problems: scarce food, mold in bathrooms, rodent droppings in a pantry and beds without linens, according to a Register review of state documents. Now Ness is facing nearly $7,000 in fines and his license is under review, according to the California Department of Social Services. In a recent interview, Ness explained the issues as a result of circumstance and logistical problems. "Quite honestly, it was just a matter of timing. I was going through some personal issues in my life," Ness said. "Unfortunately, just for me, there wasn't enough time to do it. They would argue probably against that, and

I understand that. I couldn't get it done fast enough." The homes are empty now. At the urging of the local regulating agency, the Regional Center of Orange County, all of the residents have moved out. The moves happened suddenly, putting stress on residents and their families. Those who lived on Knox were left to wonder if they would get back the allowance money provided by their families, about $130 each per month, that Ness was required to have on hand. "We took his ledgers and are trying to figure out exactly what he owes," said Larry Landauer, executive director of the Regional Center. "It appears it's going to be substantial." 'FRUSTRATING' Ness said he is considering relinquishing his license. The license is from the Community Care Licensing Division of the California Department of Social Services for a residential facility for adults, ages 18 to 59, with autism, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, Down syndrome and other developmental and intellectual disabilities. There are about 400 such homes across Orange County with varying levels of care. "The issues found throughout the facility are not common at all. This is very frustrating," Landauer said. "We want consumers to have stable lives and be in safe environments." Since December 2013, the regional center has found issues at eight homes. Ness' were the only ones that rose to the level of advising families to leave, according to Landauer. LIST OF VIOLATIONS Ness, who is facing $6,950 in penalties from the California Department of Social Services, refutes most of the inspection reports. He said he had kept $200, or about one-quarter of the total allowance money, on hand and had put the rest at his Long Beach residence for safekeeping. He said he would turn it over to the regional center soon. Ness was first cited in March for leaving the front and back yard of the Magnolia property in disarray. Inspectors noted weeds, loose wires, bags of recycling and a tree in need of trimming. He eventually cleaned the yard, but in the summer and fall, new issues cropped up, according to state records reviewed by the Register. • In August, inspectors cited Ness for not having adequate staffing after the caregiver reported that she was on duty six days alone with no other help. They also found mold in the bathrooms, though Ness said his landlord, not him, was responsible for cleaning the mold. • During several visits in October and November, inspectors found rotting carrots, no fresh fruit or juices and no milk or bread. The refrigerator did not have a proper seal. • Several beds were missing sheets or the linens were stained. Two bathrooms smelled of urine and in one bedroom, instead blinds or curtains, a sheet was strung over a window. • There were spiders in the hallway and rodent droppings in the pantry. There was mildew in one bathroom and peeling, mildewed wallpaper and a curling gift ribbon was used for a drawer handle in another restroom. • A van to take residents on outings and to appointments and work needed maintenance, had expired tags, and the caregiver did not have a license to drive it. Residents reported they did not have access to their allowances. Nancy Leventhal's daughter lived at the Magnolia house. "It was like from the dark ages, it was so bad," she said. "I was frustrated and felt bad for my daughter and the other clients because it started out to be a really nice place." More often than not, the problems went unfixed, and Ness repeatedly missed follow-up appointments with inspectors, according to state records. "It's just a business that didn't go well," Ness said. FAMILIES TRY TO ADJUST A spokesman for the Department of Social Services would not comment on whether the agency was considering taking away Ness' license but said, in general, a history of repeated violations can cause a license to be revoked. The five residents at Magnolia moved out Nov. 6, followed by the six at Knox on Tuesday, when inspectors found a three-day eviction notice posted to the door. Ness said he was "absolutely not" behind on his rent payments. Residents at the Magnolia home had already paid for November room and board, and Ness said he had put reimbursement checks in the mail last week, but the two Magnolia home parents interviewed for this story have not received the money. "It's very disrupting ... most of them are scared, I know my daughter was. She cried and cried and cried," Slikker said. "I told her it was better this way because if it's not being run correctly, we'll find a place that is." Before the regional center intervened, Melinda Fliff was already planning to remove her 50-year-old daughter from the Magnolia house. She brought her daughter home to live with her and her 88-year-old husband in Laguna Woods. "It's hard for us to maintain and manage," Fliff said. "It's a lot of additional work." For Fliff, the first sign that the situation at the Magnolia house was deteriorating was a lack of food. "It was fillers: Top Ramen noodles, rice with chopped-up carrots and something in it, a medley, and a little bit of coleslaw, but nothing was substance, nothing was protein, vegetables and fruit." The bathroom was "filthy dirty" too, she said, there were no knobs on the door handles, no soap and no paper towels or toilet paper. "It was very disturbing," she said. "Steven (Ness) kept telling me things were going to turn around. Well, they never did." Contact the writer: jchandler@ocregister.com and @jennakchandler on Twitter Source: <http://www.ocregister.com/articles/ness-643736-daughter-magnolia.html>

County home to close Last updated: November 28, 2014 11:01AM - 766 Views By Nathan Pilling - npilling@civitasmedia.com Nathan Pilling | Greene County NewsThe Alpha Group Home Photo Nathan Pilling | Greene County NewsThe Alpha Group Home Story Tools: Font Size: Social Media: Tweet BEAVERCREEK — Greene County's last congregate living program for children in the custody of Greene County Children Services is closing after many years of operation. While no definite date for the Alpha Group Home's close has been set, it will close "sometime soon," according to Director of Greene County Department of Job & Family Services Beth Rubin. The program — currently housed at an aging building located in Alpha, Beavercreek, just off of US Route 35 — is closing down because of a number of factors: the US Route 35 expansion project (the home sits close to the highway currently), the need for numerous repairs at the building (an estimate put the amount of repairs needed at $125,000) and the declining number of residents at the home (as the county moves away from congregational living programs to other methods of housing). Before deciding to shut down the program, the county looked at building a new facility, which would have cost about $500,000, according to Greene County Administrator Brandon Huddleson. "Then we looked at what are our other options and how are we doing?" he said. "It caused us to look at the entire program holistically: What kind of outcomes are we getting? Where is the industry going?" With that look, it made sense to close the home in favor of other methods. "There's been a trend for many years both in Greene County and across the state to close group homes, because they're just not the model of service any longer," Rubin said. "Very few counties in Ohio still operate group homes. We were one of the last ones to have one open. That makes it particularly hard for us to close it, because we've got this tradition of having this group home and a lot of pride in the services that it provided." Greene County Children Services previously operated group homes in Fairborn, Xenia and Bellbrook, all of which have been closed over the years. Rubin said the county is focused on finding other types of permanent living arrangements for children, such as reunification with their parents when possible, adoptive placement and foster or kinship placements. "Those are more ideal than a congregate living arrangement," she said. She also said Children Services will focus more on its Independent Living Program, which serves children age 14 and older by helping to prepare them for emancipation when they turn 18. The group home currently houses three teenage boys, one of which will emancipate in about a month, according to Rubin. The other two boys will be moved alternative placements. Rubin said the county is working with the home's seven full-time employees to help them find employment before the it closes. According to Huddleson, the building will be marketed for sale once it is closed. "I think all of our staff are sad to see it go," Rubin said. "Even though we know that it makes the most sense to close the program ... we still certainly have emotional ties to this building and this program. It's sad for all of us to see it go." Reach Nathan Pilling at 937-502-4498 or on Twitter @XDGNatePilling. Source: http://www.xeniazette.com/news/home_top/150666822/County-home-to-close

New Nebraska Foster Care Review Released By: WOWT 6 News Email Updated: Mon 2:28 PM, Dec 01, 2014 By: WOWT 6 News Email Home / News / Headlines List / Article Related Links to view the complete report click here The Foster Care Review Office has released its annual report concerning Nebraska Foster Care. This report contains independent data and analysis of the child welfare system in the fiscal year July 1, 2013 to June 30, 2014 with recommendations for system improvements. During fiscal year 2013-14, a total of 5,466 Nebraska children (not counting youth under OJS or the Office of Probation Administration) were in out-of-home care for some portion of their life. Improvements · In 97% of the cases reviewed there was documentation that caseworkers had contact with the children in the 60 days prior to the case file review. The FCRO commends DHHS for improving the documentation of this vital safety indicator. (See page 31). · There is more collaboration and problem-solving amongst child welfare system stakeholders. Issues: · Since the mandated transfer of DHHS-OJS youth to the Office of Probation Administration, reports on youth under Probation have not been provided to the FCRO tracking system due to a conflicting interpretation of statutes. The FCRO is working with the Office of Probation Administration and with members of the Legislature that plan to introduce a bill in the 2015 Legislative session. In the meantime, the statistics in this report do not include children under the Office of Probation Administration or children that have yet to transfer from DHHS-OJS. This makes comparisons of trends difficult, because OJS youth were included in most past out-of-home care measures. · 44 (6%) of the reviewed children that re-entered out-of-home care had been adopted prior to re-entering out-of-home care. (See page 71). · 68 (10%) of the reviewed children that re-entered out-of-home care had been in a finalized guardianship prior to re-entering out-of-home care. (page 71) · In 33% of the cases reviewed the DHHS case plan was incomplete or outdated. · 51% of school-aged children reviewed were either not on target in school or the FCRO was unable to determine if they were on target. (See page 104). · There are still deficits with many types of documentation. Examples, whether foster parents were given health and educational records, whether children were receiving needed medical/dental treatments, sibling contacts, receipt of services, etc. The Executive summary includes the following recommendations: · Amend Nebraska statutes to permit the FCRO to review

children during the critical first six months after being returned to the parental home. · Amend Nebraska statutes to permit the FCRO to review all youth placed on probation that are in the out-of-home placements. · Ensure that the rights of fathers are appropriately addressed by all stakeholders and the courts from the time of removal. There has been an increase in the identification of fathers but not in including them in the juvenile court action or as a placement for the child. Do not wait until it is clear that the mother cannot or will not safely parent before addressing the father's rights. · Work with the Nebraska Children's Commission and other stakeholders to develop relevant and appropriate child well-being indicators. There needs to be the ability to assure that children are better off when they exit the child-welfare system than when they entered. Analytic software would help with this endeavor To view the complete report click on the link included with this story. Source: <http://www.wowt.com/news/headlines/New-Nebraska-Foster-Care-Review-Released-284370651.html>

--> Judge says trying is not enough for foster care Last Monday at 6:15 AM in Local Photo: clipart.com 1 1 0 0 KGMI News Reporting By Peter Wagner BELLINGHAM, Wash. – It's been a decade since the state Department of Social and Health Services agreed to numerous foster care reforms after news that some foster children weren't being cared for properly by the agency. In Whatcom County Superior court recently, the agency argued that getting close to those reform goals was good enough. DSHS says nine of their 21 reforms have been completed, and that trying should count for something. Judge Charles Snyder didn't agree and gave a firm timeline for the state to finish implementing the reforms. Those reforms will cost more money, which DSHS says they'll be asking the legislature for next year. - See more at: <http://kgmi.com/news/007700-judge-says-trying-is-not-enough-for-foster-care/#sthash.DROldUtdpuf>

The kid was in Totem Town for burglary. He died in a stolen car. By Mara H. Gottfried mgottfried@pioneerpress.com Posted: 12/01/2014 12:01:00 AM CST Updated: 12/02/2014 05:04:56 PM CST John McAfee, the 15-year-old who crashed this car and died after fleeing from St. Paul police last week, had run away from Boys Totem Town a few hours earlier. Police said they were pursuing the car early Wednesday, Nov. 26, 2014, because it had been stolen. (Photo courtesy of Fox 9 News) John McAfee III, 15, of St. Paul -- pictured in April 2014 -- died Nov. 26 after crashing a stolen car during a police chase. (Photo courtesy of Nicole Tisdale) A 15-year-old who died in a stolen car crash while fleeing St. Paul police last week was on the run from Boys Totem Town, his family said Monday. "I'm not condoning what he did, but I don't believe my son deserved a death penalty for stealing a car," said John McAfee III's mother, Nicole Tisdale. Police gave chase when McAfee was spotted in the stolen car about 2 1/2 hours after he slipped away from the unlocked St. Paul residential center for troubled teens about 9:30 p.m. Nov. 25. Tisdale said Monday that she and the boy's father have questions about what happened to their son. "I will get to the bottom of it," she said. "I'm not going to give up." Police said their investigation was continuing, but a spokesman said pursuing officers didn't know the driver was 15. McAfee, who was born and raised in St. Paul, had been living with his family in the Dayton's Bluff area for about five years. He had many friends, loved to sketch and was "very smart," his mother said, adding that his grades had slipped as he became interested in girls. He had aspired to be an architect, said Joseph Irving, McAfee's stepfather. McAfee was a 10th-grader at Humboldt High School before he was sent to Ramsey County's Totem Town, a residential treatment center where juvenile males convicted of crimes can be sent. McAfee had been close with his uncle, who died of cancer in 2010, and the young man struggled after that and got in trouble, Tisdale said. "I don't understand why John picked the road that he picked, because he has a big, loving family," Tisdale said. Advertisement McAfee was on probation in a theft case, and he'd been sentenced to Totem Town for four to nine months for a burglary, Irving said. He'd arrived at the juvenile center Nov. 4. McAfee had been "doing very well at Boys Totem Town," according to Chris Crutchfield, Ramsey County Community Corrections spokesman. "He'd been very helpful," he said, adding there were no indications that McAfee would run." But last Tuesday, as the young men at Totem Town were preparing for bed about 9:30 p.m., McAfee ran out a side door of a dorm, Crutchfield said. Opening the door tripped an alarm. Staff pursued McAfee to the edge of the property, which is their standard procedure, Crutchfield said. When they didn't catch him, they contacted St. Paul police. Totem Town is intended as an alternative to a more punitive state lockup; it is not locked or gated and staff is with youth at all times, Crutchfield said. The boys who are sent to Totem Town attend school there and participate in activities on- and off-site, Crutchfield said. "The care of our young people, keeping them safe and working with them, is something we take very seriously," Crutchfield said. Tisdale said she received a call from Totem Town last Tuesday night, reporting that her son had run away. "I wanted to get to the bottom of why was it so easy for him to run," Tisdale said. "If you removed him from my house, why did you put him in a facility that he can run from and where boys have been running from since the beginning of time? Why is it so easy for these boys to get away from there?" Community Corrections is conducting a review of how McAfee got away and how to prevent such incidents from recurring, Crutchfield said. There have been 31 instances of males running away from Totem Town this year, which Crutchfield said is about average. Totem Town is in St. Paul's Battle Creek neighborhood, a couple of miles from where a car was stolen Tuesday night in the 2000 block of Suburban Avenue. Police on patrol in downtown St. Paul found someone driving that car about midnight Tuesday. They followed it with red lights and sirens on. The driver fled, passed other cars and went into opposite lanes of traffic, according to police. It was a short pursuit, said Sgt. Paul Paulos, St. Paul police spokesman. McAfee reached an estimated 80 mph, according to emergency-radio traffic of the incident posted by Minnesota Police Clips. Police are investigating the driver's speed, Paulos said Monday. Police said that officers lost sight of the car as McAfee continued south on Robert Street but soon found the car had crashed into a commercial building that houses Captain Ken's Foods at 344 S. Robert St. on the West Side. Tisdale said she had not taught her son to drive and he hadn't taken driving lessons. She thinks he must have been scared because "police were chasing him in so many cars," Tisdale said. "I'm wondering why they didn't stop the pursuit and just block the roads. I'm pretty sure they could tell he was a young boy." But Paulos said officers could not tell the driver's age. Police had received a report about McAfee running away from Totem Town, though the officers involved in the pursuit were unaware of that case and didn't know the driver was McAfee, Paulos said. Tisdale saw a photo of the smashed-up car on a news station's website and couldn't believe that striking a building would have caused so much damage to the car. There was no visible structural damage to the building. Based on the amount of damage to the car, Tisdale said she believes officers used their squads to block McAfee's car and struck it with their squads. Paulos said on Monday that officers did not hit McAfee's car and that the squad cars were undamaged. When Tisdale and Irving were notified of the crash and got to Regions Hospital, they were told McAfee had a brain injury, broken neck and severed spine, Tisdale said. "They kept him on life support until the rest of the family could come and say their goodbyes," she said. McAfee died at the hospital later Wednesday. His funeral will be Saturday. "I don't want him to be remembered as a bad kid," Tisdale said. "He was a good, spirited kid who loved helping people. ... He's a teenager that made mistakes, just like a lot of other teenagers." Mara H. Gottfried can be reached at 651-228-5262. Follow her at twitter.com/MaraGottfried. Source: http://www.twincities.com/crime/ci_27046370/st-paul-teen-who-died-after-fleeing-chase

Residents say group home conditions were deplorable Owner of group home arrested December 2nd, 2014 Monday - Residents who live on the street near a Northside group home where 10 physically and mentally handicapped residents between the ages of 46 and 62 were found locked inside said the conditions there were horrible. Quick Clicks False imprisonment arrest Atakelte Admasu (pictured below), the owner of the group home, was arrested and charged with false imprisonment and negligence of disabled adults. The Jacksonville Sheriff's Office said the rooming house at 1346 Agnes St. was previously licensed as a group home, but that the business license fee hadn't been paid since 2011. Residents in the area said people would walk up and down the street looking for food, waiting for food and going through the garbage looking for food because they weren't getting it at the group homes. Calvin Winters lived in a group home across the street from the one that was shut down. His family said he was part of the group at the house and has mental issues. "What was it like in there?" News4Jax's Jim Piggott asked. "Hell," Winters said. "No hot water, no cold water, nothing." "Was there food?" Piggott asked. "No, I brought it out of the dumpster," Winters said. Residents said those in the group home were wearing the same clothes all week long. They said the home being exposed will be for the good of everyone and the neighborhood will improve. When firefighters and police arrived at the home, they found padlocked gates, food cabinets locked and deplorable conditions. Admasu said he locked doors and gates for the safety of residents. But the Department of Children and Families and the Agency for Health Care Administration did not see it that way. They are still investigating. "In a case like this, there are a lot of people we are going to need to talk to, including the people who are living there, friends and relatives and anyone else with direct operating knowledge of this facility," DCF spokesman John Harrell said. The facility was licensed by the Agency for Health Care Administration. Group homes are inspected every two years. This home was inspected a year ago and had some issues with staff training. The same training issues were documented in January and March and cleared in April. The latest situation shut the home down last week. Source: <http://www.news4jax.com/news/residents-say-group-home-conditions-were-deplorable/30021646>

New Nebraska Foster Care Review Released By: WOWT 6 News Email Updated: Mon 2:28 PM, Dec 01, 2014 By: WOWT 6 News Email Home / Headlines List / Article Related Links to view the complete report click here The Foster Care Review Office has released its annual report concerning Nebraska Foster Care. This report contains independent data and analysis of the child welfare system in the fiscal year July 1, 2013 to June 30, 2014 with recommendations for system improvements. During fiscal year 2013-14, a total of 5,466 Nebraska children (not counting youth under OJS or the Office of

Probation Administration) were in out-of-home care for some portion of their life. Improvements · In 97% of the cases reviewed there was documentation that caseworkers had contact with the children in the 60 days prior to the case file review. The FCRO commends DHHS for improving the documentation of this vital safety indicator. (See page 31). · There is more collaboration and problem-solving amongst child welfare system stakeholders. Issues: · Since the mandated transfer of DHHS-OJS youth to the Office of Probation Administration, reports on youth under Probation have not been provided to the FCRO tracking system due to a conflicting interpretation of statutes. The FCRO is working with the Office of Probation Administration and with members of the Legislature that plan to introduce a bill in the 2015 Legislative session. In the meantime, the statistics in this report do not include children under the Office of Probation Administration or children that have yet to transfer from DHHS-OJS. This makes comparisons of trends difficult, because OJS youth were included in most past out-of-home care measures. · 44 (6%) of the reviewed children that re-entered out-of-home care had been adopted prior to re-entering out-of-home care. (See page 71). · 68 (10%) of the reviewed children that re-entered out-of-home care had been in a finalized guardianship prior to re-entering out-of-home care. (page 71) · In 33% of the cases reviewed the DHHS case plan was incomplete or outdated. · 51% of school-aged children reviewed were either not on target in school or the FCRO was unable to determine if they were on target. (See page 104). · There are still deficits with many types of documentation. Examples, whether foster parents were given health and educational records, whether children were receiving needed medical/dental treatments, sibling contacts, receipt of services, etc. The Executive summary includes the following recommendations: · Amend Nebraska statutes to permit the FCRO to review children during the critical first six months after being returned to the parental home. · Amend Nebraska statutes to permit the FCRO to review all youth placed on probation that are in the out-of-home placements. · Ensure that the rights of fathers are appropriately addressed by all stakeholders and the courts from the time of removal. There has been an increase in the identification of fathers but not in including them in the juvenile court action or as a placement for the child. Do not wait until it is clear that the mother cannot or will not safely parent before addressing the father's rights. · Work with the Nebraska Children's Commission and other stakeholders to develop relevant and appropriate child well-being indicators. There needs to be the ability to assure that children are better off when they exit the child-welfare system than when they entered. Analytic software would help with this endeavor To view the complete report click on the link included with this story. Source: <http://www.wowt.com/home/headlines/New-Nebraska-Foster-Care-Review-Released-284370651.html>

Task Force Releases Foster Care Recommendations By: Mitch Goulding 12/01/2014 06:37 PM Share This Facebook Tweet Email Text size: ± TWC News: Task Force Releases Foster Care Recommendations Play now Time Warner Cable video customers: Sign in with your TWC ID to access our video clips. Sign in Get my TWC ID Get TWC service Read the FAQ To view our videos, you need to enable JavaScript. Learn how. install Adobe Flash 9 or above. Install now. Then come back here and refresh the page. For more than a year, Williamson County Commissioner Lisa Birkman has been working to increase communication between Williamson County's child advocacy groups. "There's a lot of different ways recommended to fix it, but it needs to be fixed," Birkman said. "There's a lot of different agencies, government, non-government and faith-based that work with foster care kids in Williamson County, and until now, there was not really a lot of coordination amongst them." That is until she kicked off a county-wide task force in September which brought many of those agencies together in one room. After three months of meetings, the group released a report identifying the two biggest problems as a lack of communication and coordination between agencies and a lack of support for parents, both biological and foster. The report will soon land in the laps of legislators who are already scrutinizing Child Protective Services at the state level. "We're meeting together to kind of see where we are and what the common area is, the common grounds are and how we can accomplish those goals," Republican Rep. Larry Gonzales said. "We have a long way to go still. The legislative process is a long one." State Representative Larry Gonzales sits on the Sunset Review Committee. It will make its own recommendations to improve CPS early next year. "A lot of what you hear people clamoring for are already in statute or already in the root. They're not being followed," Gonzales said. "The question is 'Why aren't they being followed?'" It's a question Gonzales says state legislators are still looking into and though Birkman's group has released its own report, it's a conversation she plans to continue both locally and with state lawmakers. County leaders will present the full report to the public Tuesday. Both presentations will take place at the Williamson County Courthouse, first at 9:30 a.m. and then again at 3 p.m. - See more at: <http://austin.twcnews.com/content/news/310029/task-force-releases-foster-care-recommendations/#sthash.ITNe0Vig.dpuf>

Michigan asks federal judge to end oversight of child foster care By Rick Pluta · Dec 2, 2014 Share Twitter Facebook Google+ Email Michigan wants out from under the court-ordered oversight of the foster care system. Credit iRon leSs / flickr Michigan says it wants out from under court-ordered oversight of the state's child foster care system. The Michigan Department of Human Services filed a motion today with the U.S. District Court in Detroit. Bob Wheaton is with the DHS. He says the state spends $1 million a year in compliance costs that could be used for other things. Without federal oversight, Wheaton wants to see the money used on federal monitors for some higher-priority areas. "We could do things like expand our family reunification program services, which are designed to avoid foster care placements. We could nearly double families served by our abuse and prevention programs. There are things like that." The state was sued in 2006 by the group Children's Rights because caseloads were too high, and too few children were finding permanent homes. No word yet on how the group will respond to the state's motion. Source: <http://michiganradio.org/post/michigan-asks-federal-judge-end-oversight-child-foster-care>

Tribune uncovers shocking state failure to protect kids Wednesday, Dec 3, 2014 * Tribune... In residential treatment centers across Illinois, children are assaulted, sexually abused and running away by the thousands — yet state officials fail to act on reports of harm and continue sending waves of youths to the most troubled and violent facilities, a Tribune investigation found. At a cost to taxpayers of well over $200 million per year, the residential centers promise round-the-clock supervision and therapy to state wards with histories of abuse and neglect, as well as other disadvantaged youths with mental health and behavioral problems. On any given day, about 1,400 wards live in the centers, although far more cycle through each year. In the best cases, the facilities rebuild and even save young lives. But the Tribune found that many underprivileged youths — most of them African-American — are shuttled for years from one grim institution to another before emerging more damaged than when they went in. * Just one example... At Indian Oaks, which specializes in treating children who have endured sexual trauma, the Tribune identified 17 reports of sexual assault or abuse during a 21/2-year period starting in September 2011. Facility reports to DCFS and police dismissed nearly half of those incidents as consensual, even when alleged victims were not old enough to consent or had cognitive impairments. * And... The state's beleaguered child welfare agency, which has had four directors in the past year and seen its budget sliced by more than 10 percent since 2009, is more than a year behind in analyzing facility performance records that show how many days kids go on the run from each center, or are sent to jail or psychiatric hospitals. Go read the whole thing, but prepare to be thoroughly disgusted. - Posted by Rich Miller Source: <http://capitolfax.com/2014/12/03/tribune-uncovers-shocking-state-failure-to-protect-kids/>

Children attacked, abused at taxpayer-funded living centers By David Jackson, Gary Marx, Duaa Eldeib, Tribune reporters In residential treatment centers across Illinois, children are assaulted, sexually abused and running away by the thousands — yet state officials fail to act on reports of harm and continue sending waves of youths to the most troubled and violent facilities, a Tribune investigation found. At a cost to taxpayers of well over $200 million per year, the residential centers promise round-the-clock supervision and therapy to state wards with histories of abuse and neglect, as well as other disadvantaged youths with mental health and behavioral problems. On any given day, about 1,400 wards live in the centers, although far more cycle through each year. In the best cases, the facilities rebuild and even save young lives. But the Tribune found that many underprivileged youths — most of them African-American — are shuttled for years from one grim institution to another before emerging more damaged than when they went in. Reports of patient-on-patient sexual assault are commonplace at some of Illinois' largest and most relied-on facilities. Child prostitution schemes take root. Vulnerable children are terrorized by older ones and taught a life of crime. Some are preyed on sexually by the adults paid to care for them. And staggering numbers of wards, some as young as 10, flee to the streets. In the three years from 2011 through 2013, Illinois residential facilities sent the state Department of Children and Family Services 428 reports alleging a ward was sexually assaulted or abused while in their care, according to DCFS records not previously made public. The facilities submitted an additional 1,052 reports that a ward was physically assaulted during those three years — in some instances by staff but usually by a peer. And facilities notified DCFS of 29,425 incidents when a ward ran away or went missing. That is an average of nearly 27 runaway reports a day among wards in Illinois facilities. Out on the streets where they had no family, friends, money or life skills, some runaways committed carjackings, armed robberies and home break-ins, the Tribune investigation found. Others fell victim to gang rapes and sex trafficking. Placed in state protective custody at age 14 after she was kicked out of her home at gunpoint and then sexually assaulted, Singleton was sent in 2012 to the 112-bed Indian Oaks Academy in Manteno, Ill. There she was attacked by peers, repeatedly bullied and taunted, government reports show. Over the next year, Singleton ran away at least 11 times, government records show. She said she survived by prostituting herself in Chicago. Indian Oaks discharged her earlier "I'm hurting," she said. "I hate living like this, but the world isn't fair, and I have to make my way." Operated by nonprofit agencies, for-profit firms or religious charities, Illinois' roughly 50 residential centers range in size from 10 to 150 beds and are spread from the North Side of Chicago to the farmland of southern Illinois. Some are large dormitories that occupy former state-run asylums and orphanages, while others are campuses lined with cottages. The violent conditions inside these facilities have largely been hidden until now because strict juvenile privacy laws shield basic reports of harm to youths from the public, the media and even many government regulators. Reporters pierced the secrecy by gathering more than 10,000 pages of confidential juvenile case files from sources across the state, and also using public records laws to get police and state monitoring reports. The Tribune also compiled internal DCFS data on facility discharge outcomes and rates of key events like runaways, detentions of youths, assaults and sexual abuse. Taken together, the records provide an unprecedented look at the chaos, drug abuse, violence and victimization within many of the taxpayer-financed centers. Serious child safety breaches emerged at facilities throughout the state, including several of the most respected institutions, the records showed. The Tribune's investigation centered on three of Illinois' most relied-on centers where officials continued to send wards despite persistent patterns of violence, sexual victimization and runaway episodes. •At the 48-bed Lawrence Hall Youth Services facility on Chicago's Northwest Side, young residents squared off in gang fights, coerced peers into sex, smoked marijuana in front of staff and routinely walked out of the facility to work as prostitutes, break into apartments, steal cars and rob passers-by, records show. DCFS kept sending in young wards even as the nonprofit lagged well behind other facilities in the department's performance measures. At the 59-bed Rock River Academy in Rockford, a facility for girls, former residents described being pummeled by peers upon arrival. During the most recent nine-month period, Rock River filed reports of aggressive behavior by state wards more frequently than any of the 50 Illinois facilities where DCFS places children and teens, according to a review of DCFS records. •At Indian Oaks, which specializes in treating children who have endured sexual trauma, the Tribune identified 17 reports of sexual assault or abuse during a 21/2-year period starting in September 2011. Facility reports to DCFS and police dismissed nearly half of those incidents as consensual, even when alleged victims were not old enough to consent or had cognitive impairments. When young wards are hurt, the Tribune found, police and state officials rarely share their investigative reports with each other, making it difficult to uncover patterns of abuse and act aggressively to protect children. The state's beleaguered child welfare agency, which has had four directors in the past year and seen its budget sliced by more than 10 percent since 2009, is more than a year behind in analyzing facility performance records that show how many days kids go on the run from each center, or are sent to jail or psychiatric hospitals. And DCFS does little to analyze or act on Unusual Incident Reports that facilities are required to submit whenever a ward is hurt or put in harm's way while in their care. "If you were getting these reports as a parent, you would be up in arms about the facility," said Cook County Public Guardian Robert Harris, whose office has filed court motions to remove individual wards from residential facilities for their safety. DCFS acting Director Bobbie Gregg said she was outraged and disappointed to hear the Tribune's findings, adding that she was not aware youths were repeatedly sent back to facilities plagued by assaults, sexual abuse and runaways. "What you're describing is not something that has been brought to my attention, but it is something that ... we should look into," Gregg said. "Whenever any of our children are harmed in our custody, I'm not satisfied." The Tribune provided DCFS with its findings before interviewing Gregg. At that interview she said she had begun exploring ways to safeguard wards in residential treatment. Although the agency has 16 employees monitoring such facilities, Gregg said she plans to require more stringent oversight of the Unusual Incident Reports sent by the centers. Acknowledging that the department does not have the ability to analyze those reports to quickly spot patterns, she said she was planning data upgrades. "I, too, am frustrated that it takes us too long to get data to be able to make meaningful changes in our system," she said. "Like so many things, it's a question of resources." She said she has set a goal of moving 165 wards from residential facilities to foster homes by Jan. 31. "Children should be raised in homes with families and not in institutional centers," she said. Source: <http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/watchdog/rte/ct-youth-treatment-crisis-new-met-20141203-story.html?dssReturnPage=1&z=37211>

Artesia foster parent sentenced to 15 years for molesting child in his care Police say victim was young girl placed in his care by state By Jessica Onsurez jonsurez@currentargus.com @JussGREAT on Twitter Posted: 12/04/2014 09:44:43 AM MST ARTESIA >> A little girl named "Sparkle" got justice Monday when her Artesia foster dad was sentenced to 15 years in prison for molesting her. Fifth Judicial District Court Judge Raymond Romero sentenced 39-year-old Todd Harper to 15 years in prison, negating a no contest plea agreement with the defendant by the District Attorney's Office. Judges are not required to follow the plea agreement. Harper was charged with one count of criminal sexual contact of a minor in the second degree for a child under 13. He pleaded no contest to the charge stemming from a 2013 investigation into allegations that he inappropriately touched the 7-year-old girl placed in his home by the state. "Sparkle," as the victim was dubbed by Guardians of the Children, an organization that advocates protections for children, to protect her identity, was placed in temporary foster care with Harper's family in May 2013. A spokesman for the Guardians of the Children said the sentence fit the "heinous crime." Harper's sentence includes credit for 69 days of time served and parole following his release for five years to life. Harper will also be required to register as a sex offender. According to the criminal complaint, the child told investigators that Harper had "tickled her where he wasn't suppose to." The complaint states that when asked to explain, the girl reportedly told investigators that Harper had used his hand to touch her private parts underneath her clothes and in one instance had her touch his genitals. Advertisement When interviewed by investigators, Harper said "it was a one-time thing and that it was a mistake," according to the complaint. Harper later told investigators this happened several times over the summer. It's a situation that the New Mexico Department of Children, Youth and Families said is rare in New Mexico foster homes. Public Information Office Henry Varela said that candidates for foster parents undergo extensive background checks and get home checks before having a child placed in their care. "It is a very uncommon situation to see abuse and neglect in terms of foster parent to child," Varela said. In cases in which they do receive a report of abuse or neglect, Varela said children are immediately removed from the home and an investigation is initiated. Jessica Onsurez can be reached at 575-491-4682. Source: http://www.currentargus.com/carlsbad-news/ci_27066729/artesia-foster-parent-sentenced-15-years-molesting-child

Harsh Treatment: Violence, runaways plague Utah facility for troubled youth By Medill Watchdog on December 2, 2014 By John Seasley and Alice Li First in a series of articles documenting the nationwide troubles of facilities meant to help youth with behavioral, emotional problems Police reports give a glimpse into what goes on behind the locked doors of Provo Canyon School. Boys and girls as young as eight hurt each other, themselves and staff members. They engage in sex acts, consensual and non-consensual. They try to run away. A Medill Watchdog investigation revealed a striking pattern of potential danger to the troubled youth sent for treatment – often at public expense – to the Utah residential treatment center, one of the nation's oldest and largest. Since 2011, police have responded more than once a week, on average, to one of the three campuses that collectively make up Provo Canyon School, which collectively can care for 274 youth at any time. The calls include at least 56 reports of assault and 25 reports of sex offenses. Five former staff members charged with caring for the youth confirm in separate interviews the picture of an institution where violence is common. They say that many of the youth, some of whom come from gangs or other violent backgrounds, regularly lash out at each other for trivial or imagined slights. They describe troubled youth who seek ways to self-harm, scratching themselves with carpet staples and cutting themselves with broken glass. Residents threaten and attack staff. At times, as at treatment centers across the country, the youth try to escape. The agency was put on probation for one well-publicized 2012 incident, when a boy escaped, stole a car and caused a fatal accident. But even after that, the incidents continued. Within four months another boy escaped, stole a truck and traveled more than 2,000 miles home to Washington, D.C. In February 2014, a girl ran away to a nearby gas station where, she later reported, she had sex with a truck driver. As troubling as the reports are, the Medill Watchdog investigation found the reports may not be a full picture. The probe, which included a review of state inspection reports, court records and police calls to the facility; and interviews with staff and former staff, former residents and their parents, police, attorneys and state officials, found on occasion incidents being reported belatedly. And state officials who oversee the agency have criticized the agency for reports that do not fully detail what happened during incidents. Medill Watchdog obtained more than 1,000 pages of documents during its investigation of Provo Canyon School. (Medill Watchdog/Robin Amer) In one incident, an emergency room nurse called police, concerned by the condition of a resident who was brought in with a black eye and a broken nose. The assigned police officer wrote in his report that he called the facility and instructed the receptionist that the assault should have been reported. In another case, the mother of one former resident said in an interview that it was only after she insisted that police were belatedly called about an incident in which her son was beaten unconscious and taken to the emergency room. In a third case, the mother of a resident twice called police frustrated because, she said, she was told by a staff member at the school that her son was bleeding after being assaulted by another resident. The police report states the woman "wants to press charges, the school is refusing to give her information about the fight." Eleven days later, the police records show, the police noted after the woman called again that the assault had never been reported by the school. Provo Canyon School has historically been a place where adolescents with significant behavior issues from across the country were sent for treatment and therapy in an idyllic setting, nestled in the valley below the Wasatch mountain range. Since its founding in the 1970s the school has housed a combination of the children of wealthy families and children sent by schools or court systems, whose care is funded by public sources. The facility has been owned and operated since 2000 by Universal Health Services Inc., a Fortune 500 company. The company lists Provo Canyon in its February 2014 financial report as the largest of its 193 behavioral health care facilities. Experts in the behavior of troubled youth describe great challenges in operating centers like Provo Canyon, where the residents often have severe behavioral and emotional issues that pose a danger to themselves or others. "It's challenging," said Dr. Laura Gilley, medical director of the University of Utah Neuropsychiatric Institute's comprehensive assessment and treatment program, who has six years of residential experience herself. "We face kids potentially doing unsafe things in the facility." Provo Canyon School administrators declined requests for interviews. Karen Johnson, the senior vice president for clinical services at parent company UHS, said that Provo Canyon and other UHS facilities "do the best job that we can to take care of a very troubled group of kids." She noted that the company is dedicated to providing "the care each child deserves" and to help them find alternatives to misbehavior. In a follow-up prepared statement, the corporation said Provo Canyon exceeds state standards and said the facility serves as the "last resort/option...for youth with severe behaviors who simply cannot be treated elsewhere." The statement said that Provo Canyon has "from time to time" had deficiency notices, but is currently in good standing with state regulators. The statement added, "any alleged mistreatment by our staff would be treated as a serious occurrence with full disciplinary actions including termination." The Medill Watchdog review of state and local records found that between September 2012 and October 2013, at least five staff members have been terminated for inappropriate conduct toward the youth they are charged with guarding. Between 2011 and 2013, the state found multiple violations by Provo Canyon in its care of the troubled youth. Twice the state put the license for Provo Canyon School campuses on a provisional status because of violations. The first time was as a result of Tyrone McCoy's escape in May 2012. A TRAGIC EPISODE McCoy's flight to freedom ended in tragedy captured on the evening news: a resident ran away, stole a car and had a fatal accident. After reviewing videotape and conducting interviews with staff, state officials would later document just how easy the escape was for McCoy. Doors were left open that should have been locked. Staff did not maintain continuous supervision of residents. One Provo Canyon staff member was texting while on duty. The incident occurred after a staff member granted McCoy, then 17, permission to go sharpen a pencil, then left for a few minutes to get trays from the kitchen. When the staff member returned, McCoy was gone, and the door to the courtyard was left open. Over the next few hours, police reports show, McCoy broke into a house, then walked to an underground parking lot and stole an unlocked Mercedes SUV. He drove it back to the school, where he taunted staff and showed off for fellow residents, according to local news accounts. When staff members realized he was in the parking lot, they tried without success to detain him. Instead he drove off at breakneck speed, his flight ending abruptly when he crashed into a car stopped at a light. The collision critically injured the driver and killed his wife, who was in the passenger seat. McCoy later pleaded guilty to charges of manslaughter, theft of a vehicle, burglary and fleeing, all felonies. He remains in juvenile detention. Following the escape, the state banned the boys' campus in July 2012 from accepting new admissions for 30 days, and put the facility's license on a six-month conditional status. A lawsuit by the husband of the fatally injured passenger against the school and McCoy is pending. A HISTORY OF ESCAPES Like many residential treatment centers, Provo Canyon has been plagued by runaways since it opened; a pair of runaway boys sparked a lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union in 1978 over the conditions of care. According to the lawsuit, the boys fled the facility to escape brutal treatment; the case ended with the judge's order that the facility stop using force or isolation, among other practices, absent exceptional circumstances. In the years since, runaways have continued to pose a problem, including a 2000 incident in which two boys escaped, stole a car and crashed it, killing one of the youth. Even after McCoy's tragic incident and the state sanction that followed, police records document more than a dozen additional calls regarding youth runaways. The school hired a fencing company following the escape to reinforce the south fence. But on Sept. 5, 2012 – while the Provo campus license was still on conditional status – another resident jumped that section, stole a fencing company truck and drove off. Police reports show the boy had told other residents of his plan to steal a car and drive to Washington, D.C., where his mother lived. Three months later, a social worker there called police in Utah to report the youth had been found in the capital. On Sept. 9, 2012, another boy ran away. And 13 days later, three boys escaped in two separate incidents hours apart. The school reports show the boys all were later found. Residents of the girl's campus also try to escape, often in groups. On Jan. 28, 2013, a group of girls rioted, damaging walls and windows. Staff called police early in the morning to report that six girls had escaped and "might have scissors and pencils as weapons." Police found all six of them. From the back of the police car, one girl hit an officer in the back of his head with his own handcuffs. She was booked into juvenile detention and charged with assault. On Feb. 26, 2014, staff called to report that two girls had broken a window, climbed a fence and escaped. They were found at a nearby gas station and returned in the early hours of the next morning. After they returned, one of the girls told a staff member of meeting a truck driver at the gas station who gave them cigarettes and beer, before he and the 17-year-old girl had what she described as consensual sex. In its statement, UHS said it could not discuss individual cases, citing privacy laws. But the company said that it reviewed cases raised by Medill Watchdog, and "in each case, the facts are very different than what you are reporting. We strongly dispute these allegations, but are prohibited by privacy laws from providing more detail about what really happened." ALLEGATIONS OF SEXUAL ACTS Police reports document repeated allegations of sexual acts, both consensual and non-consensual at Provo Canyon. The police investigations often end short of arrest, hampered by witnesses and victims who are unwilling or unable to testify. In October 2012, a resident of the girl's campus told a police officer and social worker that a female staff member had hugged her, "made out with her" and then touched her inappropriately, according to a police report of the incident. The girl said they had kissed once before. Detective Jeff Ellsworth contacted the staff member, who told him that she had been fired for "inappropriate conduct with the girl," according to his report. But the dismissed staff member told Ellsworth that nothing more than hugging had occurred, and that she had refused the resident's request for a kiss. The woman told Ellsworth that she was cautious because she knew the resident had a crush on her, and wrote in a statement for police: "I have never kissed or touched" the victim or any girl, "other than an occasional hug." Ellsworth's report shows his investigation ran into dead ends. The girl was "very reluctant" to discuss what happened, and feared what might happen to her. She was unwilling to testify. The facility's therapist told Ellsworth that the girl's diary only spoke of "hugging," and said whatever cameras might have recorded would not still be preserved. As a result, Ellsworth wrote, he could not even establish what occurred, and was closing the case. In March 2013, Candice Gronberg called Springville police about an incident involving her son, then 10, at the center's facility for girls and younger children, police records show. Gronberg told the police, according to their report, that it had been more than two months since staff at Provo Canyon School told her that her son had been sexually molested by another student at the campus. As soon as Gronberg got that call, she told police, she hung up the phone and drove to Utah, where center officials told her the matter was under investigation. Gronberg removed her son from the school then, Officer Vincent Mendez's report shows, but was calling now because she had heard nothing about the results of that investigation. She told Mendez that she suspected the police had not even been told about the incident; the officer discovered she was right, his report shows. Mendez called the center's supervising therapist, who said the incident had not been reported because after gathering statements from residents school officials disbelieved that an incident had occurred. Mendez arranged to meet with the facility's director the following week, and told Gronberg he wanted her son to return to Utah to be interviewed. But days later, Mendez reported that he was closing the case after Gronberg "regretfully" asked that the matter be dropped. She said that her son did not want to go back, and his new therapists agreed that forcing him to do so only would traumatize her son further. Gronberg, reached by telephone recently, remained frustrated by the way Provo Canyon School handled the matter. "To me, the entire situation was a cover-up," she said. Also in March 2013, a staff member told police that two 17-year old boys had sexually assaulted other students in their beds. A staff member said that one of the victims told him that the suspects threatened to rape and physically hurt him if he reported them to staff. Boys who were victims or witnesses mentioned to police multiple occasions where the two suspects physically assaulted them or others. One boy said that the two suspects beat him daily. Another boy "stated that he was pushed into the corner and punched over and over," the police report notes. One of the suspects denied the allegations to police, saying "people say he did these things because people were annoyed with him." The second suspect provided police with a statement from his attorney invoking his Fifth Amendment right. But the investigation hit a snag when three of the boys who either were victims or witnesses were discharged from the school. Police records show the clinical director said she could not get approval from the parents of the discharged boys to contact the alleged victims. The assigned detective consulted the county attorney. "Due to there being no corroborating witnesses and this being a 'he said, she said' case prosecution is being declined," the officer's report states. NURSE ALERTS POLICE Sometimes the police are slow to hear about incidents of violence at Provo Canyon. An emergency room nurse at a local hospital called the police July 2, 2013 to report one resident had shown up with "a broken nose and black eye," according to the police report. The report shows the officer had little success when he then called the school: The receptionist would not provide information, and left the officer to leave a voicemail message for an administrator. Sheila Kirst contends the facility was slow to turn to police after the beating of her son, an event spelled out in a 2010 lawsuit against Provo Canyon. Kirst said she first learned of the March 2008 incident when a Provo Canyon nurse called to say her son, Michael Jacob Kirst, had been in "a little altercation" but was "fine," she recalled in a recent interview. In fact, by then Jacob Kirst had been treated at a local hospital, where x-rays of his face revealed "multiple facial fractures of the sinus...nasal fracture...fracture of the right orbit," according to hospital records. Even before the nurse called, Jacob Kirst had written his mother, "I don't feel safe here at all," describing a series of violent incidents he had witnessed. (His mother provided a copy of the letter to Medill Watchdog.) After getting the phone call, Sheila Kirst headed to see her son, and saw instantly: "You could tell he'd had the crap beat out of him." Provo Canyon police records of the incident show the police dispatched at 1:40 p.m. on March 31, 2008 for an incident that occurred between 8:00 p.m. and 8:30 p.m. the night before; Sheila Kirst said that the police were only called at her insistence. The responding officer wrote that Jacob Kirst had "sustained several injuries including nine fractures to the face, bruising above his right eye and cheeks, swelling on his arm, scratches and scuff marks on his neck and shoulder, and a large swelling of his left knee. Also two brackets were broken on the upper left side of the braces for [Jacob's] teeth." The beating happened while Jacob Kirst was in the shower, according to reports. The assailant, who was charged with aggravated assault, allegedly entered the bathroom to confront Kirst after a heated basketball game earlier in the day. Sheila Kirst removed her son from Provo Canyon that day. But she said he was never the same, and he saw a series of specialists and became hooked on pain medications afterward. Jacob Kirst died of a drug overdose in 2011, after which the case was dismissed, according to court papers. Karen Johnson, the UHS executive, said that the company is committed to reporting and transparency, a commitment she said comes "from the highest level in our company." She said the agency ensures employees throughout the country are trained to honor that commitment. While the company said it could not respond to individual incidents because of privacy concerns, the company told Medill Watchdog/Chicago Tribune reporters: "You are receiving information from patients who have had often horrific life experiences and have mental health issues. Their characterization of issues and facts do not accurately reflect what really happened." WORRIES AT NIGHT Current and former staff say that they often were left feeling that there were too few employees to protect residents safely, especially at night. Heather Burns, a former girls' campus staff member, said that during her evening shift she was expected to escort around the building the 16 or more girls in one unit to dinner, study hall and therapy. "My frustration was, I did not feel we had adequate staffing for those situations," she said. "I feel like a lot of behaviors could have been prevented if we had more staff." The concerns were echoed by other former staff members. In its statement, UHS said that Provo Canyon, like all its facilities, meets or exceeds the staffing levels required by Utah. "UHS achieves financial success by providing quality care and treatment to our patients," the statement read. AN ABRUPT RELEASE Like many residential treatment centers, Provo Canyon's costs – upwards of $120,000 a year – are far higher than what most families can afford. Public school special education funding pays for most residents, as it did for Coulter Slone. When that funding stops, as it did for Slone, Provo Canyon's treatment may come to an abrupt end. Slone, now 16, was admitted to Provo Canyon in December 2012 and his care was paid by the California school district in which his parents were residents. In a recent interview, his father, Joseph Slone, said that his Provo Canyon therapist had told him in early summer 2014 that his son was not emotionally ready to be released even for a weekend visit home. But things changed dramatically when the public funding stopped after the family moved to Indiana, Joseph Slone said. In early July 2014, Joseph Slone remembers getting several calls from Provo Canyon demanding that he pay money for his son's continued residency. Slone said he asked for more time from the school. But in mid-July, he said, Coulter Slone was brought back from Provo Canyon and handed off to his father at O'Hare International Airport, with a duffel bag of clothes and many medications. "There was never any concern about what was going to happen to Coulter when I got him home, nor was there for my family," said Joseph Slone. "It was like he was thrown home and done." Soon, after, the Slones received a bill charging them $7,000 for July tuition. While Universal Health Services said it could not comment on individual cases, because of privacy laws, its statement said, "We have not, do not and will not ever sacrifice patient care for financial benefit." ISSUES OVER RESTRAINTS In April 2013, state records show, a female staff member complained to state officials over an incident in which a male staff member restrained a girl resident for seven minutes so that she could be strip-searched as she arrived at campus. The facility later reported to the state that the incident occurred after she refused to submit to a search to ensure that she was not bringing anything dangerous into the campus. State officials later concluded the staff did not follow approved program policy regarding strip searches "or take reasonable measures relative to ensuring the dignity of the involved client." Provo Canyon promised the state on May 1, 2013 that from then on, "restraints will be conducted by female staff." Two months later, a girl was hurt in a restraint involving a male staff member, after the girl and a companion tried to grab one staff member's keys to attempt an escape. The school later reported that two staff members involved in the incident were fired. The school also promised that male staff would restrain females only in emergency situations. Once again, in July 2013 the state put a Provo Canyon School license on conditional status for six months. Source: <http://medillwatchdog.org/blog/2014/12/02/violence-runaways-plague-utah-facility-for-troubled-youth/>

Mother of child abused by foster parent speaks out By Adam Wright • December 5, 2014 FORT MYERS, Fla.- For the first time, WINK News is hearing from a woman who says her 11-year old daughter was beaten with a belt by her foster mother. Kelly Paulsen hasn't seen her daughter in over a year and is worried for her safety. "I just want to squeeze her and tell her I'm so sorry, and that I think about her every day, every second of every day," said Paulsen. The Department of Children and Families removed Paulsen's daughter from her home 3 years ago. The child was placed in the care of Dunbar Christian Preschool Director Teresa Robinson. Police say Robinson beat her foster daughter with a belt back in November, causing serious injuries. A police report states a medical professional said the child's injuries were too numerous to count. Robinson now faces child abuse charges and the victim has been removed from her care. While DCF investigates, Robinson was told not have contact with the kids at the preschool she owns. WINK News found Robinson outside the preschool Friday, after bonding out of jail. DCF said she is allowed to be on the property but only if no children are present. Robinson declined to speak with WINK News. Meanwhile, Paulsen says her daughter was taken from her based on accusations that were never proven. She says she has been fighting to regain custody of her daughter with no luck. "I just hope that she's with someone that will take good care of her and not hurt her, because she's just a great little girl," said Paulsen. DCF tells WINK News they have had prior contact with Robinson but did not specify how many times they have contacted her or why. She has had a total of nine foster children in care since 2008. Source: <http://www.winknews.com/2014/12/05/dcf-investigating-fort-myers-woman-accused-of-abusing-foster-child/>

Former coach, foster parent charged with sex crimes Former coach, foster parent charged with sex crimes By Barb Pacholik And Janet French, Leader-Post, StarPhoenix December 6, 2014 The people of Nipawin know Don Mark as a hardworking maintenance man who coached pee-wee hockey in the 1980s. Now, Thomas Donald Mark, 74, faces nine charges for sex offences on two youths dating back to the 1980s and 1990s. "No community wants to see this happen. I definitely don't condone it. It's unreal," Nipawin Mayor Dave Trann said Friday. That's the same day the RC MP went public with the charges against the former foster parent, hockey coach and rink worker in Nipawin - and urged anyone else who may have something to share to step forward. "There is the potential that there may be more victims," RC MP spokesperson Mandy Maier told a news conference in Regina. The RC MP is also seeking potential witnesses. Mark is to make his first appearance on Dec. 17 in Nipawin Provincial Court. Arrested at his Codette residence on Nov. 23 and released on conditions, he is charged with two counts each of sexual assault, sexual interference, invitation to sexual touching, and sexual exploitation, as well as one count of engaging in anal intercourse. Maier would only say the offences allegedly occurred in the "mid-'80s and mid-'90s." A man first contacted the Mounties in August 2014 with a complaint about Mark. A second man came forward in October with a similar complaint. According to RCMP, that second man said he first met Mark at a Nipawin ice arena, where the accused worked in maintenance. RCMP did not disclose how the first man may have encountered Mark. "I can imagine even over a significant period of time that it was very difficult. We commend them for coming forward," said Maier. Trann was shocked when the RCMP told him a few days ago Mark, who lives with his wife about 10 kilometres from Nipawin, was facing sex charges. "It just came out of the blue," Trann said. Mark had worked as a caretaker for the East Pleasant View Community Club, which operated an outdoor rink, and in the summer at the regional park, Trann said. "He was just known as a hard worker that would get more done than anybody," he added. Trann said Mark was never a town employee to his knowledge. In the 1980s, and possibly the early 1990s, Mark coached pee-wee hockey with the Nipawin Hawks. He may have coached bantam players as well, said Trann, whose sons played hockey at around the same time, but never had Mark as a coach. Trann has been on town council for nearly 20 years and never heard rumours of unsavoury behaviour by Mark. "We're very concerned as a community. Just like everyone else, (we're) waiting to hear if there's any other allegations. We're hoping not," Trann said. Natalie Huber, an executive director in the Ministry of Social Services, said Mark worked as a "caregiver" for Social Services until 2008. "It appears that he was providing foster care services and perhaps some other services for youth in a caregiving capacity," she said. A "caregiver" could also include providing room and board, she added. The ministry is still trying to sort out when Mark began as a foster parent, and Huber couldn't specify how many children might have been in his care over time. Asked why that role ended in 2008 and whether or not Social Services previously received complaints about Mark, Huber said "that's not information I'm able to share." However, she added, "if there are issues or complaints that come forward about a caregiver, those are reviewed and investigated thoroughly." A neighbour who knows Mark's wife said the couple had three children staying with them at one point. "That's crazy," said Codette resident Bonnie Haveron when she heard of the charges. "You think you know everybody and everything around." RCMP released a photo of Mark as he would have appeared in the time frame of the allegations, to assist people's recollections. Those with information or wanting to make a complaint can contact Nipawin RCMP at 306-862-6270. Persons who want to remain anonymous can call Saskatchewan Crime Stoppers at 1-800-222-TIPS (8477), through SaskTel at *8477, or submit a tip online at www.sask.crimestoppers.com. bpacholik@leaderpost.com jfrench@thestarphenix.com © Copyright (c) The Regina Leader-Post Source:

<http://www.leaderpost.com/life/Former+coach+foster+parent+charged+with+crimes/10446147/story.html>

Sex Assault Charges Against Foster Care Provider Filed In Scott County December 8, 2014 3:37 PM MINNEAPOLIS (WCCO) - A foster care provider in Scott County is accused of sexually assaulting a girl who stayed in his home around 1994. In 2003, Daniel Alvin Hennen, 59, of Jordan was convicted of sexually assaulting four other girls entrusted to his care between 1985 and 2002. Now he faces new sexual assault charges related to a woman who contacted the Scott County Sheriff's Office in October. The sheriff's office said there may be additional victims. As many as 70 children were placed in Hennen's home. Those with more information are asked to call the sheriff's office at 952-496-8755 and ask for Detective Cade. Source:

<http://minnesota.cbslocal.com/2014/12/08/sex-assault-charges-against-foster-care-provider-filed-in-scott-county/>

Former foster youths sue private agency, woman who took them in Isaiah Sais, Saleena Galvan and Shawna Adams Christina House, For The Times Isaiah Sais, 19, left, Saleena Galvan, 21, center, and Shawna Adams alleged in their lawsuit that they were abused by foster mother Lisa Oates. Isaiah Sais, 19, left, Saleena Galvan, 21, center, and Shawna Adams alleged in their lawsuit that they were abused by foster mother Lisa Oates. (Christina House, For The Times)

By Garrett Therolf contact the reporter Crime Eight former foster youths allege in suit that foster mother abused them For months, child abuse allegations have roiled a Victorville foster parent and the private San Bernardino County foster care agency that supervised her. In February, state regulators declared the parent responsible for more than a year of severe physical abuse — determining that she slapped, choked and struck some of her foster children with a baseball bat and forced others to crouch while holding heavy objects. As a result, 45-year-old Lisa Oates was banned from ever again participating in the foster care system.

Now, eight former foster youths sent to live in Oates' home have filed a lawsuit against her and Interim Care, the Rancho Cucamonga agency that recruited and supervised her under contract with San Bernardino County. Related story: California not investigating foster care complaints promptly Garrett Therolf The state agency responsible for overseeing California's foster care system is violating its own rules by failing to promptly investigate complaints of children being mistreated or living in poorly maintained homes, according to records obtained by The Times. Nearly 1,000 complaints have... The state agency responsible for overseeing California's foster care system is violating its own rules by failing to promptly investigate complaints of children being mistreated or living in poorly maintained homes, according to records obtained by The Times. Nearly 1,000 complaints have... \(Garrett Therolf \)

The youths also contend that they disclosed the abuse to at least 15 so-called mandated reporters — police officers, school counselors, social workers and other professionals who are legally obliged to initiate an investigation if they suspect mistreatment. Although some of their complaints resulted in investigations, the youths allege that they were always interviewed by authorities with Oates present and recanted out of fear she would retaliate. That allegation in particular has generated concern in the foster-care community. "There is a stereotype that youth are dishonest and just making complaints to manipulate the system, but I think youth have to be incredibly brave to actually report," said Jennifer Rodriguez, a former foster youth who is now executive director of the Youth Law Center in San Francisco. [\[Related L.A. Now Couple detained in Qatar welcomed home at Pasadena church service See all related 8\]](#)

Interim Care's chief executive, Sukhwinder Singh, is named as a defendant as well. Neither Oates nor Singh responded to calls seeking comment. The Times reported in June that Singh claimed to work a total of 120 hours a week at three nonprofit foster care agencies in 2009, receiving $311,000 in pay, according to the agencies' tax returns. She also charged almost $1.8 million in rent from 2007 to 2011 for properties she owned and leased back to her foster care agencies, according to financial statements filed with the state. State auditors have determined that she sometimes charged well above market rates. Related column: Retirement brightens as San Dimas couple take in foster children Steve Lopez One night in mid-September, Gabriel and Elizabeth Cho couldn't sleep. The retired San Dimas couple were too excited about what the next day would bring. Mrs. Cho prayed, and she thought about preparing a second casserole, just in case one of her guests didn't care for kimchi jjigae. One night in mid-September, Gabriel and Elizabeth Cho couldn't sleep. The retired San Dimas couple were too excited about what the next day would bring. Mrs. Cho prayed, and she thought about preparing a second casserole, just in case one of her guests didn't care for kimchi jjigae. \(Steve Lopez \)

Foster care officials in Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties continued to place thousands of children through the agencies because the homes appeared to meet safety standards. Now, officials say they are reassessing that because of the problems uncovered in the Oates home and others. The head of San Bernardino County's Children and Family Services agency denied mishandling the supervision of Oates' home, which at any one time housed up to six foster teens. "We have no information regarding any substantiated allegations of abuse or neglect for children currently placed with Interim," said director Randall Schulz. "If abuse or neglect is revealed, appropriate action will be taken." According to California Department of Social Services records, Oates beat children in her care between December 2011 and August 2013, sometimes causing them to bleed. cComments @joshuaallenonline The thing is, Sukhwinder is busy with all her multiple businesses in foster care that she owns, raking in salaries from several of them each year that she can't be expected to watch over all the places she gets a check from?! LOLLOLOLOLOLOLOL and the County seems to agree... Tasha J at 5:00 PM December 10, 2014 Add a comment See all comments 28

Oates also tried to pull one girl's fake fingernails off, "slammed" her to the ground and prevented her from fleeing up the stairs by dragging her back down, state investigators said. Finally, some of the youths ran away to a battered children's center last year and a state investigation was initiated that substantiated the allegations of physical abuse. The lawsuit contends that Oates would regularly wake the youths in the middle of the night if she decided that the house hadn't been cleaned well enough — and they wouldn't be allowed to return to bed for another two hours until the work was done. State regulators substantiated an incident in which Oates took one of her foster children into the Victorville desert where she choked her. Reandre Jones, now 18, said in an interview that Oates had been unhappy with the way she had been cleaning. "I thought [Oates] was going to kill me," she said. Related story: L.A. County supervisors vote to hire 'child protection czar' Garrett Therolf The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors on Tuesday approved a sweeping reform of the county's troubled child protection operation, creating an independent office charged with improving how the region's abused and neglected children are treated. The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors on Tuesday approved a sweeping reform of the county's troubled child protection operation, creating an independent office charged with improving how the region's abused and neglected children are treated. \(Garrett Therolf \)

Another plaintiff, Isaiah Sais, now 20, said in an interview: "Someone was always getting beat There was no real reason. For her, it was like a game.... For any kid who went there, it was the worst time of their life." In their lawsuit, the former foster youths also allege that Oates was evicted from four of seven homes she had rented during her time as a foster parent and that they were homeless for six months while still receiving monthly payments that the state provides for the care of foster children. At the time, a social worker from the Interim Care agency was supposed to visit weekly, followed by a monthly visit from county social workers. Even when they had a home of their own, several plaintiffs said in interviews, there was often not enough furniture and the children would move beds and other belongings back and forth between Oates' home and the home of her boyfriend who was also a foster parent. "I would have to go and get a bed when they knew the social worker was coming," Sais told The Times. "When the social worker left, I put it back." The children were not allowed to eat with Oates, much of the food in the pantry was off limits, and they lived "in a constant state of hunger," the former foster youths alleged in the lawsuit. They now experience depression, anxiety and other after-effects from the abuse, the lawsuit said. "To the system, we were just fine that whole time," said Selena Galvan, now 21. "But we were anything but fine."

garretttherolf@latimes.com Follow @gtherolf for more news about child welfare. Source: <http://www.latimes.com/local/california/la-me-abuse-allegations-20141209-story.html>

08 Dec 2014 05:32 Governor Pat Quinn today directed the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services (DCFS) to take further action in light of recent reports of disturbing issues within residential care centers for troubled youth. The Governor today directed the Children and Family Services Advisory Council to convene immediately to assess the situation and develop necessary steps to resolve these issues. In addition, the Governor named a top expert as an advisor to the committee, which will meet Thursday. The Governor issued the below statement: “The recent revelations regarding some residential youth centers in Illinois are alarming and unacceptable. They must be addressed immediately. “Today I am directing the Children and Family Services Advisory Council to meet promptly to respond to the issues at these residential youth centers and develop a comprehensive action plan to address them. “Every necessary corrective action will be implemented and monitored by the Department and its advisory committee. Our most vulnerable are of highest priority and must get the care and protection they deserve. "The Department must take every step necessary to prevent these harmful incidents to youth from ever happening again." The Governor directed the Children and Family Services Advisory Council to meet this Thursday, Dec. 11 to immediately address the issues at some of the state's residential care centers. In addition, the Governor today also named Dr. Robert R. Bloom as advisor to the Children and Family Services Advisory Council. Dr. Bloom, former longtime Executive Director of the Jewish Children's Bureau, previously served on the Child Welfare Advisory Board and is a widely respected expert on the topics of residential treatment and institutional child abuse. Additionally, as announced previously, the DCF is bringing in an independent expert to conduct a full investigation of the residential treatment centers with which the Department works. The results and recommendations from that review will be made public. The DCF is also conducting a comprehensive review of data from residential facilities to determine whether performance has improved since the timeframe examined by the Chicago Tribune and whether further sanctions or consequences are warranted. Lawrence Hall Youth Services and ERIC Family Services have both been placed on intake hold effective Dec. 4, 2014. Source: <http://www.enevsnf.com/latest-news/latest-local/57449-gov-quinn-directs-children-and-family-services-advisory-council-to-convene-on-residential-center-conditions.html>

Texas: Children's Advocacy Group Brings Class-Action Lawsuit Against CPS Share on facebook5011002 Share on email Share on google plusone share0 Share on twitter212424 by Lana Shadwick 15 Dec 2014 24 Crystal Bentley, age twenty-three, spent sixteen years in the Texas foster care system. Her testimony in a federal civil trial being held in Corpus Christi casts even more shadows on the embattled Texas Children's Protective Services agency (CPS). The agency, formally known as the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services (TDFPS), is the subject of a civil rights class-action lawsuit. Bentley testified earlier this week that she was shuffled from home to home from the time she was two years of age, until she "aged-out" at the age of eighteen. She claimed she was repeatedly beaten and sexually assaulted while she was under the watch of CPS case workers who frequently didn't show up for monthly visits. Bentley claims that the assaults came from adults who were supposed to be caring for her, the children of foster parents and other foster children, and even her own relatives according to an article in the Houston Chronicle. When case workers did show up for monthly visits, her abuse would go unreported because they failed to speak with her privately. The class-action lawsuit was filed by a New York advocacy group called Children's Rights. About 12,000 children are included in the class-action suit. These children are in long-term care in Texas. The group seeks to have U.S. District Judge Janis Graham Jack order the State of Texas to enact reforms for its children's services. The group has been successful in fifteen of its nineteen previously filed lawsuits. Another former foster child, Jordan Arce, age 19, told his story about how he was placed in a facility with children who exhibited behavioral or emotional problems. Despite multiple placements and even a group home, Arce was able to maintain his straight-A record in schools. "I would lock myself in the closet, just so I could study, read, talk to myself," he said. "After I left, I struggled a lot with just connecting to other people." Frequent turnover of caseworkers and management problems are to be blamed according to a series of articles in a San Antonio Express-News investigation. Representatives for TDFPS tell a different side to the story. In testimony this week, Jane Burstain, the current director for TDFPS, cited statistics that show the department has made vast improvements in caring for foster children. She said Texas has made more placements in homes of relatives, and had more adoptions, fewer children in long-term care, and better training and retention of workers. "Texas, vis-à-vis other states in the nation, is in the norm with turnover, not significantly better or worse," Burstain said in an article written by Stoeltje for the Express-News. "All child welfare agencies struggle with turnover." Burstain says that large caseloads are not necessarily tied to high worker turnover, or to bad outcomes for children. She said the plaintiffs were confusing "correlation with causation." The attorney for the Plaintiff Children's Rights organization disagreed. "You've heard over and over again about high caseloads leading to high turnover and bad outcomes, including in countless documents the (DFPS) has put out about it," said Paul Yetter, a Houston attorney hired to help represent the organization. Burstain suggested in several emails that "reasonable minds" could differ as to whether caregivers were at fault in some cases involving deaths in foster care during 2013. "I didn't say [the findings] needed to be changed, I said they needed to be reviewed," Burstain said. Judge Jack, who is hearing the case without a jury, asked, "Why review them if it's not to change them?" The class action lawsuit is focused on children in long-term care in Texas who have been harmed by a system that has overloaded caseworkers and other problems. A psychologist who testified on behalf of the state, addressed questions about an 8-year old boy who had been sexually assaulted by two 16-year-old boys while in a foster home. He said the boy had substantially improved while in the state's care. This witness received tough questioning by the state's lawyer, and the judge. A ruling from the judge is not expected for several weeks. Lana Shadwick is a contributing writer and legal analyst for Breitbart Texas. She has served the state as a family court judge and a CPS lawyer. Follow her on Twitter @LanaShadwick2 Source: <http://www.breitbart.com/texas/2014/12/15/texas-children-s-advocacy-group-brings-class-action-lawsuit-against-cps/>

Colorado audit finds foster care check problems Google Survey FAQ 60 4 email 79 print Associated Press • Updated: December 18, 2014 at 1:04 pm • Q Close DENVER — Counties aren't properly conducting background checks before placing foster children in the care of relatives, according to a first-of-its-kind review by the Colorado Department of Human Services. Related Information Related Articles (1) Denver parents charged after toddler tests for marijuana Social workers are required to do four background checks on people in the homes of relatives who have been asked to take care of children removed by authorities from their parents' care. Workers from the department's child welfare division reviewed the records of 46 of the state's 64 counties that had kinship placement records and found that only 65 percent of the required checks were done, KMGH-TV (<http://bit.ly/1yZQrQ2>) reported Wednesday. Some smaller rural counties, including Delta, Rio Grande and Archuleta, were found to have performed a quarter or less of the checks. Weld, Broomfield, Boulder and Crowley were among the best counties for doing checks, with Broomfield and Crowley both completing all the required checks. The audit was done in response to the television station's report about how Denver placed four children with a registered sex offender and then a convicted child abuser. Denver was found to have completed 53 percent of the required reviews— an FBI criminal history check, a state child welfare database check, a Colorado Bureau of Investigation criminal history check and a fingerprint check. Julie Krow, director of the state's Office of Children Youth and Families, said auditors often had to stop their work to contact counties with missing checks to make sure children were safe. "This is the first time that we've ever done a review of this nature," she said. "This was a huge learning opportunity for the state and the counties." The state is planning visits to counties to help ensure they are complying with the law, but other needed changes will cost more money, Krow said. She said the state's 1980s-era computer reporting system needs to be replaced so it can provide real-time information, and many counties don't have enough caseworkers or supervisors. Information from: KMGH-TV, <http://www.thedenverchannel.com> Read more at <http://gazette.com/colorado-audit-finds-foster-care-check-problems/article/1543300#9UxbmlxEgtWVX4Oz.99>

How did a sex offender become a foster parent? Updated: 12/18/2014 2:39 PM Created: 12/17/2014 11:21 PM WHEC.com By: Lynette Adams - @whcc_ladams A foster parent in Avon is charged with raping a teenage girl and we've learned that the suspect was already a registered sex offender. Sixty-year-old Richard Cassada is accused of sexually assaulting an underage teenage girl. Cassada is already on the sex offender registry after a 2005 sexual abuse arrest involving a 15-year-old girl. We wanted to find out how a man with that criminal background was able to become a foster parent. Police tell us this case came to light when a 16-year-old girl told a trusted adult at school that she had had a sexual encounter with Cassada. Avon Police Chief Gary Benedict says, "He was arrested by our agency in 2005 for a similar incident." Chief Benedict says Cassada is a level two sex offender. Last week, Avon Police picked him up and charged him with third degree rape and third degree criminal sex act. Chief Benedict says, "It is frustrating for us and our agency and I believe probably everybody -- the school, CPS workers -- looking into something like this. When it would seem like it shouldn't have been allowed to go on." It begs the question how could a registered sex offender become a foster parent? It's a question Mindy Cromwell has had for four years. She says, "When I first moved here, and I found out he was a sex offender, I assumed he was labeled wrong because of the fact that he had foster kids." We went to Cassada's house to speak to his wife. She said she had no comment, but she did say "he didn't do anything wrong." The chief tells us Cassada and his wife adopted three girls and that they have been placed in the care of Child Protective Services. The victim in the 2005 case was a 15-year-old. Source: <http://www.whcc.com/news/stories/S3653205.shtml>

San Mar Children's Home Not Closing, One Therapeutic Group Home Did Nicole Galbraith 12/18/2014 05:05 PM 12/18/2014 06:37 PM San Mar Children's Home Not Closing, One Therapeutic Group Home Did By Associated Press 12/18/2014 06:37 PM The Jack E. Barr Therapeutic Group Home for Girls operated by San Mar Children's Home closed December 1st, but San Mar's CEO said that was misinterpreted by many people in the community who thought San Mar as a whole would be closing. BOONSBORO, Md - The Jack E. Barr Therapeutic Group Home for Girls operated by San Mar Children's Home closed December 1st, but San Mar's CEO said that was misinterpreted by many people in the community as San Mar as a whole would be closing. San Mar's CEO, Bruce Anderson, said the Barr Home closed due to a $200,000 loss in revenue last year. "We realized even if we operate at full capacity, we're still going to operate at a very significant loss," Anderson said. The Barr Home served up to eight girls at a time and according to Anderson, all eight girls

living there before it closed were either placed into foster care, went back home with their family or taken to another group home. In general, a therapeutic group home serves kids with a trauma history and Anderson said the girls at the Barr Home would have to have a clinical diagnosis before staying. "When the kid comes in, we develop individual treatment plans and we'll develop whole plans of action to try to help this kid and their family get back on focus," Anderson said. San Mar's Educational Director, Millie Steinke, said a lot of great things occurred in the Barr Home. "We saw girls come in and there was a lot of nurturing that went on, a lot of support, including those from the school and we saw in my area, kids progress, graduate, and even go into college," Steinke said. According to Steinke, sometimes all a kid needs is attention, whether it's paying attention to their school, or how they feel about what's going on in their lives. "I know from personal experience that was happening in the Barr Home. It was a great tribute to the man who it was named after, a great friend, a great person in the community, a person who definitely acted from the heart and I think that's what was happening in the Barr home, people were acting from the heart," Steinke said. With nearly 250 girls passing through the Barr Home being helped, Anderson said the building will still be used for other purposes like therapeutic sessions and foster family meetings. Anderson said he hopes to one day turn the Barr Home into a transition home for girls in their programs, who are going from adolescents into adulthood, so that they can learn life skills to live on their own successfully. Source: http://www.your4state.com/story/d/story/san-mar-childrens-home-not-closing-one-therapeutic/62173/W66R_Z8HwkSxE8SK7r84A

Sacramento parents seek answers in foster care death of their 2-year-old By Brad Branan bbranan@sacbee.com 12/19/2014 6:46 PM 12/19/2014 10:38 PM Allenia Bledsoe died in November. Officials are still investigating her death. Family photo Story Comments A Sacramento couple are upset about a lack of answers in the mysterious death of their 2-year-old daughter while in foster care. Allenia Bledsoe was found dead in an Elk Grove foster home Nov. 7, said Detective Josh Magdaleno of the Elk Grove Police Department. While it's not clear what killed the girl, there were no suspicious circumstances, he said. Any future investigation by police will depend on the outcome of an autopsy by the Sacramento County Coroner's Office, he said. The Coroner's Office doesn't expect to complete its investigation for approximately four weeks, said county spokeswoman Chris Andis. Autopsies for children often take longer than those for adults because more tests are conducted in the absence of clear causes of death, she said. Related The wait for answers has deepened the pain for Allenia's parents, Jayme Wimberly and Allen Bledsoe. They can't understand how a healthy child could suddenly die. They were only told that Allenia visited the dentist the day before, woke up around 5 a.m. the following morning from a bad dream and was found dead in her bed two hours later. "I want to know if she died from natural causes or if she was murdered," said Bledsoe. They have sought more details from Sacramento County Child Protective Services and the Coroner's Office. But officials have said they either can't comment or that the parents will have to wait for the coroner's investigation to be completed. They said they have gotten conflicting reports about how long that investigation will take. CPS spokeswoman Laura McCasland said confidentiality laws prevent the agency from commenting about the case, beyond releasing a written statement confirming Allenia's death while in foster care. She said all foster care deaths are investigated by the agency. Wimberly and Bledsoe said Allenia was a healthy girl with no history of illness. Allenia's grandmother, Alicia Bledsoe, also described the girl as vibrant, saying she and Wimberly visited her at New Horizons Foster Care Agency in West Sacramento every two weeks. New Horizons, a nonprofit, manages some foster care homes in Sacramento County. When contacted by The Sacramento Bee, a woman at New Horizons' office said she could not comment about Allenia's death, then declined to give her name and hung up the phone. In the last two years, the California Department of Social Services made 12 visits to the agency's properties in response to complaints, department records show. The department has sustained seven allegations against the agency, two for the "most serious type of violations in which there is an immediate risk to the health, safety or personal rights of those in care," and five for violations that could have turned into a risk if not corrected. In one of the more serious violations, a foster parent hit a child with a spatula as a form of discipline, records show. In another case, a foster parent blocked a child from entering the home. One of the violations considered less serious involved a foster parent who allowed a child to wander out of the home for a "significant amount of time" before realizing that the child was gone, records show. In another case, a foster parent was cited for keeping knives and cleaning products within easy access of children and for sleeping in the same room as children. Wimberly and Bledsoe said they lost custody of Allenia and her baby brother earlier this year because of domestic abuse and drug abuse. They said they fought one another but did not hit their children. They said they have been attending classes and taking other steps to try to regain custody of their children. "If she had been with us, she would still be alive," Allen Bledsoe said. Wimberly said she is eager to get her 1-year-old son out of foster care. "I want to get him out because I feel Child Protective Services isn't safe," she said. Alicia Bledsoe said she has also been trying for several months to get custody of the two children. CPS has a policy of placing children with relatives whenever possible. Alicia Bledsoe said CPS has visited her home several times and keeps making additional requests, such as saying her son and Wimberly can't live in the home, too. Alicia Bledsoe has a pile of toys and clothes she bought for Allenia because she assumed she would get custody. "I cry every time I see them," she said. Call The Bee's Brad Branan, (916) 321-1065. Follow him on Twitter @BradB_at_SacBee. Read more here: <http://www.sacbee.com/news/local/article4713789.html?storylink=cpy>

DHS sued on behalf of boys abused in foster care Photos WAILUKU, Hawaii —Hawaii attorneys are suing the state Department of Human Services on behalf of two boys who were sexually assaulted in a foster home. The lawsuit claims the department should have known from background checks that foster parent Florentino Rios, now serving a 20-year prison term for sexual assault, was not fit to care for children. The Maui News reports the boys were 14 and 15 when the abuse began. Attorney Matson Kelley says a 10-year-old also was molested but was left off the lawsuit so he wouldn't have to testify. Rios in February pleaded no contest to six counts of sexual assault. He is imprisoned at Halawa Correctional Facility. Department of Human Services spokeswoman Kayla Rosenfeld says the agency is aware of the issue but has no comment. Source: <http://www.kitv.com/news/dhs-sued-on-behalf-of-boys-abused-in-foster-care/30374138>

Foster Kids Have Big Plans for OR Legislature Public News Service - OR | December 2014 | The Oregon Foster Youth Connection says foster families often don't have enough money to supply equipment, transportation and other costs so kids can participate in extracurricular activities. The group will ask the Oregon Legislature to help. Photo credit: surpasspro/FeaturePics.com. December 22, 2014 PORTLAND, Ore. – The process of seeing a new law passed can be long and complicated, but it's a challenge foster children in Oregon are taking on – even some children who aren't old enough to vote. Members of the Oregon Foster Youth Connection are current and former foster children, ages 14 to 25. In 2015, they want state lawmakers to pave the way for more foster children to take part in after school activities. Rachel Vandecoevering, who is part of the group, says there isn't always enough money in foster families' budgets to pay for activities and transportation. She says members of the Oregon Foster Youth Connection have already talked with some lawmakers about drafting the bill. "I felt pretty good – nervous at first, because I've never talked to a representative before – but I felt pretty good, and felt pretty hopeful that it will happen," she says. There are almost 10,000 foster children statewide. Another proposal from the group is allowing foster children to have their own savings account. Since many are in multiple homes during their years in foster care, James Barta, outreach director with Children First for Oregon, says their situation just doesn't fit the traditional banking rules. "It's a little tricky, because they're minors and so, they can't enter into a legally binding agreement," he explains. "So, who's going to be the cosigner? This may require legislation that allows them to have a contract, where they can have a bank account to call their own." Barta calls the foster youth very compelling advocates, and says lawmakers appreciate the young people's first-hand knowledge of the foster care system. The group also wants the legislature to require that youth aging out of foster care have access to an Independent Living Program (ILP), up to age 21, to help them launch into adulthood. At 19, Vandecoevering says for her, it's been a big help. "I'm actually part of the ILP program right now," she relates. "They talk about banking, and what are the necessities for being out on your own, like an apartment, the basic needs for becoming independent. I like it – it's helped me move forward a lot." The Oregon Foster Youth Connection developed a Bill of Rights for foster children that passed unanimously in 2013 and is now in effect. A Lobby Day for Foster Youth on Feb. 9 will give the group's members another chance to test their negotiating skills in Salem. Chris Thomas, Public News Service - OR - See more at: <http://www.publicnewsservice.org/2014-12-22/childrens-issues/foster-kids-have-big-plans-for-or-legislature/a43392-1#sthash.DY5jWgwQ.dpuf>

Former Group Home Worker Accused Of Running Off With Teenage Girl To Mexico December 24, 2014 12:24 PM Share on Email 3 View Comments (credit: Ventura County Sheriff's Department) Related Tags: Camarillo, Camarillo Children's Learning Center, Denisse Romero, Oxnard You've Earned Points for Reading! Claim points in our Reward Center, and earn more tomorrow. Claim Points CAMARILLO (CBSLA.com) — Police say a woman who worked at a children's group home in Camarillo is in custody after twice running away with teenage girl who lived at the home. Denisse Lisbeth Romero, 27, was arrested Monday after Ventura County Sheriff's investigators found her hiding in the closet of a family members' home in the 1900 block of Ginger Street in Oxnard, following an investigation that spanned several states and into Mexico, where the teenage victim was previously rescued, authorities said. Romero, who is being held on $250,000 bail, faces charges of child stealing and sexual assault of a minor. She is scheduled to make her next court appearance on Jan. 6.

Investigators say Romero was working as a staff member in August at the Camarillo Children's Learning Center, where the 16-year-old victim was a resident. Romero and the girl began a romantic relationship, sheriff's officials said, leading to the girl running away from the home and Romero quitting the same day. Investigators found evidence the pair left California and ended up in Oklahoma City, Okla., where they were nearly captured. They were then found in Texas, where the girl was taken into custody by the San Antonio Police Department. Investigators say evidence suggested Romero fled to Mexico. The girl was returned to another group home in late August, but ran away the day after she arrived, authorities said. According to investigators, evidence suggested the girl ran away to Mexico, where she reunited with Romero. The pair apparently drove around Mexico and eventually moved into an apartment together in Ensenada. Ventura County sheriff's investigators contacted the FBI, who contacted members with the Mexican government. Mexican authorities located Romero and the girl, who was taken into protective custody, but Romero remained free because there was no formal extradition agreement in place, sheriff's officials said. The girl was returned to her legal guardian on Dec. 3. Source: <http://losangeles.cbslocal.com/2014/12/24/former-group-home-worker-accused-of-running-off-with-teenage-girl-to-mexico/>

Problem Solvers examine causes behind delays for hopeful foster parents in Missouri Posted 11:19 pm, December 29, 2014, by Linda Wagar Facebook63 Twitter4 Pinterest Google LinkedIn Email KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Missouri is at an all-time high for the number of children in foster care with 13,000 children in the system. So why has a couple who had hoped to become foster parents in time for the holidays been waiting seven months, and has yet to even start the training? A woman and her husband who live about an hour north of Kansas City hoping to become foster parents haven't had begun the necessary home study. What's more is that training classes have yet to be offered. "We were told we would be contacted within a month and no one contacted us," the woman said. She asked to have her identity hidden because she is afraid that speaking out will hurt her chances of ever becoming a foster parent. She agreed to share her story in hopes of shining a light on a foster care system that many accuse of being slow to respond to the thousands of children who rely on it for care. "I emailed the person who held the class and the only response I got was: 'we will give you information when we have information for a class,'" the woman explained. The foster care certification process takes from four to six months to complete, meaning if she were to start the process now, at least a year will have passed since she first signed up in May. "They should be getting in a training session immediately," said Jill Katz. Katz is a Kansas City attorney who represents foster parents and their families. "The social services department has a bad reputation within our state of providing services appropriately, timely and to the point of protecting children," she said. To address that problem, the State of Missouri privatized the foster care system in 2013 and put Cornerstones of Care in charge. The KC non-profit received $3.5 million from the state and is responsible for licensing, training and recruiting foster families. So why then, a year after receiving the state contract, are there still long delays? "That's not how we want services provided. Certainly since this contract first started this year, we have had a learning curve. We tried to increase our services over time," said Sheila Rancatore, a spokeswoman for Cornerstones of Care. Rancatore said the non-profit was initially overwhelmed by the demand from people interested in becoming foster parents. "As of December we have tripled the number of staff that are providing services on this contract and are working to figure out how we can get services to families within 30 to 60 days," Rancatore said. Rancatore said it was hard to predict the demand for services because the state had kept very little data. She said that since Cornerstones of Care took over the training, 497 new foster parents have been certified and they are hoping to increase that number in 2015. However, some parts of Missouri seem more welcoming to potential foster parents than others. In northwestern Missouri where the hopeful foster mom in this story lives, the only provider for foster care services is Missouri Baptist Children's Home, which subcontracts with Cornerstones of Care. According to its website, foster families have to be evangelical Christians, which would rule out non-Christians, Catholics and even most Protestants from becoming foster parents. Katz was shocked when she saw the website. "No matter what religion you are, being a religious person doesn't make you a good foster parent, being a good person makes you a good foster parent," she said. Katz said a state contractor can't exclude foster families because of their religion. "Being a Christian is not a prerequisite to being a foster parent," she said. After Problem Solvers asked about the website, Cornerstones of Care asked Missouri Baptist Children's Home to remove the language. We checked back a few weeks later and it had been taken down. Also, just a few days after this interview was conducted, our would-be foster mom was contacted about starting the process to become a foster parent. She's hopeful that soon she'll be able to open her home to a child in need of a family. Source: <http://fox4kc.com/2014/12/29/problem-solvers-examine-causes-behind-delays-for-hopeful-foster-parents-in-missouri/>

Minnesota temporarily suspends foster care license of home where 6-year-old died Article by: DAVID CHANEN, Star Tribune Updated: January 1, 2015 - 1:10 PM Brooklyn Park woman caring for 6-year-old when she died can appeal agency's decision. hide Kendrea Johnson, 6, died with a jump rope wrapped around her neck. Photo: Provided by Fox 9-KSMP, DML - Star Tribune photo galleries view larger resize text print buy reprints Share109 Days after 6-year-old Kendrea Johnson died with a jump rope around her neck in the bedroom of her Brooklyn Park foster home, the Minnesota Department of Human Services temporarily suspended the license of her foster care mother. Because of the girl's death late Saturday, the agency decided Monday that Tannise Nawaqavou cannot ensure the safety of the children she has under her care, the state said. Johnson's 1-year-old brother, Charles, has been removed from her home, and no other children remain in the house, the state said. Nawaqavou, 53, who was licensed in 2011, can appeal the department's decision. As recently as September, Kendrea's court-appointed advocate had recommended that Hennepin County consider alternative housing for the girl, court documents said. "She was a cute little girl who appeared well-cared-for to me," said Barbara Englund, her kindergarten music teacher in 2013 at Sheridan Arts Magnet School in Minneapolis. "She never acted up in my class, and worked really hard. The teachers cared about her." But a report made in late November by the caseworker assigned to reunite Kendrea and her brother with their parents painted a more troubled life at school and with her various foster providers. The children had been in foster care for nearly a year. Nawaqavou had cared for them over the previous six months, Kendrea's uncle Willie Venzant said Wednesday. They were placed in foster care after child protection said their parents repeatedly failed to comply with efforts to keep the children safe, according to court documents. In August, a guardian ad litem said Kendrea wanted to live with her grandmother. The caseworker's report said Kendrea had an outgoing personality and a lot of energy while at home. But she also displayed unusually aggressive behavior at home and school for a child her age, had been suspended at school six times, and would try to run away from her foster care provider, the report said. The caseworker told the provider that if she continued to find it difficult to keep her safe at home, she should contact a hospital, the report said. The county was planning to have a personal care attendant help with the children. Venzant said his niece didn't act out at all when she was around the people she loved. He said his family hasn't planned her funeral yet because they remain in shock over her death Saturday. Details from the scene When Brooklyn Park police were called to Nawaqavou's home in the 9200 block of Queens Garden Avenue N., they found Kendrea not breathing. The details of what happened that night were in a search warrant made public this week. Her foster parents told police she went to bed about 8 p.m., her usual bedtime, according to the search warrant. A 30-year-old man who lives at the home checked on her 10 minutes later and said she had been coloring and that there appeared to be no problems. When the man checked on Kendrea at 8:30 p.m., she was hanging from a jump rope that was tied to the top support post of the bunk bed in her bedroom, the warrant said. He took Kendrea down and started to try to resuscitate her. The crime lab deputy found the knot securing the jump rope to be very sophisticated, and a deputy at the scene said he didn't believe a 6-year-old girl could tie that kind of knot, the warrant said. Blood, possibly from Kendrea, was found on one of the bunk bed's blankets. A white bucket that her foster parents said wasn't usually in the bedroom was found near the bed, the warrant said. Handwritten notes on torn book pages that appeared to have been created by a child were found on the floor. Kendrea's foster parents told investigators she didn't have a history of mental illness or of trying to hurt herself, the warrant said. But in August, her guardian had requested a mental health evaluation for the girl. Police said again Wednesday that the case is not being treated as a homicide, and that they continue to investigate. Brooklyn Park Police Deputy Chief Mark Bruley said his five investigators are working hard to uncover the facts. "Any death investigation is serious, but one involving a child is certainly concerning to us," he said. "Everybody would agree this is something [where] we have to figure out what happened." License sanction mulled Nawaqavou, who couldn't be reached for comment Wednesday, was notified Monday that her license would be temporarily suspended. Family Alternatives, a private agency that licensed her, learned that law enforcement and Hennepin County child protection were investigating her because of Kendrea's death, according to the Department of Human Services. Family Alternatives is a state-licensed foster care and adoption agency. It recruits, assesses and trains foster families, the agency's website said. Executive Director Joan Riebel didn't return repeated phone calls Wednesday. Nawaqavou's license suspension will remain in effect until any investigations are completed and a determination is made whether there will be a final licensing sanction, said Department of Human Services media relations manager Karen Smigielski. The department has 90 days to make its decision. If the license is revoked, Nawaqavou would be prohibited from holding any department license for at least five years, Smigielski said. Nawaqavou would have the right to appeal any final licensing sanction. Last year, the department issued five temporary suspensions of child foster care licenses and 53 revocations. In 2013, there was one suspension and 51 revocations. Success cut short Englund, Kendrea's former music teacher, said she never knew her student was in foster care. The little girl liked music, memorized nursery rhymes and played rhythmic instruments, she said. Every quarter at the school, a student from each of the five different sections is picked to be honored at an assembly. Kendrea was one of those winners, beating out 125 other students in her section. "She was very excited," Englund said. "She had success in her life. And now that little success feels real sad when you think about her death." David Chanan • 612-673-4465 Source: <http://www.startribune.com/local/west/287222521.html?page=all&prepage=1&c=y#continue>

State Supreme Court upholds contempt order for HHS : Journal Star Breaking News State Supreme Court upholds contempt order for HHS 2 Saved Save Article My Saved Items Print Email 2015-01-02T12:58:00Z 2015-01-02T19:32:20Z State Supreme Court upholds contempt order for HHS The Associated Press The Associated Press January 02, 2015 12:58 pm • By MARGERY A. BECK / The Associated Press 0 × Related Photos Buy Now » Buy Now Courts logo 2014 Enlarge Photo A contempt of court order will stand against the Nebraska Department of Health and Human Services over its handling of a state ward's foster placement, the Nebraska Supreme Court said Friday. The high court said the juvenile court's order ensures enforcement of other state laws governing the foster placement of children and guardians ad litem representing wards of the state. The case involves a 12-year-old boy who had been in foster care since he was 3, and who court records say suffers from fetal alcohol syndrome and other behavioral disorders. He had gone through at least 17 foster placements before being put in a Norfolk group home in 2012, where he got one-on-one care and showed significant improvement. A Douglas County juvenile court ordered the boy to remain in the program until further notice. In late September or early October 2013, the boy's caseworker was made aware that the Norfolk home's licensing was threatened by contract negotiations with the state. The caseworker failed to inform the county attorney, juvenile court or the boy's guardian ad litem about his possible removal from the home, later saying she did not believe such action was imminent. He was moved to a different foster home Nov. 1. The caseworker didn't tell the other involved parties until two days before he was moved and deleted emails related to his placement. The boy's guardian ad litem then sought a contempt order against HHS, saying it defied the court order to keep the boy at the Norfolk home, and against the private child welfare agency with which HHS had contracted. The juvenile court judge issued the contempt order, requiring the department and agency to pay a $5,000 fine. That order could be purged, the judge said, only if the department issues a written policy requiring officials to be informed whenever a child's placement is threatened for any reason and forbidding the deletion or destruction of email and other correspondence between case managers and others regarding minor children for six months after the case is closed. The department appealed, saying the judge's order violated the separation of powers doctrine by imposing a rule or regulation that is solely the function of the executive branch. The high court upheld that order 5-2, with Justices Kenneth Stephan and William Connolly dissenting. "We've reviewed the opinion, and the department will decide either to pay the fine or purge the contempt order as ordered by the court," HHS spokesman Russ Reno said. Source: http://journalstar.com/news/local/911/supreme-court-upholds-contempt-order-for-hhs/article_8f28c105-3713-56d1-b149-c551059915dc.html

Illinois lawmakers say DCFS problems widespread, systemic - News - Journal Standard - Freeport, IL Illinois lawmakers say DCFS problems widespread, systemic Comment 0 By Chuck Sweeney The Journal-Standard Journal Standard By Chuck Sweeney The Journal-Standard Posted Jan. 7, 2015 @ 5:03 pm Updated Jan 7, 2015 at 7:28 PM By Chuck Sweeney The Journal-Standard Posted Jan. 7, 2015 @ 5:03 pm Updated Jan 7, 2015 at 7:28 PM » RELATED CONTENT • Chuck Sweeney: Freedom isn't free: Machesney Park— Our View: Illinois must fix Department of Children and Fa... Social News By Chuck Sweeney The Journal-Standard Posted Jan. 7, 2015 @ 5:03 pm Updated Jan 7, 2015 at 7:28 PM A joint Illinois House-Senate committee had the first of what could be many hearings Wednesday, sparked by a newspaper's series that investigated conditions at 50 youth facilities overseen by the Department of Children and Family Services. One of those is Rock River Academy in Rockford. Sen. Tim Bivins, R-Dixon, said new leadership at DCFS is desperately needed. Noting that the acting director said the alleged abuses are appalling and unacceptable, Bivins said, "why wasn't it appalling and unacceptable yesterday, or last year? It comes down to the kind of people you hire and leadership. Hopefully we'll get some leadership" under the new governor. According to a staff report prepared for Sen. Dave Syverson, R-Rockford, the Chicago Tribune series said that from 2011 to 2013, "Illinois residential facilities sent 428 reports alleging a ward was sexually assaulted or abused while in their care; the facilities submitted 1,052 reports that a ward was physically assaulted by staff or by a peer during those three years. The facilities notified DCFS of 29,425 incidents when a ward ran away or went missing. That is an average of 27 runaway reports a day." Sen. Steve Stadelman, D-Rockford, said by phone from Chicago during a break in the committee meeting, that the problems at DCFS are widespread and systemic. "This agency has had no continuity from the top down. It has had seven directors in three years," said Stadelman. Acting director Bobbie Gregg is resigning Jan. 19. Bruce Rauner, the incoming governor, will name a new director. "The hearing got started at 10 a.m.," said Stadelman at 3 p.m. "The committee is to serve as a fact-finding panel to gather information and look at legislation that will address our concerns." Stadelman said DCFS has had problems "going on for 20, 30, 40 years, and according to the Tribune things are not getting better. The issues are very complex. Workers at the residential centers tend to make low wages and they're dealing with very troubled and difficult kids." One glaring problem that came out during the hearing, said Stadelman, "was the lack of data. DCFS is a major agency but they don't have a handle on major problems like who has run away, who's missing, how many have been arrested. If you're going to address a problem, you need data, and DCFS doesn't have the data. It's unacceptable." Stadelman said there probably is not one, giant legislative fix, "but we have to make sure that staff members who are taking care of troubled teens have the ability to do their jobs. Yes it's complex, but if not dealt with, things will get worse."

Illinois lawmakers say DCFS problems widespread, systemic - News - Journal Standard - Freeport, IL Page 2 of 2 - Syverson's staff report said a December 2014 audit discovered DCFS "cannot properly account for thousands of runaway or otherwise missing foster care children, cannot properly keep track of runaways when they disappear, and can rarely show that proper authorities are contacted when they disappear." Also, "an estimated 2,800 to 3,100 foster children, or state wards, disappeared in 26,500 to 29,200 incidents. The agency did not differentiate between those who had runaway and those whose whereabouts could not immediately be determined." The DCFS budget is about $1.2 billion, a reduction of $86.6 million since 2005. But Syverson cautioned that before jumping to conclusions, "What we need to know is how widespread these things are. Normally when a case occurs you deal with it right away and make sure the people involved are held accountable. But is this more widespread than a few isolated cases, and was the severity of some of these issues kept under wraps? That's what we intend to find out." Syverson said that DCFS is the most difficult agency in state government, because its workers have to make gut-wrenching decisions about children every day. "It's the only agency where you are asked to play God, making decisions about whether or not to separate children from their families, and where to put them. You are dealing with very difficult children and sometimes impossible children." Chuck Sweeney: 815-987-1366; csweeney@trstar.com; <http://chucksweeney> Source: <http://www.journalstandard.com/article/20150107/NEWS/150109631/10286/NEWS/?Start=1>

